CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—THIRTIETH PARLIAMENT

25 Elizabeth II

VOLUME XIV, 1976

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE EIGHTH DAY OF JUNE, 1976, TO THE TWELFTH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1976, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

Published under the authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons by the Queen's Printer for Canada

Available from Printing and Publishing, Supply and Services, Ottawa, Canada K1A 0S9

95570—1½

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 8, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Monday, June 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue with my remarks on Bill C-84 which I commenced last night. Last evening I suggested that the abolitionists should become jail guards; I think they would then find out first hand what a precarious occupation it is, especially when dealing with dangerous murderers like Lucas and Kelly.

I was commenting last night on Donald Kelly's latest escapade when he attempted escape from jail with a toy gun. I was pointing out that it was not only a toy gun, it was a gun plain and simple. If a fake gun can be smuggled into or manufactured in a prison cell, then just as easily can a real one. As romantic as he may be at a distance, Kelly is a convicted murderer with experience in prison breakouts. It was only a fluke that he was unable to take a hostage, a procedure for which a toy gun concealed is every bit as effective as a real gun exposed. His overnight seige in the North Bay jail might have ended in an escape or shoot-out; had the gun been real it almost certainly would have. North Bay was lucky this time, but that is all the more reason to ensure that there is no second incident. How did Kelly obtain the gun? Why was he in a cellblock area when he should have been in his cell? Only a thoroughgoing investigation will provide the answers and I think they should be provided promptly.

Members of parliament have received letters from psychiatrists with regard to dealing with these dangerous murderers. I should like to quote from a letter I received from two psychiatrists in New Westminster, British Columbia:

> Dear Sir:
>
> We are writing to recommend that you decide upon and vote in favour of retention of the death penalty. We also recommend that you use your influence to ensure that it is implemented where there are no extenuating circumstances to warrant stay of execution. More humane and acceptable methods than hanging should also be considered.

This is a matter I have raised on two occasions in the House of Commons. I presented a motion to the effect that this subject be transferred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where we could hear witnesses and discuss alternate methods to the rope. I feel that if we did find a more humane method of executing a murderer, maybe some of the abolitionists would reconsider, but unfortunately my motion was turned down by the Liberals. These two psychiatrists go on to say this:

> Both of us were born and grew up in the heartland of Canada. We are well qualified psychiatrists who have spent the past twenty-five years interviewing and treating Canadians from all walks of life. We feel that this background and experience qualifies us to offer you an opinion on this subject, and that we have both a professional and social responsibility to do so.

That is the opinion of two psychiatrists, Mr. Speaker. They say plainly and simply that rehabilitation is impossible in many cases.

Recently there was a news article containing comments by two leading psychiatrists who are experts when it comes to dealing with dangerous criminals. They say that it is better to hang killers than to introduce long prison terms with no hope of parole. Dr. Elliott Barker, who developed Ontario's treatment program for the criminally insane at one of our big mental hospitals, and Dr. Barry Boyd, medical director of the hospital, have said that they are opposed to capital punishment but that the death penalty is a lesser evil than mandatory sentences of up to 25 years as proposed by the federal government.

Among the numerous communications relating to capital punishment that I have received in the past few weeks are many from people who are of the opinion that Bill C-84 symbolizes the permissiveness that they believe is a threat to their safety. To many people it symbolizes a soft-on-crime attitude that is only encouraging further violence. The vast majority of Canadians are calling for a change in attitude and direction.

I wish to make it clear from the outset that I believe capital punishment should be retained in all cases of premeditated murder and other extreme types of murder. I have on several occasions spoken and voted in favour of the retention of capital punishment, and that will be the tenor of my remarks today. There are those who claim that, as a result of nearly a decade of debating capital punishment in parliament, Hansard is full of every conceivable argument for or against capital punishment. Perhaps that is so, but the fact of the matter remains that the murder rate has been consistently increasing and the public is not satisfied with the solutions offered by the government.

A strong conviction is growing among Canadians that we need the death penalty as one way of reversing the permissive trend of the past decade. Indeed, every national survey has indicated that a vast majority favours the retention of capital punishment, including surveys commissioned by this government. Yet, rather than asking themselves why so many people are calling for the restoration of the death penalty, the abolitionists continue to vilify these people. Abolitionists should ask themselves why so many good, decent, law abiding people desire a continuation of the death penalty. These people are not cruel, but they are concerned and they are demanding that their government and parliament become concerned too.

● (1110)

Advocates of abolition have never claimed that public opinion is with them. They seem to be satisfied with in playing the role of an elitist minority, and speak as if the desire to retain the death penalty shows some kind of blood lust or a perverse sadism. Very few people would find much pleasure in the sight of someone being executed. The public wants protection, it does not want cruelty. Most individuals want to serve notice on the criminal element that society is prepared to defend itself. They cannot receive such assurances from the legislation presently before parliament.

Everyone knows full well that Bill C-84 is a nothing bill which will do nothing to reverse the trend towards violent crime in this country. I am opposed to this legislation, not out of a burning desire to invoke the death penalty, but because I see Bill C-84 as one more step down the road of permissiveness. The death penalty is, indeed, a subject being discussed widely these days. During the past few months the print and electronic media have been flooded with commentary on capital punishment.

One of the questions confronting Canadians everywhere, and especially those of Christian persuasion is, is it ever morally right for government to take the life of a human being who has murdered. Christians are, of course, divided on this subject, though a candid examination of the Bible shows that both the old and new testament support it. There are those, of course, who claim to have religious objections to capital punishment but avoid the practical consideration of the command "Thou shalt not kill". Thou shalt not kill is better translated as, you shall not murder. It should be clear to every thinking person that while murder is always killing, killing is not always murder. Capital punishment is killing but it is far from murder. To say thou shalt not kill as an argument against capital punishment is a flagrant misrepresentation of scripture. The Bible says society has a right to put a murderer to death. Numerous people in my riding believe that the current government is not fulfilling its moral obligation to society or its Christian obligation to God.

Naturally one has to ask just what the retention of the death penalty would do. Abolitionists would argue that abolition does not result in crime run rampant, or social peace if the death penalty is restored. They would argue that capital punishment has no deterrent value whatsoever. With that kind of an elitist argument they ignore the real issue at hand. A former Chief Justice and President of the United States, William Taft, once said:

The abolition of the death penalty is a mistake. It certainly is a deterrent for crimes of bloody violence.

In looking at the deterrent factor one must consider it as an attempt to save innocent lives in the future and not, in isolation, in relation to the fate of the guilty murderer. This very parliament considered capital punishment a sufficiently effective deterrent to reserve it for the protection of policemen and prison guards during the five-year moratorium. I have never heard it said that capital punishment is no deterrent to murder. The only question anybody raises is whether it is an effective or significant deterrent. Perhaps we should look at the deterrent factor from the point of view of whether capital punishment would prevent all murders. I think not. Surely, we could not expect that any more than a 25-year sentence in prison would stop murder.

In speaking of the 25-year prison sentence, one has to seriously consider the possibility that such a law could be amended or even repealed at any time. Such a law is no guarantee that society will be protected from the criminal element. In all seriousness, I wonder how effective the 25-year sentence would be and how strictly it would be enforced. Given this government's lax track record I would suggest it would be a risky venture. In this debate one could quote reams of statistics, but he will find the common sense of most Canadians leads them to believe that the threat of the death penalty is a deterrent. It is superficial to even suggest that the threat of capital punishment has no deterrent value.

There are those who would suggest that capital punishment brutalizes society. So, however, does murder and that fact is seldom mentioned. The people of this country would not, I am sure, hesitate to say that a properly carried out execution is less brutalizing than murders reported in the press with the brutal headlines that read: Elderly couple hacked to death with axe; Four children slaughtered by prison escapee; Young woman raped and strangled; Thirteen shot in gangland rampage, and numerous others of a similar character.

It is the growing number of brutal murders that cause the obvious reaction when abolitionists pose the question, would you go and witness an execution? The answer is: Yes, but only if you will accompany the police to the bloody scene of a violent murder in which the victim was beaten, mutilated, knifed or shot. One would then ask which was the more brutal scene. A great deal of the apprehension and opposition to the death penalty is based on revulsion against the gruesome aspect of hanging. In this day and age the medical profession is capable of devising methods which are not only painless but also certain and efficient.

On April 1 I spoke in favour of having the subject of capital punishment referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to find a more humane way of applying capital punishment. I still stand by that suggestion. I do so because of two overriding concerns: First, the majority of Canadians favour retention; and, second, many people consider hanging barbaric. Some abolitionists say it is asking too much of anyone to enforce capital punishment. I contend that the responsibilities of office carry with them the responsibility of carrying forward the administration of justice.

The death penalty represents the final right of organized society to rid itself of those who will not conform in any respect to civilized life. Such people are a minority and are not to be confused with others who might take a life in a moment of passion. There are those abolitionists who would lead people to believe that those who favour retention want a blanket imposition of capital punishment. That is a falsehood. The vast majority of Canadians are normal citizens who find the death penalty a distasteful subject to discuss. Common sense warns them that the removal of the final right of society to carry out the supreme punishment tells the criminal that no matter how horrible and vicious the crime, his own life will be protected.

Several weeks ago I mentioned that in the many letters and phone calls I have received from constituents they share with me their concerns about being safe and that their children will grow up in a safe society. At that time I quoted Mr. William Gold, of the Calgary Herald, who described the type of individual society fears when he wrote:

> Contemporary society is producing a singularly savage type of animal, entirely lacking in comprehension of, or respect for, the lives of other people. These psychopaths know perfectly well what they are doing is wrong legally and morally, but the act of murder causes them no sense of personal revulsion.

Society wants guaranteed protection from that sort of individual because who can say where he will strike next.

I have always rejected the notion that society seeks vengeance. I call it simple justice and a desire for safety. Capital punishment has been upheld through the centuries because of the commitment of society to the sanctity of life. It is a principle of law that the penalty must in some way fit the crime. That is the basis of having a penal code.

The death penalty is based on the belief that taking a life is so great an offence it requires the supreme penalty. Having regard to the qualms of those who cringe at the death penalty, Hon. Ernest Manning made a very pertinent observation as follows:

> In this respect there is evident in society today a strange and indefensible inconsistency. Many of those who are the most vocal in demanding the abolition of the death penalty because they hold it to be morally wrong to put a murderer to death are frequently the same people who are champions of abortion on demand. In other words, they argue it is morally right to deliberately destroy the life of an unborn innocent child, but it is morally wrong to exact the death penalty in the case of a murderer who has deliberately taken the life of another human being.

Such reasoning is beyond me. If our country is to be consistent about the state's right to impose the death penalty, then we must reject the idea that it is legalized murder. If that were the case a soldier defending this country in war and a policeman using his gun in the line of duty would be guilty of legalized murder. I doubt very seriously if anyone in this House would be ready to say that we should disarm our army and police.

● (1120)

Mr. Speaker, in the numerous articles I have had the opportunity to read on the issue of capital punishment I have searched for the one argument, the one statistic, the one tidbit of new information which could somehow shed new light on this debate. The fact of the matter is that as individuals we have been too concerned about statistics to meet the real issue head on. That issue is that we, as elected representatives of the Canadian people, have a moral responsibility to deal with capital punishment. I for one will not shrink from that responsibility.

Throughout history as organized nations emerged it has been recognized that society has the right to impose any kind of penalty on any offender against the law. In every case where the law is broken there is a penalty of some sort. A state that can incarcerate an offender for 25 years surely is capable of applying capital punishment. In the discussions concerning murders we hear such comments from abolitionists as, "the murderer is a product of his environment" and, "society must show some degree of sympathy". It worries me, Mr. Speaker, that we might be heading down a road of uncontrolled permissiveness that would have us take the easy way at the expense of public safety. How much sympathy I wonder has been shown for the family and friends of the victims of ruthless murderers.

Even if parliament does pass Bill C-84 and abolishes capital punishment, I believe that every citizen of this country should ask the government in a resounding chorus: What are you going to do about your soft-on-crime record? This government has gone too far in its efforts to appease an elitist minority who have no concern about crime run rampant. Time and time again we have seen this government shirk its responsibility in the field of law enforcement.

In the area of law enforcement, Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly mention one segment of our society which will be especially endangered by the abolition of capital punishment,—our police and prison guards. There was a time when the boys in blue were held in high regard, indeed respected, and it was the boyhood dream of many to some day be a policeman. In view of the way our law enforcement officers are being hindered and threatened, must we say that those law enforcement officers who die in the course of duty will do so in vain! I should hope not.

The Nuremburg trials, Mr. Speaker, showed the world that no one can shrug off responsibility. The free nations had a responsibility to show the cold-blooded Nazis that wholesale murder will not be tolerated, so we must tell the criminal element that murder will not be tolerated in Canada. This parliament will not solve the problem of the cancer of crime by merely voting for or against capital punishment, but I contend that a vote for retention will be the beginning of an all-out battle against the ills of crime.

Now that I have put to this House my reasons for asking for the re-instatement of capital punishment I wish to return to the subject of public opinion and the will of the public. Some day all of us who have been elected to this parliament will be judged on our decisions in regard to bill C-84 and indeed on the attitude that we have towards crime. We live, supposedly, in a democratic society in which the government must express the will of the people. It certainly is a sad commentary on the members of the government when their arrogance makes them believe they are more knowledgeable than the vast majority of people. When this happens I fear that we have only seen the beginning of rule by elitist minorities.

As we head toward a decision on capital punishment I hope that every member of this House takes into account that this is not only a vote for or against capital punishment but that it will determine the attitude and direction of this country in years to come in regard to crime. A society without the ultimate protection might some day find itself in the sad state where the law of the jungle rules. When I say that, I can almost hear the professional liberals accusing me of being a prophet of doom. I believe the time has come to stop lulling the Canadian people into believing everything will be fine if only they blindly follow. I for one have more faith than that in my fellow citizens. I would certainly derive no pleasure or satisfaction from saying I told you so, but I do wish that this parliament would face the fact that our society is not perfect, that crime does exist, and finally that we do have a responsibility to fight crime. Mr. Speaker, let us express the will of the people and continue capital punishment.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, lest I be accused of benefitting from yesterday's order to prolong this debate, I will be very brief. My primary intention in rising is to correct an impression that was left by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) when he indicated that the Donald Kelly case, as I see it in Hansard, almost bankrupted the municipality. I trust he was speaking of North Bay. Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate for the record that the total cost of that chase was somewhere in the vicinity of $101,000, $92,000 of which was paid by the province of Ontario. Out of a total budget of $20.5 million for the city of North Bay, even if the Province of Ontario had not paid the amounts to which I have referred, surely there was no indication of an insolvency on the part of North Bay, a city by the way which is on a very sound financial basis and enjoying a fruitful economic life as well as a social life.

Also I should like to place on the record my intention to support the government's bill in this instance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I have heard those arguments before. I am not persuaded by them and I am sure he has not been persuaded by the arguments advanced by the abolitionists from whichever side of the House they may have been made.

In order to shorten my remarks I would simply adopt those arguments which have been advanced by the abolitionists that an act of hanging or execution, whether public or private, is in effect a collective act of violence. By such an act society condones violence and by condoning encourages it. I could not accept such a collective act of violence. Secondly, I am persuaded that capital punishment does not act as a deterrent in any sense. Statistics have been presented on both sides of that argument. I am persuaded it is not a deterrent.

The third argument flows directly from that, namely that I can see capital punishment in instances where it would be required as a means of self-defence, that is a method of self-defence available to society. I fail to see, when we have one of the most advanced systems of criminal justice and one of the most elaborate and sophisticated systems of the administration of justice, that indeed collective killing can serve as a means of self-defence.

Those are my comments. I will not vote in favour of capital punishment. I am pleased that the government has presented in this instance a bill proposing total abolition and I commend it for that measure.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on that point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asking a question?

Mr. McKenzie: I did not hear the hon. member's original remarks. Was he speaking on a point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): No. He was recognized as a speaker for a short period of time.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on a point of order? I will apologize and withdraw the remark about bankruptcy in the honourable area of North Bay, but the area certainly was subjected to some financial problems. I believe the latest news reports show that the city is trying to negotiate more funds from the Ontario government to help pay for the excessive police costs. I will put this on the record and withdraw the bankruptcy statement.

● (1130)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point to indicate that there is a dispute between the provincial authorities and the municipal authorities relating, I believe, to some overtime costs and statutory payments amounting to $9,000. However, that is a very small amount in comparison with the total budget of the police commission of $9.2 million.

While I am on my feet, I should like to indicate that indeed in rising I did not wish to demonstrate bravado in response to those of my constituents who have indicated that they wished me to support capital punishment. I would simply like to say that I have received correspondence from both sides, from those who wanted me to support capital punishment and from those who wished me to support the bill now before the House. I have dealt with them both on the same basis. I indicated to them that in accordance with parliamentary tradition my responsibility is to exercise my judgment in accordance with my conscience. If we agree that there is to be a free vote on this bill in the absence of whips, which means that hon. members will vote in accordance with their consciences freely and openly, then that is the way in which I intend to vote.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I will not say in my opening remarks that it is a pleasure to be able to speak today on Bill C-84. It has never been a pleasure for me to rise in this House and discuss the pros and cons of the death penalty. However, I feel now as I have always felt that it is my responsibility to take part in these debates. It is my responsibility as a member of parliament, my responsibility to my constituents, and my responsibility to myself as a concerned Canadian.

I call again on the government to reinstate the death penalty for premeditated murders. I do so in the full knowledge that it is the will of the great majority of Canadians that we take drastic and serious measures to protect them from those people in our society who would take the life of another. I ask for the reinstatement of the death penalty for capital murder not because I have a low regard for life, but rather because I have such a high regard for life. I believe sincerely that we in the House have a higher responsibility to the law abiding citizens of Canada than to those who take the law in their own hands.

Our responsibility is all the greater in that we cannot pass the buck along to someone else, and wipe our hands of the unpleasant duty of making a firm decision on this matter. The buck stops right here. It is an awesome responsibility to have to assume the responsibility of deciding whether or not a person convicted of deliberate, premeditated murder, should pay with his or her own life. I have never pretended that it is easy to say simply that someone or other must die by order of a court, and ultimately by order of the parliament of Canada.

We can make it easy though, if we want to, Mr. Speaker; we can say that state-ordered executions are murders in themselves, and pass the buck along to our courts, our prison system, our parole boards and along to the sociologists and criminologists and the rest of the bleeding hearts. We can wash our hands of this matter easily enough, and in fact the cabinet has been doing just that since the majority of members in this House decided several years ago to adopt this government's compromise solution to the problem of capital punishment. We decided that only murderers of policemen or prison guards should suffer the death penalty, but although several death penalties have been imposed by our courts under that law, not a single penalty has been carried out. The cabinet has commuted every sentence imposed during that period.

I said that we could make it easy on ourselves by passing along the responsibility for making a decision on capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, but that is not the same as saying that we have a moral right to do so. We know that no one else will make a decision, even if we were able to give them the authority. We know that everyone else, except our courts, takes the easy way out by adopting the holier-than-thou position of opposing capital punishment on moral grounds. This great liberal morality does not extend to the victims of murderers, however; it extends only to the murderers, as though they suddenly become a part of some higher civilization, or a cult of people who are above the law and above the condemnation of the very society against which they have raised their hand.

I maintain that we cannot avoid the moral responsibility before us any longer, Mr. Speaker. We must make a decision without too much delay that we will not and cannot look upon deliberate and premeditated murder as anything but what it is. Wilful murder and treason against one's own country are capital crimes. The argument that a civilized and sophisticated society does not condone state-ordered executions does not hold water. As the member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) pointed out a few days ago in this House, a state that maintains a judiciary like ours, with its avenues of appeal and our reverence for justice, cannot commit murder.

Some people have used the argument that the state commits murder if it sentences its own citizens to death for capital crimes, but I consider that argument to be feeble and baseless. I consider it to be a cop-out. If the time comes when we consider murder and treason to be less than capital crimes, then I think that our days as a free and democratic country are numbered. When we decide that we do not want to fight back, that we do not consider it important to win the war that is being waged within our country between the law abiding and the lawless, then this great country of ours from that time on will be less than great.

When we are elected to parliament, those who vote for us must surely believe that we are capable and competent, and that we have the courage to make decisions and stick by them, no matter how distasteful those decisions might be to us personally. Not all of the decisions that we make here can be entirely to our liking. The alternatives to avoiding unpleasant decisions usually are more unpleasant in the long haul, and this is one of the reasons I insist that capital crimes in our society must carry the death penalty. The alternative that has been proposed by the government, 25 years in prison, has already incurred the wrath of the do-gooders and the social experts. They say that this is just as inhuman and inhumane as the death penalty. They wonder out loud how any civilized society could even think of caging up one of its own citizens for 25 years. Of course, Mr. Speaker, none of these experts and bleeding hearts propose any credible alternatives to the death penalty, or to the longer prison sentence. The best they can do is to condemn our proposals, and renounce our decisions.

When this House adopted the government's compromise solution to the question of capital punishment, it was a trade-off. In place of abolition we adopted selective capital punishment for murderers of policemen and prison guards. This presumably satisfied the abolitionists and the retentionists as well. The abolitionists could feel satisfied that the majority of murderers would escape the noose, and that in the cases where the death penalty applied, there was always the possibility that the cabinet would commute the sentences of convicted murderers of police officers. They had everything going for them, including a justice minister who was a public-avowed abolitionist.

On the other hand, the retentionists believed that the government would live up to the mandate of parliament. We believed that the government would honour their own commitment to execute convicted murderers of policemen and prison guards in exchange for this limited application of capital punishment. The fact is that they did not live up to their mandate from parliament, and they did not honour their own commitment. We have de facto abolition of capital punishment, and this speaks louder than anything else I can think of against the conscience of this government.

● (1140)

The trade off did not work, except to get the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) off the hook. I have always maintained that we do not have a moral right to engage in trade offs on an issue as important to our society as capital punishment. We have a moral responsibility to face this issue head on, and if we are called to make an unpleasant decision or if we are called upon to decide that persons convicted of a deliberate murder should pay with their own lives, then we must do that and live with our decision. It would take a lot more courage to do that than just to pass the buck along, but I hope that we possess that much courage.

During the years that the capital punishment issue has been before parliament many members have suggested that this is a matter for the people of our country to settle by way of a national referendum, and I am one who believes that this is the only way it can be settled once and for all. In a survey conducted recently by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Association 55,282 people responded that the issue of capital punishment should be decided by a national vote, while only 3,444 felt that it should be decided in a forum such as the House of Commons. In this survey 55,374 people said they believed that capital punishment should be applied in the case of anyone convicted of the murder of any citizen during the commission of a crime. I would take this a step further and say that the act of premeditated murder is the crime which is being committed, and so I cannot distinguish between this premeditated murder and a murder committed during another type of crime.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) pointed out in his remarks on Bill C-84 that the abolitionists are playing down the overwhelming public support for capital punishment. The abolitionists say that we should not be influenced by the opinion polls which have been conducted on this subject around the country by various groups and agencies. If the polls were to show that the majority of Canadians were opposed to capital punishment, we would see and hear an awful lot of statistics from the abolitionists. However, they and we know that the polls show that anywhere from 75 per cent to 95 per cent of Canadians want to return to capital punishment, and the majority of them want a return to capital punishment for all premeditated murder.

The survey conducted by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Association indicates that 87.6 per cent of the 68,745 people responding to the poll favour a return to the death penalty. In my own riding of Victoria-Haliburton, of the people who contacted me on this subject, 95.66 per cent were in favour of retaining the death penalty for the crime of murder. They are concerned about the alarming rise in violent crime in Canada today. These people are concerned about the fact that the murder rate in Canada has doubled in the past ten years, and that is the actual rate per 100,000 people, as noted by the hon. member for Provencher.

The government has only itself to blame for the present public demands that we reinstate the death penalty for all types of premeditated murder. This government was given a mandate by parliament ten years ago, and this was reaffirmed four years ago. That mandate was about as simple and straightforward as a mandate could be. It called for the death penalty for murderers of police officers and prison officials, but as has been pointed out over and over again in these debates, not one convicted murderer of a policeman or prison guard has been executed.

In every speech I have made on this subject I have asked why there are so many people in our society, in the government and in the private sector who rush to the defence of murderers, while the victims of those murderers are ignored, forgotten and in most cases hardly even given a thought. I agree with those who say that executing a murderer will not bring his victim back to life, but I am convinced that it would serve notice on others who might plan to commit murders that the price is high, too high to make it worth the chance of being caught. I am one of those who feels that the death penalty would be a deterrent to premeditated murder.

I must add my voice to those who ask where our society is going. I join the chorus of those who ask how we could devote so much time and effort to securing the comfort and wellbeing of those convicted of murder and other violent crimes. It is obvious from the volume of mail which all members of parliament are receiving on this subject that the Canadian people are concerned about the kind of society this government is creating in Canada, and it is just as obvious that the great majority of Canadians are not prepared to accept that kind of society.

Much has been said about the manner in which the government should execute murderers, and I know that many people feel uncomfortable about even discussing methods of implementing the death penalty. I share that feeling to some extent, but I do not allow it to influence my thinking on the necessity for applying the death penalty. If anyone has such strong feelings about the inhumanity of hanging, then let us establish first of all that the death penalty will be retained and then seek an alternative to hanging as the method of applying the penalty.

I would like to say a few words about the study commissioned by the Solicitor General on capital punishment. Judging by the negative results the minister obtained from the report on that study, I suggest that the minister would like to forget the report. However, the fact is that the minister did commission a known abolitionist criminologist, a person who presumably came to Canada from Egypt and who quite obviously does not know very much about Canadians to make this study. This criminologist, Ezzat Fattah, who now teaches at Simon Fraser University, was apparently quite upset to learn that his own survey revealed that 70 per cent to 80 per cent of Canadians favour a return to the death penalty for all types of murder.

Mr. Fattah then proceeded to write in his report that these people are vindictive, bloodthirsty, unforgiving, uneducated, insecure, ignorant and harbouring right wing political sentiments. He had other unpleasant things to say about Canadians who feel that those who commit brutal and vicious premeditated murder should pay with their own lives. Mr. Fattah's bias destroys any credibility and any value his report might have had, and I simply put it down as a disgusting spectacle. I must add that I am appalled that the Solicitor General would associate his name and his high office with the report.

By way of contrast I would like to read into the record a few comments which I have received from constituents. A doctor whose son was killed by one of the participants in a fight wrote me a letter which will stick in my mind for as long as I live. The son was an innocent victim, was, in fact, almost a block away from where the fight was going on and was struck by a bullet meant for someone else. The doctor was on duty at his hospital and when his son was brought in hon. members can just imagine his shock at seeing that it was his son realizing that he did not stand any chance of surviving the gunshot wound. The son died in his father's arms, and it is very likely that the murderer will be back on the streets before we resolve this issue of capital punishment. The doctor said in his letter that he was afraid that many hon. members would vote on Bill C-84 according to their own consciences rather than according to the consciences of the thousands of Canadians in their ridings.

Another letter, signed by 12 responsible and respected constituents, states that opinion polls indicate that the vast majority of Canadians want a return to capital punishment for capital murder as a deterrent to the rise in terrorism and murder. Another writer says that Canadians are not motivated by a wish for revenge when they demand the return of the death penalty, but rather because they realize that a law is only as strong as the penalty prescribed and imposed for infractions of that law. Still another writes: "I wonder how the Solicitor General would feel about coddling murderers if some of his own kin were murdered."

In conclusion, I would like to point out that there is a very great concern in our country that murder will become a status symbol among criminals if we continue to allow murderers to escape the consequences of their actions. As we lessen the severity of the penalties for violent crimes, and especially murder, the commission of murder is not the risky business that it ought to be. I am concerned about the evidence that already exists that cop killers are considered peers among the criminal fraternity. It is a sad commentary upon our government when it becomes a symbol of status in a segment of our society to be convicted of beating up a policeman, or even murdering a policeman.

● (1150)

We can remove this status symbol through the simple expedient of executing these people. It would not take more than one or two executions to eliminate this cancer from the side of our society. I say to this government that, while it would be an extreme measure, we cannot do any less than that if we are to live up to the mandate that we have been given by the people of Canada, a mandate from parliament is a mandate from the people. We cannot ignore them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the subject of capital punishment with mixed feelings. Even as a freshman member of this House I recognize that this subject has been debated by more members of this chamber than any other subject. It would seem from this that there is nothing left to be said; that any avoidable repetition is thereby also a waste of the valuable time and energy of members of this House. There are two reasons at least, however, why I feel compelled to contribute to this debate.

First, the nature of the subject is such that all of us are urged on by the sobering effect of its dimensions, as well as the strength of our convictions, to make personal representations. In this debate more than any other we recognize again that "no man is an island unto himself" and as we continue in this debate we become subtly aware that to some measure at least we are talking about ourselves as we recognize the possibilities for violence within ourselves. Perhaps that helps to explain why every thinking and feeling member of society yearns for a time when capital punishment will be no more. All of us cling to immortality and none of us embraces the prospect of death; therefore when someone else dies a part of me also dies. So, because I am inextricably joined to the subject I must participate in its discussion.

The second reason I entered the debate rests in the fact that I believe a number of arguments favouring the abolition of the death penalty have been based on false arguments or a false premise. One argument, which on the surface seems indisputable, is the fact that most convicted murderers come from the lower half of the social economic scale. Statistics would support this. It is an argument of inequality in our system of jurisprudence. There is no doubt that the rich can have legal counsel which is unavailable to the poor. There is no doubt, in my mind at least, that with the influence of money on the side of the accused he may be freed by means of trickery or by means of minor technicalities. In all too many cases legal counsel is just as interested, if not more so, in the legal fees as in justice. In this way justice becomes not so much blind as blindfolded. Caught in the act of winking, it sees only one guilty party and not the other.

But this argument is directed to the system, not the penalty. Do we take away or reduce the penalty for embezzlement because a few have been sharp enough never to get caught or, when caught, get off on a technicality? No, Mr. Speaker, if that argument, the argument of reducing the penalty because of inequality before the law, were applied to every level of criminal justice, there would be chaos in our entire system of jurisprudence. And, furthermore, it would remove the necessary incentives to remove those inequalities.

What the government needs to do, Mr. Speaker, is to make sure that in our courts no one will have special advantages. Penalties must be based as much as possible on rightness and on justice, not on the identifiable and gross inadequacies of the system which we could improve if only we had the moral courage to do so. And it does no justice to logic to seduce the debate by talking of the wrongness of the penalties when all the while we are talking of the wrongness of the system.

Another argument which has been voiced here is that there is always the possibility that an innocent person will be convicted. We cannot take such a charge lightly; it has happened within our lifetime, although the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) says it has not happened in Canada in the past several decades. But, Mr. Speaker, we must keep in mind that the present law carries the death penalty only for those convicted of killing police officers or prison workers while in the line of duty. We are no longer talking about the death penalty for all murderers. We are talking about murders which take place under completely different conditions from former years, and about the kind of crime that completely rules out a conviction based solely on circumstantial evidence. The argument that innocent people might be convicted was no doubt valid at one time, but we can no longer accept that argument with the narrow terms of reference in the act now.

A third argument voiced frequently is that capital punishment is uncivilized and a holdover from a more barbarian age. Now to begin with, Mr. Speaker, that argument has an element of psychological blackmail in it. No one wants to be thought of as barbarian; all of us want to be, and want to be seen as, enlightened. So anyone with any kind of self-esteem will shrink from any kind of belief or practice which could be labelled as barbaric.

But even those who argue that the practice of capital punishment is uncivilized would probably agree that the two most prominent characteristics of a civilized society are a pervasive sense of humanity and a sense of order. Historically, the sense of humanity in a civilized society could probably best be described as the "Good Samaritan" spirit. It is one of those curious ironies, however, that that particular story places no emphasis at all on the criminal. As a matter of fact, in that story the criminals were long gone—they got away and no attention was paid to them. Should we infer from that that we ought not to pay attention to the criminals? Hardly. The point of the story is that the Samaritan, considered a barbarian by his sophisticated neighbours, gave his total attention to the plight of the victim and his rehabilitation. And to this day, Mr. Speaker, the so-called primitive people of this world could often teach us something of humanity by the way that they care for the victims of distress.

We are barbarians, Mr. Speaker, not when we have a law calling for capital punishment; we are barbarians when we do so little for the victims of violent crimes. Where is the far-reaching legislation for the rehabilitation of the victims of rape, or the familites of those that have been murdered?

There is a man in my riding who was mauled by a bear which was attacking his fiancée. He saved her life but became permanently disfigured. They have spent all of their savings to pay for plastic surgery and now they have no more; but he needs more surgery. I have asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for some help but have been refused. Meanwhile, there are hundreds of convicted criminals who are given every possible opportunity to appeal, at public expense, if necessary. And we continue to open rights of appeal. But what about their victims and others such as the one I have just mentioned. Do they even get scant attention? Perhaps the most appropriate opprobrium here is "These things ought ye to have done and not to have left the other undone". The Minister of National Health and Welfare will vote against capital punishment, probably because he things it is barbaric. I suggest to him that it is not the death penalty that is barbaric, but our lack of compassion for the abused in our society.

A young RCMP officer in my riding was shot several years ago. He was to have been married in a week or two. What about his fiancee who has to reconstruct an entirely new life? What about the mother of two small children here in Ottawa whose husband and the father of the children was killed in the line of duty? How do we measure the heartache and loneliness, the unanswered questions, the shattered relationships and dreams? Have we become so blindly passionate in our pursuit of justice for the criminal that we have at the same time forgotten the pursuit of equity? Somehow, we seem to have come to the place where we feel that, since we cannot measure intangible and personal anguish caused by crime and codify it accurately by statute, there is, therefore, nothing we can do. It is with this casual glance at equity that our barbarism really becomes glaringly obvious. No, Mr. Speaker, it is not our call for the death penalty that makes us uncivilized but, rather, the disproportionate attention given to the deliberate murderer, in relation to what we give his victim, that exposes our latent barbarism.

● (1200)

The second characteristic of a civilized society is a desire, even demand, for crder. It does not matter on what basis you become an apologist for government; it is not long until you appeal to natural law. I will have more to say on this later, but suffice it to say here that our restless search for order has caused us to give authority to governments to instigate laws that will preserve order as much as possible.

Now, the most fundamental right I have is the right to live unmolested and undisturbed. Murder is the ultimate violation of that right: it is anarchy, the annihilation of order. The murder of police officers or prison guards is deliberate rebellion against the right of the government to establish and to maintain order. In light of these two arguments involving the inadequate, and often misplaced investment of compassion and the destruction of order, how can we say that to retain capital punishment is to return to an uncivilized state? The fact is, when we reject capital punishment we, in the most real and tangible way, develop a more subtle barbarian condition.

A fourth reason frequently given in rejection of capital punishment is that it is not a deterrent. The argument is usually based on statistics and is probably the most specious of all the arguments, if for no other reason than that the argument of statistics is the most abused and hackneyed of all. Presumably, if statistics clearly and unequivocally proved that capital punishment was, in fact, a deterrent, the abolitionists would become supporters of capital punishment. Hardly! They know that the argument of statistics is, of all tools, most malleable, capable of being twisted to any design that is needed. But beyond that, the whole argument of deterrence has become a totally utilitarian one, in a very pragmatic sense. If something is visibly useful, use it. If not immediately and visibly useful, reject it. It is for this reason that statistics become so vital to the argument of the abolitionist. Statistics are supposed to establish value on the basis of concrete and irrefutable data.

I suggest that pragmatic arguments have been functional and useful in supporting technological advance on the American frontier. At that time pragmatism became popular. But it is hardly fair to apply philosophical arguments in support of technological advance to a moral question, and to use the argument of pragmatism in moral issues. It is the utilitarian philosophy which ushered in the whole array of arguments attempting to justify relative morality and situational ethics. I read, recently, a statement of a man justifying situational ethics by saying that there are times when it is much kinder to tell a white lie than to tell the truth. It sounds ever so sweet and understanding until you realize that if it ever happened to you, you would feel humiliated and embarrassed when you realized someone else's attitude of condescension toward you.

But it is much worse than that. All of us need reference points to guide us in life. We need absolutes. This is where the intangible dimensions of the utility of the law come in. If the reference points are continually shifting, we become totally lost in our direction in life. Imagine, if you will, a ship setting out on a journey across the Atlantic. The captain wants to know where he is, so he measures his position by another ship, or by an iceberg or any other floating object. How absurd! He may get away with it as far as any accident is concerned. He may never flounder or shipwreck. But he will never know where he is, and he most certainly will not end up where he had planned to go. That is the way it is when we guide our lives by situational ethics.

That, too, Mr. Speaker, is the way it is with moral issues. If we are going to know where we are going, we must have some fixed reference points to let us know where we are. We need a law to warn us, long before we approach the danger zone, when we are headed for trouble. It is not simply a question of whether the death penalty has made an impending murderer stop to think of the consequences before he commits a capital crime. It is just as much a matter of a well-defined law, with its well-defined implementation, saying to every one of us, "This far, and no farther." Who knows how many people have stopped earlier in a life of crime because they began to realize what the ultimate penalties would be. Statistics will never measure that. It is easy enough to find out how many people have been killed by speeding, but we will never know how many have been saved because the speed limit sign or the radar trap was there. We will never know where we are going if we, at the same time, do not know how we are going to get there.

Another point that has been made frequently is that capital punishment is murder and that you cannot correct one murder by committing another one. Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of oversimplification that, again, is supposed to intimidate the retentionist and frighten him from becoming involved with so-called legal murder. Usually, those who argue this quote one of the Ten Commandments which says, "Thou shalt not kill."

In every other issue, Mr. Speaker, we are encouraged to eschew the oversimplified generalization. It is no credit to any intelligent, thinking person when he participates in thoughtless repetition of any oversimplification. Man simply is not satisfied with that, which is why we have built universities and why the best universities inevitably have the best libraries. The libraries are one of the most important elements of any place of learning. It is no coincidence that the best libraries are those that have the most original manuscripts. If we are going to examine any statement, we must begin with what it says. To be sure of that, we must go back as far as we can to the original, to make sure that the statement is accurate.

When we check the earliest manuscripts of the Ten Commandments, we find that it does not say, "Thou shalt not kill"—that is inaccurate. It actually says, "Thou shalt not commit murder." Immediately, someone says, "That's the same thing." No, it is not. It cannot be. Linguists tell us that it is impossible for two words to mean exactly the same thing. If that ever happened, one would become redundant and pass into oblivion. Since both words have been with us since the beginning of time, there must be a difference between them. And there is. All killing is not murder, any more than all sexual intercourse is rape. Rape is the violent rejection of, and rebellion against, the institution of marriage. It is the rejection of order, and there is not a culture in the world that tolerates it. Murder is the rejection of order at an even more intense level. As I said previously, it is rebellion against the right of the state to impose and to maintain order. Capital punishment is not murder but, rather, the restoration of order.

Justice, historically, Mr. Speaker, has been pictured as a lady seated and holding a pair of balance-scales in exact equilibrium. Murder does violence to that equilibrium and throws it off balance. The death penalty restores the equilibrium and gives society the assurance that, to a degree at least, harmony and balance will be restored to our everyday lives. To illustrate further, frontier justice sometimes was enacted by way of a lynch mob. It may well be that the lynch mob condemned the guilty party; but that kind of retribution disturbs the balance-scales almost as much as when the guilty go free. It is the function of the state to deal in a non-emotional, non-vindictive way by basing convictions on fact and law and thereby restoring equilibrium to the balance-scales of justice in society.

● (1210)

There are some members among us who have said that they must vote by their conscience and this may mean that they will have to vote against the majority wishes of their riding. Who could argue against the right to vote by conscience? I would simply point out, however, that conscience, by itself, is not a dependable faculty. Our conscience depends, for its expression, completely and totally on the information fed into it. It is only an accurate and sensitive reflector of all we have learned about moral values. To illustrate, mothers in India for centuries threw the babies they loved into the Ganges River. They did it with the highest of motives because their conscience told them to. Meanwhile, mothers in other countries protected their babies from drowning, sometimes at the cost of their own lives. Again, for conscience sake. We must all vote according to our conscience; but we also owe it to ourselves to examine the reasons our conscience convinced us of a decision.

However, to vote against the wishes of the majority of the constituency is another matter. A number of speakers have justified this by quoting Edmund Burke who felt he had to do that. Edmund Burke, however, does not provide very good refuge in this case. He lived just after the high point of the age of rationalism, the time when man seemed to have an almost unshakable faith in the powers of reason. One of the spin-offs of that age was a very elitist attitude, on the part of leaders, toward the common people. For example, it led Burke to support the American revolution as an act of independence, but oppose the French revolution because it was an uprising of the commoners against the aristocracy.

The American ideal of this spirit was Thomas Jefferson, Burke's contemporary. Jeffersonian democracy is the hallmark of all that is good in a free society. But I would remind hon. members that while Jefferson championed the popular franchise, he also designed the electoral college. Why? Because he wanted all men to be free to vote, but he did not trust the masses to elect a president. So they elected an elector, one a little more sophisticated than the rabble, who could be trusted to elect the president. You see, both Jefferson and Burke were, in a real sense, elitists.

Hon. members, you had better not hide behind Burke when you vote against your riding, unless you wish to be seen as an elitist, far removed from the people you represent.

I took particular note of the remarks yesterday by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). He pointed out that as countries move more and more to a centralized government, there is a corresponding rise in the crime rate. At first there would seem to be no relationship between the two, but on closer examination there may well be. We do know, for example, that as governments become more centralized, by doing so they take away opportunities for individual decision-making. Since the ability to make decisions is one of our most human faculties, there is an irrepressible desire to make choices, even at the risk of making wrong ones. However, when those choices are taken from us, the process of dehumanization sets in. That, in turn, increases the frustration level for all citizens and the larger possibility of criminal activity. Could it be that the hon. member for Crowfoot is right; that the government's recurring determination to bring in capital punishment stems from an overriding guilt complex for dehumanizing man, perhaps helping to drive man to a life of crime, and now cannot therefore bring itself to punish man for becoming what the government itself has made him?

Related to this is another factor, however. Governments, by their very nature, devote their attention to material solutions of man. This is their mandate. However, as they do this they leave the growing impression that those are the only issues that matter. It is the growth of materialism. It begins with ignoring spiritual dimensions of man, and ends with denying spiritual dimensions in him. It seems to me that there is another correlation which may have been overlooked. There appears to be a strong correlation between the rising demand for abolition of the death penalty and a steady decline in a strong belief in immortality. What do they have to do with each other? Simply this: if you believe that all we have is here right now, if there is no more after this, then it follows that you must squeeze out every available minute in this that you can. It follows, also that if you are committed to this materialistic view, the worst crime you could commit would be to take away even a part of the remnant of time left to a criminal. That is what was at the heart of the Greek and Roman tragedies—not that a person might die in the prime of life, but that he would die and go into the black mystery of the beyond and no one would know where he was. It seems that our society has come almost full circle to that one.

Members may call me a medievalist if they wish, but I am here saying that there is more than just this life, that this life is just a preparation for, and in anticipation of, the life to come. The pronouncement of the death penalty may be the last chance the convicted murderer has to learn something about finality; to learn, without any equivocation, that there are inexorable consequences to our actions which we cannot escape. All our lives we spend looking for ways out. This is the one time we have to look ourselves squarely in the face, with no side-glances.

The former solicitor general said that religious convictions are not valid justification for retention of the death penalty. I wonder, would he accept religious convictions for building a hospital, or a school, or for the composition of some of our great music, or the design of great architecture, or art? I am not sure whether he is being a total materialist and would reject religious convictions on all grounds, or whether he seriously wants to isolate them only from this issue. Does he want only the pleasant and attractive elements of religious faith, and not recognize the features that are unattractive for him? It does not work that way. The evil that we see is not the effect of our faith, but the consequences of our behaviour. It is our religious faith that makes us confront that behaviour.

Again, the former solicitor general's statement is symptomatic of another problem we must face, the problem of our identity. There is no doubt that in private life we get ourselves into a pack of trouble when we try to deny our past, when we try to pretend we do not have the background we do. That is the way to mental illness, to a life of pretence, living in a world of illusions. Mental health involves a glad acceptance of who we are, our appearance as well as our family backgrounds. The same holds true on a national scale. We must, and I know we do, embrace our history, appreciate it, and then we can enjoy, as well as understand, our present.

I have, as I know all other members have, been thinking about this debate for many months. Several weeks ago, as I walked toward the parliament buildings, I saw inscriptions above the windows on three of the sides of the peace tower. Above the front entrance I read, "Give the King thy judgements, O Lord, and thy righteousness unto the King's son". On the one side entrance I read, "Where there is no vision the people perish", and on the other, "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea".

These are quotations from the Bible. Our founding fathers made certain that they would be eternally chiselled into our history. To deny our past is to deny our identity. One of the great and overriding problems we face as a nation is the fact that absolutes were accepted as a fact of life when our nation was founded. That concept was in the air and was part of a spontaneous thought-form which has become part of the fabric of the British North America Act. Since that time, however, and as John Donne once said, "The new philosophy calls all in doubt". The philosophies of relativism and existentialism deny the existence of any absolutes.

● (1220)

So we are in a state of constant ambivalence, living with a document based on one set of suppositions but debating legislation within the framework of that document from an entirely different philosophical base. That ambivalence leads us along a certain course of madness. We, as a nation, will sooner or later have to decide who we are, what kind of a people we want to be. Let us call a spade a spade and go on from there.

One of the premises on which the present bill is based is the suggestion that we are on a steady path toward an improved civilization, that things are getting better and better, and all we need is a little more time, a little more education, till we come to the great day when violent crime will be on the decline and this kind of a debate would be totally anachronistic. That, Mr. Speaker, is a delusion. It used to be the preachers who were the prophets of gloom and the announcers of Armageddon. Now, they are no longer alone. The scientists, as well as others, are now the leaders. Let me quote William Butler Yeats:

Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;
Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
the blood-dimmed tide is loosed. And everywhere
The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
The best lack of all conviction, while the worst
Are full of passionate intensity.

That was said 40 years ago. Since then we have seen the Second World War, Korea, Viet Nam, four Middle East wars, Lebanon, Biafra, Bangla Desh, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the Berlin wall. We have seen assassinations, terrorism, indiscriminate murder. On the local level, there is an increase in crime, murder and flaunting of the law and growing civilian fears. Surely, no one can say we are getting better.

A call for the death penalty is not an emotional cry for vengeance. It is, rather, a call for the self-preservation of the human race. All of us need boundaries for our behaviour. To institute abolition of the death penalty for calculated and premeditated murder is to remove those boundaries, to give the murderer an indefinite "maybe". Capital punishment is a clear statement to all of us, wherever we are, that says, "This far, and no farther".

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, this is a serious debate that demands sober judgment. It has to do with life and death, justice and mercy, love and retribution, peace, orderliness, condemnation of evil, preservation of the state and the triumph of right. I have been impressed with the wisdom and the in-depth understanding that other members in debating this issue have shown. I have not always agreed with the premises or with the conclusions, and in some cases have disagreed with both; but for the most part it has been a high-level debate. The abolitionists have not been accused of being misguided do-gooders, and the retentionists for the most part have not been accused of being barbaric, sadistic or savage.

I intend, in the few minutes allotted to me, to put forth my own case, my own argument, not necessarily to rebut any particular member's point of view, but in doing so to let the debate fall where it may. In the spring-summer 1975 issue of Inkhorn was a quote that I think was very apropos to my remarks in this debate today. It is as follows:

Anyone with a facile pen and an axe to grind can write compellingly and exert much appeal. And since axe-grinding will always produce sparks, undiscerning readers will see only the flash of indignation.

In regard to this particular issue, as a lawmaker I must consider the fundamental task of government. Generally stated, the task of government is to uphold justice and to reinforce the freedoms of man; that is, of the body politic. It is important, however, to look at the historic perspective of other scholars and the contribution that they have made in dealing with the question: What is the purpose and the task of government? Since time will not allow me to make an exhaustive review of what other scholars have said, I am going to limit my comments to quotations from John Locke, Jefferson, Mill and Jean-Jacques Rousseau. John Locke, in his "Two Treaties of Government", has this to say:

And that all men may be restrained from invading others' rights, and from doing hurt to one another, and the law of Nature be observed, which willeth the peace and preservation of all mankind, the execution of the law of Nature is in that state put into every man's hands, whereby every one has a right to punish the transgressors of that law to such a degree as may hinder its violation. For the law of Nature would, as all other laws that concern men in this world, be in vain if there were nobody that in the state of Nature had a power to execute that law, and thereby preserve the innocent and restrain offenders—

Also, in the same essay John Locke has this to say:

In transgressing the law of Nature, the offender declares himself to live by another rule than that of reason and common equity . . .

By the same reason may a man in the state of Nature punish the lesser breaches of that law, it will, perhaps, be demanded, with death? I answer: Each transgression may be punished to that degree, and with so much severity, as will suffice to make it an ill bargain to the offender, give him cause to repent, and terrify others from doing the like.

According to Locke, wherever law ends, tyranny begins. My last quotation from John Locke in his "Two Treatises of Government" is this:

For laws not being made for themselves, but to be, by their execution, the bonds of the society to keep every part of the body politic in its due place and function; when that totally ceases, the government visibly ceases, and the people become a confused multitude without order or connection. Where there is no longer the administration of justice for the securing of men's rights, nor any remaining power within the community to direct the force, or provide for the necessities of the public, there certainly is no government left.

George Washington had this to say:

Towards the preservation of your Government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles.

He also said:

And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion.

I should also like to quote John Stuart Mill. I had occasion last Friday to quote John Stuart Mill, and unless some hon. members think that I am a disciple of John Stuart Mill, let me say it was coincidence of topic that led me to quote him rather than my discipleship to his theories. He has had this to say:

That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others.

That quotation is taken from his 1859 essay on liberty. In speaking of representative government, John Stuart Mill pointed out that one of the most positive evils of the representative system is the danger that it may be influenced by an interest that is not identical with the general welfare of the community. Abraham Lincoln, in his second inaugural address, quoted the Bible as follows:

● (1230)

Woe unto the world because of offenses! For it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh.

I now want to quote from a book that I will be referring to often in this debate. It has been a good source of information to me. It is a book called, "The Bible and the Life of the Christian". This is what that has to say in respect of the purpose of government:

In Psalm 119 we are instructed that all things abide today according to the ordinances of the Creator (Psalm 119:89-91). There is nothing that is not taken up into that stream of power which preserves the whole world from collapse. Sin cannot halt God's providence nor arrest His omnipotence. Generations of men come and go, fill their time with their works and their sin, and are called to account. God continually causes new creatures to appear. He prevents the total chaos and destruction that proceeds from the corruption of sin, because He is leading the world and humanity on to the consummation of His counsel. In this providential work of preserving and governing, the institution of the office of government is also included. Such an office is indispensable if there is to be a human society where justice and order still prevail and the Church is enabled to "lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and gravity".

So, from these quotations I believe there is a commonality among the writers, and certainly not inconsistent with the principle of the scriptures, that it is the purpose of government to uphold justice and to reinforce the freedoms of man, that is, the freedom generally found in the body politic.

Studies of psychology and sociology have produced increased knowledge of human behaviour, resulting in mitigation of the death penalty. Modern theories of penology have questioned the social utility of capital punishment. The result has been that the death penalty is almost always debated in a judicial and psychosociological sense. However, it is ultimately a moral and theological question. Because it is a moral and theological question, I would discuss the mandate of government from the biblical perspective; that is to say, from the Christian ethic.

Is the Christian perspective relevant today and for this debate? By the mere fact that this is a moral question, the Christian ethic is certainly relevant in light of the basis of our western society, and, in fact, this government and this parliamentary system here in Canada. If God is, and if Christ lived, died and rose again in a redemptive way—and I believe so—then I have to reject Hegel's cyclic history and that postulation that history moves as formation of a thesis and anti-thesis which evolves into a new synthesis which becomes the thesis or accepted ideas, and you have a recurring cycle. I have to reject that, sir, and I have to reject, as well, those naturalists who believe that world history is not directed, that human history simply unfolds as it should and without regard to any exterior force or directed force.

Rather than those two, sir, I accept the lineal history idea, the truth that God is directing the final destination of history. I do not wish to quarrel with either the Calvinists or the Armenians, that those who believe that God works only as the free will exists within mankind, or the other side, the Calvinists who believe that God has preordained and has, in essence, programmed both man and the world. But it is suffice to say that notwithstanding the correctness or the applicability of either of those two schools of thought in theology, it is nevertheless therefore true that theology and God have something to say today, because God in the final analysis is directing the destination of history.

So it is important to look, when we are speaking of Christian ethic, at both the Old Testament and the New Testament, because the teaching of the scriptures, and because capital punishment is a moral issue, is not only relevant but constitutes the centricity of the issue. In times past there have been Christian scholars who have looked and studied and written about the principles of the scriptures and how they apply to human activity. One of those, Thomas Aquinas, in his book "Summa Theologica", along with other early Christian writers such as Tertullian and Athenagoras, clearly defends the right of the state in regard to capital punishment. Thomas Aquinas likens the malfactor to a limb of the body filled with gangrene. He suggests that amputation, or execution, is necessary for the good of the whole body, or the whole society. Aquinas says:

If a man be dangerous and infectious to the community on account of some sins, it is praiseworthy and advantageous that he be killed in order to safeguard the common good.

I could go on quoting other earlier writers of the Christian church, but probably the test of time and the test of the scriptures is in looking directly at the teachings of the Old Testament and seeing what in fact they have to say in relation to either the functions of government and, more particularly, the duty of government in respect of capital punishment. I refer to the Old Testament judicial procedure. For the most part in this debate, when I have heard other members pontificate on the Old Testament admonitions toward the issues, the principles have been misapplied and misunderstood. There were five characteristics of the Hebrew, Mosaic law in relation to capital punishment. It is important to understand these five principles and how they apply to capital punishment if you are going to at all use the decalogue, and particularly the sixth commandment of the Ten Commandments in basing any of your arguments on capital punishment.

In many cases, Hebrew law was superior to our Canadian criminal law. There were five essential parts and considerations in the Old Testament judicial procedure. One was the standard of proof. In our Canadian system we have to establish beyond a reasonable doubt in the conviction of one accused charged with murder. Not so under the Hebrew law. In Hebrew law you had to establish certainty. In Deuteronomy 17:4 it says: "You shall enquire thoroughly". Secondly, as an integral part of Hebrew law it requires the testimony of more than one witness. In the Canadian system, circumstantial evidence, or one single witness in conjunction with circumstantial evidence, can convict. It was not so with Hebrew law. Deuteronomy 19:15 provided: "On evidence of two or three witnesses a matter shall be confirmed".

The test, however, does not indicate precisely what these witnesses must testify to. That is, must they be eyewitnesses to the crime or merely corroborators of the physical evidence? The internal logic of the passages implies to me that eyewitnesses were intended. First it is difficult to think that circumstantial evidence, even if fully corroborated, could often amount to certainty. Second, the administration of the death penalty by stoning was to be begun by having the witnesses cast the first stones (Deut. 17:7); this would be an excellent form of psychological testing to pressure a lying witness to reveal himself at the last moment, before the irreparable act had been accomplished, but would seem unlikely to influence greatly the behaviour of merely corroborative witnesses. Third, the definitions of some crimes require information that only an eyewitness could supply. For example, Numbers 34:16-24 makes a distinction between murder and manslaughter partially on the basis of whether the victim was killed by an object held in the suspect's hand or by an object thrown or dropped. Other than an eyewitness, who could tell?

● (1240)

Third, under Mosaic law the punishment for perjury was execution. In our Canadian penal system if one is found guilty of perjury there is a fine or a term of imprisonment. In Deuteronomy 19:10-19 we read:

If a malicious witness rises up against a man to accuse him of wrongdoing . . . then you shall do to him just as he had intended to do to his brother.

Fourth, in Hebrew law we find that difficult cases were referred to judicial experts. We read, also, in Deuteronomy 17:18,19

> If any case is too difficult for you to decide, between one kind of homicide or another, between one kind of lawsuit or another, and between one kind of assault or another, being cases of dispute in your courts, then you shall arise and go up to the place which the Lord your God chooses. So you shall come to the Levitical priest or the judge who is in office in those days, and you shall inquire of them, and they will declare to you the verdict in the case.

A weakness in our Canadian system is that jurors sometimes do not understand the law well enough to apply the law to the facts at hand, and we arrive from time to time with hung juries which necessitates either a new trial or dropping of the charges. But under Mosaic law the referral to a judicial priest who understood the entire legal distinction between kinds of homicide assault, lawsuits, and so on, necessitated a verdict of guilty or not guilty. Under Mosaic law, presentation to the judge was to take place in a new location to avoid local prejudices. Fifth, under Mosaic law, once a verdict was returned—that is, a verdict of guilty—then the death penalty was mandatory. In Leviticus 27:29 we read:

> No prescribed person who may have been set apart among men shall be ransomed; he shall surely be put to death.

In the event that there was a murder of passion and the capital sentence was not to apply, in the testament under Hebrew law there were provided cities of refuge, and a person who was found to have certainly killed, but not on the basis of premeditated or paid murder, was then able to live in the cities of refuge and be free from the wrath of other people. But in our Canadian system, even though the jury and the due process of law have found a person to be guilty of murder, we have cabinet commutation and the whole area of reprieve. So it is very clear that the Hebrew law was much more thorough and, I believe, much more accurate and certainly contained a greater sense of justice and thoroughness than our Canadian law. Perhaps we ought to return to the principles and safeguards that were known and practiced under Mosaic law. Under Mosaic law there were 18 crimes which were punishable by death. I might very quickly go over them. They are as follows: 1, Murder; 2, Accidentally causing death of a pregnant woman or her baby; 3, Killing of a person by a dangerous animal that had killed before, yet was not caged. Both the animal and owner in that case were to be executed; 4, Kidnapping; 5, Rape; 6, Fornication; 7, Adultery; 8, Incest; 9, Homosexuality; 10, Sexual intercourse with animal; 11, Striking a parent; 12, Cursing a parent; 13, Rebelling against a parent; 14, Sorcery, witchcraft; 15, Cursing God; 16, Attempting to lead people to worship other gods; 17, Avenging a death despite acquittal by law. That is the killing of someone who was living in a city of refuge. Then 18, False testimony in murder trial.

Now the question would arise, having established some kind of explanation concerning the nature and characteristics of Hebrew law, are we under the Mosaic law? Notwithstanding the argument put forward by the dispensationalists, and notwithstanding the freedom we now have in Christ, it nevertheless must be recognized that we are in fact, under the New Testament, freed from all aspects of the Hebrew law except murder, because although murder was part of Hebrew law, it predates Hebrew law. It remains part of the Decalogue which is applicable to individuals and not to the functions and duties of the state.

The problem seems to emerge, in this matter, in discussing the New Testament doctrine: Did Christ replace, that is, fulfil, the law, hence freeing us from the law of Moses unto the law of love or grace? Yes, but Christ did not destroy nor contradict the Mosaic law. As a matter of fact, Christ had come to fulfil the law and not one dot of the law would be changed. The Ten Commandments apply to individual action and responsibility. The responsibility of the state regarding murder predates Hebrew law and, as I have said, is not part of that Hebrew law that was fulfilled by Christ. It remains within the jurisdiction of civil government and not the individual.

Christ replaced, not the role and duties of government but, rather, became the personal or individual mediator or Saviour between the individual man and his god. The functions and responsibilities of government remain. Romans 13 refers to the duties of the government as opposed to the responsibilities of the individual. There is not an inconsistency between the Old and New Testaments in relation to capital punishment. Of all early Christians, Paul surely had the deepest and truest insight into the essential nature of the Christian message. The inspiration of his writings is recognized, for example, by the Apostle Peter in I Peter, chapter 3, verse 16. In Romans 12, we find Paul writing:

> Be kindly affectioned one to another in brotherly love . . . bless them that persecute you . . . recompense to no man evil for evil . . . overcome evil with good.

But then, again, in the very next chapter, Romans 13, we find Paul saying:

> Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers—

That is, the government.

> —it is there by God's appointment. So those who refuse to obey the laws of the land are refusing to obey God, and punishment will follow. For civil authorities do not frighten those who are doing right, but those who are doing wrong. The government is the agent of God for your good. But, if you do evil, you should be afraid. For the civil authority does not bear and wear the sword for nothing. It is God's agent to execute His punishment and vengeance on the wrongdoer.

So, in Romans 12, the Bible speaks of love, blessing and forgiveness; and in Romans 13, of punishment, vengeance, and capital execution with the sword of government. How are the two sets of principles reconciled? Simply by recognizing that the first set applies to our personal, individual, relationships; that is, in the Decalogue the sixth commandment admonishes us not to kill, and this applies to the individual and not to the duties and responsibilities of the government. The second set applies to the relationships of the civil governments and its citizens. Individually, Christians are required to forgive those who trespass against them. Civically, the government is the agent of God to administer justice among its people. Its first essential duty, as such, is to administer the divine decree concerning the capital punishment of murderers. Originally this was written as early as in the ninth chapter of the Bible, the Gensis, and it is reaffirmed throughout the Bible in both the Old and the New Testaments.

● (1250)

I have attempted to establish a communality among writers from the Christian and non-Christian perspectives in relation to the duties and functions of government, and I have attempted to show that under the law of Moses it was the function and the duty of the state to carry out the capital sentence in violation of the sixth commandment of the Decalogue. Furthermore, I have attempted to show, by relating that to the New Testament doctrine, Romans 13, that it is not inconsistent with the New Testament in relation to the duties and functions of government to maintain civil order. Because if, in fact, the primary function of the government is to maintain law and order, to prosecute evil and to uphold righteousness and justice, and if capital punishment is a moral question, then we must look at the consistency of the scriptures in both the Old and New Testaments. We cannot deny what is written in Romans, chapter 13, in view of the fact that it is certainly not inconsistent with the Old Testament teachings and the fact that the sixth commandment predated the Hebrew law from which Christ freed us.

So I suppose that the quality of government or civilization has historically been judged by what we do with the poor, the dispossessed and the defenceless. The question is whether their life is worth as much as the lives of those who can find recourse in protection or retribution. I cannot but conclude that the principle of government applies to all and not just to policemen and prison guards. I suggest that justice dictates that the capital sentence must be applied to all those found guilty of premeditated murder or paid murder.

Furthermore, I believe it is sound statesmanship that in considering capital punishment we take into account the concrete reality of today. We must take into account the lifestyles of the people. There is no such thing as static legislation for all times. We must look at the reality of the mandate of the people. What is the real situation confronting the government and the real situation of Canadians today? From the theological point of view, sin abounds, there is lawlessness, murder, rape and wrongdoing of all kinds. That is the reality. Generally, it appears that the will of the people is that the government get tough, a term that is often used here. People want protection against those who would destroy, plunder and murder without regard for the rights, property or life of others.

People are fed-up with the overemphasis on the rights of the convicted. I would point to the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), with reference to the fact that there is overemphasis today on the rights of the convicted as opposed to the responsibilities of the government to the victims. I believe it is irresponsible on the part of the government to disregard those who are victimized. Governments are only addressing themselves to the rights of the convicted. However, the fact must be recognized that those who feel as I do do not lack compassion or love. We have a yearning for justice, as do others; but we simply place our emphasis not only on those who have been victimized, but also on those who are the potential victims, which by and large is the rest of the body politic.

I reject the views of the environmentalists and behaviourists such as B.F. Skinner, who recognize no human responsibility and who reduce all human action as the mere product of previous experience. They suggest that all that it takes to rehabilitate a person is to modify his behaviour and that, in a sense, it is society that is wrong, not the individual who transgresses the law. I reject that approach which disregards human responsibility. I believe in the biblical position that we are created in the image of God and with the knowledge of good and evil, and that we have the choice to do right or wrong. Because this is a moral question, to discuss capital punishment apart from morality is to miss the point entirely. How should the government react, in light of the reality and the will of the people and in light of the biblical mandate in Romans 13?

Mr. Speaker, the adjournment time is approaching, but I ask for the indulgence of the House to allow me to complete my remarks in a couple of minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whiteway: In conclusion, I should like to quote briefly as follows:

> The state is clothed with power for the sake of justice. Through God's preserving care the law for created life is still known to us even after the Fall (Romans I and II). In virtue of God's unchangeable Counsel that law has never been revoked. Everything is under the obligating force of the law, and nothing is indifferent. To wish to gain knowledge from the scriptures about the law is not arbitrarily to have the living, divine word at one's command; it is simply the obedience of faith. It is true that the will of God is infinitely wider and deeper than what has been revealed to us, but God's veracity guarantees to us that the revelation permitted us regarding it is trustworthy. When one places love higher than justice one contradicts the Cross of Golgotha where the Lord revealed his love and his justice. Zion is redeemed through justice. It is not even permissible to imagine a tension or opposition between love and justice in God. That would be in conflict with the simplicity of his being. In God love and justice are one. In our time-conditioned (temporal) existence, however, life branches out from the concentrated religious fulness of meaning of the love of Christ into distinct streams in its temporal orders or modes (ways) of being. Thus there is an order for the exercise of justice and also an order for the love of the neighbour. No true love toward our neighbour however is possible without justice (Ps.85:9-13). He who asserts that the maintaining of justice by the government is of a lower order than the love of the neighbour forgets that it is exactly through the existence of justice in society that the love of the neighbour can flourish. In a chaos of injustice and violence the love of the neighbour will be choked to death.

Mr. Speaker, as I live, I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way of life, as stated in Ezek 33:11. I want to see a Canada where our people are free from the terror of those who would violate the very freedoms they espouse in their own defence. I want to be part of a government that recognizes and acts upon the will of the people and its Biblical mandate. The very stones cry out for justice. We must maintain and re-establish the death penalty. We must strive for consistency with New Testament Biblical concepts. We have not the liberty to do otherwise.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the special order passed by the House on Monday June 7, it being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until the House resumes its proceedings at two o'clock.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MANAGEMENT OF MARINE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The declaration by Canada of a 200-mile fishing limit prompts attention to the provision of surveillance, patrol and rescue capability along Canada's vast coastline. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House orders that the government make a statement on motions outlining its plans to carry out management of our marine resources and that the matter be referred to a special committee comprising External Affairs, National Defence, Environment and Fisheries, and Transportation and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion of pressing and urgent necessity.

Since the President of the Privy Council indicated Friday last during the oral question period that a meeting would take place today between the executive of the Quebec APU and some cabinet members in connection with the important matter of the Quebec dairy industry; since this problem is worsening every day and could provoke very serious consequences; and since it is urgent to clarify the situation and take the necessary steps, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House request the Minister of Agriculture to make public today, through a statement in this House, the results and the content of special discussions that have taken place, so that members may know where the matter stands.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

REQUEST FOR SIX MONTHS SUSPENSION OF APPLICATION OF NEW DAIRY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion.

Considering the uncertain situation of industrial milk producers; considering that the decisions made last April by the Canadian Dairy Commission will force hundreds of producers to withdraw from the dairy industry and that in these circumstances many of them are already forced into bankruptcy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

The unanimous consent of the House to ask the minister responsible to suspend, for a period of six months, the application of the new dairy policy announced last April, so as to give these producers time to reorganize their farms according to the new government measures.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

MANPOWER

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAM TO PROVIDE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government has eliminated its Opportunities for Youth program and by so doing has eliminated almost 30,000 jobs, or two thirds of its student summer employment and activities program, and in view of the fact that this loss of jobs, coupled with cutbacks in private spending, will cause severe summer unemployment among young people and students—for example, in the Maritimes the loss of 7,000 OFY jobs, coupled with cutbacks in steel, transportation and merchandising industries, will mean student unemployment in excess of 25 per cent this summer—and in view of the fact that recent unemployment figures show not so much that more people are finding work but that more people, especially in the 18 to 24 age group, are being driven out of the labour market by the lack of employment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government immediately bring in an emergency summer employment program to be functioning within two weeks and administered through municipalities, and that the government immediately prepare a program which will provide grants to students who are either unable to find work this summer or are only able to find very short term work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES FOUND TAMPERING WITH CLAIMS BUT NOT PROSECUTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration advise the House in regard to the number of persons employed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada and classified as agents 1 and agents 2, particularly in metropolitan Toronto, who were found by the commission to be tampering with claims in the past eighteen months and who were either permitted to resign from their employment or who in most cases received letters of reprimand only, rather than being prosecuted for such illegal offences.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST OF REGIONAL PRODUCERS FOR INVESTIGATION OF TORONTO DOMINATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On Friday, June 4, a large and responsible body of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television producers from all parts of Canada called for the government to establish a royal commission to study the Toronto domination of the English network. Mr. Speaker, these people have been reluctant to express their concern outside of the family circle of the CBC, but because the problem is a long standing one and is not being attended to quickly enough, these producers from all parts of Canada have made the public call for action.

In view of the fact that the House has already given unanimous consent to have another matter similar to this referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the matter being the elimination of regional farm broadcasts, and in view of the fact that these producers believe, with good evidence to support this belief, that the CBC's neglect to involve regional producers when promoting a national viewpoint is in fact a violation of its charter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That this House instruct the government to honour the request of the CBC television producers from all parts of Canada for a royal commission to study the Toronto domination of the English network.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR AID IN REBUILDING PORTION OF MAIN À DIEU DESTROYED BY FIRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

On this past weekend, as the national news has recorded, there has been a significant tragedy in the historic fishing village of Main à Dieu on Cape Breton Island. Seventeen homes, plus the Roman Catholic Church in the area, were wiped out by a devastating fire. In view of the seriousness of the situation, I move, seconded by the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That officials of the rural and native housing section of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, be immediately sent into the area to get new housing started for the families involved and cut the red tape to a minimum; also, that the Minister of State for Fisheries immediately implement the project for a breakwater extension in Main à Dieu that was to be carried out in the 1977-78 small crafts and harbour program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the unanimous consent of the House is required before such a motion can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral Questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon).

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my lead question is for the President of the Treasury Board who is not in his seat at the moment although he was here a few moments ago. Perhaps you would be kind enough to see me again when he returns from his journey.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF PRECAUTIONS NECESSARY BEFORE COMMITMENT TO COMMON FUND ESTABLISHED AT UNCTAD CONFERENCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On May 27, his colleague, then the Acting Prime Minister stated at page 13882 of Hansard that Canada would make a contribution to a common fund for the purpose of stabilizing commodity prices as sought by various nations of UNCTAD IV, but he added "providing that certain very logical and I think reasonable precautions are taken". Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what the reasonable and very logical precautions are that have to be taken before Canada is committed to this fund?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the conference at Nairobi established an ongoing mechanism for discussion and negotiations of the common fund. The position of Canada is that if these negotiations and discussions demonstrate that the fund will be effective in stabilizing the prices of individual commodities, Canada will make a contribution to it. Its usefulness and efficiency will be under our surveillance during those negotiations. If we are satisfied that it has those characteristics, we will contribute.

● (1410)

HABITAT CONFERENCE—SUGGESTED SUPPORT OF SWEDISH OR GROUP OF 77 RESOLUTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question on a related matter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? The Habitat conference has now before it draft resolutions from the group of 77 and from Sweden, the Swedish resolution calling for the implementation of the new economic order as a matter of urgency and the larger group of 77 resolution referring to the need for new priorities, new political initiatives and commitment to the new economic order. In light of the minister's own statement regarding the urgency of this matter, will he communicate with the official Canadian delegation at Habitat and urge them to support either the Swedish or the group of 77 resolution?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no question about the Government of Canada's commitment to bringing about a new international economic order, because we have already made it clear that we would participate in efforts to bring about changes in the present international economic system. I would question at this point, without having received any report from our own delegation in Vancouver, the procedure of introducing into the Habitat conference the general subject of the new international economic order which was the subject dealt with by the UNCTAD conference and which is to be the subject of the conference on international economic co-operation. It seems to me that Habitat has a most comprehensive subject with which to deal and we ought to consider whether introducing a related, although important, subject already under consideration elsewhere is a good thing at this time.

Mr. Brewin: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to look into this matter again since I understand that draft resolutions on this important subject are at present being discussed before the resolutions committee, if that is its right name, and the absence of Canadian support might well be misinterpreted?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will, as the hon. member suggests, take a further look at the question. But my initial reaction still stands as valid in the present circumstances. I wonder how often we are to distort the purposes of particular United Nations conferences by bringing in other subjects, no matter how important they may be. I certainly will not insist at all on the Canadian delegation taking a position at Habitat against any particular subject matter which we would support in another forum.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday I asked the minister if he was aware of the verbal agreement between the Department of National Defence and Lockheed and of the requirement of the Department of National Defence for $100 million to pay interest charges. The minister's answer was on an allied subject. I wonder if he could now tell the House, was he or was he not aware of the verbal agreement between Lockheed and the Department of National Defence for Lockheed to provide some $300 million of interim financing?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I answered that, when cabinet reached its decision on November 27, I was aware that a financing problem existed and that the program was going to need an additional amount of about $100 million in interest. In the course of the afternoon, Treasury Board authorized the department to start negotiating the contract with Lockheed.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to understand that the President of the Treasury Board and board members approved this project without knowing in any way where the $300 million was coming from?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we knew there was a problem since we knew that the program would eventually cost $100 million more. Later, during the month of December, we approved it so as to allow that amount to be incorporated in the program which is mentioned in the blue book which was tabled in the House.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ADVISED TREASURY BOARD OF FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): The minister still has not told me whether the Minister of National Defence ever advised him of this bridging arrangement with Lockheed. Three hundred million dollars is an amount of money that would, with few exceptions, be beyond the capability of almost any corporation to raise, or to establish a line of credit for. Are we to believe that the Minister of National Defence was able to get by the Treasury Board without the President of the Treasury Board asking for details as to the source of such funds? The decision made was important enough to cost the taxpayers $16 million.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the question about the $16 million is entirely beside the point. We knew, at Treasury Board, that Orion would probably cost us more than anticipated, that there would eventually be interest of over $100 million to be paid. At a subsequent meeting held sometime last December, Treasury Board gave its approval.

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY BY TREASURY BOARD OF NATIONAL DEFENCE AS TO SOURCE OF FINANCING

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. If the Department of National Defence was going to borrow, this would involve Treasury Board. If Lockheed was going to borrow, that brings up the matter of the assessments that were made by various departments of Lockheed's financial situation. Either way, someone must have stopped and asked DND where, how and when they proposed to get the money. Was this question raised by Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the questions are well known. I have answered them. The Minister of National Defence also answered a dozen questions concerning the internal discussions of Treasury Board, which is a cabinet committee; I am not at liberty to answer all questions on all the problems of the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Did the President of Treasury Board seek no more assurance than that? Does he have no documentation? Are we to understand that Treasury Board authorizes the start of multi-million dollar contracts on nothing more than verbal assurance? Apparently all he received from the Minister of National Defence was a verbal assurance. Is this what Treasury Board and the cabinet are working on?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that on November 27 the cabinet had decided to buy that aircraft; that afternoon, Treasury Board authorized the departments concerned to start negotiating the contract. The rest of the story is common knowledge.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Last Friday, in his answer to a question put by my colleague the hon. member for Champlain, the Acting Prime Minister indicated that there would be today an important meeting between the executive of the Quebec APU and some ministers concerning the problems the Quebec dairy industry is faced with. Can the minister take stock of the meeting and indicate to the House whether new elements were added to this issue?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand the directors of UPA asked for and were granted a meeting this afternoon with some members of the cabinet. If they have any new proposals, we are willing to listen to them. I understand there are several topics they want to discuss with us. I do not know if they have a complete program. At least I have not been given one that is any different from what they presented to us last week.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

My question was quite simple but the minister did not answer it. I would like the minister to tell us whether he is prepared to make a statement to the House as soon as such a meeting will be held, and that both the results and the content of these discussions be made public.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think it is public knowledge that they wanted to discuss dairy issues at greater length with members of the cabinet than was the case last week. I know of nothing new that they are going to present to us, nothing that is not already public information.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO RELAUNCH INQUIRY INTO BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS FOLLOWING RESIGNATION OF MR. KEENAN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In light of the unfortunate resignation of Mr. Keenan and the consequent enhanced risk that a strike of air traffic controllers may occur, what steps has the minister taken since yesterday to open talks with those immediately concerned, namely our air traffic controllers and pilots, with a view to the appointment of a commissioner, co-commissioners or a board of commissioners representing the interests of all those directly concerned in the matter with a view to relaunching without further delay the inquiry into the safety implications of the use of two languages in air traffic control procedures for visual and instrument flying in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had some preliminary discussions with some of the parties and it is my objective to continue doing that with a view to satisfactorily settling this matter.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would say what sort of timetable he has in mind for the completion of the inquiry.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would say that nothing has changed in that regard. The question of a commissioner's report always depended upon the successful completion of the simulation exercise, and we had set a time period after that. I do not know that anything has changed.

* * *

POST OFFICE

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE THIRD-CLASS MAIL RATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF AMOUNT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It arises out of the statement that he gave in the House on May 21 in which he indicated that consideration of rate increases for third class mail was still being given by the department. May I ask the minister whether he would indicate to the House today the amount of those proposed increases.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy in giving me advance notice. I have just checked with my officials. We will be announcing publicly and directly to all members of the House, as well as to the affected industries, such as the Christmas card industry, the proposed rate increases before Friday.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has expressed his concern for those who suffered during last year's postal disruption. In view of the fact that the post card industry certainly suffered as much as any, I wonder whether the minister will play Scrooge and have the rate increases brought in before the 1976 Christmas card season, or Santa Claus and introduce them after the 1976 post card season.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, both Scrooge and Santa Claus are appropriate to the Christmas season.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE ON NUCLEAR SAFEGUARDS—NAME OF CANADIAN DELEGATE AND REASON MEETINGS ARE SECRET

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to the secret conferences in London on nuclear safeguards. I understand that these meetings are now over and that there has been the third round. My question to the minister is simply this. Who were Canada's representatives at that conference last week in London on nuclear safeguards, and was it within the terms of reference of those representatives to assent to this silly, stupid charade of continuing meetings in secrecy when they affect the future of mankind?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the representative of Canada was an officer of my department, Mr. Fulford. The answer to the second part of the question, with all the surrounding verbiage removed, is yes.

Mr. Lawrence: Cutting down the verbiage then, may I ask the minister why?

Mr. MacEachen: Because the nuclear suppliers find this the most effective way to do their business.

* * *

MANPOWER

PROPOSED PROGRAM TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He stated in his speech on the budget that it is intended to introduce a strategy for youth employment covering not only student summer employment but the more serious and pervasive problems of unemployed school dropouts and graduates. Given the fact that today's statistics reveal there is certainly a problem in respect of our young people who are not able to enter the labour force, and the fact that this matter will get worse in the next couple of months, can we expect full details on this strategy for youth employment very soon in order to effect the early implementation of the strategy, thereby relieving some of the pressure being placed on our young people, or are these details that will not be known until the fall?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my statement in the budget debate was clear. The program will be developed and made known in the fall.

REASON FOR DELAY IN STARTING JOB CREATING PROGRAM IN VIEW OF AVAILABILITY OF MONEY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, that is not too much comfort for the thousands of young people who are seeking work now and will be seeking work this summer. The minister also indicated he has some $100 million earmarked for some type of job program to commence this fall. Once again we have this fall deadline. In light of the serious problem now being faced by our young people, why can the minister not have a much earlier starting date than the fall in order to relieve some of this pressure? He has the money, the jobs are required; why can he not move now in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have announced the details of other programs for student employment in this House. The $100 million to which the hon. member refers is clearly earmarked for a local initiative type program in the fall similar to the one conducted in 1975-76.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand now that there are no programs and no initiatives on the part of the government to assist our young people who are crying for jobs now and will be to an even greater extent this summer? Is that the position of the minister at this particular time?

Mr. Andras: No, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member has been present when programs which are available for student summer employment have been detailed in this House. There are no additional funds available, but he is fully aware of those programs.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

GOVERNMENT ACTION IF PROGRAM DECLARED ULTRA VIRES BY SUPREME COURT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Today there is a great deal of speculation—

An hon. Member: It is for you, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know he is busy and I dislike disturbing him, but now that he is back from holidays I hope for an answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do I understand from press statements made yesterday that the Supreme Court of Canada will render a judgment by the end of the month? In the event the judgment is to the effect that the parliament of Canada acted ultra vires, is it the intention of the government to bring in legislation prefaced, as I suggested on October 14 last, with a preamble by parliament declaring there is a state of national emergency? Will the Prime Minister have such legislation brought in, in order to ensure that the anti-inflation legislation will be upheld?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the event that the hypothetically pessimistic view of the right hon. gentleman is substantiated in fact, I would consider the suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it was hypothetical in October last when I pointed out the need for the parliament of Canada to declare an emergency, which would have done away with most of the argument before the Supreme Court of Canada. I would ask whether the Prime Minister is still of the opinion that there was not a general emergency, and is that the reason he did not include that particular matter or declaration in the preamble?

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the legislation speaks for itself, and the right hon. gentleman should know that is the way you interpret a statute.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister refers to us as being a bunch of hyenas. All I can say is that it is apparent we have got his goat. I would ask him this simple question, hypothetical as he stated it to be, although the press is already problematically determining what the majority judgment of the Supreme Court will be, will legislation be brought before this session which already has ambled on for 19 months?

● (1430)

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question, as I answered in the first place, is hypothetical in its form. I have no cause to know what the answer to that hypothetical question would be. I do not have the advantage perhaps the hon. gentleman has of having phoned a judge.

* * *

[Translation]

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL INTERVENE IN CONFLICT IN EASTERN CANADA OVER ELECTRICITY

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Can he tell the House whether one or several provinces asked him to intervene directly in settling the hydro issue which is now developing in the eastern part of the country, and whether he will intervene through the federal authority with respect to the inter-provincial trade, and if so, within which schedule?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have received no formal request from either of the two parties, the province of Quebec or the province of Labrador-Newfoundland, to intervene in their dispute. However, I did have an opportunity to discuss with the ministers of those two provinces and the premiers of the three maritime provinces the concept of an Atlantic pool system. I think we made some important advances in looking at the power problems, particularly electrical power problems, of Atlantic Canada and in seeking an Atlantic solution for them.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING PROGRAM TO PROVIDE MILK FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the powdered milk surplus is building up by some 10 per cent in the month of April, and in view of the fact that there is a well known nutritional deficiency among many young people in this country, may I ask the minister whether or not he is planning to introduce in this country ways and means to finance in the schools of Canada a school milk program for all students?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that he would consider that program and discuss it with the provinces. It is under provincial jurisdiction. The province of Nova Scotia has such a program which allows students to buy milk at five cents for eight ounces, and it is a very good program.

* * *

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF FINANCING PROGRAM TO PROVIDE MILK FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister whether or not he on behalf of the federal government can make a financial commitment to finance a school milk program for the students in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have set out the fiscal framework for the current fiscal year and I do not see any prospect of changing that.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—ALLEGED LACK OF DISCUSSION OF FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that no small businessman would think of entering into a business deal involving financing unless the details of that financing were set out on paper and understood well by both sides, would the Prime Minister outline to the House how his government could possibly discuss for many months a deal involving $1 billion with $300 million of financing without one single word about that financing being set forth on paper?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of National Defence and other ministers have repeatedly said, it was our understanding, as a result of verbal agreement, that the bridge financing would be furnished and supplied by the Lockheed Company. The hon. gentleman talks about small business. In small and big business alike, there sometimes are such things as gentleman's and verbal agreements.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, can the right hon. gentleman think of any business of any size about which he knows or about which he has heard which has entered into any kind of business deal of any size without getting the details of the financing on paper, because without the financing no business deal that requires financing can possibly go forward. Is this not the height of irresponsibility on the part of his government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. gentleman that we are not talking about the contract itself at this point. The contract was signed later and put under escrow in circumstances of which the House is aware. At this time we are talking about a preliminary agreement. Very often agreements are entered into on the force of a gentleman's word and he would know more about that if he were a gentleman.

* * *

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RUSTING OF FORD MOTOR VEHICLES—POSSIBLE INTERVENTION BY MINISTER AND INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In so far as further class actions are being taken on behalf of Ford owners who have been affected by a very serious rust problem, and in so far as thousands of Ford owners have registered complaints both with the government and the Ford Motor Company, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on behalf of the consumers whether he has intervened with the Ford Motor Company in this regard relating to previous complaints and has he anything further, on their behalf, to report to the House this afternoon.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Well, Mr. Speaker, there have been several class actions taken against Ford, under provincial legislation not under federal legislation, for alleged rusting of their automobiles. I have discussed the matter with the Ford Motor Company of Canada and with the Automobile Protection Association to the extent that I think there are grounds sufficient for mediating their dispute.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, in view of what has now become an extremely serious problem, especially in the Canadian climate, is the minister considering legislation which would oblige the automobile companies to rust-proof parts before final assembly?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, we are investigating this whole area of whether the problems related to rust are due to climatic conditions or the type of chemical used on the roads in the winter time or whether they are peculiar to a particular automobile or certain design of automobile. When we have completed that study I will announce what the government's intention would be in this regard.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

PROPOSED FEDERAL REGULATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL TRANSMISSION OF ELECTRICITY—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to his statement made last Sunday at Chatham, Massachusetts in which he said that it might be necessary for the Canadian government to regulate interprovincial transmission of electricity in much the same way as it now does oil and gas. Given the reaction this statement has occasioned will the minister furnish the House with the specifics of this new government proposal and will he say what consultation there was with the provinces prior to this statement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was not making any particular proposal. I was making an observation which I think is a very important observation. My concern—and I am sure it is the concern of many of the hon. member's colleagues—is that power policy, particularly electrical generation and transmission within the maritimes and Atlantic Canada generally, has been held back by balkanization and there is a very good chance that if very narrow provincial views are the dominant views we will not find any solution for Atlantic Canada on a bigger, more efficient scale. I made the observation that I thought the federal government has the constitutional power to move in if necessary in the transmission of electric power in the same way—the principle is very much the same—as it has in respect of oil and natural gas transmission.

● (1440)

Miss MacDonald: My supplementary question is to ask the minister again what consultation he had with the provinces prior to his statement, and since his proposal has been interpreted by several provinces as an attempt to intrude on the natural resources field, what clarification did he subsequently give to the provinces to relieve their concerns as to the constitutionality of his proposal?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, my predecessor tells me that the same point of view that I expressed at that time was raised with the provincial premiers, or some of them, as long as a year ago. I had some discussions prior to this meeting with some of the premiers—I was not able to reach them all. You may recall that one of the provincial premiers, as a matter of fact, was in Europe at that time. But I did have occasion to meet with each of the premiers or their ministers before we sat down at the public session, and we discussed these questions specifically.

Miss MacDonald: After you made the statement.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED BREAK-IN OF QUEBEC NEWSPAPER OFFICE BY MEMBERS OF THE FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In addition to co-operating with his provincial counterpart and as the minister responsible for the RCMP, will he indicate whether or not he is prepared to give this House a comprehensive report into the circumstances involved in the break and entry by the force and by other police into the premises of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec, and fulfill the commitment he made in the House to give as much information as possible on this matter?

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): As hon. members know, there is an allegation that a criminal offence was committed in the break in of the L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec. The Solicitor General of Quebec, in his capacity as chief law enforcement officer in Quebec, is investigating that matter and has asked for our full co-operation. I have spoken to the commissioner of the RCMP and he said he would make available to the Solicitor General of Quebec all information relevant to that particular incident, and the Solicitor General of Quebec will take action in due course. Whether he lays charges or not will be for him to decide as the person in charge of administering the Criminal Code in the province.

Mr. MacKay: I would hope that, regardless of what happened in Quebec, the minister, as the minister responsible, would indicate what the circumstances were. Whose specific responsibility was it to make certain that proper legal authority existed for the RCMP to enter the premises of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Quebec, the purpose of which such entry was obtained, and assure the House that, as one former RCMP officer described such operations, it was not "a wholesale ransacking and appropriation of papers", or a fishing expedition?

Mr. Allmand: At this time I only have the side of the story presented by the RCMP. I do not have the reports of the Quebec provincial police or the Montreal city police. After the Solicitor General of Quebec makes the decision to act or not to act in this case, of course, we may have more to say and may take action ourselves. It would appear from the information I have that this was a joint operation with the three forces involved, and it is unclear at this stage who had complete authority for the operation. There is some difference of opinion at present among the forces as to who had the final say on this, and that is part of the investigation that is going on.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR PASSENGER SERVICE FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES—POSSIBILITY OF EARLY ACTION

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the air passenger service in Atlantic Canada. In view of the desperate need for this service, and in view of the support by the Council of Maritime Premiers recently of the bid of Eastern Provincial Airways Limited to provide this service, could the minister indicate to the House what is the disposition of his department to ensure the quickest possible implementation of this service in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not want in any way to prejudge the consideration which the CTC will be giving to the applications. The exact question regarding further facilities, when it arises is, of course, one which we have to take under consideration having regard to our total priorities and available funds. I can assure the hon. member, however, of a full and sympathetic examination of specific problems in his area.

* * *

POST OFFICE

ALLEGATION BY UNION DEPARTMENT VIOLATING TECHNICAL CHANGE PROVISION OF CONTRACT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My question is directed to the Postmaster General, and I have given him prior notice of it. In view of the fact that the minister has told the people of Canada in the past that the agreement between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers concerning a contract clause dealing with technological change would solve many of the problems in the Post Office, and in view of the fact that these problems have not been solved as in several centres the union has complained that the government has not lived up to its part of the contractual clause dealing with technological change, specifically article 29.03(b) requiring a detailed description of the technological change, and in view of the fact that the chief adjudicator of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Mr. Ed Jolliffe, ruled in his presentation that the Post Office Department is in breach of article 29.03(b), can the minister assure the House that he will instruct his department to honour the technological change provisions of the agreement between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the written report of the adjudicator has still not been made available to both parties. The hon. gentleman is basing his premise on a verbal declaration of the adjudicator last week. What he said in effect, and the hon. gentleman is quite right, is:

> . . . it is my opinion that the onus was on the employer and not on the union,— in refusing advance information. He also said:

> . . . but it is also my opinion that it would have been reasonable on the part of the union to specify the kind of information needed,

In other words, it can hardly be deduced that the adjudicator is blaming the employer any more than the employee. However, the more important thing is that if they want this particular section to work, I would be quite pleased to meet with the leader of the union in order to clarify any ambiguities in the section.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister that a meeting between the two groups would certainly be most helpful, but the fact of the matter still remains that the minister is responsible for his department—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REASON MOUNTED POLICE NOT PATRONIZING CERTAIN GASOLINE STATIONS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services and ask him on what basis local service stations, which in the past have supplied gasoline and oil for vehicles used by the RCMP detachments, are not being patronized now by the RCMP, even though the price of these service stations might be as low or lower than the price at service stations which are supposedly on the department's priority list for purchases?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I will surely check the facts mentioned by the hon. member and answer him as soon as possible.

* * *

[English]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE PRIME MINISTER KNEW OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister stated in the House on June 3 that he would check the cabinet minutes to determine the date when he learned that the deal with Lockheed was proceeding on the basis of a verbal commitment by that company to provide interim financing. Now that the Prime Minister has had a chance to check his records, would he tell the House when and how he learned that the verbal arrangement with Lockheed was truly a verbal one?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did have the sequence of events put on the record for me. Unfortunately, I do not have the record with me today in the House. I will make sure that I bring it with me tomorrow. But in so far as I can recollect, it is the same as I heard the President of the Treasury Board say it a few minutes ago.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh; we are really in trouble now!

Mr. Trudeau: Late in November, I believe on the 27th, there was a meeting of the Treasury Board at which cognizance was taken of the fact that DND could not finance this particular deal, that we needed more financing. At what point the knowledge of a verbal contract came to my attention I am not certain. I will have to check the date.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—POSSIBILITY OF COURT ACTION IN VIEW OF ALLEGATION COMPANY BREACHED AGREEMENT

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this question. If Lockheed misled the government and in fact reneged on the verbal agreement, as often stated by the Minister of National Defence, will the Prime Minister say why there is any legal commitment to pay $16 million or any other amount to Lockheed? Will the Prime Minister say why there is any legal commitment to pay $16 million or any other amount to Lockheed? Will he say whether the government has sought legal advice, and will he personally take the initiative to see that Lockheed is taken to court to recover the amounts which have been paid?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the case. If there is any legal commitment to pay $16 million or $14 million, whatever the figure is, it is because on December 2, the government in order to keep the option open, told Lockheed to begin the work and that we would be liable for any work Lockheed did if the contract were not finally signed.

Mr. Bawden: They reneged on their verbal agreement.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. gentleman wants to hear my answer, perhaps he should stop shouting. If he wants to ask a supplementary, I will gladly sit down and then answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I think I am finished.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REGIONAL PRODUCERS' REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. Over two weeks ago the president of the CBC went to Vancouver to meet with an unofficial group known as the Committee of 100 to discuss their concern about the lack of regional involvement in production. Two weeks later the CBC television producers felt compelled to make a public call for a royal commission on the subject. Can the Secretary of State inform the House of any of the substance of the president's discussion and why the producers across Canada had to resort to this public call for a royal commission?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not present when the president of the corporation met with that committee. I myself met with some members of the committee two weeks after his meeting. There is a problem which arises out of the success of our regionalization.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: That may appear paradoxical, but I would like to explain it. The fact is that we now have in Vancouver a facility for production which we never had before. We will be developing one in Regina which really did not exist before. Now there is a degree of tension, obviously, between the producers in a place like Vancouver, who would like to have much greater autonomy over program production than they had before, and I think this is a problem the president of the corporation is looking at seriously. It is one I am concerned about, but I am sure that problem would not be resolved by a royal commission.

Mr. Friesen: Would the minister push his luck a little and try to be even more successful by looking on decentralization as more than just putting buildings across the country and allowing some individual decision making across the country? Would he push his luck and take care of that matter before he is shuffled to the oblivion of the government backbenches this summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte.

* * *

FISHERIES

POSSIBILITY OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS CONCERNING MARKETING AND PROCESSING—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE MEETING TO INFORM MEMBERS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of State (Fisheries) has been involved in negotiations of an international nature in respect of fishing quotas and marketing. Would the minister advise the House whether any contracts have been entered into for the marketing of fish which might be caught in Canada and be surplus to the processing capacity in the area in which the fish are caught?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if a contract proposal has been signed. I have been out of touch because I have been travelling in the fisheries areas in Newfoundland and Iles de la Madeleine over the past few days. I know it was one of the options which was being considered. The price offered for herring in one part of the east coast, the Bay of Fundy, which was mainly used for fish meal, was so low that we looked at alternative markets, and I know the possibility of some sales over the side for a part of that quota was one of the options considered. I have no firm knowledge at the moment whether a possible contract has been finalized, but certainly it necessitates a permit to be issued by the minister responsible, and I have not yet issued such a permit.

Mr. McCain: In view of the negotiations and considerations which have taken place in all respects with regard to the fishing industry, would the minister call or arrange to have called a meeting of the Fisheries Committee which he would attend and advise the members of that committee as to just what has been accomplished as well as what can be expected from future negotiations, which we understand are to take place?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I certainly have no objection to informing hon. members either in the forum of the committee or in other ways. I understand there was a full session on this very issue, mainly with regard to the Bay of Fundy herring, but what information I have is obviously available, and I will make it available to the hon. member.

PUBLIC WORKS

AUTHORITY OF MR. GALLACHER TO SERVE EVICTION NOTICES TO PROPERTY OWNERS IN PICKERING AREA

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise if Mr. E. J. Gallacher, an employee of the Department of Public Works, was acting under authority granted by the Governor in Council and the minister when he served eviction notices which were worded "immediate surrender" to those owners whose land the department wishes to expropriate in the Pickering area?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to ascertain whether he was or was not.

* * *

HEALTH

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADVISE ONTARIO OF CONDITION OF FISH STORED AT GRASSY NARROWS RESERVE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning the fish problem on the Grassy Narrows Reserve. In view of the fact that Mr. David Eckhart, an environmental health officer with the minister's department, visited Grassy Narrows Indian Reserve on May 18, found the fish stored in the freezer not in good condition and advised the Indians not to eat them, why did the department not advise the Ontario ministry of natural resources of the problem, since that department is responsible for the maintenance of the freezer?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is misinformed. First, the visit in question did not take place on May 18, but on May 17. During his visit the inspector realized that the fish were not kept under proper conditions and he gave instructions that different methods be used to keep the fish in that freezer. At that time there seemed to be no indication that the fish was unfit for human consumption, even though the refrigerating conditions under which it was kept were not adequate. I have no indication that the official advised the Indians at that time that the fish was unfit for consumption. A further inspection of the fish was carried out later, around May 25, at which time the conclusion reached was that the fish was unfit for consumption, but not on May 17 or 18 as the hon. member's question indicated. It would appear that certain developments occurred in the meantime.

* * *

[English]

POST OFFICE

FINES ASSESSED UNION MEMBERS WHO DID NOT PARTICIPATE IN STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General, and it is with regard to last fall's postal strike. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General gave a number of post office locals written assurance that they would not be subject to pressure tactics or harassment, does the minister now approve of the fact that those members of locals which were suspended from the union are still having union dues subtracted from their pay cheques, plus an additional $10 per person this past month?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of it. The question of union dues, however, comes under the Rand formula, and that means that a non-union member who, however, wants the protection of the union must pay the regular dues. In so far as the $10 fine per month levied by that union is concerned, I think this practice, frankly, is despicable.

* * *

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

ALLEGED FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH PROVISIONS OF ACT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). It has to do with the matter I brought to his attention on several occasions in this House. It has to do with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act Part III, section 23(2). Could the minister now tell the House whether he has consulted the Solicitor General and whether the Solicitor General will proceed with charges because of the obvious violation of the law with reference to that section of the act?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the file to see what point this matter has reached.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF TARIFF PROTECTION FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA FRUIT AND VEGETABLE GROWERS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. There was a tragic waste of hundreds of tons of cauliflower and other vegetables produced in the Fraser Valley last year. Is it the intention of the government to protect the fruit and vegetable industry of British Columbia through the imposition of adequate tariff structures during the current production season?

● (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the tariffs that are in effect in Canada during the crop production year are agreed upon by the producers organizations through consultation with the Canadian Horticultural Society and then in consultation with the federal government. I have had no representation that I can think of so far this year concerning the crops that the hon. member mentioned.

Point of Order—Mr. Blais

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER ASSURED BY NATIONAL DEFENCE BY DECEMBER 2 OF FINANCIAL CAPACITY TO HANDLE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services and I am sorry I was not able to ask it while he was in his seat. I appreciate the minister returning to his seat. My question is designed to try to elucidate events that occurred on December 1 or 2. At page 14106 of Hansard the Minister of Supply and Services said that the Department of National Defence "assured me that problem could be solved and the financing was assured". Later, in answer to the hon. member for Victoria at page 14153, the minister indicated that the Department of National Defence "gave no indication whatsoever that it could not meet its financial obligations". What is unclear is whether there was a concrete undertaking given by the Department of National Defence as to the financial capacity of that department on this matter. I wonder if the Minister of Supply and Services could tell the House specifically whether information was given to him on that date by his colleague, the Minister of National Defence or by officials of that department. If so, could he tell the House specifically what that information was or was all that happened that the Department of National Defence did not draw attention to the fact of some financing problems? Was there a specific undertaking and if so, what was it and who gave it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as I often said to the House, the questions of financing are obviously the responsibility of the Department of National Defence. As for me, I carried out my mandate according to my obligations, that is to say DND had given the assurance they would look after the financing.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Presenting Reports from Standing or Special Committees.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege. In reply to my supplementary question the Prime Minister today indicated that he thought I was being ungentlemanly in asking such a question. As I know the Prime Minister only gives such rude answers when he is frustrated and does not want to answer the question, I want him to know that I completely forgive his rudeness in making such an ungentlemanly remark.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it never would have crossed my mind to suggest that the hon. gentleman was not a gentleman. That would be a non-tautology; on the contrary I know he is a gentleman. The fact that struck me is that perhaps he is more of a country gentleman than a business gentleman. Any gentleman engaged in business of any size knows that there are hundreds of millions of dollars of transactions that go on every day on verbal assurances without any contractual writing. This is something that the hon. gentleman does not seem to know about.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to Standing Order 43. I am sure Your Honour has noted as other hon. members have, that the practice has developed whereby members of the opposition have been using motions under Standing Order 43 in order to attempt to make political points.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I did say "attempt", Mr. Speaker. My intention would have been to rise at the time motions are presented in order to object except that I am mindful of Your Honour's previous statements regarding points of order during question period. The point I wish to make is that I do not believe that your rulings do affect motions under Standing Order 43. However, being a fair man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I would offer to hon. members opposite the full opportunity of debating the point because I am confident it is one on which Your Honour will rule in my favour. I would therefore invite Your Honour to perhaps set aside some time in the near future so that this matter can be seriously debated and discussed and a proper ruling made on it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear my hon. friend characterize himself as a fair man.

An hon. Member: Just fair; that is all.

An hon. Member: He is the member who always says no to motions under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is not being unduly modest, Mr. Speaker. In any event, I think Standing Order 43 has never been used by us for any political purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Not successfully.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Except, Mr. Speaker, when the dictates and circumstances of our country have required us to bring to the attention of the House the shortcomings of the government—which are legion—and important matters of public interest, the nature of which we would expect members of the House to consent to unanimously.

What is of concern to us, however, is that throughout this session there seems to be a presumption on the part of the government that all matters under Standing Order 43 ought not to be considered. In fact, when the history of this time is written the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) will go down as having made his greatest parliamentary contribution by uttering the word "no" before the motion has been fully put to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As I recollect the way that motions made under Standing Order 43 have gone it seems to me that Your Honour has seen fit to indicate whether motions made under Standing Order 43 are in fact on a matter of "urgent and pressing necessity" to use the words of the rule. You, sir, ought to make that decision and ought to continue to make that decision.

What I should like the government to do is not to make the decision that unanimous consent ought to be rejected to all these motions before the motion ever has a chance to be considered by you on the one hand or even put before the House on the other hand. It is to that point that there could be some objection before this House or before the committee. The Standing Order is certainly not one to be abused. It ought not to be abused by any member of the House in advancing a motion under it and it ought not to be abused by any member of the House by rejecting the substance of the motion out of hand. If we are to direct our comments to anything with respect to this matter they ought to be directed to what I think is the impropriety that has occurred during this session particularly and other sessions that has brought Standing Order 43 into disrepute.

Standing Order 43 is one of the few instances where private members of the House—not opposition parties as such, not cabinet, not parliamentary secretaries but private members of the House—can bring to the attention of the House and the country matters of urgent and pressing necessity falling within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. Because it is assumed that all such motions should not be put, the rule has fallen into disrepute. That should not have happened. I hope those considering this rule will bear in mind that it is necessary for private members of this House to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House in this manner matters of great concern to the member's constituency, region or the country as a whole.

● (1510)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the point raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais), I submit that it is not a valid point of order and that Your Honour should take no notice of it. The fact is that before Easter, 1975, the House and the Chair had a great deal of trouble with motions moved under Standing Order 43. There seemed to be no time limit for moving them; there was, admittedly, abuse and the occupant of the chair, both yourself and Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, encountered a good deal of difficulty.

The procedure and organization committee which recommended rule changes which came into effect after Easter, 1975, attempted to resolve the problem by putting in the orders of the day a time limit. Motions under Standing Order 43 can be moved only in the time between the end of prayers and 2.15 p.m. I submit that since that change was made, there has been little abuse. Your Honour on a number of occasions refused to put certain motions, because you felt they went beyond the rights of that particular opportunity. But when a member on the government side, who thinks that politics is all right on his side but not on this side, argues that we should have some discussion on the motions moved, he is intervening where he has no reason to intervene.

I submit members may stray a bit on occasion, but Your Honour stops them. On the other hand, you run into situations like those of today. My hon. friend from Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) knew he would not be recognized in the question period and used Standing Order 43 to bring to the attention of the House the plight of persons in his constituency who have been burned out of their homes. If that is playing politics, if that is an abuse, I suggest my hon. friend opposite does not know what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member opposite said no. I think that is politics at its worst. The hon. member of my party raised the issue. That was politics as it ought to be. I submit that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization did a good job when it resolved the problem before Easter, 1975. If I may say so—I hope I will not be misunderstood—Your Honour is policing the matter quite well. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) should find other fields to farm.

Mr. Paproski: He needs a holiday.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order raised by the Parliament Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) concerning Standing Order 43. This is a most important point. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just stated, there has been a time when members could introduce an indefinite number of motions under Standing Order 43. This could be a very long process and made for unending debates. Therefore, Standing Order 43, was changed on a unanimous vote.

But as far as this party is concerned, Standing Order 43 was very often the only way to raise an urgent point, and explain our request or proposition. The government felt this was too lengthy, because in their view we always waste too much time. They would rather have no opposition, but it does not matter much anyway because they act as if they were alone.

Before Easter 1975, there was work to be done and it was decided 15 minutes would be allocated each day to motions under S.O. 43. The main result was fewer and fewer Social Credit members could raise urgent matters, because the 15 minutes were distributed among all opposition parties.

Something else happened at the same time, and I would appreciate it if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council would listen, as we listened to him. There was a time when Liberal members put questions during the question period. Today, with the goodwill of almost everyone in this House, they are allowed to put questions. So, there has been a reduction of opposition opportunities under Standing Order 43, and at the same time the government overtook another portion of the question period, which should normally belong to opposition members.

I shared the views of those who favoured greater participation by the so-called government backbenchers. It has come to the point where we are now the target of the parliamentary secretary's irony for using Standing Order 43 on occasion, although I respectfully submit that oftentimes the Chair recognizes only one question by one member only in our group.

Point of Order—Mr. Blais

Mr. Speaker, this is the point of no return. Either we shall make full use of the Standing Orders to have our party recognized in this House, or the business of the House will be systematically obstructed. It is abnormal that in wanting to cooperate with the Chair, we should get only one question and one supplementary, and furthermore that we should have to take the abuse of the parliamentary secretary. There will have to be a lot more latitude in this House, that is more honesty for each parliamentary group, or I am advising the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) that he will no longer get those unanimous consents in any way.

Mr. Speaker, there is a limit to wanting to muzzle the opposition, particularly smaller parties. That is why I find entirely out of order the point raised by the parliamentary secretary because it does not consider the members of this House, and I ask him respectfully as well as you, Mr. Speaker, to respect our rights and requests as much as we accept that backbenchers of his own party ask questions.

Mr. Speaker, when they come to us to ask for our cooperation to allow a Liberal member or two to ask questions, we say: Okay, we want you to do your work just as we are doing ours. So we are asking you today to give us the same right and to respect that right without taking away the little participation in democracy to which we are entitled in this House, that is Standing Order 43. It will be remembered that one day, about Standing Order 43, when the Chair at that time allowed only one motion per day all members presented in turn two or three motions under Standing Order 43. I say this simply to bring to the attention of the House the fact that we were muzzled. And it was immediately after that that Standing Order 43 was changed so motions could be introduced from two o'clock to 2.15 and we agreed, provided we would be recognized during the oral question period. In concluding, I say to the parliamentary secretary that no respect was shown for us by both his party and the Chair—not you, Your Honour—in the oral question period as a whole. Furthermore, we will not tolerate being muzzled with respect to Standing Order 43.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Representatives of each of the parties have contributed to the point of order with respect to Standing Order 43 raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais). I do not think further contributions on the point are required at this time.

It is important to make one or two brief observations. I suggest, initially, that the assessment of Standing Order 43 made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was correct. The Standing Order has given the Chair difficulty for some time, a difficulty which arose by virtue of the fact that the order paper called for motions under Standing Order 43 to be raised each day after the question period, which meant that there was an open-ended period of time during which members could attempt to introduce such motions.

At the beginning of the present parliament I began to examine very carefully such motions moved pursuant to Standing Order 43. Since the period of time in which they could be introduced was open-ended, it was incumbent on the Chair to exercise diligence in ascertaining whether they conformed to the rule. A difficulty arose early during the present parliament, in that since such motions are almost exclusively introduced by opposition members, it appeared as if the Chair was constantly interposing itself between opposition members who introduced such motions and the actual bringing of the motions to the floor of the House with unanimous consent. That was an unfortunate appearance which did not make the life of the Speaker of the House easier.

• (1520)

I think in very large measure that was corrected by the rearrangement of our proceedings from which a very strong self-policing feature has evolved in that motions under Standing Order 43 have a limited life each day. If they are spurious on a repetitive basis by either a member or a caucus, surely that will become a self-policing factor because, on a constant basis, they cut into the time for posing questions which is generally regarded as the most important daily device in this House.

Therefore, the self-policing feature has enabled me to take a much more relaxed attitude toward the content of Standing Order 43 motions. However, I do on occasion refuse to put motions which are frivolous or do not seem to have anything to do with the jurisdiction of this House. Beyond that, as long as they relate to a matter of some importance and urgency, whether it even be in the narrow parochial lines of an individual constituency, that is a matter which might be considered.

That is not the end of the difficulty. There is a difficulty on the other side as well. When there is refusal to give unanimous consent to such a motion, there is often the impression that there appears to be some sentiment expressed contrary to the merits of the motion. That is an unfair interpretation, indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As all hon. members know, motions put forward pursuant to Standing Order 43 seek unanimous consent only for the introduction of the motion. If unanimous consent is given, once the motion is introduced it is a debatable motion which becomes the priority order of the day. Therefore, the question is not so much the merits of the motion involved, but whether the House wishes to give its unanimous consent to set aside the business of the day to debate something else. Often, the putting forward of such a motion seems to carry with it the spirit that if only hon. members would give their unanimous consent the motion would pass without debate. That is a great spirit, but all of us know there is no guarantee of procedural equanimity on all sides. Therefore, there is difficulty with interpretation of the rule, regardless of whether it is an opposition member who wishes to put the motion or government members who refuse to set aside orders of the day in order to debate it, or the Chair with regard to interpreting it.

Bearing in mind all those difficulties, I have only two remarks to make. The self-policing features do not eliminate all of the problems, but certainly most of them. The manner in which we have been dealing with Standing Order 43 seems to be about the best we have been able to find so far. Second, if there are improvements for further refinements, rather than their being raised here for further discussion, perhaps they ought to be suggested to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization which might give them further consideration.

There are other members seeking the floor on a point of order. I will first recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), then the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I know that you are trying to discourage any further intervention on the point of order with regard to Standing Order 43. However, there is another aspect of this subject that has been mentioned very rarely, if at all, since that order has become part of our rules. There are two aspects, one of which was briefly mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot prevent the hon. member from raising the point of order. However, I sought intervention from all parties and made a ruling on the point of order. I cannot prevent any hon. member from raising it as a separate point of order. I would prefer to think that the subject is closed at the moment, but I cannot prevent the hon. member from raising it.

Mr. Benjamin: Most of the time I am not disagreeable. However, as a private member in this chamber I feel there is an aspect of Standing Order 43 that has not been taken into account by private members on both sides of the House. My understanding is that if any member of this House wants to move a motion that requires unanimous consent, he should at least have the courtesy to state in advance what the motion is and when he intends to move it. This is the procedure in the standing committees when members wish to move amendments. They have the courtesy of passing out copies of their amendments. This also applies to the various House leaders when they are arriving at agreements as to procedures to be followed or what the business of the House will be.

When a private member rises to move a motion under Standing Order 43, which I rarely do, he is not playing around. He is genuinely interested in obtaining unanimous consent, not the Pavlovian reflex of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). Similarly, an hon. member should be able to obtain unanimous consent without there being debate or, if in the course of obtaining advance notice in discussion with the other parties to obtain agreement for unanimous consent, that may or may not be put with debate. Surely that should be the responsibility of each member who wishes to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

It is nonsensical for a member to move a motion under Standing Order 43 when he is just playing around. Similarly, it is nonsensical that when a member moves a very good motion under Standing Order 43, which he does not want debated, not to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to put the motion and have it passed. The knee-jerk reaction of members opposite is surely a perversion of the rule. The efforts of Your Honour to rule out those motions which just "play around" have been excellent. However, there is a great deal more responsibility on each individual member with regard to how he words his motion under Standing Order 43 and how he proceeds with it.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) seeking the floor pursuant to the point of order with regard to Standing Order 43?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have found, strangely enough, that this is one of the corners of the House that is under the blinkers. Having been a member of the procedure committee, and having considered this matter, I share some of the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I recognize some of the problems faced by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) who, frankly is under instruction to make an automatic block. His predecessor was known for that. It is a sort of knee-jerk reaction. I believe that in many instances the House has been guilty of abusing Standing Order 43. Standing Order 26 used to be the vehicle for giving expression to private members' concerns.

● (1530)

I am not going to criticize the hon. member for Nipissing, nor others, nor the Chair; I am here to suggest very strongly that the Chair should request the committee on procedure to take another look at this matter to see whether or not there is some other formula which will give greater liberty to individual members to advance certain points of view. We have done this with the ten o'clock show, and perhaps this should come at six o'clock; but we have done some other things, too. However, I earnestly suggest—and this is something that has to come from the Chair to the government House leader—that this be made a matter of priority with the committee on procedure, since I would say that we are, unfortunately, in a situation where the chairmanship of the committee of procedure is under the government House leader. That should not be, Mr. Speaker, since procedure is a matter for members of the House.

Mr. Speaker: If I may now finalize the representations made on Standing Order 43, the last two members who have spoken have raised different points. Dealing firstly with the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I was at the point of suggesting that this matter might be taken before the procedure committee. I have nothing to say, of course, respecting the chairmanship of that committee.

With respect to the point made by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), the hon. member raises a separate difficulty that is inherent in the remarks he has put forward; that is to say, that an hon. member who puts forward, as he described, a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 is persuaded that the motion is so worth while that it ought to be put without debate. That, in itself, is a proposition which most hon. members find questionable. Often, these motions are rather complex and touch very important subjects. Often members find it is incongruous to debate motions in this chamber for many days, yet the House is expected on a daily basis to accept a proliferation of motions without any debate or possibility of amendment. Usually, insistence on debate is the only motivation for refusing unanimous consent. I only add that comment to indicate that the problem of either getting or withholding unanimous consent is much more complex than meets the naked eye.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CANADA BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TABLING OF TECHNICAL AND COST PROFILE OF TELEVISION COVERAGE OF PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), a technical and cost profile of television coverage of parliamentary proceedings prepared by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 4,615, 5,258, 5,276, 5,306, 5,307, 5,373, 5,497 and 5,522.

[Text]

GRANTS PROVIDED BY MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL TO PROVINCE OF MANITOBA

Question No. 4,615—Mr. Whiteway:

1. For the years (a) 1973-74 (b) 1974-75 (c) 1975-76 were grants provided to the Province of Manitoba by the (i) Medical Research Council for medical research (ii) National Research Council for physical sciences research (iii) Canada Council for research in humanities and social sciences and, if so, in each case, in what amounts?

2. For the year 1974-75 how many persons were employed in medical research in the Province of Manitoba and, of these, how many will have their jobs terminated due to the recent freeze in funds provided by the Medical Research Council?

3. For the year 1974-75, were projects funded by the Medical Research Council in Manitoba and, if so (a) what were they (b) how many, if any, such projects will be affected due to the recent freeze in grants provided by the Medical Research Council?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Medical Research Council, the National Research Council and the Canada Council as follows: 1. (i)* $2,395,442; $2,253,839; $2,282,664. (ii) 1973-74, $2,261,130; 1974-75, $2,323,537; 1975-76 (Forecast), $2,628,863. (iii) No grants were provided.

*NOTE: Figures refer to grants provided to researchers in the Province of Manitoba.

2. Information not available.

3. Yes; (a) In 1974-75 the Medical Research Council supported 90 projects, 1 MRC Group and 2 special projects, and provided general research grants to the deans of the schools of medicine, dentistry and pharmacy, and 7 grants for the maintenance of research equipment. Details of the projects supported in 1974-75 are recorded in the Report of the President of the Medical Research Council for 1974-75, tabled in the House on June 17, 1975; (b) Thirty-nine of those projects have been completed or terminated during the intervening period. Of those which are still continuing in 1976-77, 32 projects and the MRC Group have been subject to a 3 per cent reduction in approved operating funds for 1976-77, and the general research grants have been reduced by one-third for the year 1976-77. Seven projects which would normally have been assured of support for the full year 1976-77 will receive only 8 months support and 2 additional ones will receive 3 months rather than 12 months support. These figures, of course, do not take account of additional funds of $2 million recently made available to the Medical Research Council. It is expected that the decision as to the disposition of these extra funds will be made by Council at its meeting of June 8-11, 1976.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS PROGRAMME—LOANS TO FARMERS IN TÉMISCAMINGUE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 5,258—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. Since the implementation of the Farm Improvement Loans Programme, what was the total amount of loans granted to the farmers in the Constituency of Témiscamingue?

2. (a) How many farmers in the Constituency made applications for such loans (b) how many received such a loan (c) what are their addresses?

3. For each loan, what was (a) the name of the lending institution (b) the rate of interest charged (c) the period for repayment?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Under the Farm Improvement Loans Programme the government provides guarantees for loans made at the discretion of private lenders. Statistics concerning such loan guarantees are not maintained on a constituency basis.

OUTFITTING OF SENIOR OFFICIALS' OFFICES WITH APPLIANCES

Question No. 5,276—Mr. Coates:

1. Since the present Deputy Minister of Health was appointed, what major appliances have been installed in his office and at what cost?

2. Are there any government regulations issued by Treasury Board or the Department of Public Works covering the outfitting of senior officials' offices with appliances such as stoves, refrigerators, dishwashers, and the like and, if so, what is the general purport of such regulations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Public Works and Treasury Board as follows: 1. No major appliances have been installed in the Deputy Minister of Health's office. However, an amount of $1,006 was spent to buy a dishwasher, refrigerator and stove when the Health side of the Department moved to new quarters. These appliances are adjacent to the Executive Conference Room and are at the disposal of Departmental Officers utilizing the Conference Room.

2. Although there are no Treasury Board regulations governing the outfitting of the offices of senior officials with electrical appliances, deputy heads are responsible for exercising and maintaining a high standard of probity and prudence in all aspects of the management of their departments and for ensuring that any acquisitions are appropriate to their needs.

SELECTION OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 5,306—Mr. Cossitt:

To the knowledge of the government, were appointees as Census Commissioners, for the Constituency of Leeds, for the 1976 Census members or supporters of the Liberal Party and, if so (a) is the government officially aware that Mr. Edward Lanigan was the provincial candidate for the Liberal Party in Leeds in the last provincial election (b) is the government officially aware that Mrs. Elsie Wilson of Smiths Falls is the Secretary of the Leeds Liberal Association (c) are all such appointments made on the basis of politics rather than on the basis of public competition and merit and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports the following: With respect to (a) and (b) Statistics Canada has no knowledge of the background or political affiliation of those individuals who are referred as Census Commissioner Candidates. Statistics Canada recommends for appointment only qualified candidates irrespective of their political affiliation. With respect to (c) the recruitment procedures for Census Commissioners are outlined in the answer to 2(a) of Question No. 5,307. It must be reiterated that candidates must pass both a personnel selection test and personal interview administered by employees of Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada does not recommend unqualified candidates to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for appointment.

SELECTION OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 5,307—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What constituencies are included under the jurisdiction of Mr. Robert L. Potvin, a regional director of Statistics Canada?

2. (a) What is a detailed description of methods used by Mr. Potvin or his representatives in selecting census commissioners for the 1976 Census (b) what is the name and address of every person contacted in regard to such appointments in each constituency (c) were Members of Parliament contacted and, if so, which ones and what is their political affiliation (d) in constituencies not represented by a Member of Parliament who is a member of the Liberal Party, were any members of Liberal Party executives contacted and, if so, what are their names and addresses?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports the following: 1. The constituencies included in the jurisdiction of the Ottawa Regional Office of Statistics Canada (Mr. R. L. Potvin, Regional Director) follow: (See table)

2. (a) The appointment of commissioners for the 1976 Census of Canada falls under the authority of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as contained under Section 5 of the Statistics Act. The same procedure for recruiting and appointing Commissioners has long been established several censuses ago. A local contact is appointed through the Minister's Office for each constituency for the purpose of identifying potential Commissioner candidates to Statistics Canada regional officers. All Commissioner nominees are subjected to a qualifying test administered by Statistics Canada; they are also interviewed by Statistics Canada employees. Those candidates judged by Statistics Canada to be qualified are recommended for appointment to the Minister; (b) The attachment lists the names and addresses of all local contacts provided to the Ottawa Regional Office of Statistics Canada. In addition, several Canada Manpower Centres were also contacted; (c) Question 2(b) above, indicates those constituencies where the Member of Parliament acted as a local contact for his/her own constituency; (d) In all constituencies the name of the local contact was provided to Statistics Canada by the office of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Statistics Canada has no information as to whether or not the local contacts are members of Liberal Party executives.

Ottawa Regional Office area of responsibility

Federal Electoral District	Name and Address of Contact
1. Abitibi	M. François Godbout 6 rue Principale N. Amos, Québec.
2. Gatineau	M. Gaston Clermont (M.P.) Thurso, Québec
3. Hull	Mme. Claudia Deslauriers 61 rue Corbeil, Hull, Québec.
4. Pontiac	Mr. Fred Metcalfe P.O. Box 401, Bristol, Québec.
5. Témiscamingue	M. Jacquelin Bergeron Nédélec, Québec.
6. Villeneuve	M. Lionel Brochu 663-3e avenue, Val d'Or, Québec.
7. Algoma	Mrs. Mary Gillis 211 Hunter Street, Espanola, Ontario.
8. Cochrane	Conrad Stewart 38 Kimberly Drive, Kapuskasing, Ontario.
9. Frontenac, Lennox and Addington	Mrs. Grace Stalker R.R. * 1, Bath, Ontario.
10. Glengarry-Prescott-Russell	Alvarez Laliberté 503 rue Laurier, Hawkesbury, Ontario.
11. Grenville-Carleton	Mrs. Pat Beaudry 1339 Meadowlands Dr., Apt. 911 Ottawa, Ontario.
12. Kingston and The Islands	Mr. Bob Little 346 Clarence Street, Kingston, Ontario.
13. Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton	Jim McGregor Douglas, Ontario.

Order Paper Questions

Ottawa Regional Office area of responsibility

Federal Electoral District	Name and Address of Contact
14. Leeds	Hugh Hart, 61 King St., East, Brockville, Ontario.
15. Nickel Belt	Mrs. Susan Kitchener, 10 Balsam, Copper Cliff, Ontario.
16. Nipissing	Mr. Fernand Remillard, P.O. Box 70, Lavigne, Ontario.
17. Ottawa Carleton	Tom Lamothe, 2 Seguin Street, Ottawa, Ontario. K1J 6P6
18. Ottawa Centre	Mr. Louis Tarte, 42 Primrose Avenue, Ottawa, Ontario.
19. Ottawa Vanier	Mrs. Earla Charlebois, 196 Marlborough Street, Ottawa, Ontario.
20. Ottawa West	Mrs. Joyce Erskine, 1230 Major Street, Ottawa, Ontario. K2C 2S2
21. Renfrew North-Nipissing East	Mr. Wilfred LeBarr, 262 Catherine Street, Pembroke, Ontario. K8A 1V7
22. Sault Ste-Marie	Mrs. Cathy Gernon, 152 Arden, Sault Ste-Marie, Ontario.
23. Stormont-Dundas	Mr. Ed Lumley (M.P.) 302 Baldwin Avenue, Cornwall, Ontario.
24. Sudbury	Sirio Bacciaglia, 902 Charlotte Street, Sudbury, Ontario. P3E 4C4
25. Timiskaming	Mr. Dan Kilbride, 6 Wood Street, Kirkland Lake, Ontario.
26. Timmins	Conrad Carrière, 224 Spruce N., Timmins, Ontario.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—MR. VICTOR FISHER, MEXICO

Question No. 5,373—Mr. Reynolds:

1. On what date was the Department of External Affairs first contacted regarding the Victor Fisher case?

2. What was the first time that anyone from the Canadian Embassy in Mexico talked or visited directly with Mr. Fisher?

3. What are all the dates and times that anyone from the Canadian Embassy had direct contact with Mr. Fisher?

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

4. (a) Who in the Canadian Embassy gave permission to talk directly with the Judge involved in the case (b) on what date did Embassy officials talk to the Judge?

5. Was anyone at the political level contacted by the Canadian government and, if so, what was the name(s) of the official(s) contacted?

6. Has the Canadian government ever acted as an intermediary when bribes or pay-offs were made to Mexican officials?

7. (a) How many complaints were received at the Canadian Embassy in Mexico during the years 1974 and 1975 (b) how many of these involved persons in jail (i) what are their names (ii) how long were they incarcerated?

8. Does the government advertise to warn Canadians of the special circumstances they can get involved in while in Mexico if they are accused of violating Mexican law?

9. Are there any negotiations going on with Mexico at the present time to set up special courts for Canadian tourists?

10. Are any negotiations going on between the Canadian and Mexican governments that would allow Canadians to post bail if they are arrested in Mexico?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. January 29, 1976.

2. February 16, 1976.

3. Records show that Mr. Fisher was directly contacted by the Embassy on February 16, March 25 (twice), April 9, 12, 21 and 22. In addition, there were several contacts with Mr. Fisher's lawyer and with his cousin, Mr. Arnold Fisher.

4. (a) Head of Consular Section of the Embassy; (b) February 26, 1976.

5. Yes. The Governor of Colima, the Office of the Deputy Attorney-General of Mexico and H.E. The Ambassador of Mexico to Canada.

6. No.

7. (a) Assuming that complaints mean requests for information or assistance, the Embassy received between 200-300 per month; (b) 61; (i) Information of this nature is considered to be confidential and is therefore not released without the consent of the persons concerned. (ii) The length of detention varied with the nature of the charge and; as applicable, with the length of sentence if found guilty.

8. No. There is no specific warning regarding Mexico. However, the pamphlets "Information for Canadians Travelling Abroad" and "Bon Voyage, but..." which are included with all new passports, contain general information on local laws and regulations abroad and on the type of difficulties which travelling Canadians may encounter.

9. No.

10. No.

ANNUAL SALARIES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Question No. 5,497—Mr. Herbert:

How many government employees are presently receiving an annual salary (a) between $20,000 and $30,000 (b) more than $30,000?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Of the government employees for which the Treasury Board is the employer (PSSRA, Schedule 1, Part 1, plus PSSRB): 18,918 receive an annual salary of between $20,000 and $30,000 and 4,652 receive an annual salary of more than $30,000.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—CARGO

Question No. 5,522—Mr. Forrestall:

In the best estimate of the government, would any cargo be diverted from the St. Lawrence Seaway if rates were increased to $1.65 per ton of bulk cargo and to $3.70 per ton of general cargo and, if so (a) what commodities would be diverted (b) in what quantity (c) to what modes and to what routings?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: Some cargo would be diverted from the St. Lawrence Seaway if the present tolls on the Montreal-Lake Ontario section were increased to $1.65 per ton bulk and $3.70 per ton general. Given the many variables that affect this traffic, it is not feasible to predict the commodities or the alternative routings that would be involved. There are, however, indications that such a toll increase would have adverse effects upon the low value bulk products which comprise some 90 per cent of Seaway traffic. A considerable amount of Quebec-Labrador iron ore could be diverted to U.S. East Coast ports and thence by unit train to the interior or, alternatively, to overseas markets. This ore presently provides a backhaul for grain moving eastward. If much of the ore traffic is diverted, the lack of a backhaul would affect substantially the cost advantage currently enjoyed by Seaway grain movements.

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to question No. 5,141 which was placed on the order paper on March 31. That question asks for details concerning the fact that operators of Bell Canada, under instructions from the Department of Communications, listen in at intervals of approximately 40 to 45 seconds to telephone calls made by members of parliament in incoming government Watts lines. My question also asks for the reason this is done, why these instructions were issued, who issued them, and for a guarantee that this was not being done for the purposes that one might hope are not the reason, namely, to gather information for political purposes.

It seems to me that this is a simple and straightforward question, and it is one to which members of parliament are entitled to have an answer. The information is no secret. It is contained in the question. It is obtainable from any Bell operator operating for the government under communications. It is obtainable from supervisors on duty. I have obtained it from four supervisors and at least five operators.

I think it is about time that the members of this House had an answer to a question almost 2½ months old asking why operators of Bell Canada, paid by the government, are listening in on calls of members of parliament. This is a pretty serious business. They say that the equipment is outdated, that they have to listen in to see if we are still talking in order to disconnect the line. If the equipment is outdated, I suggest that it is time something is done about the equipment.

Certainly, we ought to be told these things, Mr. Speaker, since it is always a possibility that some listening-in would be done for political purposes, and this would go beyond all bounds of decency and what should be permitted in the House. I recall that at one point Your Honour said that this matter would be looked into, along with other points of order raised by my colleague sitting to my left and, I believe, by the hon. member for Yukon, and that subsequently a meeting would be held to reveal the results and the findings. As yet, I do not believe that meeting has taken place. If we cannot have some indication from the parliamentary secretary as to when the question will be answered, perhaps I can ask the Chair for some indication when the promised meeting will be held, so as to clarify the situation which seems to me to be quite out of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had a question on the order paper since July 25, 1975, question No. 3,072, which is almost one year old. It asks several questions respecting the Post Office Department and their annual report concerning employees in the various categories. As I said, the question has been on the order paper since July 25 last, and I think it is absolutely ridiculous that this government has been unable to answer the question in almost a year. I think they had better get about their business and give answers to these questions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens (page 13901).

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I continue the remarks I started the other day, on June 3, as reported at page 14147 of Hansard, when I had to call it ten o'clock. At that time I was expressing concern that the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development had indicated that of 12 countries that appeared on a chart showing percentage expenditure of gross national product spent on research and development, Canada was tenth. I was trying to express some concern about the small amount of money that Canadians spend on research and development.

In order to show the concern that many people in this country have about this fact, may I just read an extract from a letter written to me by a constituent, a company that started a year and a half ago with four people, four founders, and which has now grown to the extent of employing 19 people. In its second full year it looks like its billings will amount to half a million dollars. Let me quote as follows:

● (1540)

We have had one government assistance program in that time, a defence industrial research program, with the government's share being $35,000. We have invested approximately $95,000 of our own funds into R&D to date and have received IRDIA assistance of approximately $19,000. We do not know what our chances of success to date, or even survival, would have been without IRDIA.

IRDIA is the only government assistance program that gives support to a new business and is one of the very few that gives capital equipment assistance at any time.

Apparently the firm is not in a DREE area. The letter continues:

The 25-cent on the $1.00 that IRDIA grants, in many cases, enables a small business to take that small step in expansion that they might otherwise not: i.e., new venture incentive.

Small business does not have the large corporate back-up to perform their own R&D. We must exist and expand on our smaller level of profit.

We feel that the underlying reason for the government action in repealing IRDIA was to reduce the enormous amount of assistance to large corporations, many of them multi-national, in which most research and development is of a small r and d nature and generally not even that, but is really product improvement.

Small businesses in Canada, which we would think are almost 100 per cent Canadian owned, initially do not have established products to offer, but do have very good ideas with which we believe we can do something. We must perform research and development in a manner so as to reach our goals as economically as possible. We are, therefore, not spending our limited funds recklessly and therefore do not indulge heavily in IRDIA assistance.

Rather than "throw out" IRDIA in its entirety, we suggest the act should be revised and limited to small business. For this purpose small business should be defined as a total corporation, not a division of a corporation, with less than 100 employees and billings, or sales, of less than $2,500,000. Once this plateau in size is reached, a company should be able to operate without outside assistance, or at least be in a position to contribute a large share of a cost shared program, i.e., PAIT. Such an approach to IRDIA would provide the incentive that new Canadian ventures require to continue in existence.

I would recommend that suggestion in the last paragraph I read, or an alternative to that, to the ministry. The ministry has said it intends to come out with something, but as yet it has not done so. Perhaps it should be pointed out at this stage that we have a growing balance of payments problem in this country, yet we have a growing domestic market of unused labour, high unemployment and a skilled labour force. We also have the raw materials. The reason we are going in the wrong direction and that we are lacking in proper research and development in industry is that we seem to have no direction, no national goals and no strategy of any kind. There certainly is no direction or any goal pertaining to an industrial strategy evident in this budget or in any other government proposal.

With the repeal of IRDIA there is, in my view, little or no government encouragement to small or medium-sized industries in the field of research and development. Unless we take some decisions in co-operation with the provinces in the immediate future, our industrial base will continue to erode, imports will continue to increase and our balance of payments will continue to be in a deficit position, with unemployment continuing at a very high level.

[Mr. Dick.]

Most industrial research is carried out by the multinational corporations in the countries in which the head office is established, and not in Canada. It is time this government took a hard look at industrial research in our own country with a mind to encouraging Canadian research and development. Unless the government changes its attitude we will lose, in the end, the talents of many of our valuable industrial researchers who no doubt will continue their research and inventions outside Canada in countries that appreciate the value of their work. Once these people have left, it will be very difficult to persuade them that the government has changed its mind and they are really welcome back at home.

It is important that the government consider the last paragraph I quoted from that letter, as I think it is a fair indication of the concerns many people have in technological and industrial companies in this country. This is the reason for great concern on the part of us all. Indeed, if we do not come up with an innovative, technological industrial base, which can only be arrived at through continuing research, development and innovation, employment in the future is doomed indeed.

I have already indicated that many people in this country who have PHDs and BAs or other college degrees, as well as engineers and other professionals, cannot find employment. Unemployment among youth in this country is alarmingly high. This is probably due to the fact we do not have the right mixture or industrial base. That is partly to blame.

As a parting comment, perhaps not directly related to the other matters about which I have spoken, I would urge this government to consider and actively put into place a "Buy Canada first" policy. The United States federal government and various state and municipal governments all have a preference in respect of government contracts there. The government awards contracts to American companies which employ American citizens in various parts of that country. Unfortunately, in Canada it has appeared over a period of time that a Canadian firm cannot get a contract with the government of this country unless it has proven itself by selling to some foreign industry or government. Only then will the Canadian government consider it to be of a certain quality.

The Canadian government should bend over backwards, to a greater degree than it has in the past, to make sure Canadian established companies employing Canadians are awarded just about every contract for which the Canadian government calls tenders. This, indeed, would encourage Canadians to carry out research and development and would encourage Canadians to be innovative. It would supply Canadians with jobs and would, in the end, encourage the employment of young people in this country as our industrial base gathers steam.

With that parting comment, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of speaking during this budget debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I recognize the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. (Mr. Jamieson).

An hon. Member: This should be good.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I begin on a note of bitter disappointment. I looked across the chamber and saw the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) present, and thought for sure he had come in especially to listen to me. I only discovered a few minutes ago that he is following me, and that is probably the only reason he is here. However, even though it may be accidental, I may be able to teach him something.

Mr. Clark: I will stay, if you will stay.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition has said that he will stay if I will stay. May I apologize to him in advance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I would be delighted to stay, but it so happens, as the hon. member knows, that I frequently listen to his learned discourse but unfortunately, I have another meeting immediately afterwards. I thought it might be useful this afternoon to take advantage of the budget debate to touch on a few of the more important aspects of trade position as it exists at the present time, and on various other matters which come under my responsibility in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Of necessity, because of the time constraint it will not be possible to go through these in detail. Nevertheless, I think I can, in the 30 minutes available, indicate to the House that there are encouraging signs in terms of the performance of the Canadian economy and the outlook for both international trade and trade generally in this country.

● (1550)

For example, in the first instance it is interesting to note that the GNP in constant dollar terms, actually increased in the last three quarters of 1975, and that the seasonally adjusted index of real domestic product was up by .07 per cent in the first quarter of 1976 over the four quarters of 1975. Therefore, I think the prediction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), which he acknowledges is not lavish but which nevertheless is to some degree satisfactory, of a 5 per cent growth in the GNP, is one which we will see borne out during the current year. I am also happy to tell hon. members today, on the basis of the performance records we have for the first part of this year, that I believe it is now reasonably safe to say that we will have a slight surplus in our trade account this current year.

This, of course, is quite a turn-around from what it was a year ago. For instance, we expect now that the $800 million deficit we had last year in commodity trade will be turned to a surplus. Exports are up by more than $1 billion in the three-month period, February to April, of this year, compared to 1975. Averaged out over the year, they will amount to more than $4 billion. Imports are also up, which is to some degree a worrisome statistic although it reflects the health of the Canadian economy. Fortunately, our exports are up more than our imports, and this gives all of us reason for confidence in predicting that the commodity trade to which I have referred is already back into what might be described as equilibrium and that there will be a surplus which at this time is impossible to forecast with precision, but which will certainly be of the order of several million dollars in the current year. This, I emphasize, is a significant turn-around from what occurred in 1975.

There is another encouraging statistic in which I think members will be interested. Export sales have increased in all commodity areas except energy materials. Right across the full spectrum of our exports there has actually been significant improvement in the first three months of the current year. It also should be borne in mind that in terms of the reduction in energy-related exports—and this is by a conscious decision, I believe, supported on all sides of the House—that in the current year those exports will probably decline by something close to $1 billion from what they were a year ago. I think this deliberate action also should be taken into account when looking at our total balance of payments in the situation.

Except for energy-related commodities, there has been an encouraging improvement throughout the whole spectrum, including—incidentally I might add—value added or finished products which, of course, is one of the things we are still most interested in because in basic terms, if one looks at our exports, it has to be acknowledged that they depend, in volume terms at least, to a very great extent on raw materials, on the auto pact and related things of this nature, and that we would be very foolish if we did not recognize that in terms of manufactured and processed goods we still have a very unhealthy total situation. I think it will take a lot of combined effort by labour, management and government—and all of us—at this time to correct and improve this situation. In a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I hope I will have an opportunity to refer to the question of productivity which has such a direct bearing on that particular objective which, I emphasize, is one of the main objectives at the present time.

May I also, in this connection, say a word about the generally subscribed to objective of getting greater value added for our raw materials in this country. If one looks at it realistically, it seems to me that we cannot anticipate or expect that for every ton of raw material or for every pound of special metal we have in this country we can achieve value added right across the board. Inevitably, for the foreseeable future at least, there will be the necessity for, and probably there will be some wisdom in, the continuation of the export of raw materials. In other words, there are commodities with which we are not wholly or solely endowed in Canada in terms of competing countries, so therefore, in that sense at least, we will have to match the competition. By the same token of course if we wish to increase our trade with, for example, the European Economic Community or some of the other major trading blocs in the world with highly industrialized economies, then it is obvious that if they are to take finished products from us, we must also at the same time give them some assured access to the raw materials they will need.

In that connection, again, if there is time I will refer to this subject when talking about the multinational trade negotiations. Perhaps the biggest single item, in terms of commodities—if it is appropriate even to use that word—affecting our Canadian trade and the international trade is, of course, the auto industry and the so-called auto pact and many matters related to it. I have already indicated to the House on previous occasions that at the present time we are in the process of negotiating with the United States and discussing with them potential changes in matters relating to the auto pact.

There are two separate studies going on, one in Canada and one in the United States, with regard to the future of the auto industry in general which, of course, is being significantly affected by the energy shortage and by a whole variety of new factors which have emerged in the last three or four years. Once these studies are completed and the United States authorities and ourselves have agreed that we ought to seek to do it during the current year, then we will put these studies together to see what kinds of additional changes may be necessary in terms of achieving more equitably the original goals and aims of the auto pact.

In the meantime, some statistics which have just recently come to hand will, I am sure, interest hon. members, and in a totally non-partisan sense I expect they will be encouraging to hon. members. The auto industry will probably sell one million cars this year. This will be the first one-million car year in Canadian history. That is perhaps in some respects—as I suspect some would say—a regrettable trend if one is talking about conservation and the like. Nevertheless, if one is talking in trade terms exclusively, of course it makes a very substantial difference. To the end of May, for example, sales were 338,122 units, which is up substantially over last year. The totality of our manufacturing sector within Canada is now working at full capacity with the exception of the Chrysler truck plant, which I was pleased to open officially two or three weeks ago. It, too, will be going on a second shift at the start of the 1977 market year, which I believe is almost a full year earlier than had been previously anticipated.

These indicators show that in the current year the auto industry will be very much on the upswing and that the deficit which we had last year on the so-called auto account, of $1.9 million, will be halved at least in the 1976 year. I should emphasize, again, as I know hon. members on both sides of the House are already aware, that a good deal of the problem continues to exist in the auto parts sector. I have had many discussions with the various parties concerned, both the auto parts manufacturers and the auto companies, as to how that particular segment of the auto industry can be brought into better balance. I believe progress will be made.

The mere fact that business is improving is bound to have its beneficial effect for the auto parts manufacturers, but there are other incidental, although very important, contributors as well. To use the auto industry as an example, one of these is the development, in the so-called less developed countries, of a growing capacity and a capability for the manufacture of a great line of parts and accessories of one sort or another. So it is not only in some of the more sensitive areas, such as textiles and footwear, that we are encountering this resurgence or emergence of the less developed countries, but it is now starting to spill over into what perhaps we considered to be almost exclusively the domain of the developed countries and, in terms of Canada-U.S., something which we kept within the North American continent. So that is a factor we will have to keep a very close eye on.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

● (1600)

I made these references in relation to the auto pact, but the same is true, of course, of a very wide and increasing range of commodities where less developed countries are acquiring greater confidence and competitiveness every day. In any event, I think it is important to note that in this current year—assuming that everything goes as is now projected—we will see, for the first time in our history, the sale of one million passenger cars. This will result in halving the deficit and virtually all of it will be on the side of the auto pact.

I said I would say a few words about productivity. Of course, this is at one and the same time one of the most obvious problems facing the Canadian economy, and particularly manufacturing and processing today. It is also one of the most complex ones, because one has to begin by seeking a definition, to which everyone can agree, of what constitutes productivity. In the manufacturing and processing sector, in the work we have done—incidentally, I would be more than pleased, as we have done on other issues, to make it available to members of the standing committee or to any others who may be interested—it is shown clearly that you can determine with a fair degree of precision what your productivity gains are, because they are based on the simple measure of output per man-hour. You can figure that out, as I said, relatively easily.

The same is basically true of the extractive industries—forestry, mining, etc.—where, once again, you have a firm and fixed product line to which you can attribute the cost of turning it out. Where the big difficulty comes, and where, as I said a moment ago, we need some clarity and agreement on definitions is, first of all, in the service sector. To the best of my knowledge, in the service sector there is no unanimity on whether or not there is a measurable productivity factor, and indeed the tendency has been for the most part to regard it as being neutral or flat, in productivity terms. In other words, you do not regard it as having had any input or output in so far as growth in the economy is concerned.

Obviously, this is an oversimplification, and yet at the same time it is something about which, it seems to me, we do not have enough knowledge at present to judge what measurements we should be using in this country to determine precisely how productive we are. I might say, also, that another area for which a more detailed study and one on which there is bound to be a good many points of view expressed, is whether or not, in terms of measuring productivity, for instance, we really ought to give it the overriding emphasis that has tended to be the case for most of us, including myself, until fairly recent times.

For instance, when you look at the statistics and the calculations, it is clear that there are countries in the world with a much higher rate of productivity, given the yardsticks I have mentioned, than Canada has. Among them, as I recall, are Japan, for example, and Italy. But whether or not we in this country would want to have the same kind of economies that have generated these levels of productivity is another matter and one which I think is a very real basis for debate.

The other point in relation to productivity—and I am simply touching here on a whole range of issues which certainly deserve much more thorough examination by all of us—is to question the accepted wisdom that greater productivity automatically means greater economic benefit and, therefore, greater employment. It is open to question, because when one looks at how you achieve major breakthroughs in productivity, in the first instance at least it generally tends to be through a transition from a very large, labour-intensive element in a particular industry or sector to mechanization and modernization where you have a substantial amount of job displacement by machines. So in straight productivity terms, you could conceivably have a situation in which, through a very strong thrust toward rationalization, modernization and various things of this sort, you could be turning out more goods per man-hour but you might not necessarily, in the short run, be improving employment in relation to productivity.

Therefore, it seems to me that a productivity policy has to go hand-in-hand with a whole series of other measures which would relate to job displacement, to alternative types of employment and to a whole range of other social issues or related economic issues. I have no doubt that the theorists are probably right in the long run when they take the view that eventually high productivity, which means excellent economic performance, will lead to jobs in other sectors and generally to a higher level of employment. I believe that is true all the time. But I think we have to accept the fact that there is, as we have seen, probably, in most of our constituencies, evidence that there is an interim period and that when you have productivity perhaps you have problems of dislocation in terms of the jobless or the unemployed.

The other related question for those of us who are interested in this immensely important subject of productivity is that a country like Canada has to pay a price for being what it is, and I do not think any of us should in any sense of the word regret that. For example, if one were being totally theoretical and were looking at it completely devoid of human terms or even of nationalistic terms, you would have to say that in economies of scale the problems of reducing transportation costs and the like would probably dictate, as I said, in this coldly impersonal way, that everything be located within a relatively short distance somewhere in the centre of the country. That is where you will get the greatest productivity at the lowest cost.

So there is a price for having a Canada that goes from sea to sea. Regional development, various developments in the northern part of the country, investments of this kind, either public or private—all of these things are a necessary part of nationhood, of national development. But at the same time we have to understand that invariably they cause a reaction in the productivity figure which we ought to take into account when measuring our performance, for example, against that of some other countries.

These are just a few of what I would describe as random thoughts on productivity, but I hope they demonstrate to hon. members that my ministry and the government are working very hard on this issue. I repeat that I would be more than pleased to make a presentation to the House on what we have learned to date, so that we can get the benefit of other people's judgment on this issue as well.

Since my time is moving very quickly, let me touch on another matter relating to trade and to the general economy, that is, the whole issue of capital formation. I had the Business Advisory Council—of whom I believe hon. members are aware, which represents some of the leading figures in the business, economic and financial picture in Canada—come to a special meeting on capital formation a little over two weeks ago. The conclusion of these business leaders, was, first of all, that in terms of the capital formation issue, inflation is clearly the number one problem, which surely suggest that we must continue our effort to get inflation under control, because as long as you have this uncertainty created by inflation, capital formation will be exceedingly difficult. Of course, given our needs over the next decade or so, that clearly looms as an immense problem for us in this country.

There are estimates—and I have not been able to challenge them effectively—that in terms of capital formation we will probably need something in the order of $800 billion in the next decade, given a year or two on either side. As near as we have been able to calculate from our assessments, some $500 billion of that will have to be provided in the private sector or for the private sector. Therefore, a real challenge to us in Canada is to figure out the most effective means of generating that capital. Incidentally, there was unanimity in the business community that there was no serious problem with regard to finding that amount of financing, but there were questions raised as to how we might be able to give special priority to particular projects so that there would not be an assault, as it were, by everyone on the market at precisely the same time, which the banking representatives present agree would be difficult to deal with.

● (1610)

So once again we have this communication going with the business community as to how this kind of thing may be managed, and I know that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, is aware, as I am, of the fact that when one looks at that huge amount of capital which is going to be required, it is equally clear that a substantial portion of it is going to be for either public enterprises of one form or another or for quasi-public enterprises such as public utilities and the like, particularly those in the energy field, either for the generation of electricity, pipelines, or various things of that kind.

An hon. Member: Petro-Can.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member says "Petro-Can." I do not know whether we calculated Petro-Can into the picture, but certainly the figures I am putting forward now are really not related in terms of the amount needed. The issue is not whether it is going to be public or private. It is purely a question of whoever does it. Those are the levels of investment which will be necessary.

Mr. Woolliams: And it doesn't matter how expensive it is!

Mr. Jamieson: I believe I heard the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) say "Cut down on expenses." That is part of the exercise, and I hope we will have the support of hon. members opposite in doing just that.

I might also say that the biggest single demand is likely to be from the provinces in terms of capital formation and in terms of foreign markets. Actually, if one looks at the record over the past several years, the federal government, by and large, has managed to deal with its financial requirements within the country. The provinces, by and large, with some exceptions, have gone offshore; so therefore there is a necessity for federal-provincial consultation as well.

Just moving quickly to one or two other points in the few minutes I have left, because I do not wish to intrude on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, as I understand it, follows me, the last thing I want to say is with regard to the somewhat cavalier way in which some hon. members of the opposition have dismissed the whole idea or the whole effort with regard to energy conservation measures introduced in the budget and in various other ways. It is most interesting to note that over the past year or so we have established a government industry committee covering all, I think, the main sectors of industry, and some of the objectives and commitments which have been made known by industry will interest hon. members in the sense of what really can be achieved in energy conservation. For instance, the chemical industry in this country is aiming for a 17 per cent reduction in BTU's per pound of product by 1980, compared with 1972. If they achieve this, and they believe they can, this will provide savings equivalent to 11 million barrels of oil annually. I am told that that is enough to heat metropolitan Toronto for one year.

Though it may at some stage seem like a relatively minor point when we talk about energy conservation measures as contained in the budget and elsewhere, the savings are potentially very significant. For instance, the pulp and paper sector is the largest energy-consuming sector, which may surprise some hon. members. I did not realize that until I saw the figures for myself. It accounts for one-quarter of the manufacturing industry's energy consumption, and the goal of this industry, as stated by the Pulp and Paper Association and its membership, is a 12 per cent reduction in BTU's per ton of product by 1980. The saving is about the same: 11 million barrels of oil annually.

I will just mention two other sectors: cement and steel. Both sectors are intensive users of energy and have already made, and are continuing to make, substantial savings in energy use. Both industries are already acknowledged to be more energy efficient than most of their world competitors. Additional projected annual savings per ton of product in the next four or five years will amount to the equivalent of one million barrels of oil for cement, and two million barrels for steel. If we put these all together and we assume that world prices will reach $15 per barrel by 1980—and nobody really knows that with any precision—the projected saving of $30 million for the steel industry alone by way of conservation will aid immeasurably in keeping Canadian manufactured goods competitive on world markets.

As I said at the outset, these are just a few comments with regard to the trade picture. I am pleased to be able to report to hon. members that there is a buoyancy present now. Quite honestly, I do not understand why some hon. members opposite would discredit our enthusiasm for the improvement in the economy of the United States. Clearly, if you are in the selling business, and that is what we are, the health of your best customer has to be a source of joy and satisfaction, and I am glad that that is happening.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I, along with the Minister of Finance, have every confidence that the projects of the various sectors which I have outlined today will come through with a satisfying performance in 1976. It will not be as good as all of us would like, but nevertheless it will be significantly better than it was in 1975. The trend generally will also be upward for the years beyond that.

I thank hon. members very much for listening with such attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in hearing the remarks of the minister, and I regret that he has to be away at an engagement later on. I should say that the only buoyancy any of us here has noticed is the unfailing optimism of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) in the face of the worst possible circumstances. He would have been an ideal choirmaster on the Titanic. We at least congratulate him on his unfailing good cheer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I found it significant that as he was concluding the minister found it necessary to comment on the comfort we can take from the health of the economy of the United States, as if that were some substitute for very serious problems we face in Canada. If credit is due for the health of the United States economy, that credit is certainly due to the government of that country. What is lamentable is that most of the gains predicted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the immediate prospect for this country will also be attributable to the government of the United States and not to the government across the aisle.

In a parliament which has been dominated by games of pass-the-buck and pass-the-blame on the "Orion," conflicts between ministers on the question of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, desperate attempts in committee to repair legislation respecting gun controls, and a government which has for the last couple of weeks indicated that it has no higher goal than to get out of here as quickly as it can, it is easy to forget that we have a budget—and I think it is particularly easy to forget this particular budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I share one distinction with the Minister of Finance, who is temporarily out of the House. This is the first budget he has introduced as minister, and it is the first to which I have had the privilege of responding as Leader of the Opposition. The minister and I, of course, differ in our attitude toward our predecessors. He is at pains to ignore his predecessor, John Turner, even while he presents a budget strictly in the Turner tradition, while I am deeply aware of my privilege in following, as Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1620)

Mr. Clark: I should say that is particularly so on economic matters, because any honest, objective review of events in this House during the period of his leadership of this party indicates that he has been the singlemost creative source of economic policy in this chamber. Whether the matter has been indexing which was derided and then adopted by the government opposite, or whether it was an incomes policy which was reviled and then adopted by hon. members opposite, the hon. member for Halifax has set the pace, has indicated the foresight and courage that would have made him an outstanding leader of the country and made him an outstanding leader of this party and leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Have to say, not to overstate the case, that this is a deeply disappointing budget, not just because it fails to give the leadership that Canada now requires on economic matters, but also it is a budget that is so much less than many of us have expected from the new Minister of Finance. I particularly regret that the minister is absent at the moment because I want to say one or two good things about him that he might not have expected.

An hon. Member: He may come in.

An hon. Member: That will bring him in.

Mr. Clark: I think most of us who have had dealings with the Minister of Finance in his previous incarnations have disagreed with him often, but we have always recognized and respected him as a combative partisan in a place that requires combative partisans. We recognize him as a competent and fairly tough minister who is generally willing to rise to challenges. We often disagree with the challenges he saw or how he responded, but he was generally willing to rise to them. That is what has been doubly disappointing about his performance here. He faced a great opportunity to bring economic leadership to the country, to respond to the challenge of drift which is, unfortunately, characteristic of this government for most of its mandate. He did not respond to that challenge.

I have noted his self-assessment outside this chamber; that he would prefer to be called unimaginative rather than foolhardy. I can assure him and his colleagues that daring is not an adjective that leaped to our minds on budget night when we heard him read the words that had been prepared for him. If this minister said anything encouraging about this budget, it is that he will seriously consider bringing in another budget before too long.

Of course, there were some good proposals in the budget—good, but minor. Measures to encourage energy conservation—although they will not have the impact that was suggested by the minister who spoke before me—higher income deductions for day care costs, some revision of the unemployment insurance program, and a reintegration of UIC operations with federal Manpower services. These are all measures which our party has advocated for some time and which we support in principle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to emphasize that a budget in Canada at any time, but particularly at this time, should do much more than just tinker with taxes. It should be a document which gives direction to the country. There is an obligation, particularly now, to give Canadians economic leadership.

[Translation]

At that stage, the country was entitled to expect a budget which would have spelled out policies. The last budget dated back to eleven months ago. At that time, the former Minister of Finance had resigned and turned his back on his party, presumably following a major disagreement on economic policies. Furthermore, the government which had won the last election by fighting controls turned around and put forth a control program which was imposed without consultation with its economic partners and whose basic rules were altered at least three times. Later, the Prime Minister caused great concern by referring to "a new economic society" and kept it alive by denying Canadians the opportunity to participate in the making of the post control policies which were secretly entrusted to a technocratic elite controlled by the Prime Minister.

Those three events: the minister's resignation, the policy reversal on controls and the apparent discard by the Prime Minister of the essential elements of the Canadian economic system, all of these created a climate of anxiety in this country. Therefore, the government had the obligation to dispel this anxiety by indicating in the budget the direction it plans to give the Canadian economy but that obligation was ignored like so many others.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, there are ominous aspects to that budget because it is a budget that is more dangerous than simply not doing what it should in setting directions that it should set. It has raised some very real questions about government policy, as indicated in the budget, plans for the other partners in the Canadian economy.

Changes have been introduced, again, to the Anti-Inflation Board. This is not the first time that major changes have been introduced to the terms of reference and the powers of that board in a way which has created uncertainty and added to administrative difficulty. The changes themselves would be serious enough, but the point I want to make is that this frequent tinkering with this very powerful mechanism indicates that this government has no understanding that the business community of Canada can accept tough rules. There is no problem with tough rules; the problems of the business community in Canada occur when the rules keep changing, when there is no certainty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It would be one thing if it were rare that the government would consciously create uncertainty in the economic climate of Canada, but unfortunately this has become a pattern. It was a pattern with the northern land regulations which were brought down not long ago after six years of delay, and it has clearly been the pattern with the competition policy. It is a pattern that goes back through the life of this government and indicates a fundamental failure to understand the necessity for a climate of certainty if there is going to be progress by the free enterprise regimes in this Canadian economy.

The government has raised some very serious questions in its proposals, of which we have only half the bundle so far, regarding unemployment. It has indicated that it intends to make some changes regarding eligibility for unemployment insurance and has held out the prospect of some other changes yet to be specified. Frequently in this House, however, the minister responsible for providing jobs and for ensuring that Canadians will have some place to go other than to unemployment insurance has admitted that he will not have, at least until this fall, any concrete programs to present which will help people who, particularly as unemployment insurance claimants, might need to have recourse to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I would call the attention of the government to a recommendation of an excellent agency which it all too frequently ignores, the Economic Council of Canada. This agency has made some excellent reports, but unfortunately under this government has had them dismissed and not heeded. The Economic Council of Canada, in its most recent report entitled "People and Jobs" said, in connection with the whole subject of unemployment insurance and job creation in Canada, that regulatory changes alone do not, and will not, send people back to work if there are no jobs available.

● (1630)

The greatest deficiency in the budget presented by this government on the question of jobs is that there is no attempt by public policy to encourage the private sector to create jobs, and there is no frankness, no indication that the government itself has any public programs in place which will create some kind of public employment. That is a serious failure and indicates that there is little regard, little compassion, on the part of those on the government benches for Canadians who need work and are willing to work if jobs can be found or created.

Once again, this budget introduces very real uncertainty, sir, with regard to the role and problems which provinces of this country are to face. May I refer again to the unemployment insurance program. We know that, for better or for worse, that program has been used for purposes other than its original intention, which was that of providing income support. If that program is tightened, particular if that tightening occurs without any kind of substitution of new job-creating programs, there will be imposed new policies on the provinces of Canada and that imposition will be particularly harsh on the poorer provinces which are particularly incapable of dealing with it. We have seen previously this kind of playing around with the capacities of the provinces. It is worth noting that this particular measure which will impose new financial strains on the provinces of Canada, particularly on the poorer provinces, is being introduced at a time when the government itself is introducing a certain proposal, not in the way it should, with a bill, but by sneaking it in the back door with regard to Loto Canada. That lottery, after the expiration of any obligation we might assume toward the retirement of Olympic debt, will become a federal source of revenue drawn from a field which should properly belong to the provinces.

[Mr. Clark.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: On the one hand, we have this government imposing new costs on the provinces. On the other hand, we have the government undertaking initiatives which will deprive the provinces of potential sources of revenue which ought to be theirs.

Finally, and generally, the budget contributes to uncertainty in that it is silent on the most important question facing Canadians now in terms of economic policy. There is no indication at all in the budget of the Minister of Finance as to what is to be the nature of the so-called post-control society. The government has told us that it will think about what it is going to do this summer; perhaps in the fall they will tell us what they think we should know. That, Mr. Speaker, is an unacceptable approach to public business in this country.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister seems determined to get rid of the controls the same way he established them, that is without consulting anyone—through the secret planning of an élite of technocrats in Ottawa and with the passive approval of a Liberal majority in Parliament so as to impose a new program to Canadians. That would be disastrous. The controls are not a solution by themselves. They can only give us the opportunity to look for more basic solutions which will not succeed if they are forced upon us. In such a complex country as Canada, in order that a national policy may succeed, it must have the support of the other government partners in the society. And the unions, the businessmen, the farmers and the provinces will not support any policy which they consider as irrevelant.

[English]

This budget, Mr. Speaker, simply ignores the basic economic problems of Canada. Worse than that, it undervalues the potential of this country. There are many places where we part company with this government and this budget, but there is none more fundamental than on the question of basic economic priorities. The minister's position is that as long as we continue to have inflationary pressures in our economy, we cannot seek to maximize our potential for sound economic growth. Whatever his words may be, the minister's actions make it abundantly clear that his first-line anti-inflationary policy is slow growth. Mr. Speaker, we on my side of the House completely and totally reject that proposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Sir, we see sound economic growth not as a contradiction to the control of inflation but as a prime requisite for the control of inflation in the long term. Indeed, sir, I have no hesitation in suggesting to you that until and unless we have a government which accepts that elementary fact, we will continue to suffer from serious economic problems in Canada.

One is tempted to ask whether the minister and his colleagues, in their understandably extraordinary effort to forget everything they said in the spring and early summer of 1974, have blinded themselves completely to what has occurred in Canada in the intervening two years. They have been years of economic stagnation on the one hand, and very high levels of inflation on the other. Do the minister and his colleagues not recognize the connection between these two factors? Do they not realize that much of the economic confrontation which has contributed to our inflationary problems is linked directly to our lack of sound economic growth in the Canadian economy? Can the minister and his colleagues not see that when our national wealth is not expanding, gains made by any group in society are seen as coming at the direct expense of other groups and that this breeds social and economic tension which leads to confrontation? Rather than being afraid of growth, we desperately need a new commitment to sound economic growth in Canada. That, of course, cannot be an end in itself, but must be seen as a key to the more meaningful goals and aspirations we all hold for this country.

Sir, we have a highly skilled and highly educated young population in this country. Are we educating them to collect unemployment insurance or welfare, or do we owe them the opportunity to pursue meaningful careers? We have hardly begun to make worth-while progress in the area of regional disparity. The Economic Council of Canada suggests that with current programs it will be at least 75 years before the Atlantic region of Canada is able to approach the national standard of living. Is the best we can do simply to transfer resources within the country, to make progress by lowering standards everywhere? Or can we not emphasize regional growth within a growing Canada? That, sir is the preference and policy of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Finance had an opportunity in his budget to face some basic, economic problems. Instead, he ducked those problems. At best they have been postponed; at worst they have been compounded. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke about productivity. His productivity policy consists of defining the problem. Sir, that just is not enough. He put, in his buoyant way, the best possible face on our productivity problems. The Minister of Finance himself set out the dimensions of our balance of payments problems. By his own figures he has admitted that, while every other western country has absorbed the full impact of world energy prices and still reduced its balance of payments deficit, this country's position has seriously deteriorated. That is the scale of the problem by the minister's own admission. What did he do about it? He has a very exciting program in this regard! He said he would welcome cards and letters in relation to improving our productivity from all across the country.

● (1640)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With the mail situation he cannot even be sure they will get there.

Mr. Clark: My colleague points out that one of the deficiencies in this approach is that the minister cannot be sure they will get there, with the mail situation. That was only half of his program. The other half is that he hoped the United States recovery would pull us out of our problems. In short, he confessed that this government is bankrupt of both ideas and leadership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let us be very clear, Mr. Speaker, of the dimension of this problem on which the minister virtually turned his back. In 1970—a year, I stress, of serious world recession—Canada showed a surplus of some $6.6 billion in trade in processed and manufactured goods. In 1975—a year when the world began to recover from recession—Canada recorded a deficit of $5.8 billion in shipments of processed and manufactured goods. Not only did we fail to achieve any significant progress in export markets; we continued to lose ground to foreign manufacturers in our own Canadian market.

The hard reality is that we are keeping our head above international water only by continuing to sell off the raw resources of this country. Last year our trade performance would have been another $3 billion worse had it not been for shipments of natural resources. Yet this government offers not a single concrete initiative to reverse this trend, not a single positive policy to strengthen the competitive position of our processors and manufacturers. If it has a policy, it is to look to Washington—and perhaps to pray!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the first to be hit by this budget will be Canadians looking for a job. There is no provision in that budget for the creation of new jobs. Instead, the minister counts on economic recovery in other countries to get 250,000 new jobs in Canada. It is already bad enough that the government says to workers that they will have to rely on other countries to have new job, but even worse, figures advanced by the minister do not match the number of people who will enter the labour market for the first time.

Last year, 353,000 Canadians joined the labour force and were looking for a job. This year, it is anticipated that about 315,000 individuals will invade the labour market. The situation is such that with his estimate of 250,000 new jobs, the minister has merely devised a new way to increase unemployment. At the same time, his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) recognized that the government has no plan to generate new jobs here.

In short, it is the budget of a government which could not care less for unemployed Canadians.

[English]

Nowhere is the need for constructive leadership more pressing, or more lacking from this administration, than in the area of spending restraint. The fact is that this government has been on a continuous spending binge since the day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In 1968, federal expenditures were in the area of $9 billion; this year they will exceed $40 billion. That is an increase of more than 400 per cent. Having put that kind of squeeze on everyone else in the economy, on the private sector and on the revenue sources of other levels of government, this administration now turns around and asks these same groups to bear almost the entire brunt of the current restraint program. Hypocrisy is probably the kindest description I can apply to this government.

In our view, the time has come for governments as a whole to halt their rising claims upon our national income—not simply by juggling their books for a year or two, but by adjusting in a very fundamental way the pace of growth in their demands upon available resources. In 1950, governments at all levels claimed about 20 per cent of our gross national product. This year the figure will approach 42 per cent. By any standard, that represents a massive shift in the allocation or our national resources.

I and my colleagues believe the time has now come to halt that trend, not as a cosmetic exercise but as a firm commitment to stimulating renewed strength and growth within our economy. Let me emphasize that I am talking about a gradual reduction in governments' share of our total national income and a reduction in their percentage share of GNP. The reality is that if we can attain our realistic growth potential in this country the amount of resources available to governments will continue to increase even while their over-all share of GNP stabilizes and declines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Only our national government can exercise the kind of leadership necessary to achieve this basic adjustment in spending priorities. The provinces, to give them credit, have moved in that direction during the current year. On the whole, they have managed to hold their spending increases well below the anticipated rise in the GNP. That has not been easy for them. Nor has it been easy for local governments who have had to deal directly with the impact of these cutbacks at the senior levels, But these levels of government are trying. They have had the courage to face up to economic reality. It is time they and the people of Canada saw some courage in Ottawa.

If this government will make a serious commitment to self-restraint, perhaps it can exercise national leadership in what will certainly be a difficult and demanding process. But Ottawa simply cannot preach restraint to others and practice none itself. Above all, it must face up to its own lack of fiscal control and begin to come clean with the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I see the Minister of Finance is back in his place. I have noted the pronouncements of the Minister of Finance in this budget. If words were all we needed, we would welcome his conversion to the need for fiscal restraint. However, unfortunately for him, governments still are judged on their actions. When it comes to restraint, this government frankly has shown a lot of sleight of hand and very little real commitment. How can we take this government's promises seriously when its record in this area is one deceit after another? It started last December when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) and the Prime Minister, on television, told us in anguished tones how they had scraped and scrimped to reduce government spending. But then we looked at the record, and what did we find? More than half of the supposed reductions were not reductions at all; they were merely decisions to drop proposed programs or departmental spending requests that were not even in effect at that time. One of the largest items of so-called savings involved nothing more than the transfer of borrowing responsibility from the government itself to agencies like the CNR and the Export Development Corporation which, of course, represented no reduction in public sector demands.

[Mr. Clark.]

● (1650)

Now this minister comes along with his first budget, and again we are given all kinds of verbal commitments to restraint and the same kind of deceit we had six months earlier. This minister wants to hold the year-to-year increase to 14 per cent, so what does he do? Does he reduce this year's spending? No. He simply tells us that last year's spending was higher than originally reported. Does the government make any serious effort to reduce its demands on the economy? No. Instead, it plays games, like the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) reneging on more than $100 million in committed payments to the provinces. This government, Mr. Speaker, is so caught up in double-talk and half-truths that it has forfeited any credibility whatsoever in the area of fiscal restraint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister, in one of the remarkable conversions of this parliament, has been talking about the need for more openness in the budget process. I concur in that need—and I want to come back to it in a moment. But if he is serious about openness, surely the place to start is with some truth about government spending. If we cannot have information or, worse still, if we cannot believe the so-called information we are given, how does the minister expect to be taken seriously in any discussion he may want to enjoin?

As I have said, sir, I concur fully in the need for more openness in the budget-making process. Indeed, several weeks before this budget I proposed that, as one step in that direction, the government place its options in regard to a post-controls program before a parliamentary committee and invite discussion of them with the major groups in our society. Without the co-operation of these groups, any such post-controls program simply will not work; and without genuine consultation and participation in decision-making there simply will not be co-operation.

But this government simply cannot bring itself to have that kind of consultation or to introduce that kind of openness to the process. There is no partnership in this administration's approach to government. For the Prime Minister and his colleauges, it is an "us and them" proposition; "us", the government, with all the answers, and "them", the poor people, with a choice to like it or lump it. In that attitude, sir, lies a great deal of the problems which face this country, not simply in economic matters but in a range of other matters as well.

It is an approach which creates uncertainty when Canadians need reassurance. It is an approach which encourages confrontation when we need honest compromise. And it is an approach which emphasizes unilateral power when we need genuine partnership. It is, sir—and I use this word very deliberately—a very unCanadian approach which is dangerous in a country where there are divisions enough without the government of Canada, by its conduct, exacerbating those divisions. I say to you, sir, and to the House that we intend to reverse that process and to rebuild a partnership in Canada which is the Canadian approach.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me say a word about my concept of openness as it applies to budget-making. It is based on a number of premises. The first is that much of the current secrecy surrounding the budget flows as much from bureaucratic convenience as from any genuine need or concern for security. There is, of course, a certain comfort to planning in private; one's decisions and arguments are spared any real outside test. The problem, of course, is that they are more likely to be wrong than if they are checked against the experience of people whom those decisions affect.

A second premise is that much of the government's present attitude is based on a highly defensive position in regard to forecasts and estimates. There seems to be a feeling that because economic forecasting is something less than a finite art, the minister and his advisers cannot risk exposing their assumptions and their estimates for fear of being proven wrong by subsequent events. To that I say simply, first, that other governments seem able to share much more economic information with their parliaments and their people without undue embarrassment; and secondly, in so far as being wrong is concerned, secrecy of information does not eliminate that problem, it merely compounds it. That is one fact of life I would have thought this government might have learned by now.

My view, sir, is that there is much we can do to make the budget process a more meaningful one without any risk to anyone's security. I would like to see, for example, an established procedure whereby a parliamentary committee holds prebudget hearings on the economic setting of the day. The prebudget papers could be referred to such a committee; most certainly we need to find a procedural mechanism to ensure that important reports of the Economic Council, to name one agency, stop being simply one-day wonders that are presented to the government and then go into limbo. I would like to see the government make public, as part of the budget process, its longer term forecasts both in terms of economic performance and in terms of its own fiscal position. Other governments and other countries do this. Among the benefits is that the publication of such a longer term framework requires the government itself to justify its own budgets within that wider context.

If this minister's economics are faulty, Mr. Speaker, his sense of social justice is abysmal. Are the only adjectives which concerned him when he spoke outside the House a choice between "unimaginative" and "foolhardy"? I ask the House, what about the word "committed"—committed to the potential of this country, a country of unparallelled potential. This is a government which continually sells Canada short, a government that unfortunately has no higher aspiration than to fall somewhere in the middle of an OECD average, a government too ready to leave the economic fate of Canada in the hands of other governments and other countries.

We in this party continue to believe in the potential of Canada. Not even this government and this Prime Minister can dim the promise of that star. This remains a country of vast resources, both natural and human. It is a country which not only has a right, but a very real responsibility to expect more than average performance. It is not Canada that is lacking, sir; it is this government that is lacking and that is failing the promise of Canada.

● (1700)

If the Minister of Finance is unable to work up any enthusiasm for Canada, one might have hoped he could at least have shown some interest in its people and some compassion for those in economic difficulty. Instead he sits as Minister of Finance who dismissed 760,000 unemployed Canadians virtually as a throw-away line, and whose own optimistic forecast was to create enough new jobs to hold that figure to 800,000. That is some "Thumper".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have a Prime Minister preaching the need for passionate love on a world scale. I say to him, Sir, why not start at home? Where is the passion or the love in this government and this budget? Where is there any evidence that this government cares about its own people? Where is the concern for hundreds of thousands of Canadians who want an opportunity to work? Where is the love for the people of Atlantic Canada who, thanks to this budget, face the prospect of even higher energy and electricity costs on top of the heavy burden they are already carrying? Where is the passion for Canada?

This is not a government of love; it is a government of smug complacency. This is not a government that challenges Canadians; it is a government which day after day by its action, inaction, and incompetence alarms and depresses Canadians. This is not a government that encourages faith; it is a government which breeds fear and confusion. This, Sir, is not a government which can offer anything to the world; it is a government which on its record and in this budget offers nothing to Canada. The sooner this government is gone, the better for all of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to deal with the contradictions of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). However, I thought I could spend my time a little more usefully in dealing with some issues that have been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition dealing with secrecy in the budget and some of the procedures that are being followed, and the question of media coverage of the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I should like to begin by congratulating my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), who raised these questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: He understands the importance of procedures that are now followed, and the necessity of some changes in traditional budget secrecy. He raised those questions, and also the question of media coverage. I think this is typical of a minister who is characterized by a forthrightness I can only commend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I think we are very fortunate in this country to have a man of his integrity and his ability undertake this great responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Some ten years ago I was Minister of Finance, and like my predecessors and my successors I was very much aware of the tradition of budget secrecy and of the limitations that this imposes upon the freedom of action to discuss proposed tax changes with anyone outside the close circle of closest departmental advisers, the Prime Minister, and ministers who are, of course, sworn to secrecy by their Privy Council oath.

Before discussing whether or not there should be budget secrecy, I think it is important to understand what is the principle of budget secrecy to which reference is made so often. What it means, I submit, and this is borne out—

An hon. Member: Don't go away, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Stick around, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The reason for budget secrecy, I submit, and this is borne out by the precedents both here and in Westminster, is that knowledge of fiscal and monetary proposals before they are announced in the budget by the minister could enable those who have access to the knowledge to profit therefrom. The Leader of the Opposition referred to budget secrecy in a rather different context, and I find myself wholly in agreement with him, that there ought to be the most open possible discussion of economic policy, but budget secrecy relates only to questions relating to the fisc, as my friend the Minister of Finance said after his budget speech.

For example, advance knowledge of a change in the sales or excise tax or customs duties could enable someone to purchase or import goods before the change came into effect, thus cheating the revenue as well as profiting himself or herself. Similarly, advance knowledge of a change in the corporate tax could enable the insider to speculate profitably on the stock market. It is possible too that advance knowledge of the general fiscal and monetary policy of the government as enunciated in the budget could be turned to advantage on the stock or bond markets, or even in the foreign exchange market.

The tradition of budget secrecy, therefore, as my colleague the Minister of Finance said in the House when a question arose about the announcement of changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, relates to the fisc, and does not necessarily relate to other matters of government policy which the government may see fit to authorize the Minister of Finance to announce or refer to in his budget address.

Hon. members will recall that in this particular case of the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act there is no way by which advance knowledge could profit anyone who knew in advance what was to happen. As the minister himself pointed out, there has been a great deal of public discussion, pro and con, in recent years about the desirability of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the government made no secret whatever of the fact that it had been consulting its own supporters in this House on the subject.

The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, other members of the cabinet, and certain officials do have knowledge of the contents of the budget before it is delivered in the House. This is unavoidable. The tradition of budget secrecy applies to them in a peculiar way. Not only are they bound not to reveal the contents of the budget before it is delivered, they are bound to act in their private affairs as if they were not aware of its contents.

This is probably the principal reason why Ministers of Finance, past and present, do not burden their colleagues with knowledge of their intentions with respect to tax changes very far in advance of budget day.

● (1710)

When I was Minister of Finance I consulted with the Prime Minister a couple of weeks in advance on proposed major tax changes, gave a broad indication of the alternatives to my colleagues a week in advance, and then in as short a time as I could just before budget day I told them what my final proposals would be. My successors in office have followed very much the same pattern.

Needless to say it is not an ideal sort of consultation, but it seems unavoidable if the Minister of Finance is to save his colleagues from the burden of knowing for some time before the budget what tax changes will come into effect on that day. Most of them, I am confident, would prefer not to know much in advance, so that they do not have to fear that their behaviour would be subject to misinterpretation or misrepresentation. When the Minister of Finance raised questions in his speech about the applicability of the tradition of secrecy to modern budgets, I had a fellow feeling arising from my own experience.

For example, what about changes in the rates of personal income tax, one of the most important sources of revenue and one of the most important instruments for effecting individual spending and saving, and the distribution of revenues between the provinces and the federal government? Does it matter whether the government's intentions with respect to changes in the personal income tax are known in advance of the budget presentation? I doubt it very much. There is no way I can think of whereby advance information on the subject could enable a taxpayer to profit or to cheat the revenue. One comes to the conclusion that the tradition of budget secrecy, which originated when governments raised their revenues primarily from customs and excise taxes, has been extended in a rather meaningless way to the personal income tax, to which it has little if any relevance.

There is a strong case for limiting the tradition of budget secrecy to the areas in which it has relevance, and to permit the Minister of Finance a great deal more latitude in discussing personal income tax changes and matters of a similar kind which do not have market or speculative significance.

The minister should be free, moreover, I suggest, to discuss changes in the structure of taxation without being found guilty of breach of budget secrecy. What should be secret is the government's final decision on tax changes where advance information could be profitable to the insider. This does not mean necessarily that the Minister of Finance would have an obligation to anticipate his budget proposals in any field. He should not be in the position, however, where he cannot discuss changes of the kinds I have mentioned outside the closed circle of his departmental advisers and cabinet in preparation of his budget proposals for fear of offending the principle of budgetary secrecy.

I have only one suggestion to offer, which is that the best defence the Minister of Finance could make would be to make it abundantly clear that he was having such consultations, and to have them as open as possible so that everyone knows the consultations are taking place.

I should now like to turn to the question of implementation of the fiscal proposals of the budget. This procedure, the business of ways and means, is a most complicated matter for it is not only part of the foundation of parliament but also it is of immense importance to everyone in the country. In a parliamentary system the government must take full responsibility for fiscal matters; if parliament cannot be induced to accept the government's proposals on taxation, the life of the government must come to an end. Since taxation policy is so fundamental to the retention of office, we have developed the rule concerning the financial initiative of the Crown, that is, a rule preventing any member of parliament, except a minister, from initiating a measure to impose a tax, to increase the rate of an existing tax, or to extend the incidence of an existing tax.

The second principle governing taxation matters in parliament is that fiscal measures must be introduced in the first instance in the House of Commons. We have never even conceded to the Senate the right to amend such proposals.

If we look at the United States we see quite a different procedure. While the President of the United States may communicate his proposals on tax policy to the Congress, they are put into a tangible form not by the administration but by a committee of the House of Representatives. Tax bills usually undergo many metamorphoses on their way through Congress—the United States Senate can and often does amend such measures—and when ready for the President's signature, very likely are quite different from his original proposals.

Taxation measures in the Unites States, however, are not normally retroactive; they come into effect on a given date which occurs sometime after a tax bill becomes law. This is also true of some of our provinces, such as Ontario. In our parliament, however, we have adopted the British practice of making most tax proposals effective virtually immediately they are announced. This requires, of course, some sort of formal notice to persons or corporations whose taxes are changed so quickly. For this reason we have arrived at our procedure concerning Notices of Ways and Means.

A Notice of Ways and Means has two effects. First, as I said, it provides notice of tax changes to those affected. In this function it should be in as much detail as possible. Its second effect, however, is to protect the financial initiative of the Crown.

Only a minister may table a Notice of Ways and Means, and a motion to concur in it cannot be debated or amended. Tax bills, however, must be based on one or more Notices of Ways and Means, and since their pith and substance must be the same as that of the Notices of Ways and Means they become most difficult to amend. Before 1969 the Notices of Ways and Means were considered in a committee of the whole, as many members now in the House will recall, and could, within the limits of the financial initiative of the Crown, be amended. In other words, if the government could be persuaded to make changes, our procedures lent themselves to amendments. The tax bills that followed the ways and means resolutions became, except in the case of the most controversial proposals, exercises in detail for the House.

Under our present procedures, however, the government itself cannot even propose amendments to a tax bill that would increase the rates or extend the incidence of the proposed tax. Since the Notices of Ways and Means, in order to provide as much information as possible, tend to be so explicit that they appear almost as bills, the scope for amendments to bills based on them is even more restricted.

Our difficulty is that if we provide maximum information to the taxpayers at the earliest possible time by making the Notices of Ways and Means explicit, we also thereby limit most severely the scope for amendments to the bill. If, on the other hand, we make the Notices of Ways and Means more general in order to expand the scope for amendments, since the bills based thereon cannot be introduced until the budget debate is completed, for several weeks the taxpayers may be denied the detailed information they require in order to make their plans.

I do not suggest, however, that we revert to the old committee of ways and means procedure. That merely imposed a redundant stage to the fiscal procedure. Debate tended to repeat the formal budget debate and to anticipate debate on the bill. My suggestion is that we endeavour to find a procedure whereby from time to time a sort of Supplementary Notice of Ways and Means could be brought down in order to permit specified amendments. We have, in fact, done this on occasion, but only with unanimous consent. Perhaps now we should provide for such a practice in our rules.

One other part of our ways and means procedure that we ought to consider is the rule that requires all tax measures to be referred, after second reading, to a committee of the whole. This one is perhaps a more doubtful proposal, but one which I think should be examined again. The theory behind this rule is that taxation is of such general interest and importance that every member should be on the committee considering the bill. Experience, however, does not square with this theory. While committees of the whole on tax bills are reasonably well attended because of possible votes, most of the speeches seem to be made for reading by constituents and should really be made in the budget debate or at third reading.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not really criminal.

Mr. Sharp: No. I am just being factual. Only a handful of members on either side of the House really participate in the process of explaining and refining the bill. One cannot help but wonder whether tax bills, or at least most of them, ought not to be referred to a standing committee.

● (1720)

This brings me to the procedures which have evolved in recent years relating to the handling of the budget speech in the House and outside. These procedures evolved essentially to ensure the necessary secrecy while at the same time enabling the various media to give adequate and speedy coverage to the contents of the budget.

I have not been able to consult the records but I have been told that the special procedures for media coverage of the budget began either during the Second World War or shortly thereafter. As I recall it, at the beginning, at the time when as a civil servant I was concerned with these matters, the special procedure consisted of giving the media the first part of the speech which did not contain any tax changes when the minister rose to speak, and the remainder when the minister reached that point in his speech. This gave the press an opportunity of putting the story on the wires of the print media somewhat more quickly than if it had had to report the minister as he spoke. Radio stations were able to broadcast the tax changes more or less simultaneously with the minister's speech.

The next development was the locked room, which was aimed at giving the media an opportunity of doing a more thorough job of analyzing the budget proposals while preserving the necessary secrecy. It meant, of course, that those privileged to be locked up were in a position to wire and broadcast the contents of the budget just as soon as the doors were opened and even before the minister had uttered a word of his speech in the House of Commons.

To me, the resulting situation is deplorable and has made a mockery of this House and its membership. What made it even more disturbing, I regret to say, is that the minister himself appeared this year on television screens on a pretaped interview, recorded during the lock-up, talking about a budget he had not even finished delivering, and his critics who had also been in the lock-up appeared on the same screen replying to a speech they had not yet heard.

I understand how this deplorable situation evolved and I am not being critical of either the minister or the other MPs. One thing led to another, each logical and defensible in itself to meet a particular problem. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come to put an end to a procedure which I believe is an affront to this House.

What is the problem? It is that the people of Canada do not have an opportunity of seeing and listening to the Minister of Finance delivering his speech. If they could do so, a substantial change in the procedure now being followed to meet the requirements of the media, print or electronic, would be possible and would eliminate most of the odious results.

Fortunately it is now possible for everyone in Canada who is interested to be able to watch and listen to the budget speech and the replies of the opposition. All we have to do is to broadcast our proceedings by radio and television, just as my colleague and his critics broadcast their commentary outside the House while the minister was speaking here in the House, making us all very uncomfortable.

It will be astounding, Mr. Speaker, if we members of parliament will ever again be content to sit listening to the Minister of Finance read his speech, waiting for him to reach the point where he announces the proposed tax changes while the reporters on radio and TV, with the document in their hands, talk confidently about what the minister will say before he concludes. It is an affront, and I trust that come next budget there will be a demand from all sides of the House that this farce will not be permitted to recur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: When our proceedings are broadcast—and I say when rather than if, because I see no alternative to the present procedures for lock-up and advance knowledge, except broadcast—I am sure that the minister will also want to deliver his message in a form more suitable to the electronic media—a shorter speech which he can supplement by a written document to be appended to Hansard—and that the opposition critics will want to make their comments the same evening so that they can be broadcast directly from the House. Not only will this be good for the broadcast, it will also make the House a more lively place on budget night.

The timing of the budget speech should also be reviewed when our proceedings are broadcast. It is accepted that the contents of the budget should not be revealed until the markets are closed. That is why the budget speech is delivered in the evening rather than in the afternoon. An eight o'clock starting time is rather late, however, for the print media if the morning papers of the following day are to carry a full account of the budget. While it would be unusual for the House to sit say between five and seven o'clock, or between six and eight on budget day, some such special arrangement should be considered. This kind of arrangement would also afford the electronic media plenty of opportunity to fill the rest of the evening with commentary from observers across the country who would already have watched and listened to the budget speech being delivered.

In the interests of adequate coverage there could continue to be a lock-up, the doors being opened for the reporters when the Minister of Finance had concluded his speech which, if my suggestions were adopted, would be either at seven or eight o'clock. It would also be suitable, I suggest, to include in the lock-up the spokesmen for the opposition who would be expected to follow the minister in the House debate. They are included now, they could be included in the kind of changed circumstances that I have outlined. These MPs could be released from the locked rooms when the minister rose to deliver his speech so that they could hear it, on the understanding that they would not bring a copy of the speech into the House or reveal its contents to anyone in advance of the delivery of the minister's speech.

There is on the order paper a resolution seeking approval of the broadcasting of our proceedings. Because of the press of other business it is not the intention of the government to call that resolution for debate before the adjournment. I have today, however, tabled a document giving an estimate of the costs of installing broadcast equipment and of annual operating costs so that there can be some further public discussion of the proposal.

The arguments I have put forward for broadcasting the budget apply with equal force to the whole of our proceedings. The people of Canada should see parliament in action, and not have to be content to read about it or watch others talking about it. If we believe in parliament, as all of us do, then we should be proud to have it broadcast. A limited number of Canadians—very limited today—are privileged to watch from the galleries. It is now open to us to have the whole of the population observe our proceedings. When that happens then the various media can fulfil more effectively their respective functions. They will still be privileged to interview MP's in room 130-S or elsewhere. They can still comment. But the interviews and the commentary will no longer be a substitute for parliamentary democracy in action on the floor of this House.

It is my hope that early in the new session we will take the decision to broadcast our proceedings and bring parliament to the people. We should cease the farce of the kind of proceedings we had this year on the budget, which are completely unnecessary and an affront to the House. I hope everyone in the House will see that it never happens again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my remarks in the budget debate by coming down from the huge statistics that we heard this afternoon from other speakers, statistics which relate to the country as a whole, and begin my brief address by simply referring to the city where I live. I think this somehow sets the tone for the entire budget, at least from the point of view of those of us who sit on this side of the House.

I have here a clipping from the June 5 edition of the Brantford Expositor which states that the number of jobless continues to rise in Brant county. In Brant county the present unemployment figure was 4,954 persons in May, chasing approximately 200 job vacancies. Yet there are people in my constituency who say that those on unemployment insurance are lazy, that they will not get out and hustle for a job. We are talking in terms of 9 per cent unemployment, or almost 5,000 unemployed registered at Manpower chasing 200 jobs in an industrial city which has many small industries and three or four large industries. I think this is indicative of many parts of the country because if it is that bad in Brantford, which is in southern Ontario, I wonder just how bad it is elsewhere. Of course we know how bad it is in places like Cape Breton Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, northern Ontario, parts of Quebec and parts of the west and northwest.

● (1730)

Much of the press reported that the finance minister faced a dilemma in trying to bring down a budget which would tackle the dual problems of high inflation and high unemployment. A few days after the budget speech it was generally conceded by many that the minister had done little or nothing to solve either of these critical problems. In fact his budget will make them worse.

There were no provisions in the budget which will do anything about our disastrous unemployment rate, nor were there any measures introduced which will increase productivity and, generally speaking, put our economy back on the road to recovery. For these omissions criticism is demanded from all members on this side of the House, or from as many as possible who can speak during these few short days in the debate.

Criticism is also warranted for the fact that even if the goal of less than 9 per cent inflation is attained next year, inflation will remain unacceptably high in this country. The finance minister patted himself and the government on the back with a statement on page 11 of the budget speech which reads, and I quote, "the actual rate of inflation has slowed noticeably since the introduction" of the prices and incomes program. He went on, "This sharp reduction in the rate of price increase is very welcome." What this overlooks is that the drop in the rate of increase in the consumer price index is occurring in areas not controlled by the Anti-Inflation Board. For instance, food costs declined at an annual rate of 5 per cent to 6 per cent, but are expected to rise considerably in the next few months, particularly this autumn.

The recent increase in the price of oil and petroleum products will also seriously affect the rate of inflation, and prices will continue to increase.

In the areas of inflation and unemployment I would certainly agree that this was a do nothing budget. What is deplorable, however, is the fact that action was sorely needed on both these fronts and, as one newspaper columnist pointed out, the minister, and I quote, "administered a placebo budget, hoping to keep the patient"—that is, the economy—"quiet until things get better by themselves." Things will not get better by themselves.

I have mentioned the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board, by and large, is useless in trying to control rising prices. In this connection I was interested in the public relations campaign the board has launched which outlines the kinds of increases it cannot control. Among some of the items the Anti-Inflation Board claims it is not responsible for are tobacco, alcohol, hydro, gas, water rates, public transit rates, rents, medical insurance premiums, and heating oil. In other words the inflationary pressures will not be halted on goods and services which are a daily necessity, not a luxury, to all Canadians.

On the unemployment side we find that in April of this year Canada showed the highest unemployment rate since June of 1961, and there are strong indications that it is unlikely to decline during the rest of this year. The minister's own Economic Review in April had this to say:

> During the recession firms engaged in substantial labour hoarding. The number of persons employed did not decline in line with cutbacks in output. Average hours were reduced . . . Much greater use was made of part time employment. Thus during the initial period of recovery firms can obtain increases in output without any increases in the number of workers by simply using them more intensively, while underutilized plant and equipment are pushed towards better operating rates.

In view of this it was absolutely crucial for the minister to have addressed himself more closely to the unemployment problem. At one point, on page 19 of his speech, the minister offered hope that some employment programs would be offered. Instead, all we got was a statement to the effect that direct employment programs can have broad social value and are not simply make work, but no proposals were made. The government even did away with OFY this year despite many thousands of unemployed young people coming on to the labour market.

I gather that the government is resigned to going through the rest of this year with unemployment at about 7 per cent of the labour force, hoping that the 7.4 per cent rate recorded in April was a fluke and not a real upturn. The finance minister's economic plan, if we can call it that, is based on the fact that the Canadian economy will generate more than 250,000 new jobs this year. This sounds impressive until we take into account that the labour force has been growing at well over 300,000 per year for the last three years. If the 250,000 jobs the minister talks about are added to the present employment level, we shall still be left with 747,000 people out of work by the end of this year. That is not what I call real performance.

The minister vainly tried to soften the impact of the current unemployment level by citing the study on the unemployed of the Economic Council of Canada, which said that much of today's jobless figure is accounted for by the young, by housewives, and by people dissatisfied with their former jobs seeking contentment in other kinds of work. I ask, why should this make any difference? Should a housewife feel any less discontented at being unable to secure work because her husband is currently drawing a salary? Should a young person feel any less distressed after having completed training for a particular job and being unable to find one, just because the finance minister says hers or his is not a kind of unemployment? I suggest that no government should be so complacent that it can afford not to provide jobs for those who wish to work, and by far the greater majority in this country want to work.

Therefore on two major fronts, inflation and unemployment, nothing has been done. As I mentioned, as a result of the omissions, both may be exacerbated.

Turning now to the specific measures which were introduced, it seems to me that it was totally inappropriate to cut $300 million in insurance benefits from the unemployed. On the one hand the minister says that today's unemployment does not carry with it the hardships it once did because of programs such as unemployment insurance, while on the other hand he announced that eligibility for benefits would be substantially cut back. It is a good thing we have some of these social transfer payments because I suggest that if we did not we would be in the grip of a revolution in this country today, for Canadians will not accept breadlines or soup kitchens any more. As a result of the cutback, some 330,000 individuals will not be eligible for unemployment insurance.

The manpower minister in his speech to the House on June 2 tried to dispel this figure with convoluted logic. He said that the figure of 330,000 did not mean that at any moment of time in the year 330,000 people would be affected. He said, and I quote, "Because the average duration of benefits extends only for a portion of the year, at any moment in time, only about 100,000 individuals would be affected." Before pursuing this argument further I must say that I find it absolutely appalling that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) would use the phrase "only about 100,000". That is 100,000 Canadians—100,000 individuals who live in this country. Nevertheless he continued this line of thought, and said that of this 100,000, 50 per cent will be able to find instant work for an additional four weeks. This means, and again I quote from the minister's speech, "only about 50,000 individuals would not be able to receive benefits and of these 80 per cent have no dependants". He has got it down to almost zero if you follow his line of thinking.

● (1740)

The minister, like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), has introduced the idea of degrees of seriouness for the unemployed. If you are single and unemployed, the government is of the opinion that your problem is not all that serious. Only this government, Mr. Speaker, could show such callousness. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration's manipulation of figures prompted one journalist to quip, "Mr. Andras leaves us wondering why we need an unemployment insurance scheme at all, until we realize that his entire rationale is a piece of statistical hocus pocus."

The proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act are simply others in a line of changes introduced by this government which show how incompetent and impotent the administration is in dealing with unemployment. The last changes in Bill C-69 were a clear admission by the Liberals that they could not bring the jobless rate down, and consequently they were not about to pay for their inadequacies either.

The new proposals which were introduced will have disastrous effects on marginal workers, particularly those in Atlantic Canada, the northern part of Ontario, parts of Quebec, and parts of the northwest. There are thousands of people in this country who are employed in occupations where they cannot have a job that lasts for more than eight weeks. By raising the eligibility requirements from 8 to 12 weeks the government is essentially saying to these marginal workers that it is their fault that they cannot find lasting jobs. I suggest it is the government's fault for not providing jobs for them.

Why was such a move contemplated, Mr. Speaker? The leader of my party suggested last Wednesday that part of the justification for the changes rests with some of the myths that are held about unemployment insurance and the unemployed. The member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) cited the notion held by many in this country that there are plenty of jobs available for all those who want them. Yet, as has been stated, there are more than 12 men and women available for every one job across the country. I relate this to my own constituency, Brant county. If all the jobs were taken that are available, there would still be 700,000 people in this country out of work. Those are the facts; surely the government knows that also, but instead it reacted to the myth with a totally irrational proposal.

There are other myths about unemployment insurance and the unemployed. Some believe that benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act are too generous and that this leads to a disincentive to work. Yet we know that last year the average weekly benefit paid was $84.64. How many family bills, how many mortgage payments can be made on that amount of money? The very study that some have used to show that the UIC Act provides a disincentive to work, done by the Economic Council of Canada, also said that most surveys show that the vast majority of Canadians prefer work, not unemployment insurance.

Probably the most outstanding comment made in the Economic Council of Canada report on the unemployment insurance system was the following: "Notwithstanding how the effects of the 1971 changes—have been interpreted, one point is unquestionably clear: regulatory changes alone do not, will not, send people back to work, if there are no jobs available." This is what the New Democratic Party has been saying for quite some time.

The costs of unemployment insurance in Canada could be brought down if the government could manage the economy of this country in such a fashion that jobs would be provided to all those who wanted them. I said at the outset that the Minister of Finance had absolutely no intention of dealing with unemployment. Instead of dealing with the problem itself, the minister decided to take a crack at those who are unemployed.

In this regard I would like to make passing mention of the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) last Wednesday. In his concluding remarks he said, as reported at page 14097 of Hansard, "The NDP want people to rely on unemployment just as the government does, and this—we object to most strenuously." The member for Hamilton West made this statement, or used it as the main reason why our party's amendment was unacceptable to the members to my right. I should clarify for the hon. member that the NDP has never wanted people to rely on unemployment. As a matter of fact our party, the socialist party, is a work oriented party, not a party oriented to living off the avails of someone else just because of laziness.

We want to put people to work. If you look at other countries in the world that have social democratic parties in power you will find in most cases that unemployment is very low. However, we are adamantly opposed to any measures which would restrict the eligibility of any person who is out of work for some reason totally beyond his or her control. Let me reiterate that the only acceptable way of reducing the cost of unemployment insurance in this country is to provide the required jobs. In other words, put people to work.

We in this party feel that certain steps could have been taken to alleviate some of the unemployment facing Canada. The Canadian economy is presently functioning at approximately 80 per cent capacity. What this means is that there is room for expansion in our economy. Tax cuts could have been provided without fuelling inflation. An increased demand for goods would have stimulated the economy, and consequently manufacturing industries would call back men and women who needed the jobs. As I said, Mr. Speaker, this stimulation for the economy would not have caused further inflation; it would if we were operating at full capacity, but this is not the present case.

Let me address myself briefly to some of the other budgetary measures introduced on May 25. I wish to deal specifically with two matters—the increase in deductions for child care expenses from the old maximum of $2,000 per family to a total annual limit of $4,000, and increasing to $3,500 the maximum annual amount deductible by employees and employers in respect of a registered pension plan. Also, if an individual is not a member of a pension plan, the maximum contribution limit will be increased from the present $4,000 to $5,500.

I should like to emphasize that I am not personally opposed to people being able to increase their tax deductions if they are able to save. If they have money that they can save without paying further tax, through registered retirement savings or the registered home owners' savings plan which is being made more flexible, I am not critical of them. If they earn around $18,000 or $20,000 a year and wish to set aside tax deferred savings until they are older, that is fine. But what I most strenuously object to is the fact that this is considered to be a very liberal attitude in a budgetary form for the people of Canada. We are talking about a very, very small number of Canadians. They are the only people who get a break at all in this budget because the vast majority of people in this country have no chance of saving $3,500 or $4,000 every year, or even $5,500 for a retirement savings plan.

Why did the Minister of Finance not bring in tax cuts for low income people to balance things and make it a much more equitable budget? These tax changes have been referred to as a hidden welfare system by Reuben Baetz of the Canadian Council on Social Development. Actually the government's tax deferral schemes are exactly that. Mr. Baetz was referring to such measures as well as to measures introduced in the last several budgets, one example being the $1,000 interest income deductible from income for income tax purposes. Such measures help people in higher income brackets. One must seriously question whether spending $60 million—which is what the deductions actually cost us—to aid those with incomes of $20,000 a year and more, really met one of Canada's socially pressing needs. I am convinced that the measure did not fill a pressing need felt by most Canadians.

● (1750)

With respect to deductions made in connection with registered retirement savings plans, I suggest that in order to reach the former ceiling of $4,000 a taxpayer had to earn $20,000 a year. The new ceiling of $5,500 per year means a further tax saving of almost $700 for a single person earning $27,500, but not a penny of saving for the average Canadian. We had become used to seeing the former minister of finance redistribute income in this fashion. I hoped the present minister would change the pattern. Unfortunately he did not.

The measure to increase deductions for child care expenses has been lauded by many; again, would it not have been more equitable if the $15 million, the estimated cost of this measure, had been given as a flat rate credit? Since deductions provide higher benefits to those in top income brackets, the child care deductions will obviously benefit those who need them least.

The government's record of income distribution is abysmal. For instance the share of total income going to the bottom 20 per cent of income earners was less in 1974 than in 1951. Not only has income distribution not changed substantially in the last quarter century, but successive ministers of finance, the present minister included, have introduced measures like those I referred to which have made the income tax system much less progressive.

I do not know how much longer we must wait for an equitable tax system. I suggest to the Minister of Finance, the cabinet and colleagues on my right, that unless we put people back to work in meaningful jobs with security of tenure, correct the inequities in our tax system, improve the lot of the 20 per cent to 25 per cent of our population living in abject poverty, give young people more incentive to study and qualify for meaningful jobs, correct the deplorable situation in which thousands of our qualified nurses who could not find work in this country went to the United States for work, and give incentives for young, middle aged, and older Canadians to look for meaningful work, this country will be in great trouble in two or three years.

We saw what happened the other day on Parliament Hill. The violent behaviour of the few troublemakers in the large crowd disgusted us. I suggest that if the Anti-Inflation Board continues to be unfair we shall see more violent demonstrations. There will be more violence in this country. There will be an even greater division between those who possess some wealth and those who possess none. The members of this House are obliged to make sure this does not happen. What other assembly in the country, what other elected council has power to make the vital decisions which will bring about more economic and social equity in this country?

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I address my remarks tonight to the failure of the May 25 budget to deal significantly with the problems facing industry in this country. A columnist for the Montreal Gazette in commenting on the government's new budget, or non-budget as it should be called, described the government's effort most accurately when he said, and I quote:

> Economy, heal thyself: having studied the symptoms for nine months, Canada's new fiscal physician has decided he does not know what to do, anymore than John Turner did when the chills of high unemployment came at the same time as the fever of inflation.
>
> So he has administered a placebo budget, hoping to keep the patient quiet until things get better by themselves. Perhaps the Yankee medicine of export demand from the United States will help.
>
> Perhaps the private sector—written off by the Prime Minister only a few months ago—will deliver the right goods and services to the right place at the right time and the right price. We had better hope so.
>
> The Minister of Finance can expect criticism for bringing down, in the midst of multiplied economic problems, the kind of drifting, dreamy budget which might have been produced by a Finance Minister afraid to change anything because things were going so well.

But things are not going all that well, Mr. Speaker. The minister will live with a deficit of about $4.5 billion for another year, an amount which points to the government's failure to control its own spending.

Furthermore, the budget does little or nothing to fight unemployment, increase productivity, restrain growth of government spending, reduce Canada's high interest and exchange rates, or promote business investment. In short, the budget exemplifies the government's obvious ineptitude in coming to grips with our real problems and needs.

The budget makes no significant effort to tackle the four major problem areas facing the Canadian economy inflation, unemployment, productivity, and the current account deficit.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has termed this do-nothing budget "a very anti-business budget", and so it is. The industrial and business sector of this country does not need government apathy. Rather, business and industry in Canada need the incentives that government can provide to improve plant efficiency, re-equip, improve the supply of goods and services, and compete effectively on the international market.

One area where the government could have helped improve the well-being of Canadian industry is the field of research and development. On March 12 of this year the Council of the Academy of Science of the Royal Society of Canada made it clear to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that a serious situation exists, and promises to become more serious in the future, as a result of the government's non-policy for the support of scientific research and development. The society, in its brief to the Prime Minister, said:

> At no time in our history have we been confronted with so many problems needing science-based solutions. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of the decisions that confront Canada in such areas as resource management, energy options, health care, food supply, pollution, transportation, and so on.
>
> Furthermore, the choices that we, as a nation, make in these areas will be dependent on the maturity, knowledge, versatility and statute of contemporary Canadian science and engineering. Canada cannot afford to depend on the scientific and engineering skills of other countries to solve its problems.
>
> Even choices as to the best kinds of technology to be imported and adapted to Canadian conditions . . . must be made on the basis of sound scientific and engineering knowledge, which can only be obtained from a community of highly competent and active Canadian scientists and engineers.

Having said that, the Council of the Academy expressed a great concern with the unfortunate deterioration that the government has allowed to take place, a dangerous deterioration in the public support of research and development in Canadian industry, in government laboratories and in universities.

The government has a bad habit of ignoring the sound advice of those sectors of society which specialize in a given field of endeavour, and it therefore comes as no surprise that the government has made a failure of its limited efforts in this area. Although the need for a well funded Canadian industrial research effort is recognized by most, the government has, as usual, headed in the opposite and wrong direction.

A statement on science policy put out by the offices of Bell Canada illustrates this point. I quote:

> We refer to the government decision to freeze research expenditures, to repeal the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act

(IRDIA) and to reduce the money available for the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT).

● (2010)

While the sums involved are not great (we are led to believe that the annual grants through IRDIA do not exceed $30 million) they were often essential for the initiation and continuation of the research programs of some companies.

Money allotted to research and development at the best of times could only be described as minuscule. The fact of the matter is that Canada's expenditures on research and development peaked in 1966, and Canada has never spent more than 1.2 per cent of its Gross National Product on research. Other industrialized nations such as Japan, West Germany, France, the United States, and Britain, have all committed much larger amounts of GNP to research and continue to do so. It must be said that if this nation expects to expand industrially, to become a major international trading nation and to continue the improvements in its internal social well-being, then this country cannot afford not to have research. The fact of the matter is that Canada will be outpaced by other industrial countries and will end up purchasing technology and scientific expertise from elsewhere.

As one who takes more than a passing interest in the economic climate of this country I recognize, unlike the government, that there is a real economic value attached to increased efficiency, better products, and increased trade. If that sounds like a cold view of the matter, then just remember that better medical care, improved housing, superior consumer goods, less work, and increased prosperity are also attributable to scientific and technological advancement. It would seem that the government views research and development expenditures as a luxury which can be done without. This is one area, however, where continued and increased government support is required. Research and development is not an expense; it is an investment in the future of this country.

Canada has problems quite peculiar to its own development. There is little to contest the precept that Canada's economic future largely depends upon its ability to enlarge its position as an international trader. Industrial research can undoubtedly be one key to securing and advancing a position in international trade for this country. Certain facts of Canadian economic life must not be forgotten when we discuss this subject.

Over the past few years wage levels in this country have risen at a rate much faster than those of competing nations and nations to which Canada hopes to sell. Unfortunately at the same time the level of productivity in Canada has dropped in relation to that of such countries as West Germany and the United States. And so it is that we are handicapped from the word go in trying to compete in many foreign markets.

To compensate for the higher wage levels and decreased productivity in Canada, research and development can bring innovations to products and manufacturing practices. To ignore research and development at this time can only lead to further deficits in the Canadian balance of trade in the future, as Canada fails to make inroads into foreign markets. It must be stressed again and again to the government that Canada's trade position is unhealthy. Canada in reality had a current trade deficit of $8 billion in 1975. We covered it by selling a net of $2.9 billion in raw resources, borrowing $4.7 billion from foreign sources, and letting our exchange reserves fall by $400 million. With a current account deficit of $5.1 billion in 1975, even after the trade surplus of $2.9 billion in raw materials, it is difficult to conceive of our trade deficit being any more ominous.

Quite apart from the likelihood of our 1976 trade performance being little better than in 1975, however, the composition of the 1975 current account balance is a source of even greater alarm than the deficit figures would indicate. The sale of raw materials is, of course, a basic element in the economic picture of this country. Increased sales of raw materials may be one way out of our current trade problems. However, most of us, except the government, realize that this attitude is pure folly. Exporting crude materials provides considerably less benefit to the Canadian economy than exporting fully or partly manufactured goods. There is far more value added to a manufactured product, in terms of labour, capital investment, and research, than to a raw resource. But in addition to this standard criticism of increased exports of raw materials, there is also the fact that our exports of non-renewable raw materials can only be, by definition, finite.

Recent developments in the petroleum and natural gas situation make very clear the full force of this basic truth. Non-renewable resources are Canada's capital assets, and to continue to export them in a totally unrefined state is to sell off fixed assets to relieve a current expenses deficit. What this means is that the government should, above all else, be encouraging new industry and established industries in this country to grow and compete effectively at home and abroad. Unfortunately this budget before us illustrates the government's total lack of foresight and initiative in this area.

It is an economic fact of life that industrial and commercial expansion requires capital, Mr. Speaker. The Economic Council of Canada, in its 12th annual review, estimated that the nation's capital needs between now and 1985 will total between $800 and $860 billion dollars. By comparison, total investment expenditures over the past decade were around $200 billion. Thus a four-fold increase in capital outlays will be needed to increase productive facilities in line with the growth of Canadian markets, to develop and upgrade our energy and other natural resources, and to achieve the improvement in our productivity performance so urgently needed as a prerequisite for long-term price stability.

The pre-budget submission of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce states some of the needs of Canadian business quite succinctly:

Historically, 60-70 per cent of our investment has been financed by corporations through retained earnings and depreciation allowances.

Neither source is expected to advance in the future at the rates required. Depreciation allowances, based on original costs, are seriously inadequate to cover the replacement value of facilities. Profits, and hence retained earnings, are limited under the wage and price control program.

The submission continues:

It is therefore, in our opinion, imperative that the federal government continuously monitor the impact of the profit controls and provide, wherever possible, assistance to industry in the financing of productive capital investment.

Measures such as the deduction of inventory valuation adjustments from taxable income, or the provision of depreciation at the replacement value of assets, have been recommended before by the chamber . . . and are still needed.

In summary, the situation for industrial expansion in this country can be termed discouraging. At a time when the economic health of the country could be improved through such measures as research and development funding, tax reform for industry, lower personal income tax rates, and efforts to encourage public savings in order to increase available capital for investment in Canadian industry, the government has responded with a do nothing budget whose only significant message is that the government itself still refuses to curb its own expenditures.

The budget deficit will not recede. It will grow by about an estimated $5 billion in 1976-77. The increase in spending is 16.2 per cent, approximately what was projected in the estimates; the increase in revenues, 15.3 per cent.

As for the fiscal year just ended, the government has revealed that total government spending was $725 million higher than had been earlier forecast. That amounts to an increase of 18 per cent in government spending rather than the 16 per cent announced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) when he unveiled some of the plans to restrain government spending last December.

I will conclude my comments, Mr. Speaker, by reiterating what this budget really means. It means that the government is content to go through the rest of this year with unemployment at about 7 per cent of the labour force, hoping that the 7.4 per cent unemployment rate recorded in April was just a fluke and not a real upturn. It calls for real growth of the economy of 5 per cent this year, and not much better next year. This very modest recovery depends, of course, on the economic stimulus offered by other countries, such as the United States, and not by any initiative of our own.

● (2020)

This budget calls for an inflation rate, as figured on the Gross National Product rather than consumer prices, of a hefty 9.5 per cent this year and about 6 per cent next year.

All in all, this non-budget presents us with a real example of what could only be expected from a government whose record of economic mismanagement is so considerable. Other countries have done and are doing better, and without the built-in advantages which make even bad management in Canada appear to be not so bad. Indeed what the Minister of Finance has provided us with is no budget at all. There can be no doubt that the government will have to show us a real budget in the near future.

Canadians have come to expect very little, except ineptitude, from the government, and so it is that we can only ask that a future budget demonstrate an understanding of the nation's problems, hope for the unemployed, and initiatives which will promote Canadian industry; but to ask this government for even a mediocre effort is to ask more than this government is capable of providing.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) for his budget. As many of my colleagues know, I have worked for a long time in the clothing industry, and I can therefore say that the minister provided us with a "made to order" suit but with very few alterations, which shows that we already had a good pattern. I also want to emphasize the enlightened determination shown in the proposed changes in our unemployment insurance legislation by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) who is also responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission and whom I have the pleasure to second as a parliamentary secretary. Incidentally, as you may guess, this will be the subject matter of my remarks today.

Everybody admits that the unemployment insurance formula had to be amended, but as in the fable of the miller, his son and the donkey, it was impossible to satisfy everybody at the same time. This debate has already shown that proposals range from the funnel to the Danaides' barrel. For instance, some members have blamed the minister for not going far enough in the area of restraints, especially among those who feel there are too many people who live poorly but pleasantly at the expense of what some people call the "permanently chronic workers" whereas on the other hand, it was said that this government was engaging in tax surgery at the expense of those who find it difficult to make both ends meet.

As a matter of fact, the changes before us had to be made, logically and in fairness, both for the large majority of Canadians who are working and paying for maintaining the present unemployment insurance system and for those who occasionally are the recipients of this system and who will finally benefit from it, for one has to keep in mind that the changes made to the Unemployment Insurance Act will bring about a substantial expansion of job creating programs. Our first goal, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said in his speech of June 2, is to provide jobs for as many Canadians as possible.

Unemployment insurance is not a goal but a step towards a new job. Those decisions are not made unexpectedly but are rather the result of analyses, surveys on conditions prevailing in Canada as well as other countries. Indeed I want to stress that even with the new clause extending from eight to twelve weeks the number of weeks of work necessary to become eligible for unemployment insurance, the Canadian formula is even more generous than in all industrialized nations of the world, except the Netherlands. In Sweden, you need 12 months of contribution, including five in the preceding year; in the United Kingdom, you need 26 weeks in the previous year to get the minimum benefits and 50 weeks for the maximum. In Germany, you need 26 weeks in the three preceding years. And when the NDP leader points out that in those countries unemployment rates are lower, I say to him that that is an argument which goes against his theory, since in all logic a lower rate of unemployment means that people find more jobs and also more quickly.

It would be useless to imagine, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment insurance alone can be used to right all our economic or social problems, even if it constitutes one of the most important and effective instruments available to the government to create jobs, as it is going to do more and more with formulas of the local initiative type, and training programs are extremely important in that respect.

The minister has been criticized for not unwrapping immediately before the House all the programs in their finest details. Yet, those statements already contain the assurance that the amounts which will not be used for unemployment insurance will be spent to create jobs, with due consideration for regional needs. In the same line, the reform launched by the minister will allow us to calculate benefits according to the regional rather than the national rate of unemployment but all those amendments requiring the passage of legislation will only affect the true status of unemployment insurance recipients at the beginning of next year.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) already indicated that all plans for those enlarged manpower programs will be completed in two or three months and made public no later than this fall.

Canada is already regarded as leading the way in the creation of employment when, for instance, our Local Initiatives Program has been adopted in Great Britain while experts from the United States, France, Australia, etc, are considering it in their turn. The advantage of these programs is that they stimulate workers and respect the dignity of man, which, in many cases, helps bring back workers on the labour market. In my constituency of Gamelin, in Montreal, seven local initiatives projects made wonderful things this year not only for the hundred persons who took part in them, but for thousands of others who profited by them indirectly.

It is also certain that a pilot program launched in Newfoundland and which has known considerable success, will take great extension. Through that plan, hundreds of people have been able for about a year to continue to receive unemployment insurance benefits while attending training courses which enabled them to acquire qualifications they will be able to use on the labour market in sectors where they will be needed.

To continue on training, the minister reminded us in this House last week that with the addition of $40 million for industrial and institutional training, the federal government will have put $522 million in that sector alone during the present financial year. In the same way, the workers' mobility program has been made more generous.

● (2030)

Reverting to the subject of unemployment insurance, I must say that the next law will no longer include severance pay in the salary of an employee for purposes of establishing his unemployment insurance allowances. Similarly, the famous "four-week" rule will be eliminated thus enabling people without a job to take temporary employment and still be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. This could become an extremely efficient incentive.

The amendments suggested by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration do not only meet the wishes of politicians, journalists or social agencies. In the interesting declaration he made on June 2, the official critic of the Progressive Conservative Party for manpower, the hon. member for Hamilton-West (Mr. Alexander) said, I quote:

The Economic Council is of the opinion that our existing legislation induces people to join the unemployment rolls and is a disincentive to work. It estimates that present legislation induced between 70,000 and 80,000 people to go on unemployment.

I am sure that what the government wants, and what the whole House wants, is a formula which will help those who are in need, a formula which induces those who are unemployed to look for a job and to keep it. By the way, merging the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission will help to improve the situation in that particular area. Finally, Mr. Speaker, this formula is more practical, more efficient, more just and more realistically adapted to the needs of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, the journalists who are presently studying the situation are far from being unanimous. For example, last Thursday, the editorialist of the Globe and Mail estimated that the federal statistics on unemployment are no longer realistic because they consider as unemployed many people who do not really want to work or who do not want to get "bored" looking for a job. On the contrary, Charles Lynch, a journalist from the Southam News Agency, estimated that the progressive reduction, given the day before by the minister, in the number of those who claim unemployment insurance allowances among the so-called 8-to-11 week category and who would really have to face difficulties, was a calculation in which the statistics were sifted in a way very hard to control.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, no one of us can try the reins and the heart, as the saying goes. On the other hand, the demonstration of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is based on the figures obtained from serious studies, and they prove, for instance, that the claimants of the "8 to 11 week" group cost 20 times, on the average, all the other recipients of unemployment insurance, that they use up their rights to the limit oftener, that they find work rather easily and quickly when they run out of unemployment benefits, that they often reenter the ranks of the recipients, that they are not usually the first breadwinner of the family but that their salary is added to the income of an average if not higher-income family, that they seldom if ever live on welfare, that their rate of claims is four times that of the average claim, in short that they are part of the category which is least exposed to having problems if an attempt is made to reduce the cost of unemployment insurance in a given sector.

Let us also remember that "disbursements" does not mean money taken from the worker, for it is understood that the amounts saved will be channelled towards programs for creating employment and training the workers, especially in those areas where the need is greatest. Finally, as the minister said again, the government does not seek the glory of reducing unemployment by one point or a fraction thereof, so much as, above all else, creating the largest possible number of jobs in the Canadian economy, as well as enabling the greatest possible number of Canadians to be advised of the existence of those jobs, to get them and keep them. That last point, namely that of keeping a job, illustrates well the importance of training programs which result in a more competent, better motivated and better remunerated labour force.

So we are not faced, as suggested by the New Democratic Party leader, with a sinister conspiracy to deprive those unemployed who are most in need, and to let them treacherously on the street, but with the rational adjustment of the unemployment insurance system, so as to allow for instance more simple activities, the number of phases passing then from five to three, more generous operations because they will concurrently give way to some working forms or the registration for training courses, fairer activities because they will be more properly fashioned after regional requirements, finally more rational activities because they are based on the results of enquiries relating to the behaviour of certain categories of unemployment insurance recipients.

In the end, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that to get the maximum of success with the new regulations on unemployment insurance and employment creation programs, we surely need the cooperation of workers, but also that of employers, as well as of provinces with which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicated Wednesday his intention to attempt every collective effort. One should also note that several provinces as well have interesting programs to reduce the number of people on welfare from various categories, including—and I say this for our friends from the Social Credit Party—those in British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said, these few legal and institutional changes will be introduced to promote a more efficient employment policy in this country, and I urge my colleagues to support the government position.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate the Minister of Finance for his courage in introducing this budget, because in the last number of years it has taken men of courage to prepare budgets.

In the way of summing up my thoughts on the subject, I endorse the following statement made by Claude Ryan in Le Devoir of May 27, and I quote:

> Caught in the narrowest margin left a Canadian Minister of Finance for a long time, Mr. Macdonald introduced his first budget, in the House of Commons Tuesday evening, under very difficult circumstances which prompted many critics to suggest this may be his last budget.
>
> Never in history did a federal budget come so close to being the "non-budget" it was immediately termed. Never in a long time did a Liberal Minister of Finance show so much reluctance and even shyness.

If I were to wish the minister something, it would be to hurry through that budget and avoid the path followed by his predecessors, who broke their necks at the head of that department we are tempted to call the death-trap ministry. As always, the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance for 1976-77 draws absolutely opposite reactions from businessmen and the millions of wage earners.

So it is not surprising that big corporations, banking monopolies and all the multinationals congratulate the Minister of Finance, while unionized and non-unionized workers alike and the 769,000 unemployed regret such an antisocial, not to say nationally shameful budget. But paradoxically, both sides may be right, since the government always favoured those who financed their elections, ignoring most of the time between elections those who were prevailed upon during the 60-day period to vote them back into power.

[Mr. Portelance.]

● (2040)

That is why I am wondering today which one is to blame—the governors or the governed who keep accepting to be easily taken in come every election time. It has been known by everybody, and this for 100 years, that successive governments have always protected the financial sector to the detriment of Canadians, and what is more astounding is that they have done so by making people believe that the elected government was acting in the best interests of Canadian workers.

The very proof of my allegations is found in the budget. After a somewhat in-depth review of the May 25, 1976 budget papers tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), one has only to look at page 11 of this paper and examine the list of anticipated expenses for 1976 to realize easily that 35 sectors will be favoured with an increase, whereas only four will suffer cutbacks, or sizeable reductions.

Even more astonishing is the fact that the very sectors which should have been increased, at least at the rate accepted by the Anti-Inflation Board, are those the government has decided to take a crack at—agriculture, unemployment insurance, Secretary of State and transport.

In my opinion the minister should have limited the CBC and CIDA budgets, the charges on the national debt as well as outlays for national defence, bank interests, government corporations and all the items under "other expenditures", which we had seven times without any explanation. We see that the budget of agriculture is reduced by $17 million whereas it should have been increased at least by $40 million to meet the demands of the industrial milk producers of Quebec which are more than reasonable; these producers are facing the worst problem ever experienced in this sector, due only to the decisions taken unilaterally by the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Where is the logic of the government which after having eliminated 60 per cent of the small farms endangers 50 per cent of those which resisted the assault of the government? Having been invited and even encouraged to enlarge their farms, improve their buildings, modernize their techniques to obtain maximum efficiency, these producers are accused of overproduction only a few months later. Because the farm producers complied with the numerous requests of the Minister of Agriculture, because the industrial milk producers trusted the government's technocrats and technicians, the same producers are penalized for having listened to the government's specialists.

Has the Minister of Agriculture only thought about the financial effects on the milk producers? Is the government aware that instead of a 20 per cent decrease, those producers needed at least 15 per cent more than in 1975 to meet their financial obligations?

We must keep in mind that it is not of their own free will that the producers agreed to run into maximum debts to meet the department's requirements. The department should at least have the decency to recognize that it alone is responsible for the difficult financial situation of the industrial milk producers. Consequently, it is its responsibility, not anyone else's, not to request the producers to pay for its specialists' mistakes.

I can readily understand the march on Parliament Hill in Ottawa on Thursday, June 3 to ask the Minister of Agriculture to reconsider his decision. Why Quebec more so than the other provinces? Because it is Quebec, more specifically the industrial milk producers in Quebec who are the most seriously affected. Indeed in the western provinces the production of industrial milk is insignificant. In Ontario, which produced its highest out of quota surpluses last year, the measure only normalizes the situation whereas the Quebec industrial milk producers who are responsible for only 2 per cent of all milk surpluses are those who must bear the burden of the cuts in quotas.

If the Minister of Agriculture really had to take drastic action to avoid more surpluses, why did he not emphasize restrictions for those who had a surplus last year? Why reduce regular quotas and why must those who did not fill their regular quotas last year be penalized as well? That is where I see a lack of logic on the part of the department's experts, unless their deliberate purpose was to favour Ontario over Quebec. I believe the cause of all these problems is the total lack of long term dairy policy. Obviously it is much easier for the agriculture technicians to outline a 12 month policy than to make projections for five years ahead. Such a policy seems to be beyond the high officials of production and marketing of agricultural products. However, the possibilities are not lacking.

I am convinced it would cost less to the government to create a warehousing system for a five year period to restore balance between good and bad years. This would take us away from the vicious circle of surplus and shortage. Sometimes the federal government calls on producers, either in beef, pork, chicken, eggs or milk because a shortage is forecasted for a few months hence; the government makes promises to stimulate the production concerned. Producers go full steam ahead following the government incentives, only to learn 10 or 12 months later that they have caused a surplus. When shall we have enough competent people to stop playing this way with farm producers by making them support the burden of government mistakes or incompetence? Again, if producers were asked by the government to prepare farming policies we would have some reason to accuse and even punish these producers, but everyone knows full well that it is the officials who prepare and run all policies, whether they have to do with marketing or producing agricultural commodities. These officials are asked to think and to act for and on behalf of producers, but if officials make a mistake, the producers are quickly punished.

Further than that, today the Minister of Finance through his Anti-Inflation Board allows an increase of 12 or 15 per cent to all other groups of workers, indexed on the cost of living which is quite normal, but this same minister forces farmers and especially industrial milk producers to take a cut of 20 per cent in their income. Where is the consistency of the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture? I might add that it is discrimination against the Quebec dairy producers because, as I said earlier, once more Quebec bears the brunt. Indeed, when Canada had wheat surpluses, this same government compensated the western producers and even paid them not to sow wheat. Do I blame the western producers? On the contrary, I say to them: Good for you! I congratulate all hon. members from the west as I did then for imposing their will on the government and obtaining greater protection for farmers. Yet, the Liberals elected only a few members in the west, as is the case today; therefore it is not a partisan policy that prevailed but the pressure, the common sense policy.

● (2050)

If a handful of western members of the opposition have delivered that master stroke for their province, I wonder what the 59 elected Liberals in Quebec are doing. I fear that the Quebec Liberals are the victims of their strength in Parliament. Some surely have no backbone to uphold sincerely the interests of Quebec. Let us forget for a moment the condition of the party to think about Quebecers. The Quebec agriculture is ill and the cause is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Can my dear Liberal colleagues do something? It is up to them to show it in the days to come.

My second criticism is related to the $45 million which the minister wants to take away from unemployment insurance. I think that after agriculture, which will remain our basic industry for a few years, provided members remain conscious of their responsibilities in the House, a very important sector for the Quebec economy more particularly is the maintenance of the manpower and unemployment insurance services. Among the 750,000 unemployed in Canada, my region has a very high percentage and they are not wealthy unemployed, but people who are looking for a job and cannot find any. The minister knows quite well that when no more benefits will be paid to the unemployed, they will be compelled to register on the rolls on social welfare in Quebec.

That is a way as good as any other to shift his responsibilities on to the back of the provinces. That is a good example of the famous balance-sheet federalism of the present government. We forgot to tell one thing to the population: that federalism was profitable only to the central government. In 1942, after having made the provinces yield all their taxation rights, the central government went as far as promising to the naive provinces that it would reinstate them in their rights once the war would be over. Thirty-four years have passed since then and the federal government still retains most taxation rights. I would even say that it takes advantage of its taxation power to intrude every day into areas reserved exclusively to the provinces.

Just to give you an idea of it, during the study in a special committee before the presentation of the budget, I drew the attention of officials to the enormous difference between the increase in personal income tax and corporate income tax. In the document entitled "Budget Speech" of June 25, 1976, page 40, we can see that Canadian workers will pay $20 billion in direct taxes against $16 billion in 1975 which is an increase of more than $4 billion while big corporations will pay an additional $700 million only. This is another levy which demonstrates the absurdity of our taxation system. While we live in a period of great banking and financial monopolies, multinational companies which own 80 per cent of our economy pay only 24 per cent of the national budget, whereas salaried people pay 76 per cent of it.

We have been asking the government for years to restore the economic balance by getting the money from those who pocket revenues and file astronomical profits. Far from seeking to take the money where it really is so as to administer and guarantee each citizen an adequate minimum income to live on, the government turns back to the unemployed, to take more money from those who cannot even work to earn a decent living for themselves and their family.

As if he wanted to soften the blow, the minister first increased the premiums, and now he decides to reduce benefits. This is what I call administrative dishonesty. If the minister sincerely wants to save $75 or $100 million, he just has to turn to the Department of National Defence, and simply keep the $1 billion they intend to spend on the purchase of new toys for our soldiers overseas.

Let us talk a little bit, Mr. Speaker, of this famous Orion or Lockheed program, whichever one you wish to call it. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, that after we were told that the government could not afford to spend $40 million to help industrial milk producers, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) is prepared to run us into debt to the tune of $1 billion to buy new military planes. While everyone is clamoring for improved rail services, the Department of Transport budget is being reduced to fill in the coffers of national defence—I was about to say "international" since most of our forces are overseas.

The government proposes to close down railway lines which are unprofitable. But is the Air Force profit-making? The country cannot afford it, so what, there is no problem, Lockheed will finance the Orion deal. Do you not think there is something mysterious about the transactions of this corporation which inspired so much comments with the terrific bribes it has resorted to in several countries to boost its sales? After the Sky Shops scandal, shall we get another involving Lockheed?

When you listen to the sometimes quite harsh interventions in this House, you wonder if some ministers or civil servants have not succumbed to the temptation of bribes. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been better for the government itself to negotiate a little loan for the benefit of farmers. Bribes would have been less significant and it would have been compensated by a political gain.

I could not conclude without speaking of our great Crown corporation, Air Canada, and its unilingualism. I have no idea what the Prime Minister thinks of the disastrous events concerning his bilingualism program and what is going on at Air Canada. In light of those events we are more and more convinced that for some English-speaking Canadians bilingualism is a good and nice thing as long as it is not implemented. We are just seeing the beginning of a fight where many senior civil servants and some ministers will have to show their true face to the Canadian people. Even if you are part of Canada, when you dare prevent a province from using its own language it becomes dangerous, Mr. Speaker. As always, the minister promptly created a commission to hide behind but the problem is still there. And what a commission, Mr. Speaker! For a commission on bilingualism, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) could not do any better than chosing a lawyer who was a former adviser to the pilot association, a group absolutely hostile to bilingualism in Quebec's sky.

The Association des gens de l'air du Québec denounced the appointment of Mr. Keenan and even declared that it would not cooperate in that inquiry because of the past action of Mr. Keenan. The association went even further: it demanded the appointment of a French-speaking co-commissioner or Mr. Keenan's dismissal. The Minister of Transport said no to everything. It was the slap in the face given by our Minister of Transport to the airline employees in Quebec. However, witnessing the increasing rebellion in Quebec, Mr. Keenan realized that his appointment as commissioner had become litigious and, far from contributing to solve the problem, it was only increasing it, so he made a decision. We have seen that Mr. Keenan, in spite of his formal opposition to bilingualism, has more sense than the Minister of Transport. Now we are waiting for the creation of the new commission.

To my mind, the minister is too compromised at this point to designate alone the members of that commission. The cabinet must be very careful to avoid more confrontations. In the meantime, we Quebecers are paying our share of the deficits of the big beautiful unilingual company, Air Canada. If the minister wants to stay with the status quo at Air Canada, let him at least give money to the unemployed and the farmers in Quebec, the money we must pay for the deficits of Air Canada. Then only will we start to consider him as an impartial anglophone who tries to work for the unity of the two Canadian ethnic groups.

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the debate on this budget of 1976, my mind went back over budget debates of the last 19 years. I think there is a well known expression, "The more things change, the more they remain the same".

● (2100)

We are suffering at this particular time from obvious evidence that the government did not know what to do and the civil servants did not know what to do, so they did nothing. I make that remark with some regret because I have seen one minister after the other in the last 25 years, going back to Walter Harris, suffer the same fate regardless of their politics because the elected representative was not contributing the knowledge that was available to the budget. We relied on the expertise of people who were sincere and able, but who had been consistently wrong for 30 years. I have made that remark on many a budget debate, and I regret to have to make it tonight. In a moment I shall refer to the source of this judgment. I always believe in being an optimist, however.

I was interested to read a statement by the former deputy minister of finance reported in the Globe and Mail of June 2. I shall not read the whole article but I would ask the members of the House who take seriously the part parliament should play in laying down the fiscal and monetary policy of this nation so as to maximize the good that will come from a proper policy, to pay particular attention to it. Here is a man who had been around for all of my time here and is now in private business. His concluding remark was: "Above all we economists should learn to be humble; so should our political leaders. Together we have much to be humble about." Now that Simon Reisman is free of government service he tells us to be humble because we have much to be humble about!

In my remarks tonight I am going to try to shift away from the details of this budget because there is general agreement that it is a nothing budget. The minister himself made that very clear when he bragged that he would rather be cautious than foolhardy. I want to remind the House that along with a good many other people in Canada I have been seriously concerned this last year or so, as I saw the nation slowly begin to come out of the recession, that somebody would do something stupid to send us back into another recession.

In this history of mistakes over the last 30 years the situation we are in at this particular time in our economic cycle is exactly the same as on two other separate occasions in the years I have been in the House. On each of the previous occasions the circumstances were the same—a country slowly coming out of a recession and then the government did a stupid thing which sent the country into a worse recession.

Just before last Christmas I put the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) quietly at the end of the question period, as reported at page 10196 of Hansard:

> . . . would the Prime Minister give serious consideration over the next three or four weeks to re-examining the whole course that the government is taking because I believe it is heading us toward a recession and would he turn the whole program of the government around into one of expansion so as to give the government time to get at the basic cause of inflation, which this program is not doing?

I was referring to the anti-inflation program. The Prime Minister promised he would give it serious consideration but as the House will understand, when he gave that answer he thought the expansion I asked about was the same type of expansion program we have had for 30 years from the advisers of the government. He thought it meant pumping more money into circulation so that there would be more to spend. He mentioned that in his answer. He said in effect, "Look how big our budgetary deficit is—we are expansionary." He accepted the word of the Department of Finance experts who believe that if we have a big budget deficit, that is expansionary. I say it is time the politicians took over from these experts and began to do some real thinking on the deficits that are before us.

Tonight I am not going to deal with the details of the budget. I am going to suggest that there are alternatives and these alternatives have been made public. They are not new but they are not being utilized by the advisers of our governments. I will give an example, Mr. Speaker.

First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) for being the one speaker in the opening stages of this debate who looked at the situation in a philosophical sense and saw what the government was doing. All the government was doing was trying to take a political posture to get the Prime Minister out of the hole vis-à-vis those silly speeches he made around Christmas time.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge put forward not a new philosophy but one that was laid clear as an alternative by the Economic Council of Canada six or seven years ago, namely, that when you have a large number of unemployed and 15 per cent or 20 per cent of the plant capacity unused, if you put that group of people to work and put that plant capacity to use, then there is no inflation. Inflation only occurs when you try to put the people to work when there is not enough plant capacity. The name for this alternative is very well known; it is called "potential budgeting". I hope it is the official policy of the New Democratic Party because when we form the government we can rely upon them as allies if they believe it. It is what we believe.

Everyone knows that if you use the labour force and use the plant capacity, the gross national revenue goes up, tax revenues go up, and the deficit comes down. This was used in the United States in 1964 when their budgeters reduced taxes by about $10 billion or $11 billion. Everyone said, "Disaster is upon us—here we have a big deficit and this crazy government comes along and reduces taxes by another $11 billion." But they put so many people to work and utilized so much plant capacity that when the year was over the government had $18 billion in new taxes and, instead of the familiar deficit, had a large surplus. This has only been used once in the United States to my knowledge, and it has never been used here. It is one alternative.

The second alternative is one I put forward some ten years ago in a series of three or four speeches. I suggested some refinements to the doctrine of Lord Keynes, and to keep it simple I called it "selective budgeting"—selective by region, selective by industry, and selective by social purpose. In those proposals I outlined how in a country as big as the United States or Canada the doctrines of Keynes would not work because they were designed for a small country like the United Kingdom. In Canada there are many regions and a great variety of sophistication in industries and great differences in social need. Any Canadian budget of the future should contain this selective feature.

I know these ideas were heeded because there is occasional evidence in a budget that they are known. In the last budget there was a reasonable concession to the maritimes on unemployment insurance. I would suggest that the principle of selective budgeting should be applied systematically in all phases of economic activity if we are to make this large country, with 16 or 18 different regions, work.

Those are two alternatives, Mr. Speaker. I shall now put forward a third alternative that to my knowledge has not been publicly formulated anywhere in Canada. The person who enunciated this doctrine is a Canadian, for which I give him full credit. His name is Mundell. For years he lectured at Waterloo. His quantitative analysis of those ideas followed over the years by our economic masters proved that those so-called truths are not truths at all; exactly the opposite is the case. Although this evidence has been accumulating for almost 15 years, it has not come to the attention of ministers of the Crown or ministerial advisers. Actually, there is a complete black-out of knowledge. There is no talk of the Mundell hypothesis.

● (2110)

Professor Laffer of the University of Chicago has also done quantitative analysis work confirming the correctness of the Mundell hypothesis. The hypothesis can now be described as the Mundell-Laffer hypothesis. In a nutshell, it says that assumptions which economists of all western nations have held to be truths are not truths at all. For instance, economists have assumed that when a country experiences a negative balance of trade in intangibles and tangibles, you should reduce the value of your currency.

Theoretically that move should automatically eliminate your international trade deficit. Actually it will not eliminate the deficit but increase inflation in direct proportion to the amount of devaluation.

Professor Laffer demonstrated with figures based on quantitative studies that our government advisers and the advisers to governments in most countries of western Europe have been following false doctrine. Conventional economists hold that if you have a deficit balance of trade you should automatically devaluate your currency. Yet West Germany, Taiwan, and Brazil have been doing very well by not following that doctrine.

I will not deal at length with the international ramifications of the Mundell-Laffer hypothesis. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) will speak in this debate tomorrow. He is much more capable than I am of explaining the mysteries of economic workings. I want to relate that particular hypothesis to the domestic stance our government ought to take at this time, to show that nearly everything we have done in the fiscal field for 30 years has been wrong.

By the way, for those hon. members interested in serious reading I recommend a royal commission report which came out in 1964. It traces the economic history of Department of Finance policies for 30 years. One truth emerges from the report, and it is this. All our advisers to the government have been constant in one thing: they have been constantly wrong, both in advising as to the direction the government should take and in timing. Read chapter 20. Hon. members will see that not only the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain talks this way. The royal commission report has been available for 12 years, but there is no evidence to show that elected representatives of the people have even read it. It would give them ammunition with which to challenge their advisers whose advice has resulted in the type of crap we have had in the last several budgets.

What would Mundell do in present day circumstances? Since our economic charts are slowly levelling off instead of rising, and since there is unused plant capacity and slack in the labour force, Mundell would advise a policy of fiscal ease. Some would call that a policy of budgetary expansion. But the expansion should not be brought about by increasing the deficit, not brought about simply by cutting taxes across the board to encourage people to spend more and spend their way out of recession. That is not what he means. Neither is he thinking of handouts or transfer payments. He suggests that in times like these we should make full use of our labour force and plant capacity. We should achieve our purposes by instituting tax cuts which will affect regions and industries. In that way we could fulfil our social purposes. For example, our steel industry for the next 30 years will have tremendous opportunity. Let us back the industry and encourage it to take advantage of its opportunity.

Our steel production figures should be rising steadily; instead, in 1976 we have witnessed a decline in steel production. Canada among the western nations can boldly compete with anyone in steel. We pay higher wages per hour, produce better steel, and do it more cheaply than our competitors. Why should we not back our steel industry and encourage it to expand in the west and in the maritimes?

I would not oppose something several speakers have mentioned in this debate, imaginative tax incentives to encourage export efforts. You will notice that I did not use the word "goods." In the next 25 or 30 years a great proportion of Canadian exports will not consist of goods.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, they will be raw materials.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Our exports will consist of the know-how of our people, of our engineers, miners, and scientists. Their expertise is needed in the Middle East, Africa, the Far East, and even in countries more sophisticated in certain respects than we are, for we are expert in certain fields. Mr. Speaker, in certain fields of knowledge we have developed expertise which is beyond price. Price is not the criterion. I should like to see tax reductions to encourage such export efforts. That is one alternative under the fiscal ease policy of the Mundell hypothesis.

The second point concerns capital accumulation. Members on both sides of the House have spoken of this many times in the last three or four years. When I talk of capital accumulation I talk of many facets of saving. First, we must consider straight savings. The high interest rates of today are not only killing industry and governments; they are killing people trying to build a home, start a business, or buy a farm. If you take a $50,000 mortgage for 30 years at 12 per cent, you will pay $150,000 in interest charges on top of the principal sum of $50,000. Seventy-five per cent of the cost of buying a home, starting a mine or opening a business, consists of interest charges. High interest rates are the common enemy of the government, the business world, and the consumer. I say that capital accumulation in any form is good.

I notice that there was faint praise for the minister because he increased the exemption under registered retirement savings plans to $5,500. I will not give him faint praise. I say it was a good thing to do. I hope my NDP friends remember that we have a labour force of between eight million and nine million people; half the homes of that labour force are paid for. Their kids are educated. They want to take advantage of a registered retirement savings plan, to add to their pension on top of their company's pension. When you look at the figures it becomes apparent that more than a few people are using these plans. I suggest that around four million Canadians are taking advantage of them. Pretty soon I hope six million or eight million will take advantage of them. I say to the minister, good for him. It is good to invest the money that way. Unfortunately some pension plans put money to nonproductive uses.

Then we must consider the question of equity. Equity is the key whereby Canadians as individuals will own their own country. They will not own their own country if the state takes everything over; they can only own it as individuals. This means that we must put money into equity in such a way that Canadians not only own the majority of our resource and manufacturing industries, but control them. I have spoken on this before, and I must put it very bluntly, Mr. Speaker. Unless Canadians as individuals take over the ownership of these companies, then what is happening so rapidly today will soon be over. Every time there is a problem, all the provincial government and federal government advisers can say is socialize them. If we continue taking over industry at the rate we are moving today in the so-called enterprise parties, by the year 1990 all the money earned by Canadians will come from government owned institutions.

● (2120)

There are some who would advocate that, but certainly not the NDP because they could not get any members elected if they did. It is coming from our civil servants who believe that the individual businessman, farmer, or labour union is not competent to make his or their own decisions. Therefore this question of accumulating capital through equity is the key.

The second type of savings is the more rapid circulation of money. I congratulate the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), who was here a moment ago, for accepting the proposal I made to him some time ago, in that in so far as northern oil and gas is concerned we are taking off front end loading charges and not taxing them until they get their debt paid off. Then we will take a much larger percentage than we would have got before. I say congratulations are due to that minister for accepting that principle and listening to ideas from this side.

I ask the government and the people of Canada to realize that if you are going to get these huge interest payments down, you have to speed up the flow of capital. If you can pay off a debt in four years instead of 12 years, that is the same as having three times as much money. If there is three times as much money in Canada, interest rates have to come down. The Keynesians say that if we print more money, interest rates will have to come down. This has been proved wrong for 30 years.

We have to increase the amount of capital, with hopefully more and more going into equity. However, before you can ask someone to go into equity you have to get governments off his back in order to allow him to earn some dividends on his equity. Then he has something at the end of his life instead of it all being taken away by inflation and taxation.

More rapid circulation could be applied, not just to northern gas, but to all capital intensive enterprises. In that I include homes for our people. I gave the example of taking 30 years to pay off a $50,000 mortgage. Cut that time to ten years and you cut the interest rate from $150,000 to $27,000. There is a $123,000 saving by the fast payout. Give the money to somebody else and get the interest rates down.

I sit here and writhe as I see young people taking on horrendous mortages, knowing they will be in debt until they are old men and women, when there is a way to get away from it. The answer, as Mundell points out, is to get back to some old fashioned economics; when interest rates are high pay the debts off quickly. That is simple.

The third point I want to bring up under the Mundell-Laffer hypothesis is labour management. I am glad to see the former Minister of Labour, now Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), in the House. He knows the truth of what I am going to say. One of the people to get all the blame for high costs is labour. In trying to protect themselves from high interest costs, land costs, and government costs, they grab for more and more in order to stay in the race. This becomes part of the cost-push and they get all the blame for it.

The minister knows there is a better way of doing these things. We have an example, not of the controls the government is using, but of a story that was leaked about a month ago, May 4. A union which had been constantly fighting management, and management constantly fighting the union, came to light in a report in the Globe and Mail of May 4. It actually appeared in the Vancouver Sun the day before. I quote:

> Canada's West Coast grain handling industry and the grain handlers union have taken a far-reaching and unprecedented step by agreeing to submit their differences over wages in a new agreement to arbitration.

One of the union men said:

> —the move to arbitration was taken because the union in no circumstances could be a party to halting the flow of grain through West Coast ports.
>
> It would have been disastrous for all concerned.

It would have been disastrous for management, union men, the consumer, and the farmer. Editorials came out stating how wonderful it was that some guys had agreed to something. The minister knows what I am getting at. I say that when the full story is told, it will be found that that story started here in the House of Commons and the minister is present who asked me the question. A group of members of parliament went out and took a little part in that. God bless them, they kept quiet this past year and a half and let the deal jell. Now we have the union and management agreeing.

Strikes are not necessary. We all lose with strikes. Mutual advantage says we should get rid of them. Indeed when the full story is told we can take this precedent and move it into many other sections of industry where we can measure quantitatively the amount of production, find out what the men want, and what management wants. We can get them both on the road and stop these absurd strikes without any law at all. All that is necessary is mutual observation and advantage. My time is running out, but I wish to ask this question. What was there in this budget to encourage labour and management to put an end to the obsolete confrontations that have developed over the past 30 years?

I will not say anything more about the cost of government or urban land costs. I have spoken on those subjects before. I want to conclude by simply saying that in this budget—tackling a few things, not causing any waves—there was no attempt whatever to use the time that the price and wage controls give to government to get at the six structural causes of inflation.

The government is betraying the people of Canada by forcing these controls. It is taking away the right of men and management to meet and deal as equals. It is not using the time on things which are well known. This is nothing more than a straight John Turner budget. It is nothing but civil service gobbledygook, trying to prove theories that were proven wrong 30 years ago. This budget cannot be supported by people who believe in growth, and the Conservative party went on record today, in the words of its leader, as the party of growth in Canada, and there we stand.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, about 12 days ago, on the first day of this debate, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) made a very accurate observation. He stated that the greatest contradiction of the Conservative position on this budget was the suggestion that the government could at one and the same time cut spending, cut taxes, and cut its deficit, while stimulating faster growth and employment. When asked to explain how to accomplish this feat, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) replied that it was because the private sector was going to be given a chance. Not even the Canadian Chamber of Commerce would subscribe to such nonsense.

In its pre-budget brief to the government the Canadian Chamber of Commerce stated that if it was considered necessary to inject some stimulus into the economy in order to alleviate high unemployment, there should be a tax reduction to provide an investment incentive. However, the chamber clearly recognized that such a cut would reduce government revenues and add to the prospective cash deficit for the current year. The chamber maintained that the proposal should not exceed that which they forecast for last year of $5.5 billion. The actual cash requirement was almost $1 billion below that of last year, and the government expects it will be about the same level this year, which is well below the maximum prescribed by the Chamber of Commerce.

● (2130)

In his speech the hon. member for York-Simcoe alleged that the accumulated deficits of the government would come to about $11.5 billion—presumably, from the context of his remarks, he came to that conclusion on a national accounts basis—by the end of this year. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the net deficit from 1968-69 to that projected for the current fiscal year amounts to $7.7 billion, which means a difference, a discrepancy, an error, of nearly $4 billion on the part of the financial critic of the Conservative party.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what kind of a leader, and what kind of a position in the country can that party expect to have in the eyes of Canadians when their financial critic makes a mistake of $4 billion in a major speech in this debate? If I can express a hope, Mr. Speaker, give us back any time the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies); we would welcome him back. The greatest sin that he committed was that of contradicting himself once every six months, but he certainly never made mistakes of this magnitude.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe complained that since 1968 direct personal taxes, as a share of total federal revenue, had increased from 34 per cent to around 53 per cent, whereas the share of corporate tax revenue had remained constant at 15 per cent. It should be pointed out here that the hon. member's figures are once again in error. He has compared the revenues from personal tax in 1968 on a budgetary basis with those projected for the current year on a national accounts basis, which of course, Mr. Speaker, is like comparing apples and oranges, something that the hon. member for York-Simcoe frequently does.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

On a national accounts basis, personal direct taxes accounted for about 40 per cent of total federal revenues in 1968, not 34 per cent. They are forecast to represent around 53 per cent of total revenues in the current fiscal year.

While the hon. member for York-Simcoe condemns the increase in federal spending in recent years and the size of federal deficits, he conveniently ignores the fact that rarely a day goes by in this House of Commons when a member of the Conservative party does not press either for increased expenditure for this or that purpose—sometimes expenditures involving tens of millions of dollars—or opposes increased charges for public services or reduced subsidies aimed at reducing the deficit of the treasury.

This great financial critic of the Conservative party ignores an even more fundamental fact, that the admittedly large increase in government spending of the last few years has primarily been due to these two factors: first, the impact of inflation on the government's own cost of providing goods and services; secondly, increases in government expenditures undertaken to ease the adverse impact on the Canadian people of inflation and recession.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe accused the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) of "fiddling" and "diddling" and cooking the books—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: That is the best line you have had all evening.

Mr. Caccia: —misrepresenting charges, and so on. He complained that the main estimates tabled earlier this year projected expenditures by the Post Office of $981 million in 1975-76, whereas the budget papers tabled by the finance minister showed expenditures for last year of only $901 million. Since the increase in Post Office expenditures projected in the estimates for the current year would be significantly more when compared to actual expenditures last year, as opposed to the projection contained in the main estimates, the member proposed to lop $95 million off the total for the current year. However, the member failed to take account of a very simple fact, namely, the prolonged strike of postal workers last year which resulted in expenditures being significantly less than provided for in the estimates. Surely not even the hon. member for York-Simcoe would advocate a repeat of this kind of enforced cost control.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe contends that because of other similar differences between spending projections in the main estimates prepared last December and preliminary actual spending projections contained in the budget papers, there was room for a saving totalling $225 million. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is, of course, the most specious kind of argument.

The hon. member maintains that some $410 million can be saved from the non-budgetary side of the accounts, but does not tell us where he proposes to make cutbacks. He proposes to slash spending under the heading of "professional and special services" by $250 million. Coming from a Conservative, this is the greatest proposal for spending reductions! He apparently chooses to remain oblivious to the fact that expenditures under this category are for services and facilities which are acquired from outside the federal government, because they can be obtained at considerably less cost than if we tried to provide them through government agencies.

Nearly 40 per cent of the total, for example, goes to purchase educational and manpower training services from the provinces. Large outlays are also incurred to purchase outside computer services, private security services, medical services, and to obtain legal and architectural services which in many instances can be provided far more efficiently by the private sector than by the government itself. Yet we have the hon. member for York-Simcoe, that great financial critic, expounding a theory which is diametrically opposed to that of his party.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the member proposes to save $140 million through administrative savings and amalgamating existing departments, or phasing out federal operations which overlap provincial operations. The hon. member proposed to make about $140 million disappear, but he was reluctant to tell us how he would do it. There is, however, a particular obligation upon this great financial critic—and as I say, give us back the hon. member for Don Valley any time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: There is an obligation on him in view of the fact that at their last policy convention the Tories approved several measures which would have the effect of significantly increasing the number of federal departments and agencies. When examined in detail in quickly becomes apparent that the "savings" of more than $1 billion conjured up by the hon. member for York-Simcoe are nothing more than the stuff that dreams are made of.

The amendment before us speaks of the failure on the part of the government to realize job creation. I should like to put on the record for the benefit of hon. members, in case their memories are short, the record of job creation on the part of the Liberal government. If we look at the job creation statistics that have been provided by OECD—and no one can claim that OECD statistics are partisan so far as Canadian politics are concerned—we find 472,000 jobs approximately were created between 1970 and 1972, 394,000 in 1972-73, 393,000 in 1973-74, and between 1974 and the last quarter of 1975, 552,000 new jobs, for a total of 1,811,000 new jobs created, and this is in a country with a population of only 22 million people. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, is that not a fantastic performance in job creation in this country?

● (2140)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: Let us consider for a moment this lack of confidence on the part of the Tories in this great nation of ours. Does this mean there is a lack of confidence in Canada when we have foreign investment pouring in every year?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: Surely the rest of the world is looking at Canada as the safest place to invest its money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: How about the lack of confidence on the part of Canadians when they purchase Canada Savings Bonds in record time when they are put on sale in the market? How about that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: How about the hundreds of thousands of people each year who apply for immigrant status to come to Canada because they think Canada is the place they would like to settle? How about that for lack of confidence?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: If anyone has a lack of confidence in Canada it is the Conservative party. That is what their amendment is all about. The amendment speaks about the lack of long-term growth and job potential and economic growth. It speaks of the lack of ability to create jobs.

This afternoon we heard from the new leader of the Conservative party. I could not help but think of the good old times when the leader of the Conservative party was the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), and I think of that party's lack of confidence in that leader. That was really shocking to the whole country when they dumped their leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: It was your decision, and it is up to you to draw your own conclusions. Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the government for its ability in steering a fine course at a very difficult financial moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Section 7 of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

[Translation]

The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Call in the members.

● (2150)

[English]

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Stevens) which was negatived on the following division:

The Budget—Mr. Caccia

(Division No. 138)

YEAS

Messrs.

Alexander
Alkenbrack
Andre (Calgary Centre)
Baker
(Grenville-Carleton)
Baldwin
Balfour
Bawden
Beatty
Beaudoin
Benjamin
Blackburn
Brewin
Brisco
Cadieu
Clark
(Rocky Mountain)
Coates
Cossitt
Crouse
Darling
Dick
Dionne
(Kamouraska)
Douglas
(Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands)
Elzinga
Epp
Fairweather
Fortin
Friesen
Gauthier
(Roberval)
Gillies
Grafftey
Halliday
Hamilton
(Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain)
Hargrave
Hees
Hnatyshyn
Hogan
Holmes
Horner
Howie
Huntington
Hurlburt
Jarvis
Jelinek
Johnston
Kempling
Knowles
(Winnipeg North Centre)
Knowles
(Norfolk-Haldimand)
Lambert
(Edmonton West)
La Salle
Lawrence
MacDonald (Miss)
(Kingston and the Islands)
MacKay
MacLean
Macquarrie
Marshall
Masniuk
Mazankowski
McCain
McCleave
McGrath
McKenzie
McKinley
McKinnon
Mitges
Munro
(Esquimalt-Saanich)
Murta
Neil
Nowlan
Oberle
O'Sullivan
Paproski
Patterson
Ritchie
Rodriguez
Rynard
Saltsman
Schellenberger
Scott
Skoreyko
Smith
(Churchill)
Stanfield
Stevens
Stewart
(Marquette)
Symes
Wagner
Wenman
Whiteway
Whittaker
Woolliams
Yewchuk—90

NAYS

Messrs

Abbott
Allmand
Anderson
Andres
(Lincoln)
Appolloni (Mrs.)
Baker
(Gander-Twillingate)
Béchard
Bégin (Miss)
Blais
Blaker
Blouin
Boulanger
Breau
Buchanan
Bussières
Caccia
Cafik
Campagnolo (Mrs.)
Campbell (Miss)
(South Western Nova)
Caron
Chrétien
Clermont
Collenette
Comtois
Condon
Corbin
Corriveau
Côté
Cullen
Cyr
Daudlin
De Bané
Demers
Dionne
(Northumberland-Miramichi)
Douglas
(Bruce-Grey)
Drury
Duclos
Dupont
Dupras
Duquet
Ethier
Faulkner
Fleming
Fox
Francis
Gendron
Gillespie
Goodale
Gray
Guay
(St. Boniface)
Guay
(Lévis)
Guilbault
Haidasz
Harquail
Herbert

Messrs.

Hopkins Isabelle
Jamieson
Joyal
Kaplan
Lachance
Lajoie
Lalonde
Landers
Lang
Langlois
Laniel
Lapointe
Leblanc
(Laurier)
LeBlanc
(Westmorland-Kent)
Lee
Lefebvre
Lessard
Loiselle
(Chambly)
Loiselle
(Saint-Henri)
Lumley
MacDonald
(Cardigan)
Macdonald
(Rosedale)
MacFarlane
MacGuigan
Mackasey
Maine
Marceau
Marchand
(Langelier)
Marchand
(Kamloops-Cariboo)
Martin
McIsaac
McRae
Milne
Nicholson (Miss)
Olivier
Ouellet
Pearsall
Philbrook
Pinard
Portelance
Poulin
Prud'homme
Railton
Raines
Reid
Roberts
Robinson
Rompkey
Rooney
Roy
(Timmins)
Roy
(Laval)
Sauvé (Mrs.)
Sharp
Smith
(Saint-Jean)
Stanbury
Stewart
(Cochrane)
Stollery
Tessier
Trudeau
Trudel
Turner
Watson
Whelan
Yanakis
Young—121

● (2210)

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the amendment lost.

It being after ten o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.13 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 9, 1976

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE QUEEN

ALLEGED UNDERMINING BY GOVERNMENT OF POSITION AS QUEEN OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, which has to do with the latest issue by Canada Post of a philatelic description of postage stamps commemorating the 1976 Olympic games. In this one, as in other similar pamphlets issued earlier, Queen Elizabeth The Second of Canada is not mentioned. The reference to the opening of the Olympic games is, and I quote, "The Head of State normally declares the games open". This is another example of the way in which the Queen is being by-passed, and corresponds with some recent speeches made by the Prime Minister in which he refers to her as Queen of England, a gratuitous injustice to her, and contempt of the provisions of the Constitution and of Parliament, of which she is an integral part. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House views with deep concern the manner in which the Trudeau government is endeavouring to undermine the position the Queen occupies as Queen of Canada by avoiding any mention of her.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FINANCE

PROPOSAL TO CALL JOHN TURNER BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN MISMANAGEMENT OF PUBLIC FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that projected government spending is $700 million more than last year with an estimated deficit of $5 billion at a time when the government is calling for restraint and in light of the fact that the former Minister of Finance, John Turner, was instrumental in developing during his term this fiscal mismanagement which has no precedent in the annals of handling public finance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

● (1410)

That this House instruct Mr. John Turner to appear before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to account for and explain his mismanagement of public funds.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL TO BUILD TANK IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that we are negotiating a deal with West Germany for the Leopard tank which involves an expenditure of some $150 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan):

That the minister investigate the feasibility of building our own tank in Canada, which could reduce unemployment as well as instill a little self-confidence and pride in Canadians, and that we name this new Canadian built tank "The Beaver".

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

ENERGY

SUGGESTED MASTER PLAN FOR PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTRICITY TO EASTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert J. Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an urgent and pressing matter pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the sharing of the electric power product of generating facilities using renewable resources and lowest cost fuels is an urgent need for all Canadian consumers, and whereas the Atlantic provinces and Quebec have tremendous unused potential development sites for power and industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion be directed to contact representatives of each of the government of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces and work with them in a spirit of co-operation to produce a master plan for the production, transmission and distribution of electric power and energy at the lowest possible cost in an eastern Canadian power pool.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DELEGATION FROM ICELAND

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before proceeding to the oral question period I wonder if I might ask hon. members to permit me to call attention to the presence in our gallery of a distinguished delegation from Iceland led by their most distinguished Speaker of the Upper House, Mr. Speaker Kristjansson.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON OWNERSHIPS OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister has announced that a 200 mile limit would come into effect by January 1, 1977. In light of this statement of intent, why has not more been done to reach agreement with the provinces over the ownership of the resources on the seabed and in the subsoil, so that oil and gas companies might be encouraged to increase their exploration activity in these areas? Will the minister make a statement of government policy concerning this matter in the House in the near future?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of negotiations between the federal government and the provinces with respect to the off-shore resources is not directly under my department, but I will draw the attention of the Prime Minister to it.

[Mr. Howie.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED INABILITY TO PATROL FISHERIES ZONE IF EXTENDED 200 MILES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): According to Ambassador Beesley who is Canada's major negotiator at the perennial Law of the Sea Conference, we do not have the ships, the planes or the manpower to do the necessary patrol work in a 200 mile area. In light of this criticism I should like to ask the minister what steps the government is planning to take to remedy this inexcusable shortfall in equipment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think I will have to speak to Ambassador Beesley.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASED RESEARCH IF FISHERIES ZONE EXTENDED 200 MILES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the same minister. The Minister of Fisheries in his address to ICNAF yesterday recognized that a massive surveillance effort is required and also that our budget for research should be doubled or trebled. This is something which has been pointed out to both ministers in the past. I wonder if the minister would indicate what the position of the government is with regard to a co-ordination of effort on the massive area Canada will have to protect, provide surveillance for and patrol. In addition, what are the intentions of the government coincidentally with the establishment of the 200 mile fishing limit with regard to doubling and trebling our research effort?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when I made my statement giving the government's decision to extend our jurisdiction, the main element in the protection of our fisheries zone would be the consent and the acquiescence of other states which normally fish in what will be Canadian waters. In the absence of that consent, acceptance or acquiescence there would be very little effect derived from surveillance activities, as has been demonstrated in other cases. Because we have worked out, through bilateral negotiations with other countries, arrangements which will respect our jurisdiction, we believe that the surveillance role, while important, does not assume the same importance as the acquiescence of the other countries.

As I understand the arrangements under the system of extended jurisdiction, foreign vessels fishing in the Canadian economic zone would be there under licence from the government of Canada. It seems to me that the possibility of losing that licence should act as a very strong deterrent from infringing any of the Canadian regulations, and I believe it will be possible under that kind of regime to enforce Canadian jurisdiction. I should repeat what I have already said, that there has been at work within the government a task force preparing for the time when Canada will exercise its jurisdiction, and plans are being made to ensure that surveillance and enforcement can be carried out.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PLANS TO PATROL EXTENDED FISHERIES ZONE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I agree with the minister that acquiescence would be the solution to the problem. However, in view of the fact that in the past, even with the ICNAF quotas agreed to by foreign nations—and I hesitate to mention particularly Russia, which ignored all the quotas it agreed to—I wonder if the minister would now be prepared, as I asked in my motion yesterday, to make a statement on motions with regard to this interdepartmental committee and with regard to what the actions of the committee are, and would he have referred to a combined committee of those departments responsibility to discuss the matter in order to get an agreement on Canada's position for the future?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think it would be a good idea, at the appropriate time, to make a statement giving the House all the relevant information on the plans which have been put in place to enforce and patrol waters under Canadian jurisdiction, and I would consider doing that, probably not this session, but I or my colleague the Minister of State (Fisheries) may do it early in the new session.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF WASTE MATERIAL INTO ATHABASCA RIVER BY GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS—REASON FOR DELAY IN GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment regarding reports that Great Canadian Oil Sands of Fort McMurray, Alberta is pumping 400,000 gallons per day of waste from its tailings into the Athabasca River despite the fact that its permit to operate requires it to keep its tailings in self-contained pits. I want to ask the minister how long his department has been aware of this situation, what steps have been taken to stop this deplorable state of affairs, and if he can tell us, following his visit to that area, what action he proposes to take now to stop this inexcusable and illegal dumping of toxic materials into the Athabasca River.

● (1420)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think it is true that some polluted water is discharged into the Athabasca River. As the hon. member mentioned, I was there last week—no, this week—or last week—anyhow I visited—

Mr. Epp: Where are you now?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): When I listen to you I do not know; it may be heaven or hell. As you know, we had a report on this particular problem last year and the province contacted the company and they are now in the process of correcting this situation. There is about 400,000 gallons of water which is discharged into the river which is a large amount. Relatively, of course, we cannot say it is a disaster but it has to be corrected. The company is committed to correcting it and they are taking steps to do so before 1977.

An hon. Member: The minister is a disaster.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that this situation has existed for some two years, and in view of the fact under the Canada Waters Act passed by parliament in 1970 the minister has the authority under section 9 by agreement to set up water quality management areas and under section 16 to do so unilaterally if the province does not agree, may I ask why this situation has been allowed to go on so long? Why could not water quality management areas have been set up. Is it the minister's intention now to establish one in the Fort McMurray area?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is under the Canada Waters Act we can act but under the Fisheries Act where we have the real power. We could do it, but we have chosen to try to collaborate with the province of Alberta in order to have the standards respected and that is in the process of being done. Why it has not been done for two or three years—it is anybody's answer.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON TOXICITY TEST OF WASTE WATER DISCHARGED INTO ATHABASCA RIVER BY GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister still has not told the House what steps he intends to take. In view of the fact that the report prepared by his department in conjunction with the provincial authorities in 1975, based on tests taken in August, 1974 showed that the waste water had excessive toxic content and also the fact that the public interest groups have not been able to get copies of the results of those tests, may I ask the minister if he is prepared to table in the House the toxicity test of the waste being discharged into the Athabasca River by Great Canadian Oil Sands?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as far as the last part of the question is concerned, I have the report here and am ready to table it at any time.

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY IF GOVERNMENT REJECTED REQUEST FOR $40 MILLION IN AID FOR MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As a result of the meeting held yesterday between some ministers and the APU representative, La Presse reported this morning that there is every reason to believe that the Canadian government will not change its present policy with regard to the $40 million requested by milk producers to face present problems. Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us today whether it is true that the difference will not be made up in any way by the federal government? I should like the minister to indicate clearly whether or not the request for special assistance in the form of $40 million has definitely been rejected by the government?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we never intimated to them that we were going to give them the $40 million. We told them of the processes that were taking place with the subcommittee that is presently meeting and had been meeting for three or four weeks to review the situation. I repeated what I had said in the Agriculture Committee about farm credit when it was discussed there, and said that we would be very lenient with those people who possibly got into trouble with repayment through no fault of their own. We compounded that action yesterday. We have already said the same thing to other dairy producing provinces that are making the same kind of representation. Yesterday I told the people who were here from Quebec the same thing that I told their executive members last Thursday—that I have to act as Minister of Agriculture for all industrial dairy producers in Canada, not just one province.

[Translation]

POSSIBILITY OF OTHER MEASURES TO AID MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In view of the minister's reply, can he tell us whether, to make up their losses, the producers can recuperate those $40 million, and whether the government might not be willing to pay, in part or in whole, those $40 million; and also whether he will take more efficient means than merely making farm credit conditions more flexible to solve the problem?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, what we are mainly concerned about and what the committee is presently reviewing is the present supply position, how much quotas can be cut back and whether the penalty of $8.60 per hundredweight is too severe. If that can be relaxed in any way it would mean tremendous savings to dairy farmers.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED USE OF SMALLER CRAFT RATHER THAN DESTROYERS FOR FISHERIES PATROL WORK

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my first question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since he has stated that one of the roles of the Canadian navy is to patrol the extra 200-mile fisheries zone and since, according to reports, he learned from seamen during a recent trip to the west coast that they do not relish this role, can he say why the government has never considered building smaller craft especially designed for this purpose, since it costs $4,000 a day to operate a destroyer on patrol?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, quite honestly, I cannot see the positive side of that suggestion. If the hon. member is suggesting that smaller ships can do the job more cheaply, perhaps he is right. I take it he is not also suggesting that we should have no destroyers in the Canadian navy. The point is, we have destroyers in the Canadian navy. They are good ships and well manned. There is no war on at present and we are having them do some of this work which is helpful for the preservation of Canadian sovereignty.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF FISHERIES ZONE 200 MILES—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES ON BOUNDARIES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my first supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since he announced the other day that Canada would extend its fisheries zone on January 1, whereas I understand that the United States will not extend its zone until March, I wonder if the Canadian action has been taken in order to extend the boundaries between the two zones in a manner most favourable to Canada or whether there have been conversations as to where the zones will come together.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unquestionably, the action taken by the Congress, Senate and President of the United States in passing the law to bring into effect the jurisdiction of that country on March 1 had a bearing on the over-all action taken by Canada, but not necessarily on the timing. As my statement indicated, we will ensure that the 200-mile fishing zone is in place by January 1, 1977. It could happen earlier; probably it will not.

With respect to the boundary question, there have already been discussions with the United States on this subject. Recently, when I advised Secretary Kissinger of proposed Canadian action, I suggested that early attention ought to be paid by both governments to the question of boundary disputes, or boundary arrangements between the two countries. I hope these discussions will begin at an early date. We have not set a date at the moment but I hope the discussions will begin soon so that this aspect of our bilateral relations will not flare up into a matter of difficulty.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MONETARY COMMITMENT TO ENSURE SUPPLY OF POTABLE WATER THROUGHOUT WORLD

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Prime Minister? In view of the objectives set by the Minister of Justice and other officials at Habitat, namely, that the world should establish 1990 as the target date for ensuring the supply of fresh, clean water throughout the world, is the government of Canada prepared, before the end of Habitat, to make a definite commitment, a dollar commitment, that it will help to clean up the world's water supplies?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that Canada's commitment in this area is already very high. I believe a statement will be made there. I do not have all the figures, but I believe something like $200 million has been spent through our external aid program to help supply clean water to those countries which want that to be done. However, it is important for the hon. member to realize that our external aid programs are carried out under the aegis of co-operation. In other words, we do not go to a country and impose our particular priorities on it. We discuss the expenditure of Canadian funds in co-operation with the national governments. Many of them have not yet come to the conclusion that clean water is their first priority and they are asking us to spend money on other things. In that sense, I would not feel it proper for Canada to set an absolute figure now and say that we are going to spend it whether the recipient country likes it or not. We are acting in a way whereby we hope they will realize that Canada is prepared to give this priority, but they have to come to that conclusion themselves.

Mr. Wenman: I expect that both the demand and the priority will be made well known and, in fact, has been made well known at Habitat. Is the government prepared to supplement the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of the Environment to ensure that all Canadians can be certain of a supply of safe, clean, fresh water by 1980?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is indeed a strange question. If any Canadians are deprived of a supply of clean water, I do not believe it is because of a lack of action on the part of the federal government. There is a lot of clean water in Canada. There is more that we are cleaning up. Of course, the provinces, municipalities and the federal government have to decide that is where the money should be spent. If the hon. member is just suggesting that we increase our expenditures for that particular purpose, I say to him that we are in a period of restraint. It would be more important to identify areas where we could cut back in order to supply clean water to those communities which presumably do not yet have it.

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER CONCERNING AMOUNT OF AID FROM CANADA TO ENSURE POTABLE WATER SUPPLY FOR THE WORLD

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. It deals with Habitat and the clean water project. The minister is quoted in this morning's Globe and Mail, dealing with Canada's foreign aid and particularly the clean water project, as saying and I quote:

> How much can we deprive Canadians of their so-called standard of living without being defeated in the next election.

As a matter of fact, many Canadians do not regard that as a crisis or a fate beyond living with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: I find this rather strange. If the minister has been misquoted, I would like to give him the opportunity of correcting it. Did the minister mean by that statement Canada should reduce its foreign aid commitment in order to increase its commitments domestically, particularly in terms of clean water? Is it the intention of the minister to increase expenditures with respect to the Great Lakes cleanup which has been the subject matter of very exhaustive and disturbing reports lately? What did the minister mean by that statement in this morning's Globe and Mail?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would be better advised to ask the Globe and Mail reporter what he meant before excerpting a sentence from an interview of half an hour expressing an idea which was not said in that sense. What I said is very simple. I said: I was asked whether we should increase Canada's foreign aid commitment because other countries have problems. As far as I am concerned, I think we should. We have to decide to what extent we can do so before the Canadian population reacts. This is the meaning of my intervention, and there is no other. Almost all the Globe and Mail can do is to report completely mistaken views of what one says.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Now that the Prime Minister has expressed his views on pure water, conspiracy, of love and problems of poverty, is he going to invite some poor kids to swim in his pool this summer?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: No, answer, Mr. Speaker? That was a serious question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ATTITUDE OF CONSERVATIVE PARTY TOWARDS BILL C-242

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader. Will he undertake to consult with his counterpart in the Progressive Conservative party to try to ascertain whether that party is going to continue to block passage of Bill C-242—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

COMMUNICATIONS

PROPOSED USE OF BALANCED ARMATURE RECEIVER BY BELL TELEPHONE—REQUEST FOR DELAY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, I will direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Bell Telephone Company will begin this July to place a device called a "balanced armature receiver" in their telephones, and in view of the fact that this device is not compatible with the use of hearing aids or with the use of Teletype machines in the homes of the completely deaf because of the low magnetic field it produces, can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will intervene with Bell Telephone with regard to withholding implementation of the new receiver until the company finds a solution to the problem in the same manner as it has done in the United States?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the organization involved has had extensive talks with Bell Telephone Company. There have been some difficulties, but I believe the CRTC is trying to play a role as an intervener in order to bring them to some point of co-operation.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that the CRTC has not been able to resolve the problem between the company and the organization of Canadians with disabled hearing, will the minister now intervene and ask the Bell Telephone Company to install the same kind of coil they install in their telephones in the United States in order that those with hearing disabilities will have the right to communicate?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly bring that to the attention of the CRTC so that as the discussions continue, they will be aware of the hon. member's views.

* * *

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS OF CANADIAN NATIONAL AND AIR CANADA TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Due to the great concern across this country with regard to rail and air passenger traffic and the fact that both CN and Air Canada have tabled their annual reports, is the minister prepared to refer those reports to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to look at that and discuss the matter with the committee.

[Mr. Speaker.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DATE OF DECISION ON REORGANIZATION OF INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us what progress has been made by cabinet which has the question under discussion as to the restructuring or reorganization of the armed forces infrastructure in Canada? I ask this because there is great concern in many areas as to possible changes and the continued procrastination that is taking place is only causing further unrest.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They are better at asking questions than they are at hearing the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): My minister and his department have indeed prepared a forces structure review to present to cabinet. I understand it is before a cabinet committee but has not as yet been brought before the whole cabinet. As a consequence, nothing can be said about it until cabinet makes a decision.

● (1440)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Since the Prime Minister presides over cabinet would he assure the House that the question will be brought before cabinet at the earliest date in order to relieve the uncertainty and unrest felt not only amongst service personnel but among the civilian population in the areas concerned?

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member knows, the Minister of National Defence is in Europe attending the NATO meetings at the present time. It would be possible to bring this matter before cabinet now because we have such an excellent parliamentary secretary—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In spite of that, I think it would be better to await the return of the minister because he will have further information from his NATO colleagues and perhaps he will have further information for the hon. member who would then learn that the morale of our armed forces is very high.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF VICE-CHAIRMAN—NUMBER OF CANDIDATES INTERVIEWED

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the recent appointment of the Vice-Chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation. In view of the fact that considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed about this appointment by those in the agriculture sector as well as by those in the Corporation itself, may I ask whether it is now government policy to ignore qualified personnel within the Corporation in favour of defeated Liberal candidates?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I do not think any man should be condemned because he takes part in the democratic process by offering himself to be elected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Yes, but he should know something about agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: He was elected and he served in a distinguished fashion in this House as far as I am concerned. He has a farm background; he graduated from the Ontario College of Agriculture; he has a knowledge of agriculture which I believe is basic. We needed someone from Eastern Canada to serve as vice-Chairman. I interviewed many people though I do not believe I received any recommendations from the hon. member. If I did, they were not quite as good.

Mr. Wise: I was in no way condemning the appointment of the new vice-Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Horner: I will condemn it!

Mr. Wise: Can the minister give us some indication of the number of candidates who were accorded interviews for the position?

An hon. Member: And whether their memberships were paid up.

Mr. Whelan: It is hard to say. I can tell the House that members on all sides did make recommendations to me about certain people who had served with distinction in elected positions and who could possibly fill the vacancy. It was public knowledge for many weeks that this position was open; I held it open purposely, hoping that distinguished Canadians would come forward and offer their services, but not many did.

* * *

[Translation]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MINISTER'S POSITION ON RIGHT OF QUEBEC TO DECIDE ON USE OF FRENCH

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

During a very special caucus last weekend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare reportedly stated that the federal government did not need the "crutch" of the Bourassa government to defend the rights of Francophones in Quebec. Did the minister mean that the government of the province of Quebec does not have at any time the responsibility to see that French is being used on its territory?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have repeated that, as a government, the defence and promotion of the French language in Canada are important priorities for the federal government and on that matter, we count on the full cooperation of all provincial governments including the government of the province of Quebec. But we also pointed out quite clearly that it is important for each government to promote and defend the French language within its own jurisdiction. If such were the case, I think the promotion of the French language and greater cooperation between both linguistic groups of Canada would be achieved much more rapidly and efficiently.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

Considering that Mr. Payeur from Quebec did not take kindly to the minister's statement last Sunday and that yesterday he reportedly sent the minister a telegram indicating the centralizing trends of the government, does the minister intend to reply to the telegram and to disclose its content for the benefits of all of us?

Mr. Lalonde: I have not yet gone through the whole text of the telegram. I will surely reply. As to disclosing the reply, I will see about it in due course. But once again my statement at the convention and the federal government's position on the matter of linguistic rights has nothing to do with the centralization or decentralization of powers at these various government levels. On the contrary, hopefully this matter should be a major priority for all levels of administration, whether provincial or federal.

* * *

[English]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING NATIONAL FOREST POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment—I have given him notice. It has to do with the lack of a national forest policy. Is it now the government's intention to accede to the many requests and recommendations from senior officials to announce a national forest policy? Can the hon. gentleman tell the House whether his officials are presently discussing with the provinces the implementation and structuring of such a policy?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): The hon. member will understand that I cannot elaborate a national forest policy without the co-operation of all the provinces; the federal government controls not more than 10 per cent of all the territory within which such a policy might apply. However, we are to have a meeting soon with the provincial ministers—some time next week, I believe—after which I may have some information for the hon. member.

Mr. Oberle: Could the minister elaborate on the areas in which the federal government is prepared to share a degree of responsibility with the provinces? Will the arrangements be similar to those agreed upon with the provinces in the past? Is the government prepared to assist in measures of fire control, pest control and measures to deal with the serious problems which are facing the provinces right now?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): These are some of the matters which are on the agenda so I cannot give the hon. member an answer today. Maybe later I shall be in a position to do so.

* * *

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADA ACQUIRING PROPER TYPE OF SWINE FLU VACCINE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the false starts made by one firm or perhaps more than one, in manufacturing vaccine of the old swine flu type instead of modernizing and incorporating the transmutations which have occurred in the interval may I ask the minister this: since Canada is buying vaccine in Australia, Europe and the U.S.A., can he assure the House he is getting the right type of vaccine, the modernized swine flu vaccine which affords much higher protection?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am advised by my officials that all the commitments we have obtained concerning the supply of vaccine completely meet Canadian standards in that respect.

Mr. Rynard: Has the minister been in touch with the manufacturing firms for reassurance on this point?

Mr. Lalonde: My officials are in continuing contact on this and other matters.

● (1450)

[Translation]

INQUIRY IF ONTARIO AND QUEBEC REQUESTED ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO PROVIDE SERVICES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the difficulties experienced by some governments, among which are Quebec and Ontario, to allocate funds to hospitals, so much so that some hospitals in various counties or rural areas will have to close their doors, could the minister tell us whether he had consultations with his provincial counterparts and if requests for additional subsidies have been made by those provinces to help them provide better medical care in Quebec and Ontario?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there was a federal-provincial conference of health ministers a few months ago. I must advise the hon. member that no province asked for additional federal funds under the hospitalization insurance scheme. As the hon. member knows, under that program the federal government provides 50 per cent of all operating costs of hospitals and this still remains entirely available to the provinces.

Any decision about the restriction in the provision of hospital services at this time would be exclusively made by the provincial authorities concerned.

* * *

[English]

ENERGY

SITE OF DUMP FOR RADIOACTIVE MATERIAL REMOVED FROM PORT HOPE—APPOINTMENT OF PROJECT MANAGER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to cleanup at Port Hope which was to have started on June 1. In view of the fact the minister has had recommendations from several of his advisers regarding alternative dumping sites, other than the Port Granby site, since at least April 7, is he in a position today to tell us where the material in respect of the Port Hope cleanup is to be dumped permanently?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, work is still going on in respect of this very important and difficult question. Several permanent dump sites were examined within the boundaries of Port Hope, but were found to be unacceptable on the part of the citizens and the council of Port Hope. We have been looking at surrounding municipalities and they have rather the same attitude as does Port Hope. I must say that the various agencies involved, the task force in particular, are seeking an acceptable site some distance from Port Hope. This is going to require additional studies and, indeed, probably some tests in respect of the ground. I can assure the hon. member that we are going forward with this as quickly as we can. We have made arrangements for a temporary transitional site so that work can start and, indeed, I am told it did start on June 1. The program will be able to move forward with that transitional or temporary site, and the material stored there will eventually be moved to a permanent site.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the minister just once more to refer to the letter dated April 7 from the chairman of the federal-provincial task force on this matter which contained recommendations far removed from the Port Hope dump site. My supplementary question is, has a project manager for the cleanup operation been appointed by the government even yet?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there has been a project team in operation in Port Hope for some months. I believe if a formal appointment has not been made it will be made within a matter of days. In any event, I can assure the hon. member that is not a reason for any holdup.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

SUGGESTION MINISTER CONSIDER RETRACTING STATEMENTS ABOUT MR. STOPFORTH

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on June 1 the Minister of Supply and Services in this House denounced a senior public servant, Mr. Stopforth, accusing him of misleading the minister or of gross negligence. I read with great care what the minister said in the House and it seems to amount to the fact that the minister at one time was informed there was no information of Lockheed undertaking to put interim financing, and later he apparently discovered that Mr. Stopforth had heard of a telephone conversation between representatives of the Department of National Defence and Lockheed. I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the great possibility of a misunderstanding in this matter which is both complex and vague at the same time, the minister will review the whole matter and reconsider whether he should make a retraction in respect of the attack he made upon Mr. Stopforth?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should read my whole statement instead of quoting part of it. In addition, this matter will be dealt with in a proper manner at a proper time.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE REMOVED FOR ALLEGEDLY WITHHOLDING INFORMATION ABOUT LOCKHEED CONTRACT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services has removed a senior civil servant from his position because he withheld information from the minister concerning a verbal agreement between the Department of National Defence and Lockheed. The Minister of National Defence apparently withheld the same information from the Treasury Board and the Cabinet in much the same fashion, on the same subject. I should like to ask whether the Prime Minister is going to take similar action to that taken by the Minister of Supply and Services, and relieve the Minister of National Defence of his position, or is there to be a different rule for Cabinet ministers than for senior civil servants?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the facts are not at all like the hon. member seems to have understood them. First of all, it was not the minister who removed the civil servant. He has asked his deputy minister to proceed in the usual way to discipline this particular civil servant. The reason for that has been stated in the House by the hon. minister who had been giving the House wrong information on the basis of wrong information he had received. I expect the House finds it proper for the minister to correct the wrong information that he conveyed, and that is what the minister did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLEGED TEN PER CENT PREFERENCE TO NORTHERN CONTRACTORS FOR WORK IN THE NORTH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In a recent statement the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is reported to have said that contractors situated in northern Canada will be given a 10 per cent preference on all federal contracts tendered for the north. Is the minister satisfied that this additional leeway is necessary in order for northern contractors to compete effectively, because this could constitute a considerable increase in funds for northern projects?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with this particular statement, but I will be glad to look into it.

* * *

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

DATE OF TABLING ORDER FROM REPRESENTATION COMMISSIONER

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, under Section 22(1) of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act the Secretary of State apparently has received a representation order from the representation commissioner. If that is so, when will he be tabling it in the House? If he has not received it, has he been informed when he can expect to receive it?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into that and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Dick: That's what you said the last time I asked.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST MINISTER MAKE ALLEGATIONS CONCERNING MR. STOPFORTH OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary arises from the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. In light of the fact that statements made by parliamentarians in the House are privileged, would the Minister of Supply and Services be prepared, if he has not done so already, to make the same remarks with regard to Mr. Stopforth being guilty of misinformation or gross negligence, outside the House as he did in the Commons and, if not, why not?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question. This matter is going to be dealt with in a proper manner at an appropriate time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the question has not been answered. Will the minister say the same thing out of the House as he said in the Commons and, if not, why not?

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO SECURE INFORMATION ON FINANCING FROM REPRESENTATIVE ON MANAGEMENT BOARD

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, since Mr. Stopforth was deputy project manager only, reporting through General Allan to the management board, and the assistant deputy minister of supply and services was on the management board, at a higher level than Mr. Stopforth, will the Minister of Supply and Services indicate whether the management board was informed of the Lockheed finance discussions including the verbal agreement and, if so, will he say why that Lockheed information was not communicated to him through his senior representative on that management board?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I encourage the hon. member to read the minutes of proceedings of the parliamentary committee.

* * *

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST MR. STOPFORTH BE GIVEN OPPORTUNITY TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE TO CLEAR HIS NAME

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. On April 30, in answer to a request by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to have a written explanation regarding the actions of a senior public servant, the Prime Minister responded by saying that "by innuendo, he cast aspersions" on a civil servant who was by this simple request being "tarred" and smeared. In view of the expressed concern of the Prime Minister for civil servants and for justice, will he take the initiative to see that Mr. L. H. Stopforth is brought before a parliamentary committee so that this House and the Canadian people will know all the facts and, perhaps equally important, a man who has been a loyal public servant for many years will at least be given a chance to clear his name?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, assuming the hon. member is sincere in his desire to have Mr. Stopforth clear his name, I suggest that the best way of doing it is not by bringing him before a parliamentary committee where the Proceedings might be tainted with political input from both sides, but to follow the normal grievance procedure, of which he has several.

● (1500)

Mr. Bawden: What are they in detail?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I just want to re-emphasize what I answered a moment ago. The minister, properly in my view, felt embarrassed at having misinformed the House on several occasions by giving it wrong information. He felt, I believe again properly, that he should explain to the House that he had been given wrong information which he did. I expect the House would have then said: Why have you given wrong information? The answer is that he had received wrong information. This is the essence of the matter before us. If the conveyor of the wrong information is not guilty he will follow the procedures and be completely rehabilitated. If he is guilty, Mr. Speaker, I think that the discipline imposed on him will follow its course.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary by the hon. member for Calgary South.

AVENUES OPEN TO MR. STOPFORTH TO CLEAR HIS NAME

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the public servant in question has neither been fired nor demoted. Therefore he has no rights under the options explained by the minister, the House Leader and the Prime Minister, so perhaps the Prime Minister would explain just how this man's rights are to be upheld and how he will be given a chance to clear himself.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is some paradox in the hon. member showing concern for a civil servant and indicating that perhaps in order to get justice he should either be fired or have a loss in salary.

Mr. Paproski: He did not say that.

An hon. Member: We want to get at the truth.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the facts as alleged by the hon. member opposite indicate that the deputy minister, on behalf of the minister, showed a certain amount of moderation in the discipline. There was no demotion, no firing and no loss of salary. I do not know the details of what discipline was imposed. I understand he has moved sideways to another post at the same salary. If the man feels he has been unjustly treated there are recourses under the law. I understand he has either an appeal to the Federal Court or else he has a grievance procedure within the rules.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says "no". If that is the case presumably the man has suffered no grievance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why don't you go home and take a swim?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that full questioning and answering has taken place on this question. We are now beyond the limit of the question period. The right hon. member for Prince Albert on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—ANSWER GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege arising from a statement made yesterday afternoon by the Prime Minister that was totally untrue. I did not hear what he said at the time. I was not aware of it until this morning when I read the summary in the Globe and Mail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, these noisy interruptions indicate there are several varieties of animals over there. It is now confirmed by Hansard. He used these words concerning me:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, the question, as I answered in the first place, is hypothetical in its form. I have no cause to know what the answer to that hypothetical question would be. I do not have the advantage perhaps the hon. gentleman has of having phoned a judge.

The allegation is very clear. I know the sensibilities of the hon. gentleman when since the Sky Shops revelations it became unpopular to dial judges.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is wonderful to have such contributions from people who have no common sense whatsoever. The Prime Minister made it very clear that I had phoned a judge. I throw that back at him. It is false. It is not unusual for him to make false statements. That statement is completely false. It is a product of the Prime Minister's imagination in order to smear by innuendo. I have not spoken to, nor have I phoned any member of the Supreme Court of Canada regarding this matter, and that is final and complete.

Such allegations that are made by the Prime Minister, too often with that Machiavellian turn of mind, constitute a breach of the privileges of members of this House. If any one member said that, he would be subject to discipline. When the Prime Minister makes a false statement like that, with the vast prestige of his office, I would expect him to withdraw it unreservedly.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I never cease to be amazed at the reserves of synthetic indignation the right hon. gentleman has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot believe he is serious about this point of order, Mr. Speaker. But just in case he might be, and that the indignation is founded on something within him, I would remind the House of the circumstances of the exchange. The right hon. gentleman was asking, I believe twice in succession, the same question about would the government do such and so if the Supreme Court threw out the federal legislation, and in his repetition of his question it seemed apparent to me that he was assuming that this would be the result of the case.

I said it was not only hypothetical but was very pessimistic. This does not happen to be my view. As he seemed to be so sure that the federal government would lose the case, I said he must have more information than I have; I have not phoned a judge, perhaps he has. The hon. gentleman tells us he has not phoned a judge. I accept that. Perhaps he got it from God that we were going to lose the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Questions of privilege always create great difficulty. They are subject to several interpretations, depending on the circumstances. Often they relate to unparliamentary language, to interference in the performance of hon. members' duties, to contempt of parliament and a number of other factors. Often they relate to disagreements or grievances. In any case, there is no machinery under which the Chair is entitled to permit repeated interventions by hon. members.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert has expressed, by way of a question of privilege, indignation at the remarks made yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister. The right hon. Prime Minister has made a reply to that. Hon. members know that there is no process or procedure under which the Chair can permit a second intervention by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and presumably a second intervention by the right hon. Prime Minister.

The matter is closed. It is for the Chair to decide. No motion has been put forward. The right hon. member for Prince Albert has called for either a clarification or a withdrawal of the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister. It is not altogether certain whether or not this comes within the authority of the Chair under the provisions of questions of privilege, but in any case, the right hon. Prime Minister has indicated that he did not expect the matter would be taken seriously. In any case, it is entirely clear that the right hon. member for Prince Albert has not, in fact, contacted any member of the judiciary on this matter. This would seem to the Chair to close the question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was not given the opportunity to reply—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have not on this occasion, nor have I had on any previous occasions, a procedure which is known to me which would give me the right, with any sense of respect for the procedures that we have followed here traditionally, to allow one hon. member to participate more than once in a discussion on any point, whether it be procedural or substantive, and I think the matter should be closed at this point.

Business of the House

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Fourteenth report of Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, in both official languages.—Mr. Corbin.

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF BILL S-35

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that there have been discussions among the parties with relation to one of the rather minor bills which remains on the order paper for completion before June 30. I understand that agreement has been reached, and I now ask for unanimous consent that at 5.50 p.m. this afternoon the House shall consider third reading of Bill S-35.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There have such discussions, Mr. Speaker, and we are prepared to give unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a suggestion that the House give its consent that at 5.50 p.m. this afternoon the ordinary order of business be interrupted to permit consideration of the bill referred to by the President of the Privy Council. There seems to be agreement to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed, and so ordered.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the question period today the Minister of the Environment referred to a report prepared by his department with regard to the waste material being put into the Athabasca river by the Great Canadian Oil Sands at Fort McMurray, Alberta. Since the minister has left the House and will not be able to table that report, I ask the House leader if he would undertake to see that this is tabled according to the commitment which the minister made.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the question period the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore made reference to his Bill C-242. You called him to order in the course of that, Mr. Speaker, but there was sufficient on the record before you called him to order to leave the impression that the official opposition, as a party, was opposed to this private member's bill. I think it is important to indicate to the House of Commons that that is not so. As I have said, the hon. member's bill is a private members' bill, and in that sense enjoys support on all sides of the House.

The House will recall that at the outset of the debate an attempt was made to draw out the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council and me, the House leader of the opposition, as if there had been some form or arrangement between us representing our parties in the private members' hour. I want to say that both of us studiously avoided that kind of involvement. It is interesting to note, as well—if it is any comfort to my good friend, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore—that I spoke on second reading in support of the bill, and that those of our party who were on the committee which dealt with the bill spoke in favour of its principle. So I think there was general acceptance from all sides of the House to the priciple of the bill.

But I think it is important that we make it clear that private members' hour is just that, private members' hour, during which members of parliament can express their own personal views on the matters discussed. I want to make it extremely clear, especially to the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, who I know has laboured for a long period of time on this matter, that our party is not opposed to the principle set forth in this bill, and in fact a careful reading of the committee's hearings will indicate that that is so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suppose Your Honour might call it a point of grievance. During the question period, when the Minister of Agriculture was answering questions from the hon. member for Elgin about the appointment of a new vice-chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation, he indulged in one of those sweeping generalizations that we associate with him and that we enjoy, when he said he had had recommendations for this position from all sides of the House. I suggest that that was in error. I have checked, and I find no one in this party and no one in the Social Credit party made any such recommendations. I leave the Tories to speak for themselves. But I wish the minister would contain himself a bit, instead of making these wild generalizations.

Mr. Whelan: If I recollect correctly, I thought I said "from both sides of the House" . If I did say "from all sides", maybe that was erroneous. But I will have to check my memory again, because I think one member from the hon. member's party did make a suggestion to me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, that is not so.

[Later:]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make a brief addition to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It gives the Chair some difficulty to restrict the right of hon. members to intervene. I stopped the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore from putting what I thought was clearly an improper question. At best it was a representation, and in any case it was argumentive. I had several reasons for ruling it out of order. I allowed the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to raise it after the question period was over because we do not consider points of order during the question period, and even the putting of the question left an innuendo which there was no opportunity to answer. However, I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had a good answer on the matter and I really do not think it should be discussed any further.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF EXTRADITION TREATY WITH SWEDEN

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would like to table, in both official languages, the text of the new extradition treaty with Sweden.

* * *

● (1520)

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 5,038, 5,075 to 5,086 inclusive, 5,281, 5,342, 5,477 and 5,504.

[Text]

OLYMPICS ARTS AND CULTURE PROGRAMME

Question No. 5,038—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the purpose of the Olympics Arts and Culture Programme?

2. How much has been budgeted for the Cultural Olympics and what amount will the (a) government (b) Government of Quebec (c) COJO (d) remaining provinces and territories contribute?

3. What is the administrative cost of the programme, excluding the budget to pay entertainers, hotel costs and transportation?

4. Who are the members of the Cultural Olympics Committee and (a) what are their individual salaries (b) for what period of time are they hired (c) what degree of expertise has each?

5. What cities other than Montreal will play host to the Cultural Olympics?

6. How many advance tickets sales does the Arts and Culture Directorate of COJO anticipate and what is the expected revenue of such sales?

7. What is the expected revenue from total ticket sales?

8. What will the Arts and Culture Committee of COJO be responsible for during the Olympic Games other than staging the Cultural Olympics?

9. What is the total amount budgeted for the Arts and Culture Committee excluding the Cultural Olympics budget?

10. What federal departments or councils are involved in the Cultural Olympics?

11. If the Cultural Olympics budget falls short of defraying the costs of staging the events and programmes, is the government prepared to increase its share of financial contributions to support the events and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State, Canada Council and Treasury Board as follows: 1. This program does not fall under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Order Paper Questions

2. (a) The Government, through the Secretary of State Department, has agreed to provide some assistance, mainly to defray the transportation and hotel costs of entertainers and groups performing in the Montreal Cultural Festival. A sum of $1 million has been allocated for this purpose, with the Canada Council being responsible for administering the program. Concerning questions (b), (c) and (d) COJO informs us that: (b) $3 million; (c) $1¾ million; (d) $2 million*; an additional $½ million is contributed by private sources.

---

*estimated

3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. Not applicable.

10. The Touring Office of the Canada Council administers a fund of one million dollars specially allocated by the Secretary of State to cover the travel and accommodation costs of groups and artists participating in the Olympics Arts and Culture Programme.

11. Not applicable.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN MANITOBA

Question No. 5,075—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Manitoba for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	82	285	4	17
1966/67	23	672	2	10
1967/68	427	1786	13	65
1968/69	—	(166)	1	5
1969/70	515	422	4	110
1970/71	—	428	5	82
1971/72	20	293	5	18
1972/73	—	(293)	201	264
1973/74	340	1732	55	166
1974/75	(160)	(182)	114	230

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. Bracketed figures for English expenditures in 1968/69, 1972/73 and 1974/75 represent the net disposition of assets within the province, i.e. the net value of assets scrapped or otherwise written off because of obsolescence and charged to the reserves for depreciation. These figures represent the amount in excess of the value of assets purchased as replacements in that year.

Order Paper Questions

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN YUKON TERRITORY

Question No. 5,076—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Yukon Territory for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	Radio (000's)	Radio/TV (000's)
1965/66	—	3
1966/67	—	21
1967/68	—	12
1968/69	—	—
1969/70	18	395
1970/71	—	34
1971/72	—	117
1972/73	—	14
1973/74	—	72
1974/75	14	58

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. The figures given are for English investment only. There was no French investment during this period.

3. The "Radio/TV" designation represents costs for rebroadcast units and transmitters used for both radio and television service.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 5,077—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Saskatchewan for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio (000's)	TV	Radio (000's)	TV
1965/66	6	34	—	—
1966/67	—	2	—	—
1967/68	8	1	—	—
1968/69	7	—	—	—
1969/70	193	1447	—	—
1970/71	48	226	—	—
1971/72	17	1275	—	—
1972/73	15	59	—	—
1973/74	17	109	—	—
1974/75	57	917	150	—

NOTE: The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 5,078—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of British Columbia for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio (000's)	TV	Radio (000's)	TV
1965/66	113	259	—	—
1966/67	172	282	—	—
1967/68	606	1546	—	—
1968/69	—	175	133	—
1969/70	887	2761	62	—
1970/71	272	825	135	—
1971/72	(37)	(99)	—	—
1972/73	—	241	—	—
1973/74	50	569	140	—
1974/75	2803	8507	510	1320

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. Bracketed figures for English expenditures in 1971/72 represent the net disposition of assets within the province, i.e. the net value of assets scrapped or otherwise written off because of obsolescence and charged to the reserves for depreciation. These figures represent the amount in excess of the value of assets purchased as replacements in that year.

3. The figures for expenditures in 1974/75 include expenditures on the CBC Vancouver consolidation project.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 5,079—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Northwest Territories for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

[Miss Campbell (South Western Nova).]

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	Radio (000's)	Radio/TV (000's)
1965/66	—	29
1966/67	—	—
1967/68	—	87
1968/69	—	73
1969/70	13	689
1970/71	—	111
1971/72	10	241
1972/73	—	(8)
1973/74	51	307
1974/75	24	150

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. The figures given are for English investment only. There was no French investment during this period.

3. The "Radio/TV" designation represents costs for rebroadcast units and transmitters used for both radio and television service.

4. Bracketed figures for expenditures in 1972/73 represent the net disposition of assets within the province, i.e. the net value of assets scrapped or otherwise written off because of obsolescence and charged to the reserves for depreciation. These figures represent the amount in excess of the value of assets purchased as replacements in that year.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN ALBERTA

Question No. 5,080—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Alberta for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	14	233	—	—
1966/67	36	1249	—	—
1967/68	7	473	—	—
1968/69	725	—	—	—
1969/70	918	338	—	868
1970/71	132	157	—	8
1971/72	(176)	(611)	—	4
1972/73	62	172	—	—
1973/74	504	224	540	309
1974/75	186	710	57	124

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. Bracketed figures for English expenditures in 1971/72 represent the net disposition of assets within the province, i.e. the net value of assets scrapped or otherwise written off because of obsolescence and charged to the reserves for depreciation. These figures represent the amount in excess of the value of assets purchased as replacements in that year.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN P.E.I.

Question No. 5,081—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Prince Edward Island for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	—	—	—	—
1966/67	—	—	—	—
1967/68	—	—	—	—
1968/69	—	92	—	—
1969/70	—	7	—	—
1970/71	—	105	—	—
1971/72	—	963	—	—
1972/73	—	459	—	—
1973/74	—	294	—	—
1974/75	—	127	—	—

NOTE: The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 5,082—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Newfoundland for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Order Paper Questions

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	302	1055	—	—
1966/67	385	1012	—	—
1967/68	268	1184	—	—
1968/69	410	775	—	—
1969/70	356	882	—	—
1970/71	382	1	—	—
1971/72	319	1486	—	—
1972/73	(40)	(135)	30	45
1973/74	715	714	40	60
1974/75	239	694	30	131

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. Bracketed figures for English expenditures in 1972/73 represent the net disposition of assets within the province, i.e. the net value of assets scrapped or otherwise written off because of obsolescence and charged to the reserves for depreciation. These figures represent the amount in excess of the value of assets purchased as replacements in that year.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 5,083—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of New Brunswick for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	11	—	11	17
1966/67	25	—	27	28
1967/68	157	—	309	391
1968/69	31	—	76	104
1969/70	105	—	378	480
1970/71	542	—	174	720
1971/72	154	—	24	555
1972/73	61	—	22	201
1973/74	75	—	95	190
1974/75	210	—	58	734

NOTE: The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 5,084—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Nova Scotia for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	88	205	40	40
1966/67	146	342	6	5
1967/68	—	—	4	—
1968/69	483	1485	—	28
1969/70	50	1253	42	—
1970/71	345	1027	10	178
1971/72	125	380	—	10
1972/73	493	1480	69	596
1973/74	390	1180	—	33
1974/75	139	406	—	5

NOTE: The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN ONTARIO

Question No. 5,085—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Ontario for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	234	1,087	—	36
1966/67	785	3,645	67	137
1967/68	835	3,875	48	148
1968/69	1,245	3,310	427	153
1969/70	420	1,790	50	72
1970/71	30	115	—	2
1971/72	200	895	25	35
1972/73	850	440	45	938
1973/74	1,100	4,290	115	290
1974/75	1,010	3,951	105	265

NOTE: The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

DEVELOPMENT OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH RADIO/TELEVISION IN QUEBEC

Question No. 5,086—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

From 1965 to date, by year, what amount did the government spend in the Province of Quebec for the development of (a) French (b) English radio and television?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) and (b)	English		French
	Radio	TV	Radio	TV
	(000's)		(000's)
1965/66	24	78	97	512
1966/67	442	1,630	2,080	10,675
1967/68	53	195	245	1,290
1968/69	235	1,730	1,540	4,380
1969/70	85	370	425	1,970
1970/71	85	350	400	1,840
1971/72	724	1,203	1,530	15,195
1972/73	315	677	8,619	26,130
1973/74	369	1,485	3,137	13,500
1974/75	146	580	1,233	5,296

NOTES: 1. The above figures represent capital expenditures reported in the year in which the project was put into service. Work in process in any given year has been excluded as such information is not readily available until the year of completion of the project and, for that reason forms part of the figures for the year of completion.

2. The figures for French expenditures in 1966/67 include expenditures on projects connected with facilities required for Expo '67, while those for 1971/72, 1972/73, 1973/74 and 1974/75 include the costs of the Maison de Radio-Canada consolidation project in Montreal.

WHITTAKER TEXTILE MILL, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 5,281—Mr. Howie:

1. Was any money committed by DREE to the Whittaker Textile Mill at Marysville, New Brunswick and, if so, in what amount?

2. Was the full amount actually advanced and, if not (a) what amount was advanced (b) for what reason was the balance not advanced?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Whittaker Textiles (Marysville) Ltd. accepted a DREE incentive offer of $2,745,850 to manufacture and process textile fabrics at Marysville, New Brunswick.

2. (a) The amount of the offer actually disbursed was $928,402; (b) The balance of the authorized incentive was not advanced because the company did not fulfill its obligation under the Regional Development Incentives legislation, in that the first phase of the project on which the initial payment had been based was discontinued before the expiry of the control period. Before the amount due to the company in respect to completion of phase two could be determined, a decision was made to discontinue all production at the mill.

USE OF AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 5,342—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,121 that the cost of the aircraft for travel to and from Anticosti Island was $778 per hour (a) what was the total amount of flying time involved and the total cost (b) what was the total amount of waiting time involved, if any, and the total cost (c) did the aircraft and crew remain with the Prime Minister during his stay and, if so, what was the total cost of their stay (d) did the aircraft fly back to Ottawa, returning to pick-up the Prime Minister later and, if so, what was the total cost of all flying time involved?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) 6:20; $4,927; (b) Not applicable; (c) No; (d) Yes. For total cost see (a) above.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ICEBREAKING AND DREDGING SERVICES

Question No. 5,477—Mr. Forrestall:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,105 which stated in part that icebreaking and dredging services "may be beneficial to the entire St. Lawrence basin from the point of view of shipping, flood control and economic development", what is the government's best estimate of the dollar value derived by (a) shipping (b) flood control (c) economic development from all the monies spent by the government on icebreaking and dredging since 1965 and, if such figures are not available, will the government consider studying the situation to determine them?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transport Canada is now in the process of developing and applying the two major concepts of cost recovery and operational performance measurement which together will enable the benefits of specific transportation services to be more clearly identified. Because these two concepts are not fully developed an adequate estimate cannot be provided at this time of the benefits derived by (a) shipping (b) flood control and (c) economic development from monies spent by the government on icebreaking and dredging since 1965.

USE OF CONTAINER CRANE IN AREA OF BERTHS 73 AND 74 AT PORT OF MONTREAL

Question No. 5,504—Mr. Forrestall:

1. At what percent of its estimated potential thruput assuming (a) one container crane (b) three container cranes and necessary backup equipment, is the area associated with Berths 73 and 74 at the Port of Montreal now leased by Logistic Corporation being operated?

2. How many 20 foot equivalent containers were handled at this facility in 1975 and what was its estimated potential in this respect?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. The terminal at Berths 73-74 is not a container terminal per se but a combination general cargo-ro-ro-container terminal with a total storage area of only 9 acres. It is equipped with one container crane on Berth 73 only. Two or more such cranes would not increase the thruput which is limited by storage area. The total area is 100 percent utilized by Logistec Corporation.

2. 5,969 T.E.U containers were handled at Berth 73 in 1975. The estimated potential is 6,600 T.E.U. containers per annum for Berth 73 (4½ acres). In addition 93,000 tons of general and ro-ro cargo were handled at Berths 73-74.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 100 and 101?

[Text]

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE ON PROPOSED SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINATION PROGRAM

Motion No. 100—Mr. Yewchuk:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence and minutes of meetings between the Minister and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the ministers and officials of the various departments of health of the provinces on the implementation of a national swine influenza vaccination programme.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency of action required resulting from the March 23 meeting of the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents—and I refer the hon. member to the statement and recommendations of that particular committee as tabled on March 30—no formal correspondence or minutes exist between the minister and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the ministers and officials of the various provinces on the implementation of a national swine influenza vaccination program. Consultation at that time was carried out through telephone conversations. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this matter and the need for the public of Canada to know the facts surrounding the whole program, I think this motion should be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Text]

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINE

Motion No. 101—Mr. Yewchuk:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all papers relating to calculations by means of which the Minister of National Health and Welfare arrived at his estimate for the cost of swine influenza vaccine at $0.60-$1.00 per dose.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, estimates for the cost of swine influenza vaccine were derived from discussions with manufacturers. More precise figures were not available because of the uncertainty over the ease with which the recombinant strains of A/N.J./76 would grow and the yields that could be obtained during the manufacturing process. Other influenza vaccines have sold generally in the price range of 60 cents to $1 per dose. In view of the hon. member having another opportunity to debate that issue on the other notice of motion, I now ask him to withdraw his notice of motion.

Mr. Yewchuk: Transferred for debate, as well.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) had the floor at the conclusion of the debate yesterday. Although technically yesterday's debate was on the amendment and we are now continuing on the main motion, it seems to be a generally accepted practice that an hon. member, in that circumstance, ought to be able to continue for the balance of his time on the main motion.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the budget there are a number of measures which deserve discussion. I will devote a few minutes to talking about two aspects of the budget. One has to do with a proposed measure with regard to unemployment insurance, and the other has to do with the budget measures relating to energy conservation, and in particular to those which provide incentives for the development of alternative forms of energy.

With regard to unemployment insurance, the question which comes to mind and which is probably in the minds of those who are interested in this issue is really this: How many weeks of contribution are considered to be fair, in a social security program like unemployment insurance, before qualifying for benefits? It seems to me that the issue boils down to that basic question. If we consider other programs of a similar nature—for example, workmen's compensation, medicare and hospital insurance—we will find that in most of those programs one can become eligible for protection from the moment one starts contributing to those systems.

In other words, to the best of my knowledge there is no qualifying period for coverage; a person is covered from the moment he starts contributing. This is true in the public sector for programs of the kind I have mentioned, and it is also true in the private sector. If a person starts paying premiums for home insurance, life insurance, or any other form of insurance, for that matter, he is covered from the moment he starts paying into the scheme. Therefore, it is natural to conclude—at least, it is to me—that under the unemployment insurance scheme it is desirable to strive for a system whereby a person can qualify for coverage from the moment he joins, because that is the pattern and the criterion which has been applied to other insurance schemes both in the private and public sectors.

If we ask the proponents of 12 weeks, 16 weeks or more to give a reasoning for that period of time before qualifying, we will notice that it is very difficult, even with the best of intentions, for them to come forward with rationale for that. I cannot provide the rationale for 8 weeks either, but if I were asked what we as a government should strive for over a period of time, my answer would be that it should be something which will take us in a direction opposite to the proposal in this budget, namely, toward lowering, rather than increasing, the number of weeks required to qualify for unemployment insurance.

I know it is very popular at the present time in this country to be tough with regard to unemployment insurance. I know there is much support for the idea of increasing the number of weeks. However, I do not share that view, because I think we have in unemployment insurance a good social program which protects people, particularly in those areas of the country where employment is seasonal and the availability of jobs is very limited. Those areas are away from large industrial centres and include areas such as New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, P.E.I., parts of Quebec, northern Ontario and virtually all the areas of the country which benefit at present from our regional economic expansion programs.

I may be wrong, but I have noticed—despite the speech made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who, on behalf of the Conservative party, supported the increase in the number of weeks—a certain nervousness in Conservative ranks as expressed in questions asked by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on May 27 and by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) on June 7. If that impression is correct, I can well understand that nervousness because some areas of this country will be seriously affected by the change in the number of weeks from 8 to 12 as proposed in this budget.

It seems to me that when a person becomes unemployed, that person becomes unemployed for reasons beyond his or her control. A good social security measure, therefore, should be available at the earliest possible time—in the shortest number of weeks that the social security system can offer. I am not so impressed by arguments that are based on the question of abuse. It is very easy to make a charge of abuse, but to the question of where the abuse occurs the answer rarely comes forth.

● (1530)

It must be kept in mind—and this seems to be forgotten by those who are criticizing the unemployment insurance policy—that if a person quits his or her job without reason, that person goes without benefits for six full weeks. That is a pretty long time to be without benefits, Mr. Speaker. There seems to be an impression that you qualify for unemployment insurance the moment you quit, or a week or two after. That is not so. If you quit without reason, you go six weeks without benefits. No one in his right mind would want to abandon a job with the knowledge that the social security system, in this case unemployment insurance, will not be forthcoming in less than a month and a half.

I would, therefore, urge the government to reconsider this measure in the budget and to stick with the eight weeks. It is a good measure. As the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said, our unemployment insurance system is one of the best in the world. We should not be ashamed of it or retreat from it; we should be very proud of it. If the government does not find it possible to reconsider this measure for the whole country, I would suggest, as an alternative, that we retain the eight-week period of contributions before benefits are payable in those regions of Canada presently benefiting from regional economic expansion. I would urge that compromise at least.

I should like to devote the little time I have left to another aspect of the budget, Mr. Speaker, for which I would like to congratulate the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I refer to the measure that was announced on May 26 concerning energy conservation. In particular, I refer to the two-year tax write-off that is extended to cover equipment enabling industrial wastes to be used as a fuel source and industrial equipment that produces energy from municipal waste. In addition to that, the federal sales tax is removed from items which contribute to energy conservation or contribute to the development of alternative forms of energy, including solar furnaces and heating panels, wind-powered generating equipment and heat pumps.

Before I go on, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to the work done in this area over the years, when it was rather like crying in the desert, by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). For years he has appealed for better use of wind energy in the part of the country from which he comes. Now we have come to the crunch. We have reached a point in history when it is quite clear to us that we will run out of non-renewable resources. The government's measure reflects concern and foresight in anticipation of things to come.

The Globe and Mail of June 8 published a report which read in part:

> A background study prepared for the federal government estimates that renewable energy sources could provide anywhere from 2 per cent to 4 per cent of the country's total energy requirements by 1990.

It went on to say that the study reports that by the year 2020 the percentage could rise to 20 per cent of energy needs. Mr. Speaker, I am more optimistic than that, although I cannot base my optimism on any scientific knowledge. I think that at present we are badly underestimating the potential of the sun as an energy source. What concerns me is the fact that when we make $122 million available for research and development for this fiscal year, according to my calculations only 2.2 per cent of that is available for research in the renewable energy field, namely, sun, wind and tidal. I think this is an alarmingly low percentage. If we cannot increase the total amount, I would at least urge the government to review the percentage or the slice that is allocated from the research and development total fund and give much greater emphasis to research in the field of renewable energy.

As things stand at the moment, of the $122 million allocated for research and development, 8½ per cent is for research on conservation, 10 per cent for oil and gas, 4.5 per cent for coal, almost 70 per cent for nuclear, 5½ per cent for transportation and transmission, and only 2.2 per cent for renewable resources. In light of the very important decision embodied in the budget respecting energy conservation and incentives for the discovery and implementation of new sources of energy, I think it is imperative that we give much greater impetus to research in the field of renewable energy resources.

It seems to me that the next step will lead to the creation of a Canadian industry based on Canadian technology in the field of solar energy and, following that, the creation of industries and jobs. Then would come the development of a market at home and with countries which have similar climatic conditions to ours or, indeed, even different climatic conditions. There is an opportunity at hand, and I am certain we have the knowledge if we have the political will to move in that direction with greater speed and determination than the figures would seem to indicate.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence my remarks this afternoon by congratulating the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) for the brilliant speech he delivered last night on the budget. It was a speech full of original ideas and observations which, if they were followed by the government, would put this country in better shape than it is today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: I do not intend to spend much time this afternoon talking about the specific deficiencies of this budget. Both inside and outside this House, the lack of any direction in the budget, the inability of the government to decide what it is trying to do, the loss of faith which is shown in this nation as perceived by an almost pathetic suggestions that Canada's economic destiny is controlled by foreign forces, has been commented upon by newspaper editorials and reporters very, very widely. To me, other than the technical deficiencies in the analysis and in the proposals, both in terms of economic policy-making and the government's attitude toward energy, the most disturbing aspects of this stand-pat budget, as it has been called, is that the government has so little confidence in this great nation that it can suggest at this time that what we need is a stand-pat budget when we have inflation at an annual rate of 9 per cent and unemployment at a seasonally adjusted rate of 7.4 per cent, which means that 760,000 Canadians are out of work.

● (1540)

The government is apparently accepting this incredibly poor economic performance and literally believes, in spite of the great resources of this country, in spite of the quality of the labour force, in spite of the fact that we have been isolated from the oil crisis created by the OPEC countries, in spite of an abundant agricultural sector, that Canada should have a slower rate of economic recovery than many other countries of the world, much slower than that of our major trading partner, the United States, and that average economic performance vis-à-vis other countries is satisfactory.

Why is there so little vision in this budget? Why, when there are such opportunities and potentials for creating a veritable Utopia in Canada, has the government turned its back on the people in the country by offering nothing? Do we not have one of the greatest opportunities of any people anywhere for creative development of techniques to bring oil from tar sands? Do we not have an overwhelming opportunity to find out new ways for operating in northern areas, new ways which could be useful for all other countries with Arctic resources? Are we not, perhaps, on the brink of one of the most exciting and far-reaching national ventures—one unparallelled since the building of the great cross-country railroads at the end of the nineteenth century—with the possible construction of pipelines from the northern resource areas?

Do we not have the great challenge of making the cities more livable and housing more available? Where is the thrust toward public transport, the ultimate aid in conservation, if not only of energy but of the urban environment? Where is the policy to encourage dispersion of industry so that we can have imaginative and controlled development of urban regions? Where is the program to really deal with structural unemployment and regional disparities? Where is the imagination that links what we could be with what we are? Where is the potentiality for taking us from underutilization of our resources to full use, for the benefit of all?

How can we accept, in the face of what we could be doing in this nation, an attitude that 7.4 per cent of the labour force unemployed, and a growth rate of less than 5 per cent, is acceptable? Again I ask, what has happened? Where is the vision? Where is the effort to rise to the opportunity? This tone of defeatism in the budget, in this land of potentiality, surely must be disturbing—indeed distressing—to every Canadian.

The budget reflects, of course, the tone and attitude of the government, a tone and attitude that there are only problems, not opportunities; that Canadians are tired and weary; that our horizons have narrowed; that we cannot be better than we are, cannot strive to influence and shape our own destiny; that we are caught in the throes of worldwide events; that we must surrender our dreams and aspirations; that we must look for less, not more; that we cannot show the way. How wrong this is. What a misreading it is of what Canadians want from a government. What a reflection it is of a government that has been in power too long, that is tired, worn-out, unimaginative and uninspiring.

A budget is, of course, a technical document as well as a statement of economic aspirations of the government and, therefore, the country. The economic aspirations of this government are to hope for a gradual decline in inflation from its current level of 9 per cent to 4 per cent in 1978, an aspiration for performance 100 per cent less than the aspirations of the United States government which is looking for a 2 per cent inflation rate at the end of 1977.

The government is also looking for a gradual decline of unemployment with the oft-repeated suggestion that the actual unemployment rate in Canada will decline when the rest of the world recovers. This analysis, or premise, concerning what happens in the rest of the world apparently has become the cornerstone of economic policy-making of this government. It was the explanation used by the former minister of finance for his inability to turn the Canadian economy around. He will undoubtedly be remembered as the most incompetent and, finally, least courageous minister of finance this country has ever had. And it is the explanation now used by the present minister. I can only conclude that it is the basic and unswerving position of the officials of the Department of Finance.

It is this type of thinking which is destructive for the nation, because it is the ultimate cop-out for doing nothing on the domestic scene and, significantly, it also permits the abdication of careful analysis of alternatives and assessment of past performances to see if, in fact, we could have done better. When everything is determined by something beyond your control, the need for accountability of performance is removed.

No one would argue that Canada is not a part of the global economy, and a significant part. No one would argue that Canadian economic performance is unaffected by what happens in other countries. But where great issue can be taken with the minister and his advisers is that they believe Canada can take no action on its own to mitigate the impact of changes in the world economy on the Canadian economy; or, indeed, that Canada can take no actions which can in fact influence the world economy. We are not spectators in the world; we are participants. But we can influence events in the world economy, just as we can influence the impact of world events on the Canadian economy. By knowing and analysing what is happening in the world, we can adopt policies to channel the consequences of such events in Canada's interest. To suggest that we can do nothing is a surrender of responsibility and ought to, and will, lead to surrender of the right to govern much longer by the party now in power.

The general apathetic, helpless approach to budget-market has been reinforced in recent years by an increasing emphasis on the part of the government on the use of broad or macroeconomic tools in preparation of the budget. While it is true that since the work of Lord Keynes in the 1930s there has been recognition of the fact that the levels of expenditures and revenues by government can greatly influence the direction of economic activity in the nation, during the past few years in Canadian budget-making there has been so much emphasis on the broad forces that influence the economy that it has been forgotten, or indeed underemphasized, that the way in which these broad forces are created is as important as their size. This retreat from traditional classical analysis has led to gross errors in the management of the Canadian economy.

Moreover, it is apparent that much less is known about the impact of gross changes in the economy than was believed only a decade ago. One does not hear much today about "fine-tuning" the economy, one of the catch phrases of the early seventies. The fact is that economists, certainly not the economists advising this government, simply do not know what impact spending, taxing and other proposals will have on the economy. The effects anticipated from specific action in periods of less competition, inflationary expectations and huge government intervention in the economy are simply, at this stage in the development of economic knowledge, unknown and unpredictable. Yet in spite of all the evidence that they do not know what they are doing, evidence supported by the record of past performance, the minister insists on bringing in a budget based on the same type of analysis at that of his predecessors. Unfortunately, it will have the same consequences for the Canadian people.

Look at some of the paradoxes. The governor of the Bank of Canada argues that it is necessary to have rapid increases in the money supply to keep interest rates down. So Canada has had a money supply increase at an unprecedented level and has, not what we were told we would get, low interest rates, but the highest interest rates in its history. In the United States, the federal reserve system has kept its rate of increase in the money supply low and interest rates are substantially lower in that country than in Canada. Clearly, it is not the rate of increase in the money supply but other factors which are establishing interest rates: But our Canadian officials do not seem to understand this simple proposition.

Consider the fact, implicit in the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) about his budget, that his officials are still talking about a trade-off in unemployment and inflation. Yet the facts are clear. We have not had in this country a substantial change in the rate of inflation as unemployment has risen. The trade-off in any meaningful sense, within any acceptable limits, simply does not exist. The facts appear, rather, to support the proposition that unemployment is created by increasing inflation and that both rise together. The policy-making is based on the false premise of the trade-off. So it is no wonder that the economic performance in Canada, in spite of the enormous advantages inherent within this nation, is so poor. Economic policy-making here is based upon a theory of economy which is simply not appropriate for the time. As long as this error persists, we will have poor economic performance.

The greatest example, and the one with possibly the most extreme consequences of the error of concentrating on broad aspects of the economy instead of looking with great care at specific sectors, can be seen in the way in which the energy sector of this nation has been mishandled by the present government for the past few years. The incompetence, which can almost be labelled as scandalous, of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board in forecasting Canada's energy resources has been commented on many times. Today it is simply unbelievable that within this decade responsible members of the government were stating that we had endless supplies of oil and natural gas for our own needs, that we could export unlimited amounts to our neighbour, and yet next year we will probably be a net importer of oil.

● (1550)

It is truly unthinkable that as recently as three years ago the government had a taxing policy that literally discouraged exploration and development. It is again almost unbelievable that through the past years the government has not worked out a meaningful process for discussing and resolving energy questions which involve different jurisprudences. The fact is that even today we do not have a carefully thought-through program for conservation and development of alternative energy supplies, and yet we know that without energy great problems are ahead of us.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) spoke in the budget debate. I read his remarks with care. Most of what he said had been put forth before, and with some of it I agree. The time is long past, however, since Canada has needed an appropriate tax regime that would encourage exploration and development. The feeble steps that the government are taking in this direction are welcome, but not nearly enough. The bold imagination necessary to move effectively in the tar sands, in the north, across this entire continent, are lacking. Nothing is done for the mining industry which through the years has been one of the most important elements in the development of the Canadian economy.

What is most startling, however, and indicative of what is wrong in the way the government is approaching the problems of the nation is that the minister in his speech said very little about energy in relation to the Canadian balance of payments. I make this point because Canada's balance of payments difficulties are going to have a profound effect on every Canadian in the course of the next few years, and many of the problems are created because of our inability to deal with energy. If a solution had been found for our energy needs, a solution which would shift reliance from imports and such a high volume of domestic consumption of oil and natural gas to other sources, then our balance of payments problems would be less threatening. In 1985, the Economic Council of Canada predicts, 38 per cent of the deficit in the balance of payments will be from petroleum products—something which indeed is scandalous, given our resource base.

It is not helpful, however, to discuss the balance of payment problems in a vacuum. It is a product of neglect of various segments of the Canadian economy, each one of which should have been dealt with specifically in the budget and by policy through the years. Again, this is one of the prices that has been paid for so much emphasis on broad policy-making. The neglect of the elements which in the last analysis are influenced by that policy, and indeed how they react in the long-run, determines whether or not such broad policies will, in fact, work.

What are the Canadian balance of payments problems, and why are they so serious for the Canadian economy? In the most simplistic sense, the base of the problem is simply that Canada is buying far more from other countries—buying, that is, services, payments for capital, and everything else—than she is selling to all other countries in the world. Indeed, Canada had a deficit, in this sense, of $5.1 billion in 1975. Since things that are purchased have to be paid for, Canada borrowed $4.7 billion in 1975 to help make up the difference. So in this period when the government is saying it is the policy to lessen foreign ownership in Canada, we are in fact faced with an economic situation which simply requires that foreign investment increases, unless we do something about it.

If we do not want to borrow, the only other thing that can happen is that the Canadian dollar can be devalued and devalued, it will be if the present situation continues. But what does this mean? Fundamentally, it means that Canadian imports will be more expensive, and that has to mean strong inflationary pressures on the Canadian economy. Although, because it is the conventional wisdom of the Minister of Finance and his officials to believe that this will increase exports because the dollar will be cheaper, the recent work of Professor Mundell of Columbia University suggests this is not true, and the evidence of the past few years supports him.

The fact is that the rise in the price of imports, and the inflation which this rise in price creates, has meant that devaluation has led, in every country he has studied, to a rise in costs to such an extent that it more than offsets the advantages of the cheaper currency. What country in the world has had the most continuous devaluation of their currency? Great Britain. And it has had the longest period of balance of payments problems. What country has had no balance of payments problems and has maintained high levels of exports? Germany. And it has not had a continuous pattern of devaluation.

It is a myth to think that devaluation will solve the balance of payments problems. It will not. It will simply add to inflation and exacerbate the difficulties. If the government does not recognize this, and if it is not prepared to see the entire Canadian economy owned by non-Canadians, it must totally revamp its economic policies or we will never get out of the inflation-unemployment dilemma which we are now experiencing.

What has to be done? We need to cut back on exports where it is possible to do so; not through tariffs or restrictive trade practices, but where we can substitute domestic production for imports on an economic basis. Certainly, this means a crash program in energy development, a program to move the tar sands ahead on a priority basis, a program to generate energy from alternative sources, the tides, the wind, the sun and nuclear power properly safeguarded. The minuscule approach to this effort indicated by this budget clearly shows the government has no realization of the scope and implications of the change in Canada from an exporter of energy to an importer, implications for the balance of payments and the rest of the economy.

Second, we must increase our exports, not through devaluation, because devaluation will not work, but by making the areas in which Canada has a world advantage more competitive and more productive. Tax policy must be directed at stimulating productivity, at developing our mineral resources, at improving our forest industries and keeping our agricultural sector one of the most competitive and efficient in the world. The Economic Council of Canada is absolutely correct in stating that we have to move away, in our policy, from programs that put us in direct competition with Hong Kong, Taiwan and other Far-Eastern countries which are labour-intensive. We have to strengthen our industries through tax treatment, incentive programs and general support where we have some advantage. Our future is based on resources and advanced technology and we must build our policies to strengthen these areas.

The current account in trade has been in deficit in seven of the past ten years. Despite the wishful thinking of the government that this problem will go away as the world economy recovers, it will not. Canadian export trade developed in the late fifties and over the sixties because of the Kennedy Round, Viet Nam, the auto pact and other special circumstances. It is all changing. The world is developing into trading blocs and Canada is not in one of them. The Kennedy Round approach is being replaced by bilateral negotiations and commodities, and it is certain that the trading patterns of the 1950s and 1960s will not be repeated. The automobile may be on the decline in this energy-short society, so if Canada is to prosper through trade it must have new policies and be more competitive.

Therefore, this budget deserves all the condemnation that it has had from Canadians from coast to coast. It lacks vision of what this country can be, and therefore has no policies for the long-run approach to the fulfilment of the nation's potentialities. It continues to emphasize broad-gauged fiscal and monetary policies which, important as they are, are less reliable for guiding the economy because no one knows what the results of such policies will be in an inflationary, government-dominated nation. It neglects the traditional task of a budget of producing policies and programs for specific sectors of the economy which must be supported if inflation and unemployment are to be reduced. It is based upon an out-moded and patently incorrect analysis of the manner in which an economy operates. It neglects to come to grips with the most significant approaching economic problem Canada is facing—the enormous deficits in our buying and selling relationships with the rest of the world.

● (1600)

In studying this budget and the philosophy, economic analysis and confidence in Canada which lies behind its formulation, Canadians can only conclude that the present government is worn-out, tired, incompetent and incapable of providing the leadership which a nation with the great opportunity and potentiality of Canada clearly deserves to have.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, before I go further I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) on his presentation. Of course, I do not agree with many of the points he has made, and unfortunately I am not replying to him; I have other topics to talk about. But I listened carefully to his speech, and even though I disagreed with it I thought it was a most useful presentation. He talked in a very commendable way about the budget, expressing his views upon it and upon what should be done.

I was surprised to hear him speak as he did about the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. As he knows, there are many articles being written at this time suggesting that we should weaken the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar—it is now two or three points above the U.S. valuation. I am glad to note that the hon. member recognizes that there are a lot of people in Canada who say that if we want to improve our export position, we ought to have a kind of devaluation. I will pass the hon. member's views on to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). At least the hon. member for Don Valley is very happy with the healthy situation of the Canadian dollar at the present time and he does not want to change it. It is a fact of life. I was surprised to hear his condemnation of the government at the end of his speech, to the effect that it was a tired, old government, and so on. I do not feel tired at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: As I say, I am happy to know there is one member who is in accord with this particular aspect of Canadian fiscal and monetary policy to the extent that the Canadian dollar should be, not at par or below the value of the American dollar but that it should be a healthier dollar.

I have notes today. Usually I provoke a lot of controversy when I speak, so on this occasion I have written down the observations I intend to make. In rising today to participate in the budget debate, I would like to discuss two aspects of my responsibility as President of the Treasury Board. First, I will speak about government spending and then I will turn to the subject of the official languages policy.

Government spending is a matter which has been receiving much attention for a long time. It is right that it should receive a lot of attention because it is very important. The trouble is that it is also very complicated, and many of those who may have much to say on the subject have not taken the trouble to learn enough to understand it. As a result, a great deal of criticism people hear is misinformed. It is not forgivable for a large segment of the opposition to be so wrong-headed in talking about government expenditures when they should be giving leadership through informed criticism. But how can they give leadership when they stand paralysed in an attempted acrobatic effort to move in three directions at the same time? They advocate cutting government expenditures in total, but are critical of cutting expenditures in any particular area. In a third dimension, they favour a whole lot of new ideas which involve expenditure. Let me touch on a few points to entertain these hon. members as they stand in their fixed position.

First, let us consider the question of the growth of expenditures. This is usually looked at in terms of current dollars discounting the effects of the use in prices. In those terms, total outlays, both budgetary and non-budgetary, rose 25 per cent in 1973-74, 28 per cent in 1974-75, and according to necessarily preliminary figures presented in the budget, by 18 per cent in 1975-76. But in terms of constant dollars, with the effect of price increases removed through a deflator, the actual rise in the years I have mentioned was 15 per cent in 1972-73, 15 per cent in 1973-74, 13 per cent in 1974-75, and 8 per cent in 1975-76—a different story, one of persistent decline. If we achieve our aim of staying under a ceiling of 14 per cent growth in 1976-77, price effects included, the growth in real terms will be no more than 5 per cent, maintaining the decline.

As hon. members know, our commitment to the future is that the trend of growth in expenditures by all levels of government will not exceed to trend of growth in the gross national product. This is a collective responsibility which the provinces and municipalities must share if it is to be discharged. I have shown in the record of decline just set out that we can be expected to do our part.

The word "trend" is significant. No government worth electing would bind itself to an automatic formula. Should the economy require assistance through added expenditures from time to time, the assistance must be given. Recent history offers a pertinent case in point. There is little doubt that the performance of the Canadian economy during the recent period of slow growth was assisted by the fact that federal expenditures remained at a high level. We avoided the decline in GNP which our neighbour suffered.

I maintain that our advanced social welfare structure, put in place by a series of Liberal governments, had much to do with this favourable outcome. The collection of programs which make up this structure has, as its primary purpose, the relieving of hardship among those who are the beneficiaries. But the indirect, cumulative effect is to maintain the purchasing power of the domestic economy in the face of downward pressures. So what we intend to do, by and large, is to hold expenditure growth over the medium and long term to the trend of the GNP. But we will depart from that trend when it is the right thing to do.

There is another general aspect of government expenditures which is analogous to the welfare aspect and which appears to go unnoticed. A large part of what is spent is in the nature of investment. Every year hundreds of millions of dollars are disbursed in budgetary outlays for capital acquisitions. The convention of the government accounts is to write off these outlays in the year they occur. The balance-sheet of Canada contains an almost quaint entry of one dollar to represent the value of all these budgetary investments from all the years this country has been in existence. That is a very big dollar. Business and commercial practice would show, in similar circumstances, an entry for billions of dollars, as well it might. The airports, the wharves, the roads, the postal terminals are in their own way as productive facilities as the factories and stores which weigh heavily in valuations of the commercial sector.

● (1610)

I have mentioned on other occasions that after you subtract transfer payments to other governments and to individuals, and after you subtract subsidies to transportation, research and the like, and after you subtract public debt charges, you are left with a few percentage points of the total. These few percentage points include all the budgetary capital investments I have been talking about.

On the non-budgetary side, productive investment is much more marked. Here, our accounting practice is a little close to the commercial. The public accounts for 1974-75 show $1,831 million as a return to the government on its investments. These investments include, very prominently, the mortgage funds provided to CMHC to assist housing, the funds given to the Export Development Corporation to promote export, those given to the Farm Credit Corporation to assist agriculture, the Northern Canada Power Commission to support northern development, and much more.

What I have been trying to counteract here is the false impression created by so many who wave around the big figures of total expenditures in a way that hides the beneficial effect. The subject of the beneficial effect, through transfers to all segments of our society, I hope I have covered often enough before. These investment aspects are not mentioned frequently enough.

I really must deal, now, with the remarks made the other day by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). To say the nice things first, his remarks do serve some purpose in that they illustrate what I meant about uninformed criticism. I have not the time to reply to everything he said, so I will content myself with some of the juicier morsels. He started with the Post Office, about a difference between the 1975-76 expenditures figures for that department as forecast in the main estimates and as reported in the budget papers. Surely the hon. member must know by now that the main estimates are compiled in the December preceding the start of the fiscal year on the basis of departmental submissions received around the end of October. One figure is a forecast made some months before the year ends, and the other is a figure reported after the year ends. He must also be aware, if he was around, that there was a postal strike last year, a little incident that lasted for many, many weeks.

Miss MacDonald: Don't we remember!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, and during which the Post Office was, naturally, not paying the workers who were not working and, as a hardly surprising result, actual expenditures are less than forecast expenditures. The estimates for 1976-77 were made on the assumption that similar circumstances will not arise. So this is why you have the difference. Then the hon. member went into the question of the $725 million difference between the expenditure projection I made in February and the preliminary totals reported in the budget. The explanation is very straightforward. We had expected at that time to disburse $33,625 million in budgetary expenditures and $2,875 million in non-budgetary expenditures.

The budgetary expenditures were in fact $262 million greater, for two reasons: statutory expenditures, particularly those for the Canada Assistance Plan—and we pay the bills the provinces send to us in that regard—were higher than the forecast, and reflecting the pressures placed on departmental resources by the current restraint program, the actual amount not spent, the lapse between estimates and actual expenditures, was less than forecast. I cannot resist a little bit of praise for myself because I have done my job too well. The lapse at the end of the year was 1 per cent. If you look at the past history of budgetary handling by the government, you will find it is 2 per cent on average. Last year, because we have been involved in two exercises, one in the amount of $1 billion and another one in the amount of $1.5 billion, of course the departments were left with less money at the end of the year because we had put the squeeze on.

Rather than have a 2 per cent lapse, I forecast a 1¾ per cent lapse, and in fact it was around 1 per cent. This is because I was too tough with the department. I recognize that I made an error there. I have to tell everyone that it was the first time, last year, that a president of the treasury board had ever tried to come to the House and instead of just tabling the blue book, made a forecast as well for supplementary estimates for the year. This was the first time it was tried. I know I was taking a heck of a gamble, but I wanted to try to give the total picture.

This is why we are having problems of that nature. We used to have different accounts here and there, and the return on expenditure was always lower than now. Now we put everything into it. Now it includes everything, even the special fund which used to be put aside from the budget. We put into that figure all the non-budgetary items so the country would have a total picture. This is why we must recognize that in February, 1976, I did not arrive at exactly the total of budgetary items. The difference was, as I mentioned earlier, $262 million. I do not think that is too much. For the rest of the non-budgetary items the difference was $463 million, and this was because a decision was taken at the end of the fiscal year to increase the flow of investment funds to Crown corporations in the energy and export fields. These are two well recognized priorities for this country.

We made that decision in the last few weeks because we felt that the revenues were better than predicted, and the Minister of Finance decided to make some advances in the field of energy and exports. I think the opposition would be very ill-advised to complain about this. When I was listening to the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley, I noticed he devoted the greater part of it to energy and export policy. Of course, there was a change there in the forecast of $463 million. That money was used in respect of these two fields because revenue was higher than expected. This permitted the government to make that decision in the last weeks of March. That is the explanation. It is nothing we want to hide. It was not a miscalculation to the extent of $463 million. This was a conscious decision of the government to advance funds in respect of energy and exports.

Mr. Mazankowski: Just juggling.

Mr. Chrétien: No, we made that decision because we had the money to do it, and I think that was a pretty good policy to follow. You can see I have spent much more, and I can tell you where.

Mr. Mazankowski: Why didn't you bail the Lockheed company out?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: That is a different question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) has the floor and I suggest we listen to him.

Mr. Chrétien: Perhaps I should go back to my text. A third subject the hon. member went into was the familiar delusion of the opposition about the amount spent on consulting contracts. We went to some trouble to clear up their confusion in the 1976-77 version of "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent". The opposition has again and again confused the object "professional and special services" for which $1,162 million is provided in the main estimates, with one of its minor components, just a little component—as a matter of fact, less than 8 per cent of the total—for that purpose. To make it very clear, the total is only 8 per cent for that. The opposition should not be confused. I have said this a dozen times, and I repeat it.

The so-called experts who were there—and they may be good at managing banks—could not understand that. It is just a percentage of the total. The total covers the cost of all outside services obtained by departments, including some they obtained from one another for which they are required to pay. The hon. member does not understand, so I will try to make myself very clear. Eight per cent is for consultants from outside. When one department pays another department for services, it is included there. Thirty-nine per cent of that amount of money, for example, covers educational and manpower services purchased from the provinces. It is not consultants in the sense they want the people to believe. If they were honest about it, they would recognize that the money that is spent in the provincial sector for training by the federal government is a consultant's fee we pay to the ministry of education of every province. So it is not a friendly little consultant of the government, which is the impression they try to leave.

● (1620)

Other consultants' fees are fees paid to private medical practitioners, lawyers, computer services, private security services, and the like. Does the hon. member, as an alternative to buying these services from the outside, suggest, instead, that we expand the public service itself? Why should we hire more dozens and dozens of lawyers, doctors, and so on, when we can have those services from the outside?

Mr. Oberle: You have consultants now to tell you what you want to do.

Mr. Chrétien: I am trying to clarify your mind. I know you want to understand, but your guys on the front bench confuse you all the time. I think that from the wobbly base he established with his Post Office example, his misconception of professional and special services, the elimination of some unspecified departments and what would amount to retrenchment in export and energy investment, the hon. member came up with a magic figure of $1,025 million in savings. May we all give fervent thanks that the finances of this country are not in such hands. Perhaps now, Mr. Speaker, I can turn to my other preoccupation for today.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal now with the government program on official languages. As you know, the cost of such programs gives rise to many comments, particularly because of the present restriction period. However, from the outset the consideration of all those linguistic matters must be placed in its real context.

As for any other government program, the funds allocated to the official language program are now subject to the strictest assessment. In the light of available data, the government estimates will have to spend about $310 million on those linguistic programs during the current fiscal year. This represents .8 of 1 per cent of the government overall spending which, according to the estimates, will be around $42 billion.

If we compare the cost of the official language programs with those of other sectors, we see that the linguistic programs require less money than the military equipment needed for national defence: $322 million. The same goes for the manpower rehabilitation and training program: $530 million.

[English]

This is one of the arguments they use. They think these are consulting firms.

[Translation]

As for the program concerning the native people of Canada, their budget of $605 million is almost double the total budget for official languages.

Out of the total projections of $310 million, 43 per cent or approximately $135 million are included in transfers for financing provincial programs of second language education. The amount of $135 million is spent and transferred to provincial governments, to Quebec for teaching English as well as outside Quebec for teaching French. In other words, the government has already agreed to the wishes expressed by the Commissioner of Official Languages and others that it would be more profitable to invest in young people attending school.

Moreover, $39 million were assigned to the bilingual program for military personnel in order that a national service of the scope of the Canadian Armed Forces can, within the country and abroad, reflect the bilingualism of Canada.

Regarding expenditures on programs for Canadian civil servants, these will reach $137 million, approximately half the subsidies to be paid to milk producers. That figure includes the cost of language training for civil servants, that of translation services for all documents, of course translation services for the House of Commons, and the budget of the Commissioner of Official Languages and also the operation costs incurred by my department under vote 15, that is the salaries of civil servants absent from work to follow language courses. The total is $137 million. All translation services at the House of Commons—

An hon. Member: Too loud!

Mr. Chrétien: . . . do I speak too loud? It will not be very long.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

There have been reservations concerning the linguistic designation of jobs within the Public Service of Canada and the language training program for civil servants. It has been implied for example that the identification of too many bilingual jobs would of necessity entail a lack of unilingual ones. However, any evaluation of that particular aspect of the program must adhere strictly to the original aims and criteria followed in the identification of language requirements for each job.

Under the Official Languages Act, government policies and programs are intended firstly to ensure that members of the Canadian community can communicate with and be served by federal bodies and departments in their own official language. The second objective is to make available to public servants every opportunity to work in the official language of their choice.

Procedures which were used to identify the linguistic requirements for various positions, while taking into consideration previous objectives, were described in the text of the resolution adopted in June 1973 by all parties represented in the House of Commons. The system used to identify the requirements for positions were not designed as if the situation would never change. On the contrary, it was meant to adapt to any situation which could arise and to promote the development of the official languages whenever it was desirable. I should point out in that respect that the resolution on official languages also included provisions for the increasing use of French within the confines of the merit principle, thus involving both francophone and anglophone communities in the federal administration process. The positions have therefore been identified to meet not only immediate needs, but also future requirements of the linguistic development of the public service.

As I already announced publicly, the Treasury Board, in cooperation with federal agencies and departments, will undertake the systematic review of linguistic requirements of all federal positions. If, in the light of the data collected during this review, we have to recognize that too many bilingual positions have been identified within the federal administrations, we shall not hesitate to take the required action.

In November 1974, I announced in the House that the government had decided to commission some experts to study linguistic training programs in the public service. The government has just received the thick report prepared by this study group, and it is now being translated and printed. We hope to make it public as soon as possible.

I would like to take this opportunity to express on behalf of the government my gratefulness to Mr. Gilles Bibeau of the University of Montreal who was asked to direct this important study. I would like to tell him once again that the government will study closely his evaluation and recommendations.

There is no doubt that the transformation of the Public Service of Canada into a functionally bilingual institution at an acceptable but fair cost is an enormous task. The concept of linguistic planning is in itself revolutionary and until now, no other country in the world has undertaken such a wide linguistic training program for adults.

Those who never had the opportunity to take part in the activity of a bilingual organization sometimes find it hard to understand how bilingualism can be introduced in a working context. Occasionally, the vocabulary used by those who are interested in bilingualism can lead to confusion. It is obvious that someone in the academic field who has the opportunity to have a sabbatical year in a second language will have a tendency to consider bilingualism differently than a federal employee who is faced—

● (1630)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Chrétien: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out that I answered some questions at the request of some hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Go ahead.

Mr. Chrétien: I am going ahead. I have to switch to French, and I need a couple of seconds to adjust. I will give you a couple of hours to adjust also, if need be.

[Translation]

A whole vocabulary was established to distinguish between the various forms of bilingualism, from operational bilingualism to institutional bilingualism. I for one believe that in more than one situation, operational bilingualism will have to be used where one expresses himself in his language while all understand one another. In the Treasury Board, for example, that is the formula being used because we believe everyone must have the opportunity to participate in the creative process, and for most of us that is only possible in our mother tongue. But we all want to use our knowledge of the second language at work.

Some Treasury Board meetings sometimes take place entirely in English, and others entirely in French, but I sometimes express myself in French while others speak in English. Such a flexible and relaxed approach seems to us particularly successful when it comes to working without being bound by a prepared text. Mr. Speaker, I only touched on a few of the particular aspects of the government official languages policy and programs.

In concluding, I could not overemphasize the importance of another dimension of official languages, because it would be wrong to reduce them to a simple linguistic matter. If through that linguistic reform we want to achieve a civil service that provides services suited to the needs of the Canadian public on the one hand and, on the other hand, a hospitable working climate for the civil servant, the Public Service of Canada will have to become aware of and sensitive to the culture dimension. In other words, when it comes to a decision likely to affect the whole of this country, it is important for those who participate in the decision-making process to seek to understand and respect provincial variables. In short, we must pursue and try by all means to implement in the federal public service the very climate that Prime Minister Pearson was proposing when he stated in 1966, and I quote:

> Civil servants of both linguistic groups will be able to work together toward common goals using their own language and drawing from their respective cultural values while at the same time appreciating to their full value and respecting those of others.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important at this moment to thank everyone in the various departments in Ottawa for their great understanding of the government's policy in this respect. I think we have made a lot of progress. There is much good will, and this should be emphasized more often because I know that in my department this has been a great experience. As I have said in my speech, everyone uses his own language at meetings when we have to make decisions. This is of great satisfaction even to people who sometimes appear to object the most to this policy.

It is sometimes said that we do not provide sufficient opportunity for those who have learned the French language, to use it. Some people say that not enough French is spoken in Ottawa. I must tell hon. members that I have been a member of the House since 1963, and in my view the situation now is completely different. Sometimes when we have technical discussions in my department I prefer to use my native language. I speak in French, which my officials understand, and they reply in English. This is the kind of attitude that is being developed and one which is gratifying to both sides.

In my view, too many people tend to raise the problems and not talk about the results. The other day I heard someone complain that some people claim they use French only 9 per cent or 10 per cent of the time. I refer here to English people who have learned French. Some English-speaking officials in Ottawa have learned French and use it only 10 per cent of the time, and yet this is a revolution, a revolution in the right direction. I think we have gained from those exchanges.

Of course there are many problems, but I think that not enough people speak about the real progress that has been achieved, the understanding between people and their willingness to understand each other. We should not try to put into perspective only the problems, because there will always be problems. I see, after talking with members on both sides of the House and from all parties, that they want this policy to be a success. This will not take place overnight, but I think every one of us should look at the problem realistically and not forget the good progress we have made in the last ten years in Canada in this respect. The other day I was in British Columbia and some people came up to me to talk about this policy, people who want to be part of the fabric of this nation, who want to have access to the two greatest western cultures, the French and the English. There are other components—

Mr. Oberle: Too much, too fast. Start in the schools.

Mr. Chrétien: We have made much progress in Canada and we should try to put the progress into perspective and not speak only about the difficulties. After two years in this position I can say that I was somewhat worried when I assumed the position because of my own personal background. I was worried that some people would assume that I had ulterior motives in doing what I was trying to do. I think the reception of the whole public service and the willingness of public servants to participate in this policy is gratifying. I think we have made a lot of progress and everyone is helping to develop a better understanding within our nation.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) must have put a lot of time and effort into the drafting of this budget. It is obvious that this has not been a hasty effort or one lacking in ingenuity, either. It took an awful lot of planning, enterprise and expertise to prepare a budget that does not contain a single, solitary item that should have been in the budget. In fact, it is such a sterile and useless document that the Minister of Finance might have used his time to better advantage, possibly rounding up some money with which to buy long-range patrol aircraft for the Canadian armed forces. There are so many things missing from this budget that it might become famous as the case of the missing budget. It might have to share billing with Keith Spicer's famous annual reports on the failure of bilingualism in the public service, or that infamous volume of instructions on how to tender for contracts at the nation's federal airports.

● (1640)

Because of its shortcomings, this budget is guaranteed a place in history, the history of "nothing" budgets, "nothing" reports and "nothing" programs, because there is not a program in it. It was inspired and inaugurated by the Liberal aggregation across the floor. It is not surprising that the advisers of the Minister of Finance disagreed with him as to what kind of budget this is. The finance minister said that it is slightly stimulative and mildly expansionary. His economic advisers are reported to have described the budget as mildly restrictive. Surely, a minister responsible for approving and tabling national budgets should know the difference between expansionary and restrictive policies; at least that is what I hope.

Things do not change much from day to day around here in the life of this Trudeau government. It staggers along in disarray and chaos. The situation has become so bad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet are now unable to confront the confusion, corruption, hypocrisy and ineptitude of his administration. The multi-million dollar loss incurred by either one of his two ministers, or both, in the ill-fated Lockheed deal is the latest albatross around the neck of the Trudeau government, and the best thing the Prime Minister could do would be to sack both the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). The government's policies are damaging our economy, or what is left of it.

We had the dubious distinction last Thursday afternoon of being the spectators of stormy scenes here on the Hill, brought about by the demonstration of the Quebec milk producers. That demonstration proved to be quite impressive. I can appreciate their milk marketing problem because I come from a farm background. I have milked cows and helped produce milk at ridiculously low prices in the past, and I have witnessed milk surpluses in my area as well as nationally. Nevertheless, I cannot condone the damage done to public property by a small minority of the Quebec milk producers. If this deliberate vandalism does not stop, the government should ban all demonstrations on the upper concourse in front of the Peace Tower and permit demonstrations on the lower level of the front lawn only. Persons and property must be protected. That is the first duty of the government. But the Prime Minister can blame himself and his own policies to a great degree for the terrible state of general insolvency in the dairy industry in Canada today.

The Prime Minister has been the chief abettor of the main grievance of the Quebec dairy farmers, namely, the accumulated surplus milk products and the lack of market for this surplus. I want the House to pay special attention to the following: The Prime Minister's importing this year of 50 million pounds of cheese, much of it from the European Common Market, which is part of his much vaunted contractual link with that group of nations, only contributes to our own surplus. This represents about 500 million pounds of milk and costs our producers an additional $3.6 million over and above our current surpluses. This import item of cheese was one of the chief points of protest raised by the Quebec milk producers.

One of the statements made by the finance minister on budget night sticks in my mind and worries me, but I think it was the closest the minister has ever come to levelling with us. He said: "The outlook for 1977 is, of course, much more uncertain at this time." Every finance minister since the present government took office could say, and in many cases did, that the coming fiscal year looked uncertain. We have lived for a long time in that atmosphere of uncertainty—too long—and it shows up in everything we see when we summon the nerve to look around us.

I just have time to look in one more direction at present. We should consider our manufacturing industry and certain parts of it. The budget does nothing for our manufacturers, our secondary industry and especially for the textile industry. The Canadian textile industry, in all its facets, is in deep trouble and severely depressed because of our damaging imports of vast quantities of low-cost offshore products. I received a protest from Celanese Canada Limited, the owner and operator of a large plant at Millhaven in my constituency of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington. I want to put that protest on the record. I have a letter here from Celanese Canada dated May 17 which reads in part as follows:

Dear Mr. Alkenbrack,

Further to my letter of April 15th, the polyester yarn business continues to be severely depressed. You may have noticed since that our competitor, DuPont, has deferred the opening of a new plant at Coteau-du-Lac, Quebec.

We have now found it necessary to cut back production further at our Millhaven, Ontario plant. This entails the lay-off of an additional 94 employees, bringing to 465 the total number of jobs lost this year in the Company's polyester filament yarn operations in Ontario.

I also received a resolution from the county of Lennox and Addington. The county government is so concerned about this that it sent this resolution to me, to many other elected representatives in this House and in the provincial government in Toronto. The county government goes back quite a way in the record of this government. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas on May 14th, 1970, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, Minister, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, tabled a document known as the Canadian Textile Policy;

And whereas its intention was to give the textile trade in Canada—

That is referring to Mr. Pepin's document which he tabled.

—the necessary protection against low-cost and damaging offshore imports;

And whereas on the local scene there is much evidence of the Canadian textile industry being in serious trouble as evidenced by large lay-offs in two main fibre producing plants in this area and cut-backs in expansion of facilities and a slow down in production of output;

Now therefore the council of the county of Lennox and Addington requests the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—

That is, the present minister.

—to hasten the implementation of the immediate and long-term remedial action necessary to bring the textile trade in Canada to an acceptable economic level.

I also want to bring to the attention of the House and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) that a major recommendation has been made to him by the Clothing and Textile Board with regard to polyester yarn and filament. It has been in his hands now for five weeks. The minister promised to table it in the House and to table his answer within 15 days. I ask the government, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Prime Minister as well: In light of the serious situation now present in the general textile industry of Canada, why has this report not been tabled? Why has the minister failed to do this?

The Canadian economy at the present time is all tied up in knots, and the example I just gave is just one of the complaints. The Canadian economy is tied up in knots with the gold-dust twins, Jean-Luc Pepin and Beryl Plumptre, grinning and fawning as they try to justify their enormous salaries and preemptive power over every aspect of our economy. This is what the present government told Canadian voters in the 1974 federal election campaign could not possibly work. The Prime Minister was right, even as he was deceiving the voters into returning this government to office. Soon after the election, this government implemented a program of wage and price controls that had been drafted and approved long before the election campaign. The finance minister of that time has since resigned from the cabinet and from the House. There can be no doubt that the former minister knew a lot that we did not know, and do not know to this day, and that it was too much for him to accept and to live with and remain in the government.

● (1650)

We could have been less honest with the voters at that time, but that is not Conservative policy. We could have warned the people what to expect in the way of controls and restrictions if the then government were returned. Instead, we proposed a program—a sensible program—of selective income and price restraints, tied in with restraints in federal government spending—I repeat, tied in with restraints in federal government spending. The result of that honesty is history. The Prime Minister conned the Canadian voters and they turned down our sensible and reasonable restraints program. Now they are caught up in a gigantic and expensive bureaucratic web, and it is both possible and probable that our economy may never fully recover from the effects of these controls and restrictions.

I am surprised that the Minister of Finance did not use this opportunity to respond to the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages and slash the budget for bilingualism in the public service, since Mr. Spicer says it is a failure. We could find the money to buy the equipment and airplanes we need for our armed forces simply by establishing realistic priorities for government spending. The billion dollars we need for aircraft to replace the aging Argus patrol aircraft has been available to us, but most of it has been spent on bilingualism—"squandered" would be a better word.

What do we have for that money? We have a level of inefficiency in our public service that is lower than at any time in our history. There is no merit system left. We have a morale problem both in the public service and in our armed forces that is a disgrace. Our country is divided as never before in our history, yet we are told continually that bilingualism is bringing our people closer together. The plain fact is that this government's bilingualism program is destroying confederation by creating the two nations that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has been warning against for the past decade.

This would be a good time for the Minister of Finance to come clean on the ill-starred Lockheed deal, a boondoggle that threatens our good relations with our NATO partners and could cost us up to $20 million for nothing. The Minister of Supply and Services has found a likely goat to hang the Lockheed fiasco on, a public service official who cannot defend himself. The minister claims that he was not kept informed of what was going on in the Lockheed negotiations, so the offending official must go. What a travesty, Mr. Speaker!

I simply cannot believe that a minister of the Crown, a minister responsible for federal government purchasing, could suggest that he was not kept informed of negotiations on the largest proposed armed forces purchase in the history of our country. Even though we have seen the ultimate in inefficiency and bungling among cabinet ministers in this government, I still cannot accept the minister's statement that he did not make an attempt to follow each and every step in the Lockheed negotiations. If he allowed other people to carry out negotiations on their own, without assuming responsibility for what was said and done, then he cannot do anything except resign his cabinet post. Passing the buck to someone in the ranks is simply not good enough. It would not be acceptable on the part of a public servant, and it is not good enough for a minister of the Crown. What we need more than anything else, though, at this point in time is the full story of the Lockheed deal.

If it is true that a senior official in the public service is responsible for the colossal blunder that promises to cost the Canadian taxpayer $16 million or more, then we should know exactly how it happened so that we can plug that loophole. If a senior public servant has been guilty of negligence, or has been guilty of assuming authority to disburse sums from the treasury that were not lawfully his to assume authority for, then his indictment must be supported by facts, not innuendo, and this evidence must be presented to this House. The members on this side of the House who moved for a public inquiry are to be commended.

If, on the other hand, this is simply more ministerial bungling, then that minister must be forced to accept responsibility for the expenditure and in fact the misapplication of millions of dollars of public funds. For the minister to simply announce that he has fired an offending public service employee is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, and the minister is not naive enough to believe that we will accept that as a full and complete explanation and expiation of this appalling example of negligence. This House, and through us the Canadian people, must be made aware of the full and complete story of the Lockheed affair.

Mr. Speaker, this might be the time and place to ask why the Prime Minister does not see fit to give us the full story on another case of ministerial shenanigans—the case of the Sky Shops contract tendering. My colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has done a great service to all Canadians by exposing the sordid details of the Sky Shops affair and I do not intend to add to or detract from that member's excellent efforts. I only wish to say that there must be some compelling reason why the Prime Minister insists on protecting those involved in the Sky Shops affair, in a conspiracy of prime ministerial silence. I cannot help but wonder, Mr. Speaker, if one or more of the principals in that sordid affair might have been among the anonymous donors of the Prime Minister's now famous swimming pool. Could that be the reason for his reluctance to have the full story known?

There is one item in the budget that I concur with, and that is the provision to extend the eligibility period of insured employment from eight to twelve weeks in order to receive Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits. I do not agree with all its ramifications, but I agree with the time limit. This is not a sufficient reason to bring in a budget, though, Mr. Speaker. This could, and should, have been done long ago by the simple expedient of tabling a bill in the House. There is one thing wrong with this item, though, and that is the effect that it could have on people in areas of high unemployment, such as in the maritimes. Some of the traditional jobs in the maritimes, largely in fisheries, have a seasonal duration of eight weeks and these people will not now be eligible for benefits.

I urge the government to re-examine this provision in the UIC regulations to see if there is some way that these people can be considered as exceptions to this rule—not fishermen only, but others as well. I know that exceptions lead to more exceptions, but these are worthy exceptions. I know there is a danger that the desirable effects of this change in the regulations could be watered down, but surely we should be able to work out some way whereby these people will not be further penalized by a situation that is unique to the region or area in which they live. They might well become victims of the very uniqueness of their types of principal employment.

I have also suggested that if a way cannot be found to include them in the benefit program, then these people should not be required to pay unemployment insurance premiums in the first eight weeks. It would be grossly unfair to expect anyone excluded from the benefit program to pay premiums. This principle is a sound one and it is in fact enshrined in the founding principles of the American revolution. The colonies, rightfully, refused to pay taxes to support a parliament in which they were not represented and could not therefore derive any benefit. This is a parallel to the question I have raised. I say that where there is no possibility of receiving benefits, there should not be the requirement to pay premiums.

● (1700)

Mr. Denis Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) and heard him often refer to the budget as a "nothing" budget, I might conclude he made a "nothing" speech. I promise to read it tomorrow and appraise it fairly.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the participation in this debate on the budget in the last few days is perhaps a repetition of some remarks already made. For some hon. members, it was congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), for other hon. members, it was an opportunity to speak on a topic, and for my hon. colleagues opposite, it was simply criticism, even negative criticism, because I heard nobody offer alternative solutions or even one alternative to the budgetary measures. In any case, I congratulate them for their participation in this democratic process.

I should like to join my colleagues who spoke before me to congratulate the Minister of Finance for his first budget. As the Canadian public on the whole seems to welcome it, and even if our most ardent critics from the media agree to say that this budget is trying to meet the needs of the state and of the economy at this time, it seems to me that perhaps the most important sector of our economy has been neglected namely agriculture.

It seems to me that there would have been room in the budget for these 5 or 6 per cent of the Canadian people who provide us with all our food. I will come back to this later. Even though I make this remark, Mr. Speaker, I must, in all sincerity, comend the Minister of Finance for several items of his budget.

First, concerning the conservation of energy, I fully endorse the proposed measures, namely the increases in the prices of oil and natural gas, so that the exploration and development of these resources may continue. Those who venture into that field assume enormous financial risks. It is very easy to criticize oil and multinational companies, but even if for economic reasons these companies decided to discontinue their research and exploration activities, we would be the first to feel the secondary effects of that decision. We would immediately be subject to the world price for oil, which would mean increases of almost 50 per cent, and I am convinced that this is not the wish of the Canadian people.

In my opinion, a price increase such as that proposed in the budget is a positive factor of conservation. We must realize that our per capita spending of non-renewable energy is higher than that of any other industrial country. It is a moral issue. We have no right to use more than our share of these non-renewable resources. We must leave their fair share to the coming generations. A price increase would therefore bring the desired effect, that is less waste.

In his comments my hon. friend from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) accuses this government of taking an overly large share of the tax on a gallon of gas—almost 13 cents. But he does not dare mention much higher taxes collected by provincial governments and particularly the producing provinces. At least that 10-cent federal tax is only aimed at protecting the consumers in the east of the country and if the hon. member for York-Simcoe wishes a return to the Borden line system he should have the honesty to admit it.

I wish also to mention the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system. Merging unemployment insurance and manpower services is certainly a step in the right direction as those two services have so many things in common. The qualifying period will be increased from 8 to 12 weeks, a change which also received strong support because, in fact, the 8 weeks were mainly for the underprivileged areas which only have seasonal employment. But like in any good program there are abuses and changes must be made. We had reached the point where full employment areas had so many profiteers who worked only 8 weeks to qualify and received their benefits when in the same areas employers were looking for manpower. Then, I endorse those changes in principle but I shall encourage the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) to bring about all those changes to help areas with seasonal employment and to adopt even stricter measures for full employment areas.

For the less privileged areas maybe we should have LIP projects on a continuous basis but strictly with the cooperation of municipalities. We could even return to our Opportunities for Youth Program but still strictly with the cooperation of municipalities. It would eliminate criticism that some of those projects were not productive. There would be an authority or I should say a control.

Without any doubt, several of those projects gave very good results in our communities but as in the case of the 8-week qualifying period for unemployment insurance there were abuses. I was listening to my friend, the hon. member for York-Simcoe when he criticized the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. He asked that the unemployment insurance system operate on the principle that we should collect as much as we contribute. But two lines further he says that he supports the principle that the government should give a revenue to those who need it.

[English]

The hon. gentleman cannot have it both ways. He either supports a social measure, or he does not. This is something like his criticizing the government's policy on the Olympic gold coin which is being minted to help cover the Olympic deficit. He managed to slip the subject into his speech to show his refusal to co-operate on any measure concerning the Olympic deficit. Yet while he says this in the House, his leader, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), is touring Quebec and telling the people of the province that if a Progressive Conservative government were to assume power in Ottawa, it would help the province directly to eliminate the Olympic deficit. Here, again, they cannot have it both ways. Inside Quebec they support the Olympics; outside Quebec they do not support them.

Mr. Paproski: When did he say that?

Mr. Ethier: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people are entitled to know where the official opposition stands concerning the Olympics.

Mr. Paproski: You don't know what you are talking about.

[Translation]

Mr. Ethier: In that budget closely following the anti-inflation program, it is fair and reasonable to expect stricter measures concerning government expenditures. This means a sacrifice for a number of our citizens, because the reduction of government expenditures directly affects the social welfare programs directly or indirectly under our jurisdiction.

The changes to the unemployment insurance scheme will require sacrifices from the residents of areas where employment is seasonal. Urban dwellers are also asked to co-operate since the anti-inflation program is in effect. Many young unionists have seen their collective bargainings rejected by the Anti-Inflation Board. However, they had expected a raise comparable with what they had received in the last five years, which does not seem exaggerated. Professionals will have to restrict their increase in income to a limit of $2,400. Businesses will surely be asked to accept a smaller margin of profit.

● (1710)

The people in rural areas were also prepared to do their share. They were ready to make a sacrifice just as the rest of our society, but a shared sacrifice and not one supported only by the dairy community.

This is the main reason for my intervening today. Following the demonstration of June 3, it is obvious that there is a problem, an uneasy feeling, but we cannot and should not accept this responsibility alone. I have been quite surprised that so few producers understand the responsibility of their own marketing committee since this committee is composed of their own fellow producers who, as a matter of fact, appoint their delegates to sit on the management and supply committee with the Canadian Dairy Board.

I have been amazed and humiliated, Mr. Speaker, to see how the delegation treated the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on June 3. I am sure several of the participants will regret this gesture, because they will soon find out how quickly they have forgotten their hero of the day before. Yes, I do say hero, for never in the history of Canada has a Minister of Agriculture done so much and in such a short time for those he is defending in cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, I would rather believe what many people have suggested, namely that this demonstration which was supposed to be peaceful turned out differently as a result of the infiltration of a few professional trouble makers. The large majority of producers are blaming the federal government for all the problems that the dairy industry is facing as a result. But the marketing boards have a responsibility and I would say it is their duty to better control the dairy production for 1975-76. They have done just the opposite. They have encouraged overproduction up to the very last minute. These marketing boards are operating under a provincial legislation so as to control production.

That is why I say we will never agree to assume full responsibility.

As regards the problem which dairy producers are facing, at the beginning of the 1975-76 dairy year, the Minister of Agriculture informed the marketing boards through the Canadian Dairy Commission that the money available for subsidies amounted to only $266 million, that is $2.66 per hundred weight of milk. Obviously they meant that all production in excess of 100 million hundredweights of milk would not be subsidized.

In August and September 1975, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Minister of Agriculture warned the producers and the marketing boards in particular that there was overproduction and that if this was not under control as soon as possible, it might have an adverse effect on the dairy industry especially in the industrial sector.

I read an article in the Ottawa Journal of May 8, 1976 where Ontario Agriculture Minister William Newman is quoted as still arguing that there is no overproduction in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, it is shameful for a minister to play on words in such a way. He knows very well the difference between production eligible for subsidies and quota production. True, the production has not gone over the quota but the minister should show a minimum of integrity and confess that our production was more important than what was necessary to be eligible for the subsidies and this is precisely where the problem is, namely the lack of money. The necessary production to be eligible for subsidies was 100 million hundredweights of milk and we have produced 112.6 million hundredweights. If we wanted to play with words, it would be very easy to say that we are not asking for a 5 per cent reduction but simply for a 15 per cent reduction, because last year we were asking for a production of 100 million hundredweights of milk and, this year, we ask for 95 million hundredweights to be eligible. But we do not want to play with words and we will not. There is a problem which must be dealt with, but before all we must be frank.

The problem is all the more important in Quebec because in that province there are two marketing bodies. The Federation of Industrial Milk Producers controls industrial milk producers and the Federation of Milk Producers controls producers of fluid milk and also the integrated producers, those who produce both fluid and industrial milk. I think that, here again, there is some misunderstanding. They too refused to assume their responsibilities and keep production below the necessary level to be eligible for subsidies. Here again, these two bodies are run according to a provincial law.

I think we are far from having a national policy with a single market for milk if, in one single province, they insist on keeping two federations, one for fluid milk and the other for industrial milk. I think that it would be more profitable to take some time to solve this problem of the two markets than to come and pour milk on Parliament hill.

Mr. Speaker, here are some propositions which might help this group which belongs to the industrial sector.

The cabinet could perhaps consider the possibility of creating a system to promote our dairy products on the export markets, at competitive prices. There might result a lower price for our dairy products but not necessarily a reduction of net incomes. For example, with regard to the producer who is getting nothing for the milk produced in excess of his quota, I am sure he would choose to get a lower price, but for his whole production.

It will now cost the producer something for having overproduced, for not only will he not be paid anything for the excess milk but under the existing policy the Canadian Dairy Commission could charge the producer for a product he has not been paid for.

So a good advertising at world level is imperative if we are to find outlets for our dairy products, even at the risk of products commanding lower prices. If, as I was saying earlier, producers were free to produce as much as they want, this would have a double impact: higher income for producers and lower prices for consumers.

I would like to make another suggestion, Mr. Speaker. We could perhaps urge provincial governments to get back to the old custom of distributing free milk in primary schools and providing milk at special or reduced price in secondary schools. Schools should even be forced to have automatic vending machines for milk; there are always some for soft drinks, but seldom for milk.

I would like to make another suggestion if I may. There is still this agreement between producers and the Canadian Dairy Commission about the levy, that famous levy which affects industrial milk producers only. It is intended to cover the deficit incurred by the lower export prices compared with the home-market price or the subsidized price. This five year old agreement ought to be renegotiated and the burden could be shared in one of the two following ways: Either by the industrial milk producer, the natural milk producer, the processing plants and the two levels of government which are also responsible to the producers, or by the provincial and federal governments.

This would help us dispose of our present surpluses and empty out our storage rooms, then we could use the same system which is being practised in the European Economic Community, namely do away with the levy and, as I have said before, do away also with the export support price as the common market countries do.

Right now, our producers find themselves in competition with the government of those countries and not with the producers and I think this is not fair.

Another suggestion would be to have a single market for the milk but there again, as I said previously, as long as we insist on having two federations in one province, that does not seem possible.

[English]

I was pleased to read in today's Montreal Gazette that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) informed the producers that a two-year moratorium had been offered on the repayment of loans to the Farm Credit Corporation. I hope this will also include the interest. If not, it means very little to the producers who have just contracted large loans, since during the first years very little is in the form of repayment of capital; it is mostly interest.

Another welcomed announcement by the Minister was that the present limit of 95 million hundredweight will be raised if farmers demonstrate their willingness to stay within their assigned quota level. As I have said, there is a serious problem for the industrial milk producers, and all those responsible should work together toward a policy or formula whereby situations such as the one we are not witnessing do not happen again. All those responsible should include the federal government, the provincial governments, the transformation plants, the fluid milk producers and the industrial milk producers.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this budget has been called a status quo or standpat budget by some. By others it is referred to in over-all terms as being fiscally neutral, a "wait and see" budget. That means we must wait and see if the American economy, slowly making its way out of its deep recession, will accelerate enough during the presidential election year to also lift our national economy by its bootstraps.

The budget, in essence, expects that the growth of the American economy will greatly improve the performance of our export sector. It seems to expect, at the same time, an increase of imports at reduced prices and thus improve our internal price structure as measured by the gross national product price deflater to 9.5 per cent. It projects a growth rate of 5 per cent which in real gross national product will just create enough new jobs to cover the increase in the labour force and thus leave us with average national unemployment that will remain at a seasonally adjusted rate of 7 per cent.

● (1720)

One of the disconcerting things about the budget, as I read it, is the finance minister's remark about the relationship between the present economic systems of control as characterized by the Anti-Inflation Board and what the economists call aggregate demand in the economy during peacetime conditions. He says on this point:

> A clear lesson of history is that controls cannot be made to work in peacetime in the face of excess pressures of demand.

There is scarcely anyone who would argue the point, but surely even a neophyte Minister of Finance can see that when you have a seasonally adjusted 7.3 per cent level of national unemployment, you do not have an "excess demand" situation but a lack of demand. It surely called for some tax cuts or tax credits for the low income groups in this country. This lack of demand tends to create a level of unemployment which is about the highest in the western world. Indeed, if we exclude the United States we can truthfully say that Canada has by far the highest rate of unemployment in the western world.

Some would like to deny the reality of what that means in billions of dollars in goods and services which are not produced and which quantitatively and/or qualitatively could improve the lives of many Canadians. These people also think that young adults and women workers, with their material needs and desire for work, can be dismissed by trite slogans or phrases such as "marginal attachment to the labour force" or "secondary workers". The very people who measure their own standard of living by the level of their family income would deny that the same criterion be applied to hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians.

The old bromide is still around, that there are lots of job vacancies if "they" would only look. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we now have estimates from Statistics Canada on job vacancies which include both full and part-time categories. As the leader of our party noted earlier in this debate, these figures show there are now 12 unemployed Canadians for every available job in this country. He stated:

> If every available job was filled tomorrow, there would be more than 700,000 Canadians who would be unable to find work.

The finance minister's remarks in the budget on Canada's central bank money supply growth targets provide clear evidence that a relatively tight money supply and an accompanying high structure of interest rates will be with us well into the future. The effect of this on our already overvalued exchange rate and the current account of our balance of payments—to say nothing of our own housing sector and investment in the business sector—and the likely consequent increase of unemployment is not seriously considered in this budget.

One may rightfully doubt that even a sluggish growth rate at this time, of 5 per cent, one which will produce 250,000 jobs and leave us with a 7 per cent level of national unemployment, will result from this so-called fiscally neutral budget. What if the game plan turns out to give us only 4 per cent or 4½ per cent real growth in GNP? It will take at least six months fiscally to stimulate the economy back to a more stable and acceptable condition. Recent Economic history in Canada seems to suggest that it takes about $800 to $900 million to reduce the unemployment rate by about one percentage point.

Mr. Speaker, this budget does nothing of substance to fight unemployment. In fact, in my opinion it may increase it. It talks about productivity, but does little or nothing about it. It does nothing to reduce Canada's increasingly high interest rates. It is altogether too dependent on the economic stimulus of the American economy. It might be considered a fiscally neutral budget in over-all terms, but in reality it is more of a do-nothing budget. It certainly will not be neutral in its effect on certain sub-regions and categories of people who can least protect themselves.

Granted, single parent families and families in which both parents work will be able to make larger income tax deductions with respect to child-care expenses. The most significant change is in the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Unemployment rates were recently at a 15-year high. What does the government do? Does it implement measures to stimulate employment? No. It makes it harder for those same unemployed people to receive benefits. This, despite the protestations of the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Andras), smacks of a cynical move on the part of the government to shift the blame of its failure to create jobs on to the very people who have suffered from that failure. On budget night the minister announced his intention to increase the number of weeks of insured employment from 8 to 12 with respect to eligibility for benefit. Regional extended benefits, he stated, would be related in a more sensitive manner to levels of regional unemployment. This second statement was taken as a concession to ease the burden of changes in areas of high unemployment. The Canadian Press story in the Halifax Herald of May 26 fell for this line when it stated:

> This will result in a longer benefit period in areas of high unemployment such as the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is not the case at all. Take, for example, a person who has worked for 12 weeks before losing his job, in a region with 10.5 per cent unemployment. At present, due to a system of national and regional extended benefits he could draw unemployment insurance for 44 weeks. Under the revised, and supposedly more sensitive system, he could collect for only 32 weeks. So much for helping the regions where unemployment is traditionally high!

I want to pursue this question of regional extended benefits. The minister claims they will be related in a more sensitive manner in future to levels of regional unemployment. The present legislation includes the notion of extension of benefits based on regional figures. The problem here is that the region chosen is, for example, the whole of the province of Nova Scotia. Let me show how this discriminates against the unemployed in Cape Breton, including my own constituency, that of Cape Breton-East Richmond, as well as that of Cape Breton-The Sydneys, Cape Breton Highland-Canso and other Nova Scotian ridings. Indeed, it applies to many ridings in the Atlantic provinces and probably through Quebec as well.

Under the normal labour force surveys carried out by Statistics Canada, Nova Scotia is divided into three economic zones for the purpose of measuring unemployment. Group four consists of the four counties on Cape Breton Island. Group five includes the eight counties from the Strait of Canso to the Bay of Fundy. Group six comprises Halifax County including the well-off Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area and the South Shore counties. The average unemployment rate in these three groups varied widely for 1975. Group four—Cape Breton Island—had 13 per cent unemployment. Group five had 7.5 unemployment. Group six experienced 6.2 per cent unemployment. But the unemployment rate for Nova Scotia as a whole was 7.8 per cent for 1975.

● (1730)

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration last Tuesday, I think it was, when he made his speech claimed that almost half of those who were in the category of the eight weeks are under the age of 25 and many are working wives and young persons living at home. What he left unsaid was that over half are over 25; 75,000 are between 25 and 34; 41,000 are between 35 and 44; 35,000 are between 45 and 54; and 19,000 are between 55 and 64. As for the charge that some of these people represent only a second income to the family, according to the 1971 census 6,200 heads of households in my riding draw less than $5,800. These families, surely, should not be denied a second source of income by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Further, the minister said that only 30 per cent of the 8 to 11-weekers have established a seasonal repeat pattern. That is only 110,000 Canadians in the course of a year. That is 110,000 people who quite probably will not even be able to remain where they are to work those 8 to 11 weeks per year if this measure passes. Has the minister given any thought to what will happen to these seasonal enterprises if the people can no longer stay in the area to work for the two months because it does not provide the necessary stamps to carry the person over the winter? Job creation is the proposed solution to the gap left by these measures. I suggest this is a sham. In reality it will be just replenishing the slashed coffers of LIP. LIP programs were cut in the last Turner budget, and now in reinstating some of the cut money the government tries to present this as a solution to high unemployment regions.

We will probably wind up making jobs for a couple of months so that people will be eligible to collect unemployment insurance benefits under the new qualification period. What does the Conservative manpower critic, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), have to say about this mutilation of a fine piece of social legislation? Five years too late, he says, and he brags about amendments proposed by himself in 1971 to increase the insured period from 8 to 12 weeks. It is easy to see that the hon. member for Hamilton West does not have to live with serious structural and seasonal unemployment in his constituency. He may feel that people in his riding work for eight weeks, quit and draw pogey and then get another job. In many areas of this country the possibility of another job is just not there. I suggest the hon. member should listen to some of his maritime colleagues on this subject.

I want to return again to the question of unemployment regional figures and to show that under the present legislation the definition of "region", when it includes the whole of the province and does not include the sub-regions which are used in a labour survey conducted by Statistics Canada, completely discriminates against those areas of very high unemployment. In other words, in the example I gave previously, the fact that you have such low levels of unemployment, from 3 per cent to 4 per cent in the Halifax-Dartmouth region—which is part of region six—lowers the average level of unemployment, and therefore the extension of regional benefits to areas like Cape Breton Island is away down and we are getting gored in two ways. First, we are not getting the jobs, and we are not getting the compensation we should get because of the lack of jobs. As I mentioned in the example of Cape Breton Island, it has the worst of both worlds. It has the highest unemployment in the province, yet it is included with the Halifax-Dartmouth region which has had full employment, or much less than 6.2 per cent.

Under the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has not given any indication that they plan to change the definition of "region" and, therefore, the basis for regional benefits. All the minister has to do to make the benefits more sensitive to the region is to follow the sub-regional patterns of unemployment that Statistics Canada already uses for its labour force survey. Regional benefits were designed to help areas with high unemployment, and Cape Breton, among others, is not being given its fair share of benefits. To repeat, our ox is being gored twice, as it were: first, in being forced to put up with intolerable rates of unemployment, and then in not getting fair compensation for the people suffering from these hardships.

By such devious statistical sleight-of-hand, this government gets out from under the moral and legal obligations accepted when the act was changed in 1971 to protect the unemployed who sincerely could not get work. God knows, we have battled long and hard for government policies to be designed to give them permanent employment, and we know from living with these people that 80 per cent to 85 per cent of them would be glad to have a job. This is particularly disturbing when we see that a recent study published by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, "Climate for Regional Development", which was published a few months ago, purported to show that during the 1970s economic progress, as measured by per capita national income, has increased in the Atlantic region in general.

It is even more optimistic about DREE's work in the Atlantic provinces, for it shows a pretty graph that reveals that even earned income per capita has increased for the Atlantic provinces. Alas for the DREE study. Mr. André Raynauld, the head of the Economic Council of Canada, said before the Standing Committee on Regional Economic Expansion that any increase in income levels in the Atlantic provinces vis-à-vis the rest of Canadian provinces is the result of transfer payments. It can also be documented from Statistics Canada that unemployment in the Atlantic area has increased since the inception of the anti-inflation, restraint program.

However, this study done by DREE showed that in Nova Scotia, for example, the disparity between the central core, that is, Halifax-Dartmouth and the peripheral area, including the whole of Cape Breton—with some 160,000 people—and southwestern Nova Scotia, advanced from 31 per cent to 37 per cent during the 1970s. When you consider that the 1971 census showed that Sydney, the only city in Cape Breton, had a per capita income that was only 68 per cent of the Canadian average, this is a disturbing trend. Glace Bay, the largest town in my constituency, was then only 54 per cent of the national average, and New Waterford, the next largest town, was only 48 per cent.

Little wonder that the former national Progressive Conservative party leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), recently was quoted as telling a dinner meeting of the Dartmouth Chamber of Commerce, as quoted in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, the following:

● (1740)

> The disparities within our region have become just as great as those between our region and central Canada.

What is equally true for New Brunswick is more true for Newfoundland, and just as true to a large extent for Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration would have more to say on the matter. Did the Minister of Manpower use the occasion of his speech during the budget debate to enlighten us? The said fact is, so far as I am concerned after reading his speech, that we have to say "No." Is this government actively pursuing a policy that is linked to the concept of full employment? No. The minister says:

> Our goal is the fullest employment rate possible, in light of inflationary pressures and the international economic situation.

These two qualifications are being used as an excuse for inaction. The Minister of Manpower quotes the Economic Council of Canada, but he does not heed their comments in regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The ECC's study, "People and Jobs", on page 39 says—and I hope all Liberals will listen to this:

> We believe that most Canadians affected by unemployment are well served by the unemployment insurance system and use it honestly . . . It would of course be possible to try to eliminate abuses by cutting certain categories of claimants or the duration of benefits, or by extending the period of work, before claimants could become eligible for benefits. But such recommendations could prove harmful to persons most exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment.

The report by the Economic Council of Canada recognized not only the fact that most Canadians use the program honestly, but also that it provided transfer payments to persons most exposed to uncertain or seasonal jobs. Unemployment insurance serves as a major income-stabilizing element in the economy, safeguarding purchasing power at crucial times for groups and areas that would otherwise suffer. This safeguard, I fear, is about to be knocked down for these groups and areas when they most need it.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about what these proposed changes could mean for my area. According to our local Manpower centre, which I might add is most helpful in providing needed information, there are 11,000, out of a work force of 44,000, unemployed in industrial Cape Breton. This represents 25 per cent unemployment. That does not include student summer unemployment. The record of this government, as we see the unemployment situation across the nation at this time of year, especially among students, is absolutely abysmal. The government is waiting until next fall to come up with a program.

Our local economy is on the ropes and the government is about to provide a series of damaging body blows. The fishermen and fish plant workers, all seasonally employed, now have the added worry of not having enough stamps to collect unemployment insurance if it is a bad season. Even if they get 12, 15 or 20 weeks' work, the period for which they will be able to draw will be substantially reduced.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration has not been truthful with parliament with regard to this matter. What will happen to the steelworkers laid off with no hope of being recalled until well into 1977? The Minister of Manpower—cynically, it seems to me—tries to argue that the figure of 330,000 individuals who would be affected by the increased eligibility requirement is wrong. He suggest that 100,000 at any one time would be affected. This is akin to the general who denies he had 12,000 troops die in a year, but says it was more like 1,000 a month. He states that almost half are under the age of 25 and many are working wives and young persons living at home. What is left unsaid is that over half are over 25. Furthermore, the minister says that only 80 per cent of the 8 to 11-weekers have established a seasonal repeat pattern. That is only 110,000 Canadians in the course of a year. There are 110,000 people who quite probably will not even be able to remain where they are to work those 8 to 11 weeks per year, if this measure passes.

I noted in passing what the manpower critic for the official opposition had to say in respect of minimizing the action of the government. In fact, if I may say so, the financial critic for the official opposition and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration seemed to be vying with one another as to who should receive the credit and who suggested this thing. The financial critic for the official opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), congratulated the minister for adopting such a sound measure. During a question period after the budget I made up a little doggerel as I listened to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for York-Simcoe vying concerning who should get the honour on this occasion. It goes like this:

Where could Mr. Andras have gotten
An idea so stinky,
Likely from Cafik and Liberal Ontario
Colleagues who are blinky,
But also of course from those vaunted
Ontario Tories called sinkie and linkie.

The Tory manpower critic quotes editorials from the Globe and Mail to support his stand. He should also read the columnist on the same page. Geoff Stevens, in dealing with the budget, pointed out that tampering with the UIC legislation might gain the Liberals a few votes, but it would be a mean and crass political manoeuvre to hurt those in society who can defend themselves least. The member for Hamilton West is concerned about abuses and disincentives to work. Perhaps when he wants to quote editorials he should read the regional press. An editorial in the Cape Breton Post stated:

Finance minister Donald Macdonald estimates that about half of these workers will simply find work for the additional four weeks now required and thus will retain their eligibility. This estimate seems overly optimistic but, even assuming Mr. Macdonald is correct, the implication is that those workers only stay on a job long enough to qualify for the pogey.

In effect, they are shirkers who would rather collect UIC benefits than go to work. Yet they are the ones who will retain their eligibility. At worst, they will be inconvenienced by having to work an extra month.

It is the other half of these 330,000 citizens (or more than half, if our guess is correct), those who are genuinely incapable of finding steady employment, who will suffer in Cape Breton, during the present economic travail.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 5.50 p.m., pursuant to order made this day the House will proceed to the consideration of Bill S-35, to amend an act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act.

* * *

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT, AND TRADE MARKS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND LICENCE DATE

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-35, to amend an act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Goyer (for Mr. Lalonde) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (1750)

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I think I would be remiss in my position as health critic for the official opposition if I did not make a few comments at this stage on the bill. I am sorry that the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) both think it is of little importance and neither of them is here, having known well in advance that it would be coming up at this time.

We gave this bill a fairly careful look in committee and we learned a couple of things. I think the position which we took earlier in refusing to let it whistle through the House at all stages in one sitting, without any questions asked or any debate, was justified. We have seen examples that there has been a good deal of shortsightedness on the part of the government, and even a little bullheadedness when they dealt with this matter when it was presented to the House in the form of Bill S-9.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the bill deals with the repeal of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and replaces it with certain regulations under the Food and Drugs Act, provision 10, part C of the food and drug regulations. When this matter was first before the Senate, the Proprietary Association of Canada stated that they would require a December 31, 1976, proclamation date in order to have sufficient time to make changes in labelling and packaging to conform with this legislation. For some reason, the government at that time adopted a stubborn position and insisted on moving the date up to July 1, 1976. Very shortly thereafter it became obvious to the Proprietary Association of Canada, as well as to the government, that the representations made by that association in the first place were valid and that the date would have to be moved forward. So here we are, once again dealing with a bill which, if it had been carefully studied in the first place, and if the government had paid the slightest attention to the results of its consultations with the industry involved, we would not have before us now.

One of the reasons given, which struck me as rather strange, was that the principal hold-up which made it impossible for the industry to be ready for July 1 was the government itself because of its failure to provide certain numbers to its proprietary patent medicines, which are required in order that the labels be appropriately printed. When we were before the committee there was another show of gross sloppiness on the part of the government in that they had the parliamentary secretary speak on behalf of the government, but no officials of any sort. Indeed, there was nobody there to answer any questions on behalf of the government. The parliamentary secretary took a few guesses, but in the final analysis we had Mr. Don Harper, the president of the Proprietary Association of Canada, giving answers on behalf of the government.

Here was a man representing private industry answering questions in committee and trying to explain things on behalf of the government whose representatives were unable to provide us with the information required. I think that is a rather shameful approach by this government to parliament and to the committee system. It indicates a certain disregard, perhaps even a certain disrespect, for the validity of the work that committees do, because if the government had had regard for our committee's work it would have at least provided us with some experts or civil servants who could give us answers to questions.

We will not hold up this bill. As a matter of fact, we agree with its intent and we think it is necessary. We agree with the bill on the basis of assurances given us in written form that the provinces will be ready to comply with this legislation by April 1, 1977. We agree with it, also, on the basis of assurances given us by the Proprietary Association of Canada that they will be ready on April 1 with their new labels and packaging.

With those few comments, I will conclude my remarks. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that if anybody from the government side is listening—which I doubt—I hope they will have learned a lesson from this experience which suggests that if the job is not done right the first time, it has to be done again and in the long run this wastes everybody's time. We on this side of the House are not interested in wasting anybody's time. We think the government has a responsibility to try to run its business in an efficient manner, but in my view the manner in which this bill has been dealt with is far from efficient.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, whatever or however it happened, it seems quite clear that the mistake with respect to the date that was made in Bill S-9 needs to be corrected, as proposed in this bill, and therefore we are prepared to let it pass at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 10, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-84 proposes the abolition of capital punishment. I shall vote against the bill. By so doing, of course I shall vote to retain the death penalty for those who commit premeditated, first degree, coldblooded capital murder, call it what you will. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my colleagues in this House that no single issue, certainly since my election over two and one-half years ago, has caused me more personal concern and torment than the issue of capital punishment.

Some complex issues have been discussed during this period. I think of the efforts to deal with the economy, inflation and of course the frustrating issues of unemployment as well as the energy crisis. There have been more heated issues. We have only to recall to the judges' affair to establish this fact. However, in over-all terms the death penalty or its abolition contains such a tremendous mixture of values and considerations that the subject defies, at least for me, a logical or rational approach, and frankly, in my judgment, presents a problem that is incapable of a solution that will continue to be acceptable to all segments of our Canadian society and all regions of our country.

Likely by now most of us have had for some time a definite opinion on this issue. But the considerations that prompted us to formulate this opinion are not nearly so definite. A great deal of opinion has been based on religious considerations, and I think quite validly so. Much of my mail and the personal representations I have received have this basis. What is difficult for me, and I am sure some of my colleagues share this difficulty, is that we find different church groups taking diametrically opposite views on the retention or abolition of the death penalty. Similarly, I have many constituents, and I am sure I am not unique, who are members of a certain church who will disagree firmly and openly with the official view that the Church has taken. I suppose, therefore, I should not be too confused or even too surprised when I see two individuals in support of completely opposite positions quoting me the same Holy Scripture. That is the nature of capital punishment.

Another consideration involves the general concern regarding law and order, and in many cases it goes certainly far beyond concern. I detect a very real fear. People see an increase of some 25 per cent in the number of murders committed in roughly a five-year period, and they want a solution. Generally, people who are in fear look for a quick, simplistic and understandable solution. So the government has seen fit to bring in the peace and security package to this House for debate. It has tried to convince the people of Canada that this is one entire package, but really it is two different bills, Bill C-83 which deals at great length with gun control, wiretapping and other housekeeping amendments, and this bill. Bill C-83, the main thrust of which is gun control, has been debated in the House and it is now under discussion in the committee. Bill C-84 of course is the one we are debating now, and that deals with capital punishment. It also contains other provisions.

I wish to make another point regarding the conduct of the government in bringing in legislation such as Bill C-84. This bill has been highly touted as providing for a minimum 25 year prison term in place of execution. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said this 25-year provision is harsh, that it may be counterproductive with respect to rehabilitation, that it may increase the problems in our prisons and for our prison guards. He does not know whether the 25-year rule in capital murder cases will act as a deterrent. In view of all this I, and others, must ask why we have the 25-year minimum rule? The only answer I can find is that the government, by instituting the 25-year sentence provision, may garner enough votes in this House to abolish capital punishment. It is the price it will pay to eliminate the death penalty which is unacceptable to it.

What happens then if this bill is passed? There are two classes of murder. A person convicted of either class may receive a sentence of life imprisonment. In spite of the sentence, is the murderer eligible for parole? Sure. In the case of first degree murder, the minimum 25-year rule applies. Does this mean that a murderer convicted of a cold-blooded murder has to wait 25 years to become eligible for parole? No, that is not what the bill provides. It provides that after 15 years a man convicted of first degree murder may have his case reviewed.

● (1110)

What does all this mean? It means that life imprisonment is not life imprisonment but 25 years, and it means that 25 years is not really 25 years, it is 15 years. Yet, the government wonders why the public is confused and angry. The government saw fit, in bringing in this legislation, to support it with a great deal of publicity and a high cost advertising program to try to convince the people of Canada that the peace and security legislation could replace capital punishment in this country. We saw the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) on television and we heard them on radio. We received a great deal of literature, which must have cost the government a fair amount, and which was distributed to the people of Canada. Nevertheless I do not think that the government has been able to convince many Canadians to change their minds. I do not know what they have been able to accomplish so far as MPs are concerned. In their advertising they said that members of parliament should vote according to their conscience and not according to what their constituents want. They said this because they knew that a high percentage of the Canadian population is in favour of retaining capital punishment, according to the latest polls. In my riding the percentage in favour of retention is 84 per cent, and I believe it is 80 per cent across Canada. So, in their advertising the government is appealing to members of parliament not to vote in accordance with what the people of Canada want.

I do not believe they have been successful in convincing Canadians through this advertising program, and it is certainly not convincing many members of parliament to change their minds. In fact it seems that there is a hardening of attitudes among people in Canada with regard to this bill. We know, and much has been said and written on this, that there is to be a free vote on this issue. We also know that this is a government bill and that the peace package was brought in as government legislation. Bill C-84 deals not only with capital punishment, but with other matters as well. It is certainly the feeling of many of us that there will not really be a free vote on the government side, especially since we have been told that the cabinet will vote solidly for the bill.

Since I have been here we have had two votes on capital punishment in nearly two years, and since 1966 we have had four votes in the House on this issue. It appears to me that the vote will be quite close one way or the other, with the government making every effort that it can to ensure that the legislation is passed and that capital punishment is abolished in Canada, in spite of what Canadians want.

It is because of this conflict, and because I am not positive that this issue will be finally solved with the vote on this bill, that I am in favour of having a referendum on this issue. I do not favour government by referendum, but on an emotional issue of such importance it appears to me that if we are to solve this problem for any length of time we should let the people of Canada decide, not just the 264 members who are sent here to represent them. I would not want this practice to be extended to other issues, but I would certainly favour it in this case. If we have to bring forward bill after bill on capital punishment, eventually the government will be forced to carry out a referendum on this issue.

I made a speech on capital punishment in October of 1973 and at that time I outlined my reasons for being a retentionist. One is the fact that not much emphasis is placed on the relatives of victims of murder and all the attention is focused on the murderer after he has committed the deed. We hear a lot about the deterrent aspect of capital punishment. Many abolitionists say that the deterrent aspect of capital punishment must be proved beyond a shadow of a doubt. I really believe that capital punishment is a deterrent and I think I can use as many arguments as the abolitionists put forward to convince others that capital punishment is a deterrent. More emphasis should be placed on the fact that retentionists also have a conscience, certainly, this is true of a greater number than the abolitionists are prepared to admit.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

Then there is the subject of parole. Here again, if the government really wanted to demonstrate that it is going to tighten up the law and order legislation by doing what Canadians really want, then murderers would certainly not be let out of prison on parole after only a short period of incarceration. I think that Canadians have come to the conclusion that capital punishment is necessary because of the large number of murders that have been committed by people out on parole.

● (1120)

The matter of second offenders is a matter which should be considered in detail because many murderers have committed the offence of murder a second time. These people, under the rules of law and order we have in Canada, are not doing very much to convince the people of Canada that we should not have capital punishment. Second offenders most certainly should not receive anything less than the death penalty.

Those are the reasons I feel that capital punishment should be retained in Canada. I think the courts should decide, when somebody is found guilty of the type of murder for which capital punishment could be the penalty, what the penalty should be. That penalty should be carried out, and the Cabinet should not be permitted to decide that capital punishment should not be carried out.

I will close by saying that I do not believe retentionists are cold-blooded, hard-hearted, cruel or have no regard for human life. I believe it is easier to be an abolitionist than a retentionist. If capital punishment is retained, each of us voting for retention will have to bear some measure of responsibility each time capital punishment is carried out.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with considerable interest the debate on Bill C-84 to this date, and in particular, I paid very close attention to the statements made by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand) when he presented a brief on May 3, 1976 on the abolition of capital punishment. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) stated that the government of Canada, the ministry of the Solicitor General and he, personally, sees it as our first task in the field of criminal justice to protect the Canadian public against violent crime. I applaud the Solicitor General, as I am sure all hon. members of the House applaud this minister, since all of us in this House believe that the protection of the law-abiding citizen should be the first principle in the administration of criminal justice.

The minister further stated that capital punishment does nothing to protect the public, and those who argue that capital punishment does protect the public are using emotional, illogical and rhetorical remarks. Let me just pause at this point and quote from an interview with Ernest van den Haag, a psychoanalyst and adjunct professor at New York University. Professor van den Haag recently stated that he was in favour of the use of the death penalty for certain types of crimes. He said that it is indispensable. He said that the federal prisons—and he was referring to the federal prisons in the United States—now have in custody a man sentenced to life imprisonment who, since he has been in prison, has committed three more murders on three separate occasions, and these murders included both inmates and prison guards. The professor said that there is no further punishment that man can receive and that in effect, he has a licence to murder.

Professor van den Haag dealt with another case and said that when a man is threatened with life imprisonment for a crime he has already committed, what reason has he not to kill the arresting officer in an attempt to escape? His punishment would be the same. In short, the professor said there are many cases where the death penalty is the only penalty available which could possibly deter.

In deference to the Solicitor General, that was not an emotional, illogical or rhetorical statement made by the professor. The professor disagrees with the Solicitor General. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the statement made by the Solicitor General regarding deterence is open to question and interpretation, and that his statement that capital punishment does nothing to protect the public can be taken as a personal opinion rather than as a statement of fact.

In the statement on the abolition of capital punishment made by the Solicitor General there is a further reference to violent crime. Statistics have been brought in to show that the murder rate, as reported by the police in Canada, climbed since the last executions were carried out in 1962 from 1.2 murders per hundred thousand population to 2.4 murders per hundred thousand population by 1974. This is an interesting statistic because in the 12 years during which capital punishment was not carried out the murder rate has doubled. However, I must be careful because the Solicitor General states that those citing the increase in murder rates and concluding from those statistics that the lack of executions in Canada since 1962 is the reason, run the risk of deluding themselves and those who listen to them. I certainly do not wish to delude the House, because the minister went further and stated that the real problem is the growth in the rate of all violent crimes, and indeed, the growth of crime of all types both here in Canada and throughout the world in recent years.

I find little consolation in being told that I should not be incensed or distressed by the growth of the murder rate in Canada because violent crime has also been increasing. Could it be that the growth in the rate of violent crime in Canada and the doubling of the murder rate in a 12-year period just might be the result of a breakdown of deterrence in our criminal system, and that those who cause violent crime are very well aware of this breakdown?

Recently when touring the B.C. penitentiary, I and several of my colleagues were informed by the prison staff that approximately 80 per cent of the inmates were repeaters. In other words, they had not committed only one crime, but a succession of crimes. In all seriousness, is this an argument for making deterrence lighter or heavier? Are Canadians less law-abiding than they were 50 years ago, or are the same people perpetrating crimes, receiving minor sentences and being turned loose on society again?

It would be interesting to learn from statistics whether there are more people committing crime or whether the same people are being convicted on more than one occasion. Unfortunately, statistics tend to be rather dry in the reading, but to put the trend of murder in Canada in a better perspective, let me state that in 1955 there were 118 murders, while in 1974 this figure had risen to 539. I am afraid the trend of attempted murder is even worse than murder, according to Statistics Canada. In 1961 there were 74 attempted murders in Canada. In 1974 there were 524 attempted murders, so that in that 13-year period attempted murders increased seven to eight times, which I think is rather frightening.

It is not my intention to criticize the Solicitor General, but he stated that if those who suggest that capital punishment is an effective method of fighting crime were serious, they must argue that we should reinstate capital punishment for many more crimes and many more murders. I would only point out that in my humble opinion if the deterrents to all crimes were harsher, then those who prey upon the law-abiding citizen would have two choices. First, to be deterred by more stringent enforcement of the Criminal Code with longer sentences or, second, to be incarcerated for a period of time that would in effect protect the public at large. In those cases wherein the crime was so heinous and repugnant to our society that the ultimate deterrent should be provided, then the ultimate protection would be provided.

● (1130)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to agree with the Solicitor General that the concentration on the issue of capital punishment does not serve Canada well and that ultimately the peace and security legislation embodied in Bill C-83 is of much greater importance. I realize that by stating this I will be in conflict with some of my colleagues and the general public in Canada, since they perceive the capital punishment issue much as a mariner would view an iceberg. The tip of the iceberg is an awesome sight and which can be clearly perceived; however, the main bulk and danger remains below the surface where it cannot be readily identified. Bill C-84 is a high profile bill. I would recommend that all hon. members of this House proceed with the speedy dispatch of Bill C-83 through the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and third reading through this House, since the matters dealt with in this bill will ultimately have a greater impact on the protection of our Canadian citizens than will Bill C-84.

The hon. Solicitor General has quoted Professor Wilson who said: "It is a matter of dispute whether any penalty will have a deterrent effect on murderers, but surely the prospect of a long prison term will have as much as others." As a layman, I cannot dispute Professor Wilson but can only quote in rebuttal Isaac Ehrlich's recent article in the American Economic Review, where he stated: "Over the period 1933 to 1969 one additional execution per year may have resulted on the average in seven or eight fewer murders." My dilemma, Mr. Speaker, is that I do not know whether Professor Wilson or Isaac Ehrlich is correct in their statements and I doubt whether any of us in the House can make empirical judgments since experts disagree on whether capital punishment is a deterrent. Professor Wilson's thesis is that surely the prospect of a long prison term will have as much deterrent effect as capital punishment. The hon. Solicitor General has apparently heeded the words of Professor Wilson, since C-84 establishes the punishment for premeditated murder as life imprisonment with a minimum of 25 years incarceration as the answer to the protection of society from those who would commit premeditated murder.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote Mr. William F. Phipps, Chairman of the Penal Reform Task Force of the United Church of Canada who states:

> We submit that the very extensive prison sentences will put even greater pressure on the penal system. The legislation seems to eliminate most of the current incentives, and when the incentives are lost, the pressure inside the institutions will be considerable.
>
> These terms will also create a different class of prisoner, who will be living in a different "head space" from other inmates. Therefore, we would predict a negative impact on other inmates as they see their colleagues having no chance for parole. Some well informed people are predicting that these kinds of sentences will increase violence within the penitentiary system. A more isolated and dangerous "subculture" will surely develop.
>
> Many of the programs within our prison institutions will be irrelevant because they are geared to inmates who are getting out of the institution. There seems to be no accompanying legislation regarding rehabilitation for such long term prisoners.
>
> There will be an increase in prison population and therefore increased human pressures as well as increased cost.

He made a very interesting comment which struck me as something that I should certainly look into when he stated:

> What happens to the inmate when he gets out of prison after serving 25 years? Most sociological data in this regard would say that the person would be more dangerous coming out than going in.

These are not my comments but those of William F. Phipps, Chairman of the Penal Reform Task Force of the United Church of Canada. I must say it is a rather chilling prospect to find that, according to his group, we are creating a dangerous situation within our penitentiaries and throughout our penal system if we adopt the provisions of Bill C-84 as they have been brought before the House. I think hon. members would agree that whichever way we vote on this, the object of the legislation is to not create more problems than we already have.

Mr. Speaker, I was going to quote further remarks made by Mr. Phipps but I think that is really the sum and substance of his remarks. I think the dilemma that we as members face in voting on C-84 is that we are told on the one hand by experts that life imprisonment should deter murders that are not crimes of passion. We are told again that by incarcerating a premeditated murderer we have removed him from our society therefore he is no longer a danger. On the other hand, Professor Van den Haag states that you run into an additional risk if you fail to execute the convicted murderer. In that case, since executions have had an additional deterrent effect, you have failed to spare the lives of a number of future victims. Mr. Van den Haag also states that between the two risks, first, of failing to impose the death penalty because it does not have an additional deterrent effect and thus by failing to execute the convicted murderer failing to spare the lives of future victims, he would much rather execute the convicted murderer than risk the lives of innocent people who could have been saved.

Mr. William F. Phipps, the Chairman of the Penal Reform Task Force of the United Church of Canada, although not in favour of capital punishment, has clearly stated there is a disadvantage to long prison terms and that the pressure inside the institutions will be considerable. He predicts there will be additional violence. It would be fair to say that not only is there no concurrence regarding the deterrence of murder by the establishment of capital punishment, but that there are also varied views regarding whether life imprisonment or the 25 year sentence will protect our society or merely lead to acts of further violence by the establishment of long prison sentences. This, Mr. Speaker, is the quandary in which I find myself; the dilemma the government has to face and the decision that we, the members of the House of Commons must make and there is no clear evidence on either side.

Mr. Speaker, our system of criminal justice is based not only on deterrence but also on fairness. A person who has committed a crime, I believe, must be punished in proportion to the seriousness of the crime. When you kill a man or a woman with premeditation you do something which is irrevocable to the victim; his or her life is lost forever. The society which does not deal swiftly and justly with premeditated murder detracts from human dignity and in fact argues against the sacredness of life.

One paradox, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe has been raised during this debate is why, in one of the most affluent countries in the world, during a time of almost undreamed of prosperity—undreamed of by our forefathers—are we experiencing a rapid rise in crimes of all types, including crimes of violence? In a society in which there is no class distinction, where anyone can rise to the potential of his or her own abilities, why should crime be increasing? Throughout the ages, the oppressed, the landless, poorly educated, those who have no material goods have traditionally taken to a life of crime because they could not obtain by honest pursuits what they could obtain by crime. Is this the case in Canada today? Are our children deprived of education? Are there oppressed people in our land? Is our society so stratified the people cannot succeed by ability? Surely, the answer is no.

● (1140)

Why has crime in Canada increased? I am sure there are many components to the answer. Could one component be that our society has turned the penal system and Criminal Code into an inconvenience rather than a deterrent. Should we not consider this? It is not our object, surely, to make the punishment for crime a mere inconvenience, which will leave the criminal free to pursue his course when he returns to society because we have not put road blocks in his way. I am no authority in this field. I merely bring to the attention of the House one of the causes for the breakdown of law and order in society.

In my opening remarks I agreed with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), that the first priority of any member of parliament when dealing with criminal law is the protection of the public. Since experts have expressed grave doubts about life sentences, I must vote against Bill C-84. As an idealist I regret that our society is in many ways barbaric and cruel, as evidenced by the murders taking place in society. As a pragmatic legislator I abhor the taking of life. Nevertheless, the penalty must fit the crime. The Canadian people must feel that the legal system does not condone premeditated murder.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, a philosopher rightly showed that the more education gives a man liberty in his judgment, the more complex and shaded every issue appears to him. He sees the valid reasons both for and against, and becomes all the more incapable of taking sides. Obviously, this is a position that many members of parliament find themselves in on the question of capital punishment. Unfortunately for the politician, while he may philosophize with the philosopher, he must take matters one step forward, to decision and action. For many months and years now I have maintained the philosopher's position without coming to a full and real decision. However, having been forced to make a decision, it is my intention today not to outline both sides of the issue, both of which I have sympathy for, but rather to rationalize the side of the decision I have taken.

First, most of us have our own visions of what Utopia our society should hopefully evolve toward; then we rationalize and legislate toward such a better lifestyle for mankind. In the Utopia, there is obviously no requirement for capital punishment, because man becomes a self-actuated, self-responsible individual, maximizing his individual capacities in a creative and productive way born of respect for himself and for the individual rights of others around him. Such a society would require fewer externally imposed laws by government, because enlightened reason would have replaced force and irrational violence. In view of the affluence of our society, virtually total literacy, a population which has, on average, more than 12 years of formal education, securely and firmly based churches and our democratic government, one might expect our society to draw close to the reality of such Utopian objectives. But the reality of the situation finds us straying far, perhaps even regressing, thereby necessitating an agonizing and pragmatic reassessment.

The question of retention or abolition needs to be considered in a common sense way fitting the time in which we find ourselves, a time, hopefully, leading to man's upward ascent. As we move through time and space there will be stages in social evolution when punitive factors need to be imposed; at other times of greater order and enlightenment punitive factors can be moderated or even eliminated. While I prefer to support an upward or progressive evolutionary movement, in order to uphold the fuller, long-term interest and approach Utopia sooner I must accept that at times it will be necessary to recommend backward, punitive, even regressive measures.

When a democratic society attempts to move beyond the commonality of its moral ethics at a pace too fast for the overwhelming majority, such a democracy or government deserves its own inevitable self-destruction. Therefore it is necessary, in my opinion, to take into account the contemporary moral ethics of our society. It does not take an oracle for politicians, who are moulding our laws, to recognize that the basic moral ethic of today's society is that the most precious value is human life and the safeguarding of the free continuation of such life. If one person takes the life of another without a just cause, and the just cause is commonly defined as approval by the state, as in war; and if these two lives are weighed equally before the court, the death sentence is inevitable for the murderer.

A regulation against capital punishment would necessarily value the life of the murderer more than the life of the victim, since the life of the murderer would become untouchable. This, in my view, does not conform with the aspirations of justice maintained by Canadian society. Hence, capital punishment should remain as a possibility, no matter how rarely used, in order to further safeguard our lives and preserve the ethical equality before the law of all human beings. The victims of brutal murders had a right to life. The crime of murder is equally on the hands of the state as it is on the hands of the murderer himself. An individual living in a non-state or a state of anarchy carries his own responsibility for his personal protection and security. In an organized state he subjugates and passes his right of self-determined security by any means, including murder, to the state. In transferring this authority the individual expects to gain from that society the guarantee of his right to life, personal safety and security.

The state by allowing, for whatever reason, the murder of the individual has become itself a party to the murder and thereby has an obligation, not only to the victim of murder but to those other individuals who remain in society, to demonstrate the equity of the value of life to the state by providing that the value of the life of the victum is no less than the value of the life of the murderer. Society owes not only the victim but other members of society who have abrogated their rights of self-determined security to the state a demonstrated expression of equity in the form of capital punishment. That the state has the right to take life is necessarily obvious in that, in order to defend the sovereignty of its law, a state must maintain the right to defend its territory and laws from an aggressor. If a state does not maintain the right to kill in a defensive war, the law and thereby the state itself has no force, authority, or security. If a state maintains, as it must, the right to take life, particularly in face of an external threat to its sovereignty, then it too has an obligation and a right to take life internally when the right to life has been violated within the state.

● (1150)

When the state or its individual components, basic security or right to life or law are violated, the murder of an individual component of the state is in fact murder of the state itself. The killing of a murderer by the state is not revenge, it is rather self-preservation and the ultimate statement of intent to guarantee, as far as possible, the security of both the individual component parts, the people of the state and the state itself. The strongest instinct that man is born with is the instinct of self-preservation which, in turn, formulates his understanding of his most basic right and that is his right to life.

If the state refuses to uphold his most basic right with the ultimate penalty for the ultimate crime, why should the individual within the state continue to abrogate his right of self-determined protection to the state? If the state will not protect his right to life, does the individual regain by default the right of self-determined protection? Will the policeman or the prison guard or the individual not take this law then back into his own hands?

Killing is a natural part of the balance of the environment. Murder, on the other hand, is offensive to the environment. Murder is wanton, wasteful killing that upsets the social balance of the environment. One of the most basic reasons for man collectivizing to form a state is to ensure his own personal security in a balanced, lawful, and orderly society. Murder upsets the social environmental balance. The killing of a murderer stabilizes and re-establishes social balance and order within the environment of the society.

The acceptance and adherence to law is a matter of a broad and general public perception. Some enlightened people obey the law because they perceive the law to be right and just and because they know that because they live in a democracy, they have the opportunity for direct participation in the formation and changing of these same laws. However, the majority seem rather to obey the laws that they perceive; that should they break the law, justice will be certain and swift. I am more certain to be caught, more quickly caught and convicted for over-parking at the airport than caught and convicted for premeditated murder.

Unfortunately, the broad perception of law and order in today's society is that justice is unsure, uncertain and even improbable. This negative perception is enhanced when governments are either unwilling or unable to uphold and enforce their own self-made laws, or when the law makers themselves, even in a minority, are perceived to be dishonest and corrupt. Unfortunately, this negative perception is the perception that abounds in Canada today.

Through the focus of this debate, the problem is further compounded in that the broad perception in the minds of Canadians is that this vote on capital punishment is a symbol of the intent of the government to re-establish the upholding of law and order. If the retentionists win the battle by defeating this abolitionist bill, the abolitionists still win the war because the limitations of the existing act then remain in force, and while the government of the day remains temporarily in power it will, in all likelihood, continue its abolitionist stance through the commutation provisions still available to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet. The retentionists will, however, have some solace knowing that they have raised the level of perception of the intent of the government to uphold the existing laws and order in Canadian society.

Not only must the question of the state moral ethic of the nation attempt to be determined, but also the church moral ethic requires examination. This is a considerably more difficult position to ascertain because of contradictions between and within the various Christian denominations.

The Pentecostal assemblies of Canada quote, amongst other things, the Bible, Numbers 35, verse 33, and verse 31 which read:

> Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death.

They also quote Genesis 9, verse 6 and Romans 13. Ephesians 4, verses 31 and 32 and Matthew 5, verses 38 and 39 might well be cited by those on the other side of the question, the United Church of Canada which comes out clearly for abolition. They cite Matthew 5, verses 38 and 39 which read:

> Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

[Mr. Wenman.]

They may also quote Exodus 20, verse 13:

> Thou shalt not kill.

I could list other examples.

In the face of such contradictions by the various church establishments, the individual member of parliament is, even on the moral question presented with both positions, left personally to make his judgment as to the broad consensus of the Christian Church.

In the research and consultation that I was able to undertake, it seemed clear to me that while the establishments and hierarchy of some church organizations speak strongly and clearly in favour of abolition, an interdenominational broad poll from coast to coast would show that Christians in general are in favour of retention of capital punishment and, taken as a group, would exceed the percentage reported by the various polls in the nation's news media. While I cannot fully substantiate this claim, I doubt that there are many neighbourhood church leaders who would refute this probability.

Abolitionists tend to centre their case around the question of deterrents and varying forms of empirical statistical analysis. Between the years of 1970 to 1974, during which time Canada was in a situation of de facto abolition, Statistics Canada provides the murder statistics as printed in the text I speak from today. While from these statistics I could claim that the murder rate had increased 25.9 per cent across Canada and claim that the reason for the increase was because the death penalty was in fact not invoked during this period, I reject that claim in the same way that I reject the claim of the abolitionists who will produce alternative sets of figures and interpretations to make their case. In my opinion, all these statistics indicate is that the murder rate is clearly up but the reason for the increase in the murder rate is not solely due to the effectual abolition of capital punishment, as currently practiced, but is rather only one factor in the increase in murder rate; the actual causes being the sum total of the many variants relating to the lifestyle, economics, morality and values prevalent in our society during any given period.

Similarly, comparing murder statistics in abolition countries and non-abolition countries of wide cultural and value differentials lacks considerable credibility or validity. Comparisons of different regions to ascertain the deterrent value of capital punishment must reckon with such factors as the homogeneity of the society and its traditions, and whether these have been lawless or law-abiding. Even regions within a country indicate variations. It is not surprising, therefore, to see that in the Northwest Territories the increase between 1970 to 1974 was 14 per cent, while in British Columbia the increase was 47 per cent. New England also, as another example, as might be expected, has had a low murder rate over the centuries. Rising racial animosity in Boston and its suburbs seems likely to change this tradition as it has drastically altered the social climate of Philadelphia and San Francisco.

● (1200)

I make these points, not to make a case for the retentionists but, rather, to question the cornerstones of the abolitionist argument. I suggest that the bric-à-brac of the statistical by-play game has little real value and is invalid, or at the least misleading and inconclusive.

Abolitionists often attempt to discredit retentionists by claiming that they are emotional and non-objective. I suggest that more often the opposite is true. If we were to shun emotional response and look for objectivity and reason, the argument might well follow in this manner: living on a small and delicately balanced life support system, mankind, through his unbridled consumption and over-population has embarked on the irreversible self-destruction of his environment; the obvious end to this process is a lawless and chaotic struggle for depleting life support systems. Murder statistics show that where the population is extremely high, with extreme affluence at one end and extreme poverty at the other, the incidence of lawlessness, including murder, is also extremely high and increases rapidly. In order to restore a balance within the life support structure, society requires discipline, law and order and balance. If we could be totally objective and emotional, logic would accept the elimination of murderers from that society.

Those who argue against deterrence as being a factor in the prevention of murder seem, somehow, to categorize murderers as some sort of non-persons. We have become so preoccupied with distorted sensationalism in our thinking about criminals that we have almost succeeded in persuading ourselves that all criminals are radically different from other people; that they are utterly indifferent to rewards and incentives, and that they are capable only of response to fleeting impulses or passionately uncontrollable forces from within. As police superintendent Tom Flanagan said in an interview:

> Don't believe for a moment that they do not prize their lives as much as you and I. They have families like you. They have jobs, albeit illegal ones. They enjoy living and put a high value on their lives ... Anyone who thinks criminals do not weigh the possibilities of getting caught and do not understand that they could be executed is talking absolute balderdash. Every sane person thinks about the consequences of his actions. Some of these people are brilliant strategists and there isn't any way you can be that if you don't consider consequences and accept the risks involved.

Some abolitionists claim that no one in his right mind would purposely plan to kill another human being. There is an implication that all murderers must be depraved or insane. I maintain that in many cases not only is a murderer perfectly sane and rational, but also that he may well be highly intelligent. In such cases it is not a matter of sanity but, rather, a matter of moral values. If a murderer is sane and rational, he is also capable of considering consequences and of accepting the risks involved. In the case of murders of this type, capital punishment could well be one deterrent factor which would convince such a person not to commit murder.

Assuming the rationality of the criminal and his adherence to a set of values different from that held by "normal" persons in our society, the alternative to capital punishment is limited to some form of brainwashing or life imprisonment. Are the abolitionists suggesting total life imprisonment, or some form of mind alteration along the lines of the "Clockwork Orange" solution? Or, if the deterrent of capital punishment is removed, do abolitionists support the alternative of maintaining prisoners who pass their lives in drug-induced docility in root-cellar prisons?

Another favourite and typical statement made by abolitionists is this, "We must be very clear in our thinking and our motives must be objective and unemotional." Then, in almost the same breath, they quote the line about Madame La Farge taking her knitting to the guillotine. Or else they hurry to this description of a hanging and its aftermath:

> Two wardens would then cut the corpse down, lay it out on the table in the pit for the coroner to tuck the tongue back into the mouth, plug all orifices with cotton batten and then, while we stood around the body, proceed with the inquest.

It is interesting to note how on one hand an abolitionist will condemn emotionalism, while on the other using it for his own purposes. Mr. Speaker, murder is emotional and it is impossible to consider the subject without emotion. As a consequence, it is not my intention to discredit abolitionists who use this emotional approach. At the same time, I would not expect them to put down retentionists who use similar emotionalism to express the retentionist point of view. The question remains: What about the victim found in a bush area off the parkway who had been bludgeoned and stabbed several times with a screwdriver, or the two little girls who were raped and then strangled with their own blue jeans?

Those who hope that alternatives to capital punishment might have been found and presented to the House must be dismally disappointed in Bill C-84. There is nothing in this legislation to indicate that prisons will be changed so as to ensure that they are more than merely warehouses for convicts. There is no indication that the social and economic costs of locking people up for long periods have been considered. There is no indication that the government has a clear conception of the objectives it wishes to achieve in administering punishment by incarceration.

How can an abolitionist, who condemns capital punishment on the grounds that it is nothing more than revenge and an expression of the retributive urge support, proposed sentences of 25 years mandatory for first-degree murder, and ten years for second-degree murder? These proposals guarantee a prison system populated by men and women without hope. There is no evidence to support the notion that spending ten years in prison guarantees that a woman who shot her husband will emerge a better and happier person for that decadent experience.

If the abolitionists were truly humanitarian, they would call for indefinite sentences, recognizing that one man's rehabilitation might well take place in one year and that another's might never occur in a hundred years. They would call for punishment to fit the crime and the criminal, rather than a process of fitting the crime and the criminal to the punishment. They would recognize that one man's punishment might well be another man's pleasure, and vice versa. They would urge that those with maximum potential for rehabilitation should be identified and the full rehabilitative capacity of our society brought into effect; that justice be tempered with reason, emotion, mercy and love. The 25-year provision is arbitrary, illogical and self-defeating and I oppose it firmly in favour of the rehabilitative principles I have just enunciated.

In a complicated and diversified society such as ours, the 25-year provision will have little more effect than to restrict the parameters of justice by limiting the flexibility now given to judges to make allowance for the multiplicity of variants in the nature and individuality of the crime and the criminal. Our system requires a broad and full range of options for punishment and rehabilitation—from pardon to parole, to prison, to solitary confinement, to capital punishment.

Like many other MPs, I questioned constituents regarding their views on the retention or abolition of capital punishment. While earlier questionnaires to the constituency elicited a return of approximately 8 per cent, the results of my last questionnaire showed that of 48,300 sent out, 7,885 were returned, for a percentage of 16.3. The tabulation indicated that 95.1 per cent of those who returned the questionnaire wanted capital punishment retained. Certainly, the value of such polls is not absolute. But whether the result showed 85 per cent or 98 per cent, the fact remains that it is a clear indicator of the broad, general feeling of my constituents and, in my opinion, of Canadians in general.

Like other members of parliament, I believe polls are only one of the factors which lead members to a decision on this subject. While I certainly did not agree with all the statements made in the hundreds of letters, telephone calls, conversations, interviews and public meetings, I might put on record a number of typical responses from constituents. Some thought there should be a national referendum and that the government should be bound by its results. Others pointed out that it cost between $10,000 and $15,000 a year to keep a prisoner in jail—money which might well be used to rehabilitate prisoners with a greater potential for return to the community.

● (1210)

Others say that we should strike a bold new step and bring back the noose; that until some better deterrent comes along we must retain the death penalty; that punishment must be swift and certain; that capital punishment is a deterrent. It is said there is a fundamentalist revival that recognizes revenge and retribution as valid motives for capital punishment; that we should vote secretly to avoid party pressure; that 25 years is a slow death; that capital punishment is justifiable homicide; that murder is an act of free will and the perpetrator must and should be held accountable with his life.

Others liken capital punishment to animal management and say that an animal that must be destroyed is destroyed without animosity or emotion but, rather, with cold, rational management. It is said that protection of the public is the most important consideration. Some ask, would the subject of capital punishment even have been raised if existing laws were enforced? Others say that responsible government is outmoded due to massive government intervention, that therefore there is confusion, and that consequently members of parliament should vote on a representative basis. Some feel the abolitionists should tell us how they will protect us. Still others claim that abolition has proved unsuccessful and they are tired of permissiveness, that now is the time to try severity. Some say that to propose the abolition of capital punishment for treason is treasonable; that we should not let the minority point of view of abolitionist members of parliament repress the will of the majority of Canadians. And so on and so forth, Mr. Speaker.

I could go on listing this typical kind of response that comes directly to all of us from our constituents. While I certainly do not endorse all of the sentiments expressed by my constituents in letters to me, the mood of the country is frightening, yet clearly expressed. In the final analysis, the government must reflect, at least to some degree, the tenor of the times, however much this distorts the priorities of reason. After all, Mr. Speaker, democracy can prevail only if the law reflects the will and tolerance of the people. It does seem clear from any broadly based assessment of public opinion that the tolerance of the people for a humane and, in the short run, somewhat riskier penal system is being strained to the point of breaking.

In casting my vote for retention I do so with considerable regret. The responsibility of a judge is heavy when he finds a criminal guilty of premeditated murder. But how much heavier is the weight and pressure of responsibility on a member of parliament whose vote is cast for legislation that will put a man to death?

As I cast such a vote for retention, I feel regret and sorrow both for the criminal and his family. I feel anger at the failure of the institutions of our society and the inadequacy of my own efforts within these institutions. I feel anger that the schools, after 14 years of education, have been unable to teach the young people of our community self-respect for themselves, let alone self-respect for others in the community. I feel concerned that the church that has preached loud through the centuries has been unable to achieve its objective. I feel concerned and disappointed that the home that is supposed to provide the base of security and acceptance for the individual has, instead, in too many cases, rejected the individual; and with the community rejecting the individual, resulting in criminality, that we then allow that condition to continue.

It is with great regret and responsibility, Mr. Speaker, that I shall cast my vote thus; and it is with a pledge to work hard to improve our society, to move it forward so that perhaps another day another time will come when I, along with others in the House of Commons, will find that the time has come to vote for abolition.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is regrettable that members of parliament should be put in the position where this very serious matter is being debated once again. I feel this way because I think the responsibility for this must fall on the shoulders of the government. If the existing law had been upheld, as everyone in Canada expected it to be, we would not be discussing this bill in parliament today. When this bill comes to a vote, although I should not be prejudging the outcome, if it is defeated, then having spent many weeks debating this very serious issue we will again find ourselves in the position of having to live with the existing law and wondering whether the government is in fact going to obey it.

The second reason I am on my feet this afternoon is that I want to restate some of the views I hold about this legislation and to put forward a view that I think is held by the majority of my constituents. We are discussing Bill C-84 which seeks to amend the existing legislation, which provides that a murderer can be sentenced to death for the killing of a policeman or a jail guard and that all other cases of murder are regarded as second-degree murder. I say again that if the government had fulfilled its responsibility to the people of Canada, we would not be discussing this bill today.

The points I wish particularly to discuss this afternoon have to do with the arguments that have been presented on both sides of this issue; the arguments presented by the abolitionists from various articles available to us and to the public, and the arguments presented by the retentionists. The abolitionists advance the argument that the death penalty is not an effective deterrent to prevent murder. The second point they make is that the imposition of such a penalty is contrary to all concepts of Christianity. Their third argument is that the hanging of a murderer is nothing more than an instrument of revenge. Their fourth argument is that all forms of capital punishment are objectionable and repulsive, and that the alternative to capital punishment is life imprisonment and a rehabilitative program.

To take the first argument of the abolitionists, that the death penalty is not an effective deterrent in the prevention of murder, I suggest that the deterrent effect of a certain punishment has two aspects: deterrence as it applies to the convicted prisoner, and deterrence as it applies to others who read about or otherwise learn of the imposition of such a punishment on a prisoner convicted by the courts. I suggest that such a penalty is the only deterrent that will guarantee that a murderer will not commit a murder a second time. Life imprisonment is certainly an assurance that for a given period a second murder will not be committed, but with the government doing some of the strange things it has done in the past, that is not much of an assurance.

Life imprisonment does not mean that a convicted murderer will spend the remainder of his life in custody. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, all it means is a lengthy term in a penitentiary. But let us suppose that life imprisonment really does mean life imprisonment and that it would be enforced as presently proposed in Bill C-84. There is still a danger, and no guarantee, that a lifer will not again commit murder in attempting to escape from prison. Surely there is ample precedent for this view, and the possibility of prison murder increases as the number of lifers in prison increases.

The second argument that the abolitionists put forward is that the imposition of such a penalty is contrary to all concepts of Christianity. It seems to me that there is a conflict here. It appears to me that those who would make such a statement have not read three particular passages in the Bible to which I might refer. The first is Exodus, chapter 21, verse 12 which states:

● (1220)

He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death.

The second passage, Leviticus, chapter 24, verse 17, states:

And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death.

The third passage, Deuteronomy, chapter 19, verses 11 and 12, states:

But if any man hate his neighbour, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and fleeth into one of these cities; then the elders, of his city shall send and fetch him thence, and deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood, that he may die.

Surely the aforementioned passages are the wish of God, who is the divine ruler of the world, and anyone who does not want to abide by his ruling should not say that he believes in God, because if he does not want to abide by God's ruling how can he believe that God will save him from eternal suffering? Furthermore, as the Fifth Commandment says, "Thou shalt not kill". That tells you what not to do. The aforementioned Bible passages are warnings concerning what shall happen to anyone who kills a fellow citizen. It does not mean that they should get royal accommodation and royal service. Surely they should not receive the kind of treatment this government has been dispensing since the middle 1960s.

The third argument that is raised is that hanging a murderer is nothing more nor less than an instrument of revenge. I think the simple answer to that argument is that if the murderer has so little respect for the life of the victim, then it certainly does not appear to me that if society has no more respect for his life, that is revenge.

The fourth argument the abolitionists put forward in respect of capital punishment is that it is objectionable and repulsive. I must say that that statement is true. But, Mr. Speaker, so, also, are wars repulsive. Surely wars in the defence of one's country are not nearly as repulsive as wars fought to save political face, as has been the case in recent times where hundreds of thousands of "cream of the crop" young men have died to save the political image of politicians.

Yes, killing in any form is repulsive. It is as repulsive to take the life of a murderer as it is for a murderer to take the life of an innocent victim. But if that is the law of the land, then each one of us as an individual has the responsibility to abide by that law. So that is a valid point. Killing is repulsive. Killings by murderers are even more repulsive. In wartime, a Christian may kill an enemy in battle to prevent the enemy from killing other persons. Under the guise of self-defence, a Christian may kill an assailant who intends to kill another human being. Therefore, why may not a Christian government provide a law for the killing of a convicted murderer in order to protect its innocent citizens? I submit that killing of all kinds is repulsive, but capital punishment is not in the nature of revenge; it is, rather, a punishment justifiably prescribed by law, a punishment aimed to have effective deterrent results which I am thoroughly convinced it has.

As a retentionist, I believe that the repeal of capital punishment could unleash on society a greater number of criminals to murder innocent people, to rape, to maim, or to betray their country. I firmly believe that many the capital murder offenders are beyond the rehabilitative process. Surely not all, but many are beyond the rehabilitative process, and therefore the risk is too great. I believe that without the deterrence of capital punishment, the lifer would be much more violent toward policemen and authority, and there is a possibility that the people responsible in institutions would have to have their authority extended for the purpose of greater retaliation and this, reasonably, could lead to a greater upswing in violence and murder.

I suggest that 25 years in jail, as proposed by this bill, is less humane than the death sentence. Life imprisonment, particularly where there is little or no hope of parole, itself creates tension and anxiety. Custodial officers are forces to segregate or watch lifers most carefully. This places upon those officials an onerous and difficult responsibility, with a constant awareness of the danger to themselves.

I have on my file letters from people who have suffered through having lost loved ones who are prepared at this point in time to take the law into their own hands unless the government takes very serious action in this regard. To the extent that this government has not obeyed its own law, there has been, to a degree, a breakdown in our moral values. How does a government expect the populous of a nation to respect the laws this parliament passes, when the government fails to obey them?

It is true that in many instances the death penalty is not a deterrent. A person who is mentally deficient cannot conceive of his own death. Capital offences are usually of an emotional, spur of the moment nature. They are acts which are not planned. That, again, suggests temporary insanity, and in most cases that kind of murderer will not hang. It has been suggested that juries, in the knowledge that a man may die, are less likely to convict. Therefore, the culprit often is acquitted, which makes a travesty of justice. I have more faith in the jury system of this country than I have in a minister of justice or a solicitor general who will commute a death sentence when there is not a recommendation of mercy from the jury.

In conclusion, I wish only to say that my concern is not mainly in respect of murders of passion, murders that are not planned—because they cannot be controlled. They will not be controlled by Bill C-84. They will not be banned unless we ban the association of human beings one with another. What I am concerned about is the premeditated murder, organized crime, the hitman, so-called, and the destitute who deliberately plans to commit a robbery or a felony, and does so. I think to them it is a deterrent, because they are indeed very astute people in the pursuit of their trade. If weaponry is part of that pursuit, then the penalty for the crime should be the ultimate penalty.

I think the proposals in Bill C-84 are inhumane. Recent surveys have indicated that lifers who have been interviewed would prefer the death penalty to a 25 year sentence without hope of parole. The rehabilitation process is expensive, slow, tedious and uncertain. There is an everlasting risk of recidivism. Some way that capital punishment is archaic. Well, so is murder. The only thing modern about murder is the modern weaponry used to mow down a policeman or a bank teller. On the basis of that brief statement, I intend to vote against Bill C-84.

● (1230)

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) and the members who spoke before him. They conveyed many of the sentiments that I wish to convey to this chamber. I am deeply concerned as I take the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon on Bill C-84. I do not propose to speak at great length on this legislation because, as I have said previously, many of my colleagues have already put forward many excellent arguments and any detailed remarks on my part would only prove repetitious on points that have already been made by these members.

However, I do wish to voice some of the sentiments and views of the constituents of Wetaskiwin on the extremely controversial issue of capital punishment. Nearly 90 per cent of the individuals who answered the recent questionnaire I sent out voted in favour of the reinstatement of the death penalty for all premeditated murders. Of the constituents who responded, 88.3 per cent said they wanted retention of capital punishment, 9 per cent favoured abolition of capital punishment, and 2.7 per cent agreed with the present law on the death penalty.

I found these results very interesting, particularly in light of a comparison between the current feeling and that of few years ago when we debated this issue. A poll of my constituency conducted in 1973 revealed that 74.3 per cent of the individuals who responded favoured reinstatement of capital punishment. Yet a large percentage—some 47 per cent—were willing to consider life imprisonment as a satisfactory substitute for capital punishment. Today, only 17.7 per cent believe that long prison terms would be an acceptable alternative to the death penalty.

Emotions in Canada are running extremely high because of the steady increase in violent crimes, in particular crimes in which the victims have been innocent, law-abiding citizens or law enforcement agents. Naturally, in view of the number of horrible murders and violent crimes committed recently in this country, the current major concern of all Canadians is the prevention and reduction of crime in order to protect our society. I believe that much of the strong feeling in my riding in favour of capital punishment stems from a concern over the lawlessness that individuals see everywhere today, and frustration over the fact that the law as it now stands has not been carried out by the present government.

I do not intend to involve myself in a discussion of the possible deterrent effects of the death penalty. Others have argued against the arguments of the abolitionists. The hon. member for Edmonton East recently put those arguments on the record. Rather, I would like to say a few words about the general scope of this bill. The government is presenting the citizens of Canada with an ill-formulated and, I believe, an unjust piece of legislation containing provisions on two aspects of conflicting principles which should more properly be dealt with in their own right.

The gist of the legislation is, first, to abolish capital punishment entirely in favour of lengthened imprisonment terms; second, to impose mandatory sentences of 25 years and 10 years to be served for first-degree and second-degree murder, respectively, without any consideration being given to the crime itself and the circumstances surrounding it. Little room is left for the exercise of judicial discretion. I think I am correct in saying that most retentionists would not advocate the death penalty for second-degree murder, say for a murder of passion resulting from a domestic dispute. The majority of these killings are unpremeditated, even accidental; the murderer would probably never again commit such a crime and therefore poses no threat to society or the safety of others.

While no one can condone the taking of life, for whatever reason, I believe that few people would maintain that a person who has no previous criminal record and who committed a crime of passion should be incarcerated for a minimum of 10 years. The punishment should be dependent upon both the individual's past behaviour and the circumstances surrounding the crime itself. To imprison a person who may contribute something of value to society and whose freedom constitutes no threat to the well-being of others seems both unfair to society in general and to the individual in particular.

I believe in the premise that if you put someone in prison, he can be rehabilitated. The same can be said of individuals who commit first-degree murder. Will a mandatory 25-year sentence really prove of concrete value? During the 25 years in prison, the prisoner constitutes a burden to the Canadian taxpayer. He is a potential escapee and poses a danger to other prisoners and prison officials. On the whole, I think that a blanket 25-year sentence is not the answer for all first-degree murders. Some individuals deserve harsher treatment, others could be treated more leniently. Again I reiterate that the punishment has to be suited to the crime.

It seems to me that there are, indeed, instances where the death penalty is warranted: for mass murders perpetrated by organized crime syndicates, for treason killings, political assassinations, ritual slayings, killings of policemen and law enforcement officers. Even for some cold, calculated murders planned for financial gain, the death penalty would not be unreasonable, dependent upon the circumstances involved in the crime. But there may well be mitigating circumstances in some first-degree murder cases, and these should be carefully examined before sentence is passed.

Let us consider, for example, a man who plans to slay his wife's lover, or who plots the murder of a drunken driver who has seriously injured or killed his child or spouse. This man would be extremely unlikely to ever kill again, and could doubtless contribute more to society outside the prison walls, after he has been punished, than by being incarcerated for 25 years. Certainly he must be punished, but the punishment must suit the crime.

The Canadian people are indeed concerned, with justification, about the recent rise in our crime rate. They want action, and this is something the present government has failed to give them thus far. Even though the law at present calls for the death penalty for murderers of policemen and prison officials, the cabinet has commuted every death sentence. Likewise, rehabilitation efforts on the government's part have proved minimal, at best. Once again, with the introduction of this legislation the government has failed the citizens of Canada and has failed to show leadership in this very important area.

● (1240)

We are faced with only one alternative: abolish capital punishment and enforce lengthened prison sentences, with no regard for the nature of the crime. Imposition of the death penalty and prison sentences should be discussed separately. They should not be part and parcel of the same piece of legislation. The circumstances surrounding each crime must be carefully examined before sentence is passed, be the sentence the death penalty or imprisonment.

However, the enforcement of harsher penalties after a crime has been committed cannot, alone, lead to a lower crime rate. More effective correctional and rehabilitation programs are essential for both juveniles and adults which will, as much as possible, ensure that a prisoner upon his release from prison will be fully rehabilitated and declared fit to join society again. The government must concentrate its efforts on providing valid, constructive rehabilitative programs in our prisons.

The entire peace and security package is supposedly designed to bring about a decrease in Canada's crime level. I fail to see how this legislation will prove effective in so doing, just as I fail to see how Bill C-83 will help in this area. Rather, I view this bill particularly as a thorn in the side of Canada's criminal law and jurisprudence system.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that capital punishment is a very difficult subject with which to deal. This has been amply demonstrated. There is the humanitarian standpoint and the standpoint of law and order in the state. A society without guidelines and ways and means of applying justice to those who would offend has nothing but anarchy and disorder. Justice must be meted out well and fairly to both the offender and the offended. Generally, in those cases the offender's peers sit as a jury and listen to all the evidence presented by both sides, and the judge sums up the case. The jury then carefully weighs the evidence to see that justice is done and that the judicial laws of this country are carried out. However, with this legislation I believe the government is trying to trade off capital punishment for long prison sentences to appease the people because of the long list of murders which have occurred since the government has failed to carry out any executions for the murder of prison guards or police officers since 1961. Let us look at the trend of murder from 1961 to the present time. We see that murders have doubled and that attempted murders have quadrupled. This is over a period of years when never have we given more to help social well-being in the community. Never have we spent more on housing, education and health. I am sure this is why the people of Canada have said they have had enough. They say that we have tried another plan and found it wanting. In my own constituency, people are overwhelmingly in favour of capital punishment. I feel that regardless of my own beliefs, I represent the thoughts of those people and in no way would I be responsible if I did not consider those wishes.

The carrying out of capital punishment should not be done by hanging. I think there are far more humane methods than hanging. A life can be taken in the quietness of a chamber with a minister or priest, prison officials and a judge present and giving the prisoner a period of time to make his peace. As an alternative, I could not be cruel enough, in any way, to sentence any man to 25 years in prison or a longer term if necessary—and that will be necessary because very few prisoners who receive a term of 25 years could be reformed or rehabilitated. All such a sentence can do is frighten or frustrate a man because of the long road ahead with nothing but hopelessness, walls and cells. Much better it would be to have the little white chamber and a quiet exit, than the Chinese water torture method of destroying a man's soul a little bit each day.

The minister states that cases would be reviewed in 15 years. At least all hope will not be taken away from prisoners. But 15 years is destructive in itself. A man going into prison at 35 years of age would be released at 50 years of age into a vastly different and rapidly moving world. Rehabilitation of this man would be beyond one's fondest dreams. Even if I was an abolitionist, there is no way I would have the heart or cruelty within myself to impose a prison sentence of this length with the hope of rehabilitation, knowing full-well that rehabilitation would be nearly impossible. If we take an active individual and sentence him to 25 years in prison, he will become a robot with no hope for the future.

I want to substantiate that statement with the statement of Dr. Boyd, who is the head of the institution for the criminally insane. Incidentally, Dr. Boyd was an abolitionist, but he now says that he is forced into taking the position that we must have capital punishment and he has retired entirely from his position of being an abolitionist. He states that it would be absolutely impossible to control or to help a fellow who is facing that long prison term, and that bit by bit we would not only destroy him, but we would also destroy any chances of rehabilitation. Further, it would frustrate the man and he could very well become an incorrigible prisoner who might lead prison riots or lead others into grabbing hostages. As I said before, never before in the history of prison reform have prisoners been treated as well as they have over the last ten years, and never before have there been so many guards taken hostage. We have seen that in the west, and we have seen it across Canada. So here we have, as reported, a man of Mr. Boyd's stature, someone intimately associated with the criminally insane, saying that this long sentence will completely destroy any chance of rehabilitation.

I remember well once seeing a fellow in prison clothes standing outside Kingston penitentiary. I went inside and told a guard that there was a man out there on the prison walk, and I was told that that fellow had been released three years ago but he did not want to go out; he was absolutely unable to face the world.

I ask, which is kindest, cruelly destroying a person day after day in a cell over a period of years, or quietly letting that person meet his maker after he has had a good opportunity to see his priest or preacher, to set himself right after the criminal acts he has perpetrated in this world and to ask forgiveness in eleventh hour repentance?

I have heard people quote the Scriptures. I think the Bible can be used to back any stand. I have here an article by John Palmer, published in the Orillia Journal. John Palmer is the son of a minister. He states that this humanitarian standpoint started in the nineteenth century. He says it is a good standpoint. He continues, and says that people are quoting the Bible to back their stand, and one quotation they are using is, "Thou shalt not kill." He goes on to say that it is now known to be correctly translated, "Thou shalt not murder." There is one quotation which covers murder and which I think is very relevant. When Christ was asked about taxes, he answered, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's." What Mr. Palmer was saying is that you have to run this world by law and order.

● (1250)

I wanted to point out that it is probably a failure of society and probably a failure of the church that there is not enough contact with families who need help. Perhaps a young man could be saved from a life of crime, or a young girl from a life of prostitution. On the whole, society has treated its citizens well, but over the past several years we have had many prison riots and anti-social behaviour in the prisons although social workers and others try hard to improve the system. How many prisoners have been killed within prisons in the last few years? This government imposes long prison sentences and total confinement for psychopaths, which just means that more prisoners will be killed. It just means that we will have to employ more security guards and this should be a priority.

At the same time as we are doing this, however, we are closing hospitals and firing staff, which means that we do not properly provide for the sick and severely afflicted. Some of the sick and afflicted are really under a sentence of death because they are going to die of the disease from which they suffer. On the other hand, the bank robber who laid plans and carried a gun with him at the time of the act, and knew that he might either kill a policeman or be killed by one, has in effect accepted the possibility of death. If he killed one or two policemen, the possibility is, today, that he would be sentenced to 25 years behind prison walls. But, Mr. Speaker, this also destroys a man day after day.

Many years ago, when I was a medical student, we took clinics in the penitentiaries and observed that long prison sentences destroyed any chance of rehabilitation. Many prisoners told us that they would rather have been shot when robbing a bank than land in prison. To me, the ultimate cruelty is 25 years behind bars. With a short prison sentence there is a chance for reform. If a prisoner gets out within five years, I believe there is a good chance of keeping him away from crime—and particularly if he is crime-free in five years.

Psychiatrists, doctors and social workers have never been able to determine what goes on in a man's mind. I remember the famous "Red" Ryan who escaped from Kingston penitentiary in 1922. He had killed someone during a bank robbery and was sentenced to life imprisonment. After his escape he was recaptured and returned to the prison under guard. For some time he caused all kinds of trouble, and then was put in the "hole", on bread and water. He started a whole destructive process in the penitentiary, through chants. I remember being in the prison hospital one day treating some prisoners, and the chanting was so loud that we could not hear ourselves speak. All the prisoners, even the one we were treating, were chanting.

That is not an easy thing to handle. Eventually, Ryan began to reform and he became an orderly. He was good looking, bright and intelligent, with an IQ of, I believe, about 150. He worked in the library and then in the works department and became a model prisoner. He was a Roman Catholic and the priest declared that he was reformed and could be paroled. I remember that R. B. Bennett was prime minister at that time. After "Red" Ryan's parole he went out speaking to service clubs and to boys' clubs, telling them that crime did not pay. He was a real success story. In time, a series of murders were committed in the Toronto area where Ryan lived. He also had a cottage at Jackson's Point. At Stouffville, which is near Toronto, a man discovered that his garage was being robbed and tires taken. His dog had been shot, so he went out himself to stop the robbery, and he was shot. He left a wife and three children. Some months afterwards, "Red" Ryan was shot dead in the process of robbing a liquor store in Sarnia.

What I am trying to convey, Mr. Speaker, is that there is no way a psychiatrist or anybody else can look into the mind of man and say what he is going to do. Man has a computerized brain and we do not know what starts the computer or what stops it. That just has not been discovered, so there is no way that we can predict a man's future.

Then there was the O'Donnell case in Toronto. A young school teacher had been murdered, her skull crushed. She had also been raped. O'Donnell was picked up. He had already served a term in Kingston for the same thing.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock, at which time the House will resume routine proceedings.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED RESTRUCTURING OF APPEAL BOARD PROCEDURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, relating to immigration appeal board procedures and departmental policy. Some months ago, an appeal board consisting of Rachel Tremblay, widow of former Liberal cabinet minister Rene Tremblay, Jean Rochon, a former Liberal MP, and Carmel Carriere, a former executive assistant to the then minister of transport, rejected the appeal of Czech ski champion Frantisek Charvat who had opposed the 1968 occupation of his country by the Soviet Union and consequently was harassed and jailed. In order to escape his country he used bribery and subterfuge and our appeal board used the astonishing rationale that because he had used deception to escape from Czechoslovakia any punishment he would incur there was deserved and he was, as was his countryman Jan Morcinek in another instance, ordered deported. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House instruct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to restructure application and immigration appeal board procedures in order that refugees from oppressive régimes will in future be treated with more understanding and compassion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DR. JOSE CASAL, MINISTER OF DEVELOPMENT FOR VENEZUELA

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I know that hon. members will wish to join me in extending a warm welcome to Canada of a very distinguished visitor, Dr. Jose Ignacio Casal, the Minister of Development for Venezuela.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—REASON ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM NOT MORE EFFECTIVE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the sad news for Canadian consumers contained in today's announcement relating to the Consumer Price Index and noting that the minister stated on three or four occasions in his budget speech that the anti-inflation program had begun to take effect, I now ask the minister how he can reconcile this point of view in view of today's figures showing an alarming rise in consumer prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have noticed as well in the budget statement that I referred to the fact that the reduction of beef prices in particular had been one of the bases for the reduction in the Consumer Price Index. Of course, one of the principal factors in the change in the month of May was an increase in that item. The two major elements of increases are two items not covered by the control program, namely farm prices and the budgetary policies of provincial governments. Unless the hon. member is suggesting that we should attempt to exercise control in those areas, I would have to express my regret that there has been the increase in the past month, but it seems to indicate more than ever that we will want the program to be effective in that part of the economy which is under controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: This is more than just an ordinary increase, Mr. Speaker. The minister's very credibility is on the line.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: The government has statutory authority to protect the Canadian consumer. Considering that today's news as published by the Consumer Price Index indicates that the government had been relatively successful in controlling wages and low income salaries, but not successful in controlling prices, something very serious especially for low income Canadian consumers, what immediate action can we expect on behalf of the beleaguered Canadian consumer from this government today or before the budget debate is over?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I first draw to the attention of the hon. member the analysis of the figures as follows: Higher beef prices, up 12.4 per cent on average over the previous month, were the largest single contributing factor to the 1.5 per cent rise in the food index. As to the non-food price increase, increased prices for tobacco and alcoholic products which were mainly brought about by various provincial budgetary measures accounted for most of the 0.6 per cent rise in the index for all items excluding food. Unless the hon. member is advocating control of farm prices, which this government has chosen not to do, and unless he is advocating that provincial budgetary decisions should be subject to the control of the federal government, regrettably I feel there is nothing can be done about that kind of increase. It does indicate that greater support should be given to the controlled part of the economy.

● (1410)

Mr. Grafftey: The minister will not get off the hook with that kind of sophistry. Can he assure the House that the price increase is related to food before it left the farm gate? Is he completely unaware of the policy our party has proposed in connection with food prices?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The price increases are, of course, related to the price of beef generally. With regard to salary and wage costs involved in the food processing and distribution industry, may I point out that a moment ago the hon. gentleman objected to the notion we should exercise control over wages and salaries; the fact of the matter is that at least with regard to the major packers these are subject to control under the anti-inflation program. With regard to the basic cost of livestock, it is not the policy of the government to control this as it affects the farm community. In that respect I think I would have the support, if not of the hon. gentleman, then at least of some of his colleagues.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

NUMBER OF CASES AWAITING DECISION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE BACKLOG

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance with respect to the effectiveness of the Anti-Inflation Board. On April 30 he told the House that the majority of the 3,900 wage settlements awaiting ruling by the Board should be, and I quote, "cleared in the relatively near future". Since the AIB has reported that a ruling is still awaited on 3,000 wage settlements, can the hon. gentleman tell us what he meant by the phrase "relatively near future" and can he provide the House with a revised estimate of the date by which the backlog will be reduced to more manageable proportions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Many of the cases under consideration at that time have been disposed of but naturally, in an ongoing program, cases are added from time to time. The necessity of scrutinizing individual cases with great care and of re-examining some of them—I have in mind, for example, the re-examination which was pressed upon us by the hon. member's colleague with regard to the situation in Thompson, Manitoba—naturally means that the Board must spend more time on individual cases and is therefore not able to get on as rapidly with the others.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF SIZE OF STAFF REQUIRED THIS YEAR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): My supplementary is based on the fact that the staff of the AIB now exceeds 850, which is more than double the figure of 398 for which provision was requested in the main estimates. Can the minister provide a revised estimate of the Board's staff requirements for the current fiscal year—an estimate which will bear a closer relationship to the actual number of personnel required to administer the program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It seems to me the hon. gentleman is contradicting himself. The Board has a heavy volume of business before it. A few moments ago he was complaining because it has not dealt with all the cases on which decisions are pending. Now he is critical because the staff has grown, even though a large volume of work remains to be done.

Mr. Alexander: I asked a simple question. Can the minister give us some indication of the staff required to deal with these matters? Has he a new figure to give to the House?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not think one can provide such a figure in precise terms, because I cannot tell which agreements will fall within the arithmetical guideline. The Board will have to respond to the pressures placed upon it as a result of collective bargaining settlements throughout the country.

* * *

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CONTROL LAND SPECULATION AND MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the most recent consumer price index shows that the cost of home ownership rose by 14.5 per cent over last year and by .9 over the past month, and since home ownership is one of the few areas left completely uncontrolled by the anti-inflation program, can the minister inform the House what measures he intends to take to assure Canadians they will not continue to see land speculation and mortgage rates drive home ownership further and further beyond their reach?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): While it is true that some parts of the real estate sector of the economy are not subject to the control of the Anti-Inflation Board, insurance prices are now subject to control. Municipal taxation is not, nor indeed are rents. However, rents are subject to provincial rental control. In general terms, the government has proposed to deal with actual ownership charges as opposed to rental charges, of the kind such as the program that my colleague has set forth, so as to bring down interest rates for those in the lower range of income levels.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that not just lower income Canadians are finding that home ownership is beyond them but so are the middle income Canadians, in view of the fact that mortgage interest rates charged by the banks are completely uncontrolled, and since we were hoping that the minister would have included a measure in the budget respecting mortgage interest rates, is the minister contemplating, now or in the very near future, to establish some kind of controls or rollbacks of mortgage interest rates so that middle income Canadians can also afford a home?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, a formal ceiling on interest rates would only make certain that less funds were put into mortgages for real estate purposes than is the case at present. My colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has put forward, under the assisted home ownership plan, specific measures designed to bring down interest rates for those at the lower end of the income scale, the group within the community that has very high priority with us.

Mr. Rodriguez: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While I am in some agreement with the minister in that the fixing of interest rates might result in less money being put into housing, would the minister consider what this party has always suggested, that legislation be implemented which would force the banks to set aside mortgage funds for those who would like to build their homes at reasonable rates of interest?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the rate of interest is the price of the money borrowed. Of course, if one starts setting interest levels which are below the rate of inflation in Canada, one can be certain that funds will not be coming forward from the many millions of Canadians who are depositors and investors. So in that sense an over-all ceiling would be counter productive in terms of having additional mortgage funds made available.

* * *

[Translation]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF SUGAR—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. However, I think he is not in his seat. Perhaps the minister who replaces him or his parliamentary secretary could then answer my question.

As a matter of fact, this question relates to another question I asked him on May 11, concerning the increase in the price of sugar. Considering that companies also take advantage of the conversion to the metric system to reduce containers while retaining the price of old containers, thereby raising the price of sugar, can the minister tell the House what steps have been taken or what investigations have been made concerning the rise in the price of sugar?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the hon. member's question and as soon as he returns, the minister will give an answer. However, if it is possible, I will answer the hon. member's question myself before the return of the minister.

* * *

[English]

AGRICULTURE

RECOMMENDATION FOR NATIONAL FOOD POLICY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is supplementary for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the president of Canada's largest retail chain has predicted that food prices in Canada this year could go as high as 10 per cent, and further went on to recommend the development of a national food policy to co-ordinate the interests of consumers, producers, processors and distributors, may I point out to the Minister of Agriculture that a similar recommendation was made by the special committee on food prices in 1972. May I ask the minister what steps the government is taking to bring in a co-ordinated food policy for Canada that would serve the best interests of Canadian producers and consumers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to remind the hon. member that the country that has the cheapest food in the whole world is the United States of America. Call it what you want, food policy or not, with the distribution system and climatic conditions, food in Canada costs only one per cent more. I have not seen any great move in the United States to change over to a food policy in that country. So we are not doing all that bad in Canada, but if there is room for improvement we will do it. The food index after declining for four consecutive months rose one and one half per cent between April and May to account for nearly half of the over-all consumer price index. This index is 6.2 per cent higher than one year ago as compared to 10 per cent for all items, excluding food index. So, we must get the facts straight concerning what really has increased the market.

● (1420)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question and remind him of a statement made to the Retail Council of Canada by the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board in which she predicted that there would be a serious increase in the price of food in Canada in the months ahead. Can the minister tell us, in view of the prediction by Mrs. Plumptre and in view of the projection of the President of Dominion stores of Canada what policies he is proposing to his colleagues in cabinet to coordinate the food policies in Canada or are we to continue to suffer from the ad hoc policies of the minister which hurt both the consumer and the producer.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the food producers in Canada are the envy of the world, not only the small countries but many of the large countries also. Food prices are virtually the same as they were in October. The all-items excluding food index rose some 5.2 per cent. What I am saying is that we must be realistic about this whole thing. The income of farmers actually went down last year. The hon. member quotes the head of a supermarket as a source of information. They share over 60 per cent of the money that the food consumers of this nation pay. Maybe this is a place where expenses should be curtailed. Perhaps he should be asking them more questions because we made the same prediction in our department that the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board made, that food prices would go up because the farmers are still getting less return than they were last October.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO CO-ORDINATE FOOD POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a final supplementary in view of the fact that we cannot get an objective, rational response from the Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Prime Minister, who has the over-all responsibility for coordinating government activities, if he will undertake to determine what became of the Interdepartmental Committee which was supposed to have been set up by the Minister of Agriculture quite some time ago to make recommendations regarding a coordinated food policy for Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise of the question. On the contrary I think the Minister of Agriculture is giving very rational answers on these points. I am surprised that the hon. member seems to be disappointed with the position the minister adopts in defence of the farmers.

* * *

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE DATE FOR INTRODUCTION OF PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the minister's exhortations on Monday to the Canadian Manufacturers Association that they should sell considerably more products to try to revive Canada's sagging trade balance and put it on the plus side of the ledger, and as the main reason our sales have fallen so badly in recent years has been a steady decline in the last four years of industrial productivity, I would ask the minister does he intend now at long last to introduce productivity incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in industrial productivity so that we can lower costs and prices and thereby make our products more competitive to sell in the kind of increased volume the minister has requested.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I said in my comments on the budget debate a couple of days ago, we are directing a great deal of our attention to the question of productivity. The summary the hon. member has mentioned might work for some sectors, specifically manufacturing and processing, but would not be effective in others. But, as I think the Minister of Finance also indicated earlier on, we are prepared to listen to and receive representations from business concerning how in fact such incentives can be applied. In other words, the principle is a very sound one but I am sure the hon. member will agree it is not just a simple matter that can be stated in a couple of moments, which is what he suggested it is.

Mr. Hees: As I listened very carefully to the minister's speech in the House and found nothing positive regarding the introduction of productivity incentives, and as I have been asking for the past two or three years about the introduction of just this kind of incentive, does the minister mean to tell the House that he and his predecessors have waited until now to ask businessmen for some suggestions as to how the kind of productivity incentives that I have been suggesting, and which businessmen all agree would make very good sense, could be put into operation?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, we certainly have not waited until now. Futhermore, the hon. member is using the word "businessmen" as if it incorporated everybody in the country. I can assure him that there is a wide variation of opinion among businessmen as to the form which the incentives should take. If you adopt it purely for manufacturing and processing on the one hand, what do you do for those industries which are extremely valuable and important to the country but in which it is not as easy, indeed it may be almost impossible, to assess what the productivity gains are. It is that kind of issue which we are trying to resolve.

Mr. Hees: Let us see you start with industry and I will give you the other answers later.

* * *

ENERGY

ALLEGATION PLUTONIUM IN HANDS OF NON-GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF NUCLEAR POLICY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Back to your seat, Pierre.

Mr. McGrath: Behave yourself because she is a lady.

Miss MacDonald: My question relates to the affidavits signed by the president of the Greenpeace Foundation that he was offered an ounce of plutonium, indicating that the most lethal substance is in the hands of non-governmental agencies. Given that the Minister of Justice has called for an immediate check into the possible existence of a black-market operation dealing in plutonium, would the Prime Minister say what action the government will initiate to get to the root of this vital matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, the hon. lady is informing me that the Minister of Justice said he would inquire into this. I think this was a very speedy response from the Minister of Justice, and I support him wholeheartedly.

Miss MacDonald: I would think that on an issue of this magnitude the Prime Minister would be better informed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: Given the serious implications of this incident and the fact that the Minister of Justice did not spell out any pattern by which he would follow up such an inquiry, would the Prime Minister undertake to ask the government House leader to put down a motion to refer this matter to committee where it would be possible to call witnesses and to have a meaningful public hearing on the safety aspects of Canada's commitment to nuclear energy, both at home and abroad?

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, I must tell the hon. lady that I am not informed about all the things my ministers do. I can assure her that they do not jump to the telephone every time they have an important decision to make. This indicates that they are strong men and woman able to take their own initiatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know how the hon. lady could really expect that I would be informed that some person somewhere is taking an affidavit that he has been offered an ounce of plutonium.

Miss MacDonald: It has been on the news for a day.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry; I do not listen to the news.

An hon. Member: You don't listen to the people, either.

Mr. Trudeau: As I have explained to my backbenchers, that is why I do not have ulcers or insomnia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is a free bit of medical advice which I address to the hon. lady.

Miss MacDonald: I don't have them either.

Mr. Trudeau: It is of course an extremely important topic and I hope that the opposition, on one of its days, will want to discuss this question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We have already done so.

Mr. Clark: Perhaps you missed that, too.

● (1430)

Miss MacDonald: Given the fact that the Prime Minister indicates that he has knowledge of ulcers, headaches or whatever else it might be, I wonder if he has any understanding of the implications of plutonium on the health of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I know that you cannot do much with plutonium unless you have a great deal of expertise and devices at your disposal. If the hon. lady has some plutonium or knows where to get some, I would ask her to inform the police.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: By its very nature this must be stolen property, and I suggest that the Greenpeace person report this to the police.

* * *

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED FINANCIAL AND MEDICAL HELP TO COMORO ISLANDS

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the disastrous sanitary conditions prevailing now in the Comoro Islands and the visit to Canada of a delegation from that country, and the refusal by CIDA to respond to their request for immediate financial or at least medical assistance, can the minister tell the House whether other means are considered in cooperation with CUSO to help the Comoro Islands, especially considering the intention expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be more active in those countries of the Third World that are French-speaking?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of assistance has been drawn to my attention by a number of hon. members, including my parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Saint-Denis, and I know the interest of the hon. member is added to theirs. I want to tell the hon. member and the House that at present I have these representations under consideration and will ascertain whether it is possible within the over-all strategy for international development, which has already been laid before the House by the government, to make any form of assistance available to this particular country.

REQUEST OF UNITED STATES BROADCASTERS AND GOVERNMENT FOR DELAY IN FOREIGN ADVERTISING TAX LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister tell the House if he shares the opinion expressed by Senator Keith Davey, who described as a regrettable intrusion on the business before the Canadian parliament the move by U.S. Ambassador Thomas Enders and New York and Washington State broadcasters calling for a delay in the implementation of part of the government's foreign advertising tax legislation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should explain that I did pass on what Ambassador Enders regarded as a correct version of the opinion of the United States government on a particular matter which was before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I believe that it was within normal practice for my department to act in this way, but at no time did we take the view that the proceedings on this bill, either through the House of Commons or through the Senate, should be either facilitated or held up because of representations made by the United States, as a look at the record of the proceedings of the bill would indicate.

Mr. Wagner: In the light of the minister's remarks in Quebec City a few days ago calling for a permanent dialogue with the United States, is it the government's intention in this particular matter to have a dialogue and to listen to what the United States have to say on this subject?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We had discussion earlier in the year—in January, I believe—and it was at this particular early discussion between Canadian and American officials that the suggestion that possibly the passage of this particular bill might be delayed was raised. Further dialogue will be held on this subject, as on all other subjects in play between Canada and the United States, and I assure the hon. member that the degree and intensity of the dialogue between the two countries is very great and increasing very rapidly.

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER ON ACTION OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT IN INFORMING SENATE OF POSITION ON FOREIGN ADVERTISING TAX LEGISLATION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister on the same issue. Yesterday morning at the request of the United States American ambassador, the United States government's summary of its position on Bill C-58 was tabled before the Senate banking committee in which that government expressed the view that the legislation should not proceed at this time and that the United States could achieve some other, more positive arrangement with the Canadian government. Does the Prime Minister accept this unwarranted intrusion of the American government on this Canadian legislative process?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker I have the impression that this was already dealt with by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but beyond that I say to the hon. member, and perhaps to some of those behind me who have been applauding, that I wonder what we would do if some Canadian interests were being jeopardized in the United States. I think we would probably make representations to them, and that is what they are doing to us. We do not have to follow their advice, but we certainly can hear what they have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: I think that there is a difference between affected individuals making representations at the request of the Senate committee and a foreign government taking the initiative to table its position. Will the Prime Minister make it known to the United States ambassador that it is considered, if not unacceptable, at least irregular, for this kind of procedure to take place and that the government has every intention of passing Bill C-58 unamended in the Senate?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think it would be proper to comment on the proceedings in the other House and to say what we would do in some hypothetical situation. However, as to the representations, I am assured they were made in a very proper fashion through the Department of External Affairs and the minister, and this is the way we proceed in Washington when we want the administration there to be informed of something which is of interest to Canada. We act through the State Department.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—DISCUSSION OF ACCESS TO RESOURCES WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement that Canada and EEC officials have reached agreement with respect to the terms of the so-called contractual link between the EEC and Canada, does the minister intend to table the terms of the agreement in parliament? If so, when, and if not, why not?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the agreement was initialled ad referendum on June 2 by officials of Canada and the community. The agreement is now before the community and the Canadian government, and when and if the agreement is concluded, I will obviously consider tabling it. I hope that the signature can take place at an early date, hopefully in Ottawa.

An hon. Member: Unamended?

Mr. Balfour: To what extent do the terms of the understanding arrived at provide access to Canadian resources by member countries of the EEC, and has the question of access to Canadian resources been discussed with the provincial governments?

Mr. MacEachen: The question of access obviously has been the subject of discussion and interest in the course of these negotiations, but the framework agreement itself does not create any new rights or obligations with respect to access to supplies of raw materials or access to markets. That has been a position taken quite strongly and successfully by the Canadian government, that the agreement should not create any such undertakings.

However, in the future it might be that in specific projects questions of this kind can be discussed between Canada and the community, but the agreement itself does not do any such thing.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

INCLUSION OF MINISTERIAL LANDINGS IN TOTAL NUMBER OF IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Immigration figures released by his department today show an immigrant flow of some 187,000 for last year. The minister went to some lengths to explain that refugees were included in the sponsored, nominated or independent categories. Could he tell the House whether the 21,000 plus landings under ministerial order were dealt with in the same manner by his department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not follow the gist of the question. The order in council landings are always included in the totals. Apart from that, I am not sure what the hon. member is asking.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF IMMIGRANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): The minister answered my question by saying that they are included in the 187,000. I take it that that is affirmative. I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. With reference to immigration, in his press conference on June 1 the Prime Minister indicated that we have a moral responsibility and that it is politically right for Canada and for the world to increase immigration. In view of the decline in Canada's immigration in the last year by some 14 per cent does the Prime Minister feel that flow is in keeping with Canada's present labour needs or in view of the statement he made at Habitat, does he feel that flow should be increased?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the rest of my statement he will see that I indicated that naturally any immigration—of which we always wanted more—would be acceptable in varying degrees depending on the economic conditions in Canada and depending on the rate at which we could absorb it. The hon. member knows that at this particular time we are making a particular effort to assist immigrants of Lebanese origin. At other periods in history we have made efforts to assist people from Chile, Hungary, Tibet, Uganda and so on. When there are special circumstances we make a special effort. Year in, year out Canada has been accepting immigrants and will continue to do so. We will do it at a rate which is compatible with the economic welfare of the immigrants themselves and, of course, Canadians.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR ISSUANCE OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMP FOR MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH, FIRST UKRAINIAN MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Ukrainian Canadians from across Canada will be assembling in Edmonton next Sunday, June 13 to dedicate a memorial to the first Ukrainian member of parliament, who represented the riding of Vegreville, Michael Luchkovich—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoreyko: —who was elected in 1926 and served with distinction until 1935. Would the Prime Minister feel disposed to issuing a stamp in memory of this notable Canadian?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General is always open to suggestions of this kind and I hope the hon. member will address himself to the Postmaster General. His parliamentary secretary is present and he is almost as able as the Postmaster General himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't insult him.

Mr. Trudeau: Able as he is, however, I am sure even he would not make that kind of commitment outright. He knows, as I do, that we receive hundreds of representations every year from people who would like to see a stamp in memory of a particular event. They all have to be put in perspective. Is that not right, Paul?

An hon. Member: What did he say? No?

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

ALLEGATION GOVERNMENT CREATING EMERGENCY AS BASIS FOR ESTABLISHING PROGRAM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have to get into this multicultural discussion but I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to the first one asked today. In light of the statistics issued today, is the Prime Minister considering requesting the Supreme Court to reconvene to hear additional argument as to the constitutionality of the anti-inflation program—the argument being, of course, directed to the way in which the government, in collaboration with the Anti-Inflation Board, is engaged in creating the emergency which would justify its original formation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to inform the House of a very important piece of news. I will be making a speech this afternoon on the anti-inflation program and the budget—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Trudeau: —in the House of Commons at around 3.45. I am not sure if we will have a quorum but if we do, I shall continue—

An hon. Member: You mean you are going to do it in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, I shall not be able to avail myself of the invitation of the hon. member to invite the Supreme Court to reopen the case. I will convey his request to the right hon. member for Prince Albert; perhaps he would want to contact the court.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

ALLEGED BORROWING OF PERSONNEL FROM BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance is related to those asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West. On May 31, at page 13968 of Hansard the minister undertook to make inquiries into the practice of the Anti-Inflation Board approaching major banking and trust institutions to lend personnel to the AIB on the basis that the employers would be reimbursed for salaries paid to their personnel in their absence while working for the board. Can the minister now report to the House on this matter, can he outline the extent of this practice, the actual cost to the government and can he say whether the figure of 853 AIB employees as reported in today's Globe and Mail includes personnel who have been obtained on this basis?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had an answer in my book for several days after the hon. gentleman asked the question. Perhaps I could dig it out from my office and send it to him. With respect to the number of AIB employees in this category I shall be glad to make that inquiry.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF UNIONS TO LEND PERSONNEL TO BOARD—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question. Can the minister confirm that the AIB has also attempted to second personnel from the trade union movement and that this effort has been singularly unsuccessful? Can he tell the House why, if this is the case, the unions do not wish to participate? What is being done to change their attitude?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the views of the Canadian Labour Congress at least with respect to the program are well known. While we will be meeting with the Congress for the purpose of discussing broader economic questions, I am not sanguine at this stage that we will be able to persuade them to take a more positive approach to the fight against inflation in Canada.

[Translation]

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REMEDY THE LACK OF REDFISH AROUND ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE AND GASPÉ

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fisheries).

In view of the critical state of fisheries in eastern Canada, especially around the Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Gaspé, owing to the scarcity of redfish, a fact which could last three years leaving the population in very uncertain economic conditions, could the minister, as a result of his meetings and those of his officials with fishermen and producers, tell the House and distressed Canadians what he intends to do to relieve the hardships of those who really are in desperate straits?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, without accepting entirely the pessimistic description of the hon. member, I recognize that there is a real problem caused by the scarcity of redfish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and this is why we have asked that large trawlers withdraw from that area. To solve the problem we are also trying within the framework of the North Atlantic Council to reach an agreement which could allow an exchange of redfish for a certain quantity of capelin caught by Russia. I hope that this agreement which seems to be effective will be concluded and accepted by the international community. If so, it would help relieve the problem to which the hon. member referred. I must say however, that this year and next year there will be no magic solution to the problem under consideration.

[English]

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES TO SETTLE BOUNDARIES RESULTING FROM EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONE 200 MILES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. On the anniversary of a great political event which occurred 19 years ago today and which is soon to happen again—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: —and in light of the announcement by this government that a 200 mile limit will be declared on January 1, 1977 while the United States government has stated it will declare a 200 mile limit effective March 1, 1977, can the Prime Minister tell the House what steps will be taken by this government to resolve the controversy between the United States and Canada over ownership of Georges Bank which is one of the most prolific fishing grounds off the east coast of Canada and which falls within the 200 mile limit of both Canada and the United States?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, this matter is the subject of considerable discussions between the United States and Canada at the present time. In fact, I had occasion to discuss the question with the head of the United States delegation to ICNAF last night and talks will be continuing. The problems are being identified. The fisheries aspect of it might be more subject to reciprocal arrangements. The boundary problem will be difficult for some time to come and may require intervention at a very high level.

* * *

● (1450)

CUSTOMS

REQUEST FOR SERVICE FOR INTERNATIONAL FLIGHTS AT REGINA AND SASKATOON

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Revenue follows on a question raised some time ago by my colleague from Regina East. In view of considerable interest in Saskatchewan in the continuance of customs services, with respect to which representations have been received by the Minister of Transport, among others, and since all members from Saskatchewan are interested in seeing this kind of service continued, can the minister now confirm that service will be provided for international flights to airports in Saskatchewan, particularly Regina and Saskatoon?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I understand that no scheduled international flights use, as their first port of arrival, Regina or Saskatoon. Probably between ten and 15 such flights a year occur in this particular area. Because of the inconvenience being caused to a comparatively small number of people, a team of officials, both from the Department of Transport and the customs branch, are looking at the matter to see if facilities can be fixed in such a way as to accommodate people who travel by charter.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—BASIS OF INFORMATION ON WHICH MINISTER MADE STATEMENT ABOUT MR. STOPFORTH

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Since Mr. Stopforth has firmly denied reversing his position on the subject of financing the Orion project and made the statement that he reports directly to senior officials who, in turn, report to the minister, will the minister say if Mr. Stopforth in fact did report on this or other matters directly to him, the minister, or whether the statement the minister made about Mr. Stopforth was based on information received from other officials in his department?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I believe the statement I made in the House is quite clear. I personally checked some facts with this senior official of my department.

[English]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE ON WHICH PRIME MINISTER AWARE OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING AND AMOUNT OF INTEREST PAYMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I gave him notice of it. Can the Prime Minister tell the House exactly when he became aware that the financing agreement between Lockheed and the Department of National Defence was purely verbal; can he also tell the House when he was informed that the interest payment on the financial arrangement would be about $100 million?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the file checked on this and am speaking from the knowledge conveyed to me by the file. I cannot claim to have a precise memory of what particular phrase was said at what particular time in the long sequence of events concerning the choice of an LRPA by the Canadian government. But, having checked the dates and, particularly, the statements made in the House by the Minister of National Defence, that he had become aware of this after his return from NATO in mid-December, I can only conclude that some time between December 15 and December 22 I became aware that the assurance that Lockheed could provide the bridge financing had been given verbally. It would be in that period when I became aware of that.

As for the second question, Mr. Speaker, as all the ministers involved have said repeatedly, they were aware some time in the fall and even before that, in the summer of 1975, of the difficulties of the Department of National Defence with financing the purchase of the long-range patrol aircraft. Indeed, we took a decision in the early fall, I believe, to increase the capital expenditures of DND in real terms by 12 per cent a year, in order to facilitate such purchases. So, we were aware of the cash flow difficulties with some precision toward the end of November, on November 27, when we realized we would have to do some borrowing—in other words, that there would have to be some bridge financing and that we would have to pay interest on it. At that time an approximate amount was established, but it was only decided by Treasury Board in mid-December, on December 15, that $100 million-odd would be authorized for interest payments.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I take it from his answer that he was aware that the verbal financing agreement had broken down on December 15. My question was, when did he first become aware that there was in existence only a verbal agreement between Lockheed and DND? I call the right hon. gentleman's attention to page 14107 of Hansard where he is reported to have said, when discussing the decision made on November 27:

> . . . we were hoping that the LRPA bridge financing would be provided by Lockheed . . .

Further, in the next column, quoting and approving what the Minister of National Defence had said, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> . . . perhaps we acted imprudently, but we did so in good faith based on this verbal agreement.

That answer left the impression that he knew then that there was a verbal agreement. Today I should like the Prime Minister to clarify if he knew on December 2 that the arrangement with Lockheed was purely verbal.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have just given the answer to that. The closest dates I have been able to ascertain would be between December 15 and December 22. I would have known then that the agreement we had from Lockheed was purely verbal. Before that, of course, the people who had received that agreement, presumably one or more people in the Department of National Defence, knew the nature of that agreement. But, from reading the answers of the Minister of National Defence himself, it is apparent that he indicated that he, himself, only knew the agreement was verbal when he returned from NATO in mid-December. I repeat, until then we knew there would have to be bridge financing. We had been assured that Lockheed could supply it. It is only when it came to saying, "O.K., to whom do we pay the $100 million-odd in interest" was it realized that Lockheed had only made a verbal agreement, had given some verbal commitment, and that there had been some misunderstanding. Those are the dates.

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY IF DEFENCE MINISTER GAVE CABINET ALL INFORMATION RELATIVE TO NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is it the position of the Prime Minister that the cabinet received from the Minister of National Defence all of the information relative to any aspect of negotiations with Lockheed that was in the possession of the Minister of National Defence and that was germane to a decision to be taken by cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that would be, yes, if the import of the question is to know whether the Department of National Defence had held back any information. I am certain that they held no information back from the cabinet. As I have just indicated in my answers and as has been repeated many times in the House, the assurances we had from Lockheed turned out not to be forthcoming. When we asked "why?", we then found that there was a misunderstanding and we could not refer to an item in writing because it was said that this understanding was purely oral, purely verbal. I just said, Mr. Speaker, that that, as far as I am concerned, was after mid-December. That is also what I understand the Minister of National Defence told the House.

* * *

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

POSSIBILITY OF POOLING SHOE IMPORTS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR TARIFF CONCESSIONS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

When the Canadian Shoe Manufacturers Association submitted its last brief, it requested the establishment of quotas for foreign countries exporting shoes as well as a guarantee that no new tariff concession be made. Could the minister tell us where the negotiations of his officials with exporting countries representatives stand in terms of obtaining export quotas and could he also give us some information about the tariff issue?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there were two elements in the suggestions made during my meeting with the Shoe Manufacturers Association. The first was that I would make representation to the Minister of National Revenue, with a view to speeding up unquiries and actions coming under the Anti-Dumping Act. I have already made those representations and am sure my colleague will deal with them expeditiously. The second point was a proposal or query as to whether shoes and footwear might be embraced in the responsibilities of the textile and clothing board and be monitored in the same way. That question is now being examined. In addition, meetings are continuing between officials and the industry as to other steps which may be taken.

* * *

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF UNITED NATIONS ENVIRONMENT PROGRAM, DR. M. K. TOLBA

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, may I call to Your Honour's attention the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished guest, Dr. M.K. Tolba, executive director of the United Nations environment program, successor to Mr. Maurice Strong.

● (1500)

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On two separate occasions in the House, on April 29 and May 11, I directed questions to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Prime Minister with regard to the special beef inquiry that was ordered by the Prime Minister and which the minister had in his hands. As I understand it, the minister received the report in both official languages on or about April 27. On April 29 the Minister of Agriculture indicated that he would have the report made public as soon as possible. On May 11, approximately a month ago, the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have to be patient. I hope next week to study the report and discuss it with my assistant deputy minister who is in charge of it. He is now attending a preliminary meeting in Rome—

It has been over a month since the minister gave that undertaking. The report is very important and certainly very urgent as far as the general farming community is concerned. I urge the minister to table the report. If he does not do that, we can only assume that he is trying to hide something and is not prepared to table this very important document.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT "CHARACTERIZATION OF WASTEWATERS FROM THE GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS BITUMEN EXTRACTION AND UPGRADING PLANT"

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table two copies of the report, "Characterization of Wastewaters from the Great Canadian Oil Sands Bitumen Extraction and Upgranding Plant", as I promised yesterday.

TABLING OF REPORT "ATMOSPHERIC ASBESTOS FIBRE CONCENTRATIONS IN THE BAIE VERTE AREA, NEWFOUNDLAND"

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table two copies of the surveillance report, "Atmospheric Asbestos Fibre Concentrations in the Baie Verte area, Newfoundland".

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON UN CONFERENCE ON TRADE AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In reporting to the House on the results of the UN Conference on Trade and Development, I should like to say at the outset that its immediate results represent a major achievement in the dialogue between developed and developing countries on a new international economic order, and that the longer-term impact of Nairobi will be substantial. Obviously, UNCTAD IV—like all conferences where countries are required to make compromises in order to ensure agreement—did not achieve all that Canada or other developed and developing countries might have wished. But it was, without question, a most important step in the efforts to reduce disparities between developed and developing countries which were initiated at the seventh special session of the United Nations.

At that session I stated that Canada was determined to play a positive role, to use our resources and our influence to help bring about constructive change in the international economic system and thereby to reduce the gap between rich and poor nations. Governments committed themselves at that time to work together to make changes in the international trade and payments system in order to enable it to contribute to more rapid economic development in the developing countries and to permit them to obtain a larger and sustained share in world trade.

UNCTAD IV was the first major UN conference following the seventh special session, and in its disagreements as well as in its accords it reflected these new dimensions. There were efforts to address these questions at a practical level; there were some important new commitments; there was agreement to create a program, timetable and framework for the central issues in which the many essential decisions can be taken.

In my statement to the conference on May 7, I touched on the four areas Canada considered would be the main issues to be dealt with: the problems of stabilization of commodity trade, the alleviation of the debt servicing difficulties of many developing countries, liberalization of trade to benefit developing countries, and the transfer of technology to developing countries. Of these, the commodities issue proved to be the central focus of the conference. Indeed, the adoption, by consensus, of a resolution which established an integrated program proposes a list of 18 commodities of particular interest to the developing countries for consideration, describes the international measures to be taken in the context of the program, and establishes procedures and a timetable for pursuing it.

On the important question of a common fund, the resolution provides for a negotiating conference to be held next year and for a series of preparatory meetings. As a major importer and exporter of commodities, we shall be actively involved in these international discussions and shall work with the other participants to resolve the problems of commodity trade which concern developing countries. These discussions and negotiations will provide the appropriate basis for examining the parameters of a common fund and for a decision regarding its establishment. As I stated in the House earlier this week, and as stated before that by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), if we are satisfied in the course of these commodity meetings and negotiations that the common fund will be effective and useful, Canada will make a contribution to it.

The conference also took an important decision on the subject of the financial problems of developing countries by adopting, again by consensus, a resolution on the debt problems of developing countries. The resolution calls for appropriate international bodies to identify features relating to debt servicing problems which could provide guidance in the future for dealing with them. In addition, a ministerial session of the UNCTAD board will be held in 1977 to review this work and a group of experts will be established to assist in this review.

We had hoped that some further steps would be taken on the broader subject of financial transfers, which is of fundamental importance to many developing countries, but this was not possible. We had hoped, for example, that the conference would agree to improve the international standard for official development assistance so that developing countries would receive such assistance on softer terms than they do now. Although this was not agreed, we shall continue to pursue this objective.

Apart from these two issues of particular importance, the conference also adopted resolutions on trade liberalization, the transfer of technology and a number of other subjects. One remarkable, and encouraging, aspect of the conference was the fact that 12 of the 13 resolutions approved were adopted by consensus. No previous UNCTAD conference has reached such a broad measure of agreement.

Canada supported all of these resolutions, offering explanatory statements on a number of them. We also, together with other industrialized countries, supported a proposal for further study of the concept put forward by the United States. Dr. Kissinger had proposed to the conference that early consideration be given to the establishment of an international resources bank to facilitate resource development in the poorer countries. While we have not reached any final conclusion on this idea, we believe that it fully merited further consideration and we regret that it was narrowly defeated by two votes, the great majority of developing countries abstained on the resolution.

Despite the difficulties which arose at the conference and the problems which still need to be resolved, I believe that the outcome augurs well for the continuing dialogue between the developed and developing countries. Most especially, the positive results of the conference, particularly in the commodity area, should provide a useful and constructive basis for pursuing the work of the Conference on International Economic Co-operation in Paris.

At UNCTAD IV, Dr. Perez Guerrero stated, on behalf of the developing members of CIEC, the Paris conference, that failure in Nairobi could bring into question the continuation of that dialogue. The 19 developing countries which are members of CIEC have now assessed the situation. In light of the progress made on a number of important questions at Nairobi, they have indeed judged it useful to continue the dialogue in Paris.

● (1510)

I fully share the view that there is a satisfactory prospect for balanced progress in CIEC during the remainder of the year. In July, the CIEC will be reviewing the progress it has made and setting its course for the second half of the year. I am confident that the results of UNCTAD IV will help the conference in Paris to pursue its essential objective—the strengthening of international co-operation for the benefit of all.

So far as Canada is concerned, we shall pursue the work outstanding from UNCTAD IV in UNCTAD, CIEC and other bodies. We shall pursue our interest in improving the international standard for official development assistance. Together with other countries, we shall consider further the balance of payments and debt problems of developing countries and the appropriate measures for meeting them. We shall continue to support the principle of joint producer-consumer financial responsibility, on a mandatory basis, for buffer stock financing within commodity agreements containing such stocks. We shall be actively involved in consultations and negotiations on individual commodities and on the common fund. We shall devote efforts to see that the developing countries achieve additional benefits in the course of the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva. We shall take an active part in the elaboration of a voluntary code of conduct for the transfer of technology which is universally applicable.

While the decisions taken by UNCTAD IV mark an important stage in our common efforts to reduce disparities between developed and developing countries, our progress toward that goal, to which the government is fully committed, will not be easy and will require hard decisions. As we proceed along that course, there will be costs for Canada and for individual Canadians. Their support will be essential, but with it, and the support of this House, we may approach these decisions in a confident and positive manner.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, first of all, why is UNCTAD IV so important as to merit this statement in the House?

UNCTAD'S purpose and principal aim is to transform a global economic environment that is most unfavorable for the poorest two-thirds of humanity. It seeks to do this through the process of negotiation, that is, hard bargaining as distinct from rhetorical expositions on the state of the world. It is, therefore, an essential forum to put into practice the trade reforms necessary to close the widening rich-poor gap in the world. But many nations are in great danger, and Canada is no exception, of becoming victims of procedural intricacies while losing sight of our real objectives.

The message of UNCTAD, the message of Habitat now in its closing hours in Vancouver, the message of the UN conferences in the past few years on the environment, population, food and the new economic order is that we must set in motion a process of restructuring the world economy. This will require more than an expansion of growth, more than better control over cyclical fluctuations. As the Secretary General of the United Nations, Kurt Waldheim, has said, this restructuring requires a well-defined time-table of economic cooperation to bring about——a more equitable share of developing countries in industrial activities beyond their present mere 7 per cent of the world's industrialization.

—self-sufficiency in food in developing areas.

—indigenous capacity in science and technology.

—serious progress in the eradication of mass poverty and unemployment.

All this is why the parliamentary subcommittee on international development issued an interim report, prior to UNCTAD IV, urging the Canadian government to exert leadership "in seeking creative solutions to the problems of commodities trade which will be acceptable to producers and consumers in both developed and developing countries." Canada's leadership is essential, not only because UNCTAD IV is itself a crucial element in international negotiations, but because Canada is a bridge between the developed and developing countries. This special role is reflected in the fact that Canada is co-chairman of the continuing Conference on International Economic Co-operation.

The subcommittee therefore suggested that Canada make a clear statement at the opening of UNCTAD IV committing this country to a phased, co-ordinated approach to increase and stabilize the prices of primary commodities exported by the developing nations. Such an approach would include the selection of an agreed list of commodities for action, the establishment of a timetable for negotiations, and emphasis on the possibilities for linkages among commodity agreements such as integrated or common buffer stock financing.

What the government did, however, at the opening of the conference was merely to repeat our worn-out position that "we are prepared to continue examination of the proposal for a common fund . . ." In other words, continued study but no action. Yet the Scandinavian countries and The Netherlands were able to go into UNCTAD and immediately pledge a commitment to the common fund principle around which the success of UNCTAD IV was clearly seen to turn. That was the kind of leadership that I expected from Canada. Why was that firm leadership, leadership we are capable of, not given?

Canada has a five-year strategy—between 1975 and 1980—on international economic co-operation, yet the government fails to implement it. In fact, most Canadians do not even know of the existence of this multidimensional strategy which recognizes that aid, as such, is insufficient in our relations with developing nations. The reason the strategy is not being implemented—and why we were so weak at UNCTAD IV—is that the government cannot get it all together. Some of the policy-makers want to participate in integrated commodity agreements, and others say that our domestic economy would be adversely affected and that we therefore cannot move on new agreements. But not to move is to perpetuate the economic discrimination which is at the heart of the problem. For this debate is not about charity, not about the $1 billion CIDA spends in a band-aid approach to poverty; it is about new, equitable economic relationships. This point is acknowledged by every serious student of the rich-poor gap. Last Monday, the Globe and Mail, expressing its disappointment at UNCTAD IV said:

> The reality is that, setting aside the oil trade, the rich countries are taking out of the poor countries in excess profits from five to ten times as much as they are putting in foreign aid.

The Globe and Mail put its finger on the problem:

> Thanks to grossly unequal access of capital, to the third world's lack of market leverage, the vulnerability of economies that depend on a single export, and to barriers set up by the rich against the manufactured products of the poor, it is the industrial world that takes most of the profit from what the third world has to sell.

So UNCTAD IV lumbered on as the pressure mounted. The Canadian NGO representatives kept sending back reports on the impending failure of UNCTAD IV. This group should be commended for its serious efforts to mount public opinion in Canada. Questions about Canada's commitment to a common fund were raised in the House. Finally, on May 27 the cabinet responded to the pressure and committed Canada to a common fund, if in fact there would be a common fund.

Why did this commitment have to be dragged out of the government? Why did the cabinet have to be pulled, kicking and screaming, to the reality of what UNCTAD IV was all about? Why does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talk about a "conspiracy of love" to solve the problems of the developing world, when the government cannot back up sentiments of love with a commitment to action? Are we to assume that if the NGO community had not escalated the pressure on the government, there would have been no final commitment at Nairobi? Are we to assume that Canada finally acted because it wanted to save face at CIEC but without alienating the United States which was more committed to a new bank than new rules of trade? What a sad way that is for the government to lead!

Finally, UNCTAD IV ended with Canada giving its approval in principle, along with 15 other countries, to an integrated commodities program which calls for a negotiating conference on a common fund to be held before the end of March, 1977.

● (1520)

We urge the government to play a more active role in these negotiations, and to do this by first of all building a climate of support within Canada for this action, which is clearly in the interests of our own country. We want to build better and more diverse trading partners, and this can be done by equalizing economic opportunities. This approach is a far more positive one than relying on the CIDA budget to do the job. When this policy is fully explained to the Canadian people, the government will find support for some brave, new action.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the minister's statement and are glad that he has been able to make such an optimistic statement about the results of UNCTAD IV. We share the views that he has expressed, and action on the various aspects of the new economic order is urged. The well-known Swedish economist, Gunnar Myrdal, put it very well when he declared that we have been living during one of history's most abrupt reversals of political climate. UNCTAD has been an important step in that essential reversal of policy. The minister himself said at the UNCTAD conference that we need action with an unprecedented sense of urgency. He then went on to say:

> I believe that we have passed that stage of analysis and assessment of issues. We must now get together to devise workable and dynamic solutions.

I must say I share, with the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), the view that these bold words were not effectively followed up; there has been a degree of hesitation. I would give as an illustration the common fund, of which mention has already been made. The common fund is essentially a means of getting funds for a buffer stock to stabilize commodity prices, and this is one of the primary requests of the developing countries. Its purpose is to procure the exchange of commodities through which they can develop themselves so that they will not be dependent upon aid from the outside world.

Instead of our delegation taking a firm stand on principle, they put it off until the very last minute. Even in his statement the minister skated around any commitment by Canada, saying there were a lot of conditions and sort of backward steps. There is, in fact, no commitment at all. May I read what the minister said in this regard. He said that we shall be working with the other participants to resolve the problems of commodity trade which concern developing countries. He went on:

> These discussions and negotiations will provide the appropriate basis for examining the parameters of a common fund and for a decision regarding its establishment. As I stated in the House earlier this week, if we are satisfied in the course of these commodity meetings and negotiations that a common fund will be effective and useful, Canada will make a contribution to it.

As has been pointed out already by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, many other countries were able to make a firm commitment. It is true that the details of the commitment still have to be worked out. Obviously, if a commitment was made which was impossible to carry out, or which Canada felt was a totally impractical way of solving the problem, we would not expect Canada to go ahead; but the making of a firm commitment is indeed perfectly possible. I wish the minister had used the same sort of language as was used by Mr. Hakkvard Bakke, the minister for commerce for Norway, who followed the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). He said:

> Only decisions which can be transplated into the realities of the daily life of the poor masses are real contributions. I am glad to say quite unequivocally that my government is in agreement with and supports the main elements of an integrated program for commodities... we have already declared ourselves ready to contribute to a common fund. In our view UNCTAD should have the central co-ordinating role in this important venture—

That language seems to me rather different from the language used by the minister in his statement. Perhaps the minister is just indulging in ministerial caution, which in many cases, I suppose, is befitting of his particular position. But as he described it, this is an urgent situation calling for action, not—to use his own words—analysis or assessment. I am disappointed that this caution, and perhaps the caution of some of his colleagues as well, seems to have so watered down his approach that I must agree with the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that we have not had the real leadership we would have had. This common fund is not a backbreaking financial burden. It has been estimated that it would cost between $21 million and $29 million for Canada's share, which is about 3 per cent of Canada's aid budget.

Then there are other matters, Mr. Speaker. There is a vague reference in the statement to a resolution on liberalization of trade, but not a word more is said about that. Apparently the minister has overlooked the fact that the committee on development, which was approved by the whole external affairs committee, firmly recommended that if we are serious about liberalizing trade, we should get on with the business of planning adjustment assistance for those who might possibly be affected.

Has anything been done in this regard? I shall have to ask some questions of the minister about that later, but there is no mention of it in his statement. We are told that there was a resolution. Are we serious about this, or not? If we are serious, we should look once again at what the committee recommended, which was a tripartite body composed of government, employers and employees working together to work out adjustment assistance. This means that if, as a consequence of trade liberalization, we face competition from overseas which destroys job opportunities, something ought to be done about it. I am just wondering why so little is said on that particular question. UNCTAD IV is only a beginning, but an important beginning, leading to what may take months or years to hammer into shape so that practical action can be taken.

In closing, may I say there is needed a far greater and continuing effort on the part of the government, members of parliament and those who have the role of leadership in the community to make clear how vitally important is this whole new movement. If we are to build a stable world based on co-operation, greater justice and equality for men of all races, then we will have to start putting into practice some of the noble words we have been using for quite a while now.

[Mr. Brewin.]

I know that we are committed, but we need something to evidence that commitment a little more so as to arouse the Canadian people who must give it their support. If they do not do so, it will fail and fizzle. We have to do more to warn the people of Canada that we are in an era of drastic change; that justice as well as our own future stability and economic security depend upon a real change of opinions and upon action being taken in this field.

● (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first I should thank the minister for having been kind enough to send us a French copy of his statement before the opening of the House and we wish that this practice will continue in every other similar circumstances.

UNCTAD IV that was held in Nairobi in Kenya from May 3 to 28, 1976 enabled more than 2,000 delegates from over 150 countries to meet and try to find answers for the establishment of a new international economic order, which means that the old economic order that we knew is no longer appropriate.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) was very careful in his statements concerning our commitments to the developing countries and he was right because when we know the pressions between industrialized countries and poorer nations we realize how difficult it is to find an easy answer without offending one or the other of the countries that give or ask for help. Furthermore, an action program at the international level is highly impracticable because of important differences between the nations which can help and those which rely on that help. As the minister said, two particularly significant resolutions have resulted from this conference. One establishing an integrated program for basic products and the other concerning the debts of developing countries.

Mr. Speaker, it is unusual and it surprised me that even at the international level we discuss debts even before we talk about development. Even undeveloped countries have managed to get into debt. It is again an obvious sign of the illogicality of political economy principles which typify the financial management of those countries which have debts even before growing to maturity. Several external help programs have already been created by various international groups and by some countries, including Canada, the United States and others, and unfortunately the helping countries are too often criticized to the same extent as their generosity. But I am pleased by the minister's statement and I hope, as he said, that this conference will eventually give long term positive results.

[English]

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a couple of questions. Why is it that Canada changed its position during the course of UNCTAD? In the minister's speech during the opening days of UNCTAD he merely said we would give our assent to a study of the common fund principle around which the success of UNCTAD IV was turning. Indeed, on May 11 when he reported to the external affairs committee he said he was not yet convinced of the need for a common fund. Yet on May 27 the cabinet met and gave its assent to the principle of the fund, which was subsequently announced in the House and relayed to Nairobi, enabling us to sign the statement of the resolution with 15 other countries at the conclusion of UNCTAD.

I ask the minister, now, what evidence was put before the federal cabinet to enable it to change its mind and give its assent to the principle of the common fund, evidence that was not available at the opening of this conference and which would have enabled Canada to go into the conference at the beginning and give the commitment in the opening stages so that we would have been able to give the leadership that UNCTAD so desperately needed?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not regard the comments made in the House by the President of the Privy Council as any change in the Canadian position. It was merely an evolution of a position that had been taken by myself in my opening statement when I said we were quite prepared to examine further the concept of the common fund. We merely advanced that proposition to the point where we stated that as a result of discussions and negotiations, if the common fund justified itself in terms of usefulness in the solution of commodity problems, then we would be prepared to contribute to it.

I do not regard it as a change of position, because these contingencies obviously were in our minds as we prepared for the conference and as we considered the various attitudes we could take. I do not regard it as any change. Our delegation, headed by Mr. Bruce, had been advising us of the developments in the discussion and it was in response to our own convictions on this point and the developments of UNCTAD that caused us really to carry forward the policy which had been indicated in embryo in my opening statement.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see there was such a speedy evolution in the government's thinking during the course of UNCTAD IV, which only shows what can be gained by escalating pressure. That brings me to the question of public understanding of what this conference is all about and, indeed, the understanding and the commitment of the House itself.

I ask the minister why the report of the subcommittee on international development has not yet been tabled in the House, despite an expressed public desire by the minister that it be so debated in order to bring up the level of understanding by the Canadian people concerning the structural changes required in international relationships that are highlighted in the report. Those structural changes can be most significantly demonstrated by reference to two figures. Canada's aid to the ten leading recipient countries in bilateral assistance last year was $330 million, yet our trade surplus with those same ten countries was $368 million, which led CIDA to confirm today that there is a greater benefit to Canada in economic relations with these aid partners. In other words we gain more than we put into the developing countries, which is at the heart of the problem. The subcommittee reported on this, yet that report continues to be buried.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should correct a false impression under which the hon. member seems to be labouring, namely, that the whole matter of the common fund was escalated as a result of public pressure. Obviously, we had considered the view made known by the subcommittee. We had listened to views in the House of Commons. We were listening in Nairobi, and we acted in conformity with our own understanding of the realities and not as a result of any public pressure directed to us from Nairobi particularly.

I do not regard public pressure as distasteful or undesirable, but I think the hon. member would agree that there certainly was not an outcry among the Canadian public on the common fund that would cause the government to react to a groundswell in its favour. Unfortunately, the Canadian public up to the present time has exhibited only marginal interest in the subject we are discussing today. I had intended today, in my statement and in other ways, to draw to the attention of the House and the public these important questions that are so vital to the future of the world. I would be prepared to debate the subcommittee report at any time, but as my hon. friend knows, we are rushing pell-mell in this House to deal with all kinds of important matters and it is not easy to fit in every subject matter. That is the only reason.

Mr. Roche: I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The reason the Canadian public has a marginal interest in these questions is that the Canadian government has not laid before the public the full exposition of what this question is all about. I ask the minister specifically, with reference to the speech he made at the opening of UNCTAD, when he referred at page 5 of his speech to using aid funds to establish a trade facilitation office to assist developing countries seeking to export to the Canadian market, what did he mean by "trade facilitation office", and to what extent is the Canadian government prepared to move on that?

Mr. MacEachen: I thought that was a particularly positive proposal that was made in my statement. We did make several other important proposals that were not accepted by the conference, including a proposal to increase the grant threshold, including a proposal to have a debt conference and a proposal for support of mandatory joint producer and consumer financing operations. All these were distinct Canadian proposals which were not accepted and were, in my view, somewhat ahead of some of the proposals which were accepted. The purpose of the trade facilitation office is to assist developing countries to penetrate the Canadian market. We are taking that proposal seriously and it is being studied at present. It is a new proposal, but it has not yet been implemented.

● (1540)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not easy, on the strength of 8½ pages of generalities, to formulate questions: rather, this invites comment. There are two specific questions which I should like to ask, one relating to a comment that is made, and one relating to an omission. On page 5 the minister speaks in glowing terms of how happy he is that there was such a broad measure of agreement in that 12 of the 13 resolutions were adopted by consensus. I wonder if this is not a way, perhaps, of avoiding standing up and being counted. When you have reservations in a consensus procedure, you do not actually have to say you agree or disagree; you can virtually abstain.

This is unusual in UN procedure. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on this point, because it seems that the whole thing is a means of befogging the issue and, as two or three of my colleagues have suggested, there are no clear, positive actions aside from the decision to study something further. This matter has been studied for years now. On the matter of consensus, I wonder if the minister could comment on why he considers this more desirable than a voting procedure, because on the next page he says that something was missed by a couple of votes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, the hon. member has no difficulty in putting precise questions. He has put this question two or three times.

Mr. MacEachen: I have not advocated consensus in preference to voting on the resolutions. What I have been saying is that consensus is much more positive than confrontation, which has been a real possibility in the course of the conference. It was only as a result of 48 hours of intensive negotiation that the developing and the developed countries agreed to go along with the negotiated resolutions by consensus.

In the case of the American proposal there was a vote. A vote was taken because the majority of those who voted were opposed to the American idea of a resources investment bank. We voted for that. I think it was a mistake to have turned that proposal down simply because it had not been fully explained or fully considered and it seemed to have been unwise for the conference to have turned down, without serious examination, a proposal made by the major industrial power whose co-operation is vital if we are to make any changes in the international economic order. I think that was a mistake.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My second question refers to an apparent omission. I believe that one of the objects—I may be misunderstanding the purpose of these ministerial statements—would be to make the Canadian public aware of what went on, not just to justify the position of the government. For example, there is complete neglect of the matter of the transfer of technology in agriculture with a view to improving or helping those countries which seek self-sufficiency in the matter of food, water and fertilizer—those three things together. They are basic even to the generation of commodities for trade, particularly renewable commodities. No reference whatever is made to this question. Would the minister care to comment either on the purpose of the omission or on the matter itself?

Mr. MacEachen: Three resolutions were adopted at the conference on the general question of the transfer of technology. I agree with the hon. member that agriculture is a very important item of development. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, through the world food council, through the world food conference, through the world food program, is addressing himself to the general question of agricultural production in the developing world. It did not receive special attention at this particular conference or in my statement because it was not a subject matter of special attention even though it is quite important. I did not omit it because I regard it as unimportant. As the hon. member knows, it has been highlighted as one of the areas to which we attach priority in our international development strategy.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister about the resolution on trade liberalization. I have not seen the resolutions yet. I think the members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and perhaps all members of the House, would like to see them. However, I think trade liberalization is a very sensitive subject and I should like the minister to tell us the nature of the resolution passed on that subject.

Mr. MacEachen: There were three resolutions passed by the conference on trade matters. One provides for measures to improve access to developed country markets for improvement of the generalized system of preferences and tariff reclassification. Another resolution calls for measures which will give added impetus to multilateral trade negotiations. The third resolution dealt with transnational corporations. I have received all of these resolutions. They require a good deal of study, and I believe it would be very useful for the standing committee to take a look at some of these resolutions which are cast in general terms. The three resolutions on trade liberalization were adopted, by consensus, at the conference.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to ask the minister about another matter I mentioned in my remarks earlier today. What steps, if any, have been taken, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, toward working out and developing adjustment assistance to help those who might suffer economically as a result of more liberal trade measures or, indeed, help those who are suffering because even now some industries are threatened by cheap imports?

Mr. MacEachen: I realize that the subcommittee of the standing committee did make proposals on the matter of adjustment systems, and if at a certain point the Canadian government, supported by the Canadian parliament and the people, decided that we ought to admit tropical products at the expense of Canadian production and Canadian jobs, then of course adjustment measures would be essential. But up to the present time, while we have an adjustment program in the textile industry, as have most other countries, we have not yet developed new adjustment policies with respect to other industries. I say this with the full realization that the responsibility for such a program and policy is that of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I suggest that it would be useful, in the interests of the dialogue, to raise the matter with him.

● (1550)

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. In view of the record of commodity agreements and the great importance some of these commodities might have on our Canadian economy, how far did the Canadian commitment go in these commodity agreements?

Mr. MacEachen: If I may attempt to abbreviate the Canadian position, we stated that we will support measures which have the effect of stabilizing commodity prices, and particularly of stabilizing the earnings of exporters. We accept, as one of the techniques, the negotiation of commodity agreements, where they can be demonstrated as useful, on a case by case basis. For example, as a consumer we have joined the tin agreement. We made a voluntary contribution to the tin buffer stock because we believed that would be a useful approach. Some of the industrialized countries, including Canada, have supported the idea of a commodity by commodity approach and that each commodity should have its own agreement, with its own funding and with its own buffer financing formula. This has been our approach.

We then went on to say, like the French stated at the conference, that if a number of individual commodity agreements have been negotiated and are in operation, and if at that point there is a necessity for a common fund either drawing upon the individual funds or supplemented from other sources that would be useful, then we would consider it. In addition to that, we indicated at the conference our readiness to participate in the negotiations and the discussions on the common fund. But there seems to have been an idea abroad that we should create a huge common fund and that that would be an incentive, by the very creation of a large fund, for producers and consumers to enter into the commodity agreements regardless of whether the justification for these agreements had been carefully worked out. If a common fund is seen in that perspective, it certainly has dangers for the international economic system.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, on page 20 of the French copy of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs, dealing with developing countries, it says in the third paragraph:

Debt

A crisis of accumulated debt has been brewing for years in many of the developing countries and the severe balance of payments of recent years have now brought a number of them to the brink of bankruptcy. It has been pointed out that the repayment of the capital and interests on former debts use up to 50 per cent of the total amount of financial aid received by developing countries. Some proposals consider drastic measures in all respects to alleviate the burden of debts in developing countries. Now, I do not see these proposals in the report.

Would the minister advise the House which proposals the government is prepared to make to those developing countries, since 50 per cent of the financial aid they receive are used only to service their debt?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member asked what proposals we had made with respect to the debt question. We supported the proposal in the Manila declaration that a debt conference would be convened to consider what action could be taken and what guidelines could be used in order to overcome the debt problem. We also made the proposal that it might be better to consider ways and means of preventing countries from getting into debt or from increasing their debt. It was for that reason we suggested an increase in the threshold of assistance to developing countries.

Now, of course, there have been various mechanisms established by UNCTAD—a review, the creation of guidelines, a group of experts to consider debt questions—and we have gone along with that.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 5,161, 5,233 and 5,431.

[Text]

PUBLIC WORKS—FIRE ALARM SYSTEMS

Question No. 5,161—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government and, in particular, the Department of Public Works and the Dominion Fire Commissioner aware as to whether or not the Library of Parliament is the only part of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings with a fire alarm system connected to a central station and, if so (a) since what date has the Dominion Fire Commissioner been aware of the existence of this situation (b) have any recommendations been made on the matter by the Dominion Fire Commissioner or anyone else in the government and (i) if so, to whom and on what dates (ii) if not, for what reason?

2. Does this same situation exist at the (a) Lester B. Pearson Building (b) l'Esplanade Laurier (c) Journal Towers and (i) if so, on what dates and to whom have any recommendations been made on the matter by the Dominion Fire Commissioner (ii) if no recommendations have been made, for what reason?

3. Is the Department of Public Works and, in particular, the Dominion Fire Commissioner responsible for testing the fire alarm system in the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings and, if so, on what dates during the past five years have such tests been made?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. (a) November 10, 1967; (b) (i) a recommendation to directly connect the fire alarm system to a central station was made by the Dominion Fire Commissioner to the Department of Public Works Capital Region Director in July 1973. However, due to the fact that a manually operated direct connection was provided to a central station, and to avoid unnecessary response by fire apparatus to the building in the event of false alarms, the recommendation was reconsidered and the present procedure whereby all alarms are monitored by a 24-hour guard service is considered adequate. (ii) Not applicable.

2. (a) Yes, in the case of the Lester B. Pearson Building where there are security personnel on duty at all times capable of taking appropriate action in the event of fire, the direct automatic connection from the fire alarm to the central station has been waived. Alarms are transmitted directly to the Ottawa Fire Department by operation of a direct line telephone. (b) The l'Esplanade Laurier is a leased building with qualified security personnel on duty at all times in the fire control room, which is equipped with an emergency telephone for use in reporting fire or other emergencies. (c) The Journal Towers are leased buildings with 24-hour security guard service. On receipt of a fire alarm the guard in the lobby immediately telephones the fire department. Any requirement for an automatic direct connection to a central station system from a leased building (items b and c) would have to be made by the Municipal Fire Authorities having jurisdiction.

3. The Dominion Fire Commissioner is responsible for testing fire alarm systems in the Centre Block. The most recent test of the complete system was conducted by the Dominion Fire Commissioner and Facilities Maintenance personnel on 21 to 23 January 1976. The fire alarm system in the Centre Block has been tested every three months over the past five years by contract.

OLD AGE SECURITY OFFICE, DON MILLS, ONTARIO

Question No. 5,233—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the reasons that inquiries to the Old Age Security Office in Don Mills, Ontario, by the Member for Leeds, have taken in some cases up to fifty-one days to complete investigations and specifically in the case of File Number 415 164 821?

2. Will the Department of National Health and Welfare conduct an investigation into operations of the Old Age Security Office in Don Mills to determine reasons for such slowness and will it take the necessary methods to drastically improve services in reply to inquiries from Members of Parliament?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Enquiries from the public and Members of Parliament, directed to the Old Age Security office in Don Mills, Ontario, are dealt with by an enquiries section set up specifically to ensure that a quick response is provided. Office records indicate that telephone enquiries from Mr. Cossitt concerning File Number 415 164 821 were answered promptly. Due to technical difficulties associated with the adaptation of the new Spouse's Allowance program to existing computer systems, there was a delay in producing a cheque in the correct amount for normal cheque delivery. To offset this problem, cheques for account 514 164 821 were produced manually and were delivered when due.

2. The technical difficulties mentioned above have been identified, and action is being taken to eliminate these problems. Enquiries from Members of Parliament always receive high priority.

MONTREAL PORT AUTHORITY AND HALIFAX PORT AUTHORITY

Question No. 5,431—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the government's best estimate of the (a) total (b) individual amount spent in support of members of the Montreal Port Authority in respect of attendance at meetings, for travel and other purposes during 1975?

2. What are the comparable figures for the Halifax Port Authority?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. (a) $31,254; (b) Fees for Meetings, $4,700; Travel, $3,241.50; Honoraria, $23,312.50.

2. (a) $18,909; (b) Fees for Meetings, $7,300; Travel, $2,609; Honoraria, $9,000.

[Mr. Drury.]

[Translation]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 5,423 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

MANPOWER CENTRES, QUEBEC

Question No. 5,423—Mr. Matte:

1. How many Manpower Centres are there in the Province of Quebec?

2. What are their addresses and telephone numbers?

Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this budget comes at a crucial stage in Canada's fight against inflation. Because of tentative—and I am referring to the period between now and October as compared with the earlier period—early signs of success in reducing the rate of increase in the cost of living, there are some who would abandon the fight now, before the anti-inflation program has had a chance to exert a deep and permanent effect upon the inflationary expectations of the nation.

There are others who would divert our attention from the battle by proposing that the government should spend its way toward full employment. Such a proposal would not only fatally compromise the government's adoption of spending restraint as an essential weapon in the fight against inflation, but by stimulating inflation would also impede the private sector's long-term ability to create jobs for the jobless.

It is a mistake to consider inflation and unemployment as mutually exclusive problems. The unemployment problem cannot be solved by abandoning the anti-inflation effort. If economists and the governments of the industrialized nations have learned anything from our post-war experience, we have learned that the cyclical switching of our attention from inflation to unemployment and back again has not only not cured either problem but has worsened both.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is for just that reason that all our policies—spending policies, over-all fiscal and monetary policy, and the policies governing price and income restraint—are aimed at gradually bringing inflation under control without jeopardizing renewed growth of output and employment. The only way to bring down the rate of unemployment is to restore the economy to a state of health and vigour; and the only way to do that, in the present circumstances, is to remove inflation as a major obstacle to our economic progress.

● (1600)

[Translation]

And this is one of the reasons why we must strongly object to the diversion manoeuvres of our opponents.

When I announced the creation of the prices and incomes control board last October, I said clearly to the Canadian people that we were launching a three-year restraint program because it would take us that long to get back on our feet again, to return to steady prices and a balanced growth rate, and because we would need all that time to bring down inflation gradually and surely without putting the country in a situation of economic paralysis.

The government's viewpoint has not changed since then. We see no reason to give up our efforts today or in the near future, now that our hopes to bring down the inflation rate are just beginning to materialize. Despite the strong objections of some particularly restless unions and businesses, objections which their spokesmen in the opposition are echoing, we will not give up until we succeed in our attempt.

[English]

I am not surprised that some powerful interests are crying out for an early removal of restraints on the exercise of their free-wheeling power in the marketplace. But the plain, simple and hard fact of the matter is that there is no way in which inflation can be brought more quickly under control without resort to Draconian measures—measures which would seriously impede, if not abort, the present recovery of the economy and lead to substantially higher unemployment. Some may be prepared to pay that price. We are not. Nor do I believe the vast majority of Canadians are prepared to pay that price. I am surprised that the special interests of these powerful groups should be pleaded so blatantly by opposition members who have been elected to serve the powerless as well as the powerful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Pure bunkum.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my speech is important and serious but not very funny, and if hon. members opposite want to contribute a bit of levity, it is on their shoulders.

Mr. Paproski: You are laughing; we are not; we are serious.

Mr. Trudeau: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am especially shocked by the New Democratic Party. In trying to give the appearance that it is serving simultaneously the incompatible interests of powerful unions, which oppose the controls program, and powerless low income families, who need and support the program, the New Democratic Party presents the absurd spectacle of having both feet planted firmly on the ground on opposite sides of the fence.

Mr. Blais: It is a pretty low fence.

Mr. Trudeau: I had expected a little more courage and a little more honesty from the party which so often and so self-righteously has proclaimed itself to be the social conscience of the nation.

I am less surprised by the contradictory performance of the Progressive Conservative party, which in its predictable effort to identify itself with every competing special interest group in the country is not representing any interest very well, least of all the public interest. It is perhaps too much to ask the Tories where they really stand on the issue of controls and spending restraint. I would be satisfied if they would just tell us which fence they are currently sitting on.

For an example of the Tories' attempts to be all things to all men, we need look no further than the remarkable speech given in this House on May 27 by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I am sorry he is not here. If he had known I was going to speak, I am sure he would have been here to understand the remarks I am going to make on the subject of his speech. After criticizing the government for the level of its spending and the size of its deficits, he proceeded, without so much as an embarrassed blush, to plead for more government financial assistance for farmers, small businessmen, energy consumers, exporting companies, job creation, industrial research, medical research, big business and the taxpayers in general.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Heward wrote that for him.

Mr. Trudeau: The next time I hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) complain about the damaged credibility of parliament, I will know exactly what he means.

It was to be expected that some business and labour leaders would object very strenuously to controls on their freedom of action. In fairness, however, it must be said that hundreds of thousands of union members have voluntarily agreed to settlements within the guidelines, and that the bulk of business criticism has not been directed against controls in principle but against the details of their application. That kind of criticism has usually been both constructive and welcomed by the government. It is more in sorrow than in anger—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, yes!

Mr. Trudeau: —that I listen to otherwise responsible people demanding restraint in government spending but objecting to restraint in programs in which they have a special interest. That kind of myopia has made the government's job more difficult than it need be. I have no quarrel with those who plead the special worth of one or other of the very many worth-while programs for people in which the government is engaged, whether it be regional development, housing, the Local Initiatives Program, museums, dairy subsidies, or many others. This afternoon we heard special pleading for UNCTAD. We have no objection to these; they are all worth-while programs and that is why this government is pursuing them.

But the harsh fact is that we do not have the billions of dollars which would be needed in order to give immediate and adequate support to all those and other priorities. We will have to learn to choose more carefully and pay for some things over a longer time period than we have been used to in the past.

I ask for public understanding and support of the hard spending decisions which are being forced upon us by economic circumstances. It seems to me that there comes a time in the affairs of the nation when a particular public policy is so much in the public interest, so crucial to the stability of the country, that it requires members of parliament and citizens generally to lay aside narrow private interests and stand up for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Now is such a time, and the anti-inflation program is such a policy.

[Translation]

For in this fight against inflation, we have only one alternative: success or chaos. A failure would be a gross injustice towards our most disadvantaged citizens and would jeopardize the hold we must have on our future. I urge opposition members to think about it when they are tempted to use the House of Commons as a forum for powerful economic interests. I said it many times, an effective control of prices and incomes is possible only with the support and cooperation of all of us. That is why I am pleased not only because Canadians have supported this program from the outset but because they have not changed their minds since, despite the well financed and well organized hostility of our opponents.

What is to be feared is not that willing Canadians will finally take a negative stand as a result of the continued propaganda of groups which serve particular interests, but that public support weakens because some people would be led to conclude, on the strength of favourable statistics on the cost of living, that the fight is already won, or because others, reassured by the same figures—I will quote them in a moment—would feel that this problem is not as serious and consequently that restraints are no longer necessary. Both attitudes, if they were to become widespread, might be fatal to the success of our program. This is why those who are in a position to influence public opinion have such a responsibility. Those who, among influent and academic people, contribute to make people believe that it is less important today than last October to strongly restrain prices, salaries and public expenditures are doing the nation a very bad service.

● (1610)

[English]

Of course I am gratified that the increase since last year in the consumer price index declined to 8.9 per cent in April and May from 10.6 per cent in October. I am pleased that the seasonally adjusted CPI, which had increased at an annual rate of 11.7 per cent in the six months prior to last October, declined to 6.4 per cent between October and May. While this sharp rate of decline is very welcome, I am the first to admit that it is not due solely to the anti-inflation program, and that it is not sustainable over the long-term in the absence of some basic structural reforms in the economy.

I have said many times before that success in the fight against inflation is not to be looked for in short-term movements of the CPI, but in the progress we make in effecting necessary changes in our attitudes, expectations and economic institutions. That takes time. If we do not give ourselves the time by reaffirming our resolve to see this battle through to the end, we cannot succeed. I realize that in the context of the double-digit inflation which Canada has suffered for the past couple of years, the 8 per cent rate which we confidently expect to reach this year must seem to many people like the fulfilment of a dream, negating the need to continue the struggle.

Mr. Stanfield: A bad dream.

Mr. Trudeau: A bad dream, as the hon. member opposite mumbled.

Mr. Stanfield: I did not mumble. I said it quite distinctly.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member dreams quite distinctly. I apologize.

It is because of the potentially dangerous consequences of such an attitude that I am appealing today to all who have an influence over public opinion to tell it like it is. I realize that in order to sustain public support for the anti-inflation program it is necessary for the people to understand not only that it must remain in force until it is successful, but it is also necessary for them to see that the program is fair.

In furtherance of that second objective, the government has consistently and seriously offered to make changes in the rules when we are convinced that such changes will contribute to greater equity. Our desire to be fair is the reason wage settlements above the arithmetic guidelines have been allowed in special cases. But it is important to note that even with those exceptions above the arithmetic guidelines, settlements subject to the Anti-Inflation Board's jurisdiction have shown an average increase of only 12.1 per cent. This compares with settlements which were running at average rates of about 18 per cent during the first three quarters of 1975.

I wish to stress that point. More and more we hear people—usually they are theorists—say that inflation was going to come down anyhow and the government only brought the program in to take the credit. Inflation was not going to come down anyhow. They say that now because it has been coming down. Settlements have been reduced from an average of 18 per cent in the first three quarters of 1975 to an average of 12.1 per cent since we brought the controls program in.

The desire to be fair is the reason behind changes in pricing regulations announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on budget night. We are confident that with the new rules all companies will be treated more equitably. No one in the government has ever claimed that restrictions on the way we do business in this country are attractive to us or easy to apply. We have claimed only that such restrictions are necessary and can work. Mr. Speaker, they are working and they continue to be necessary. They are working because millions of Canadians have generously subordinated immediate self-interest to the longer-term common good of the nation. In that spirit of generosity lies the greatest hope that the program will continue to attract the support of Canadians and will be ultimately successful.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it never occurred to me, when I was slated to be the first speaker for the Conservative party this afternoon, that it would be my lot to follow—and I say this in a neutral sense—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is difficult to predict the course of events in this House. On this quiet, early summer afternoon I wish to make some comments on the budget and offer some suggestions.

The Prime Minister set a good example for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) by delivering a short speech. I say this as I wish to comment on the length and dullness of the budget speech; and I assure you I will not indulge in carping criticism. Although the minister's speech did little for the Canadian economy, it did something for me. Speaking as one who may have bored audiences, as I suffered throughout that marathon of platitudes which the minister delivered I felt purged of all sense of guilt. I no longer felt guilty for what I may have inflicted on my audiences during the past 25 years or so.

I am puzzled why the government House leader, whom I regard as an honest and straightforward man, would wish to see the speech televised. Perhaps the hon. gentleman wishes to destroy not only the House of Commons but Canadian television as well. The truth is that the speech would never have been made on TV. Some generously describe the speech as realistic. A more accurate adjective is "soporific." I do not believe anyone could be that dull for so long without really trying. I know that I could not have been so dull for so long without working hard at it.

Mr. Trudeau: You must be trying now.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not know if the minister was trying to put the House of Commons to sleep. I suppose the government's strategy is to tranquillize the Canadian people. Its strategy is also to leave it to the Americans to bring prosperity to Canadians after the next election: Do not raise any disturbing issues in Canada. Prepare your ground well with a few well chosen fights against the big, bad wolves, like certain big labour interests and certain special interests in the country. We saw the Prime Minister start to prepare that ground very nicely this afternoon.

● (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It surely indicates something about this government, and in fact this country, that the Minister of Finance could have delivered that fatuous speech in the year 1976 in the world as it really exists. I am afraid it says something about the Canadian people. Some of them think that speech was not too bad because there was not anything in it to disturb them. I wondered that night, and I still wonder, whether the minister and I are living in the same world. Is he right to ignore the reality that I see, and content himself with a policy of inertia associated with some tricks, devices and sleight-of-hand such as monkeying with the estimates, unemployment insurance and controls?

I wish to say a few words about the tricks. The Prime Minister emphasized the importance of telling it as it is. There is no need for me to dwell on the basic dishonesty of the government on the issue of controls. The government and its supporters have shown a degree of cynicism that was previously not thought possible in this country. It is just as simple as that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister spoke this afternoon about those members of parliament who are not prepared to help the little fellow whom they were elected to support. I ask the Prime Minister seriously, does he remember anything at all of what he said in 1974? Does he really expect anybody to take him seriously when he attacks any member of this House for failure to defend the little fellow or defend controls?

Consider what the government is doing in the area of unemployment insurance. Changes are being adopted that the government resisted, fought against and repudiated, hoping to convince the electorate that they were prepared to be tough toward unemployment insurance and hoping that the whole issue of the cost of unemployment insurance would quieten down and go away. That is the whole point. Consider the sleight-of-hand with the spending estimates. The Prime Minister made a big fuss, pleading for support for the efforts of the government to cut back on its expenditures. As far back as December last, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) was swearing by everything that is holy that spending for the year ending March 31 last would not be more than 16 per cent higher than in the previous year. He stuck to that story in a pamphlet issued to us in April, just a couple of months ago.

On budget night, however, we learned that spending during the last fiscal year was in fact 18 per cent higher than in the previous year; some $700 million higher than the President of the Treasury Board swore it would be. That may have made a monkey out of the President of the Treasury Board, but it was very convenient for the Minister of Finance and the government as a whole. Having spent that money last year, they not only do not have to spend it this year but it gives them a better basis for comparison in terms of this year's spending. It enables the Minister of Finance to say that expenditures this fiscal year will not grow faster than the gross national product, estimated by him to be about 14 per cent.

The government spent hundreds of millions of dollars during the fiscal year ending March last. It advanced hundreds of millions of dollars to Crown corporations toward the end of that fiscal year, hundreds of millions of dollars which did not need to be advanced or spent in that fiscal year. The government seems to have deliberately inflated last year's spending so that it will look better this year. Thsi is the sort of jigging around, tinkering and dishonesty which one has come to expect from this government.

Some may say I am making a big fuss about very little. What difference, they may ask, does it really make whether the government spent money in the last fiscal year or the current fiscal year? Just this, Mr. Speaker. Quite apart from making a fool of the President of Treasury Board—and that is his business, with all his fine talk—it puts the Minister of Finance and the government in a position where they may well argue this time next year that expenditure growth did not exceed the growth of the gross national product during this fiscal year. It is just more manipulation.

The Prime Minister pleads for us to co-operate with them in their very earnest effort to control expenditures. He does this, of course, completely forgetting the totally irresponsible commitments made by the government during the election campaign. How can anybody take the Prime Minister seriously? Who can have any confidence, now, that this government will do what it says it will do, that its word is worth the paper on which it is written? Who can really believe that this government believes in anything?

This destruction of confidence is serious. Our challenge in Canada, as in other western democracies, goes far beyond working our way out of this recession. If we look around us, we see that western-style democracies and economies are under attack for lacking a sense of purpose, direction and cohesion. They are under attack for being too materialistic and lacking ideals, under attack for the range of their inequalities, inflation and unemployment.

In Canada, today, we lack a sense of common purpose. Distrust is prevalent. There is distrust of big business, big labour and big government. Citizens do not believe their national government is telling them the truth. Unfortunately, they are too often correct in that regard. The Minister of Finance is not to blame for all of this. However, this is the context in which he ought to have prepared his budget, although you would never recognize that from reading his speech.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) emphasized the need for a budget to set objectives for a period substantially longer than the year for which this budget has provided. We must improve our economic policies. We must re-establish trust between the citizen and his national government. We must ease, rather than aggravate, tension and confrontation that exists within our country.

I am not suggesting that we should abandon our institutions because those institutions are under attack. I am not suggesting that we should subject ourselves, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, to deep-seated structural reform. The kind of talk indulged in by the Prime Minister around the end of the year is both incoherent and unsettling for many Canadians. He did not do much here this afternoon to throw any light on that question. Of course our institutions must evolve as conditions change. However, our system of a mixed economy, with heavy reliance on private enterprise, is better for us than anything we see abroad. That system may not be the best for certain developing countries, but it is best for us.

Government ownership has a role to play, providing certain national services as our history and our experience shows us. However, public ownership as a means of giving people control of their economy has been shown to be a gigantic illusion. I suspect the most difficult corporations for government to control are Crown corporations where we see a paradoxical lack of control by the government, associated with great difficulty by those corporations in any hard decisions taken.

I say that our system is best for us. However, if we are to preserve it, we must see that it works satisfactorily. It is not working satisfactorily. This is partly due to external conditions, but it is dishonest to blame most of our troubles on the rest of the world, as the Prime Minister and the government have been doing for the past several years. What we need in the post-control period is not more government intervention but more restricted, intelligent, honest and better-defined intervention.

● (1630)

We should define the aims and priorities of government policy for the years ahead. The Leader of the Opposition has emphasized the importance of this. Not only have governments been expanding too rapidly, but they have been unable to solve or deal effectively with the problems they suggested they could solve. The national government in particular has been trying to do so many things that it has not done anything well. This has led to disillusionment and distress. Moreover, government has been taking an increasing proportion of the gross national product, and this in turn has generated inflationary pressures. Then, again, we see the federal government launch, with the provinces, costly programs which the national government now wishes to stick the provincial governments with, thus increasing distrust between the federal and provincial governments. I shall not elaborate on the con game involved in this; I have done so before.

Let me sum up in this way. The federal government has plenty to answer for. Instead of the Prime Minister coming to us and asking us to tell it as it is; instead of coming to us and seeking our support for some program of restraint, let the government tell it as it is, let the government try to be honest with the people. Certainly, the government must slow down the rate of growth of its expenditures if it does not wish to foster continuing inflation as taxpayers try to maintain their position after taxes.

It is clearly not good enough for the federal government to transfer costs to the provinces. That may ease the financial position of the federal government, but it solves nothing. Moreover, it places a heavy strain on confederation. We should recognize that the increasing share of the gross national product taken by the government presents a basic problem for our economy and our society. If that is what the Prime Minister was saying this afternoon, though he did not put it in those terms, I would agree with him. We must face that issue.

I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe did face it. He put before the House a number of proposals for large cuts in expenditures. It is true he did suggest using a small part of that money for certain specific purposes about which the Prime Minister made fun this afternoon. If the Prime Minister and members opposite are serious about the importance of controlling the rate of growth of government expenditures, the situation has gone far beyond hurling challenges at the opposition to say what we would cut. It has gone far beyond that. We must face this problem of the government taking more and more of the gross national product. But we should not regard government restraint as being in itself a policy of economic management, though this is crucial if we are to preserve our mixed economy, with its heavy reliance on private enterprise, and if our citizens are to regain confidence in what the government says it can do and in what it does.

But I emphasize that government restraint, of itself, will not cause our economy to work satisfactorily. Government restraint is only a precondition. Flexible fiscal and economic policies, as opposed to rigid doctrinaire conceptions, will continue to be essential tools of economic management.

It may have been naive to believe that Keynesian techniques could achieve perfection, that they could produce a perfectly balanced economy with full employment and no inflation. But it would be even more naive to believe that our economy would regulate itself if only the government would control itself, important though that is. Surely we are not going to revert to a pre-Keynesian world. I remember what that world was like, and I do not wish to go back to it. Surely we are going to learn from our post-war experience and not simply throw it out of the window because we have made mistakes. Let us learn from our mistakes. We might even go back and reread Keynes, who never advocated bigger and bigger governments taking an ever-increasing share of a gross national product. In any event, we still need flexible fiscal and monetary tools for economic management, associated with a longer-term policy of economic restraint.

The question is: what additional tools will we need to provide the stability and growth required to enable our institutions to work? That is the question which is worth discussing, not some murky question about changing our institutions. Nearly everyone agrees that price and income controls are not a permanent solution, that they can only be used effectively to deflate inflationary expectations. I say, after long and considerable thought, that the length of the program of controls adopted by the government is both stupid and tragic.

I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in the chamber to hear me say this, but I hope my remarks will be brought to his attention, for what they may be worth. I say the duration of the control program contemplated by the government is both stupid and tragic. In the first place, controls will not work satisfactorily for that length of time. Then, the restriction on collective bargaining, for example, for so long a period will create fear and resentment among organized labour which will subject the economy to severe and unnecessary strain. I say to members of the government over there, "Please stop thinking of maintaining controls for three years or more." I say this is an irresponsible attitude, partly because the government probably has no intention of maintaining controls for that period of time any more than it had any intention of not imposing controls when it was arguing that controls should not be imposed.

The correct policy of the government would be to emphasize its firm intention to drop controls as soon as possible and seek the co-operation of labour, business and other economic groups. The correct policy at this time is for the government to give labour and business an incentive to prove that controls are not necessary. Maintaining the position that the controls are to be kept in place engenders confrontation and tension. The control operation carried out by the government is cynical and is certainly harmful as far as the aspect of its duration is concerned. Controls will not provide a solution to anything except in terms of deflating inflationary expectations on a short-term basis. Nor will controls take care of any competitive disadvantage which may exist in the manufacturing sector of our industry.

● (1640)

The Economic Council has already outlined the reasons for our competitive difficulties in this world of large trading blocs. One problem basically is that, with few exceptions, our manufacturing industries do not have free access to large markets and consequently are not competitive with manufacturing industries which do have free access to large markets. The Economic Council has documented this difficulty.

Why do we not face this problem? Why do we try to pretend that we can perhaps overcome these competitive disadvantages by the imposition of controls? The problem is real, it exists, it will not go away; controls will not drive it away. We will not get rid of it just by cutting or controlling government expenditures. We will not drive this problem away through any approach of Canadian ownership. Nor will we solve the problem by adopting miscellaneous programs to encourage research and development. We will only solve this problem by attacking it in the way the Economic Council indicated.

This, however, is not my main point this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. The main question is: what direction should the government be taking? What direction are we taking? There has been debate about where we should go in the post-controls period. With all due humility, I express the view this afternoon—it is a very simple approach basically, though certainly not easy to carry out—that we should make another effort to run our economy along what I would call orthodox post-war lines; that is to say, we should try to get back to where we were before the government became overcommitted. There is much more force to this than just trying to put the clock back.

I should like to see us adopt a firm determination to reduce somewhat the proportion of the gross national product going to governments in Canada. I say that without any delusions about its difficulties. Associated with this move, however, I wish to see neither the adoption of rigid concepts, such as the necessity of a balanced budget every year, on the one hand, nor, on the other hand, resort to Galbraithian concepts, analyses and solutions.

I should like to see us take another crack at the approaches that seemed to work reasonably well after the war and which we have moved away from substantially during the past ten years. That, I think, is a simple, realistic approach that is worth trying. I believe that if the government were to back off somewhat in terms of expenditures and what it is trying to do in this country—such as to stop taking, for example, more of the working man's pay in taxes, and if the government and the Bank of Canada were to abandon the sort of stop-go policies that we have had in recent years—and took a somewhat longer-term view of economic policy, realizing that policies take time to take effect and have the additional advantage of creating an atmosphere of more certainty for those involved in our economy, the workingman as well as the businessman—the Leader of the Opposition referred to this—we might achieve, not Utopia but something we could live with. I think it is worth trying and it is urgent that we try it. I believe that all Canadians generally would support this kind of effort.

I am not this afternoon attempting to write a blueprint. My time will soon expire. Certainly, anything I have said this afternoon would have to be supplemented by specific programs, such as attacks on structural unemployment. Nor am I suggesting conditions have not changed in the last ten years, that life in Canada 10, 15 or 20 years ago was the same and that our economy in that period was working perfectly, because I know it was not.

My basic point is that our post-war economic policies worked reasonably well until we got off the track; until, as I have put it, the government became overcommitted, not simply in terms of what it was spending but in terms of what it was trying to do, usually without success. I believe we should make a very determined effort to get back on the track, that the national government should outline a firm, believable set of objectives and policies for, say, the next five years, and try to convince the Canadian people that it is both serious and determined to carry out those policies. One of those policies, of course, would be a very firm attitude toward the rate of inflation, having clearly and firmly delineated its direction. We would then follow the course that had been charted.

I must say that I have not seen evidence that this government is capable of that, and if it is not capable of such an effort, or if it lacks the credibility to put forward such an effort, then the people of Canada will most certainly turn to the Leader of the Opposition for the kind of straightforward, challenging leadership which our country needs. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite, and through them to the Prime Minister, that I believe trickery has run its course in Canada.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this third budget debate since becoming a member of parliament. I should like to say at the outset that I have never been prouder to be associated with a finance minister and his budget presentation than in this particular case. I think we should all be aware that Canada is in the midst of some troubled times and that there is, indeed, the need for a steady hand on the rudder. I believe that our current finance minister has indicated very clearly that that steady hand is now being applied.

I think it is worth remembering at this time, Mr. Speaker, as we enter a phase with a new finance minister, that he is joining a group of seven able and capable finance ministers which successive Liberal governments in this country, under four prime ministers, have placed in this onerous responsibility since the early days of World War II. I suggest each has acquitted their responsibility with a degree of ability and aplomb that I suggest has been the pride of Canadians and has had much to do with the continuing strength of successive Liberal governments over 30 years of this 36-year period.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

I think it is significant, in the context of today's problems, Mr. Speaker, to bear in mind the importance that must be attached to the direction being given in the area of economic policies. The success of past finance ministers under Liberal governments has brought us through various periods, including a general period in which the population of the country has doubled. It has brought us through a wartime period, a crisis that has never before or since been equalled. It has brought us through a post-war boom, with all its ensuing difficulty as the economy moved ahead at a very rapid and unusual rate.

Liberal government finance ministers were then called upon to take over following a six-year period of Conservative rule during which our national and international reputation, which had been built up so successfully over past years in the area of the management of our economic affairs, was brought to a new low point and almost completely destroyed.

A more recent situation facing the country, of which we are all aware, has been the raging inflation that has beset Canada, and the need eventually to impose strong, central controls when it became evident that voluntary measures were not going to suffice. Finally, it was under a Liberal government that a finance minister has been responsible for implementing a most difficult and challenging set of amendments to our Income Tax Act, which has resulted in a greater degree of equity and fairness under our over-all taxation system.

● (1650)

These were some of the challenges faced by the government and by men of the stature of Ilsley and Abbott, both of whom held the finance minister portfolio for a period of some 14 years, and by people of the stature of Harris and of Gordon, the man who, in spite of problems besetting him and his government, was the single Canadian in high political office who was finally able successfully to pinpoint and bring into public focus one of our most continuing and besetting national problems, the degree of control over our Canadian economy exerted by people beyond our borders. The list goes on.

It is with this background, and in this context of 30 of the past 36 years, that our current Finance Minister, a man of proven ability and strength of character, as evidenced in his previous portfolios, particularly that of energy, mines and resources where I came to know him best, now takes over during an exceedingly difficult period. I suggest he has approached his first budget in his current mandate as Canada's Minister of Finance with a background that is second to none.

On the other side of the coin, what has parliament to offer? At the present time, the financial critic of the official opposition is spending a good deal of his time comparing fiscal expenditures with those of the past 100 years. It seems to me this is an exercise equally as futile as an endeavour to point out that General Motors is today an inefficient operation because its capital expenditures are so much greater than at the time that organization was built up. It is so ridiculous a comparison as to be discountable without any further thought on the part of any Canadian to attempt to follow the rationale of the finance critic of the official opposition.

The position of that finance critic is one which I think we must assume, under the parliamentary system, does indeed involve responsibility to bring intelligent criticism to bear on government economic policies as brought forward in a statement so important as the budget. While I do not envy the task of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—it is an arduous task he has been given, to poke holes in an honest and straightforward finance policy brought forward by such an experienced and able minister as the hon. member for Rosedale—I must, however, take him to task for seeking sensationalism in his unfounded accusations, based as they are on the potential media value of the rhetoric contained in them rather than on their actual material content.

He mentioned the so-called 7 per cent growth factor which apparently has been lost over the past two years. Has he examined the picture in other western industrialized countries over the same time? Obviously not. Or if he has, for purposes of his own choosing he has refrained from including these comparisons in his speech. I must assume that he is both too intelligent a person and one who properly prides himself on the research capabilities of his office not to have appreciated that the real GNP for OECD countries dropped by 2 per cent in 1975, far from any gain at all, let alone a 7 per cent gain, and that as a result of, and contributing to this decline in economic activity, was a 6 per cent drop in over-all volume of world trade.

It is inconceivable for a responsible person to suggest that Canada, a country which lives by trading, could remain insulated from this worldwide trend and be expected to fly completely in the other direction, particularly to the extent suggested by the hon. member, the official opposition's financial critic. On one hand the hon. member for York-Simcoe complains of the extent of government control in the economy—and I presume he is referring to all levels of government, including the massive involvement of the government sponsored by his own party in Ontario in the affairs of that province—while on the other hand he moans about the lack of further government involvement in the federal economy in 1976 in his reference to what he chooses to call a "heal thyself" philosophy that he attributes to the federal government's position in relation to economic matters within the country at the present time.

He simply cannot have it both ways. The member indicates concern over what he regards as no real stimulus to employment. Yet he must be aware of the intent of the government to use any funds saved by the changes in the unemployment insurance legislation for job-creation programs. This will obviously operate as a form of stimulus. This may turn out to be something the opposition financial critic may find difficult to accept, being a seemingly confirmed anti-stimulant where the stimulus is to originate with the government.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult to really know where the hon. member stands or even to adequately define the side of the fence on which he appears to sit. The hon. member goes on to talk about lack of tax cuts and a probably horrendous deficit. Surely, tax cuts would result in an even higher deficit. Once again his economic arithmetic is difficult to fathom. The opposition financial critic indicates that we are counting too heavily on the U.S. economy to cure the Canadian economy of its ills. Again, as a businessman, surely he understands the position of the United States as Canada's largest customer. Is it not rational to assume that an improvement in the financial condition of your largest customer is bound to help your situation, when you are indeed its main provider of merchandise?

His reference to lotteries is nothing but a cheap shot. If, indeed, the lotteries of the day at both federal and provincial levels are, as he indicates, a poor remnant of what went on in the seventeenth century, one must assume that the lotteries of those days represented real bonanzas, based on the current success of the current Olympic series of lotteries. Here, again, the official opposition's financial critic is obviously seeking a point that lacks substance, in his attempt to make a publicity score on the government. This sort of meaningless criticism, once again, does him and his party little or no credit and the Canadian people, I suggest, simply will not buy it.

The arguments of the member for York-Simcoe on the anti-inflation program are similarly disturbing.

Mr. Speaker, he continues to argue for the implementation of the controls some 18 months earlier. Yet it seems to me that the government of the day, and the people of Canada, demonstrated quite clearly that they were not prepared to go for controls at that time without benefit of further attempts at consultation among government, labour and industry in a final effort to see if some voluntary means could be found to achieve the desired objective. As stated on many occasions, and surely as heard and noted by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, such efforts at voluntary resolution were not successful.

In the interim, the rates of inflation grew beyond all reasonable limits, reached double-digit rates and thus demanded more concerted and direct involvement by government than voluntary means could possibly have provided. Yet we have the spectacle of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the official opposition's financial critic, leading his group in opposing that controls legislation when it was finally brought into the House. As to the post-controls period, the financial critic for the Conservative party decries the absence of meaningful discussion over this. Yet what has his own personal contribution been in this direction? When our distinguished Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made even the slightest reference to changes that might be necessary in the future, the best that spokesman for the Conservative party could do was dash off in a form of blind hysteria. I ask whether this really can be considered a responsible position. In my view, it cannot.

I could go on and on analysing and answering criticisms levelled by the hon. member for York-Simcoe in his capacity as the official opposition's financial critic. However, I would like to move for a few minutes to comments made even more recently in this past week by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

● (1700)

In one area—that of proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act—the distinguished Leader of the Opposition on the one hand indicates general concurrence with the position advocated by the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Macdonald), but then later in his speech equivocates as to his position when he further examines the matter.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition indicates that the minister fails to provide leadership. Surely this is far from the case, Mr. Speaker. Any real understanding of the term leadership will appreciate that there is a time and a place for holding a firm hand on the rudder and charting a course that lies straight ahead. Stated in another form one might say that, when in a small boat on rough waters and surrounded by alligators, it is no time to stand up and move around. I suggest that the present Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Rosedale, has shown a most direct and meaningful act of leadership in bringing down a budget that might quite fairly be described in a general sense as neutral in its over-all impact on the Canadian economy, a most appropriate stance at this particular time, in my view.

I could continue to pick apart many of the specific criticisms made by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech earlier this week. However, I feel that in fairness I must respect the fact that this is his first opportunity to react to government leadership in the area of Canada's economy, in his new and responsible role as leader of his party. Although the Minister of Finance was also presenting his first budget in his new portfolio, I think his most creditable performance must at least in part be attributable to his extensive background in major positions of responsibility within the present government—in each of which he has acquitted himself with a high degree of ability and success. I do appreciate that the Leader of the Opposition has not had the opportunity for serving in anywhere near equivalent positions of responsibility or experience, and no doubt we can expect more from him in the years ahead as he entrenches himself in the role of leader of the party that I am sure Canadians will be pleased to leave in its current position of official opposition for many years in the future.

I have chosen to enunciate in my comments today the underlying strength which I think has been evident in the positions taken and the leadership shown by finance ministers in Liberal governments since World War II. I say again that into this picture enters our current Minister of Finance as he presents his initial budget before the House of Commons and the nation at large. I am sure the House recognizes the obvious ability of our new minister to follow in the illustrious steps of his predecessors. Nowhere is this more in evidence than in the seeming inability of the opposition to come forward with any real, meaningful criticism during this budget debate.

Turning for a moment to the immediate area of the economy that must continue to be of concern to Canadians I want to speak briefly on the matter of the balance of payments situation. In 1973 our current account with other countries was in balance. In 1975 the situation had deteriorated to a $5 billion deficit. In 1976 we are hoping that this deficit can be reduced to $4 billion. Mr. Speaker, we all understand the extenuating and world-wide circumstances that have led to this unfortunate state of affairs. The severe drop in the rate of increase of our 1975 exports to our two major trading partners; the international and national problems in the area of oil and gas—resulting in significant contraction of our exports in these commodities; our continuing deficit in the non-merchandize trade area; all of these contributed in a significant way to the $5 billion deficit which had then to be made up through the importation of substantial amounts of capital—both of short and long term nature. Unfortunately this capital has both to be serviced and repaid in future years, and it really provides an unsatisfactory solution to the problem over the long term.

It is important to point out that this current account deficit was occurring at a time when our Canadian economy continued to perform better than those of most other countries. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the $5 billion cash problem is there, but I believe there is every reason to be optimistic in view of our buoyant economy. Surely methods will be found to offset this substantial cash deficit problem. Certainly improvements in the area of merchandize exports to our major trading partners, as their economies improve, will help substantially. The point is that the cash deficit problem is there and must continue to receive the concerted attention of government and persons in the private sector.

I think it is significant to note that as we discuss this current budget the rate of unemployment has dropped—slightly it is true—but nevertheless the drop from 7.4 per cent to 7.1 per cent is most certainly in the right direction.

I would like to make a brief reference to the features of the budget relating to unemployment insurance, I might add, features that I heartily endorse. By uniting the Manpower and unemployment insurance programs, by increasing the work requirements from 8 to 12 weeks, by more directly tying benefits to the number of weeks worked and granting extended benefits according to regional economic conditions, the cost of the insurance program to taxpayers will be lowered at no risk to its equity. The Canadian unemployment insurance program has been hailed as one of the most advanced in the world. The changes which have been announced will help to reduce the opportunities to violate the intent of the program.

The integration of unemployment and Manpower services will result in improved enforcement of the provision that recipients be actively seeking work. I think that is important, and the length and eligibility requirement should discourage over-reliance on unemployment insurance as a principal source of income. Like other forms of justice, social justice must not only be fair but must be seen to be fair if it is to retain the support of society as a whole.

In conclusion, there are no claims that this budget would be a panacea for all our economic problems. However, the decision not to attempt extensive remedies should not be confused with indecisiveness. Rather, it represents a mature recognition of the limits of effective government intervention and of the importance of individual initiative. That problems will persist, there can be no doubt. Neither an unemployment level of 7.1 per cent nor an inflation rate which approaches 9 per cent is compatible with a healthy economy. Both undermine the foundations of an open society. The increased levels of investment which are essential if we are to avoid an early relapse are likely to await further improvements in business confidence.

The demand for housing continues to outstrip the supply. Credit conditions play a particularly important role in the housing sector, and mortgage rates which are near the 12 per cent level make it all the more difficult to finance the construction or purchase of a home.

I might add that I do not share the views of those who suggest that the average Canadian should no longer be expected to own his own home. Whenever the opportunity has been available, people have unequivocally demonstrated their preference for their own piece of property and their own backyard. It is therefore essential that there be further improvements in the housing industry.

There are many positive signs on the economic horizon. A careful review of the minister's speech and accompanying documents most certainly gives legitimate cause for an optimistic if cautious attitude on the part of all Canadians. It is this kind of positive attitude that we on this side of the House feel is the appropriate and justifiable stance to hold. I am personally thankful that the prophets of doom and gloom, epitomized in the little thought out and almost desperate tone of the official critics of the opposition, do indeed occupy the benches opposite.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it is great to get into this debate finally after waiting for so many days. The fact that so many cabinet ministers have spoken in this debate is an indication to me of its weakness. I do not believe the House has witnessed so many cabinet participants in a budget debate for many years.

● (1710)

The intervention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today can be classified as a painful exercise in generalized vagueness. In fact if the parade of cabinet ministers continues, we may have a new entry for the Guinness Book of Records for the most cabinet ministers to speak in support of a budget which was so lacking in content that it needed their contribution to prop it up.

Recently the Prime Minister was quoted as saying that it would take a miracle for the anti-inflation controls to be removed. Let us say that if the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is any indication of the talents of the government, then we can be sure there are no miracle makers in its ranks.

This is really such a bare bones budget that one has difficulty separating the verbiage of the document from the measures which normally flow from budgets. Indeed, by 10.15 p.m. on budget night the media people in the lobby were putting their cameras and tape recorders to bed, and there has to be a message there. Watching some members of the front benches opposite, one could see them fighting off yawns.

One of the few good things in the budget was the removal of research and development from the Anti-Inflation Board regulations. This was hardly a stroke of genius because research and development should never have been placed under the AIB regulations in the first place. We will never know the full extent of the damage to the development of products in Canada. We could not calculate the number of projects which would have been undertaken but were either cancelled or moved out of the country. As it stands today, research and development projects will have to be approved by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce before they will be allowed as an expense item, and I am not too confident that that is the best procedure to follow.

Let me deal with a few items in the budget. Under the heading of energy conservation the minister announced a tax of $100 on automobile air conditioners. Any competent automotive engineer will tell us that an air conditioner uses the same amount of horsepower as power steering. In fact when in use automobile air conditioners take less than one mile per gallon from performance. If you have the wrong tire pressure in your automobile tires that can rob you of more than one mile per gallon and create a tremendous safety hazard as well.

The weight tax on automobiles must be questioned. Surely the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, which obviously put this tax in the budget, must realize the lead time required for the design of an automobile. Of course I am not surprised that the minister of that department did not think it out because he is part of the energy problem, not part of the solution.

Earlier this year the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) announced that government policy, in line with that of the United States, was to set a target of 24 miles per gallon fleet average for cars by 1980, and here again we have a conflict between the two ministers.

This budget increases the weight tax in stages to 1979. Bearing in mind the lead time required for design, and bearing in mind that the industry has accepted the 24 miles per gallon standard and adopted it as an industry standard, why have we chosen to complicate the problem further by adding a further tax?

We have a rationalized North American automobile industry, to some extent, and now we may be heading for a separate standard for Canada as distinct from the United States. While I appreciate the need for conserving energy I believe it could be accomplished in other ways without interference in the design and production of automobiles. We find the motor vehicle safety standards have added more than 1,000 pounds to an automobile.

In fact to look at the weight of a vehicle alone as the criterion for saving fuel shows the lack of in-depth study done by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Transport. It is obvious to anyone dealing with motor vehicles that aerodynamics, tires, axle ratios, carburetion, engine displacement, and so on can have more effect on the efficiency of the engine performance than the weight of the vehicle. In many instances a small, light weight engine is less efficient than a larger, heavier engine.

When one considers the impact on our domestic industry and how our trade balance is affected when the industry is not at top production, one can only conclude that the provisions for additional taxation are inappropriate at this time.

The real disappointment in the budget is that the government missed a real opportunity to add a measure of confidence that would show our economy is really recovering, that inflation is being contained, and unemployment is being reduced.

Instead, we have another budget deficit of more than $5 billion, a trade deficit in high technology product of $9 billion, and no meaningful reduction in unemployment. In fact it is forecast that we will have an increase in unemployment before the end of this year, and that is tragic. The tragedy in all the economic problems we face is that it could be so different. When we travel out of the country we are told how fortunate we are in Canada with all our resources. Yet within the country we are being told we are running out of resources.

Various members on the government front bench have stated that the recovery of our economy is directly related to the recovery of the American economy. While in Japan a few weeks ago, Japanese cabinet ministers with whom we discussed the question indicated that the recovery of their economy depended to a great extent on the recovery of the American economy. In Japan I picked up an Australian newspaper and read that the Prime Minister of Australia stated that their economic recovery depended upon the recovery of the American economy. If we read the comments in the OECD releases, we will find that they continually refer to the European economic recovery linked to the recovery of the American economy.

It would seem to me that we should be working closely with the Americans to see that our economy not only recovers in step with theirs but that we put in place complementary taxation and tariff measures to see that both our economies remain strong and buoyant. Rationalization of taxation is an urgent priority for the manufacturing sector.

We have no industrial strategy. In fact much of the profit earned by industry since 1971 is a pure paper profit. The combined effect of inventory inflation and a rate of depreciation on assets that is inadequate to recover the replacement of that asset has created levels of profitability that are fictitious. In many cases companies have to borrow to pay the tax bill. The net result is that most businesses face cash flow problems. Decisions to replace machinery are deferred because of lack of cash and increased replacement cost. Plant expansion has been held off because of increased cost, lack of cash, and the high cost of borrowed money.

When you spin off the combined effect of inflated inventory prices, unrealistic depreciation allowances, lack of adequate cash to operate, and high interest rates for borrowing, you realize the opportunity missed by the government to put in place some legislation that would build a sound foundation for an economic recovery. Once in place, that type of legislation can be adjusted to achieve the national objectives of a strong secondary industrial base.

Canada will for the forseeable future be a trader in rocks and logs in the international market place. The amount of processing of our mineral resources we are able to accomplish will depend upon the acceptance of those resources in the market place. There are those who like to comment on the economy and who would have us refuse to ship our mineral resources unless they are partially or completely processed. That is an unrealistic approach. We are not the only country in the world with mineral resources for sale. We have to compete for orders in a market that is flexible and moving. Our labour rates are amongst the highest in the world. To offset this we must be more productive and more efficient in our business process. Our transportation, because of the distances involved, must be the best and most efficient to offset the distances to markets. It follows, then, that we have to operate in an atmosphere as free from government interference as possible.

The most urgent negotiation the federal government should undertake is with the provinces to work out a taxation formula to maximize the development of our mineral resources. But hand in hand with this is the development of a secondary industrial base, not only to complement the mineral industry but also to produce more of the products we import.

Each year we see the number of companies involved in manufacturing declining. Many companies find they can purchase the products they were manufacturing from a source outside the country, and merely act as a sales agent and marketing arm. There are more and more manufacturers becoming marketing organizations. It usually starts with a position that says, "We will round out our line of products with imports." From there they move to calculate the capital cost of new plant and machinery research and development against the cost of acquiring a product offshore. You can go through industry after industry and find this happening. In fact a large portion of products manufactured in Canada are aligned against similar products from countries that are classified as Third World countries that have labour rates only a fraction of our rates.

● (1720)

Looking at the decline in the manufacturing sector of our economy, one can only say that there is a death wish in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that virtually all manufacturing cease in this country and that we become a net importer of products of other countries forever.

Certainly a look at the textile industry is a classic case in point. Our manufacturers' share of the Canadian market is dropping and has reached a level that they only enjoy 46 per cent of the domestic market. Only 6 per cent of the available domestic market is covered by quotas. In order to claim damage from imported textiles the manufacturers can appeal to the textile board, but the process is complicated and lengthy. By the time a case is heard it is too late for action to be taken.

By comparison the United States textile manufacturers have about 90 per cent of their domestic market reserved for them. The United States government has negotiated 19 separate agreements on textile quotas with various countries that produce fibres, woven and knitted products, flat goods, and apparel.

The net result of all this is that we find the Canadian textile industry in general will not invest in new plant facilities, and will only upgrade and maintain the better and newer production facilities. Plants that should be replaced will be closed down and more unemployment will result. Certainly the people responsible for including, in the first instance, research and development in the Anti-Inflation Board's regulations, and restricting the level of expenditures by a formula classifying research and development with donations to charity, promotion and advertising, displayed plain stupidity.

It is this type of bureaucratic stupidity that has frustrated manufacturing in Canada for years. We need, first, a complete overhaul and review of our taxation system. It must be compared with that of our major trading partners to see that we are not placing our manufacturing industry in a non-competitive position because of inequities in our taxation system.

We must then examine the pricing of inventories and take a look at the method of calculating depreciation. Manufacturing profits should be stripped of inflation factors, and the profits should reflect true profits. To offset high interest rates a serious study of depreciation methods and an appropriate adjustment will do much to increase the cash flow in a business.

Profits that are earned and reinvested should not be subject to taxation. This would help the cash flow problem facing many businesses today.

Needless to say I am deeply disappointed that the budget did not reflect some of these points. We have so much potential in this country. I find it discouraging, and feel the sense of frustration that there is in this country with a government that has so little imagination that, at a time when other economies are advancing, we are still playing the short term game of finance. Is it any wonder that after the budget presentation when we asked people in business, "What did you think of the budget?", they replied, "What budget?"

There is a basic weakness in the departmental structure of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Perhaps the weakness is the fact that industry is included with trade in one department. Perhaps we would be better served in Canada if industry were separated from trade and we could then have them pursue their separate goals. Certainly a visit to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce confirms this. Talk to the people at Industry, Trade and Commerce about a product, and the first and most urgent question is whether or not it has export potential. If you say you want to serve a domestic market they lose interest.

In other words the heavy emphasis is on trade. Industry itself is only of secondary concern to the people in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Question the people at the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce about product development in Canada and you are surrounded with classic bureaucratic buzz words such as world scale, economies of scale, export—export—export. You end up frustrated and discouraged.

There has never been any real co-ordination between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A case in point is that there is at present a backlog of 370 cases to be heard by the Opposition Board of the Registrar of Trade Marks. Under normal circumstances the Opposition Board would rule on about 60 cases a year. At the present time the trade marks office is dealing with cases presented for adjudication three years ago. Only the registrar can give a ruling on these cases, but the new registrar is on a year's immersion course to learn French. Consequently when he returns he will be looking at more than six years of backlog. What an intolerable situation! It requires an amendment to the Trade Marks Act to allow person other than the registrar to act on his behalf.

When you look at the combined effect of all the disincentives to the business community, it is any wonder there is dissatisfaction and frustration? Let us for a moment add up the problems they face. The Anti-Inflation Board has more than 3,000 wage settlements to rule on; inflation is creating false profits that are being taxed at too high a level; the combined effect of federal and provincial taxes and royalties is holding back expansion of our non-energy resource industries; inventory pricing under existing regulations does not allow for an inflation factor; depreciation allowances do not reflect the replacement cost of capital assets; there is a basic tax penalty for Canadian manufacturers as compared to our major trading partners; before phase one of the competition legislation has had a chance to work, we will be looking at phase two; interest rates are the highest of any country of the western world; our productivity is amongst the lowest of any of the O.E.C.D. countries; we have a six year backlog of trade mark cases to be considered by the Opposition Board under the Trade Marks Act; working capital is so short that some companies are borrowing money to pay their tax bills to the federal government; we lost 11 million man years due to strikes in 1975; we lost more than 11 million man years due to alcoholism and drug use in industry in 1975; research and development are at the lowest level they have ever been.

Only two countries on the O.E.C.D. list have lower research and development than Canada; we had, until this budget, research and development subjected to AIB regulations and formulae. This alone caused cancellation of many projects. It has taken four years after the realization that we had an energy supply problem for the government to act on expense deductions for exploration costs. While we welcome the announcement in the budget we must ask, along with other Canadians, "Why did it take so long for you to act?"

We face more and more intrusion in the private sector by the federal government. Add to all the foregoing, the year-end musings of the Prime Minister on the economy, and subsequent statements, and you will begin to see the depths of despair and frustration of the business community.

Many cabinet ministers who have spoken said that the official opposition has offered no solutions but pointed out legislative weaknesses. If you examine the points I have just mentioned you must agree that solutions to most, if not all of them, could have been included in the budget. Too much goes to the government. In fact these suggestions would have gone a long way toward stimulating employment and helping to reduce the level of unemployment in the country.

Inflation can be beaten, but the action that has been taken so far I do not believe has made the impact it could have made. Our trade deficit and balance of payments problem, in spite of the buoyant words of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), will be with us for some time. In fact his speech reminded me of a man whistling in a graveyard trying to keep his spirits up.

I have tried to set forth the real facts and problems as I see them. I have spent most of my life in business. I have had to look at the realities of economic life. If I had to choose a board of directors from the government benches I would be hard pressed to find one person to whom I would offer that position of trust. From the Prime Minister down, there is hardly anyone who would qualify based on their eight years of lack lustre performance. This budget reflects the lack of talent available.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1730)

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to bring to the attention of the House and the Canadian people the importance to Canada's economy of science and technology, which in turn rest on a foundation of research and development.

I was pleased to learn that the new budget removes approved expenditures for research and development from the list of restricted expenses under the Anti-Inflation Act, expecially so since I made representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and emphasized this point strongly in my speech during the recent opposition day debate on science and technology. I am glad that the government showed a sensitive and sensible response to an important matter when it was brought to its attention.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was a beginning.

Mr. Maine: Two major aspects of science and technology in our economy are vital: harnessing it and controlling it. One without the other does nothing to improve either our standard of living or the health of our economy.

The harnessing of science and technology is done in the laboratory. To this end we spend millions of dollars annually to train scientists in our universities. We have expertise in many high-technology-content areas, but we rarely reap the benefits from this knowledge via its application because we do not control the use of that knowledge. If we are to derive benefit from scientific research work, the results must be commercialized and thereby translated into the Gross National Product. The "brain drain" about which we heard so much in the early sixties remains a serious problem. There are very few significant industrial research and development operations in Canada.

If by chance a multinational corporation does become interested in a product of Canadian technology, it is unlikely that much, if any, financial benefit will be realized by Canada. It is the practice of most multinationals based in the United States to carry out virtually all research and development in American labs and limit the Canadian operation strictly to manufacturing. The auto industry provides a very good example of that type of operation. All of the research and development work in the automotive industry is done in Detroit. All that is left for the Canadian operation is assembly line jobs, while jobs which should be going to our university graduates do not exist in this country.

Occasionally there has developed in Canada a research and development facility rivalling the best in the world. One of these is the RCA Limited Research Laboratories in Montreal, part of RCA Limited. There is no better example of the problem of Canadian control of science and technology than the announcement by RCA corporation that it is closing down these labs. RCA Limited is owned 100 per cent by RCA International Development Corporation in New York. The Canadian company has 20 directors, ten of whom are U.S. nationals. The president of RCA Limited, Mr. G. Denton Clark, is a native of Montreal who has taken out United States citizenship. The company dates back to the turn of the century, became part of RCA during the 1920's, was for many years known as RCA Victor, and in 1968 became RCA Limited. In 1975 the sales volume of RCA Limited was approximately $175 million. At least 75 per cent was in consumer products or components for consumer products. Of the remaining 25 per cent a substantial amount was sales to the federal government or to Crown corporations.

For many years RCA corporation prospered under the direction of David Sarnoff, who built the organization into the giant multinational it is today. Following Sarnoff's retirement in 1970, his son, Robert Sarnoff, became president of RCA corporation. The young Sarnoff, for whatever reasons, was unable to provide the quality of leadership his father had shown. He was replaced as president in 1971 by Andrew L. Conrad, who now also serves as chairman of the board since Robert Sarnoff's resignation from RCA last fall.

Before Mr. Clark became president in 1973, the president of RCA Limited functioned largely as an administrative head. Effective line authority over the five divisional vice presidents was exercised by the corresponding executive vice presidents at the headquarters of RCA corporation in New York. With Mr. Clark as president, this situation appeared to change. The new president attempted to establish full functional line authority over the five operating divisions. In what was viewed by the government to be a significant move, the research and development laboratories were elevated to the status of an autonomous division reporting directly to the president.

In March, 1975, Mr. Denton Clark indicated to the government that the future direction of RCA Limited would emphasize Canadian autonomy, a world-wide product mandate, high technology and Canadian design capability, and the expansion of business. In an apparent reversal of Mr. Clark's earlier position, RCA announced on March 18, 1976, a restructuring of RCA Limited, "as part of an international program at RCA corporation to make its product divisions more efficient and profitable by giving them direct control of their world-wide operations."

RCA issued a further press release in April stating that, "Consistent with RCA's restructuring program, RCA Limited is undertaking a major realignment of its research and development activities." In other words, the research and development laboratories will be closed down at the end of this year, or by the end of the first quarter of 1977 at the latest. Some of the work done by the laboratories will be transferred to other divisions within the company, but only about 30 per cent of the scientists now engaged in research and development will be assigned positions in those divisions. However, those will not be research positions and will not be innovating the expertise developed at the research centre.

RCA Limited has made good use of the incentives programs which are available to industry through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The company has, during the past ten years, received at least $20 million in outright government assistance for research and development. In addition it has benefited from $67 million of financing provided by CIDA and the Export Development Corporation toward sales to other countries through RCA Limited's government and commercial systems division, one of the five divisions in the company. Without this government assistance these foreign sales would not have been made.

What has been a successful and highly respected scientific research centre in Canada is now to be disbanded and abandoned because Ed Griffiths, an executive vice president of RCA corporation and president of RCA electronics and diversified businesses, decided that such a move would increase profits for the parent company and streamline its international operation. Mr. Griffiths was responsible for restructuring the Canadian Hertz rent-a-car company, an RCA subsidiary, so that control was centralized more completely at the American head office, leaving little autonomy for the Canadian operation. Apparently because that move was financially effective it was felt that similar actions should be taken with RCA Limited. I maintain that no matter what economic sense this realignment may make to the American parent company, such high-handed measures, disregarding Canada's needs and priorities, should not take place or be allowed to take place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: Most hon. members are aware that the government updated last year its guidelines for good corporate citizenship for foreign companies operating in Canada. Those guidelines state that foreign-controlled firms in Canada should pursue a high degree of autonomy in the exercise of decision-making and risk-taking functions, including innovative activity and the marketing of any resulting new products. RCA Limited was committed to function according to that principle. That commitment has, as I have shown, been rescinded by the parent corporation.

The guidelines also ask that companies develop as an integral part of the Canadian operation an autonomous capability for technological innovation, including research, development, engineering, industrial design and pre-production activities. Here again the actions of RCA corporation show no regard for that principle.

Furthermore the guidelines suggest that the companies foster a Canadian outlook within management, as well as enlarged career opportunities within Canada, by promoting Canadians to senior and middle management positions and by including a majority of Canadians on boards of directors of all Canadian companies, in accordance with the spirit of federal legislative initiatives. The board of directors of RCA Limited does not have a majority of Canadian members. Neither does the company offer expanded career opportunities within Canada when it closes down a successful operation that will almost certainly force brilliant Canadian scientists to take employment in the United States.

● (1740)

What is to be done? RCA Corporation should review its decision in the context not only of profitability but also in the wider context of Canada's national interest bearing in mind the large amount of Canadian taxpayers' dollars that have assisted the company in achieving its reputation and sales. RCA Limited has been successful in establishing an excellent technical capability in satellite subsystem design. The recent award of the Telesat contract to RCA Limited enabled its satellite group to remain in business in Canada, and its continued viability will depend on government support.

If the company is not prepared to reverse this retrograde decision, the government should not give any further subsidy to a company which has demonstrated that it will not abide by the "New Principles of International Business Conduct", as published by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in July, 1975. Canadian consumers, too, should consider whether they should purchase products from a company that is not prepared to be a good Canadian corporate citizen.

As 75 per cent of the company's sales come from consumer products, primarily TV sales, if RCA does not change its policy, I would urge Canadians not to buy RCA. I repeat, do not buy RCA products—boycott RCA if RCA Corporation closes its research and development labs. Fight fire with fire. If RCA wants to attack Canada's future, let Canada attack RCA's future!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: There is no point in the government taking measures to encourage industrial research and development if foreign multinationals such as RCA are not prepared to support Canadian research operations. But, since our standard of living is directly related to the harnessing of research and development and will be even more so in the future, it is absolutely essential that we have and maintain a viable industrial research and development community in Canada if we are to have any control of our own future.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), indicated, this is a rather record-breaking debate in terms of participation by cabinet ministers. They have indeed been brave souls, trying diligently to make the best of this budget, hopefully trying to make it a saleable product.

I was very impressed by the attempt of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) to try to sell the sizzle in the budget, the sizzle that is not there. A number of members have participated in this debate, including the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson), the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) and other brave souls.

I listened very closely yesterday to the speech by the President of Treasury Board. He ran out of steam about half way through, talking directly about the budget. He switched to debating the Official Languages Act and policy. His comments seemed to run counter to the report of the languages commissioner.

The President of the Treasury Board went on at great length suggesting that the critics of government expenditure controls were ill informed. I trust he was not including in that category the Auditor General, having regard to the rather stinging indictment the Auditor General made about government budgetary control, improper accounting methods, and a dearth of clear-cut understandable information contained in the estimates and the public accounts. That is very clearly documented. It is something of which the government, and indeed all members of parliament, should take serious cognizance.

In my view parliament must have a better awareness of government's anticipated spending and government's intentions both in the short and long term. Further, adequate provisions and procedures must be established in order properly and effectively to examine and scrutinize all government expenditures.

The former Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), today dwelt at great length on the cynicism and lack of trust that pervade society with respect to our parliamentary and other democratic institutions. It is something we must all concern ourselves with if we are going to preserve the kind of credibility our institutions deserve and, with it, the kind of support we must have in order that our institutions will function in an orderly and proper manner.

The budget that we are debating has been described in many ways. Don McGillivary of Southam News described it as a drifting, dreaming budget in the midst of multiplying economic problems. Doug Fisher referred to it as 90 minutes of rhetorical drivel. He suggested the government did not have two ideas to rub together. He further suggested that the manner in which the budget was presented was tantamount to a non-relevant ritual. I think we all agree there were a lot of words in the budget, perhaps a lot of unnecessary words. I think we can further agree that the speech was honed in such a way as to preserve the government's own self interest.

I see my good friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in the Chamber. Some people refer to him these days as the "Minister of sour milk and rotten eggs", but I would not do that. He is indeed a very unique Minister of Agriculture. The fact that we taunt each other in the House from time to time does not in any way affect our personal regard for one another.

The Minister of Agriculture has been under a fair amount of pressure, and under a lot of heat lately. He adopts the same profile as the others. When things are going well in agriculture, he is the first to take credit. If things go sour and we have a rotten egg or sour milk problem, who does he blame? He blames the provinces. It is not the fault of the Department of Agriculture or the government.

Mr. Kempling: Typical Grit trick.

Mr. Whelan: If they had done what I told them, there would be no problem.

Mr. Mazankowski: There he goes again. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicates that the farmers are getting enough and they should thank him.

Mr. Whelan: They are the highest paid in the world. Heward Grafftey said we should lower the pay.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am surprised that the Minister of Agriculture has not engaged in this debate. I can only presume it is because there is nothing positive in this budget to help agriculture in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Just ask the pork producers; they will tell you.

Mr. Whelan: They are the best off farmers in Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would love to get involved in an agricultural debate, but unfortunately I have to speak on other things today. There is nothing I would love to talk about more than the "blue tongue Superbull."

We need only look at the attitude the government has taken when it expresses great satisfaction over the fact that we survived with a zero growth rate in this country last year. That has been described as a successful achievement. As the leader of my party pointed out in his remarks—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Mazankowski: We have a number of leaders. Together we are building a team that will lead this country out of the doldrums, and back to prosperity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1750)

Mr. Mazankowski: As our leader has pointed out, the difference between our party and the governing Liberal party is the absence of any clear determination of growth, the absence of any clear direction. I think it well worth while drawing attention to what our leader stated as was reported in Hansard at page 14284, "We see sound economic growth not as a contradiction to inflation control but as a prime requisite for the control of inflation in the long term." In that context I should like to quote a passage from the latest edition of The Economist, that of May 22, 1976. This is from an article entitled "Out of Slump."

> In 1974 the world's six largest industrial economies marched roughly in step into slump. These big six are America, Japan, West Germany, France, Britain and Italy, which together account for 80 per cent of the output of the 24 rich countries in the Organization for Economic Corporation and Development. In 1975 two of the big six turned back up again early (America and Japan) while three others (France, Britain and Italy) turned back up again late. But by the end of 1975, industrial output in all six was rising again.
>
> In January-March, 1976, recovery continued and each of the big six achieved faster industrial growth than its longer term trend. On this reckoning, the slump is over and the boom has begun. Everywhere idle plant and capacity are being brought back into use. Everywhere unemployment has stopped rising, and almost everywhere it should soon be steadily reduced.
>
> In theory this should be the start of a long and strong boom. The world has a lot of lost ground to recover. Do the impossibly huge industrial growth rates necessary to get the world back on trend mean that there is no danger of overheating—of overstrain in capacity in any of the big six until 1981 at least? Not quite.

I think that sets out the international scene succinctly. It is obvious that recovery internationally is well under way. It seems to me that the budget we are discussing is not tuned in to the realities of the recovery on the international scene—that we have failed to take advantage of what might well be a long and sustained boom.

Look at the government's position with respect to spending. Here again we find the government patting itself on the back for the manner in which it says it is cutting back or controlling federal expenditure. I should like to examine that aspect in some detail, but I will repeat once again that this budget is clearly not a good budget; it fails to include measures to encourage productivity or stimulate sales abroad despite the fact that our industrial plant is operating at less than 80 per cent of capacity.

It has been said over and over again in this debate, but it still bears repetition, that the government relies essentially on the recovery of the United States and its other trading partners. It intends to rely also upon the Anti-Inflation Board whose staff has now increased to 853 in an effort to deal with a backlog of 3,000 wage cases and to reduce delays which have made it an increasing target of criticism. The budget is completely lacking in vision of the full potential of this country. I find it amusing, having regard to the curt attitude the government has taken toward the United States that it should now be relying on that country as its saviour.

A word, now, about the importance of the private sector. The Prime Minister and some of his colleagues had all but written off the private sector last December, but it has suddenly become the key factor again. It is consoling that some ministers like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) should be coming out in defence of the private enterprise system, and I hope some of their colleagues will engage in the same crusade.

What about the reckless spending habits of the government and, in particular, the position of the President of the Treasury Board who is going about the country trying to convince Canadians that the government has become the epitome of restraint and good economic management? The fact that it is content to live with a further deficit of $4.5 billion shows us how phony and misleading it is. I think this reflects a blatant failure on the part of the government to control its own spending which, in my view, continues to be one of the main factors contributing to inflation.

The government has clearly demonstrated its inability to forecast accurately its expenditures and revenues. Review the record. On November 18, 1974, finance minister Turner told Canadians that he expected a deficit of $1 billion in the financial year ending March 31, 1976. Mr. Turner returned to the House with a new budget on June 23, 1975, and revealed that the $1 billion deficit he had planned earlier was in fact to be $3.2 billion. The estimate had gone awry, he said, because he had over-estimated revenues by nearly $2 billion, having taken an over-optimistic view of the economy. Despite the drastic revision of the expected deficit of the June 23 budget, evidence mounted during the fall of 1975 that the federal government had lost control of the deficit. Presented with evidence showing that the deficit would climb even higher than Mr. Turner's estimate of June 23, 1975, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) refused to comment. He said it would be of little value to comment on such projections.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was pointing out the dismal record that the government has had in its ability to forecast. I was also leading up to the point that the Minister of Finance was not left with a very glamorous situation. While the former minister of finance may have been a glamour boy, he did not have the propensity for being able to put the nation's economic house in order. We are now faced over there with a new version, a version in the name of "Thumper". Whether he can put our economic house in order remains a leading question, but it is little wonder that he refuses to say what the predicted deficit will be.

In his budget speech of May 25 the Minister of Finance revealed that the deficit would be $4.1 billion in 1976, $900 million over the June 23, 1975, estimate. This time the fault lay not in inaccurate economic forecasting but in the fact that federal expenditures had overshot their target by close to $1 billion. The finance minister chose not to tell Canadians that the budgetary deficit had quadrupled in size since the first estimate of November 18, 1974. To make such a comment would have revealed both the wilful deceptions of previous federal economic forecasting as well as the incompetence of the present administration in controlling its own spending.

We have only to turn the clock back to the campaign of 1974, May and June, to ask how the government can stand up in a very sanctimonious fashion and preach restraint and responsibility? During the 1974 election campaign this was the government that so recklessly threw money around. Its members made election promises amounting to billions of dollars, Mr. Speaker, of your money and mine, simply to buy votes.

Today the Prime Minister stood up in this House and said, "We have to level with the Canadian people". He appealed to all members of parliament to be honest and to tell the story as it really is, and to tell it particularly to the little people. I can assure hon. members opposite and you, Sir, that many Canadians did not ask for the extravagances which were promised during the election campaign of 1974, but in the name of power, and only in the name of power, did this irresponsible, power hungry bunch scandalously pilfer the Canadian taxpayers' money.

The President of the Treasury Board failed to deal with this particular point in his remarks yesterday, and I am glad to see that he has now come into the House. He failed to justify the startling figures on the basis that they were political. It was a political game rather than an honest economic game. This particular view is shared by many Canadians, including a well known Liberal by the name of Douglas H. Fullerton who, in the Ottawa Citizen for March 8, in an article entitled "Dear Pierre: Who Said We Wanted All Those Goodies?" wrote as follows:

> Come off it, Pierre, did we the people really ask for all those goodies your government showered on us these past eight years?
>
> I'm awfully tired of hearing you say, as you did again recently in Vancouver, that the enormous rise in federal spending since you became prime minister has occurred because of the insistent and growing demands of an expectant public for more government handouts.

This is a phony argument, a smokescreen designed to obscure the truth. Most of your new or expanded programs were concocted by a group of your colleagues, the "liberal" or spending wing, perhaps more appropriately designed as the "drunken sailors". With your support, their schemes were powered through cabinet and caucus, despite the doubts of more cautious ministers and members.

I am not challenging the motives of this spending lobby, which I suspect range from a humanitarian desire to benefit the weaker members of our society, down to instinctual political or personal urges for recognition, glory or re-election. What is at issue is that they are much less a response to a need felt by the public than the collective decisions of a small but powerful group at the top, who believed that they knew what was best for the country.

This is elaborated further by the former auditor general in an article appearing in the Globe and Mail for Wednesday, April 28. I quote him as follows:

Spending public money "seems to have become almost the exclusive preoccupation of the government, with the politicians spending the people's tax money almost solely to buy votes to retain power, with little regard for parliament and no regard at all for the concept of balancing the budget or living within the country's means . . .

Unlike businesses which have to meet payrolls and make profits or face disasters, governments can never face bankruptcy so long as they have an unlimited blank cheque on the pockets of the taxpayers of the country.

Yesterday we had a long dissertation from the President of the Treasury Board, who has been making a lot of sweeping statements recently. He generated a lot of publicity across the country. Maclean's referred to him as "Mr. No". He has also been referred to as the fastest gun in the east. Members on both sides of the House, I know, have a great amount of admiration for the minister's capacity and integrity, but we know very well that he is very political; he is a cagey individual, and he is very canny when it comes to manoeuvring and manipulating figures. I suppose his training in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has served him well in that regard. But we know very well that in justifying government expenditure the minister has used deferrals. He used the business of transferring or borrowing authority.

● (2010)

We see a new technique in the formation of Loto Canada by which the minister is using an estimate to enact legislation which in effect establishes a Crown corporation, outlining its purpose and its method of financing, so we know very well that the minister is very capable. However, as the Globe and Mail has suggested in an article on Monday, May 24, some of his practices are somewhat deceptive.

The President of the Treasury Board has talked a good line about restraint, but surely with the record of increase in government spending by this administration since it took office there is a lot of room for trimming government fat. I must say that, because of the juggling of figures and the manipulation, many Canadians are not convinced that the government has seriously cut back on federal government expenditures. It has not been able to live within its own forecasts and its own predictions. On February 18, 1976, the President of the Treasury Board, during the tabling of his estimates for 1976-77, stated in the House as follows:

Government expenditures in 1975-76 will be held to 16 per cent or less over 1974-75.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

He stated further:

I am pleased to say that there is now every indication that this target will be achieved.

I must say that this is 1 per cent over his prediction in February, 1975, when he said he would keep expenditures down to a 15 per cent level. As late as April 27, 1976, less than one month before the budget was brought down, in an address to the Toronto Metropolitan Board of Trade he heaped praise upon himself for cutting the percentage increase of 16 per cent during the last fiscal year. That was less than a month before the budget was brought down.

As I said earlier, the minister reminds me of the Minister of Agriculture who heaps praise upon himself. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not here. He is probably mourning over the fact that his good friend, Beryl Plumptre, has resigned. I think she was a political asset to the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister said further, "I will not fudge or juggle statistics", but that is precisely what he is doing. While the minister purported in the same speech just one month before the budget, to have had effective control—he declared that he managed to hold spending to 16 per cent for 1975-76—what did we see on budget night? We saw that increase rise to 18 per cent, which amounts to more than peanuts, it amounts to some $725 million. We have not received a satisfactory explanation for that.

The President of the Treasury Board waffled around the subject yesterday but, in my opinion, the explanation is far from satisfactory. If this money was spent in 1975-76, why is it included in the estimates for 1976-77? Should not the figure of $42,150,000,000 be reduced by $725 million? This is tantamount to the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board hoodwinking the Canadian people into believing that they will restrain their spending in 1976-77 to 14 per cent over the previous fiscal year. This is another example of the government's manipulating and juggling figures. Its record of forecasting and the methods that it employs make it very difficult to place any credence in its forecasting ability. If this is what the Canadian people have from their new planning, programming and budgeting system, I am sorry to say that we are in for very dismal days ahead. Perhaps that is why the Auditor General took such a dim view of the government's accounting procedures.

If we look carefully at the 1976-77 estimates we find some rather revealing information that the government has not acted with restraint in areas where it could and should have. If we compare the 1976-77 estimates with the forecasted expenditures for 1975-76 we find that the government has stated that the major components of the roughly $4.7 billion increase, which amounts to 14 per cent for total standard objects, are transfer payments and other spending items which are beyond the government's control. The most cursory examination of total spending by standard objects indicates that this statement is ridiculous and nonsensical. Increased spending on grants, contributions, and transfer payments in fact accounts for $1,944,-228,000, or 41.5 per cent of the increase. But there are a number of areas in which a more realistic approach would produce significant savings.

Let us look at a number of items. For example, in the area of salaries and wages there has been an increase in 1976-77 over the last fiscal year of $687,305,000. This is an increase of 13.6 per cent, or a 14.7 per cent increase of the total amount exceeding the expenditures of the last fiscal year. In personnel costs there has been an increase of $179,546,000, that is, 18.4 per cent over the previous year. In rentals there has been an increase of $50,759,000 or 18 per cent over the previous year. In public debt charges there has been an increase of $875,000,000, a 23.1 per cent increase over the previous year. In all other expenditures, a sort of umbrella group, there has been an increase of $392,444,000, amounting to 36.4 per cent over the last fiscal year.

It is interesting to look at these expenditures in terms of specific government activities. Most of these are highly controllable. Administration, for example, is controllable. We can go into that in quite some detail. The administrative operative expenses will cost at least $1,358,176,000 in the fiscal year 1976-77. This is an increase of $143,226,000 over actual expenditures in 1975-76, or 11.8 per cent. Some of the increases are astounding. There is much that can be done in this area and that is not being done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I very much regret interrupting the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in his budget speech given on Tuesday, March 25, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) stated the following:

> No miracle drug exists to provide an instant cure to these economic ills. It will take time and patience to restore price stability and a high level of output and employment. This approach is evident in our monetary policy, our fiscal policy, our expenditure policy, our energy policy and our control policy. In all of these fields, drastic action to yield quick results would be highly disruptive, damaging to the interests of the groups most affected and unlikely to be sustainable.

Mr. Speaker, such is the philosophy underlying the budget now under consideration, a budget instilled with a healthy realism which truly shows the well-understood role of a government in the management of community affairs.

Mr. Speaker, and oft repeated French adage states that the knack of governing is to see ahead. It is also to try and determine where the true interests of the people lie, and above all to have the courage to go to the bottom of things in the search for solutions to society's problems. It seems to me the main quality of this government in these circumstances is they do not try to hide the facts from the Canadian people, they treat them as adults. The government also show they believe in Canadians, because they invite them to take part in the fight against our current economic troubles.

In the budget, the Minister of Finance stated and I quote:

> Indeed, all Canadians have their roles to play in the achievement of our economic goals.

Mr. Speaker, clearly it is in the interest of workers themselves to join in the fight against inflation, because one way or another they are going to suffer most in an inflationary period. Let me say that while wages and salaries accounted for 74.9 per cent of national revenues in the first quarter of 1974, they had declined to 70.2 per cent only in the third quarter of the same year. That proportion seems to have maintained during 1975.

As for corporations, their profits rose from 11.2 to 17.6 per cent of national revenues between 1971 and 1974, an inflationary period. How can anyone blame the government for seeing to it that the rate of price increases be abated, while wishing for an upswing in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, it used to be that government had to remain entrapped in the vicious circle either of fighting unemployment at the cost of stimulated inflation, or fighting price increases at the expense of employment but those times are over. As the governor of the Bank of Canada suggested on May 29, 1975 to the members of the Canadian Association of Life Insurance Companies, and I quote:

> The time has come for everybody to realize those two complementary aspects, to be united if we are to have stability and orderly progress in the economy, rather than contradictory objectives impossible to reach together.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, a government concerned only with their popularity would have yielded to the temptation to introduce a very expansionary budget. But in so doing, they would have escaped their responsibilities. The danger must be perceived that considerably higher rates of unemployment and inflation as we are now facing might befall us if no measures were taken to fight inflation and maintain Canada's competitive position vis-à-vis the United States, which account for two thirds of our international trade.

In this connection, one must bear in mind that during the third quarter of 1975, just before the implementation of the anti-inflation program, the collective wage agreements signed in Canada provided an average salary increase of 16.8 per cent or about twice the increase awarded in the United States. If this trend had continued, we would have experienced at the same time disastrous unemployment and inflation rates, and that had to be avoided at all costs. Therefore, we must rejoice in the fact that the inflation rate has been brought back to 6.3 per cent during the first six months of the anti-inflation program while it reached 11.7 per cent during the six previous months. Salary increases have been reduced to an average of 11 per cent since the program is in force, and that can only improve our competitive position on foreign markets on which Canada relies for a number of jobs.

Mr. Speaker, whatever some people may say, it does not appear advisable in the overall economic situation to sacrifice the fight against inflation for the one on unemployment, because, and I quote once again the Governor of The Bank of Canada:

> In due course, it appears that what we get for a slight reduction in the unemployment rate—here again only for some time—is not an additional amount of inflation but indeed a fast and accelerating inflationary upswing to which there is no end in sight.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to review all the measures contained in the last budget. However, I would at least like to bring to light the uplifting from $100,000 to $150,000 of the annual profit ceiling under which small businesses can take advantage of a reduced taxation rate, as well as the increase to $750,000 of the cumulative maximum under which businesses can be taxed at this rate. In my opinion, this is a measure which was needed if the incipient economic recovery is to appear still more vigorously in the coming months. I am more especially glad as the government is thus bringing a solution to a problem I had personally brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance last April in the House. Indeed we must recall that as a result of the provisions of the Anti-inflation Act concerning the payment of dividends by corporations, many corporations might have lost their eligibility for that reduced rate of taxation because they would not be able to pay their shareholders all the dividends they had to pay in order not to reach the cumulative limit which was only $500,000. In taking these measures, the government shows its concern for our small business and its desire to use it as a decisive factor of the economic recovery which will create the employment and the prosperity all Canadians want.

I previously pointed out the sense of responsibility of the government, which does not hesitate to strike at the root of the problem and which prefers to risk being unpopular in the short run so as to ensure the well-being of the people in the long run. There is no better example of that sense of responsibility than the difficult decision made recently to raise the price of crude oil. Of course, it is a measure which strikes the consumer directly, and which may look inconsistent with the government's concern for the fight against inflation. Still, it had no other choice but to so encourage the people into moderating their consumption of a non-renewable resource, while by the same token freeing additional amounts to speed up exploration in the field of traditional oil in western Canada and its tar sands. Because the fiscal treatment of oil companies should encourage them strongly to reinvest their profits instead of increasing the dividends paid their shareolders, I support that decision.

It is imperative that the people know that Canadian oil reserves are not limitless, that our country runs the risk of becoming dependent in less than ten years, on imports from the Middle East or Venezuela, if explorations in Canada are not stepped up. Then, we will have to pay the price exacted by the producing countries. If the past is any indication of the future, this cost could very well be prohibitive and lead us, for a few years at least, to yearning for 1976 price levels; let us not forget that oil products are still relatively low-priced in Canada, when one knows that in western Europe, a gallon of ordinary gas costs between $1.60 and $2.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that it is essentially because of the federal affiliation that Quebecers can obtain oil products at a substantially lesser price, a price which will reach $9.05 a barrel starting July 1 and which is less than the price prevailing on the international market, which is between $11 and $12 a barrel.

This single price policy is possible only because the federal government gives generous subsidies—the cost in 1975-76 is estimated at $1.6 billion—to refineries of eastern Canada in general and Quebec in particular, so that they can sell gasoline and heating oil for a significantly lesser price than what they would normally have to charge in relation to international costs of crude petroleum.

● (2020)

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Because of Alberta.

Mr. Duclos: You are going on record, Steve.

Mr. Paproski: I know.

[Mr. Duclos.]

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, shortly after the federal-provincial energy conference in April 1975, the director of the Montreal Newspaper Le Devoir, Mr. Claude Ryan, wrote this, and I quote:

> Just as the fact of belonging to the Canadian federal community enabled provinces such as Quebec and Ontario to go through the crisis resulting from the spectacular rise in the international price of oil, without being too affected so can the ten Canadian provinces view their energy future with confidence if they stay together instead of separating.

And he added very appropriately, quote:

> The most important thing is that a country has the wealth which enables it to be sure it will enjoy a great variety of energy resources and maximum security of supply. These are the guarantees offered by the Canadian challenge but they would not be available to a separate province.

Mr. Speaker, there are some ideas worth thinking over in these few lines, for those in Quebec who are tempted by the apparently captivating adventure of the establishment of an independent state, for which Quebecers generally and the workers particularly may be left to pick up the tab.

I do hope that while letting the crude oil price get nearer the international levels in the next few years, a substantial differential be maintained and that, as far as possible, the single price oil policy be maintained in Canada as a whole. Otherwise, one of the most forceful arguments in Quebec in favour of Canadian federalism would lose all its meaning.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be timely to review briefly why, in spite of the considerable benefits the federal formula brings to Quebecers, too many of them remain skeptical about the possibility for them to assert themselves as a cultural group different from the majority of Canadians. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, most Quebecers clearly see the advantages provided by the federal system or they are at least open to a frank and honest discussion. It is the latter group, Mr. Speaker, that we must convince once and for all in the years to come of the profitability of federalism and of the possibility for Quebecers to assert themselves culturally, socially and economically in such a political framework.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the Speech from the Throne in October 1974, the Prime Minister stated that he hoped an agreement would soon be reached with all the provinces towards the repatriation of the constitution. That was almost two years ago but unfortunately little progress has been achieved, chiefly on account of the Quebec government's opposition. However, it seems to me that the amendment formula which was adopted in Victoria in 1971, providing for regional veto powers, one of them for Quebec, was an improvement over the current constitutional practice which requires unanimity rule for any amendment concerning the delimitation of constitutional jurisdictions. One could not reasonably claim that the repatriation of the Canadian constitution would, under those conditions, seriously affect the basic rights of Quebec.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the Quebec government is somehow seeking to trade its agreement as to the repatriation of the constitution for a constitutional review, which would inevitably lead to an increase in its constitutional powers. Therefore I hope that Quebec will renounce what sounds very much like blackmail and give its assent to the repatriation of the constitution. Thus it would help create a more serene and favourable climate in view of a future federal provincial conference which would consider the matter of sharing constitutional powers, which is obviously most important for the province of Quebec. However, it is imperative that the federal government show unequivocally in the next months its strong intention to pursue more vigorously than ever its objective by strengthening slightly the role of French-speaking officials in the management of the business of this country to promote the full development of French culture and the use of French in Canada, particularly in Quebec. If not, the people of Quebec will be right in turning to the government of their province and the latter will be justified in taking all available means to get a new sharing of the constitutional jurisdictions which will satisfy it.

We must say, Mr. Speaker, that if the present sharing of powers does not seem satisfactory, because of the extraordinary behaviour and the untiring devotion of Quebecers in the government who make sure that Quebec gets its share and that it is not affected in its vital interests, it is not impossible than an electoral accident could deeply change the Canadian political checkerboard and lessen the role of Quebecers on the federal scene. I think it is normal that such a possibility is the main concern of several Quebecers and that they are anxious to give to the Quebec government the necessary means enabling it to modify even more the destiny of Quebec in case the voice of French-speaking people would disappear from the federal scene.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think that all these negotiations to review the system of the sharing of powers must be undertaken in a real cooperative spirit and must at least take care that the quality of the services offered to all Canadians will be maintained. We must also see to it that they will not generate an irreversible process of gradual erosion of the powers of the federal government leading to some kind of disappearance of the presence of Quebec on the federal level. If French-speaking people could expect to be equitably represented in the senior positions of the federal public service, the possibillity of a setback of Quebecers on the political level would not be so serious. Unfortunately, it is clear that, in spite of the important progress that has been made in almost ten years, the efforts made to promote French-speaking people to the senior positions of the public service have not been as fruitful as expected. If the number of French-speaking persons in the senior posiions of the Public Service Commission, the Privy Council, the Secretary of State and in some other departments is adequate, the situaton is far from satisfactory in some others, and I would like my friends of the opposition to listen carefully to some figures I would like to give. For example, in the Department of National Defence, only one senior officer out of 28 is French-speaking; in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, three French-speaking persons have been promoted to senior positions out of a total of 67; in the Department of Finance, 2 out of 32, in the Department of Agriculture, 5 out of 79, and in the Department of the Environment, 10 out of 127—

• (2030)

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Duclos: I just want you to listen please. You take action.

Mr. Paproski: Do not blame it on the Tories.

Mr. Duclos: I did not say a word about you—

[Translation]

—does the hat fit you? And what is done to correct this situation? We could believe him as far as the hiring of university graduates is concerned. We could try to catch up by hiring a percentage of French-speaking persons slightly over the 28 per cent rate that must be reached as fast as possible. However, in 1974, French-speaking graduates who left the universities and who were hired by the Canadian public service made up hardly 29 per cent of the total. At least 35 per cent of French-speaking persons should be hired if we really want to make up for time lost.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that many French-speaking youths, especially in Quebec, are not very enthusiastic at the idea of moving to Ottawa, which they consider wrongly, to my mind, as an inhospitable city for French-speaking Canadians. I am sorry that they are prejudiced in this way, but this is an attitude that we must consider and which should in fact urge the federal government to be more enthusiastic when French-speaking people show an interest in a career in the federal government.

How can we ask French Canadians to play a role in federal administration if, in spite of their university degrees and their experience on the labour market, they are not sure that their offer of service will be well received. The government says that there are not enough French Canadians in the public service. It is supposed to be very difficult to find competent French Canadians, but if one shows some interest, he is treated with indifference.

I know that the government can count on the suppport of our Social Credit colleagues and on the open-mindedness of the NDP members on this matter, but I would like especially the official opposition to make a positive and determined stand on this matter instead of being satisfied with supporting the government half-heartedly.

I am sometimes surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear certain members of the official opposition. From what they say, it seems that it is the French Canadians who have taken over everything in the federal public service. I hope that the few figures that I have submitted to the House will make them reflect on this and that they will take the trouble to read the last annual report of the Public Service Commission which contains very significant statistics in this matter.

Mr. Paproski: Do not blame the opposition. It is your government.

Mr. Duclos: I will provide the hon. member with a copy.

Mr. Speaker, when speaking on this same subject in the House in October 1974, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) very rightly said, and I quote:

Therein lies an obligation that we all have, a kind of political contract with French-speaking Canadians under which they would reject separatism and the federal parliament would guarantee the right to French Canadians to communicate with and work in the federal administration in the French language. I solemnly believe that if we do not or cannot make that right a reality during the life of this parliament with its commitment to bilingualism, with the very emphatic words of the Leader of the Opposition in his speech an hour ago, with the strong French-speaking representation in government, then it will never be done and separatism will have proved its point and Canadian unity will cease to have meaning for the majority of Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, those are the words of a lucid man who, more than anyone else, wishes all Canadians to feel at home in Canada and to feel that they are making a useful contribution to the progress of their country without having to suffer cultural alienation.

● (2040)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps before the Chair recognizes the next speaker it can have the indulgence of the House for a moment. It seems to me that the Chair can accommodate one member from each party in the time available between the present and 9.45 or 10 o'clock, if each speaker agrees to limit his time. I know that several members still wish to be heard.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think, after the next speaker has spoken, we will be glad to limit the time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood that the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) was to be recognized after the hon. member who has just spoken, and that, after he spoke, there would be some agreement for allowing two or three members on the Liberal side to speak for the balance of the evening. That is my understanding. I could be wrong. However, I believe the Chair did say that the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley would be recognized next.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): This always happens when the Chair tries to divide time, or suggests that it should be divided. The names I have before me include those of the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Miss Campbell), the hon. member for Greenwood, and the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne). The Chair, trying to be fair, has obviously got itself up to its neck in trouble. I suggest that if hon. members speak for 20 minutes that would carry us through until 10 o'clock.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley will endeavour to fulfill that obligation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Greenwood. Is it agreed that each member will speak for 20 minutes?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we will try to stick to that suggestion.

[Mr. Duclos.]

I feel that this debate is about to end and that probably nearly everything which needs to be said about the budget has been said. But I wish to make a few comments on what, after all, is an important central event in the life of parliament.

In my view the budget introduced few significant changes. It lacked any sense of social justice and failed to move in the direction of equity. The view which I and, I think, my party hold is that the budget should be the instrument for bringing about social justice and promoting equity. I share the view expressed by Lord Keynes, the famous British economist, who recommended redistribution of income in the direction of equality, partly on the ethical ground that extremes of wealth and poverty were disgraceful but also because the poor spent more of their income than the rich.

I was going to quote the words of other famous men, the words of Tawney and Matthew Arnold, but will not do so now. Both said that a system founded on inequality is against nature and breaks down. I think we are seeing the breakdown of our system which is based on inequality. My quarrel with the budget is that it fails to reverse this trend. For example, let us consider unemployment.

Over 700,000 Canadians are out of work. I strongly suspect that when students seek to enter the labour force, the figures will get worse. What has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) done about this? He has done nothing, as far as I can make out. He rests his case on shallow optimism about the American economy. He anticipates it will continue to expand and that this will have the direct effect of promoting in the neighbourhood of 250,000 new jobs in Canada. One is assuming a great deal when one assumes the American economy will continue to expand. In any event, there is little link between American expansion and the Canadian economy. I remind the House that we will have 300,000 people entering the labour market next year; therefore, even on the basis of the Minister of Finance's assumptions, we will have a larger number of unemployed than before. What should be done about this question?

In my view the Minister of Finance should substantially cut the personal income tax for those whose incomes are below $15,000. This would have a dual effect. It would not only be a way of equalizing wealth between rich and poor but would stimulate the economy. People on lower incomes spend a greater proportion of their incomes than the rich do. As Lord Keynes pointed out, an excellent way to stimulate aggregate demand is to tax the rich to employ the poor. The budget does not touch on this.

It is suggested by some, including the Minister of Finance—I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said much the same this afternoon—that such a tax cut would be inflationary. This argument ignores that our economy is only working at 80 per cent of capacity, and if we were to use the now unused 20 per cent capacity the effect might well be a reduction of inflation. The minister ignored the fact that in an economy working at close to capacity there will be less unemployment, less money going out in unemployment insurance payments, an increased supply of goods and services, and a reduction in welfare costs.

The next thing on which I wish to comment in the budget is the proposal to increase the number of weeks of employment required to qualify for UIC and the decline in the duration of benefits. Here again the so-called remedy of the Minister of Finance strikes at those who can least afford it. I refer to the people in the maritime provinces and Quebec where there is little opportunity to qualify for the present eight-week requirement. There will be even less opportunity to qualify if the period is extended to 12 weeks. The effects of these proposals will drive those people on to welfare rolls and increase the burdens of municipalities and provinces which can least afford them. Surely we in this House have learned that the welfare of all regions of Canada is of vital interest to all Canadians.

The question may be asked, if we are to seek full employment, for what types of employment must we plan? I maintain the view that where private industry cannot provide the necessary jobs it is up to public enterprise to step in. There are very great needs in our country; I will not list them all. We need public housing at rents and prices people can afford. There is an urgent need in metro areas, such as my own, for the extension of rapid transit. So far the government has completely failed to live up to its promises to assist the development of public transit, promises made in the last election campaign.

There are one or two things in the budget of which I approve. The first is the higher taxes on large cars. This measure is designed to conserve energy. I wonder if enough has been done. I am inclined to think that a reduction in the tax on small cars would have been a better incentive to conserve energy over the years.

● (2050)

I heartily agree with the increased tax exemption for small businessmen. The limit to which businessmen are eligible to pay the small business rate of 25 per cent tax is doubled. Small businessmen are a group in the community who have been particularly damaged by inflation and urgently need the assistance provided for them by the budget change.

I also approve of the increase in the child care deduction. I wish the government would proceed vigorously to carry out the recommendations of the Status of Women Committee which recommended a major federal investment in day care centres. On the other hand I do not agree that the government was wise in allowing tax exemptions for an increased range of registered personal pension plans. This is a change to assist the well-to-do and not the people who need it most.

I have tried to study the proposed changes in the prices and incomes policy. The objection which we have in this party to the government's anti-inflation measures is that the prices and incomes policy was effective to some extent in stabilizing wages and salaries but it left profits virtually intact. The Prime Minister this afternoon almost seemed to acknowledge this fact. I suspect that after the changes it will remain ineffective in respect to prices and profits. One obvious reason is that a large number of prices are exempt, such as energy, most food, and the price of imports. The price of housing has not been effectively controlled. These are major items.

I suppose that the object of the proposed changes is to give at least the impression of more effective control of prices and profits. I am afraid that the effort will be ineffective. One reason for this is the extraordinary complications of the system. These invite evasion by those who can afford a skilled accountant and other expert advice. The mysteries of transfer payments give rise to serious doubts whether these technical changes will be an effective instrument of control. The Department of National Revenue has been unable to control large multinational corporations, and without an army of investigators far exceeding the present staff of 853 the Anti-Inflation Board has no way to assess the figures found in financial statements of these large corporations engaged in intra-corporate trade.

I now want to turn to the external aspects of the budget. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech did indeed make reference to the new economic order, but I think Canadians still have a long way to go before they appreciate the importance of the revolutionary changes affecting the world trade system. Canada depends upon trade; trade in the ultimate analysis depends on world stability and prosperity. There is an increasing recognition all over the world of the need for change in the way in which international trade is conducted. This has given rise to a series of international meetings. The main actors and promoters of the new economic order have been the victims of under development who have suffered on an immense scale from ever-worsening destitution and malnutrition. The Prime Minister himself observed in his famous address at the Mansion House, London, and I quote:

> These nations seek no piecemeal adjustments but a comprehensive restructuring of all the components. The response of the industrialized countries can be no less well prepared or no less comprehensive in scope.

What is sought from us now is not aid, although in the least developed countries that remains a major factor. What is needed is to promote agriculture in the Third World, and to improve trade opportunities so that the Third World can earn for itself the means of developing itself. What we are talking about then are not fringe benefits but the basic necessities of life such as food, shelter, and clothing. What is required is to meet the basic needs of mankind in the foreseeable future on a global scale.

To this end a number of conferences under the auspices of the United Nations have met. The latest one we discussed today, the UNCTAD IV conference at Nairobi. It is notable that in all of these conferences the participants recognized the inter-dependence of nations in solving the basic problems of mankind, and the urgent need for the political will in both developed and developing countries to make the necessary changes.

Another thing which seemed to be common to all of these conferences was the conviction expressed by knowledgeable men and women from all over the world that the problems of the world could, in fact, be met by international co-operation and the necessary political will.

The Canadian government has clearly indicated its acceptance of the basic notions behind the new economic order. In his address to UNCTAD IV, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) spoke of the need for action "with an unprecedented sense of urgency". He went on to say:

I believe we have passed the stage of analysis and assessment of issue. We must now get together to devise workable and dynamic solutions, and solutions mean action.

Some observers at the conference felt that, at Nairobi, Canada did not take an effective lead and offered no solution but only more talk. I will not discuss UNCTAD further because it was discussed today. However, there is a long course ahead of us where important structural changes are required to be made. We must organize new machinery, such as the common fund to stabilize the price of commodities.

I am aware of course that programs in this field will be sought during the coming year, and no doubt for many years to come. It is of course wrong to assume that commodities are the only subject that is the concern of the new economic order. It is concerned with trade liberalization policies. It is concerned with the transfer of technology, and is still concerned with adequate aid transfers.

It is sometimes asked what is the real basis for Canada's concern about these matters. The real basis is a dual one. On one side is enlightened self interest. This requires that the strong, positive demands of two thirds of the world's people be heard and acted on. This is essential to stability. The other is the basic notion of human compassion and brotherhood. It is perhaps old fashioned to mention this, but it remains that some such moral imperative is an essential ingredient if we are to have effective action.

I had intended to mention the subject of justice to our native peoples, but I do not have enough time to do that. I will conclude by repeating that I have found the budget uninspiring and inadequate. It fails to move in the direction of social justice. It deals inadequately with the major problem of external trade whose urgency was expressed the other day by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson). I can only hope that if the minister has another chance to bring in a budget, it will be a much better one.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to rise tonight to speak in the budget debate. I would first like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on what I consider a very good budget for the times. One might have the great desire to get into all sorts of expansionary ideas and projects, and certainly as a member of parliament it would be very nice to have more federal money circulating in my constituency. However, it seems to me that it is very important to allow existing programs to take hold fully. I refer to the anti-inflation program established last October.

At that time all Canadians were asked to abide by the guidelines for prices and incomes, and we made provisions for mandatory controls over the larger economic units in our economy. The essential purpose was to change expectations, and to bring about a quicker response to the program as a whole so that the fiscal, monetary, and other general policies would in fact bring about real growth and declining inflation. We have seen the program become operational in the last few months and we have actually seen it taking effect. It would not do at this time to introduce programs which might disturb the full operation of the government's attack on inflation. The importance of all Canadians co-operating in this program was reiterated in the Prime Minister's speech on the budget today.

[Mr. Brewin.]

● (2100)

Nevertheless there are some areas in the budget which I should like to discuss and with respect to which I may, hopefully, introduce some new thoughts. The one-parent family or the working mother will welcome the changes set forth under the day care provisions which allow a deduction for child care of $1,000 per child up to a total of $4,000 per family. Many people will not be directly affected by this concession, but for those concerned about the cost of child care this will be a welcome measure.

I also welcome the new tax provisions concerning oil and gas exploration. Such a means of equalizing power costs will be particularly attractive should oil be discovered and the Maritimes become an exporter of energy. I understand that a similar concession is given to the coal industry. Let me remind hon. members that we have a source of energy in coal. Not only could this provide energy but it would also provide work for people in Cape Breton and other areas in Nova Scotia. Let us take a look at it. The challenge is there. My sources tell me we still have a great amount to use up.

The budget provides that a taxpayer will henceforth be able to write off exploration costs at a rate of 100 per cent—up from 30 per cent as it presently stands. This concession became operative as of budget night and will remain in force until July 1, 1979. Until now, only the principal business taxpayers could claim a 100 per cent write-off of exploration costs. The new provision will also apply to funds received under provincial incentive programs in connection with drilling and exploration. As one who comes from a province where, at present, we are right in the difficult situation of relying on an oil-based power system due to the low cost of oil less than three years ago, I welcome these tax advantages and look forward to the use of coal and to the discovery of commercially viable oil resources off the Atlantic sea coast.

However, let us not think the discovery of oil will ease our problems over the long term. The Atlantic provinces and Quebec must make arrangements between themselves to provide a mutually beneficial and fully operational grid power system.

The federal government has offered financial support for the development of alternative power sources and it is up to the provinces to take advantage of this program. The provinces wish to continue jurisdiction over energy and thus they should come forward with new proposals. In this regard I am particularly anxious to see action taken to harness Fundy tidal power if this is possible.

Canada has always been a country which seemed to be able to get around its difficulties. In 1867 the areas came together and, as provinces, dedicated themselves to working together for the good of all. This has occurred over many years; it happened with respect to the rail and air transport industries; in connection with the oil and gas pipeline in the West; in equalization grants to the provinces; in support for the arts, humanities, and sciences; in education; with the CBC; with our social insurance programs, and in all principal areas of our national life.

The federal government provides services of unique importance to the unity of this country; this is what Confederation is largely about. Surely at this point it is not up to the federal government to say to one province, "Find your own solution." This is particularly the case should the solution lie in co-operation not only with the federal government but perhaps with four or five other provinces, all of which must get together if a particular difficulty is to be solved. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the sooner this is done the better it will be for Canada.

I should like to turn now to the subject of employment and the labour force. We often hear of the high unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces. We also know that the figures mentioned are true and we look forward to the amendments which are to be introduced to the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, one does not solve this problem by increasing the number of weeks a person must work in order to qualify. Surely what we need to solve the problem are incentives which would help get all those people back to work.

We know that approximately 50 per cent of those presently receiving benefit can find those four extra weeks quite easily and will do so as soon as they are forced to take such action. But what of the others? As I say, I look forward to the amendments to the UIC Act in the fall. We welcome the assurances from the government that there will be programs of retraining and job creation—that the money which has circulated in the area will continue to be there. We are looking to see incentives which will enable existing operations to find new jobs for these people, along with the incentive already provided by the federal government.

Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, that there are abuses of the present system and that it is not only the working people who are responsible for them. There are employers who will not take a person who comes knocking at the door because they are scared that if they refused to say that the applicant is not suitable he will, when engaged, fail to provide efficient service. Employers therefore prefer to state that the applicant is not fit for the job rather than engage the services of a possibly unwilling worker. The system certainly has its faults and the one I have mentioned is probably the greatest—an employer is afraid to say openly to an applicant for a job that the job is available when he knows that the applicant is really not anxious to stop receiving UIC benefits.

On the other hand in some areas it is very hard for employers to compete in the employee market bearing in mind the amount of UIC benefits possible applicants for work are receiving. Usually it is persons from outside the community who receive these high amounts of unemployment insurance benefit.

I do not want to give the impression that we should jeopardize an unemployed person's UIC benefits if he has earned them at a particular level and would receive the same amount if he returned to the work force, when there is no job available for him. However, over an extended period of time perhaps it would encourage people to get back into the work force if the rates were reduced to the minimum wage thereby enabling an applicant to compete for jobs which are available in the area. I therefore welcome the indication of the Minister of Finance that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) will introduce a further change relating to unemployment insurance benefits, that is to say, the number of weeks during which benefits may be drawn will be more directly related to the number of weeks worked and that, in addition, regional extended benefits will be related in a more sensitive manner to the level of regional unemployment. I look forward to taking part in the discussion of these proposals.

The budget has been criticized by the opposition as failing to bring forth new housing programs or incentives to business. I have been a member of parliament for not quite two years but I know the government has brought in a number of housing programs. Consider, for example, the Assisted Home Ownership Program. Under this program, a couple, regardless of income, who are buying or building a new house under the qualifying limit, which is $31,000 in my area, are eligible for loan assistance to reduce their mortgage interest rate to 8 per cent. Those with children and needing additional help to keep monthly payments below 25 per cent of their income may qualify for outright subsidies of up to $750 annually.

We have programs such as the Neighbourhood Improvement Program available to a great many municipalities. There are 16 municipalities in Nova Scotia which have taken part in this scheme. One of them is in Yarmouth, in my constituency. I should like to see more use being made by Nova Scotians of these programs, and I look forward to seeing residential rehabilitation assistance programs in full use.

● (2110)

I also realize that an agreement has been signed by the province of Nova Scotia with the federal government designating the rest of the province—that is, the rural areas including municipalities of less than 2,500 population—as eligible for residential rehabilitation assistance programs. It is up to the municipalities to take advantage of these programs. Included in this designation in Nova Scotia are a number of areas selected for priority assistance. I am under the impression that some problems still remain to be worked out before commitments can be made, particularly program delivery arrangements for provincial assistance. However, negotiations on these matters are proceeding and I hope it will not be too long before the full impact of these housing programs is felt.

These programs, Mr. Speaker, show progress in the housing industry, and I hope that anyone with housing problems will go after their municipality, their provincial and federal representatives, to ensure that the full benefit of these housing programs are taken advantage of, not only in Nova Scotia but in Canada in general.

In so far as business incentives are concerned, Mr. Speaker, opposition members claim we have not provided measures to stimulate capital investment. This government provided in the last budget manufacturing incentives, investment tax credits. Other programs provide financing directly, such as to small business. In the province of Nova Scotia in the first three months of 1975 there were eight loans to small businesses, whereas in the same period this year there were 30. The amount last year was $66,240, compared with the amount this year of $487,146.

With regard to farm improvement loans, in the same period last year, namely the first three months, there were 48 loans made in Nova Scotia, and 48 in the first three months of this year. However, the amount lent last year was $191,537 compared with $262,435 this year. As far as the fishing industry is concerned, there were 208 loans granted in Nova Scotia during the period April, 1974, to March, 1975, totalling $1,505,251. Between April, 1975, and March, 1976, there were 197 loans—this was a poor year for expansion, particularly in the groundfish industry—for a total of $1,300,773. However, loans in the first quarter of this year ending March, 1976, totalled 50, amounting to $282,021.

These measures have been provided to sustain high levels of business investment in Canada. We are looking at productivity as a government, Mr. Speaker. People, business, and Canada as a whole must get into these programs. We have reached a maturity; let us take it from there and make a success of what we have.

This budget also increases the amount of corporate profits allowed for the small business tax reductions. Canadian controlled private corporations are entitled to pay tax at a reduced rate, subject to an annual limit on their profits. For 1972-73 the limits were $50,000 to $400,000 per annum in total. In 1974 they were raised to $100,000 to $500,000; and effective for 1976 the Minister of Finance in his recent budget announced the limits will be further increased, ranging from $150,000 to a total of $750,000. This can only create incentives for small business in the Atlantic area and will help these small businesses to continue and expand.

Another welcome announcement has been the increase in the maximum annual deduction for registered pension retirement plans from $2,500 to $3,500. This measure will be welcomed by all those who are saving for their retirement.

A new step was taken by the government last Friday when it announced that it would be proclaiming jurisdiction over fishing rights extending out to 200 miles from our coast. This is to take effect as of January 1, 1977. We have had bilateral negotiations and have tied up some 88 per cent of the operations of foreign fleets within this 200 mile limit.

What will this do for the Atlantic provinces? It can only provide new industry and ideas. It is also time that the government regarded fish as a natural resource. We do not have to look elsewhere if we have a 200 mile limit. Businesses will grow and the fishery will develop. We have allowed foreigners to fish off our shore, but a lot of these fishermen have been fishing these grounds for some time alongside our own fishermen.

With regard to tariffs, we have a tariff on finished fish products that leave Canada but no tariff on unfinished products. When we are negotiating tariffs with other countries, perhaps we should consider imposing a tariff on unfinished products as an incentive to finish our products in Canada.

I realize we have agreed to take only 20 minutes and perhaps I have overstepped my time.

Mr. Grafftey: Keep going.

Miss Campbell: Thank you. This budget has been critized by the opposition as not being expansionary. I suggest that this is a time when we ought to examine the programs we already have in existence in an attempt to make our economy work. At a time when we are trying to make our anti-inflation program work we should not try new, expansionary ideas; the programs we have, I suggest, will probably work if given the opportunity.

I was very pleased to be given this opportunity this evening to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker. Since my 20 minutes have expired I will say thank you, and resume my seat.

[Miss Campbell (South Western Nova).]

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased once again to take part in a budget debate, especially since I seem to have the distinction of closing this memorable debate on this memorable budget, which will be remembered forever for its nothingness. However, if I stick strictly to the contents of the budget itself, I will probably be finished before I have hardly begun. I say that because the budget is as shallow and as celluloid a budget as we have ever seen, and as a result it has very quickly become known as the "no budget budget".

This budget is what we get at a time when sweeping new proposals and policies are required, in fact are vital, if the downward economic trend that we are facing is to be reversed. But all this and more has been said by my colleagues who have spoken before me, none better than by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his very forceful yet eloquent address just a couple of days ago.

Instead of expounding on the obvious deficiencies in the budget itself, I would like to take this opportunity to express my thoughts about a part of our economic process, a part that must surely form the backbone of our economic way of life. I am, of course, referring to small business, which many believe is slowly but surely disappearing under this government.

This small firm sector which generally seems to be ignored and bypassed by governments is responsible for employing over 50 per cent of our labour force. This high figure was substantiated several years ago by the minister of energy who was then the minister of industry, trade and commerce, when he stated in this House:

> Almost 60 per cent of our entire labour force—two thirds of Canadians work for businesses employing 15 persons or less. Most of these businesses are owned and managed by Canadians and provide a means of developing greater Canadian participation in our country's growth.

● (2120)

Although it is admitted that by far the largest and possibly the most important sector of our economy is in fact the small firm sector, the government continues to expound on philosophies it established some 20 years ago by concentrating most if not all its efforts on bigness, bigger and costlier governments, bigger and stronger units, and larger and fewer multinational corporations as well as merger oriented enterprises, while small business as we know it is possibly heading toward extinction.

The government has gone so far in its centralization of power that it has nearly reached the stage of allowing a few to monopolize our over-all economy. The Canadian Labour Congress, for example, has been allowed to become so powerful that just recently it reached the height of impertinence when it threatened the government, and therefore the public at large, by suggesting that unless it were given a key role to play in running the nation it would call a national strike. This is the way things operate in most communist countries, obviously not to the advantage of their people. In any event, they hold all this concentrated power, and yet the CLC controls only approximately 20 per cent of the labour force compared to over 50 per cent in the small firms sector.

Mr. Rodriguez: Nonsense.

Mr. Jelinek: I notice that my socialist, if not communist, friends are getting upset because they would like nothing better than state ownership and control. If that is so, they can go back to Cuba or Russia.

Mr. Rodriguez: Absolute tripe.

Mr. Jelinek: Yet the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) did not even mention small business in his speech on the budget earlier this week. He does, however, from time to time outside the House indicate the seriousness of problems relating to the small businessman, as he did in a recent speech to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. But I believe this is only a means of pacifying the hungry. If the minister were sincere in his casual concern for the small business community, then he would back his statements by appropriate legislation in order to show his sincerity. Promises alone mean nothing unless they are backed by action, and action is nowhere to be seen as far as the government is concerned.

As for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) I do not think he even knows small business exists. The only mention in his budget which was in any way connected to even medium sized firms was an increase in the amount of net profits eligible for a lower tax rate. Not only will this affect less than 1 per cent of the business community but the truly small businessman whose net profits are below $100,000 a year remains on the list of the ignored so far as the government is concerned.

I would like to point out some of the problems or deficiencies that exist between governments and small business, but before doing so let me say that I hope I will not be labelled a pessimist or a cynic, as I was by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) a few weeks ago during my objective questioning on Olympic financing because I will now, as I did them then, base my points on facts and precedents, and therefore if I am to be labelled anything by anyone I suggest that the word realist would be far more appropriate.

First, however, let us clarify by means of a definition who we are talking about when we mention the small firms sector. The government's definition of small business, an active business income, has created considerable room for dispute which involves the usual cost of accountants and lawyers for the businessman and of civil servants for the government.

I believe that a far better working definition, perhaps oversimplified to some extent, would be that a small firm is one that is owner-managed. There are always exceptions, of course, for specific programs where arbitrary size limits would have to be decided upon. However, at this time for the sake of simplicity let us assume that the so called small business sector would fall into the owner-managed category. Even without the exceptions, by using this definition we can be sure that we are including 99 per cent of all small firms in that category.

Let me begin with high interest rates and the over-all banking system as it relates to this "owner-managed" segment of our business community. It is a well known fact that a small independent firm is at a great disadvantage against conglomerates and multi-national corporations when it comes to money supply. Although there are thousands of chartered bank branches across this country and the government has the Federal Business Development Bank, which is a carry over from the Industrial Development Bank, established supposedly for the purpose of assisting Canadian firms in their expansion programs; our banking system still remains one of the least competitive organizations in the world, afraid to take the least amount of risk when compared to the banking system in the United States, for example. A sort of a monopoly by the big "10" seems to be in existence within the money institutions, supported and protected by the government. The branches and their managers virtually have their hands tied when it comes to credit decisions, as their credit levels are limited by head office at uniform levels, thus eliminating any possible fluctuation for the sake of a healthy competitive atmosphere.

What is even worse is that American and other foreign subsidiaries can come into Canada and purchase Canadian firms and businesses which may have remained in the hands of Canadians, without ever using their own capital. The foreign company, by simply using its parent company in the United States or elsewhere as collateral, is able to generate a loan from a Canadian bank with no real problems. In many cases it is able to obtain the loan from the same Canadian bank that more often than not had refused the same Canadian plant further credit for necessary expansion. I know this as a fact as I have gone through this whole cycle myself.

In short, as it now stands, a U.S. or foreign enterprise can in fact buy out a Canadian firm without ever having to bring a red cent into Canada. From time to time we cry foul, or independence, and rightly so, but we as Canadians cry foul often without doing anything about it. The best comparison I can make is the way we cry and complain every four years when, as a nation, we do not bring back enough or any medals from the Olympic Games. Unfortunately this year will not be any different, so we complain, but during the subsequent four years we as Canadian citizens, as media, as governments, do next to nothing to assist, morally or otherwise, those few athletes who continue to give all their energies as well as their souls to specific goals for this country, and that is just one typical comparison with the small independent businessman in Canada and the government's attitude to him.

Yet still on the money end, while governments continue to turn their backs on small business and from time to time throw a bone in their direction just to keep them pacified, Canada has lent almost $1.5 billion to 57 foreign countries in the last ten years alone, for little or no interest. These are not figures I am making up, Mr. Speaker, they are figures that the government itself has confirmed. Some of these loans are even made to communist countries with no termination dates set, and they continue to be made while thousands of small businesses survive in this type of political atmosphere. How is it that Cuba, for example, can borrow millions of dollars at a rate of 3% while many small Canadian firms have to fight and beg, and collateral their gold fillings, in an attempt to obtain reasonable financing—say around 12%—many to no avail? No wonder the unemployment situation is a disaster, with three quarters of a million Canadians unemployed. Mr. Speaker, there is no better, no cheaper, and no quicker potential employment opportunity than by way of the small firm sector of our economy. The government must take appropriate steps to utilize this sector for economical make-work programs, by initiating and imposing comprehensive and realistic incentives for this very important industrial and economic community for the benefit of all Canadians.

● (2130)

Now let us move to a more specific problem, the problem dealing with the swamp of bureaucratic paperwork which governments continue to impose on all business establishments. There are the conventional tax papers, refund forms, application papers, questionnaires, licence forms, and on and on goes the list. There is general agreement that some of these forms have no justification for existing, and in fact many have become obsolete, sometimes tied to legislative bills which are no longer in effect. However, the forms continue to circulate, causing unnecessary demands at great expense to governments and business establishments. Meanwhile the filing cabinets of the nation bulge, often with incorrect and incomplete information. The only consolation is that most files gather dust, rarely to be used again.

The answer to this problem is simple: all we have to do is follow the example of the United States and initiate an immediate reduction of 10 per cent of government forms every few years or so. The result would be an unbelievable saving in dollars to the taxpayer and would certainly reduce considerably the nuisance, even harassment, that the small firm is expected to bear.

Surely if the government is prepared to wait for the United States economic upswing to bring us out of our doldrums, the least we could do would be to borrow some of their effective methods, which are obviously working for them, and could just as well work for Canada.

With regard to labels and packaging our labelling legislation is yet another horrendous bureaucratic and complicated mess. It is of little, if any advantage to anyone and unquestionably a big hindrance to the small manufacturer. To point out a very quick example, a manufacturer in northern British Columbia distributing goods from, say, the United States within the borders of the province of B.C. alone must go through the expense of relabelling and repackaging his product at a very great expense. The same can be said for manufacturing in central Quebec, or in any other area of this regionally complex nation. The act should and must be simplified.

One of the more intricate problems for some businesses—and I suppose every individual has this problem to a certain extent—is one which relates to the existing tax complexities. It is bad enough for individuals, but for small businesses it is a nightmare and a real deterrent to expansion. The entire Income Tax Act should be rewritten so that it would be comprehendable to the taxpayer. This may seem like a large and burdensome order, but from the viewpoint of a small business the administration of the tax laws has become as critical as the laws themselves. It is a double cost to the taxpayer who must indirectly pay for bureaucratic administration and then pay again for advisers to deal with the problems directly affecting him.

If the small businessman had unlimited funds, as most multinational corporations do, there would be fewer tax problems for him to worry about. He could set days aside to confer with tax advisers, supervisors, and evaluators from Revenue Canada, but only to find that simple solutions are no longer available in this respect. Of course the small businessman has other things on his mind, for example, mere survival, let alone keeping up with product development, research, employment, cash flow, expansion and so on.

I could produce a long list of specific tax examples which apply to the small firms sector in a harmful way, but because of my time limitation I will just give one sample. It relates to the small businessman who in many cases must depend on his spouse to take part in his business endeavours. It so happens that because of the weird tax laws which are in existence it is cheaper for the business proprietor to live with a woman working for him rather than to marry her. I can vouch for the fact that wives can be just as expensive as girlfriends, but that is no reason for this specific tax law to continue. The point of the matter is that if they marry his business income is all taxable, and if they do not, he can deduct her salary. Then if they do decide to marry after all, they will need to incorporate so that she can be employed by the business. In other words, it is more economical to live with a mistress than it is to marry her. Strange as this example may seem, it is a true fact, and it affects tens of thousands of Canadians struggling to carry on their business ventures under existing tax complications.

The fact that the budget is a no budget naturally came as a surprise to many, but the fact that the budget in no way deals with Canada's current number one problem surely must have shocked all. I am of course referring to the housing situation as it now stands and the fact that the average young family can no longer purchase a home. This lack of positive action by the government in the field of housing does not only affect the small firms sector, but indeed all Canadians. Surely if the government was not prepared to reduce the tax on building materials, at least further concessions should have been introduced in respect to insulating materials, just to name one example.

We talk and preach about the serious need for energy conservation, and rightly so, yet modern homes are built without the least bit of thought about conserving energy. It is a known fact that properly designed and insulated homes will use less energy, as far as heating and air conditioning are concerned, than the types of homes which are now being constructed in various developments across Canada.

I had the privilege of attending a recent NATO conference at which it was established that those nations which impose stricter controls on building construction in respect of energy conservation are the same nations which are ahead in the energy conservation field, and Canada unfortunately is not among them. It seems to me that the government has its priorities mixed up when it comes to controls.

Having just mentioned air conditioning, I am prompted to reflect on why the Minister of Finance saw fit to include in his budget a surtax on automobile air conditioners when the amount of energy consumed by air conditioning is less than one half of 1 per cent. The only answer must be that once again this is simply another example of pacification, this time for the benefit of energy conservationists who have a right to be concerned.

If I may, I would now like to take this opportunity to make some suggestions and recommendations which I hope will be considered in a serious manner.

It is no secret that government, whether in a restraint period or not, is by far the largest purchaser of goods and talent, but the bulk of the contracts go to a concentrated group of elite corporations and individuals, usually in the multinational range. In this regard it is time that the government followed the examples set by Japan and others by initiating set-aside programs in its purchasing for the purpose of contracting them to the competitive small firms sector. It is time the government took immediate steps to reduce the costly bureaucratic paperwork onslaught I mentioned earlier. It is time to simplify our legislation with regard to labelling and packaging, and it is time to rewrite the Income Tax Act for the sake of simplification and saving.

It is time the government took away the right to strike from those individuals and groups working in essential services. It is no secret that one of the major factors behind the low productivity figures in Canada is the fact that millions of working man-days are lost as a result of strikes, many of them illegal, and many of them within essential or government services.

Two recent polls indicate strong support for such a proposal. Of roughly 5,000 business establishments polled on a national basis 91 per cent favoured the idea of taking away the right to strike within essential services. On a more local level, of those constituents from my riding of High Park-Humber Valley who answered a recent questionnaire, 94 per cent supported such a move. Many of them work in essential services themselves.

It is also time the government followed its anti-inflation guidelines and reduced its spending in accordance with those guidelines. Our finance critic, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), outlined in his budget remarks how we could realistically reduce government spending by at least $1 billion.

It is time for the government to encourage, by way of co-operation in research and development, the formation of a small firms consortium. This system of business co-ops in West Germany, Japan, and elsewhere is a tremendous advantage to the small firms taking part with respect to buying, selling, financing, sharing facilities, and so on.

It is also time for the government to initiate cautious but realistic and meaningful incentives for the primary purpose of increasing productivity. It is time the government encouraged, through tax incentives, a far greater amount of secondary manufacturing within Canada rather than selling our national resources abroad for the sake of improving our international trade balance.

In short, the time has come for the government to change its attitude toward centralization of business, unions, and governments as well, and to take the necessary steps, some of which I have outlined, for the purpose of preserving a competitive business community which forms the basis of the free market system.

● (2140)

I have tried to outline some of the problems, along with some remedies, that relate to the small firms sector of our economy and, believe me, I have only scratched the surface. If we want this sector to survive within our society, as indeed we do, then immediate action by the federal government must be taken, for the small business community is what the free enterprise system is all about. It is what this country was built on and what this country can prosper by. Other countries which presently are more fortunate than Canada in regard to unemployment, inflation, productivity, and other areas by which the standard of success and happiness is judged, have all concentrated their economic energies toward their small firms sectors within their industrial way of life.

Japan, Belgium, West Germany, not to mention the United States and others, are all in far better shape economically speaking than Canada, and one of the primary reasons is because in those countries their governments are dedicated toward the betterment and continual growth of the small firms sector, thereby assuring the survival and success of the free market system in particular, and free enterprise as a whole. We cannot allow the Prime Minister to change the free market system in this country. If the Prime Minister believes that the free market system does not work, as he so clearly stated late last year, then may I remind him that if indeed free enterprise is having its problems in this country it certainly has nothing to do with the system itself but rather with the stranglehold that he and his government have had on that system for the past decade or so.

I see I still have about five minutes left, Mr. Speaker, so in order to close on a not too serious note I should like to read to you a very simple but significant story put out by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It simplifies the realities of our economic society to a children's fairy tale, but the reason I decided to end my address today by reading this story is because, more than anything that has been printed lately regarding the problems within our economy, this story signifies reality and comes right to the point in a way that even members and supporters of the New Democratic Party will understand—I hope.

Before I read it, however, let me set the stage by introducing the characters in the story and equating them to the real life segments of our society. First, there is the Little Red Rooster who should be equated to a typical small businessman in a free society. The cow will play the part of the union leaders, the duck will be the NDP oriented working man, and the goose is a socialist Liberal—is there any other? And lastly the farmer represents the cabinet. Allow me to read from this pamphlet put out by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which is a non-profit organization of over 32,000 independent business owners dedicated to the preservation of free competitive enterprise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May we clarify one point? It being 9.45 p.m. I should at this time put all questions necessary to dispose of the motion, but I believe there is some understanding so perhaps I could recognize the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is general agreement among the parties that we do not see the clock until ten o'clock?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is correct.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed by unanimous consent that we do not see the clock until ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, it was also agreed that the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) would finish his speech and then we will go to the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), and finish up by ten o'clock.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, does that include listening to fairy stories about red roosters?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Lefebvre: You guys deserve each other.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is adding to the situation. I should ask consent not to see the clock until ten o'clock but the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) suggests that the next speaker will be the hon. member for Kamouraska. I know that some other members might want to make representation and wish to speak, so it is difficult for the Chair to include that in the agreement. We could go beyond 9.45 p.m. and see what happens afterwards.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jelinek: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks by reading this story although it is simplified for the primary purpose that even those socialists on my left will be able to understand some of the problems of industry. It does lower itself somewhat to the level of a fairy tale. There is a very strong and important point in this. Allow me to read the story from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You could have read it by now.

Mr. Jelinek: If you guys had been quiet over there I might have been finished. Here is the story. Once upon a time there was a Little Red Rooster who scratched about and uncovered some grains of wheat. He called his barnyard neighbours and said, "If we work together and plant this wheat, we will have some fine bread to eat. Who will help me plant the wheat?" "Not I," said the Cow. You remember who the cow was. "Not I," said the Duck. "Not I," said the Goose. "Then I will," said the Little Red Rooster and he did.

After the wheat started growing, the ground turned dry and there was no rain in sight. "Who will help me water the wheat?", said the Little Red Rooster. "Not I," said the Goose. "I'd lose my workman's compensation," said the Cow. "Equal rights," said the Duck. "Then I will," said the Little Red Rooster and he did.

The wheat grew tall and ripened into golden grain. "Who will help me reap the wheat?" asked the Little Red Rooster. "I'm waiting for a guaranteed annual wage," said the goose. "Not I," said the Duck. "Out of my classification," said the Cow. "Then I will," said the Little Red Rooster and he did.

When it came time to grind the flour, "Not I," said the Cow. "I'd lose my unemployment insurance," said the Duck.

When it came time to bake the bread, "That's overtime for me," said the Cow. "I'm a dropout and never learned how," said the Duck. "If I'm the only one helping, that's discrimination," said the Goose.

"Then I will," said the Little Red Rooster and he did. He baked five loaves of fine bread and held them up for his neighbours to see.

"I want some," said the Cow. "I want some," said the Duck. "I demand my share," said the Goose. That is the NDP.

"No," said the Little Red Rooster. "I can rest for a while and eat five loaves myself."

"Excess profits," cried the Cow. "Capitalist leech," screamed the Duck. "Equal rights," screamed the Goose. And they hurriedly painted picket signs and marched around the Little Red Rooster, singing, "We shall overcome." And they did.

For when the Farmer—that is the cabinet—came to investigate the commotion, he said, "You must not be greedy, Little Red Rooster. Look at the oppressed Cow. Look at the disadvantaged Duck. Look at the underprivileged Goose. You are guilty of making second-class citizens of them."

"But I earned the bread," protested the Little Red Rooster.

"Exactly," the wise Farmer said. "That is the wonderful free enterprise system; anybody in the barnyard can earn as much as he wants. You should be happy to have all this freedom. In other barnyards, you would have to give all your loaves to the Farmer. Here you give four loaves to your suffering neighbours."

And they lived happily ever after. Including the Little Red Rooster, who smiled and crowed, "I am grateful. I am grateful."

But his neighbours wondered why he never baked any more bread.

The point of this story is that it is time to wake up to the fact that unemployment insurance has increased five times since 1971 and government spending has increased five times in the past ten years. The unemployment deficit has reached a staggering $4 billion, not to mention the unacceptably high unemployment figures and the highest inflation rate in history. So wake up Canada—there is no free lunch.

● (2150)

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I wish to emphasize some aspects of the budget proposed by the present government and that seem very logical, wise and adapted to the general situation of the Canadian economy a well as to the needs of the area that I represent, the south shore of Montreal.

Without coming back in detail on every point contained in the precise statement of the minister (Mr. Macdonald), I wish to comment briefly on the general context of that budget which is as follows: it is made up of a delicate web of contradictory situations. It represents the middle phase of an economic cycle. We are not entirely out of the depressive phase of the last economic cycle and we are not yet at the apex of the recovery which follows automatically any recession in each four or five year cycle. This is why the opposition can only make general criticisms which consequently are irresponsible. Those criticisms are general and out of context. As we all know the years 1974 and 1975 were the worst years of the recession in our economy since the 30's. In unprecedented and extremely concrete fashion, they reflected for every citizen what happened internationally, events which cannot possibly be underestimated in the restrictive context of a national electoral quarrel—a new planetary awareness both distressing and beneficial at the same time.

The last years have lit up new alarm signals on the controls panel of our planet. We realized as never before the limit of our resources. We noted, even us, the privileged citizens of a wealthy country, a large country new and rich, the fragility of the economic and environmental balance of the world.

We also understood the message of Carl Sagan, the American astronomer and physicist responsible for the message sent to the stars by Mariner 8. Our planet is small and limited and while we are broadening our conscience at the universal level we must look for new forms of organization on this earth and evaluate immediately its resources in the spirit of interdependency so favoured by the economists Galbraith and Myrdal. This is the meaning of the two years of recession which we have just experienced. They mean deep realignments on a world-wide basis between developed and underdeveloped countries, rich and poor ones, young and old ones, heavily populated and almost empty ones such as ours.

In spite of its privileged position in the world, Canada has known the consequences of an economic crisis which has affected every one of its partners. Due to some persistent behaviours of its citizens, especially the rapidly growing significance of wage increases as a deflation factor of the yearly inflation rate, Canada has been prompted to react, to strengthen some controls and to impose others enabling it to anticipate the future and maintain a real stability. By the way, while all or almost all industrialized countries reported a real reduction of their national production, Canada maintained during the past years an average growth of 1 per cent on a two-year basis.

While the unemployment rates were reaching 10 per cent in the United States, including incredible rates of 16 per cent in Connecticut and 23 per cent in the States of New England, Canada for its part was always maintaining unemployment rates lower than 8 per cent. At the same time, the unemployed of our country enjoyed services and benefits whose realism and efficiency drew the admiration of all industrialized countries. For me, the general criticism expressed by the opposition in its motions of non-confidence are shabby and show an alarming chauvinism. They form, I think, an incredible condemnation of the policy carried out by the majority of our major commercial partners in the free world that were unable to match the stability of Canada in the recent crisis.

Indeed, if the opposition is not satisfied with an actual increase in the purchasing power of Canadian citizens, a real employment growth, a gradual increase in oil prices and a sustained national productivity, I wonder what strong criticisms they would make as regards the American government which enables the United States to undergo a real slowdown in productivity, the Japanese government which had to face inflation rates ranging from 10 to 20 per cent and the British government which must constantly appeal to the International Monetary Fund to keep afloat what is left of the strong pound sterling. I wonder what else the opposition want and to what model they were referring when they restlessly attacked the behaviour of the government of Canada during the recent events.

They were probably referring to a hypothetical country located in a solar system with which they are the only ones to maintain a constant relationship. I humbly suggest that Canada got out of the recent crisis with distinction and that the Canadian government was largely responsible for the relatively good performance of our economy through its strong and responsible approaches which were constantly adjusted to reality rather than to the requirements of a restrictive theory. And this year, it continues to act according to its principles.

We might have, between two alternatives, either applied brakes and more severely restricted our expenditures by relying on the economy recovery to ensure as best as we could a fair distribution of wealth. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said, this would have amounted to clearly ignoring the most disadvantaged segments of society whose improving status necessarily depends on suppletive government action. Or we might have brought forward a largely expansionist budget, ignoring the fact that we can expect a better recovery than was forecast in Canada, under the pretence of stimulating our weakened economy.

But we had to respect the traditional balance of the economy. We decided not to feed inflation thanks to expansionist measures and important tax reductions, but at the same time not to demand further sacrifices from the citizens, under the pretence that consumption has remained at a high level and that it is impossible to cut expenditures that are attributed to it in our society.

This budget strikes a difficult balance between expansion and belt-tightening. It is an intermediate budget, with significant amounts still allocated to items that will require less funds starting from next year because the effort is done now. It also takes into account the real and significant results obtained mainly through the Anti-Inflation Board. It is now projected the inflation rate for 1976 will be below 8 per cent, certainly a more acceptable figure than the 11 or 9 per cent figures of preceeding years. This budget takes into account the key action by the Anti-Inflation Board since its inception. It also introduces a delicate transition before the termination and change of certain programs, and finally it undertakes major structural changes originating from important policy statements such as those made by the Economic Council of Canada.

I would like to stress at this point why this budget seems to me both acceptable and in line with certain major aspects of the situation in Quebec, namely economic development—more especially that of small and medium businesses—the improvement of manpower programs and progressive changes in the employment insurance, and finally the energy issue. On the matter of economic development, I note firstly that this budget does not affect the regional development incentives programs.

Despite the significant progress experienced during the 1970-74 economic cycle, and the bulk of favourable trends now experienced by the Quebec economy, that province is still faced with important structural problems that were keenly emphasized in the last DREE report in March 1976. Although Quebec has caught up in real terms on most aspects, its economy is still plagued by traditional industrial traits that must be rapidly changed to bring the province to the level of Ontario or the Canadian average.

We may therefore hope in that context that all this year and all along the 1976-1977 fiscal year the DREE programs take into account that basic requirement, by allocating significant funds to industrial reconstruction efforts that are complemented at the provincial level by a determined and specific action policy. However, I see in this budget a special emphasis on the growth of small and medium businesses, clearly the ones that denote the highest level of local and regional enterprise.

• (2200)

The provisions designed to increase deductible benefits for tax purposes to $150,000, and set their total amount at $750,000, are first of all a type of realist indexing to the cost of living. But by allowing a business to save up to $10,500 on its tax account for the previous year, the government exceeds indexing and ensures—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock, I must interrupt the hon. member and, as agreed earlier, it is my duty to put forthwith the question to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

The question is on the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On division.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion (Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)) agreed to on division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 2.

At 10.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 11, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF MEETING WITH QUEBEC TO REDEFINE ITS OBJECTIVES WITH CONFEDERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion.

Yesterday, the Quebec Minister of Communications stated that if this government continues to centralize everything, it could, if it remains in power a few years, bring about the split-up of Canadian federalism and Quebec separation.

Since the statement made by an official representative of the Quebec government shows a growing concern among Quebec authorities and consequently among Quebecers generally, and recognizing also the centralizing position of this government which daily threatens the objectives aimed at by the BNA Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That the House unanimously instruct the Prime Minister to call a meeting between the Quebec government and the federal government to reassess the legitimate objectives of the Quebec government within Confederation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROPOSAL THAT COMPANY GRANT PENSIONERS AN INCREASE EQUAL TO THAT GRANTED BY CANADIAN NATIONAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion to which I hope the House will agree. It is of urgent and pressing necessity so far as many persons are concerned. The delay in the submitting of the report by Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions ought not to delay action with respect to the pensions of those who are now retired. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House calls on the government to urge the CPR to grant to its pensioners an increase at least equal to the increase granted recently by the CNR to its retired employees and their survivors.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

● (1110)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota. As the International Joint Commission will not complete its report until October 31, 1976 on the effects the Garrison diversion project will have on polluting Manitoba waters and on Tuesday, June 15, additional moneys will be requested from the House of Representatives in Washington for further construction of the project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs contact President Ford and request a moratorium and that no further funds be allotted to the project until IJC files its report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

RECOMMENDATION THAT NO APPOINTMENT BE MADE TO REPLACE MRS. PLUMPTRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Mrs. Beryl Plumptre has resigned as vice-chairman of the government's Anti-Inflation Board, and in view of the fact that her reasons, apart from personal ones, included an obvious disenchantment with the growing bureaucracy of the anti-inflation program and the obvious ineffectiveness of the program in controlling prices, and in view of the fact that recently the Minister of Agriculture chided members of this House for not making recommendations to the government for the appointment of a top official of the Farm Credit Corporation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House recommends to the government that no appointment be made to replace Mrs. Beryl Plumptre on the Anti-Inflation Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

RESIGNATION OF MRS. PLUMPTRE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESTORE CREDIBILITY OF BOARD

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the co-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board resigned on the very day that we saw almost a record increase in the consumer price index. Since one of the original reasons for her nomination as co-chairman of the board was her great credibility with Canadians, especially the consumer, may I ask the Minister of Finance what immediate action, after this serious resignation, is the government prepared to take to restore the credibility of the Anti-Inflation Board with Canadians in general and consumers in particular?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are two questions of fact: in the first place, Mrs. Plumptre was not the co-chairman, but the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board and in the second place the resignation did not occur yesterday. It occurred, I think I am correct in saying, on June 1 or some seven to ten days ago when she indicated in a letter to the Prime Minister that the six month period that had been discussed with her at the time she took on the role, had been reached and for personal reasons she proposed to stand down. With regard to her replacement, there have indeed been some considerations and discussions in this regard and we hope to be able to make an announcement at a very early date.

DATE ON WHICH WAGE CONTRACTS WILL BE REVIEWED—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON PRICE MONITORING

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question. Since the very credibility of the government is at stake here,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Grafftey: —is the minister prepared today to give the House a firm date on which the wage contracts before the board will be reviewed, and because this government has been given specific statutory authority to protect the Canadian consumer, will the minister table a thorough report of price monitoring in order to explain the price increases reported yesterday?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, virtually all of those questions were answered yesterday. The price increases were described very fully by Statistics Canada in the release issued which indicated it was the price of beef and the impact of certain provincial budgetary decisions such as the pricing of tobacco and alcohol which had an effect on the consumer price index in the month of May. With regard to the other details of pricing decisions by the Anti-Inflation Board, from time to time the board issues releases. I would be prepared to make a collection for the hon. gentleman and make certain that they get into his hands so that he can review them.

As to the question of the backlog, as I mentioned to his colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, of course the Board has not proceeded as quickly as it would have liked to in dealing with cases generally, one of the principal reasons being that a number of occasions they have paused to consider fully cases that have raised a lot of public comment, such as the Thompson case. The board has been prepared to go back and talk again to the parties rather than make a final and summary decision. The board will be trying to make its decisions as quickly and effectively as it can. I think the chairman is concerned about seeing that each party who feels he has not been fairly treated will have full opportunity to state his case before the final decision is made.

GOVERNMENT ACTION ON MRS. PLUMPTRE'S RECOMMENDATION FOR NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since Mrs. Plumptre, who resigned yesterday, has on a number of occasions advocated that the government should adopt a national food policy and since in yesterday's price rise, the rise in price of food was a serious consideration especially affecting low income Canadians, will the government now accept Mrs. Plumptre's recommendation to formulate as quickly as possible a national food policy, so that we will not have any other announcements like yesterday's concerning the rise in prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has accepted the importance and priority of formulating a food policy. I will not say that this, necessarily, was Mrs. Plumptre's suggestion, but we are glad to have her support in this regard. As the Minister of Agriculture has indicated many times, it will be valuable and useful both to consumers and producers in Canada if they can have that kind of statement. That is an occupation on which he is now engaged and has been for some time.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF BOARD'S OPERATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. As both labour and consumers have little confidence in the board because at present their interests are not vigorously represented within the board, would the minister, in view of the necessity of fully disclosing the operations of the board to the public, arrange the immediate referral of the administration of the board to a committee of the House, which would call witnesses and hear evidence in order to assess the board's performance and the resources it enjoys for doing its job? I ask this in view of existing circumstances.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to correct the hon. gentleman with regard to the membership of the board. There are two labour representatives; one is Mr. Ladyman of Winnipeg, whose lifelong career has been in the labour movement; the other is Mr. Chapman, from Vancouver, whose metier as well has been in the labour area. We will be seeking appointees to the board who have Mrs. Plumptre's specific experience in the consumer area; although I would have to say that the membership of the board generally has been sensitive to consumer concerns, as evidenced by the decisions which have been made.

Finally, with regard to the proposal that the members of the board and its staff should be involved in hearings before a parliamentary committee, it seems to me that, following the line taken by several members opposite, it would be much more valuable if their time was spent dealing with the problem of inflation in Canada rather than in conducting another set of hearings.

REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF PROGRAM FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the minister's attitude to full disclosure, which I think is surprising, particularly as the board has a mandate to advise on general and structural policy changes necessary to contain inflation after the controls come off. Mrs. Plumptre's resignation having further narrowed the coterie of post-control advisers available to the government, is the government prepared to open up this process and advise the House what options are now being considered and who in the government is doing this important work? Perhaps it will disclose, as it ought to—this is the hallmark of a free democratic society—what is to happen in the post-control period. Or, is the post-control period so far down the road that there is no point in doing it now? Is that the position of the government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question of full disclosure, the chairman of the board and other representatives have appeared before the standing committee, to discuss their work in detail and in more general terms. If the hon. member feels that was not adequate, then that, of course, is a reflection on his own colleagues rather than on the government's willingness to make these people available.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The situation now is different.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of the discussions concerning the post-controls period, we will, of course, be meeting many groups in the community and it will be the government's intention in the coming session to set before parliament and the country the kinds of options and considerations we will have to take into account in the period after the controls come off. We have set ourselves a specific period for the controls program. That period should give parliament and the country time in which to reflect on some of the important changes which may be necessary in the post-controls period.

POSSIBILITY MRS. PLUMPTRE MADE RECOMMENDATIONS ON LEADERSHIP OF BOARD AND ITS PRICE CONTROL POLICY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister said that Mrs. Plumptre told the government six months ago she would only take the job for six months, it is strange that she would call a press conference to say exactly what she had told the government six months ago. Surely this press conference is bound up with the fact that she is not pleased with the manner in which this anti-inflation program has been put into place. Can the minister or the Prime Minister tell this House whether Mrs. Plumptre made recommendations to the government, the Prime Minister or the minister with regard to the leadership of the Anti-Inflation Board, its consumer policy or the control of prices? Did she make any such recommendations during the past six months?

● (1120)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can say quite categorically there were none with regard to the leadership of the Anti-Inflation Board. My observation would be that there has been a very close, cordial and effective collaboration between the chairman and the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board. As to what she may say about her reasons for resigning, it would probably be a better idea to let her speak for herself rather than put words in her mouth. I suspect she may have concluded that the personal reasons for her leaving might have been misconstrued by the malicious in some way and she would like to dispel that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): It is obvious that Mrs. Plumptre intends to go out with a bang rather than a whimper. She has chosen a time when food prices are escalating as well as the bureaucracy of the government's anti-inflation program. Does the government intend to implement any of the recommendations of the final report of the Food Prices Review Board which Mrs. Plumptre has fought for since becoming involved in the Food Prices Review Board and the Anti-Inflation Program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I say again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is seeking to put words in her mouth. Why not let her speak for herself? With regard to the recommendations under her leadership as chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, these indeed are an important part of the government's consideration in relation to food policy.

SUGGESTION REPLACEMENT FOR MRS. PLUMPTRE BE OFFERED LOWER SALARY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): We are not trying to put words into Mrs. Plumptre's mouth. We are trying to get the government to tell us whether the program is indeed foundering. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether in seeking a replacement for Mrs. Plumptre he will honour the attempt to tighten up the belt in this country and offer a reduced wage in order to attract someone who can better reflect the consumer interests of this country, a wage that is more in line with his attempts to fight inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find this line of questioning absolutely preposterous. The Minister of Finance has repeatedly said, let the lady speak for herself, which she is obviously able to do. If the hon. member is intimating in some way that the wage is the cause of her resignation, that it is related to our ability to entice other people to the board and that the lady has been overpaid, I wish the hon. member would put that to her directly and see what her answer would be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RESIGNATION OF MRS. PLUMPTRE—ACTION ON RECOMMENDATION FOR MONITORING SYSTEM FOR MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since it now appears obvious to everybody but the minister that Mrs. Plumptre's timing exemplifies in a very dramatic way her frustration over her inability to get this government to act on the prices issue, will the minister advise what action the Anti-Inflation Board and the government are taking on one of the recommendations made by Mrs. Plumptre with respect to a monitoring system of marketing boards in Canada and some agreement with the provinces in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, having been the person who first spoke to Mrs. Plumptre about taking on this assignment, I feel I must at least dispel the suggestion put in the first part of the question. When I first approached Mrs. Plumptre in October, her first answer was negative. I would rather not put these matters before the House because they are of a confidential nature. But in face of two opposition parties which really are fabricating a whole series of interpretations which are completely opposed to the truth, I feel I must say that at first Mrs. Plumptre refused, because of family and personal reasons, to accept the assignment. Finally, she took it on but made it quite clear she would resign within a period of a few months—that she was only taking the job to help in the transition. Wait to hear the results of the press conference, Mr. Speaker, but I am stating the facts as they happened. She made it clear at the outset that she would resign in a few months. If her resignation now comes as a surprise to the opposition, it certainly has not come as a surprise to the government. The timing, if anything, was favourable to the government because Mrs. Plumptre stayed on longer than she said at first she would. Her letter of resignation was dated June 1, before the figures of the last consumer price index were known, and I therefore repeat that this whole line of questioning, if not malicious, is extremely ignorant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE STUDY ON FOOD POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps had the Prime Minister shown a little less ignorance of this subject he would still have Mrs. Plumptre. I would remind the right hon. gentleman that yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister regarding the activities of the interdepartmental committee on food policy, and the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister expressed complete ignorance. Yet, as reported at page 7482 of Hansard for July 11, 1975, in reply to a similar question, the Minister of Agriculture said this:

> Mr. Speaker, the committee is active. I can say this: if the hon. member has any constructive suggestions, we would like to hear them.

Can the Prime Minister now inform the House whether there is an interdepartmental study going on with regard to a comprehensive food policy and if so is he prepared to tell us what proposals this committee has made to the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member would refer to the white paper published on October 13 he would see that one of the four lines of attack on inflation concerned the need for structural changes in the area of food, housing and energy. Announcements concerning policies in these three areas have been made and more will continue to be made.

* * *

[Translation]

MANPOWER

THE ALLEGED WRONGFUL USE OF FUNDS FOR MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is the minister aware that in some provinces manpower training courses are used to denigrate free enterprise, to promote divorce, abortion, the abolition of capital punishment and homosexuality? Although I realize that the minister may not be aware of this, will he order an investigation and recommend that provinces take action so that the federal funds for manpower training serve the purpose of the emancipation of workers and not destruction and negativism?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am really at a loss for words. But I will take note of the hon. member's vehement representation and try to trace this suggestion to its source.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FEDERAL POSITION PAPERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question, of which I have given notice, is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the crucial Conference of First Ministers which is to begin on Monday. I know that members of the press are to be briefed on Monday morning with respect to the federal position papers, prior to the next sitting of the House. Will the Prime Minister undertake to table these papers today so that Members of Parliament may have an opportunity to study the federal position?

● (1130)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to table the federal position papers on Monday at two o'clock. The custom, a long established one, has been that position papers of either the provincial or federal governments for federal-provincial conferences should not be released in advance, and would not be released in advance unless there were agreement from the parties that that could and should be done. Obviously, the federal government acting alone would have no objection to tabling this paper now, but I feel that this would be somewhat of a breach of faith with the custom established with the provinces.

In fact, my office has received representations from at least four provinces following a partial leak which I understand occurred a few days ago, from we do not know what source. These representations are to the effect that we should not release these position papers. The premiers wanted to be in a position on Monday to react to them and not be forced to react to them before that time because of the release of the federal position papers. This has been the custom in the past.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While I appreciate the Prime Minister's reply and understand that position, given that copies of these proposals are already in public circulation and the further fact that the press will be briefed and made aware of them at nine o'clock on Monday morning prior to the tabling in the House of Commons, would the Prime Minister undertake to canvass the provinces again on this matter to see whether or not their agreement to tabling these documents later today could be achieved?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether between now and four o'clock it would be likely that we would reach every premier and get his consent to do this. I do not see what great advantage the opposition would get from having them at four rather than on Monday. What was leaked to the press—and I have not seen it—certainly could not be the final document, which was worked on until very recently. So, therefore, let us assume that the premiers will have first look, at I believe 9.30 on Monday morning, at what is to be the final version of the federal document. I would certainly agree at that stage to give copies to the hon. lady and to any other members of the opposition who would want to take cognizance of it before the document was actually tabled in Parliament at two, presuming that the House would not object to our releasing it to some members before it was tabled in the House as a whole.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR DELAY IN LAYING OF UNDERWATER POWER CABLE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PAYMENT OF EXTRA COSTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can the minister state whether the installation of the underwater power cable to Prince Edward Island has run into unforeseen delay and, if so, what is the cause of the delay; and can the minister also say whether there is still any possibility of this cable coming into service on schedule?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed we are having a small problem which I trust will only be temporary and will not cause too much delay in the installations of the cable. Some time in the last few days, a small incident occurred when the manufacturer of the cable was getting ready to load it in Sweden for shipment to Canada. The cable was damaged but technical teams are now evaluating those damages and how long it will take to repair it before shipping it to Canada. It may be that this will cause some delay and, for the time being, we are not sure how long that delay may be and whether it will affect the laying down of the cable which was to go into operation in the fall. Within a week or two I should be in a position to say more specifically what effect the incident in question will have on the installation of the cable.

[English]

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether any additional cost involved will fall on the Swedish contractor or on Canadian taxpayers?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, if any costs are involved at the production level so far as fixing the cable and keeping the cable in good shape is concerned, no doubt such costs will be borne by the producer of the cable.

Oral Questions

CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES

ALLEGEDLY INFERIOR QUALITY OF VACCINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAINTAIN STANDARDS

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of continuing concern expressed about Connaught Laboratories by a former employee, Dr. Andrew Moriarty, regarding the quality of vaccines and other biologicals produced by that firm, and recognizing that Connaught is owned by the Canadian government through the Canada Development Corporation, can the minister assure the House that the government, through the health protection branch, holds Connaught Laboratories to the same high standards, regulations and controls as other pharmaceutical manufacturing companies?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Absolutely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the House what action is being taken to verify or deny the validity of Dr. Moriarty's reports, and with particular regard to the effectiveness of various viral vaccines produced by Connaught, is anything specifically being done to test them in view of the charge that perhaps the polio vaccine which we have is not as effective as we all thought it might be?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, Connaught Laboratories are in exactly the same situation as any other firm in Canada, subject to examination and control by the health protection branch of my department.

* * *

INDIAN AFFAIRS

USE OF MERCURY CONTAMINATED FISH BY NATIVES IN AREA OF ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE OTHER SOURCES OF PROTEIN

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I presume that the minister has seen and probably read a report prepared by officials of his department and the Department of National Health and Welfare recommending that subsidies be paid to Indians on the English-Wabigoon river system to provide protein substitutes for mercury polluted fish which is still being eaten for lack of any substitute in the area. Would the minister either make a statement now, or if he has not had time to look into the matter fully would he make a statement at an early date in the House, stating what the federal government proposes to do about this suggestion, either in consultation with the provincial government or on its own, so as to deal with this serious threat to the health of those affected?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the report contains several recommendations; for example the program to provide alternate fish by fishing for them in the lakes themselves rather than having them flown in from other centres; the institution of subsidies; and programs for economic development. However, the first point that the report made was to strongly recommend that none of these programs be instituted without full and complete consultation with the two Indian bands directly involved and with the provincial government. That is the step we are now taking; we are discussing the contents of the report with the Indian people and the provincial government.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is going through this process of consultation would he report to this House what this government proposes to do?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to make that information available.

* * *

TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN SUBSIDY FOR CLARKE STEAMSHIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is posed to the Minister of Transport, and in doing so may I express to him my sincere thanks for taking time out of a very busy schedule to visit the port of North Sydney to meet with union reps and others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: I am sure he now has a much greater appreciation of the facilities that we have there. Can the minister advise the House whether Clarke Steamships Limited have applied for an increase in subsidy beyond the over $7 million that they have now received to carry freight to St. John's, Newfoundland through the ports of Halifax and Montreal, to the detriment of the port of North Sydney?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would want to check to see whether this could be classed as an application. I am sure there were explorations of possible increases; however, there has been no decision to grant any such increase.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that by providing government subsidies from taxpayers' money to private shipping corporations that apparently cannot operate on a profit basis on their own merit, when at the same time East Coast Marine Ferry Services, a CN subsidiary, has ships lying idle, the government is contributing to an already unbearable unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island, where our stevedores are walking the streets and our work force has been reduced?

● (1140)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the situation. Of course, the hon. member ought not to ignore the very significant sums of money by way of subsidy covering losses which are paid on the North Sydney-Port-aux-Basques line.

An hon. Member: That's why you should run your own ship.

Mr. Lang: The question of alternate subsidies really came up as part of the effort in the battle of matching one subsidy with another, a general policy which I have stood against, but which is not necessarily easy to reverse when it involves a matter of a constitutional arrangement.

* * *

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF CLOTHING AND TEXTILE BOARD ON POLYESTER YARN

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and in his absence I trust his parliamentary secretary will handle it. The question is urgent and pertains to the Canadian textile industry which is now in a severely depressed state because of the damaging importation of offshore low-costs imports. A major recommendation has been made to the minister by the Clothing and Textile Board with regard to polyester yarn and filament. This recommendation has been in his hands now for five weeks. The minister promised to table it in the House and give his answer within 15 days of the time of its receipt by him. Can we be assured that this will be tabled soon?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the situation in the textile industry is now undergoing a complete review at the hands of an ad hoc committee which was set up five weeks ago at the request of textile industries. A report will be tabled on the matter by the end of June.

* * *

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance try to determine from the Vice-Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board how she has managed to seduce to her support the very opposition parties and members who were violently opposing her appointment last October?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

TRANSPORT

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE—POSSIBILITY OF HEARINGS TO CONSIDER REVIVAL OF ABANDONED SERVICES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, now that the rabble has quietened down I would address my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that hearings on existing passenger rail services in Canada are being held, will the minister tell the House whether the ministry has any intention of examining presently abandoned passenger rail services in areas of Canada which could possibly sustain passenger rail services, in order to determine whether they should be revived?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it will be our intention to look at potential rail passenger services as well as going through the present exercise, which is examining passenger services in place. They are separate exercises, of course, but certainly it is our view that as passenger rail services demonstrate themselves in various locations there will be new possibilities of renewed services in areas where they no longer exist.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that statements made thus far would indicate that hearings are being held only on existing rail services, and in view of the fact that the minister has received representations from unions, from this member and others that the Kettle Valley line be reviewed, how does this particular decision that rail services in Kettle Valley not be examined at this time square with the minister's statement that they are proposing a total examination of Canadian rail passenger services? In fact, will the minister assure the House that the Kettle Valley line and the people concerned will have an opportunity to provide the Ministry of Transport through the transport committee with input?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must have missed my earlier answer in which I indicated that these two things will be done but they are separate exercises. The current exercise is one of looking at existing services to determine which of them should, indeed, be retained. I am, indeed, pleased to receive representations from many sources about various services which are now being studied, and also those which are not in existence and where a case might be made for them.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO STIFFEN PENALTIES FOR THOSE WHO POLLUTE RIVERS AND LAKES—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Last week the minister's parliamentary secretary, after continual prodding on my part—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: —stated that the government is considering the introduction and implementation of stiffer penalties to industries and municipalities which continue to dump excessive pollutants into our rivers and lakes, and I was specifically referring to the Great Lakes. In view of the fact that the very costly cleanup of these lakes has fallen sadly behind schedule, and because of a continuing and alarming increase of large quantities of dangerous chemicals, such as PCB, which incidentally is known to cause cancer, can the minister now advise this House what these stiffer penalties will be, who they will affect and when will they be implemented?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): In general terms, Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member, who gave me verbal notice of his question, for which I thank him, is aware of the press release issued a couple of days ago concerning PCB. PCB will be prohibited in Canada everywhere, except in respect of some electrical materials. There was an exception made for electrical materials for obvious reasons; because a technological substitute for this product has not been found. On the other hand, most of the products which contain PCB for electrical materials come from the United States, and we have to work with the United States in order to eliminate this very noxious material, and that is what we are doing now.

ACTION TO REDUCE AMOUNT OF PCB IN GREAT LAKES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, the minister is aware that four times the amount of PCB from electrical uses gets into the Great Lakes from the air. Therefore, I wonder whether his department has given any consideration or thought to further research on the matter, and where does the department stand on this situation as far as the United States is concerned? In other words, when can we expect some steps to be taken on the electrical question, which is primarily the reason for PCB pollutants in the Great Lakes?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Of course, Mr. Speaker, the question is not limited to PCB, but all other pollutants in the atmosphere and in the water. This was discussed with Mr. Train when he visited with me about two or three weeks ago. In July we are supposed to meet with the Great Lakes committee and with the Minister of the Environment for Ontario to see what other steps we can take to reduce PCB, mercury and phosphates, and generally clean up the Great Lakes as much as possible.

* * *

PUBLIC WORKS

AUTHORITY OF MR. GALLACHER TO SERVE EVICTION NOTICES TO PROPERTY OWNERS IN PICKERING AREA

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on June 8, as recorded at page 14269 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works, asking whether there was governor in council authority for the activities of Mr. Gallacher in the Pickering area. I am wondering whether he can now advise that this authority exists?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the action taken was under the Expropriation Act which authorizes the minister to issue notices and documents of this character in connection with expropriation proceedings, and does not require an order in council.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

SUGGESTION COMPANY GRANT SAME INCREASE TO PENSIONERS AS CANADIAN NATIONAL HAS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the delay in the submitting by Dr. Noel Hall of his report on railway pensions is disturbing to many pensioners who had hoped that by now something would have been done for them, and in view of the fact that the CNR has granted a small increase in the pensions of its retired employees and their survivors, will the minister have a serious talk with the CPR to try to persuade that organization that it should at least match what the CNR has done?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to carry the hon. member's representation forward, and I am always willing to draw to the attention of the CPR the example of the CNR and ask them to do as well.

* * *

● (1150)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO MR. FERNAND ARCHAMBAULT UPON RETIREMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before continuing with the remainder of the question period I wonder if I might borrow a minute from the schedule, which I will repay to hon. members at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With interest.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps hon. members will allow me to take some time to indicate to them that today marks the last day in the House of Commons of one of our distinguished and devoted official stenographers, Mr. Fernand Archambault.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: After 15 years of loyal and valuable services, Mr. Archambault will enjoy a well deserved retirement. I am confident that all hon. members in the House join me in expressing our gratitude and wishing him a very pleasant retirement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

[English]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF TIME NECESSARY TO REDUCE PCB IN GREAT LAKES TO ACCEPTABLE LEVEL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and it relates to the PCB discharge into the Great Lakes. As the minister knows, this chemical, like mercury, is toxic and cumulative as the discharge is released gradually into the water. What is the estimate of his department of the length of time when PCB would be reduced to an acceptable level, presuming the immediate cessation of the PCB influx into the Great Lakes? In other words, how long would it take for the Great Lake PCB content to reach an acceptable level if we could stop dumping this chemical immediately into that body of water?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think only one thing is sure so far as PCB is concerned, and that is to control the sources of PCB. So far as the presence of PCB in the environment is concerned, I think it will be a matter of years before it is reduced to an accepable level.

* * *

[Translation]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH MR. BOURASSA TO SOLVE PROBLEM OF CENTRALIZATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to disturb the right hon. Prime Minister, but I have an important question to ask him. I know he will give me a good answer.

Considering that the president of the Quebec Liberal Party was startled Tuesday by a statement from the Minister of Health, and that the Quebec Minister of Communications stated yesterday that in the current regime there is no doubt that this government could trigger separation, I think it is important in such circumstances to put a question to the Prime Minister. Recent polls prove, considering the circumstances—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member proceed immediately to ask his question?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, in view of those statements from both sides which cause profound concern to Quebecers, I ask whether the Prime Minister would agree to meet his Quebec counterpart to find solutions which might better correspond to the aspirations of Quebec. I do know it is an objective which the Prime Minister would like to achieve as much as I do.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not without knowing that I will meet my Quebec counterpart Monday and probably Tuesday. If he has suggestions to make or discussions to open, of course, they would be welcome.

I cannot comment on the statements which the hon. member claims to quote because I do not know whether they are correct. I know the premier of Quebec never expressed such opinions and in all likelihood the hon. member is unknowingly quoting comments by a Quebec minister. Ah, he is showing a page of a newspaper, Mr. Speaker; that is always the ultimate response of those who spread unsound rumours and gossip. However, let me add that I am encouraged by the fact that the hon. member of the opposition is so concerned about communications between the provincial Liberal party and the federal Liberal party. If that interests him so much, he should come over and join us and we can discuss it.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I do not know if the Prime Minister understands my concern for Quebecers, since on one hand the two political parties are contradicting themselves, and on the other hand the Minister of Communications, who still is an official of the Quebec Liberal Party, said yesterday he wished this government would be defeated as soon as possible in view of its centralizing attitude. Would the Prime Minister like to comment on a similar statement reported in the press—and I think it is accurate—for the benefit of the Quebecers who are also concerned? I believe the Prime Minister should make such a statement.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am in complete agreement. Someone in authority should make a statement, but the point is who it should be. If a minister of the Bourassa government did state that he wished this government would be defeated, I am convinced Mr. Bourassa will disown him very quickly.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you sure?

* * *

ENVIRONMENT AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Certain aspects of it were raised as a motion under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. It has to do with the Garrison Dam project in North Dakota and the possible effects on the Manitoba waters. I am wondering whether or not the Minister of the Environment has communicated to the United State government or to North Dakota officials the uneasiness and apprehension that Manitobans feel with respect to the continuing progress on the Garrison Dam, regardless of the stand and the effect which the International Joint Commission may have on the final outcome. If there had been discussions, could he inform the House of the nature of the discussions and what reply was given by the U.S. government?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to give a clear cut answer because, as the hon. member knows, this problem is before the IJC. I expect a report very soon. I discussed the matter with Mr. Train. They are well aware of the fact that we will resent any action on the part of the U.S. which will have a negative effect in Manitoba. This is all I have to say today while I await the report of the IJC.

GARRISON DIVERSION—SUGGESTION UNITED STATES BE REQUESTED TO DELAY FURTHER CONSTRUCTION AND FUNDING

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As IJC will not complete its report on the Garrison Diversion project until October 31 and it is my understanding that moneys for further construction are to be appropriated before October 31, will the minister request that the U.S. delay further construction or funding until alternatives to the project not resulting in a treaty violation are found? It is my understanding that requests for further funding will be made on Tuesday, June 15, in Washington.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, Mr. Train told me they would not do anything before the report is presented. I will make sure that this is the position of the United States. I will be seeing Mr. Train early in July. I do not think they will do anything in the meantime.

* * *

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF TESTS OF ELECTRONIC PAYMENT SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF STUDY GROUPS ON LEGAL AND CONSUMER ISSUES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On May 21 I brought to the attention of the Minister of Communications that Master Charge and Bank America of the U.S. were test marketing a primitive precursor of an electronic payment system. I tried, somewhat unsuccessfully to determine whether or not the minister was following the introduction of the system in the United States and whether the government was aware of any plans to test market a similar system in Canada. Since that time I learned of the responsibility of the Minister of Finance for government policy in this respect, and I wonder if he can indicate whether he is following the developments in the U.S. and, if so, could he also tell the House whether or not there are similar plans for test marketing even a primitive form of an electronic payment system in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman is quite correct. The government now has underway a careful study of a payments system that will be an historic change in many respects from using negotiable paper instruments to operating, in effect, by a kind of credit card system, and electronic transfer of funds. For this purpose the government has established a number of working groups made up of federal and provincial representatives and representatives of the private sector to define the necessary changes which will be required in our law of negotiable instruments and banking for this purpose and also to define the circumstances under which it will come into effect. I anticipate that it would be a number of years before we would do this, but the preparation is now under way. I think it is not unlikely that for the purposes of experimenting with the system, once it has been determined for Canada, we might want to do a trial run marketing.

● (1200)

Mr. Beatty: Perhaps I could address my supplementary question either to the Minister of Finance or perhaps the Acting Minister of Justice. One year ago on June 25, 1975 the then minister of justice was asked if a special study was being set up on legal and consumer issues arising out of the increasing use of electronic technology in the payment system. I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether a preliminary report has been received from that study group as yet and also whether he can tell the House when a final report is expected from that study group?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A final report has not been received. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has had the opportunity of examining the document—I think the title is "Towards an electronic payment system"—which is the principal document available at this point. A general summary of work of the various committees is that they have the work in process, but they have not as yet produced any documents for publication.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO LIAISON OF BOARD WITH DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, and it deals with the expertise now possessed by the Anti-Inflation Board as opposed to the tribunal activities of the Anti-Inflation Board. Does the AIB have an input into the Department of Finance and the government regarding the problems it faces, apart from making its decisions public, and if so, what kind of liaison is there, and what results are obtained?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been a close liaison, particularly between the staff of the board and officials of the Department of Finance and other government departments. The most extensive liaison at the moment is for the purpose of producing the new regulations with respect to the profit and pricing rules. I understand that the board will be in a position to publish draft regulations early next week dealing with these areas.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

TABLING OF REFERENCE TO ADMINISTRATOR ON COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY OF CANADA

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table, in both official languages, a copy of the reference from the Anti-Inflation Board to the Administrator, under the act, of the collective agreement with respect to the International Nickel Company of Canada, in Thompson, Manitoba.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 4,126, 5,269, 5,404 and 5,449.

[Text]

MOTOR VEHICLE ALLOWANCE FOR MEMBERS OF CABINET

Question No. 4,126—Mr. Jones:

1. Do members of the Cabinet receive a yearly car allowance and, if so, in each case, what was the amount for each year 1965 to date?

2. For the same years (a) what provision was made for the use of an automobile by members of the Cabinet (b) who purchases the automobiles (c) in each case, how many have been purchased (d) what is the cost of operation of the automobiles including chauffeurs, etc.?

3. Is such allowance in addition to the use of a car supplied by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. Provision was made by statute in fiscal year 1930-31 for $2,000 per annum motor vehicle allowance to each minister of the Crown and the Leader of the Opposition (see Senate and House of Commons Act).

2 and 3. See replies to questions 321, Sessional Paper 255, dated December 9, 1968, and 1,037, Hansard 99, page 5839, dated February 24, 1969. Also see the Minutes of Proceedings Issue No. 52 of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates for April 5, 1976 pages 52.8 and 52.9.

Order Paper Questions

INFORMATION TO PARLIAMENT CONCERNING CBC

Question No. 5,269—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the government prepared to review the periodic refusals of the Secretary of State to furnish information to Parliament concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with words contained in answers to various questions: "It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration" and (a) if so, will the government consider making requests for legitimate information concerning the CBC available to Parliament (b) if not, what are the reasons justifying such continued secrecy being applied to a publicly owned corporation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): No. See reply to question 2,530 (Debates No. 200, dated November 6, 1975, page 8913).

NATIONAL WELFARE GRANTS

Question No. 5,404—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. Since the implementation of the National Welfare Grants Programme, how many grants have been allocated to each province?

2. For each year, what amounts have been allocated to each province?

3. What was the number of projects approved in the Constituencies of (a) Témiscamingue (b) Abitibi (c) Villeneuve and, in each case, what was (i) the aggregate amount allocated in grants to each Constituency (ii) the name and purpose of each project?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Newfoundland, 14; Nova Scotia, 45; Prince Edward Island, 23; New Brunswick, 28; Quebec, 87*; Ontario, 161; Manitoba, 34; Saskatchewan, 29; Alberta, 47; British Columbia, 65; Northwest Territories, 13; Yukon Territory, 6; National Organizations, 108.

---

*It should be noted that Quebec did not fully enter into the program until 1968-69.

2. See table below.

3. Two projects (a) Témiscamingue (Rouyn) (i) and (ii) Projet de Développement Social du Nord-Ouest Québecois, 2554-1-11, 1970-1974. ($244,263.87) To encourage the residents of northwestern Quebec to become aware of their community and to establish the machinery that would give them a growing influence on the decisions that affected them through popular participation in local and regional activites. (b) Abitibi—None (c) Villeneuve (Val-d'or) (i) and (ii) Projet: Centre de Référence et d'information, 1972-1974 ($20,423.36) To aid persons with various types of financial problems, to furnish information on types of social assistance available and on welfare rights, and to provide help through advocacy of individual claims.

$ '000

Province	1962/63	1963/64	1964/65	1965/66	1966/67	1967/68	1968/69
Newfoundland	11	9	21	43	8	4	—
Nova Scotia	8	20	61	91	93	115	108
Prince Edward Island	—	—	1	11	36	23	35
New Brunswick	12	10	15	32	12	16	37
Quebec	—	6	22	30	36	47	66
Ontario	57	154	242	463	549	302	359
Manitoba	23	33	77	112	110	184	197
Saskatchewan	18	22	43	61	39	107	131
Alberta	9	21	40	81	48	56	118
British Columbia	19	66	113	196	239	283	299
Northwest Territories	—	—	—	—	28	39	31
Yukon	—	1	—	12	19	20	20
CANADA	—	—	—	—	62	345	300

Order Paper Questions

$ '000

Province	1969/70	1970/71	1971/72	1972/73	1973/74	1974/75	1975/76
Newfoundland	16	15	10	27	29	101	27
Nova Scotia	107	191	173	291	290	553	320
Prince Edward Island	22	27	27	80	70	67	218
New Brunswick	27	31	86	126	88	68	77
Quebec	233	504	489	567	607	999	1,021
Ontario	310	267	309	704	643	548	528
Manitoba	179	213	180	134	78	48	—
Saskatchewan	59	100	127	213	248	139	137
Alberta	139	122	96	187	239	367	199
British Columbia	232	243	238	264	268	318	333
Northwest Territories	60	45	19	—	11	6	5
Yukon	15	—	—	—	—	—	—
CANADA	263	343	268	110	109	285	546

ERECTION OF FENCE AT VICTORIA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 5,449—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. Is a fence being erected at Victoria International Airport and, if so (a) what is the amount spent to date (b) what is its purpose (c) is the project completed and, if not (i) how much fencing remains to be built (ii) when will it be completed (d) what is the total estimated cost?

2. Is the purpose originally intended for this fence being served as matters now stand?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. (a) $161,664.85. (b) To meet the requirements of the National Airports Policing and Security Program to separate aircraft operating area from public access at developed areas near terminal building. (c) (i) The project is complete, but should a deterioration in the (ii) security climate occur, consideration to completely fence the airport would involve a further 9,000 feet of security fencing, at an additional estimated cost of $72,000. (d) Total estimated cost is $161,664.85 to date.

2. Yes.

* * *

[English]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 5,346 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT AIRPORTS—ABANDONED VEHICLES

Question No. 5,346—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the name and location of each Department of Transport operated airport?

2. What is the official DOT policy on abandoned vehicles at such airports?

3. For each such airport, how many abandoned motor vehicles have been reported since January 1, 1975?

[Mr. Lalonde.]

4. Do such vehicles fall to the Crown and, if so, in what manner are they disposed of?

5. Has the government received any revenues from the disposal of such vehicles and, if so, in what amount?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—TRANSPORTATION—"USER PAY" CONCEPT AS DEFINED BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

That this House questions the application of the Department of Transport's "user pay" concept as it applies to "mature and immature" regions of Canada and to different modes of transportation, and urges the minister to clarify the guidelines for implementation of the policy and to explain any alterations contemplated in it.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion I really welcome the opportunity to discuss one of the main obligations of the government, such as governing the country of Canada. Transportation has historically played a very important role in the development of this country. In the last two or three years this government indicated to us that it was going to do something about transportation. Over and over again the government stated that it had a concept which would greatly assist Canada in its development, namely rationalization of our transportation policy. Some years ago, a former minister of transport said that the transportation policy of Canada was in a mess. We all agreed with him, acknowledged his frankness in admitting that, praised him for admitting it and hoped that he would come up with a solution. During the election campaign in June, 1974, the Liberal party pranced across the country suggesting that it had some solutions, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said they were not idle election promises but they were promises to do something about Canada's transportation problems.

In the Speech from the Throne in 1974, the government indicated its desire to see transportation used as an instrument of policy designed to achieve broad national, social and economic objectives. Well, we are still wondering. In fact, on the question of transportation policy today we could ask where we are going. In western Canada, the Stavely commission is studying the cost of moving grain. Also, in western Canada the Hall commission is studying the question of rail line abandonment and the rationalization of trackage. The CTC is travelling across the country hearing briefs with regard to passenger traffic. We wonder where all this is leading us.

As late as June, 1975, the government announced a new transportation policy. The government and the then minister said the principal advice on transportation policy would be in the hands of the government and they were really going to take over much of the role played by the CTC until that time. Now we are in June, 1976, and what have we seen this government actually do? We have a new Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). He has bought the line handed down by, I suppose, the civil service which said that we must work on a "user pay" concept. I have always felt that transportation could serve the people of Canada a great deal better if users had a little more say before they were asked to pay.

● (1210)

Members of the transport committee travelled to Vancouver. One of the things they learned was that the federal government's policy had held back the development of that port. Nearly everybody concerned with the question of transportation into and around Vancouver harbour seemed to admit that. The committee then travelled down to Seattle and saw Canadian produce moving in and out of that port both to and from Canada when much of the goods should have been coming in through Vancouver. Our port facilities and transportation policy on the movement of goods into the port from the centre of the country and the prairies have not kept pace with the need which has been demonstrated in our trading policy with the Pacific rim countries.

What are this government and the Minister of Transport going to do about it? There are numerous commissions studying conditions, of course. We have a country concerned with transportation and productivity, because transportation plays a great part in our economy. It can keep inflation down and increase productivity, or increase costs; so it is important to know which direction the minister is taking. The only conclusion I can come to is that the minister seems bent on increasing freight rates, increasing the cost of air passenger travel, increasing the cost of rail passenger travel and, recently, increasing the cost of shipping.

An article in this morning's Globe and Mail reported that Nova Scotia was complaining about this government's actions in regard to Bill C-61 which will increase the cost of shipping in Canada. Shipping costs went up on the Great Lakes last year, and we have seen rail costs and freight costs go up. All this makes it more difficult for our produce to get to world markets because of a poor and ailing transportation system. We want to know what the government is going to do about it. How are they going to apply the "user pay" concept?

In June, 1975, a policy was announced which spoke of "mature and immature" areas. What does that mean? What are "immature" areas? At various times in committee the minister stated that subsidies would have to paid in immature areas, but in areas where competition had matured, competition would take care of the cost and no subsidy would be necessary. The government did away with some of the subsidies for the maritimes with regard to the movement of freight, so I suppose they consider it a mature area. I am sure it is not considered that way by many of the people living in the maritimes and attempting to do business there. This government has failed to clearly enunciate what they mean by "user pay" and what they mean by "mature and immature" areas. I hope the minister takes the opportunity to explain to the House and to the country what he means by the use of those terms in the national transportation policy.

It is not good enough for the government to suggest that they are going to do something about rail passenger service, or to think that giving $30 million to the CPR is going to bring about any great improvement. We know that 3.4 million people travel in what is commonly referred to as the Quebec-Windsor corridor. In 1974 the government had a grandiose scheme to set up a transportation authority for passenger traffic, something like Amtrak in the United States. But they have not done it. Instead, they proclaimed loudly that the $167 million subsidy for rail passenger traffic was too high.

They say they are going to adopt the "user pay" concept and that people who use a certain mode of transportation will have to pay for it. They do not mention that the government operates something like 86 airports and loses $243 million in maintaining them. Some time ago the minister suggested that under the "user pay" concept landing fees would have to be increased. If fees were increased for all the smaller planes using airports, that would in no way pay for the cost of maintaining those airports.

When he announced the new transportation policy, the minister also stated that the government was going to increase competition with Air Canada. In November, 1975, I asked him if this meant that the 25 per cent formula that controls CP Air would be done away with. Earlier this spring I asked the same question in the transport committee, and the minister replied that they were trying to find a way of removing the 25 per cent formula and allowing CP Air to grow. But we still have no clearcut explanation of how this will come about.

In 1965 we had a regional air policy that was designed to promote the growth of clearly established regional airlines. We have five regional airlines in Canada and have built up a huge number of primary air carriers, sometimes referred to as third-level carriers, but as yet the government has not announced any policy with regard to them. All this uncertainty with regard to freight rates, air passenger traffic and costs is cause for a great deal of apprehension to the users of our modes of transportation. Is the "user pay" concept going to apply fairly to all modes of transportation?

Transportation Policy

When the new transportation policy was announced in June, 1975, the Department of Transport stated that buses were the only mode of transportation not subsidized. One could argue that buses receive a tremendous subsidy through the maintenance of our highways. In fact, figures released recently suggest that all users of highways only pay for about 67 per cent of the cost of maintaining them. Buses make good use of the highways and they perform efficiently. In the "user pay" concept, will the government step in and ensure it is applied fairly to bus, rail and air traffic?

Ottawa has been the centre of a very recent experiment in the movement of passengers, Mr. Speaker. The government set up an experimental STOL service between Ottawa and Montreal which lost a great deal of money. Although the service is discontinued, we do not know if the government intends to reintroduce it. We have not been told. This leads to uncertainty.

● (1220)

The government wants to set up a new kind of rail passenger service between Ottawa and Montreal, Montreal and Windsor, and Montreal and Toronto, but has not specified clearly what it intends to do. We are entering an era of high energy costs, but the government has not spelled out clearly which mode of travel it prefers or how that mode will be developed or even financed. We do not know the government's direction. If we bound into one volume all the press releases the Department of Transport has put out in the past ten years, we would have an encyclopaedia of the government's good intentions. But the government has done few of the things set out in glowing terms in those news releases.

The minister said quite clearly that Air Canada may lose some of its shorter routes. Apparently, regional airlines, including CP Air, will be allowed to bid on some shorter routes. If it is found that regional carriers need less subsidy to operate such routes, Air Canada will lose them. To me, that will be a step in the wrong direction. As it is, too many airlines are operating in the United States. There has been some attempt to trim the fat off airline operations in that country. Here, in Canada, the government's move may encourage the proliferation of airlines. Instead of dealing with one airline in trouble, some day we may have to deal with six or seven all in trouble.

What is the government's policy on freight movement? The Minister of Transport has created much apprehension on the prairies and in western Canada generally. Many people in western Canada suspect him of being in bed with the CPR and of being in favour of getting rid of the Crowsnest pass rates. Some time ago he said in Edmonton that the Crowsnest pass rates had to go; it was only a matter of time.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The hon. lady is pounding her desk. Apparently she supports the minister.

Mr. Paproski: The next minister is clapping her hands.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mrs. Campagnolo: Someone has to do something for the north.

Mr. Horner: I do not mind seeing Liberal members clap their hands when it is suggested that the minister suggested the Crowsnest pass rates have to go. At least that clears the air. We on the prairies, particularly those in the minister's province, want to know the Liberal party's intentions with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates. If we know the government's position, the uncertainty will disappear.

In 1974 the government convened the western economic opportunities conference in Calgary. Western Canadian representatives presented their ideas concerning railway tracks. The government has not acted. We have seen no answers and few results. The government said it would devise a system for grouping commodities with a view to bringing about more favourable freight rates. There was much talk, but that is all. So far as we know the conference brought few results and answered few western Canadian complaints about the movement of goods.

Mr. Paproski: The government does not care.

Mr. Horner: The minister has said in the past that freight rates governing the movement of goods west should not be greater than those governing the movement of goods from central Canada to Vancouver. But this policy has not been implemented. It still costs more to ship from Hamilton to Calgary than from Hamilton to Vancouver. We have heard much talk but we have seen little action in this regard.

Some time ago the Canadian Transport Commission studied the movement of rapeseed, but its findings were not released. The minister said he would make a decision on the matter. He did, but that decision is not clear. He said certain discrepancies must be eliminated and the rate gap narrowed. But he wanted to move up the bottom rates rather than bring down the top. That did not suit the people of western Canada, who still wonder what the minister's policy is with regard to freight movement. In North America the natural flow of traffic has been from north to south, and vice versa, rather than from east to west. Perhaps that accounts for some of our difficulties.

As we see it, transportation in this country must play a vital role in making our economy sound—and developing the various regions of Canada economically so that, in competition with one another, they will be able to grow and better serve central Canadian—indeed, all Canadian consumer markets. As we see it, also, this government's policies have created much apprehension and solved few of our difficulties. Supposedly, it enunciated a new policy one year ago. It talks a great deal about the concept of users paying for service. I say that users should have more say in these matters.

It talks of certain mature and immature regions, but does not define what those terms mean. At present, shippers and manufacturers do not always know if they are entitled to a subsidy. In this country we have traditional subsidies coming under the Maritime Freight Rates Act in the maritimes and the Crowsnest pass rates in western Canada. But the minister has already said that the Crowsnest pass rates in western Canada are to be reviewed. That has created much apprehension. I suggest that the minister should explain in greater detail exactly what he intends.

Two years ago the government talked of introducing a new transportation act, because the original act passed in 1967 can no longer serve Canada adequately. We are still awaiting that new transportation act, which I suppose would incorporate policies the government announced over one year ago. Perhaps if this session continues another year the government may introduce the bill.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to put before the House some answers to questions asked throughout the country concerning the transportation policy of the government as now being developed. Transportation in Canada is most important. For that reason, what we do in transportation is most important as well. Because transportation is costly, it is a large item affecting the over-all cost of living of Canadians. Therefore, if we manage our transport system badly we shall lose a great deal of money.

I want to talk today particularly about the cost of transportation and where our policy with regard thereto has taken us so far. When my predecessor, the now Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), said several years ago that transportation in this country was a mess, he did not mean that people involved in transportation in Canada were doing their job badly. He did not mean that about the people involved in the various modes of transportation. He did not even mean that about the people inside government departments who work on various aspects of transportation policy and issues. What he meant to say was that the policy was a mess, that the conglomeration of approaches to transportation in Canada which had developed over the years was full of inconsistencies and contradictions, that it had built into Canada tremendous costs in the way of non-productive expenditure that was in fact counterproductive.

● (1230)

He pointed the finger, in the bold way he has, directly at government as having the responsibility, at least today, to put the situation right, even though, clearly, the problem he was speaking about was the conglomeration of problems of governments year after year and over many decades in Canada. In his bold way, as well, my predecessor began the work of putting right the mess in transportation. Last summer he put before the House and the people of Canada the broad outline of the analysis of our transportation difficulties and the broad direction in which we ought to go in order to find solutions. I want to make it very clear that in pursuing this work I feel a complete consonance, a complete "in-tuneness" with my predecessor in the work he has done. I express my gratitude to him for the way in which he began it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I have been saying all across this country that we have to be realistic about our transportation costs. This has been translated into the expression that the user pay. I want to put that expression clearly before the House in the proper context. The proper context is that transportation costs are real and someone must pay them. Those who do not think the user should pay have to appreciate that they are pointing the finger and saying that someone else should pay. If you do not like the expression "user pay", you have to defend the proposition that the non-user ought to pay for transportation costs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: That term "non-user" can, of course, be put in other ways. He can be called the taxpayer. It can be the taxpayer who is supposed to pay part of the cost. However, those politicians who like to make it appear that by fighting "user pay" they are fighting against and eliminating high costs to the great advantage of the country, are deluding themselves and the country. It leads to the continuance of the very kind of patchwork policies, suitable to particular political demands, which created the mess in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Those patchwork policies were frequently devised, and subsidies piled one on top of another, in answer to particular political demands which by themselves were popular in meeting a particular cause of a particular individual. It did not change the cost to the country. It had the impact over the years of unnecessarily increasing the total cost to the taxpayer, building a transportation system more costly than it otherwise would have been. It is to put this right that we are now launched upon the reform of transportation policy.

I want hon. members, particularly on this side of the House, to appreciate that this exercise will not be easy. These particular band-aids went on as political offerings to meet a particular demand for a particular area. There is a good deal of attachment to those band-aids and a good deal of fear about the pain that will be involved, as it will, every time you remove a band-aid.

We will only be able to succeed in improving our transportation policy in Canada, and thereby our transportation system with our dollars, if we are prepared to be strong enough to stand up politically and draw the picture of what we are trying to accomplish in terms of removing the band-aids, not individually but one by one, in order to remove them in total so that the body politic of transportation in the end can be healthier as a result of removing the band-aids rather than covering them over with more political band-aids.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I want to make it clear that there are very good reasons in this country for direct policy action to accomplish particular ends. Direct policy action to improve regional development is clearly an objective that this government asserts. Redistribution of wealth is another objective which this government asserts. However, generally speaking we will be better off if we try to accomplish those objectives directly instead of hiding an apparent accomplishment of those objectives behind a transportation distortion and subsidy program. That is the point I am trying to make.

The point is that these distortions in transportation costs in fact lead to distortions in production and a higher total cost in Canada. For example, it may be effective to the producer of grain on the prairies to have a low freight rate. There is, simultaneously, a more normal cost-reflecting rate on meat which might be produced from that grain. That is a serious disadvantage to the prairie region, in terms of the encouragement of the shipment to Japan and Italy of grain instead of the shipment to those markets and the creation in those markets of a demand for our beef, pork and similar products. The substitution of meat for grain might create jobs in processing and development, the very things that the prairie region wants. Does it, therefore, prefer the shipment of grain because the cost to the shipper is lower by shipping it in that form than shipping it as beef? The important point here is that the cost to the country is significantly greater to move eight pounds of barley from the middle of Saskatchewan to Vancouver than it is to move one pound of beef. The rates may be lower, but the cost to the country is higher. Therefore, there may be an inducement to that kind of movement. Indeed, if they are much lower than the real cost reflected rate, they tend to that artificial result.

Not only do we defeat our broad purpose of being productive by producing where it is best, ideally, by economics to produce, especially when that is an area where we want to develop population, jobs and secondary industry in processing, but we end up spending more money on transportation than we would have to spend if we went about the system correctly and in a balanced way.

An hon. Member: You have not created any markets for beef.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member says we have not created markets for beef. We have not. That is because of this very kind of disincentive which has stood in the way of real encouragement to production.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I wish to make another very complicated point as clear as I can. I am referring to the value of the Crowsnest pass rates which I have been, obviously, discussing with regard to the low rates on grain. I want to say something about that and some very special arrangements in this country, such as the arrangement entered into with Newfoundland at the time it joined confederation when a particular and special treatment was accorded that province with regard to the movement of goods between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. That may indeed, in that sense, be rather sacred. The sacredness of the constitutional agreement with Newfoundland obviously stands. The sacredness of the tradition with regard to the Crowsnest pass is well known. But the point I am making—and I have made it in the west—is that if we have to do these things in accordance with our obligation to a region, it should be open to us to consider whether we can do them more directly rather than indirectly in the area of transportation. I have, therefore, said with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates that if this benefit were conferred more directly, and if we did not pin it on the rates, we would not only benefit the region as much in terms of dollars, but a lower-cost over-all transportation system would be brought about because we would be shipping the goods which it makes more sense to ship, instead of goods which are shipped because of the artificially lower rate upon those goods.

● (1240)

In the west this is understood—only they refer to other matters. They say the low rates on ores and the higher rates on finished products are disincentives to the refining of those products in the west. Obviously, that is true, and it is exactly the kind of case I am making. It is exactly the approach which leads us to say that by and large in this country, we would be better off if the rate to which a person is exposed when facing a business decision is as close as possible to real cost. He then has to take into consideration the real cost of moving the product he wishes to move.

I do not see the advantage of taking coal out of our ground and shipping it at a certain cost to the shipper when, if we weighed all the costs to the country, including the real cost of the freight which is not being charged, it might not be a benefit to move that coal into some other market, or abroad. Why should we move it if the costs, when taken into account, are not adequately met by the gains we get from the product which is moved?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: That is the realism I ask to be brought to the transportation system. When we talk about bringing this approach to mature transportation systems, we are, of course, talking about transportation systems in which the loading factor, the use of the system, is sufficient to make an approach which balances costs an appropriate one. I say this because I will always accept the need on occasion to take a transportation system into a remote area or to go in well in advance, for national purposes, of development which will eventually sustain that transportation system, or to connect remote areas so as to provide for the movement of people by some mode to the more settled centres of the country. When only a few people are there, it may not be possible to charge enough to meet the total cost. What we really mean when we say the user should pay is that there should be a logical cost transportation system, a low-cost transportation system, and this will most likely result if the user knows the real cost and makes his decisions accordingly.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) says that if there is "user pay", there should be "user say". To that, I say "bravo". Increasingly as we move toward the implementation of costs which are real and reflect the investment required, more and more of the people involved in the marketing of that service will have a say in the kind of service provided. I have told the airlines, for example, that I welcome input from their customers on the question of the style of facilities which are legitimate in our airports from a marketing point of view.

In the passenger area one finds one of the best examples of the problems which arise when we are prepared to distort the real cost. The papers published in connection with the 1975 study of our transportation system have been before the House and the people for a very long time, essentially unchallenged by those who have read them. It is true they have been challenged by some who have not read them. Some of those figures are out of date now, but in my view they are still instructive.

Based on those studies, it is said that the person who travels by bus essentially pays his own way. The analysis even concluded that a fair share of the total road cost was defrayed through the gas taxes and licensing system to which buses are subject. The automobile was seen as receiving a subsidy equivalent to half a cent per passenger mile. The air passenger was seen as receiving a subsidy equal to 2 cents per passenger mile. In the case of the railroads it is higher, at 6 cents per passenger mile.

I ask hon. members: What kind of particular public purpose is there which would lead us to say that a person who travels by bus should first of all pay his own way and then, through sharing in the tax system, pay part of the costs of those who travel by car or by airplane? I ask what justification there is for that. I ask whether it is not better, if we have income distribution in mind, to face this situation straightforwardly. I do not think we would then end up taxing the bus rider to pay for the airplane traveller. If we have something else in mind, I would like to know what it is. I can see no justification for it.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the St. Lawrence Seaway?

Mr. Lang: To every example hon. members would like to raise, I say the same logic should apply. As far as I am concerned, we should move with that logic in any particular mode, and as time goes on we should move as close as possible to recognizing real costs except where there is justification in terms of development, remoteness or some other clear reason which we can state. What we ought not to do is pretend in one area that a particular subsidy is kept for good political reasons, and then try to get people in other parts of the country to ignore the fact that there is an adverse impact upon them by virtue of the subsidy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: If you followed that, I would agree. But you don't follow it.

Mr. Lang: With respect to air, bus, rail and automobile, I ask about the need for the subsidies which have been in place, and of course we have unveiled a progressive move toward a policy of reflecting those costs. Serious discussions with the key users involved are under way. There may be some good arguments about how much, in fact, the cost amounts to and how much ought to be debited to the particular mode. We have taken some steps—for example, in the air business—to collect more from those who travel, because I do not see why we should put a subsidy of a particular amount on the table and say, "You can only benefit from that if you fly between Ottawa and Montreal. If you go by bus or in some other way, you cannot have any part of that subsidy." I do not see any justification for that.

All we do by inducing people to fly when it is not in Canada's economic interests or in their own economic interests, is end up having to build more airports to service the additional facilities. We will still need a lot of airports, let there be no doubt about that; but we have already adopted the principle for our major airports, those at Toronto, Montreal, including both Mirabel and Dorval—the key international airports—that those airports will be paid for by the users. Those who land at or leave those airports will be paying over the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Atl-East rate is another example of an occasion on which we embarked upon an artificiality. I say again: unless one is really embracing a principle of using a teaspoon to dig ditches by way of maintaining employment in this country, we ought not to preserve systems which lead to absurdities in terms of total cost.

● (1250)

The Wheat Board told us yesterday in committee that even at the Atl-East rates it costs seven cents a bushel more to move grain from the prairies to Halifax and Saint John than if it were moved by the water mode. That seven cents was worth their while to pay in order to have grain in position over the winter months for delivery when the lake and seaway system was closed. Of course, the cost to the country was much greater. This led to the result that we took grain from a farm by truck, put it in an elevator, then it was taken out again and put on a train to Thunder Bay, unloaded there, put in an elevator, cleaned, loaded into a vessel, taken to a port along the bay or lake, unloaded there, put into a terminal, then in due course loaded on a train, taken to Halifax or Saint John, and then unloaded into the final terminal.

Because of the subsidy, no one in that period of time had any incentive to look at a reasonable alternative, such as taking it from an elevator which can clean grain on the prairies, putting it on a train and taking it by unit train movement direct to Halifax, Saint John or Montreal, which can be done at very little more cost than by the water route, if all the truth be known—if we can get the truth, in terms of a real rate, from the railways, and we are trying to do that exactly these days. Those costs, unnecessary for that purpose, were thrown away. The examples go on and on, Mr. Speaker. That is the theme that we would want to develop as we examine all aspects of our transportation system.

I must say this to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan), that when we are looking at the seaway, rail and a road running side by side, it makes no sense at all to be paying a specific subsidy or part payment of the cost if the grain go by water, making a different payment if it goes by rail, or some other payment if it goes by road. There is no justification for that at all. All that does is distort economics and it leads in the end to the construction of more facilities that are subsidized, even though that may be the more costly way of moving the product. This is what we are going to try to put right.

I want to say a few words, since the hon. member for Crowfoot did, about a couple of other issues rather than this broad, philosophic one. For instance, we are moving forward with our passenger rail examination in Canada, and we intend, as we have said, to put under one management and operation passenger rail service in this country so that it can be marketed effectively and run in a cohesive way to make maximum use of joint facilities and the interchange of track wherever it makes sense to do so. This is our firm intention. We have asked the companies to move in that direction and we are prepared to take whatever action is needed to make sure that this result is accomplished.

Mr. Horner: That is just one more band-aid.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting at this stage that we can necessarily approach cost recovery in all our passenger service routes which are retained, but that is consistent with what I have just said. Our problem is that we start with a transportation system that was built on certain patchwork principles, and therefore there is a certain amount of preference for some modes over others. In particular, we have without any doubt favoured, in terms of subsidy, the automobile mode over other public modes of transportation.

I am prepared to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in this country there is a real chance that passenger service can be made more attractive, that with new equipment and upgrading of lines it can be made attractive to passengers. The only way we are going to demonstrate this is by having faith in this thesis, going out and building the system and proving that it can work. We therefore propose to maintain some rail passenger services where it will not be obvious that it will be possible in the early phases to accomplish full cost recovery. We believe, of course, that we ought to discontinue those services where perhaps lack of demand is so great that the losses will be inordinate, and where alternative modes of transportation, such as a bus running alongside an unused rail passenger service, is available to the people. In those cases we ought not to spend the money; we ought, indeed, try to save it.

We also propose to continue to attempt to support public transportation in the cities of this country. When we implement the commuter policy of making some money available for commuter services, we recognize that we will only be doing part of the job that we have to do for urban transportation. We believe that it is right at this stage to support urban transportation with federal capital assistance, for much the same reason as I have described in relation to rail service. These have been in large part underused and undersupported because of the quite unnecessary and unjustified subsidies, although politically band-aid subsidies, which have been given by governments all over this country in support of the automobile, particular in regard to urban transportation.

That is a patchwork problem that has been created in large part by governments other than ours. Nevertheless, I believe we will have to try to take the lead in trying to get a change, a revolution in thinking, in favour of public transportation and away from the subsidized automobile which is so common in our cities.

It happens, of course, that both in the case of rail across the country and in the case of urban transportation system within our cities these may be modes that look particularly to the future, as we face a Canada that is becoming more and more concerned about pollution of the atmosphere, noise, and the cost of energy. Therefore, we may want in many different ways to encourage the use of these systems and certainly to avoid the use of the costly systems employed in each of these modes.

I have, Mr. Speaker, touched on some of the issues with which we will be dealing. We have, indeed, laid before the House and the country the blueprint of a philosophy that we will be adopting, and we will continue to do this. This helps individuals to know where they may be going and to calculate what the costs to them may be in the future of various options for a transportation system. What I should like from most users, therefore, is the general conclusion on their part that if they make a mistake in examining a future course of action, looking at rates on an artificial basis instead of costs that are real, they will be looking at the wrong thing.

As far as this government is concerned, productivity in this country will be improved by this rational approach to transportation and the lowest cost alternatives being selected. Productivity will also be improved as users of transportation, both businessmen and entrepreneurs looking at business possibilities, face the real cost to this country of what they are trying to do and of what is being done, and not at artificial rates based on some band-aid, political opportunity subsidy. Those subsidies we will want to remove, and that will be our task.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, before lunch the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) used an analogy and likened the transportation system of our country to a band-aid policy or band-aid program. He said that now he is taking these bold steps in removing the band-aids, it is going to hurt. I am glad he used that analogy because I always think of a band-aid in terms of it being used to cover a sore or a wound, the purpose of which, of course, is to protect that wound or sore from infection and to allow whatever it is you are covering to heal. The premature removal of a band-aid would, in fact, result in further harm, especially if you have not done anything to heal the wound or sore.

In fact, that is what we have here in terms of transportation in Canada. We have the minister removing these band-aids without having put anything in their place to correct the problem. Indeed, the very things he is doing—and we have analysed what he is doing in respect of giving the CPR $30 million for railway passenger services between Quebec City and Montreal—constitute another band-aid program; he is starting a new brand of band-aid program.

We in this party have always held the view that at the beginning of Canada, transportation was used as a binder; it was used to bind this country together, bringing its peoples closer. The railway system was specifically built for that purpose. It was to repel what was feared to be an American invasion from the south, and really to connect the country from coast to coast. Of course, with the improvement in telecommunications, that original purpose has been lost. There is a new role we in this party have always felt, and still feel, that transportation ought to be playing. We feel it ought to be used as a tool by the government to eliminate regional disparity. In other words, it ought not to be considered in terms of profit for the railway companies or in terms of the phrase "let the user pay" which the minister uses so often, but, rather, to eliminate regional disparity.

I congratulate the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) for having chosen this particular motion to put before the House, giving us an opportunity to debate it. A few years ago the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand) who was minister of transport at the time, had some interesting ideas about transportation. We heard that transportation in this country should serve the country, and that our transportation policy should be used in conjunction with other policies to improve the lives of Canadians. Specifically, the minister said:

> What we are proposing states that the transportation system should be accessible, equitable and efficient, rather than economic, efficient and adequate. The notion of efficiency is not lost, but the emphasis is on service to Canadians.

That is a far cry from what we hear today. Today we hear the Minister of Transport trying to throw the country back 100 years with his concept of "let the user pay." Mind you, this "let the user pay" concept is pretty selective. It is pretty clear that some users will be paying a much higher percentage of the cost than others. It is also clear that some parts of this country are going to pay a lot more for transportation than others. I am not just talking about the dollar cost of taking a train, nor am I talking just about the dollar cost of shipping material from one place to another; I am talking about the cost of unemployment in parts of Canada, both in social and economic terms, and the destruction of the potential for job-producing secondary industry.

If this government was really concerned about these problems, it would present this House with a comprehensive transportation policy. The government would present us with a policy which we could debate, analyse and legislate on. It would show the people of Canada exactly how parliament intended to use transportation over the coming years and what could be expected across this country because of it. Instead, the government is surreptitiously making changes in a "half-fast" way which masquerades as a transportation policy.

For example, the government announces a cutback in transcontinental rail service by sending the matter to a committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, giving the committee instructions that can only result in the choice of alternative cutbacks. For example, this government chooses to change freight rate arrangements at a time when commissions are already studying the subject. While this goes on, low-income Canadians and the poor regions of Canada continue to suffer from policies aimed at keeping them in their place.

In northern Ontario particularly, where I come from, freight rates for years have played a major role in preventing the growth of secondary industry. Relative to Ontario as a whole, northern Ontario suffers from stagnant population growth, a lack of growth in employment, a high rate of emigration and low levels of per capita income. As a result of that emigration, northern Ontario will lose one federal seat in this House, dropping from 12 to 11.

The fact is that the economics of transportation are such that they tend to favour the transportation of materials in their unprocessed state to their final destination. This has pretty obvious implications for areas based on the production of prime products, such as northern Ontario. We do not have a great deal of information on this subject, for the very reason the minister gave in the House earlier today: he said the railway companies have never provided us with their freight rate structures and the costing of their rates.

Why can the government not act on behalf of Canadians and demand from the railway companies their freight rate structures? This is a veritable jungle, and if the government cannot get that information from the railway companies, how can it plan any kind of program? How can it put into place any kind of transportation policy, when it does not have the facts? It seems to me the government should obtain these facts before it takes all the little band-aids off all the little sores across the country.

Over the years we have gained some information. Here are some examples I was able to get my hands on in 1974. These examples amply illustrate the discriminatory manner in which present freight rate structures discriminate against northern Ontario and areas like ours. It costs about $9 to ship a ton of iron ore pellets from Copper Cliff, which is in my riding, to Pittsburgh, a distance of 800 miles. But it costs about $90 to ship a ton of fertilizer, a manufactured product, from Toronto to Sudbury, a distance of 242 miles. A 500-pound shipment from Kirkland Lake to Toronto costs $95.20 a ton for a distance of 398 miles. The same sized shipment from Winnipeg to Udora, Saskatchewan, a distance of 394 miles, would cost only $55.20 a ton. Using another example, shipments of plywood from Hearst, northern Ontario, to Eugene, Oregon, cost $74.80 a ton. But similar plywood can be shipped by rail from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, to Eugene, Oregon, for only $60 a ton—despite the fact that Dartmouth is 1,000 miles farther from Eugene than Hearst is.

● (1410)

Here is another example. A shipment of forest products from Kapuskasing to Green Bay, Wisconsin, must travel a circuitous route via Detroit, travelling a total distance of 1,449 miles. A shorter route via Sault Ste. Marie to Michigan would mean a journey of only 625 miles, but the railways will not authorize this. It is pretty clear from information like this that those rates and routes unreasonably discourage the growth of primary and secondary industry in the north. This is discrimination which the present national transportation policy is supposed to eliminate. Yet the discrimination exists because this government will not institute a rational transportation policy for this country based on service to our citizens rather than based on corporate benefits.

If anyone doubts the effect this has on the north, all one has to do is to study the latest census data comparing northern Ontario with Ontario as a whole. In Ontario 22.3 per cent of the work force is involved in managerial, administrative and clerical work. In the north, the figure is 15.1 per cent. But a better example is in the area of machining, product fabricating, assembling and repairing: 12.1 per cent of the Ontario work force is involved in those jobs, but for northern Ontario the figure is only 8.3 per cent.

In Sudbury, for example, when the world price for nickel is buoyant and the two levels of governement, federal and provincial, are threatened into bribing INCO and Falconbridge to produce there rather than at their branch plants abroad, there is a boom in employment in the north. But in the bust, when the lay-offs come, my area faces severe unemployment. When this happens, the community begins to disintegrate as families drift away to other locations in search of work. The economic base of the community fails as taxes decline and the community as a whole suffers. And do not think the companies do not know the power they hold in that part of Ontario.

Secondary industry in the north would break the strangle-hold of those companies by providing alternative employment and by broadening the economic base of the community, thus minimizing adverse effects in any slowdown in the resource sector for whatever reason. But this situation is not peculiar to northern Ontario alone. The people of western Canada have for years experienced development problems directly related to the lack of any national and comprehensive transportation system. The people of western Canada have traditionally opposed the railway monopolies which sought to make enormous profits off their backs, and over the years they have won some fights. The result of one of these fights was the creation of the Crowsnest rate arrangement which guaranteed fair prices for the shipping of their products.

It was MP Reynold Rapp who in the early sixties introduced a bill in this House whereby rapeseed would be included under those rate arrangements. This allowed rapeseed to be delivered in the east or the west at the lowest possible rates. These rate arrangements meant that western farmers could move their grain to market at reasonable costs, and in return the railway companies got other considerations.

But now the minister wants to give the companies more than the healthy profits they already enjoy on freight. In fact, commissions have been set up to study this whole problem. But the transport ministry has prejudged the outcome of the Hall commission and the Snavely commission, presently examining this problem, by his recent actions on rapeseed products freight rates and his proposal for increased seaway tolls. The Minister of Transport talks about consultation, but it appears he has already made up his mind without consulting the provinces. The order in council of April 13 removing rapeseed oil and meal was made only five days after mailing the latest cost information to the provinces, which they view to be inadequate and inaccurate.

The federal government is reneging on its promise at the western economic opportunities conference in 1973 to support further processing of raw materials in the west. Compensatory rates for movement of rapeseed products places the total western rapeseed crushing and processing industry in jeopardy. It will increase the anomaly in favour of crushing rapeseed in eastern Canada over crushing it in western Canada.

The minister's "the user shall pay" policy will wipe out any hope of transportation being used to achieve broad national, social and economic goals. People will be discriminated against because of where they live. The freight rate structure which discourages processing in western Canada will only worsen regional disparities.

According to successive Liberal and Tory governments, westerners are not supposed to be able to process their own products in western Canada. They are supposed to grow the raw product and send it to central Canada for manufacturing, then buy it back. This latest freight rate controversy on rapeseed products has caused a great deal of disappointment among western Canadians. It is quite clear that the federal government has abandoned its promise to eliminate the freight rate discrimination on processed western products in favour of having the processing done in eastern Canada. The further suggestion to solve this problem by increasing the freight rate on unprocessed rapeseed is another attack on the Crowsnest rates before the results of the Hall and Snavely commissions are completed. The work of these commissions and of the people who appeared at formal hearings is being ignored by the minister who has already made up his mind.

The minister has been playing around for two years with feed grains on the open market. The producers have shown a distinct preference for dealing through the Canadian Wheat Board rather than the open market. Now the Wheat Board will be required to offer feed grains at prices competitive with those of U.S. corn. Reducing the feed freight assistance will mean lower feed grain prices to western producers. This feed grains policy will also put the western livestock producer at a disadvantage with respect to the eastern livestock producer. In western Canada, as in northern Ontario, Canadians are being treated as hewers of wood and drawers of water. The Minister of Transport is perpetuating and intensifying this problem through policies which discriminate against the establishment of secondary industry in the prairies and northern Ontario. Recent attempts to raise costs for the use of the St. Lawrence Seaway is another example of a change in our transportation policy that will cost our western farmers plenty, without any thought for the social and economic costs beyond the crass concept of "let the user pay".

Now let us turn to Atlantic Canada. The Atlantic provinces are in the same boat as the west and northern Ontario. The specific example I have chosen to exemplify the transportation mess in Atlantic Canada is Bill C-61. The theory behind Bill C-61 is that it will give Canadian shipping a boost, and to a lesser extent the Canadian shipbuilding industry. The bill makes it mandatory that ships sailing from one Canadian port to another Canadian port must be of Canadian registry.

● (1420)

Canadian shippers and the SIU strongly agree with this bill, for their own reasons. The SIU is hoping for expanded membership, and the Canadian shippers, a relative handful of companies, would have no foreign competitors. There is an exemption clause in Bill C-61 which is very germane to this particular transportation problem, and which will allow firms to ship with foreign flags if there are no Canadian vessels available. This clause is vague and subjective. The government could veto shipping contracts if a Canadian shipper offered a vessel, no matter what the cost difference. Companies are not going to expose themselves to such a hazardous proposition. Already one firm has claimed that it will not build in Cape Breton because of the proposed changes. This was in regard to iron ore. It will be cheaper to send the iron ore to Rotterdam, in Europe, than from Ungava to Cape Breton for processing.

Canadian shippers, perhaps in anticipation of the bill, have drastically raised their fees, forcing marginally profitable firms like SYSCO to switch to commonwealth ships. If this measure passes, the maritimes will be at the mercy of these shippers. For this law to work, this government must build a Crown-owned merchant marine, but unfortunately the government makes no such guarantee. Hence, we may inherit the worst of both worlds.

Presently, shipping rates are having the effect of keeping down rail and trucking rates in coastal areas, because if there is a significant difference firms will shift business to the cheapest of the three means of transport. If this bill is passed it is sure to cause a rise in shipping costs. Transport minister Jack Davis of British Columbia, for example, estimates that this measure could mean increases of 30 per cent for rail and marine shipping. Salt from Nova Scotia mines will be put at a comparative disadvantage, for example, with Rumanian salt. Worst of all—and this could be disastrous for Cape Breton—it could mean a cancellation of the steel complex for Cape Breton because of increased shipping costs and the fact that it will be cheaper to process Canadian ore abroad rather than in the Atlantic area.

What about rail passenger transportation? If the government was really interested in presenting this country with a useful transportation policy, now is the time to call for hearings to find out what the people of Canada want and need. However, instead of having people involved in planning a new transportation strategy for Canada, we have them reacting to a three-page outline by the Canadian Transport Commission on alternative cutbacks in passenger service from Montreal to points west. We are offered no supporting papers which deal with the social or over-all economic costs of these measures. There is nothing at all. These are hearings held in a vacuum.

In the meantime, the railway companies are allowed to cut back services. The CNR is dropping one of its transcontinental trains this summer, when the Olympics will be on and when people will need to be moved across this country. While waiting for the government to develop a policy, the Minister of Transport has ordered the companies not to purchase any more rail passenger equipment. The CNR is retiring 50 passenger rail cars, which will amount to 15 per cent of its passenger capacity. When it comes to improving Canadian rail passenger service, all this seems to come under Professor Parkinson's third law which states that delay is the deadliest form of denial.

In my opinion, policy formation is the responsibility of the people's elected representatives, not the role of appointed individuals in the CTC, and even when the government does decide to improve rail service it does so in the most absurd way. For example, let us look at the recent government decision to give the CPR $30 million to upgrade its service between Montreal and Quebec City. Canadian Pacific has never indicated any interest in rail passenger service in the corridor between Quebec City and Montreal. It is the CNR which has shown the people of Canada that it is interested in passenger service. The CNR has shown an interest in improving rail passenger service, but the CNR did not get the $30 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), but his 20-minute time allotment has expired. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I just say that you adorn the chair very well, and you appear to be a person with the impartiality we in this House would like. Of course, we have received that from Mr. Speaker, but you seem to fit into that chair very well and I am glad to see you sitting in that place.

In view of the fact that our time is limited, I would like to start off my remarks by complimenting the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) on the very important motion he has brought to the attention of the House. This motion is of great concern to a good number of people in our country, dealing as it does with matters relating to transportation, a most important topic in a country the size of Canada.

I am sorry that the minister is not able to be here this afternoon for this very important debate, but I see that his parliamentary secretary is here. I am sure that in his usual way he will take notes and relate all the information which comes from this side of the House to the minister in the hope that it will have some effect upon him. I am sorry to say that during the time the minister has been in his portfolio he has not taken advice or had the consultation which I think is expected of a minister of transport in an area which has been referred to—and was referred to again today—by the minister's predecessor, as being a mess.

I listened with great interest to the minister's comments today relating to his theory and his concept of transportation in Canada. Much of what he said is quite true. I say that in the spirit of attempting to have a dialogue with the minister relating to transportation matters in Canada. I think it is most important that this matter be dealt within a non-partisan debate. It should be dealt with in a debate without partisan consideration, in which there could be consensus throughout the land. I commend that attitude to the minister.

I hope the minister will change his present attitude with respect to developing transportation policies in Canada, because the evidence we have before us is that he is making, not only piecemeal decisions before coming to any firm conclusion with respect to transportation policy for Canada, but he is doing so without the benefit of full consultation with those involved in transportation. I think the example of transcontinental rail passenger service, mentioned by the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), is a good one. That is an area in which the minister has not carried out discussions across Canada. Rather, he has given a directive to the CTC with respect to a policy to be implemented, an irreversible policy, and he has sent the CTC out under the guise of consultation when everyone knows that the die is cast in that regard.

I am not alone in suggesting that the minister is instituting a transportation policy of his own which is on a piecemeal basis. A very respected spokesman for western agriculture, in the person of E. K. Turner, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, saw fit to put out a press release recently in which he pointed out that the minister has in fact been instituting his own transportation policy. He has not done so in any co-ordinated way but, rather, on a piecemeal basis and no one knows for sure whether one part will fit with the others. Mr. Turner condemns the government for operating in that fashion. Therefore, I hope the minister will heed some of the criticism from very responsible people across Canada and give a little more thought to getting some advice from people who have knowledge and expertise in the area of transportation, as well as from people who are affected by changes in transportation policy.

In concluding this part of my remarks, I want also to remind the minister that, as I understand it, he made a commitment to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications that the committee would have the full responsibility of investigating national transportation policy. As I understood the minister, he would not be introducing any policies with respect to transportation until the committee had had a full opportunity to investigate the subject. I am sorry to say that what we have had in committee has been, almost exclusively, representations and submissions by officials of the department. On a limited basis we had a number of opportunities to deal with certain aspects of transportation, notably through a trip to the west coast recently.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary seems to indicate another position, but I am sure he will have an opportunity to make a speech this afternoon. I have to make a confession, Mr. Speaker. It is an awful thing to have to say, but I must bare my soul. The parliamentary secretary is a former student of mine. To paraphrase the Prime Minister's remark: Where have I gone wrong?

I want to address my remarks primarily to the area of rail passenger service. Here is an example of the kind of ill-considered policy that has been rammed down our throats without full consultation and an opportunity to consider its implications for the people of Canada. I find that policy incredible for any minister of transport, but particularly incredible for a minister from western Canada. I have referred to the fact that the former minister of transport, now the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), referred to transportation in Canada as being in a mess. He was not kidding, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the extent of this mess was revealed to us in the statement made by the present minister about the federal government's new rail passenger policy at the end of last January.

In introducing the policy, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) said that although Canada has extensive rail passenger services, they have been allowed to deteriorate so that Canadians no longer have a fair incentive to use them. He added that this was in no way due to any fault on the part of those who operate the trains, but to a combination of management and government policies which could only produce losses and worsening service. Losses, according to the minister, amounted to $167 million in 1974 and are increasing. He went on to say that losses may amount to $400 million by 1980 if changes are not made.

This sounds like a very ominous forecast. But what are the facts? The Department of Transport, in my estimation, seems to have a bias against passenger rail. Like bees to honey, they swarm around glamour projects such as STOL, the short take-off and landing aircraft. The government has spent over $150 million on STOL, the heavily subsidized "new baby", only to have Mr. Kirkwood, the senior assistant deputy minister, inform me and my colleagues on the transport committee in February that they have no idea what to do about STOL now that the demonstration project is over. What we are witnessing is another hydrofoil case which involved a loss to our taxpayers of $52 million spent on a vessel designed to carry passengers over water at fast speeds, the Bras d'Or which now sits propped up and dejected on the shore at Halifax as a very expensive wallflower.

The Minister of Transport states that rail passenger service does not pay its way, therefore rationalization is needed. In the department's terms, "rationalization" is defined as "reductions". Why is it that a government which sinks $400 million into the Pickering airport and then suspends its construction, gags over a $160 million loss on rail passenger services? There are many examples of areas where the federal government picks up losses and deficits with respect to essential services. For example, the government picks up the $26 million annual deficit incurred by the Canadian National cargo and ferry service on the coast of Newfoundland.

A research study shows that Canada lags five years behind the United States, ten years behind the United Kingdom, and 20 years behind France in new rail passenger service concepts. The same study shows that passenger trains in Canada are "almost always late" and that rail operations in Canada are "more dangerous than other systems", recording, in 1972, 12 times more derailments and three times more collisions per train mile, twice as many passenger deaths and 17 times the number of rail employee deaths and injuries than France, for example.

Although the federal government is just beginning to admit it, the Canadian public has been aware for years that our railway passenger transportation system is in a state of deterioration. Certainly, during my time in parliament we in the opposition have been pressing the government to develop a national transportation policy, including rail passenger service—a policy that would be integrated, less costly, workable and fair to all parts of the country. In June, 1975, the former minister of transport stated in his overview of policy proposals that transportation should be an instrument of economic and social development.

With special reference to rail transportation, section 18(1) of the Canadian National Railways Act states that the railways of the Canadian National Railways "are hereby declared to do works for the general advantage of Canada". The Minister of Transport, in a letter dated April 5, 1976, to His Worship Mayor T. J. Cavanagh of Edmonton, Alberta, stated that the rail passenger policy was put forward in explicit recognition of the key role that railway passenger services play, not only in the direct provision of transportation services but also in terms of employment, tourism and many other facets of the economies of all regions of Canada.

But the government's response to this date has been to submit the country to policy reversals dazzling in their frequency and continued ineptitude. Premier Alex Campbell of Prince Edward Island has stated that the new policy statement on rail passenger service left him cold and confused. He found that the notion that the transportation system can serve as a development tool contradicted the idea that it could also be self-sufficient.

The government's entire transportation policy seems to be devoted to, and the Minister of Transport seems obsessed with, the "user pay" concept. This, I suggest, is one of the problems we face with this government: they only see things in black and white and have no flexibility in their approach to a transportation policy. There is absolutely no room for any deviation. Once the minister has in his mind that it is going to be a "user pay" concept, that means it will be a "user pay" concept whether it hurts or not.

The minister has referred to band-aid measures. He was trying to make us believe that the government is a brand new one and is going to cure all the woes of past years which got us into this mess by applying band-aids. Once you take them off, of course, it causes pain and suffering. Once the sores are exposed, they are susceptible to a kind of gangrene. That is what could happen to the transportation policy. It is the government's responsibility to act in a responsible manner, and not impose black and white concepts on us as these will have serious economic consequences.

I do not disagree with the "user pay" concept in the right circumstances, but what bothers me about the minister's approach is its inflexibility. The principle of "user pay" must be weighed against what I consider the more important policy principle—the principle that transportation is an instrument of national policy and a tool of regional development. In my view, the geographical distance of Canada makes residents of the different parts of this country remote from each other and an exception to the objective of commercial viability is necessary to allow rail passenger services to fulfil the role of linking this country. The previous minister of transport agreed to let the standing Committee on Transport and Communications review recent government studies.

I hear thunder outside, Mr. Speaker, and I know He is with us as well, bringing lightning down on the heads of the government.

An hon. Member: You mean "she".

● (1440)

An hon. Member: Hitler said the same, with a thick German accent.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know some hon. members opposite are more expert than I am about what happened in other countries. I am merely pointing out the inadequate policies introduced by the government. The promise of the previous minister has not materialized. There has not been a full review on the part of the committee. It was my impression that the new policy was to be instituted only after the committee had been given the opportunity to conduct a full investigation. Then, before the committee was able to complete its consideration of a national transport policy, the present minister, on January 29, made a statement about passenger rail service. The minister's statement was a dramatic reversal of the government's rail passenger policy as enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on June 18, 1974, at Cornwall. I see the hon. member from Cornwall present in the House. He may remember the Prime Minister's glowing remarks which were instrumental, no doubt, in the hon. member's being elected to sit on the government side.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Now the Prime Minister's words are a millstone around his neck.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On that occasion the Prime Minister did not mention any form of physical removal of passenger rail service: he promised, instead, as the hon. member no doubt remembers, additional services. A Canadian passenger corporation would be established by the government to operate all intercity passenger train services and to set up transcontinental excursion trains to supplement the existing cross-country services. That was quite a speech. I see the hon. member smiling, no doubt as he fondly remembers the Prime Minister's promises. The Prime Minister said that there would be increased provision on the transcontinental services of piggyback carriage of private automobiles so that persons taking the excursion runs could use their own cars at their destination.

The backtracking came quickly. To the Speech from the Throne of 1974, and the tabled statements on rail passenger policy, was added the sneaky proviso that transportation policy would be implemented within the means of the financial resources of the federal government. During the last federal election campaign the Liberal party did not mention in any way that transportation policies would be subject to financial restrictions.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that transportation is a top priority which should not be hindered by financial restraints or rationalization. I will not dwell on the discrepancy between government promises in the last election campaign and the reality of government transportation policy, but will add that the Prime Minister himself said during the last election campaign that Liberal promises would not be "pie in the sky." Now, on the minister's instructions, the Canadian Transport Commission is holding public hearings with a view to reorganizing the rail passenger system by 1980, dropping some duplicate services and improving operation in the heavily populated Quebec City-Windsor corridor. I contend that the government's true intention is not so much to reorganize our rail passenger service as to reduce substantially the service in some parts of the country or wipe it out completely.

The Minister of Transport's new rail passenger policy has created great apprehension throughout the land. To cite just one example, in his own city, Saskatoon, the city council passed an emergency resolution expressing disapproval of any proposal to reduce transcontinental rail passenger service. It expressed particular opposition to the reduction or discontinuance of any such service passing through Saskatoon.

The new, so-called self-sufficent policy announced by the Minister of Transport has run into considerable opposition, particularly in the maritimes and the west which will apparently feel the brunt of the new policy. I hope it is only a coincidence that the only area of Canada promised new initiatives and expenditures in rail passenger travel, the area between Quebec City and Windsor, is an area largely represented by members of parliament supporting the government.

The minister says he must phase out non-profitable rail passenger service because too few people use trains and they are not paying their way. I disagree with the statement presented to the Canadian Transport Commission earlier this year that passengers have deserted the railways. I believe passengers were driven away by government policies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. Unfortunately, the time allotted to him under the Standing Order has expired.

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I join other hon. members in appreciating your presence in the chair this afternoon. This day's debate is particularly interesting as it deals with the difficulties parliament and the government can encounter in bringing about needed changes and in changing old ideas. Of course, change runs counter to Tory philosophy, perhaps best expressed by a Tory in Great Britain, whose name escapes me, who said, "Any change at any time, for any reason, is to be deprecated."

The minister has taken on a massive job in looking into the history of his department. He is examining a mass of regulatory sacred cows and is determined to change at least basic principles, even if some things are not to be changed overnight. He has suggested that the cost of this enormous transportation apparatus should be borne fundamentally by users unless a good case can be made to the contrary. This does not mean that there are not instances throughout the country, possibly in every constituency, calling for subsidy and assistance. But the basic argument proposed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is unassailable, I suggest.

The minister asks, "Why should someone be given a free or a subsidized rate, at the expense of someone else, if that situation can be corrected without endangering the fundamental economic viability of the area in question? He suggests, also, that it is more sensible to subsidize directly an area in which the assistance will do the most good. These policies show the minister to be tough but farsighted. If Canadian transport policy is in a mess, as has been alleged, or in difficulty, the surest way to create order is by applying the kinds of solutions he has recommended.

Numerous examples respecting the transportation question have been cited. I think the most graphic one drawn by the minister showed that bus travellers pay for their service entirely; automobile passengers are subsidized at the rate of .5 cent per mile; air travellers at 2 cents per mile, and rail travellers at 6 cents per mile. The minister asks, "Is it fair to ask the bus traveller to pay his fare and a portion of the train traveller's fare as well?"

Let me say a word about airports. There is a major airport in my constituency. Airports are extremely costly facilities. The government has been criticized for allowing airports in the past to be built without considering, first, efficient use and convenience of passengers who must use them. Too often, airports have been built as large entertainment centres, where people see travellers off or greet them. This has created enormous parking problems.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

The "user pay" principle, as far as it relates to federal government airports and related aviation facilities, is aimed at placing a fairer share of the cost of the burden on the shoulders of that section of the Canadian public which benefits most from the use of any particular transport facility. For instance, it is well known that only between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of our population actually use our aviation facilities. The cost of building and maintaining these facilities has increased at an incredible steadily growing rate in recent years. At the same time, the government is keeping well in mind that the cost of certain aviation facilities, such as those in the Arctic, should continue to be borne by the public, or the taxpayer. In that category also come such things as government support for airport development and improvements which may be part of a regional economic development program, the provision of airport facilities and services for remote regions and other, similar regional and national undertakings.

The framework for user charges was provided for in the National Transportation Act of 1967 in which it was stipulated that each mode of transport in Canada, as far as was practicable, should bear a fair proportion of the real costs involved in providing that mode of transport. It can be shown that in 1976 or 1977 the Department of Transport's air transportation administration will be seeking parliamentary approval of a non-budgetary appropriation totalling some $385 million, as well as approximately $75 million in increased loan authority to support the international airports at Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. Therefore, the total air program will be around $460.7 million.

● (1450)

The deficit in the next fiscal year has been estimated at $225.3 million. Because of the burgeoning costs of operating our aviation facilities, a number of user fee charges have been introduced this year. These include a 30 per cent increase in national fees and an increase from $33 to $50 per flight in respect of using North Atlantic facilities. I will not go into further detail. I do not think this is of particular interest beyond stating that it is a specific major example where, notwithstanding an increase in user fees, the Canadian taxpayers, 85 per cent of whom do not have anything to do with flying, are paying a very large proportion of this cost. Those of us who travel regularly by air are the beneficiaries. What the Minister of Transport is saying is that as a basic, underlying principle of policy, the user should pay in full for the product he is using unless it can be demonstrated that a wider public interest dictates otherwise.

In the United States, many major airports have been built, with the airlines being obliged to subscribe to the bond issues that finance the construction. The price that they pay is high, but this is compensated by the fact that they can dictate to a large extent how the airports will be laid out and how they will be most efficiently utilized. In this country we have a different procedure. I am gratified to find that in this area and in others citizens who use the facilities, or those companies who ship the products, must be prepared to pay.

We see throughout government that one of the problems is that history may have baked our cake, as someone once said. We in this parliament must be prepared, not in this area of government alone but in many others, to consider that while the programs as formulated were adequate and proper at the time, they may require change. We should not build up sacred cows, unchangeable objectives, and rebel when positive reform is offered. If we run up large annual deficits in this country, a good proportion of them are borne by projects which have served their purpose and are now in need of reform and scaling down. This is true right across the board, whether it be unemployment insurance, health costs or transportation. If we are wedded to programs, we will not make the reforms or changes which would deprive the people for whom they were designed, but will make them more efficient and reduce the cost to the taxpayers.

I fail to see why every time a policy is proposed to parliament which has as its objective saving the taxpayers money without impairing the program, the Tories in particular turn on the minister who brings them forward, even though they would reduce the impact and burden of government financing, freeing moneys for other purposes.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Wrong.

Mr. Abbott: It is true, and it is not true on only one side of the House. I think all of us resist change. We are all tempted to say that if it was good enough for grandfather, it is good enough for me. I do not think it brands one, despite the comment of one of my colleagues, that as a Conservative there is a need to change something. There are many programs which have been designed, all of them by Liberal governments which this country—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Your modesty is overwhelming.

Mr. Abbott: It is the truth. There has not been a social program provided in this country, on a national basis, that has not been provided by Liberals, over the opposition of Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: Liberals are equal to the challenge of saying that we do not regard these programs as written in stone. We are prepared to make changes because we want to allocate the resources of this country in the best possible manner. In transportation, as in many other areas, there are only so many dollars to spend. Now that we have tough, capable ministers who are ready to face the music and reform the programs under their administration, all of us can have confidence in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) reminds me of a secretary who once wrote speeches for a politician.

Mr. Goodale: Now he is Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. McCain: He took quite a promotion. Wait until the next election. That is the one we are waiting for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: When that politician was stuck for a source of fact, he always had a phrase in his speech which was, "Grisdale says". That was his source of reference. Grisdale was a man who had a great capacity for knowledge and was famous for many sayings. The hon. member for Mississauga, in his reference to the Tories, was using a "Grisdale". He was not using a Tory, nor was he quoting directly from anybody; he was merely attacking—and that is his prerogative.

Every member of this House recognizes that there must be change. It is not simply the characteristic of the government, the Conservatives or the NDP. Every person, regardless of his political philosophy, recognizes that our transportation system, which literally built this country, must now be adapted to fit what it built. Change we must support, but change must make for the better. It must not add to the confusion. This is what a multitude of Canadians fear as change is proposed at this moment in time in the transportation structure.

The policy as outlined this morning by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is purely theoretical. Scientists may sit down and rely on the law of gravity. They may rely on the laws of mathematics and may be accurate in the conclusions as they calculate solutions to the problems that face them, because those laws are inflexible and continuous; they are dependable. However, when one starts to deal with something such as the laws of economics and modes of transportation, one finds oneself in an entirely different situation where a single, simple formula does not fit the needs of the people to be served. Such in the case in the field of transportation: it is theoretical; it is not realistic.

Let me cite an example. The minister stated this morning that we should not be moving grain by rail in Canada; we should, instead, be exporting beef. Theoretically, this is a perfectly good statement; but in fact we are not competitive, in world markets, in beef. Most of the time we are not quite self-sufficient in beef products. It is therefore ridiculous to discuss the idea of turning corn into beef to sell, for example, to Italy, a country which could not afford to pay for it anyway.

● (1500)

Our farmers could not possibly live on the return for beef which the world market would bring us. I can envisage, too, that if we entered this trade our competitors would cut the price under us. On the markets of this continent, yes, our producers could survive although they have gone through hard times, but on the markets of the world we are really not competitive.

If we were to follow the pattern the minister suggests we would certainly dislocate a number of the economic structures which exist in this country, not only in the West and in the Atlantic area. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), the economy of certain areas depends to a very large extent on the system of railway rates presently in existence. The existence of these arrangements allows those sectors of the economy to remain in business, whether it be the apple growers of Nova Scotia, the wheat farmers of the prairies, or those who grow vegetables in central Canada; they depend upon their ability to get their goods to market at reasonable cost of transportation related to the weight and value of the produce.

The minister's theory breaks down because he fails to take into account the aspect of competition and the abnormalities which exist in the rate structure. I could give a number of examples, but again I will refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. He pointed out that far too many rates are now based on what the traffic will bear; they are in no way related to compensation for the service rendered.

The mess which was described by a former minister of transport is one which was created by the party which has been in power in Canada virtually uninterrupted for 50 years, so when the present minister referred to band-aid solutions he was referring to the band-aid solutions applied by his predecessors. When he referred to decisions taken for political reasons he was referring to decisions taken by his predecessors—and in somewhat uncomplimentary terms. The policy which is in operation today is not a Conservative policy nor is it an NDP policy. It is a Liberal policy, and it has been for 50 years.

There is a fourth reason why the minister's suggestion that transport be placed on a user pay basis will not work out. I defy him to say to the urbanites of Montreal, Ottawa or Winnipeg, "You will pay the full cost of transportation in your city." It simply would not work. And just as it would not work in the urban areas, it would not work in the rural areas and all points between. No government anywhere has been able to make an airport pay for itself. There will be subsidies.

Let me turn to the Seaway. The minister spoke in deprecatory terms with respect to subsidies and those who rely upon them—it was the phrase "those who rely upon them" which some of us found offensive, and I might add that the objections did not all come from the Atlantic area. There is, by legislation, a subsidy paid to the maritime region under a measure known as the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Relate this to the Seaway.

The Seaway was opened in 1959. The fee structure was established in such a way, we were told, that not only would it pay for maintenance costs but it would amortize the cost of construction and, in the end, not cost Canadian taxpayers a nickel. Mr. Speaker, I submit that if the total investment in the Seaway were added up today one would find that this undertaking owes the Canadian people a billion dollars, and if this were to be financed in today's terms the amount of money paid to the Atlantic area would be less than 25 per cent of the interest charges alone on the amount of money the Seaway owes Canadians. Is the minister prepared to say to the City of Montreal, for example, "You will pay the actual cost of operations on the Seaway?" Try that one on for political size.

An hon. Member: What about Saint John?

Mr. McCain: We will come to that, all in good time. Here are at least three instances in which the user pay concept could not possibly be applied to the nth degree, even politically.

There are other instances which might be mentioned. Sacred cows? Political realities? They may be more than that. There may be economic realities, and they may in the end be in the interest of the nation. I do not really agree with the idea that the federal government should be paying subsidies to any part of Canada. But if there are not to be subsidies, let me point out right away that the anomalies in freight rates which we were supposed to get rid of long ago, according to the former minister of transport, still exist. For instance, there is the $90 rate to Nickel Belt referred to a little while ago, as compared with the $45 rate for iron pellets to Pittsburgh. These are anomalies we cannot afford. Cannot we obtain rational rates which relate to the ton-mile cost, or the cost the shipper or the consumer can bear? Let us change the system by all means, but change it in a way which will bring about a better transportation structure, one which will be of benefit to the total economy.

Criticism has frequently been expressed about what is happening to passenger service. In the past 50 years or so the government never paid serious attention to the service which was being rendered by the railroads as passenger service was being phased out. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, have had the same experience as I had when I waited three hours in the bowels of the station in Windsor in trying to get a connection between the passenger service of the CPR and the CNR in Nova Scotia. I have waited overnight in the City of Saint John to get from train to boat although both are operated by the same company. I have driven my car—something the minister deplores—because I knew I would not be able to get to Saint John by the passenger service provided and complete my business without having to stay in that city overnight. With that timetable, Mr. Speaker, the operation had to fail.

One of the factors which contributed to the disappearance of express and passenger service was the removal of mail contracts. This has proven to be a sorry decision as far as the effect upon mail delivery is concerned. In former times mail to the east was often delivered over night. It is a rare occasion now, under the present airmail system, for a piece of mail to be delivered over night to my constituency. And so it has been during that period of 50 years under the Liberal administration that this system has gone downhill in every aspect, whether it be freight, passenger or express. It is the only system, Mr. Speaker, in which government has permitted excessive charges for deteriorating services. And the government opposite sat back and watched it happen.

Not too long ago the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) moved a motion in the House with respect to the conditions of the railways in Prince Edward Island. There are no other means of transportation services leaving that island other than rail services. Yet the railroad is in a condition which is unacceptable, deplorable, and incapable of giving proper service to the area. That has happened under 50 years of Liberalism, with a little interruption under the guidance of a Crown corporation. It is no use government trying to avoid the responsibility.

● (1510)

Let me come back to another user pay concept. Bill C-61 has been proposed by the Government of Canada. It is a notable bill and I for one support the principle that Canada should have a merchant marine. No matter what I may say in criticism of that bill, Mr. Speaker, bear in mind that this is my principle and my objective just as much as that of any person inside or outside the House. However, we come back to a theoretical position on the bill presented to the House; we have ignored the practical situation that exists in the economic world in which the act would take effect.

Let me remind the House of some of the comments that have been made but whose authors have not been given the opportunity of presenting their case before the committee or the House. I have before me a telegram from the Atlantic premiers conference, signed by Mr. A. B. Campbell. I wonder who he could be? I think he is the Liberal premier of the province of Prince Edward Island. I will not quote this telegram in full because I do not have time, but it says this in part:

> Existing industry and future industrial development in the Atlantic provinces will be seriously affected if this bill, and those regulations of which we have been made aware to date, come into effect.

That telex was dated May 26 last and was directed to the Minister of Transport. Has the telegram been acknowledged, Mr. Speaker? There are those who do not know whether it has. In any event that is the position of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. MacFarlane: How do you know this telegram was received?

Mr. McCain: There are none so blind as those who will not see. Let us just see, Mr. Speaker, how all this began. We are all fully aware of the Darling report. A multitude of people in the Atlantic area made representations to the group that made the report. Their objections did not appear in the report, nor were they given consideration in the economic conclusions that the report reached.

A meeting was held in camera in Halifax between federal and provincial officials and industry and labour representatives in regard to the Darling report on July 18, 1973. Here is a list of the people who appeared. First of all the provinces made an appearance and their representative said it had been agreed with the then minister, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), that no action would be taken until the regulations were approved by the provinces.

The Sydney Steel Corporation said the Darling report would hurt them. The Canadian Salt Co. did not favour it because it would hurt them. Dover Flour Mills suggested that they might have to close. Gulf Oil Company were going to have problems. Labrador Linerboard said they were threatened with loss of business. The Maritime Co-operative Services spoke on behalf of the farmers and said that the increased cost of farm requirements would be severe, and they objected. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission presented a brief rejecting the principles as outlined. Smith Brokerage, which deals in grain, said the cost of the proposals would affect the Atlantic area, and they objected.

The pertinent part of the minutes of this meeting is as follows. Labour union opinion—I understand this came from the SIU—was this:

> The two representatives expressed their agreement with the recommendations of the Darling report. Noting: the lack of a real national transportation policy; that the government should provide the vessels that are required to move the cargoes—

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when the corporations complained about the costs that they feared and anticipated, the union recognized, as well as the corporations, that such an act without subsidy would be nothing but detrimental to the manufacturing and shipping industries of the Atlantic area. I repeat that I favour the formation of a Canadian merchant marine, but it must not be a theoretical thing of the sort the minister talked of this morning; it must be practical in every sense of our economic world. One shipper suggested to the transportation committee in Vancouver that if the government would offer tax incentives or other incentives comparable with those given to ships of foreign registry, it might be possible to have in Canada a merchant marine that could operate and have a chance to profit; but the government has said it would not care to do this. I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the union representatives recognized fully that this could only happen with government assistance or through incentive of one form or another, even if it supplied the ships to the shippers.

The Halifax Chronicle-Herald for May 19 said that financial incentives are required to encourage a Canadian flag fleet. The Gazette for Tuesday, May 25, carried the headline, "Atlantic Provinces Concerned Over New shipping Act Changes". I could go on to read these editorials, Mr. Speaker, but there just is not time.

Let me come back to the user pay concept. Again the Chronicle-Herald has an editorial from which I wish to quote briefly:

> With major markets in the centre of the country, producers in the east and west are placed at a competitive disadvantage . . .
>
> Government simply is determined that there are two classes of users and that one class is to have preferential treatment.
>
> The currently popular policy favours the heart of the country and greatly strengthens the Ontario economy. The price is paid by the west and the east.

That is where the political clout is which the minister was talking about this morning. I should also like to refer to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald for Monday, May 3, 1976. I want to quote a name familiar to the government of the day, Premier Regan, who in this article criticized the program. Then I want to refer to another chap who is familiar to the government of the day, Mr. Jack Davis from B.C. According to the article:

> Mr. Davis said last week that the amendments would force shippers to wait for a Canadian flagship to carry his goods if one were available immediately. Premier Regan said if Mr. Davis ran the B.C. transport department the way he ran the federal fisheries department "it's quite possible he could be mistaken."

I like that little comment.

The Gazette for Tuesday, May 25, carried this headline: "Merchant Marine Policy—Cost-Benefit Focus of Study". I want to refer to an article dealing with what members of the committee and those opposed to the act asked for consistently, and to which no one would respond until after the committee had risen and this little snippet appeared in the Gazette:

> A key element in forming the recommendations will be a series of cost-benefit studies now under way—

This has neither been acknowledged nor denied by the government in regard to Bill C-61.

> —Roland Murray, a senior adviser to the federal transport ministry, told a meeting of the Naval Officers' Association of Canada Montreal branch.
>
> . . . Murray, who heads the board's working committee, said there can be no policy recommendations to the transport minister until the board sees the conclusions of 20 studies it has commissioned covering such areas as international agreements, labour, shipping rates, and shipping in the Arctic.

Despite this statement by a high ranking official in the government, only as recently as last Wednesday the government was trying to rush this bill through by June 30. I suggest that we need the kind of change called for by the hon. member for Mississauga. Above all, one of the things we need is a change in the way policy decisions are reached, as well as a change in the way legislation is framed so that people may be guided in what they do. This Marine Code Act, including its most recently suggested amendment, is enabling legislation. It has "mays" and "mights" and permissions throughout both the act and the regulation. For this reason it leaves the people at the mercy of government policy at the moment in time at which a decision affecting industry is to be made. If that policy at that moment is unfavourable then industry will suffer the consequences.

● (1520)

I want to give one assurance to the minister while I am in the process of these remarks.

An hon. Member: Where is the minister?

Mr. McCain: I do not know, but he is not in Halifax. They had a transportation week down in the Halifax area and the minister was to be the guest speaker. He advised certain people in the Atlantic area that he was sorry he could not be there because there was an important vote in the House of Commons. I want to assure the minister that anytime he has an important transportation meeting anywhere in the Atlantic area which is to the benefit of that area, he can count on me or any other maritime member on this side of the House to be his pair. He will not be hurt as long as it is beneficial to the Atlantic area.

An hon. Member: You better talk with your party whip.

Mr. McCain: I do not have to talk to my whip. I do not worry about getting his permission in circumstances like that because he, Sir, is a generous and trustworthy individual. I just want the minister to know that when he wants to make an announcement we will protect his vote, even though I do not believe in pairing.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have some rather specific points to make with regard to the subject of this opposition day.

One of the major transportation problems of our country is the establishment of a rational, efficient, and flexible system for the shipment of grain from the prairie provinces to Canada's ports and then overseas to our export markets. While this is an issue of interest to all Canadians, it is of particular concern to those of us in the western part of this country, whether in the prairie provinces where the grain is produced, or in British Columbia where we have had, at the same time, the most attractive and effective delivery system, and the greatest problems in making that particular system work.

Over the past eight years the volume of overseas grain exports shipped through west coast ports has fluctuated between 37 per cent and 57 per cent of total Canadian grain exports. On the average the three western grain ports, Vancouver, Victoria, and Prince Rupert, have handled 45 per cent of overseas grain exports, yet these three ports have a total storage capacity of under 27 million bushels while the 30 terminals in eastern Canada have a capacity of over 141 million bushels, that is, five times as great.

I point this out to hon. members not only as a tribute to our current system of western grain exports and to the men and women who make it work, but also as an indication of what can be done if this western system is properly rationalized and suitably upgraded. Two steps in this direction, which I am pleased to note have recently been taken, are the Canadian Wheat Board's program to expand significantly west coast grain storage capacity, and the visit last month by the Transport and Communications Committee to western Canadian communities to study at first hand problems such as those being outlined here today.

One of the visits by the transport committee was to the port of Prince Rupert where members met with a number of local representatives, including Mr. Joe Scott, chairman of the Prince Rupert Port Authority, and the city of Prince Rupert grain co-ordination committee represented by Mayor Lester and Dr. William Hick. I am confident that the members of this committee have returned from their western trip convinced, as I am, that the key to the rationalization and expansion of the western grain exporting system is the port of Prince Rupert.

The problems of shipping grain through Vancouver are numerous and have been discussed in this House on more than one occasion. The advantages of Prince Rupert, however, are just now beginning to be realized. The current single grain elevator in Prince Rupert is owned by the Canadian Grain Commission of the Department of Agriculture, and is currently undergoing a three-year renovation and structural upgrading program. In addition, a facility study is currently being conducted to determine the possibility of increasing the storage capacity of this particular elevator. This study, I am certain, will bring back a positive report.

What is needed to rationalize western grain shipments is a greater utilization of lower volume rail lines; better usage of existing port facilities; an increase in storage capacity in areas where rail congestion and land prices do not make such a step impossible; a more wisely regulated pattern of ship movements; a full recognition of the strategic location of B.C. ports and their relative closeness to Pacific markets; and full co-ordination of the plans and activities of the several federal government departments and agencies involved in the western export of grain.

The first five points can all be facilitated by an increased use of the grain exporting facilities of the port of Prince Rupert. The sixth is already becoming a reality under the more than capable stewardship of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has indicated by his motion today, it is after all not really a grain problem that we are discussing. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the hon. gentleman for raising this exceptionally relevant topic of interest to every Canadian, and I think particularly relevant to those who are regionally disadvantaged. As a representative of such an area I feel it is important that this sense of regionality be communicated in this House.

In utilization of the ports in my area and, ports not being the only subject, also the utilization of present rail and other transportational infrastructures, we are an adolescent part of the world. Although we are mature in years, utilization has been, to use the minister's word, immature. Ever since the original building of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railroad, which was finally joined in 1912 with the "last spike" at Fort Fraser, in the centre of the constituency of Skeena, our northern half of British Columbia has been overwhelmingly concerned with transportation, and we have been eternally cognizant of the unequal battle that must be waged not only west to east but, similarly, north to south, as we have seen a giant concentration of traffic funnel first to the east, and then an even greater volume south through Vancouver and its environs.

Our CN northline—Edmonton to Red Pass, Red Pass to Prince George, and Prince George to Prince Rupert—seemed to languish, only partially utilized, although it has been acknowledged over and over again as economic and even superior in assessment of coal shipping potential—in fact just the other day I observed an article by an expert on unit trains who said it was possible to deliver grain at $10 a ton to only two ports in Canada, and I am sure the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) will be as happy as I am to know that one of those ports is Halifax and the other is the port of Prince Rupert.

In the transportation of minerals, for instance, the capacity of a rail route from mine to port is gauged by the "ruling grade"; that is, the most severe grade a train must pass on a given line. In the case of all southline traffic from Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to southern ports, severe grades in the mountains require up to ten 3,000 horsepower locomotives to do what four can do on the CN northline. In addition transport over these reduced grades permits a significant increase in the tonnage that is carried.

In 1976, the CN has scheduled a $100 million capital budget for the mountain region alone. This represents 25 per cent of all capital outlays planned, including equipment, in the whole country. Part of this is for expanded terminal facilities in Vancouver and Edmonton, including two 12-mile sections of double track on the southline. CN anticipates an 80 per cent increase in tonnage in Canada over the next five years. Where will that put us? Double tracking becomes necessary above 35 trains per day. We are certainly a long way from that at the current rate of five trains a day. Estimates are that by 1990 Prince Rupert to Prince George traffic will be up to between eight and ten trains per day, and Prince George to Red Pass will be somewhere between 15 and 19. Now let us take a look at what those trains are or may be carrying in the future.

● (1530)

In the two years between 1972 and 1974 Canada's exports to Japan rose from $957 million to a record $2,220 billion. In imports, Canadians purchased $1,427 billion in producer goods, consumer durables, and non-durables including trucks, motorcycles, and the ever present Japanese cars. As well, a surprising new non-commodity trade is showing strongly as a projected 85,000 Japanese tourists visited Canada in 1975. Eighty per cent of these visitors spent more than 24 hours in this country—and spent money! And they used transportation—air, train and cruiseship, as well as highway travel.

Development between us and our pacific neighbour is the most dynamic element among Canada's trading patterns. British Columbia, the Yukon and Northwest Territories have combined to lead exports with an amount of $1.18 billion in 1974, of which $462 million was copper and $309 million was forest products; these two commodities alone accounted for more than one third of all Canadian export earnings in Japan. A further 53 per cent of Canada's total exports to Japan in 1974 was from the two territories and B. C. You will note that I did not mention coal, which accounted for $229 million in that export basket.

Until the development of northeastern British Columbia coal properties by Utah mines, Dennison, Minolta and Quintette, coal is still mainly a southern B.C. product. Access is coming though to the new Alberta coal field developments such as those I have just mentioned, as well as Coalition Mining, Sukunka and Teck Corporation, and if they are proved viable and economic there will be further access required under the transportation policy.

Last November the government completed an agreement regarding northern railway transportation which would have seen the access improve considerably because of the necessity for resource transportation. I say "would have seen" because this agreement is stalled, even though it generated considerable heat and light—not much light—last December during the B.C. provincial election. We now have the minister of transport for B.C.—whom many members of the House will remember, and whom indeed I remember very well as being the first to quote widely the $1 per ton saving in shipping coal through the CN northline—now seeming to do another about face and seeing in BCR access to Squamish another possibility. I can only hope that we northern British Columbia citizens will not have to live through another protracted political battle with the B.C. railway port of Squamish, and that economics and good sense, and not just politics, will prevail.

The proposed BCR Dease Lake sharing, which would have seen the federal government pay British Columbia $117.5 million in return for a one third sharing of the cost of construction of the CN northline from Terrace to Suskeena, has met with rejection from the new B.C. government, and so it is back to the drawing board again with a recommencement of negotiation. These transportation linkages are essential for and inseparable from the economic enhancement of northern B.C., and I am pleased to note that the federal Minister of Transport will soon meet with his opposite number in B.C. All I can say to Jack Davis is, "Your new government is now six months old and it is time to get on with the job." We await provincial planning priorities and we await impatiently in northern British Columbia the infrastructure that the north lacks in order that we might become equal partners with the south of our province.

The precedent has been established in Fort Nelson where millions of DREE dollars have been invested in municipal services, notably in sewer systems to the betterment of the community and enhancement of back-up services to industrial expansion. If we cannot get B.C. "off the pot" in a reasonable amount of time, then I say, scrap the present agreement, formulate a new transportation and regional development co-ordinated federal policy and go it alone, if we must, to allow regionally deprived areas to survive these troubled times. I say, please do not keep the northern half of this country waiting any longer. Regionally deprived areas need transportation access in order to survive in troubled times, and in my view there are some towns and villages which cannot continue to endure without the implementation at an early date of the subsidy assistance in transportation mentioned by the minister today.

What are we as a nation selling? What does Canada move to market in exports? We export agricultural products and we have a rising market in pork. We export coal, aluminum, zinc, iron, fertilizers, and manufactured goods, furs, radar equipment, power driven hand tools, perfumes, cosmetics, art, antiques and collector's items, and do not forget our tourist trade. We provide ski trips to the Rockies and other western trips which are becoming increasingly important. I remind hon. members that tourism is a labour intensive finished product and a renewable resource, as well as a non-environmentally damaging industry. Quite apart from visitor traffic, there are new transportation linkages and the general cargo terminal at Prince Rupert now awaiting phase three final finishing with a target date for opening in November of this year. Neptune terminals is presently proving the viability of the bulk loading facility at Ridley Island near Prince Rupert which will have further impact on western trade opportunities.

Northwestern British Columbia is not just Prince Rupert. The potential of Kitimat as a complementary resource oriented port is seriously being investigated by other private investors. Recent Kitimat development oriented proposals included a Nippon-Kokan steel mill, and presently Trans-Mountain Pipelines Limited and the Ashland Oil Company are proving the viability of a mid-province oil pipeline. This is one that brings a great deal of concern for a well balanced environmental approach, but in addition to that a very healthy concern that the economic benefits accrue to the area affected by the development of the pipeline. It really does not matter whether it is a pipeline or a grain elevator. The area which is providing the resource has a need to receive the benefits from such a development. These areas require the support of the engineering arm of this government, namely, the transportation facilities.

To the north above Kitimat and Prince Rupert, adjacent to the start of the Alaskan panhandle is the once bustling gold town of Stewart, a place where it is reported that once some 4,000 people lived when it was a gold town. This border area now includes less than 750 souls whose destiny is tied to the illusive price of copper. It is another port probability, another area which is mature and historic but which could benefit mightily from the sensitive administration of the policy the minister has so clearly enunciated today of subsidization to areas as yet undeveloped which are developmentally in need of transportation access to reach maturity and add to the productivity of this nation.

There is another hinterland in the northern part of B.C., the tenth National Harbours Board port in Canada for Kitimat and Terrace and their untapped resources at this time. These future port, rail, road and communications linkages will, hopefully, bring the Yukon on stream again so far as Canadian transportation is concerned, bringing us back to greater utilization of our own facilities rather than the present practically economic and easily accessible Alaskan gateways of Skagway and Juneau. I look forward to the linking of Prince George through Watson Lake with the Mackenzie Valley as a development which common sense tells us must happen at some point in the not too distant future.

To perceive the world of the Pacific rim in all its variety I ask hon. members, this late Friday afternoon, to imagine a mathematics compass with Hawaii as your centre point. Inscribe a circle as broad as the world's biggest ocean. This Pacific circle has Alaskan and Russian shorelines to the north and west; there are China, Japan and a wealth of emerging and re-emerging small nations; further south are Australia and New Zealand, our Commonwealth neighbours. Then wing over to Antarctica, and eastwards up the coast of Chile and her southern hemisphere neighbours, Peru and Equador, to Central America, Mexico, the United States, and on to our home turf, the long coastline of British Columbia. This is the geography of future trade opportunities, each as potentially rewarding as the one we currently pursue with Japan.

To return to the specifics of mid-northern Canada and our B.C. requirements for greater transportation and communications access, the federal Department of Transport, under the leadership of the Minister of Transport, has initiated two areas of study which I predict will soon become household words in business and labour circles in every part of our nation.

● (1540)

Pacific Rim access is being studied first by the Department of Transport's policy planning and major projects branch to assess the effectiveness of transportation systems which carry exports to and from Pacific Rim markets. This MOT project affords a focus for three levels of government and the widely diffused array of Crown corporations, private entities, and agencies which comprise our access to the buyers of our goods and services.

Second, a task force is screening the gamut of transportation policies and has specifically delineated the need for alternate means of access to the west. This review forms part of the broad Pacific Rim access project and will profoundly affect us, particularly in western Canada, when completed.

Transportation and communications access are, in my opinion, the cornerstone on which our area's new economics must be built. We require a flexible system for the efficient shipment of grain; a fair recognition of third level air carriers and required subsidies, no matter where they operate in this nation; utilization of existing rail lines on economic rather than political bases; and regional transportation as an engineering arm of economic enhancement.

Reciprocal running rates are still being negotiated between the BC Railway and the CN and will have an enormous impact on the northern part of British Columbia when completed. The presently stalled CN line north from Terrace has received important impetus with the historic commencement of tripartite land claims negotiation in the Nass Valley when the Nishga Tribal Council, the government of B.C., represented by the hon. Allan Williams, and the Government of Canada, represented by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), committed themselves to resolution of the Nishga's 111-year-old land grievance. This matter is now out of the hands of politicians and into the realm of professional negotiators. Progress on this front will signal the release of a log-jam of discontent which will make possible responsible development in the northern half of my province. Make no mistake, the Nishga people are not opposed to development; they simply seek to ensure their just participation in it, with benefits accruing to them from such development as it does to the non-Indian sector of our society.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me one more minute.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is seeking one more minute to complete her remarks. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Thank you. With all the problems, in an extraordinarily difficult country, to co-ordinate a systematic and sensible transportation plan, I for one have every confidence in the ability of this minister to replace band-aids with a healthy, economically sound system of access.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate today on the user pay concept in transportation, and I would like to refer in my remarks to our national airline, Air Canada. I note that its president recently stated that he is going to be seeking a fare increase, so that the user is probably going to have to pay more to travel on Air Canada in the future. However, I am going to oppose this fare increase, and I have written Mr. Benson to notify him about the financial fiasco at the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg and the disastrous debt it is running up. Until this mess in Winnipeg is cleaned up there certainly should be no fare increase allowed for Air Canada.

There are other problems at the Air Canada finance branch, and these problems have been with the finance branch for over three years. One of them is a labour problem, and this related to job descriptions and overtime pay, and has nothing to do with poor accounting or auditing procedures.

For the last couple of months I have been asking that the Auditor General be directed to carry out a complete audit of the Air Canada finance branch and to establish a proper auditing and accounting system. This was recommended first by the Independent Review Committee which called for all Crown corporations to be audited by the Auditor General, and in the report it states:

> The Auditor General should audit the financial accounts of all Crown corporations whose expenditures directly affect the budgetary accounts of Canada.

The budgetary accounts of Air Canada are certainly affected because I notice in Air Canada's annual report this year that the federal government is giving Air Canada a donation of $5 million to build a hangar in Winnipeg. This is apparently a new procedure. In the past Air Canada had to build its own hangars, but now the government is contributing $5 million for a hangar in Winnipeg.

In addition, the Estey inquiry was established by the government to look into a $100,000 travel agency payment which Air Canada made. It was an improper payment, so the government had the Estey inquiry carried out at a cost of $400,000. If we are going to spend $400,000 to investigate a $100,000 payment, we should certainly have the Auditor General move into the Air Canada finance branch and carry out an audit there to investigate the fact that millions of dollars are going astray. I will get to that problem in just one moment.

In the Estey report it is stated:

> As we have seen, the auditors of the Corporation are appointed by Parliament and are the same auditors as those appointed for the CNR. By Section 67 of the Financial Administration Act the Auditor Generral is eligible to be appointed as the Auditor or joint Auditor of the Corporation but such has not been done in the past.

So, the Auditor General has every right to move into the Air Canada finance branch to conduct an audit and to establish a proper accounting system.

In the Estey report it is stated that the market facts study was a bona fide research job but that the costs ran out of control as a result of a lack of monitoring by Air Canada personnel. All through the Estey report it is pointed out that there have been unauthorized disbursements, and a number of recommendations for improvements at the Air Canada finance branch are made.

I am sorry that the minister is not here today. I find it rather strange that on a transportation opposition day the minister is only here for a short period.

Mr. Horner: He gave us his lecture and then left.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes. He gave us a lecture and then left. Some lecture. However, the parliamentary secretary—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You can't do as well.

Mr. McKenzie: Wait until I get going, Joe. The parliamentary secretary is well aware of the problems at the Air Canada finance branch, as he has debated these problems with me on a number of occasions during adjournment debates. However, I have received no satisfactory answers from the parliamentary secretary, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to the problems there. All I have been able to get out them is that Air Canada should not be run from the floor of the House of Commons. I certainly agree that Air Canada should not be run from the floor of the House of Commons, but when problems of this magnitude are brought to the attention of a member of parliament he would be derelict in his duty if he did not raise them here.

I find it very strange that the Minister of Transport has not given any constructive answers with regard to what he is going to do about these problems, and I hope that after today I can receive an answer from the parliamentary secretary as to what action will be taken to correct the problems at the finance branch.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) this week asked the Minister of Transport when Air Canada will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and I hope we can receive an answer today.

I would just like to go over some of the problems at the finance branch. I raised this matter with the Prime Minister on May 21. I said to him:

● (1550)

I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that, since there are no longer any enforced controls on travel agents reporting ticket sales and, as of October, 1975, there were an excess of 96,000 unreported travel agent ticket sales, which represents a minimum of $2,208,000 unpaid for transportation, . . .

That is just one example, Mr. Speaker. If we can have the Estey inquiry because of a $100,000 transaction I think we had better get a little action on a missing $2 million. As I pointed out earlier, the President of Air Canada stated that he is going to need a fare increase. I hope the government will make sure that no fare increase is granted until the financial mess is straightened out.

I drew to the attention of the government that Air Canada's own internal auditors endeavoured to audit the refund bank drafts account in 1975. This account is not less than $2.5 million per month, about $30 million per year. They finally gave up and that account remains unaudited since 1972. Therefore over the past four years a $120 million account has been in question. When I bring matters like this up what do I get—"Do not talk about Crown corporations on the floor of the House." That is a lot of nonsense, Mr. Speaker. The government is obligated to take action when it has a mess like this on its hands.

I pointed out that a debt of $186,000 of Electronic Associates Canada Ltd. of Toronto had been written off. How could that be possible, Mr. Speaker? How could it be possible to run an account that high? You would think they would be alerted to it at about $20,000 or $25,000 and not let it go any further. I understand that all tickets have not been accounted for by this company and the debt could run much higher still.

I have pointed out that in the past Air Canada has broken IATA rules and regulations. They issued buyer vouchers to Tourist Mount Royal, of Quebec, to the tune of $27,384. All that Air Canada collected from this travel agent was $9,445; they wrote off $17,938, Mr. Speaker. Under IATA rules and regulations this is illegal and the Auditor General should certainly look into it.

I also reported a letter from Harveys of Bristol (Overseas) Limited of London, England. They are continually complaining to Air Canada because they persist in paying the incorrect amount. Certain bills are overpaid and other accounts are not paid at all. As I pointed out, In the past the Air Canada Heathrow office in London has been threatened by the gas and light companies that the gas and light will be shut off unless they pay their bills. Mr. Speaker, this is all because of the finance problems of Air Canada in Winnipeg, and it is another reason why the Auditor General should clean up this mess.

Another of Air Canada's strange practices is that of contracting out their work. The billing is being distributed to Office Overload in Vancouver, Montreal, and Toronto, and exorbitant sums are being paid for the work done which is coming back with a 50 per cent error factor. That means that they get into deeper trouble. The sooner this mess is straightened out the better. Most employees of the finance branch sit around doing very little work so it is strange that all this work is being contracted out. The minister should investigate the situation and find out why Air Canada is contracting work out, and put a stop to it. The cost ranges anywhere from $5,000 to $9,000 per week to individual companies.

I pointed out too, that there are in excess of 180,000 tickets which have been used but in respect of which there is no record of sales ever having been reported to the finance branch. At a dollar a ticket this represents a lot of money, but when one considers that the lowest charge on Air Canada flights is $23 there is cause for concern to the tune of a possible $3,843,000. Can anyone explain how many hundreds of thousands of ticket sales have been reported but in respect of which the fares collected are insufficient to cover the cost of transportation?

At the end of April this year Air Canada had a net loss of $14½ million, about $1½ million over last year's deficit. We can see the direction things are going and why the government should get the Auditor General in to find out exactly what is going on. This should be done before Air Canada is brought before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. As was pointed out earlier, the Auditor General has authority to go in and conduct a survey.

Another area I should like to touch on is security at airports. We have reports that Air Canada has been warned by police that security is lax. An example is the gold robbery at the Ottawa airport. Air Canada was warned repeatedly by the Gloucester township police that there was no proper security. The gold theft a couple of years ago amounted to $175,000. To my knowledge there has been little or no improvement in security.

Another example is a group of Air Canada employees in New York who were arrested for alleged gold theft. I have been in touch with them and they tell me that security was removed a number of years ago and that they were in charge of large gold shipments themselves. These employees were arrested and charged with gold theft. They were eventually acquitted as they had nothing to do with the robbery, but they were left with legal fees of $18,000 which they had to pay themselves. This makes Air Canada employees or any airline employees very vulnerable. If there is any theft at any airport and employees are charged, Air Canada immediately dismisses them. They have to pay their own legal fees. I do not know why security was removed from these airports a couple of years ago, but the Minister of Transport should be looking into it. Apparently as an austerity measure Air Canada removed the guards at some of the airports. I fail to see the logic in that.

If an Air Canada employee is arrested the judicial system is so slow that his case could drag on for months, with legal fees mounting. They do not have any financial support from Air Canada.

In the few minutes remaining, Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary would tell the House what action the government will take regarding the Air Canada finance branch and if he would comment on the matter of airport security.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley).

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could give an explanation why he will not give me an answer to the two questions I asked?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) will speak when he is recognized by the Chair. This is not committee of the whole so he cannot answer questions. If he used his right to speak to answer the hon. member's questions now, then he would not be authorized to answer other questions afterwards. He will do it by his own choice at the end of his speech, and only after being recognized by the Chair.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to compliment the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) for bringing forward this motion today. I think it is the first time in the House of Commons that we have had an opportunity to discuss the user pay concept which is very important to all Canadians. They must have a full understanding of what the government is trying to do.

● (1600)

I heartily endorse the concept of the importance of transportation to regional disparities. I think it is most important to apply the cost-centre concept in letting the people of Canada know the purpose for which funds are to be used. If moneys are to be voted for regional disparity programs, let us account for them under such programs and not bury them in transportation estimates. It is important to eliminate the patchwork solutions to problems which are not aimed at eliminating problems but are designed to meet political situations. Put in simple economic terms I suggest that, by and large, it is better for the people who use the service to pay for it. I commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and his predecessor in that portfolio for having the political will to do what is right and to ignore political expediency in preparing our national transportation policy.

In any consideration of a cost effective, efficient transportation system you must remember that, if rates are low because of hidden costs, there will be greater use of expensive modes of transportation than there would be if fares or rates reflected real costs. That entails a loss to all.

This afternoon I should like to discuss the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. First, let me make a couple of comments. I am continually surprised because members of the opposition, who preach government restraint and less government intervention in the private sector, want to maintain the present subsidy system and not make our transportation system self-sustaining, which is what the user pay concept advocates. These remarks also apply to the business community.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his statement during the Christmas holidays on television, the business community was upset about his comments concerning the free market system. But when the business community discusses, for example, increased tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway system, it wants the tolls to remain the same. It does not want government intervention on the one hand, but likes the present subsidy system on the other. I remind the business community and the opposition that they cannot have it both ways.

Let me now speak about the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. It seems, because there has been so much talk of government restraint and so many questions about the effectiveness of government, that the press has not noticed something that happened in connection with the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. When the chairman of the St. Lawrence Seaway appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications I took note of the fact that administration costs in 1976 were lower than in 1973. In the past two years Seaway costs for maintenance, operations, and administration have risen only 12.8 per cent. I doubt if any government department, federal or provincial, any corporation, public or private, can boast of such a track record. That fact endorses, I think, what the Minister of Transport said earlier this afternoon. When the former minister of transport talked of the condition of this country's transportation system he was not referring to the managerial ability and effectiveness of those who operate this country's transportation systems.

It is important to reflect on the intent of the St. Lawrence Seaway Act, passed in 1951. It is also important to note that there was no opposition to certain clauses of the bill which were included at that time. For example, let me allude to section 17 which reads:

> The tolls that may be charged by the Authority shall be fair and reasonable and designed to provide a revenue sufficient to defray the cost to the Authority of its operations in carrying out the purposes for which it is incorporated, which costs shall include
>
> (a) payments in respect of the interest on amounts borrowed by the Authority to carry out such purposes;
>
> (b) amounts sufficient to amortize the principal of amounts so borrowed over a period not exceeding fifty years; and
>
> (c) the cost of operating and maintaining the canals and works under the administration of the Authority, including all operating costs of the Authority and such reserves as may be approved by the minister.

Clearly, parliament's wishes have not been met. Some moments ago the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), a member of the transport committee for whom I have the greatest respect, commented on the government's band-aid approach. I remind him that in 1962 the Conservative government then in power eliminated tolls on the Welland Canal. That was a grandiose example of a band-aid approach to difficulties in transportation.

In 1959 the initial year of the Seaway operations, a tariff of tolls based on estimates of future traffic was established by agreement between Canada and the United States. Its purpose was to obtain directly from the users the revenues required to cover operation and maintenance costs for this joint facility, as well as interest on loans and repayment of capital over a 50-year period.

From 1959 to 1973 combined revenues on the two sections had more than covered operation and maintenance costs but they were never sufficient to cover full interest or to enable any capital repayment. Since 1973, however, these costs have not been met and the annual deficit has been increasing steadily.

The main reasons why the original financial expectations were not fulfilled arise from circumstances which were not foreseen at the time the Seaway Authority's financial structure was established. Seaway tolls on the Montreal-Lake Ontario section have not been increased since the Seaway opened in 1959. Toll reviews took place in 1964 and 1967, but recommendations made by Canada to increase the level of tolls failed to obtain agreement on the part of the United States. Tolls on the Welland section of the system were suspended, as I said earlier, after an announcement in 1962 by the prime minister of the time.

The result has been that the Seaway's debt at the end of March of this year stood at $818 million. The difficult financial position in which the Seaway finds itself obscure, unfortunately, its true value to Canada as well as its operational success and over-all economic viability. Over 17 years of operations it has experienced a substantial growth in terms of tonnage. Long range forecasts of the traffic growth indicate a 12.5 per cent annual average increase during the next 15 years.

Many other benefits, including lowered transportation costs particularly on such key commodities to Canada as grain and iron ore, the development of increased international trade, and the impact on the labour and industrial sectors of the St. Lawrence River-Great Lakes area, have clearly established the Seaway's role as a vital element in our economy. Cabinet agreed some time ago that in principle the financial structure of the Seaway should be revised so as to provide the authority with a realistic financial base related to reasonable expectation of future revenues. The Minister of Transport has indicated his intention to recommend to his cabinet colleagues a revision that will have the added objective of providing a foundation for a new tolls policy.

Allow me to substantiate the benefits of the Seaway. Hon. members commented earlier about the importance of the Seaway with respect to the distribution of wheat. I remind hon. members that in 1958 the toll cost per bushel of wheat was 1.3 cents. In 1975 that cost, at 1.3 cents per bushel, remains the same. In other words, Mr. Speaker, between 1958 and 1975 the toll cost per bushel of wheat did not change. In addition, other costs during that period were increased.

The toll costs are not the reason for the increase in the price of wheat or other bulk products shipped through the Seaway. If I am not mistaken toll costs represented about 10 per cent of the sale price of a bushel of wheat in 1958. In 1975 those toll costs represented approximately 3 per cent of the sale price. Therefore tolls are an insignificant factor in total transportation costs, and form an insignificant part of the value of the merchandise when it finally reaches the consumer. The same may be said of coal and iron ore. The toll costs for iron ore in 1965 represented about 9.5 per cent of the total transportation cost. In 1975 the proportion of tolls was reduced to 5.3 per cent, or almost half the previous amount. This again demonstrates the insignificance of the increase in tolls.

[Mr. Lumley.]

A moment ago I talked about the situation in the United States. Incidentally the situation in that country is the basis for the argument used by the business community and the opposition for the government's not increasing tolls. It is logical for our American Seaway counterparts not to want an increase in tolls. In 1970 Congress and the President of the United States enacted laws whereby all interest, both past and to be incurred in future, was to be written off. Consequently surpluses which the American authority had been able to generate were applied against some of the debt it had incurred. Let us consider the statement, made both by the American and Canadian authorities, that both countries benefit from the Seaway equally. We must assume that the Canadian government is picking up the majority of the deficit on the Welland Canal because it is 100 per cent Canadian-owned. What does this mean? It means that we are, in fact, subsidizing the Americans. Consequently the Americans have no incentive to increase tolls.

The cabinet agreed some time ago in principle that the financial structure of the Seaway should be divided in order to provide the authority with a realistic financial base related to reasonable expectation of future revenues. The Minister of Transport has indicated his intention to recommend to his cabinet colleagues a revision which will have the added objective of providing a foundation for a new tolls policy. Personally I do not think the government should write off the debt but change it into some form of equity because the Seaway does have substantial assets. The replacement cost is estimated at between $4 billion and $5 billion.

● (1610)

A policy of freezing Seaway tolls, and indeed an outright cancellation of these tolls, may be looked upon by some as a tool for promoting economic development. A serious drawback from Canada's point of view is that Canada carries more than 90 per cent of the investment and that our country bears a corresponding share of any deficits, while both countries benefit more or less equally from the waterway.

If we are to reach an explicit objective of commercial viability in terms of both the operations of the carriers and the provision of infrastructure, the St. Lawrence Seaway will no doubt have to be given a new financial structure and tolls will have to be increased.

This means that the users of the Seaway will have to pay to a reasonable degree the costs incurred in the operations of this transportation infrastructure. We must use sense and judgment to determine what a proper charge should be. Yes, the prices for transportation services will have to go up, and likely more rapidly than in the past.

It is the government's responsibility that the transportation system be efficiently run, that unjustified price increases are avoided, and that whatever increases are necessary are reasonable and equitable in terms of their impact. I heartily endorse the comments made by the hon.

member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to the effect that the onus is on each member of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, representing all sides of this House, to participate actively and constructively in meeting the request of the Minister of Transport to develop a new transportation policy for Canada.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate on the motion moved today by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). It attempts to pinpoint some of the fundamental problems of transportation in this country. In particular it deals with the problem of the new concept of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) of user pay as it applies, in his words, to mature and immature regions in Canada and to the different modes of transportation.

Earlier today the minister graced us with some remarks. We are dealing with something that is fundamental to each member of this House, be he from the east, west, or central part of this land. It was rail transportation and some of the problems of transportation that built this country and helped keep it together. Coming from the Atlantic area and having practised law in British Columbia, I know something about the history of the CPR. Members from all parts of the country know how vital transportation is in terms of their allegiance to and identity with this country. That is why there is a very real concern in almost a non-political way when any new minister comes in with a so-called new policy.

When the minister starts referring to user pay, and to mature and immature regions of the country, opposition members, and I am sure some government members, would like to know just what he means. What do his officials mean when they talk about mature and immature regions of the land? Those are the words used in the minister's announcement of the policy.

If the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) does not know that in the enunciation of the minister's policy the words "mature" and "immature" were used, I can understand why transportation in this country is in a mess. I hope that before time runs out today the parliamentary secretary will amplify, clarify, or at least state what he means when he says I am misquoting when I talk about the mature and immature regions of this country in reference to the new transportation policy of his boss, the Minister of Transport.

The minister graced us today with an interesting lecture from the podium of the classroom on the problems in Canada and now we must be realistic. I was going to give some very fundamental and detailed equations and figures with regard to some particular problems. However, when I heard the minister's dialectical exercise this morning I weighed upon the transport committee chairman on this side of the House to ask if I could reply to the minister. When the minister spoke today he tried to define his concept of user pay. In effect he made the brilliant statement that if the user does not pay, the non-user must. We have to be realistic in accepting this proposition. As I say, I am glad the hon. member for Crowfoot placed this motion before the House and that the minister was here this morning.

In Atlantic Canada we have had what was called transportation week. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will have something to say about this. Even though the minister said he would be there to amplify on some of the problems of his new policy, unfortunately at the last minute, for whatever reasons, he was not able to be there.

Mr. Goodale: The budget vote.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear someone saying the budget vote. I would hesitate to accept that because there is not a minister who cannot be where he wants to be when there is a majority government. With a majority government, ministers go where they want to be. We all know that the vote on the budget the other night was not a vote of confidence in the government.

The Minister of Transport absented himself later today, as he absented himself in Halifax from a conference which had been in preparation for six months. It was pretty fundamental to Atlantic Canada. I do not know what it is like in Saskatchewan. However, for the minister at the last minute to excuse himself from a conference in Atlantic Canada that had been set up for months was a sad reflection of his concern for transportation problems in Atlantic Canada. There was great concern in Halifax when the minister did not show up. It is the same type of disappointment, but to a lesser degree, that the minister is not here today. There may be a legitimate reason for that.

Rarely in Atlantic Canada has there been such concern about where we are going in transportation. That is primarily because of the rehash of some of these new or old ideas that the minister has been talking about. I am going to come to that.

The minister says we have to be realistic with regard to transportation. There is not a member of this House who does not appreciate there has to be some realism. However, I suggest to the minister that if there were realism and only realism in transportation, this country called Canada would never have been built.

This type of narrow minded professorial, restricted theory, with no inspiration or imagination in a field that is crying for inspiration, imagination, and new energy, is one reason we have these problems in transportation. In his speech the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) said you cannot have it both ways. Why should the people of Canada have faith in the Minister of Transport when he says we have to be realistic in our policy, and no longer have band-aids or political expediency in the area of transportation?

Never was the question of transportation more abused in more crass political ways than by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the time of the last election in his politically dishonest attempt to stay in power. Now the Minister of Transport, cloaking himself in the sackcloth of some vestal virgin, wants us to walk with him hand in hand down this little road, ride on the bumpy railbeds, and fly in the planes of this land. He wants us to do all these things and place our confidence in him and not talk about band-aids and political expediency, when the reality is that the government for 43 of the last 50 years has had responsibility for transport. It has had the chance to build rail beds, it has had the chance to take politics out of transportation and get down to basics. That is why we are a little skeptical when the minister says everything will be peaches and cream and that the word politics will be taken out.

● (1620)

As far as some of his plans are concerned, the Minister of Transport was the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

An hon. Member: He still is.

Mr. Nowlan: That is unfortunate for the Wheat Board. It was the present Minister of Transport who conceived the LIFT project—lower inventories for tomorrow. And we all know it became lower incomes for tomorrow.

An hon. Member: It did not.

Mr. Nowlan: It did, because it took hundreds of thousands of acres out of production just at a time when wheat was going from about $1.05 a bushel to $4 or $5 a bushel. The farmers of Western Canada were short-changed by this classroom concept which was promulgated by the Minister of Transport. Because he sometimes wears the cloth of a politician, he sold the idea to the government, and the wheat farmers of the West were the people who lost out. We are afraid we shall lose out as a result of some of the transportation policies envisaged today.

I wish to move on now in a non-partisan way; some of the words I intend to quote were spoken by people who wear Liberal sackcloth from time to time—provincial premiers who are concerned about where the federal government is going in the field of transport and so on. I might point out that the premiers of Atlantic Canada are, one might say, bipartisan—there were two Liberal premiers and two Conservatives. But on the Maritime Council, to which I shall soon refer, there are only three—two Liberals and one Conservative. I would draw the attention of the House to the final communiqué of the Council of Maritime Premiers issued in Charlottetown on May 26 of this year. With regard to transportation the premiers say:

> Bona fide consultation is required between governments to ensure that transportation is used to help rather than hinder economic development.

The premiers also expressed concern that the federal government is increasing cost recovery within some transportation systems without considering the effects on the over-all economy. The communiqué went on:

> Undue reliance upon the user pay concept should be replaced by the vigorous pursuit of cost-effective solutions . . .

That expresses the generality in terms of national transportation policy. Coming to specifics, one of them was mentioned by my hon. friend from Carleton-Charlotte who spoke of Bill C-61. I will read two paragraphs because they are so interesting. The one I intend to read first deals with the budget and explains why there is concern in Atlantic Canada about where transportation policy is heading.

It is, of course, easy for us all to say we are in favour of restraint, but there is real cause for concern when expenditure in an area which is so vital to Atlantic Canada, the area of transportation, is cut by over 50 per cent. Need I point out once again that we are talking here about a region of economic disparity, a region where wage levels generally are lower than they are in the rest of the country, a region which does not enjoy the same extended economic base as other parts of Canada? Those are not just my sentiments. Those words paraphrase the feelings of the Atlantic premiers, as is clear from this later statement in the communiqué:

> The premiers expressed disappointment in the federal budgetary restraint program as it applies to transportation expenditure. Recognizing the need for effective measures to control inflation and restore economic stability they endorse the principle of a restraint program but took issue with the discriminatory nature of the transportation section of the announced program, noting that of a total reduction of $41.2 million for the whole of Canada $21.9 or 63 per cent would affect the maritime region transportation program exclusively.

The communiqué went on to say:

> In view of the present economic situation in the Atlantic provinces and the effect transportation has upon it, the announced transport expenditure reduction would seem to be inconsistent with programs designed to correct regional disparity.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, say it all in a nutshell. I fail to understand how someone could hope to establish a viable program of regional development, while on the other hand making such savage cuts in transportation subsidies affecting the very region which one is supposedly trying to help. It is contradictory. It is one of the reasons why the program of regional economic development has failed to produce the economic results for which members on both sides had hoped when the department was set up several years ago. It is impossible to pursue a viable program of economic development unless it is complemented and supplemented by satisfactory transportation policies. Over half of the restraint measures announced in the federal budget hit Atlantic Canada right on the nose.

Bill C-61 was mentioned by other speakers and I shall not spend too much time on that aspect. As for Bill C-87, fortunately the government House leader has agreed to take another look at it. Some people say it will put an end to exports of grain and flour. These are things which give rise to legitimate concern among people in the region regardless of their political stripe.

● (1630)

I mentioned earlier the comments made by the Council of Maritime Premiers on budgetary restraints which feels, quite rightly, that a cut of over 50 per cent is a little heavy for an area of this kind which cannot stand that kind of cut.

They had this to say about the coasting trade in reference to Bill C-61:

> The Premiers expressed concern that the safeguards required to protect regional industries against high transportation costs which would result from the removal of Commonwealth shipping in the coasting trade do not appear to have been adequately provided in either the new act or proposed regulations. The Premiers said that at a meeting of the Council of Maritime Premiers and the Premier of Newfoundland with the Honourable Jean Marchand in September, 1973, it was announced that Canada would withdraw from the British Commonwealth Shipping Agreement and reserve coastal shipping to Canadian flag vessels. At the same time, assurance was given by the federal minister that safeguards would be introduced to protect regional industries against high transportation costs.
>
> The Premiers today are sending a telegram to the Honourable Otto Lang urging him to permit the use of non-Canadian vessels according to the dictates of availability and cost. This is essential to enable maritime industries to benefit from one of the region's natural advantages.

I should also like to refer to the telex of May 26 signed by the chairman of the Council of Maritime Premiers, Premier A. B. Campbell of P.E.I. He is a concerned premier of Atlantic Canada and he had this to say in his telegram:

> Further to our telex to you of December 16, 1975, and other representations made to you and your predecessor, we are still deeply concerned about Bill C-61. Recent representations from industry have heightened this concern, giving it a new dimension.
>
> In view of this, we now urge you to take action which will retain for Atlantic industries their access to non-Canadian vessels for the coasting trade without serious impediment in the form of the necessity for either expensive or difficult-to-obtain waivers, licences or permits. Availability of suitable vessels and their cost should be the criteria for the selection of carriers, with the decision resting with the shipper.
>
> Existing industry and future industrial development in the Atlantic provinces will be seriously affected if this bill, and those regulations of which we have been made aware to date, come into effect. This legislation would tend to transform the Atlantic provinces into inland provinces in so far as coastal shipping is concerned without their concomitant advantages. High transportation cost to and from markets is already one of the most serious obstacles restricting growth in this region. By restricting competition, Bill C-61 will increase these costs for water, rail or truck.
>
> We urge you to withdraw or change this legislation as it pertains to coastal shipping and to permit the use of non-Canadian vessels according to the dictates of availability and cost, thereby enabling our industries to benefit from one of this region's natural advantages.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the remarks that have been made today are those not of partisan, political creatures that are worried about band-aids, but of Canadians worried about fundamentals. We want to know how this new policy of user pay as it applies to mature and immature regions of Canada is going to work. Perhaps the definition of mature is that we should remove subsidies or make cutbacks, for some paradoxical reason, in Atlantic Canada, which everyone would admit is an area of economic disability, that this in the minister's eyes will be considered a mature region. He did not say anything about that today. We have all heard about western alienation, Quebec separation, and B.C. isolation. I say that we are going to cry out for our maritime rights unless we get a better deal from the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) would like to take part in this debate before the day ends, so I assure him that my remarks will be very brief and will leave him plenty of time, provided that Mr. Speaker calls on him when I sit down.

I should like to join with others in commending the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) for putting down this subject for debate on this opposition day. Like many days in this House of Commons, it is not a day on which we make decisions or arrive at any conclusions, but I do think it has been one of the better days of debate on transportation policy. Arguments have been presented from both sides, there has been a good deal of philosophy and many suggestions, and I hope that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and his department will take cognizance of what has been said in this day's debate.

It will come as no surprise to anyone in this House when I say that the reason that I ask for the floor for a few minutes is to underline once more what I think is one of the requirements of a transportation industry that serves the best interests of the country. That requirement is good employer-employee relations.

I come now to what might be called my favourite subject. I think that one of the ways to establish and to maintain good employer-employee relations is to have good pension programs. It has been a long struggle to get the pension programs of Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to their present level, but there is a tremendous need for still further improvement.

The fact is that nearly two years ago, as a result of one of the distputes in the railway industry, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) appointed Dr. Noel Hall as a special commissioner to examine all aspects of railway pensions. When I say all aspects, I refer to all railways in Canada, to the pensions of those already retired, the pension plans of those still working, and so on. We do not yet have this report. The Minister of Labour has promised it "soon" so often that the meaning of the word is hard to grasp, but I do hope we will get it within a few weeks. The difficulty is that it is taking so long to get the report and that many pensioners who had hoped to benefit from it have died, and others wonder whether they will live long enough to see the benefits of this study.

I have two things I want to say. First, I urge the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour, when they do get Dr. Noel Hall's report, to study it very carefully and if, as I am sure there will be, there are in it recommendations that will improve the pension position of railway workers I hope they will do all they can to see to it that those recommendations are implemented without delay.

The other thing I want to say is simply by way of underlining the point that I made in a question which I put to the Minister of Transport this morning. Although we have been waiting for the Noel Hall report a long time, one can at least say that the Canadian National Railways a short while ago did put into effect an increase, a small one but nevertheless an increase, in the pensions of those already retired or their survivors. It seems to me that that action by the Canadian National Railways should be matched by the Canadian Pacific. The point of my question to the Minister of Transport was to urge that he have a serious talk with CPR about this matter. I appreciated his reply that he would do so, and I simply rise now to make it part of the record at the end as well as at the beginning of this day. I hope this is something the minister will do at the earliest possible opportunity.

I agree with all who have spoken in this House as to the importance of transportation to this country and as to the need for making improvements. But I repeat that we will have a healthy transportation policy if we have happy and satisfied employees, and one of the best ways to achieve good employer-employee relations is to establish and maintain the best possible pension plan. Real improvements have to be made for our railway workers, and they must be made soon.

● (1640)

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I was moved to make a few remarks in this debate by the response of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) today which made us more clearly aware of the direction we appear to be taking in respect of transportation policy. I certainly am more clearly aware of this than I had been up to this point. I really feel the minister did a remarkable job in describing for us in rather simple terms exactly the direction we are taking. I cannot accept the suggestion we heard a few minutes ago, and earlier today from the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), that in fact the result of the minister's remarks today was greater confusion. The minister's response seemed to me to be a remarkable clarification of the issue, and I thank him for it.

Having regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott), and particularly those regarding the airline industry and its response to the cost factors and arguments put forward by the minister, I feel perhaps some response should be made, particularly in respect of general aviation in this country.

The aviation industry has obviously been a resource assistance to opening up this country. This must be recognized by the minister and his officials who contemplate this idea of cost effect and the user pay concept in the total transportation field. If in fact the airline industry is to be consulted with respect to how airports will be built in the future and what facilities are needed for the movement of passengers, and in respect of runways required for future type aircraft, and those sorts of things, then it seems to me these facilities will also be used by aircraft that do not require luxurious buildings, 10,000-foot runways, and six feet of concrete at the threshold. In fact these facilities will be used by aircraft flying into our hinterlands and carrying small packages on an express basis between cities. In this way we will have facilities substantially over-built for the type of aircraft using them.

I trust and I believe, because of what the minister indicated today, that there is a conscious awareness of this fact when considering the user pay concept. I trust there is to be some realization that a great deal of the time the use to be made of these facilities which are substantially over-built will be by these small aircraft, and that as a consequence some reasonable approach will be made in respect of that reality.

I should like to make one further suggestion, and I commend this to the minister's attention, in respect of the movement of passengers by rail and by other means. The minister indicated he really thought it would be unreasonable for anyone to suggest that people should not be moved by bus along an unused railway line. I hope he has in mind the fact that some people may not be travelling now by bus as a matter of preference over rail travel, but rather because of the mode of transportation that is available, the type of facility, etc. Many of them are using this mode of transportation because of the misuse and disrepair of the available mode of transportation.

We have to be careful that we do not impose on the people our position of preference in respect of transportation. We must pay more attention to the fact that people may not rather move by train than by bus, or by bus than by train. Having in mind some of the bus service between Toronto and Windsor and the length of time it takes, I feel certain that most of my constituents would express a preference for rail travel over bus, even if we were able to improve that service.

[Mr. Daudlin.]

One must also remember the Bruce-Grey Peninsula where in fact there used to be train passenger service available. That service no longer exists. One would hope that in fact we would not place ourselves in the position in respect of such areas that we will only be looking at the possibility of a bus service as opposed to the reinstitution of train service.

May I also say in respect of the situation in that part of my riding of Peeley Island that the transportation services seem to be deteriorating. There are pockets of people who will never be able to support the type of transportation they need. It would be unreasonable to suggest that the 200 island people should pay the total cost of an air or boat service to that island.

Let me indicate again that after listening to the minister today I feel confident that, notwithstanding the user pay concept, there will be an improvement in over-all transportation policy. I feel that in fact there must be a substantial amount of reasoning behind that concept to be followed by cost effectiveness, with the realization there is still the principle that the taxpayers as a whole must bear some of the costs of transportation. Having pointed out some of the concerns I have, and having expressed my complete satisfaction with the general principle as outlined by the minister, I want to compliment the minister again for a straightforward and clear exposing of this issue today.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity during this debate to make a few remarks concerning the user pay concept in respect of mature and immature areas, regions, and modes. I think regions in this sense are of great importance, keeping in mind the many people involved in using the transportation system in Canada and those managing the system.

We can call a mode of transportation such as the airline industry mature today, but when we think of that industry serving areas such as Canada's frontier in the north we get an entirely different picture. We talk about the user pay concept, and I think of the five major airports in Canada which have a revolving fund. This fund gives us some measure of the performance of the industry, and we have the indication from public accounts that this fund is in fact operating at a profit, last year earning something like $12 million.

We find the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) advocating the user pay concept, and arbitrarily imposing a 30 per cent increase in landing fees and charges at these airports because of the over-all cost of operating all our airports. Let me point out that at the other 211 airports in Canada there must be a dollar loss of between $100 million and $250 million. For this reason I do not quite understand the exception taken by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Goodale) to the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan).

The regional considerations represent the most serious aspects of this user pay concept that we will have to consider in committee. If the user pay concept is to work, if the new transportation policy we have been given is to be effective, and if we are to keep this country together we will require some innovations. We will require an effective transportation policy that works in fact to keep this country together, and we will not have such a policy on the basis of what the minister was talking about today. Such a policy can only work in the context of national priorities.

Let me refer to the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When he began to speak I thought he was going to get at the heart of the problem, namely, top priority items in implementing a workable transportation policy for this country. He then moved from what I thought was the key issue. He limited his remarks concerning the employees strictly to pensions. Pensions represent an important part of the benefit package of our working force, and I agree with the concern expressed by the hon. member for that segment of the working force involved in transportation.

● (1650)

I stress, however, that there is no point in spending hundreds of millions of dollars on improving transportation in Canada unless we have full and open co-operation from members of the work force who are involved in that aspect of Canadian life. There are thousands and thousands of lost man years of effort in our transportation system due to strikes. If the transportation policy which has been submitted to the thirtieth parliament by the government is going to work, we must first involve the nation's work force in the planning and implementation of this policy. There is no sense in improving the arteries to the port of Vancouver and in building more grain elevators so we can service the world faster and better, if the people manning and operating the system do not have the right attitude toward it.

A fundamental priority in making the new transportation policy of the government work—and I am basically sympathetic to it and I have worked pretty hard to gain an understanding of it—would, in my opinion, be the involvement of the employees and work force of this nation. We can no longer continue to serve this country well and to take our part and place in the world with a labour management philosophy which involves confrontation. We will have to turn to Europe and look at the results of co-determination, look at the results of industrial democratization of other industrial countries and integrate them into our lives in Canada as a first priority to keep us from spinning our wheels in trying to update our great transportation machine in Canada.

For example, I look at such things as the STOL experiment. I can understand $25 million or $30 million being thrown away on an experiment, but I cannot understand STOL when the need is for a high speed railway down the dense corridor of Canada. I notice that my good friend, the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), was commenting on the St. Lawrence Seaway and pointing out that the administration burden has decreased. That is probably the only example we could find in government agencies where it has. But I should like to put it into perspective. Here we have a $6 million administrative burden for $23 million of revenue which cost $22 million in direct costs and requires a $42 million subsidy from the people of Canada. If that is "user pay", then something has to give.

We in other parts of Canada—and I am very fortunate in coming from the port of Vancouver—have had an excellent track record in having been able to pay for our own facilities. We produce over 54 per cent of the profits earned by the National Habours Board of Canada. We would like to see the port of Vancouver developed and utilized. The port of Vancouver is not just in Burrard Inlet or on the Pacific coast, or on the tidemark line. The port of Vancouver starts somewhere up in the hinterland, and I am speaking specifically of the mechanics of the port. If we resolve the problems of that port and utilize it to its full effectiveness, we will have to start organizing the dispatch and utilization of all modes of transport and co-ordinate them. I have had more input from union members out there than I have had from management in the utilization of facilities that already exist there. If we dispatch trains from Kamloops and take away the competitive forces between the grain elevators there, we could increase our ship loadings. We cannot increase our ship loadings unless we have the input and co-operation of the labour force.

Time is running out on me, Mr. Speaker, but there are two more things I would like to say. We are talking about the user pay concept in transport. This means that we will have to start decentralizing the decision-making process because we in the west are just about at the end of our tether about some of the decisions imposed on us by the mandarins, bureaucrats, and so called experts here in Ottawa.

When we were out travelling on the west coast with the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications we visited the port of Seattle and the airport owned by the port. That airport is one of the finest installations that anyone interested in transport could visit. It has satellite stations, and the main terminal is served by a computerized underground railroad. It has fantastic immigration facilities so that people emerging from large airlines do not have to wait for hours. The customs and parking facilities are also excellent. Everything is made for man, as it should be. That airport cost only $150 million. It has two runways. It is financed locally, the interest is paid, it is non-profit and self-liquidating. Then I look at the over building for which we have a tendency here in Canada, and at the $450 million minimum that Mirabel will cost us. There is something wrong with us in Canada. We are a country of 24 million people and we cannot afford this kind of luxury, this nonsense, this over building in the light of examples of other airports on this continent.

The other thing we do in air transportation is to base everything on seasonal demands. We place full page advertising for charter flights to Europe on our national airline. We advertise holidays here and there, we tell people to spend their dollars somewhere else. The demand on our airports is to take care of the peak summer tourist season. Is this the user pay concept? The guy who has to travel back and forth selling and buying goods and seeking orders has to pay the load for the whole. We have to put this into perspective. The regular user of our airline and transportation systems is prepared to pay and wants to pay, but why should we pay for facilities that are over built and over designed for 60 days of the year for the tourist industry? This should be rationally considered in our consideration of the user pay principle.

I should like to say a few words now on Bill C-61. A special committee was called, of which there are no minutes, on Bill C-61, and we have been offered three major amendments to this bill in an attempt to keep it from dying before the life of this parliament fades. Within hours of the last meeting I had those amendments telephoned to the west coast and they have been meeting on them ever since. I have just had the results of these meetings telephoned back to me this afternoon, and there is no way that the industrial groups on the west coast can go along with the bill even as it is amended. It has to go back to the drawing board because we have no faith and trust in the government any longer.

Mr. Goodale: You have been listening too much to Jack Davis.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have now expired.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, through the usual channels it has been indicated to me that there might be unanimous consent for me to make a brief statement on motions, an announcement which I think is pertinent.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is quite true, Mr. Speaker. We are prepared to hear the announcement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We too would like to hear it, and I should like 30 seconds to express appreciation for what I understand is coming.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is my concern. As hon. members know, Standing Order 15 provides the opportunity for hon. members to comment on a statement and even to ask questions. Is there consent to revert to motions for the statement by the minister, and then to see how it goes by consent and agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AID FOR MAIN À DIEU, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as many hon. members know, a disaster recently took place in a community in Nova Scotia called Main à Dieu which suffered from a very severe fire which has caused great damage to the community and the surrounding area.

● (1700)

Among the many unhappy consequences it is obvious that there will be severe unemployment, although I hope it will be temporary. In the face of this, and along the lines of our response last year to the Springhill community disaster, we are going to make available immediately some funds from the Local Initiatives Program to try to provide the necessary resources for clean-up, rehabilitation, and employment. The amount has not yet been determined. That is simply because I have just been apprised of this, and we have not yet had the opportunity to determine exactly how much will be required. However, that will be settled in a matter of a very few days.

Applications for projects designed to aid the community and employ local people will be considered as soon as they are received. All projects submitted under this special phase of the Local Initiatives Program should be capable of immediate implementation, and they will be allowed to begin just as soon as they can be put into operation.

Project officers will be available to work with local organizations and the citizens of Main à Dieu and to assist them in designing projects. As I say, this is being provided to the community of Main à Dieu in view of the very unusual circumstances involved, and although the Local Initiatives Program is primarily intended to relieve seasonal unemployment, it is also designed to aid and improve local communities. I think these circumstances really do fit, and I hope this will receive the approval of hon. members.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition I would like to commend the government for this act of compassion in an area which suffers in any event in terms of employment. I am satisfied that the officials of the minister's department will move with dispatch in processing the applications, and in terms of the bureaucratic necessities which must take place for public funds, I know it will be in the mind of the minister and all his officials to cut those necessities to the very minimum.

I am sure I join all hon. members in the House, particularly my colleagues from that area, in thanking the minister on their behalf and on behalf of the people who will be the beneficiaries of this program.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy in making this announcement here in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We join in the sentiments already expressed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and express our pleasure that the minister and his officials have been able to move on this issue.

One of the particular reasons I hoped I would get 30 seconds is that a few days ago my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), raised this matter in the House, and in view of his not being able to be here this afternoon, I want on his behalf to express appreciation, but even more so on behalf of the citizens of Main à Dieu.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my turn, on behalf of my party, I would like to congratulate the minister for making such pertinent use of moneys which could be used for other Local Initiative Programs. We know that when such disasters affect a part of the country, it is important that the federal government be in the position to take steps as quickly as possible to help the victims, instead of deliberating for weeks and months before coming to a decision. Therefore I congratulate the minister on taking such a quick decision. This proves that in many circumstances when a minister makes up his mind to take action, he can do it and we should all commend him for what he did today in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being past five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.08 p.m. the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 14, 1976

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONGRATULATIONS TO FIRST NATIVE, DR. ANTONE, TO GRADUATE FROM FACULTY OF MEDICINE AT WESTERN UNIVERSITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion that I am certain will receive unanimous consent from both sides of the House.

It was my privilege to witness the graduation ceremony this past Friday for the first native student to graduate from the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Western Ontario. It may interest the House to know that Dr. Irwin Nobert Antone is from the Muncey Reserve and will be serving his internship at Victoria Hospital in London. My son informs me Dr. Antone and he will commence their internship this coming Monday on Obstetrical-Gynecological Service and it is Dr. Antone's intention to establish a practice on his reserve at the completion of his training.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House recognize this milestone in native education and through you, Sir, send the appropriate letter of congratulation on behalf of all members of the House to Dr. Irwin Antone.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the unanimous consent of the House is required to put the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSAL TO STUDY SIX ALTERNATIVES TO DAIRY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the seriousness of the problem facing the Quebec industrial milk producers and the difficulties experienced in working out a satisfactory dairy policy, and since it is urgent to remedy that situation, in order to protect our farm producers and thus stabilize an important sphere of activity for the economy of our country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House immediately consider the six alternatives to a dairy policy set forth by the Food Prices Review Board in its report of February last, so as to bring out their main lines with a view to establishing a balanced and economic dairy policy and thus contribute to a positive settlement of the present conflict.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REASON FOR DISBANDMENT OF SPECIAL INVESTIGATION DIVISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the so far unrevealed number of 6,437,907 cheques issued in Ontario in the last year by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the 538 isolated individuals, all outside the commission, who were actually prosecuted for fraud during that period of time. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

● (1410)

That the Minister of Manpower make a statement giving all reasons the Unemployment Insurance Commission's special investigation division was disbanded on 24 hours' notice, whether or not it was investigating at the time the possibility that up to 5 per cent of cheques issued in Ontario for 1975 could be fraudulent, and whether or not it had uncovered evidence that certain unemployment insurance officials in metro Toronto were aware of forged record of employment forms being sold to newly arrived immigrants.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FINANCE

PROPOSAL TO MAKE GOVERNMENT DEFICIT SPENDING ILLEGAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask, with the unanimous consent of the House, for permission to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the crippling effect our inflation rate has on Canadians by reason of the fact that it erodes their real purchasing power, and the fact that most economists including John Kenneth Galbraith, philosopher-king to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognize that excessive government spending is a major cause of inflation, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House instruct the government to introduce legislation to make government deficit spending illegal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—KNOWLEDGE OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD OF VERBAL AGREEMENT ON FINANCING ON DECEMBER 2

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the conflicting answers given in this House concerning who was in the know concerning the verbal agreement between the Department of National Defence and Lockheed for Lockheed to provide interim financing for the LRPA purchase, would the President of the Treasury Board inform this House, did he or did he not know on December 2 that the agreement for Lockheed to provide financing was only verbal?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the statements made last week by the Prime Minister on this matter.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE OF TREASURY BOARD APPROVAL OF SIGNING OF CONTRACT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister last week contradicted his own statement of the previous week, so I was asking for clarification as to whether the President of the Treasury Board knew what was going on at that time, since the Prime Minister did not. Did Treasury Board give its approval to the signing on March 31 of the contract between Lockheed and Canada, which called for payments of up to $16 million to Lockheed in case Canada did not exercise its option?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check the exact date. We authorized the signing of a contract and then asked the minister to put it in escrow until the financial problems were solved by Lockheed.

* * *

[English]

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF ANY PAYMENTS MADE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services? The signed contract between Lockheed and Canada dated March 31, 1976 indicated that Canada would pay to Lockheed $6 million on April 1, 1976 and $4 million on April 30, 1976, plus a possible $808,000 for milestone payments, plus other payments. Can the minister advise the House if any or all of these payments have been made and if not, what is the present status of these liabilities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give a detailed reply to the hon. member, but those figures are accurate; there is a direct incurred cost of $10,808,000. We are now in the process of estimating with Lockheed the additional costs which we will have to disburse to reach a maximum of $16 million, taking into account contract agreements that Lockheed had engaged in with possible Canadian subcontractors. All this is obviously subject to verification by my department.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I may have lost something in the translation. Could the Minister of Supply and Services assure us that no money so far has been paid to Lockheed under that contract?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: No, I could not give the hon. member this assurance. All I know is that we definitely have direct costs to incur, amounting to $10.8 million. As for the balance it must be determined and checked by government officials.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR REFERRING MR. STOPFORTH'S CASE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Aside from the Canadian public which has lost $16 million as a result of this contract, a public servant to whom the President of the Treasury Board owes a special responsibility has had his reputation lost or at least damaged by statements by the Minister of Supply and Services. That civil servant cannot now save his reputation except through remedies which are really meaningless through the ordinary course of things. As the minister in government responsible for the public service of this country, will the President of the Treasury Board intervene with his colleagues to have this matter referred to the appropriate standing committee of this House so that Mr. Stopforth, the Minister of Supply and Services, the deputy minister and the Minister of National Defence can appear? Members of this House could then examine this matter in order that the relationship between Mr. Stopforth and the government can be clarified. I ask this in view of maintaining the principle of ministerial responsibility.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what was said in the House on this subject last week. Moreover, I think the official in question has decided to take legal action, therefore I do not intend to interfere in a dispute between citizens and the courts.

* * *

[English]

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—INQUIRY WHETHER MR. STOPFORTH GAVE REPORTS TO DEPUTY MINISTER WHO REPORTED TO MINISTER

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the official involved has decided to go to the courts because the government had determined not to give him any help as they have something to hide with respect to this matter. Mr. Stopforth said publicly that he gave accurate and complete information to his superiors in the Department of Supply and Services in respect of this matter. I ask the Minister of Supply and Services whether he received reports from his deputy minister and the extent of those reports with respect to what that deputy was told by Mr. Stopforth?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this question on June 1 in a very comprehensive manner. I think that if the hon. member takes time to look at my statement, he will see that it is very precise. It was fully backed by my deputy minister who took action because he has the prime responsibility for dealing with these matters.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ACTION OF DOME PETROLEUM TO PROVIDE INFORMATION TO REPRESENTATIVES OF COMMUNITIES AFFECTED BY DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Beginning today, the Can-Mar Corporation, a subsidiary of Dome Petroleum, is providing representatives of the communities affected by drilling in the Beaufort Sea with the financial capacity to send representatives from each community to view their drilling equipment in Victoria. I understand that in addition to paying their expenses, they are providing $100 a day spending money. How does the minister view this action? Does he see it as an innocent public relations gesture or as a possible attempt to diffuse or buy off criticism of the project from these communities?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Basically I see it for what it is, Mr. Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Buchanan: Sorry about that, Mr. Speaker. I see it as an attempt to help inform these communities. They will also, I understand, be represented on the drill ships when they get into position so that the process can be watched and reported back to their communities. I think it is really an informational or an educational process.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: I know the minister is accustomed to saying yes to the Prime Minister, but in view of the fact that it cannot be expected that these community representatives, any more than members of parliament, can possess any degree of expertise in this field at all—

Mr. Paproski: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Broadbent: —would the minister consider requesting the Dome Corporation to open their facilities to the same community representatives accompanied by neutral experts in the field?

An hon. Member: Who are they?

Mr. Buchanan: I will be happy to convey that suggestion to the appropriate quarter. I think it may well have some merit.

POSSIBILITY OF DELAY IN MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE PENDING DECISIONS OF BERGER COMMISSION AND ENERGY BOARD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary on the Mackenzie Valley project itself. Is it still the intention of the government to await the result of the hearings being conducted by the National Energy Board and Mr. Justice Berger before granting a pipeline permit? Will the government permit these hearings to consider possible routes for a pipeline via the Alcan Highway as currently under consideration in Washington and by the Polar Gas group?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Resources): I believe they have made an application in connection with the Northwest project; they are in the process of putting together a proposal to submit to the National Energy Board.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the Berger Commission look into that as well?

Mr. Buchanan: As the hon. member knows the Foothills application, to the extent that it differs from the Mackenzie Valley or the Canadian Arctic Gas application, was referred to Mr. Justice Berger for inquiry. We have to take the other question under advisement.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE OF SIGNING AGREEMENT ON AGRICULTURE WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a year and a half has elapsed since the announcement of the subsidiary DREE agreement on agriculture between Nova Scotia and the federal government, would the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion inform the House when the agreement will be signed, because considerable disruption is being caused to farmers planning to expand or consolidate their operations in the province?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed now over a year that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the government of Nova Scotia have been holding discussions to come to an agreement which would permit the development of agriculture in that province. We have received representations from our colleagues on this side of the House in particular and I have personally received some from Nova Scotia people but I can inform the hon. member and the House that this project is entering the final stage and that within a few weeks we shall be able to announce that the two governments have come to a conclusion and signed the agreement.

* * *

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED BLACK MARKET IN PLUTONIUM—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It arises from the hon. gentleman's call last week during the Habitat Conference for immediate check into the possible existence of a black market in plutonium. Since the Prime Minister indicated last Thursday in the House that he expected the Minister of Justice to pursue his own initiative in this matter, would the hon. gentleman tell us what kind of investigation he has launched into this very serious question?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, I asked the association making the allegation that there was a black market in the sale of plutonium to provide me with material and they have subsequently provided me with an affidavit which really does not indicate very much. However, I am forwarding it to the proper authorities within the government in the hope that the matter will be pursued.

Miss MacDonald: Since the implications of the possibility that plutonium is no longer within the complete control of government go far beyond the legal aspect and relate to the whole question of hazards and safeguards concerning the nuclear industry, would the minister undertake to have this matter referred to a parliamentary committee for full discussion and examination?

Mr. Basford: Whether it is referred to a committee or not is really not a matter for myself. I am in agreement with the hon. member that the matter is obviously a serious one; I said so in Vancouver and that is why I asked for particulars. The matter goes clearly beyond a purely police affair and it was not referred to me in my capacity as Minister of Justice. Since it involves safeguards in international affairs, I am in the process of referring the material to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the minister responsible for the Atomic Energy Commission.

* * *

ENERGY

POSITION OF HABITAT CONFERENCE ON DEVELOPMENT OF NUCLEAR POWER—CANADIAN RESPONSE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice as head of the Canadian delegation at Habitat and concerned directly with the number of issues raised there, including the one just referred to. Since the Vancouver symposium took a strong position on the moratorium on further export and development of nuclear power and the development of alternate sources, and since there was considerable representation made to the Canadian delegation at Habitat in respect of public hearings and the future development of nuclear power, I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the House what was the Canadian delegation's response and what follow up there may be on behalf of the government of Canada with respect to the considerable public concern registered.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the position of the government has been stated a number of times by the Prime Minister, including in Vancouver.

Miss MacDonald: He said "live dangerously".

Mr. Basford: The question of public hearings was referred to in Vancouver, and I indicated that I would refer that matter to the Prime Minister and my colleagues when I returned to Ottawa, which I will do. The Prime Minister is, of course, today at the first ministers' conference.

* * *

OLYMPIC GAMES

ALLEGATION BRITISH COLUMBIA BANKS CHARGING SALES TAX ON OLYMPIC GOLD COINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General perhaps the President of the Treasury Board would care to respond to my question. I wonder whether the President of the Treasury Board would comment on the fact that in British Columbia banks are presently charging 7 per cent tax on the gold coins, which I understand are coins of the realm. Is this practice approved by the government, what is the government's position in regard to it, and are any other provinces charging a sales tax on Olympic coins?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will seek information about it because I do not have an immediate answer. I do not know whether it is a provincial or a federal tax. I will, however, take the necessary action to inform the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Brisco: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. For purposes of clarification, I can assure the President of the Treasury Board that the 7 per cent tax is indeed a provincial tax and is indeed being levied. Constituents in British Columbia are forwarding their money orders here to Ottawa, or even to Alberta, in order to purchase these coins.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak on behalf of the provincial government of British Columbia which has decided to tax this product which is sold across that province.

* * *

[English]

DIVORCE

POSSIBILITY OF ADOPTING NO FAULT PRINCIPLE AND UNIFORM MAINTENANCE RULE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to welcome the Minister of Justice back from his "love-in" in Vancouver, though since he has had his "love-in" he has had something to say about divorce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: If we are going to have a divorce law in Canada, it should be realistic, workable, less costly and less embarrassing. In view of this fact, is the Minister of Justice when he meets with the attorneys general of the various provinces, going to put on the agenda and discuss no fault divorce on the ground of marriage breakdown with the object of obtaining from the provinces their views on this matter—which is not a new thought; the committee discussed it in 1968—and also is he going to endeavour to obtain from the provinces uniform law as to maintenance and support, particularly for children, that will be enforceable by any jurisdiction in Canada, even if the order is made in a province where the parties affected are not residing at the time of the order?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I got the agreement of the provincial attorneys general at our meeting last October that at our June meeting, which will be next week, we would devote a day to discussing the report of the Law Reform Commission, as it relates, not only to the subject of divorce reform but family law reform generally. This is what we will in fact be doing.

The hon. member will apreciate, having undoubtedly read the report of the Law Reform Commission, that a number of issues of federal-provincial interest are raised therein, this is the report we will be discussing. Any action to be taken by the federal government or any measures to be introduced to the federal parliament will depend on the nature of those consultations and discussions. However, when the Law Reform Commission report was published, I indicated that I thought it was an excellent report. I hope that the question asked by my hon. friend from Calgary, whose welcome back I appreciate, is an indication that he and his party also support the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission.

● (1430)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, because of the two articles, the one on Saturday in the Globe and Mail under the headline, "Proposal for no-fault divorce approved by federal Cabinet", and the other which I found when I picked up my morning paper denying that fact, I should like to ask the minister whether he had the approval of his colleagues in discussing this matter, and does he approve the kind of law that would cover "no-fault divorce" meaning, of course, the breakdown of marriage?

Mr. Basford: As my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board knows, the Globe and Mail is not always accurate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How about the minister?

Mr. Basford: As the hon. member knows, I do not discuss any matters with anyone without the leave of my colleagues, and I indicated some time ago that we would be discussing the Law Reform Commission Report with the Attorneys General.

* * *

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION OPERATIONS CONTRAVENE ACT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and has to do with a matter which has been referred to him by his colleague, the Minister of State (Fisheries), regarding the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation which is obviously in contravention of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, 1968-69. Would the Solicitor General indicate what action he has taken in that matter?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the detailed answer to that question. I will have to get the information and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer just given by the Solicitor General, I wonder whether the Minister of State (Fisheries) could indicate what if anything, and I find it incredible—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Whiteway: Could the minister indicate what, if anything, he has done in this matter?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I have consulted the legal advisers of the Fisheries and Marine Service, and their answer leads me to believe that the hon. member is either misinformed or is trying to distort the function of the corporation.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

* * *

FISHERIES

ROLES OF CANADA IN ICNAF AFTER EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONE 200 MILES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of State (Fisheries) whether he can report to the House on the outcome of the recent ICNAF meeting in Montreal and, more specifically, whether he can tell the House what new role was discussed for Canada through its membership in ICNAF after our unilateral declaration comes into effect on January 1?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet been briefed in detail on the latest development as I have just returned to Ottawa within the last half-hour. The discussions which were going on last week were very much about the role of ICNAF in light of the extension of jurisdiction by ourselves and the United States. We made it very clear that we saw a continuing role for ICNAF outside the 200-mile economic zone since the ICNAF area does cover a number of fisheries outside that zone, and we are interested in the orderly management of that zone in order to avoid any adverse effect on the economic zone itself. I think it is a little early to indicate to the hon. member and to the House how the discussions are going, but they were quite positive in the report I received last week.

MEASURES FOR SURVEILLANCE OF 200-MILE FISHING ZONE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether he can enlarge upon the comments he made in Montreal regarding Canada's capability in respect of surveillance of the new 200-mile zone. Can he give the House some kind of timetable in respect of the acquisition of new equipment, and the new role proposed for the armed forces in this regard?

[Mr. Whiteway.]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I said in Montreal, and I say here, that we are doubling the level of boardings and inspections this year, which will mean about 1,200. This will be done with the assistance of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport in those areas where they can be of assistance, air identification and especially vessels used as platforms for fisheries officers. I also tried to make clear, and obviously this has not come across yet, that the jurisdiction of the zone will give us a very different management régime from what we have now, under which violations are reported to the state which penalizes its nationals. In the case of extended jurisdiction, ships violating the regulations within the Canadian zone will possibly see their permits lifted and see themselves taken to Canadian ports and subjected to Canadian law.

* * *

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED POLLUTION OF WATER SUPPLIES AS RESULT OF DEVELOPMENT OF TAR SANDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns pollution from the tar sands. It rises from a report the minister tabled in the House on Thursday. In view of the fact that the Alberta government has been ignoring for some time the arguments from its own officials, as well as federal officials, that the environmental controls over development of the tar sands are inadequate, and in light of the authority which the minister admitted he has to enforce water quality standards, can the minister assure this House that, since a report from his department has concluded there is a danger to water quality in the area from developments in the tar sands, he will use his authority to enforce reasonable water quality standards?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I can do, and this is what I have done, is get in touch with the government of Alberta, talk and discuss the matter with Mr. Russell. I think he has agreed that the level of pollution should come down, and he is taking steps to have the company agree on that. The company has agreed to do better than it is doing now, and that is all I can do for the time being.

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE LEVEL OF EMISSION OF SULPHUR DIOXIDE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister does have authority under the Canada Water Act to take more stringent action, I should also like to ask, in light of assurances already given to the House by the minister that he regards the projected emissions from the Syncrude plant of 287 long-tons of sulphur dioxide a day as too high, and that he would be pressing for a reduction in the emission levels from the Syncrude plant, can the minister assure this House that if he is unable through negotiations and cooperation with the Alberta government to reduce this level of emission he will use his authority to enforce what his department regards as appropriate environmental standards?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I can say is that at Syncrude we can, of course, do much better than we could with the old plant which is there, but this will require a lot of investment. As far as Syncrude is concerned, however, I think there is a good chance the standards will be met.

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—INQUIRY IF FEDERAL STANDARDS WILL BE APPLIED TO EMISSIONS OF SULPHUR DIOXIDE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I am confused by the answer just given to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Does the minister regard the Syncrude project as a federal project and, if so, is there any hesitancy on his part to take action to see that federal standards are applied? Forget what Alberta is doing. He has a federal responsibility if he regards this as a federal project. Is he saying that the federal standards shall apply as contained in the act?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows very well what the nature of the Syncrude company is.

Mr. Jarvis: I think I do.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is a joint organization and a joint venture, not the sole responsibility of the federal government. Even if it were a federal government plant or company it would be subject to the criteria established as standards by the province. It would be on exactly the same footing as the others.

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID IN PURCHASING NEW EQUIPMENT TO CONTROL EMISSION OF SULPHUR DIOXIDE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it is known that better equipment is available to control pollution in the atmosphere than that which is being installed at the Syncrude site. I think the minister knows that part of the reason for installing the inferior equipment relates to cost. Would the federal government be willing to participate in a greater way in supporting the increased cost to put in the different kind of equipment which would result in less pollution to the atmosphere?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, all I can do as the Minister of the Environment is insist, in co-operation with the provincial government, that the standards are met, and this is what I have done as far as we are concerned.

An hon. Member: I am asking you about federal funding.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am not the one who gives federal funds, and you know that.

IMMIGRATION

REJECTION OF REFUGEE STATUS FOR TWO URUGUAYAN FAMILIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in view of the present political upset in Uruguay will the minister now be looking at the case of two Uruguayan refugees and their families who, up to now, have been denied refugee status? Will the minister not agree that their civil rights would be in serious jeopardy should they be returned to Uruguay, and, if the minister cannot use his usual humanity, will he advise these people of their rights under the Immigration Appeal Act?

● (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the case has just come to my attention. Their plea for refugee status has been reviewed by the interdepartmental committee. They have made appeals to the Immigration Appeal Board and to the Federal Court of appeals. In every case their claim has been dismissed and the appeal rejected.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting that the stability of the democracy in Uruguay is such that these two persons can return without any question about their safety.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, in responding to the first part of the question where the hon. member suggested that I tell them their rights before the Immigration Appeal Board, those rights obviously have been exercised and the Immigration Appeal Board and the federal court have reviewed the case. I just received notice of the case this morning as a matter of fact. My discretionary powers are very limited because the deportation has been upheld by two court appeals, but I do want to look at the case again myself.

* * *

MANPOWER

PROPOSED EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—DATE OF CONSIDERATION BY CABINET

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his speech on the budget the minister stated:

> I expect to be able to recommend to my colleagues an employment strategy for the year ahead.

Now we know that the details of the strategy will not be given until the fall. Is the minister stating that this strategy will not be placed before his cabinet colleagues until the fall,—I hope this is not the case—and if I am wrong when does the minister think this important matter will be placed before his colleagues for their consideration and approval?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as sometimes happens the hon. member is wrong. I will be placing this before my colleagues much in advance of the fall, but in so far as the actual details of the program are concerned and the public announcement about it, that will be in the fall just as I said in my speech.

Oral Questions

PROPOSED EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—POSSIBILITY OF CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES AND PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has cleared that up. It was not clear before. Is there a role for the private sector in this strategy and is consultation with it and the provinces required before the many complexities of design can be worked out as referred to by the minister in answer to a question by the hon. member for Halifax.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be consulting most certainly with the provinces and to a large degree the private sector through the advisory committees available to me and any other contacts I can make.

* * *

[Translation]

OLYMPIC GAMES

PROPOSAL TO CONSULT QUEBEC ON INVESTIGATION OF FINANCING

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Since the Quebec premier declared during the weekend that he intends to instruct a parliamentary committee after the 1976 Olympic Games to consider the causes of the rising costs, could the President of the Treasury Board advise this House whether he would be prepared to communicate with the Quebec Minister of Finance to ask him that, in accordance with section 81 of the Quebec financial administration legislation, the Lieutenant Governor in Council or the Quebec Treasury Board ask the provincial auditor to investigate and report to the National Assembly so that the parliamentary committee which will consider the matter have all necessary information available to perform such a study?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be improper to try to explain to the Quebec Minister of Finance what are the requirements of the Quebec financial administration legislation, but I imagine that he must be informed. I will convey him the hon. member's question, but I am pleased to learn that it has been publicly stated that a public investigation will be held, as I mentioned before the committee last week.

* * *

[English]

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTION DEALS MADE WITH IMPORTING COMPANIES BY PRODUCING COUNTRIES—POSSIBILITY OF IMPORTERS OPENING BOOKS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I will put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware that it has now been revealed that for the past two years OPEC nations have been discounting with under-the-table deals the price of their oil from that stated to be the price and allowing the companies that deal in the products to speak of one price and pay a different price? If the Acting Prime Minister is so aware would he indicate what precautions have been taken in respect of government compensation payments to the international refiners and other persons who import crude oil and petroleum products into Canada to ensure that rip-offs at the expense of the people of Canada have not occurred.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the hon. member's question, but I would point out to him that the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, which will soon become a group within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, runs a careful check on all imports into Canada to make sure that this sort of rip off does not occur. However, I will bring it to their attention.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since in his answer he referred to the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could indicate if the government or that board has been successful in any way in having international companies open their world-wide books so that an examination may be made to make sure no one has benefitted from Canada's compensation payments while receiving an undisclosed discount from one of their suppliers.

Mr. Foster: No, Mr. Speaker. They have to do a careful audit of all the companies importing oil into Canada or the compensation is not paid.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary.

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF ALLEGED DEALS WITH IMPORTING COMPANIES TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I now return to the Acting Prime Minister. As the possibility of these rinky-dinky deals was discussed at length when the energy supply bill was before the committee, and as the 1977 estimates covering this item will be deemed to have been passed by Tuesday, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate if a reference could be made to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that this specific matter can be dealt with bearing in mind that $1.4 billion in compensation is planned to be paid this year alone?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the members of the board are well aware of the possibility of pricing actions of the kind the hon. gentleman has referred to. They are always looking to be sure that the Canadian treasury is protected against any unwarranted payments. If the hon. gentleman has some specific information I would be very happy to pass it on.

URBAN AFFAIRS

HABITAT CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RECOMMENDATION FOR PUBLIC OWNERSHIP OF AGRICULTURAL LAND

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Were the Canadian delegates to the UN Habitat Conference expressing this government's policy when they were voting on ratification of documents presented to the conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Acting Prime Minister for his answer. On Wednesday June 9 agreement on the document entitled "Recommendations for National Action" was unanimously approved. This document urges among other things public ownership of agricultural land. Does this government support the policy of public ownership of agricultural land as the Acting Prime Minister just stated.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer for the Acting Prime Minister in this case.

Some hon. Members: Oh! Oh!

Mr. Basford: I think the question represents a gross over-simplification of the statement which, however, in my view represents the first time we have had in Canada a comprehensive statement of principles as to the use of land which certainly makes it very clear that land is held or should be subject to public control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: What are you talking about?

Mr. Basford: I am delighted that my friends over there see the point I am trying to make, that land is and should be subject to public control which the hon. gentleman who asked the question did not seem to agree with. It indicated that one method of proper land planning was the acquisition by public authorities of land, farm land or otherwise, as a means of proper urban planning and as a means of preventing urban sprawl.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to either the Minister of Justice or the Acting Prime Minister. They have hesitated to answer whether the government does or does not support the policy of public ownership of land.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the question was directed to me. I re-directed it to the Minister of Justice who was the head of Canada's delegation at the Habitat Conference and who is in a position to answer with a great deal more competence on the specific question. The question which has been put was answered by the minister. The hon. gentleman is now putting another question which has nothing to do with Habitat.

● (1450)

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AGREEMENT WITH MR. MORRIS ON SUBJECTS TO BE DISCUSSED AT CONFERENCE—POSSIBILITY OF NATIONAL STRIKES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister advise the House whether there is any agreement now in effect between the government and Mr. Morris of the CLC settling the specific matters which will be discussed at the meeting later this week?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can advise the hon. member that there have been meetings with Mr. Morris. I talked to him last week in Geneva. We discussed the general tenor of how we hope the meeting will go. We will certainly be talking about policies involving the post controls period, and we will be endeavouring to respond positively to labour's desire to have greater input in the consultation process which will lead to any government policies during that period.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise specifically whether the CLC is prepared to withdraw the threat of a national strike in return for any commitments from the government, and if so, what might those government commitments be?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): At this stage I think it would be presumptuous for me to state what may or may not be in the minds or the planning of the members of the CLC. I can only say what my hope would be, and my hope would be that the meetings will be of such a successful nature that the CLC may find that such action is no longer necessary.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION DEPORTATION OF URUGUAYAN REFUGEES BE DELAYED PENDING DISCUSSION WITH MINISTER

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the same matter which was raised by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. I would like to get the Department of External Affairs into this because it seems to me that the question of refugees concerns an international convention, the United Nations convention on refugees.

Someone in the Department of External Affairs apparently has said that the present regime in Uruguay tolerates peaceful dissent, and one of the representatives who is represented to be looking after Uruguayan issues exclusively said she did not know very much about what is going on in Uruguay. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether she would discuss with her own minister—or if he is not available, with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—at least the postponement of the carrying out of deportation orders until the true situation in Uruguay can be determined, instead of having the matter dealt with by people who apparently know nothing of what they are speaking.

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to draw this matter to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since the Minister of Labour and Immigration is ultimately responsible for decisions made in this connection. I feel he gave a very frank and very favourable answer to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

I might add, however, and I do so without any hesitation, that the role of external affairs through its representative on the interdepartmental committee is to ensure whether the international political situation, as we are aware of it, is favourable or adverse to refugees, according to the file and evidence they themselves present to the various courts involved. I have never seen any external affairs member give interviews by telephone in this manner, and the department is well known for its humanitarian sense which has always been evidenced in favour of refugees coming to Canada.

* * *

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON ALTERNATIVES IF LEGISLATION RULED ULTRA VIRES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Can the hon. gentleman advise whether it is the intention of the Prime Minister to discuss with the first ministers the question of emergency or standby powers, such as the constitutionally accepted method of delegating authority, for either the continuation of or the orderly dismantling of the anti-inflation program in the event that the legislation before the Supreme Court is struck down as being unconstitutional?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman seems to assume that it is going to be struck down.

An hon. Member: He is just asking.

Mr. Sharp: That seems to be the purport of the question. I hope that is not a case of the wish being the father to the thought, because I think it would be a very serious matter if that were to happen. The Prime Minister and the government, of course, cannot help but consider the possibility, but no consultations are taking place at the present time.

[Mr. Brewin.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REASON FOR ABOLITION OF SPECIAL INVESTIGATION DIVISION—SUGGESTED DISCLOSURE OF MATTERS UNDER INVESTIGATION AT TIME DIVISION DISBANDED

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising from the abolition of the special investigation division of the Unemployment Insurance Commission within the last year, at a time when the need for such a division seemed to be clearly demonstrated. Will the minister tell the House why the special investigation division of the UIC was abolished and the reasons some of its members were then sent to far distant points in the UIC system after abolition took place?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I most certainly will. The special investigation division existed, and it was found that there was a very considerable overlap between its function and the function of the benefit control operation. After considerable analysis and discussion, including some discussions with me, we decided to make the change.

The special investigation division was also very centralized here in Ottawa, and the cases to which we wanted attention paid were obviously very often in the regions. It was a very logical organizational decision made in March of 1975 to integrate the SID into the regional benefit control operation.

On the second part of the hon. member's question, I would have to check the details, but I presume that since we did want to decentralize and get the investigation where the action is, as it were, some people were transferred in order to make it more efficient.

Mr. Cossitt: Having been forewarned that the minister would use decentralization as the reason, I will ask him this: Specifically will the minister agree to make public all matters which the special investigation division had under scrutiny at the time of its abolition, and if he will not agree, why will he not agree?

Mr. Andras: The reason should be apparent to everyone. This is an investigation into potential or alleged fraud or misdemeanours or that sort of thing. Often the case being investigated proves to be nothing, but it is very close to being a criminal investigation in many cases, and when a prima facie case develops, we call in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to proceed. So, I think it would be utterly unwise to disclose all the details of what they have or have not investigated.

Mr. Cossitt: Pretty weak.

* * *

INCOME TAX

KNOWLEDGE OF DEPARTMENT OF PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON MORTGAGE TO OFF-SHORE LENDING COMPANY

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Can he tell the House how the government knows that Canadians who own property off-shore and who are paying interest on mortgages to an off-shore lending company or agency have declared this obligation to the Canadian government.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with that situation. I will have to check it out.

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF STATEMENT OUTLINING LEGITIMATE ACTIVITIES OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. A few weeks ago I asked the minister whether any pressure had been brought to bear by his department to cancel the proposed demonstration on behalf of religious dissenters in the U.S.S.R., and at that time his department indicated that it was giving information to these organizations to the effect that they were getting involved in quasi political activities. Despite the fact that CPRI has now had its charitable status returned to it, has the minister prepared and distributed written statements of clarification for organizations which have a charitable tax status in which the department has defined what is considered legitimate activities of those organizations and what is regarded as political?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there are some 30,000 organizations which have that particular status in Canada, and those involved in this particular activity at any time or those which are concerned about it have had this brought to their attention. We have been able to work it out without any problem. I think the fact that there has not been one appeal launched speaks well for the equitable way in which they have been treated. There was in fact no pressure brought to bear. I might say that I read a speech given in the other place by Senator Forsey with some concern. I intend to have a meeting with him to get his views on the subject because it is a matter of some concern.

Mr. Epp: If requests for written statements as to the definition of legitimate activity for organizations of that type are made, are they made available to officials of those organizations?

● (1500)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I think to attempt to codify something of this nature would create more problems than it would solve.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LOCKHEED CONTRACT—DATE MINISTER LEARNED FINANCING ARRANGEMENT WAS VERBAL

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Would the minister now clearly and simply state when he learned that Lockheed was to provide bridge financing to the government of Canada? Would he also simply and clearly state when he found that the arrangement was purely a verbal arrangement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have fully answered those questions. I think the hon. member should perhaps make the effort of referring to the House of Commons debates.

[English]

Mr. Bawden: A supplementary question. Will the minister say if the reason he will not come clean is that if the true facts even known he would be forced to resign?

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which concerns the dress of members of the House. I was going to raise the question about the neckwear worn by a particular member, but I see he has left the chamber so I shall not. In this connection, I was wondering if members of the House in general could have some direction from Your Honour, because I have noticed more and more of the leisure-suit type of apparel and I do not think this is a place for leisure. There is also the question of leather jackets which I, personally, do not think are in order. There has just been a general deterioration in the mode of dress. I think it might be pertinent if a memo were issued in regard to the standard of dress that should be adhered to.

An hon. Member: Where is your motorcycle, Warren?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will, of course, take under advisement the very strong representations of the hon. member for Palliser.

Mr. Muir: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this matter, for the simple reason that on another occasion the Chair drew attention to the hon. member for Joliette. On another occasion I remember attention was drawn to the hon. member for Mount Royal in the House. Certainly, we all got here in the same way, and I do not think someone should be allowed to dress as he wants and just quietly be told to ease out. I think the matter should be brought to his attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I may say that the particular matter which I believe was the subject of remarks today has been already brought to the attention of that hon. member by the Chair. The reason for the lack of formal dress was one of medical treatment, and the hon. member left the chamber until the matter was rectified. The matter did not go without notice, nor did it go without notice in being brought to the attention of the hon. member.

Order Paper Questions

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF PROPOSALS ON COST-SHARING OF HEALTH AND POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to the item of tabling documents. I should like to table copies, in both official languages, of the federal proposal regarding the major shared-cost programs in the field of health and post-secondary education which the Prime Minister presented at the first ministers' conference this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the House agreed to revert to tabling of documents for the purpose requested by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 4,963, 5,367, 5,525 and 5,652.

[Text]

TOBACCO GROWERS

Question No. 4,963—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

For each of the past ten years, what sums has the government (a) accorded tobacco growers or cigarette manufacturers in the form of (i) loans (ii) grants (iii) subsidies (b) expended in advertising to discourage members of the public from smoking?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed as follows: Agriculture Canada: (a) (i) nil; (ii) 1967-68—$141,864.77 to tobacco growers; (iii) nil. (b) nil. Health and Welfare Canada: (a) nil; (b) 1975-76, $359,-333; 1974-75, 203,968; 1973-74, 395,600; 1972-73, 385,000; 1971-72, 381,271; 1970-71, 163,619; 1969-70, 260,436; 1968-69, 239,649; 1967-68, 200,281; 1966-67, 161,843. The above figures are for printing, design and art work, for posters and information materials, and production of films and T.V. clips for use by private and public organizations. Industry, Trade and Commerce: (a) For each of the past ten years, the government has accorded tobacco growers or cigarette manufacturers grants to the extent of: 1965—nil; 1966—nil; 1967—nil; 1968—$190,000; 1969—$158,000; 1970—$93,000; 1971—$199,000; 1972—$99,000; 1973—$136,000; 1974—$262,000. Figures of grants for 1975 are not yet available. No loans or subsidies have been made. These grants relate to the development or improvement of tobacco and cigarettes with emphasis on lowering tar and nicotine levels through cultivation and production techniques. A portion of the grants supports the updating of research facilities. (b) nil. Regional Economic Expansion: (a) Under the Regional Development Incentives Program there are four net accepted offers outstanding to tobacco processors and none to cigarette manufacturers as of January 31, 1976. (i) nil; (ii) $68,582 (estimated); (iii) nil. (b) Nil.

[Mr. Speaker.]

NOTE: Under the earlier Area Development Incentives Program statistics were not maintained in a way that permits the question to be answered.

FITNESS LEVELS IN CANADA AND SWEDEN

Question No. 5,367—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the name and country of residence of the male who plays the Swede in the Participaction ads on television?

2. (a) How many Fit Kits were produced (b) what was the cost of each (c) what are the government sales projections for 1976?

3. Does the government have any explanation or information that could suggest for what reason Canada has won more medals in the Winter Olympics than Sweden, if the Swedes are in much better shape than Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The information requested should be sought directly from Sport Participation Canada (Participaction). This is an independent organization which receives annual contributions for operational purposes from the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. (It encourages financial support from the private sector to subsidize media messages with fitness themes).

2. (a) See answer to Parliamentary Enquiry No. 4,950 tabled May 19, 1976. (b) Projected unit cost is $2.66. (c) 75,000 kits for the first nine months of 1976; 25,000 kits for the following six month period.

3. Sweden, which has a reputation of being a physically fit nation, achieves this image as a result of it's people's active participation in outdoor recreation. In previous years, cross-country skiing has been one of the few sports where Swedes have excelled at the international level, although that dominance is decreasing. Currently, a few individual Swedish athletes (diving, men's alpine skiing, swimming, canoeing) have achieved international success. At Innsbruck, their best performance was a bronze medal in the men's alpine skiing slalom event. Canada by contrast had 3 olympic medalists.

OTTAWA AIRPORT PARKWAY

Question No. 5,525—Mr. Bawden:

1. Is the National Capital Commission responsible for the roadway to the airport and, if so, from what point?

2. Does the Commission consider the highway to be in acceptable condition and, if not, for what reason?

3. Who was the contractor for the highway and what was the contract price?

4. Were there any over-runs and, if so, by what amount?

5. Does the Commission plan repairs for this road, and, if so, what are the projected costs?

6. Are there any plans to convert this road to a four-lane highway with beautified surroundings?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Acting Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Yes, from Heron Road to the Airport.

2. No. Frost penetration has caused uneven settlement of the roadway surface.

3. Dibblee Construction, $1,968,993; Francon Limited, $2,056,467; McKay-Cocker, $1,558,000.

4. Yes, by the following amounts: Dibblee Construction, $149,170; Francon Limited, $73,474; McKay-Cocker, $5,782.

5. Yes. Projected cost of inital repairs is $25,000.

6. The roadway was originally designed and constructed to permit the addition of two more lanes thereby creating a four-lane, median separated roadway. Construction drawings and specifications have been completed and the roadway will be built as funds are available and as the need arises. Site development work will be continued on a seasonal basis.

Question No. 5,652—Mr. Beatty:

1. What government involvement, if any, was there in the construction of the Ottawa Airport Parkway?

2. Did any other jurisdictions contribute towards the cost of construction and, if so, to what extent?

3. What has been the total cost to date?

4. (a) When was the Parkway last paved (b) what was the cost of the paving?

5. At the time the Parkway was built or last repaved, was it anticipated that driving conditions on it would have deteriorated so badly by this date?

6. Is the government aware of any accidents or injuries resulting from the present, dangerous state of disrepair of the Parkway and, if so, how many?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Acting Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. The Ottawa Airport Parkway was constructed by the National Capital Commission.

2. No.

3. Capital cost to date: $9,213,561.

4. (a) Early summer of 1973; (b) $308,452.

5. No.

6. No.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 5,327 could be made an order for return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

SCHOLARSHIPS GRANTED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Question No. 5,327—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. From 1970 to date, how many scholarships has the government granted through the Canadian International Development Agency or any other agency, to foreign students studying in Canadian colleges and universities?

Capital Punishment

2. For each year (a) how much has the government spent on such scholarships (b) how many students received scholarships and what were their countries of origin?

3. For each year, what were the colleges and universities attended by the students and what was the distribution of the students in each case?

Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, at one o'clock, I was speaking about the O'Donnell case in Toronto where a man had killed a young school teacher, going across the Don in Toronto, by hitting her with a stone, raping her and then dragging her out of the Don Valley. A few days later he was picked up by the police for the murder he had committed on a defenceless young school teacher who had no chance of saying a word to defend herself or to prepare for the next world.

There was also the case of a young sex offender who was released from penitientiary because the psychiatrist said he was unlikely to kill again, but within two years he had killed five young men in Quebec City. Just a couple of years ago, a 26-year old female was taken by an intruder who had entered her locked apartment by using a master key. She and her husband had been awakened by the noise, and in their night-clothes had gone to see what was happening.

The husband was warned not to call the police or his wife would die. The wife was taken by the intruder at knife point. He drove her around Toronto for nearly five hours, then raped her, subjected her to all types of sexual aberrations, and when she was not complying, the ever-ready knife was poised. The criminal in this case was a 19-year old youth who had been in psychiatric care from the age of five. He had recently been released from the hospital for the criminally insane at Penetanguishene, Ontario. This young woman is still not working. She cannot work. She is still suffering from the ravages of that night and the indelible imprint the tragedy made on her. She will probably go through life suffering, as a result.

Mr. Peters: They should hang the psychiatrist.

Mr. Rynard: You have an idea. At least you are in favour of capital punishment. These are the responsibilities, Mr. Speaker. Then there is the little girl of ten years of age who just a couple of weeks ago was raped and had her skull blown to pieces. That little, innocent girl never had her day in court or a chance to repent.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you that these are our responsibilities to keep law and order in society. That is why we have police forces. That is why social workers and all our levels of courts are needed, to try to see that justice is carried out on this earth. I have tried to point out that in no way can I watch prisoners sentenced to 15 years or longer walk up those corridors day after day, with bars on the windows and doors bolted. It is dying daily, inch by inch. The chance of rehabilitation goes out the door as the never-ending days pass. Is this what we really want—the torture, the wasting of the mind, the cruelty of long years of suffering?

I have heard people say they are abolitionist because they want to make the criminal live and, day after day, relive and suffer through a long prison sentence. Over and over again I have heard the relatives of a critically ill patient say it was nice to see him, or her, die so quickly and not suffer through a long, agonizing and lingering illness. What is one's philosophy as an abolitionist? The ultimate in cruelty is not the humane way. You can let a man leave this world quietly and peacefully. A judge in Barrie said recently, according to a report, that he had a prisoner before him who had spent more than half his years in prison. Because of the long years spent in prison, this man was unable to communicate with the court. He could not communicate, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the many years he had spent in prison. Do we want long prison terms to do this to people? If there is to be hope for us, society must have a better understanding of how to prevent crime. Second, we must provide an effective deterrent by imposing the shortest possible sentence in the circumstances. Unfortunately, what the shortest possible sentence is has not been discovered. We do not know how to prevent crime.

● (1510)

I cannot support the idea of long prison sentences taking the place of capital punishment. The cruelty of the long sentence is not in keeping with my philosophy, nor that of my riding of Simcoe North.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will intervene briefly in this debate. It has been a long debate and I know hon. members are trying to keep their speeches short. I intervene to indicate that, as Minister of Justice, I support the statement made by my colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), in this House when he began the debate on May 3, as reported on page 13088 of Hansard. In introducing the bill, he gave a long and thorough exposition of the reasons why it is being introduced and why at this time we feel capital punishment should be eliminated from the law.

Capital punishment has been debated in this House four times in the last ten years. It seems to me, with all due respect to what many have said in the four debates, that the real issue facing parliament and the country is not the issue of capital punishment: the real issue is how best the criminal justice system can be made most effectively and adequately to protect society. The issue is not whether we shall execute one, two or three prisoners a year: the issue is how the whole criminal justice system, the Criminal Code, the administration of that code in our courts, the legal system, police enforcement and prevention systems of the country can best be made to work and protect our society and its values.

Quite apart from my personal opposition to capital punishment, I am convinced, beyond any shadow of doubt, that even if all murderers convicted of capital offences in the past ten years had been hanged, this would have done nothing to prevent the increase in violent crime which we have experienced in this country in the last few years. During the past 14 years, Mr. Speaker, in 70 per cent of all murders the suspect and victim were related or had some kind of social relationship. In my view, the prospect of hanging in no way influenced whether or not a capital offence in those cases was to be committed. Another 10 per cent of murders were committed during the commission of some other crime such as robbery, arson or sexual assault.

The execution of a few murderers will not deter crimes of passion, murder by sexual perverts, or gangland killings involving hired "hit-men." It will not stop violence. In my view, the very fact that there is on the law books a provision calling for the hanging, every year, of one, two, three or more people for the offence of capital murder gives our society a false sense of security and diverts us from what ought to be the real issues concerning the criminal justice system. To support my view, I wish to quote briefly, as my colleague the Solicitor General did, the words of Sir Robert Mark, the 38-year veteran of police work in Britain and current commissioner of the London metropolitan police, better known as Scotland Yard. Addressing the Canadian association of chiefs of police in Canada last summer, he said:

> I am therefore opposed to the death penalty and so are most of my senior and most experienced colleagues, simply because its continuance prevents the reforms necessary to increase the effectiveness of criminal justice.

That is my position. It seems to me that the best and most effective deterrent to any crime, murder included, is the certainty of apprehension and the certainty of conviction. To bring about that certainty requires, under our system, better methods of crime prevention, crime detection, apprehension of criminals, and reforms of procedures in our criminal courts so that the determination of guilt and innocence is carried out more effectively and without the prolonged delays which so often are the case now. It seems to me that significant improvements must be made to our criminal justice system if that system is to serve its central purpose, the protection of society. That is why the government last July introduced the bail reform bill to which I introduced further amendments in October which became effective on April 26.

We introduced amendments specifically designed to make the bail laws of this country more effective, to protect society against those charged with murder, to protect society against repeaters within the criminal system, and against those who traffick or conspire to traffic in narcotics and who are responsible for up to 70 per cent of all crimes in our centres of population, including the crime of murder. And that is why the government introduced Bill C-83 which is now before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

That bill contains measures concerning gun control. There are to be greater penalties for the misuse of firearms, greater abilities for the police to deal with criminal elements using or possessing firearms, improved measures to keep firearms out of the hands of those who should not have them. Also, we included in that legislation—which I hope will be reported back from the committee shortly—measures to allow for the isolation from society of those deemed, by the legal process, to be dangerous offenders. They are to be separated from society for long periods. Bill C-83 also provides for the tightening of rules relating to the temporary release of criminals from prison. It provides for a more effective parole system, by which I mean that there is to be a more effective way of keeping within our penitentiaries those whom it is considered unsafe to release.

There is to be more effective examination of prisoners seeking release in order that we may release those who may safely be let out and participate in society. Included in that measure are controversial proposed changes with regard to electronic surveillance, or wiretapping, by police authorities after appropriate judicial authorization has been obtained. They are designed to strengthen the ability of police forces in this country to wage a more effective offensive against the bosses of organized crime who hire others to kill and often are instrumental in bringing people into the criminal system.

Later this week, as I said in the question period, I shall discuss with the attorneys general of the provinces other measures which will further improve the administration of our criminal justice system. The changes in the penalties for murder contained in Bill C-84 are related to the earlier measures I mentioned. The very stiff, no-pardon provisions will protect society by ensuring the prolonged incarceration of the convicted murderer. As I have indicated, the central purpose of our criminal law and administration of justice is the protection of society. Society has a right to be protected. It has a right to perceive that the criminal justice system is protecting it. That is why the long prison term provisions are there. They are, in fact, to protect society, to give society what it must have out of the legal system—that is, a perception or feeling that the system is serving to protect them, their communities and their values.

● (1520)

That is why the central issue in this debate is not whether we in this country hang one or two criminals; the central issue is whether we can build a more effective criminal justice system which, without hanging, protects society. It is my view that we can. The fact that we have a law relating to capital punishment gives our society a false sense of security, a sense of security that is undeserved. We should be addressing ourselves instead to how we can improve our criminal justice.

During previous debates on the capital punishment question, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has made very distinguished and important contributions. It disturbed me to read his speech of the other day in which he indicated that he is reversing his position in order to ensure that capital punishment remains for treason. The incidence of treason in this country is extremely low. In fact, Louis Riel was the last person hanged for treason—and that was in 1885.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert has had a long and distinguished career as a lawyer, as a member of this House, as prime minister and as an avowed supporter of the abolition of capital punishment. I hate to think that on the current bill he will be voting against sending it to committee. If he feels so strongly on the particular point that he has raised, because of his long-standing support of the abolition of capital punishment and his long-standing belief against hanging—which I have always taken to be a sincere and deeply-held belief—his proper course of action, knowing his long work in this area, would be to ensure that this bill is referred to committee. If he then wanted to suggest in the committee that there be some change in the bill, that would be the proper parliamentary course of action for someone who feels so strongly about the question of abolition as the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: There are others in this House who are thinking of making amendments, and some who still have some doubts on the issue. I hope they will see the logic of my persuasion and will vote for the bill on second reading in order to put it into committee where their amendments can be considered or their doubts resolved through debate. I suggest, with the greatest deference, that would be the proper parliamentary course.

As I mentioned earlier, as Minister of Justice my chief concern must be the protection of society. It should be the concern of all members when they consider the measures now before the House. I am satisfied that the sentencing provisions contained in Bill C-84, together with the other initiatives we have taken and are taking through the measures introduced by the Solicitor General and I in Bill C-83, changes in the Bail Act and discussions we are having with the attorneys general as to improvements in the criminal justice system, are an adequate response to the need to make the criminal justice system work better for us and for its central purpose, the protection of society. That is the central issue in this debate.

We are not going to protect society by giving it a false sense of security by hanging one, two or three people a year. We are not going to make our criminal justice system more effective by all the debate, energy and thought that for so many years have gone into the issue of hanging. We should devote that same time, energy and thought to reforming our criminal justice system, to providing better methods of crime prevention and detection. The only effective deterrent there is to crime is the certainty of apprehension and conviction. That is the central issue in this debate and the debate on Bill C-83. It is the job of myself, this parliament, the provincial attorneys general and those responsible for the administration of justice to address themselves to that issue, rather than the capital punishment issue. They should address themselves to how we can develop better methods of crime prevention, detection, certainty of apprehension, and conviction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Capital Punishment

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would accept a question.

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) if, in the new process and plans for the apprehension of criminals—if capital punishment is abolished—we will have a type of capital punishment carried out by law officers. I think this has happened in a good many cases recently, where the number of bullet holes in people in the process of being apprehended by the police suggests much more than is necessary or accidental in carrying out a duty. It is a form of capital punishment by law officers.

Mr. Basford: As I understand the question, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with it. Obviously, police officers get into situations where they have to act to protect their lives or the lives of others. That is their duty under the law. In that way, pursuant to the law, they have the right to take life. I do not think there is evidence that the police forces of this country are abusing their rights under the law in that regard.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while I did have some notes and remarks to make on Bill C-84, I consider it fortunate that I follow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) in order to respond to some of the shallow arguments he has presented and, indeed, some of the deception he has inflicted upon us. I wonder whether the minister has even read Bill C-84. He said that hanging would have done nothing to prevent murder. The minister stated that 70 per cent of recent murders in Canada were those of a domestic nature, crimes of passion. However, what he patently failed to say was that those same crimes of murder within that context of 70 per cent are the very crimes that will not be included in this bill under supposed capital punishment, or first-degree murder. In other words, those who are responsible for crimes of passion involving murder are not the ones who would pay the supreme penalty.

● (1530)

By failing to state this, the minister tries to delude Canadians. He indicates that 10 per cent of other crimes resulting in murder would, similarly, not be affected. He says capital punishment would do nothing to stop violence. I have one reassuring comment to make: the murderer who pays the supreme penalty will certainly no longer resort to violence. The minister says Canadians feel a false sense of security when they talk about capital punishment. I do not think this is true at all. I think they believe that for too long the government has failed to recognize its responsibilities in this area. Canadians do not feel a false sense of security. On the other hand, they want to see the law enforced; they want capital punishment and it is in this area that the action of the government has been open to criticism. I ask the Minister of Justice why, today, so suddenly, would he express concern over the escalating crime rate in Canada? Why did it take him so long to address himself to the responsibilities of his ministry?

He speaks of improved methods of apprehension and improved methods of conviction. They certainly have not been demonstrated to date, and I see nothing in the legislation before us which is likely to change that situation. The minister spoke of Bill C-83 and the marvellous effect it would have in removing guns from the hands of criminals. Surely he is aware that this measure dealing with gun control has been a total disaster. Refer me to any other bill in the memory of the House which has been the occasion of the introduction, at committee stage, of 43 amendments!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): By the government.

Mr. Brisco: By the government, to its own legislation. Thirty-one of them dealt with gun control alone. Who does the minister think he will delude? Who does he think will turn in their guns according to the provisions of Bill C-83? Surely the criminals will not do so. Guns will be just as readily available to the criminal element as they are now.

The minister talks about the need for an effective system of criminal justice. I could not agree more, but I suggest this is the responsibility of the government, one whose exercise is long overdue. The law with regard to capital punishment has not been enforced. The hon. gentleman says the idea of capital punishment gives Canadians a false sense of security. Then he tells us this is not the issue. Mr. Speaker, I thought we were debating Bill C-84, a bill which deals with capital punishment. If that is not the issue, I wonder what the issue is.

The minister complains about the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He expresses disappointment. He says, "Here is a man who for years has opposed capital punishment, and now he is in favour of it because of one clause, the clause dealing with treason." The minister reminds us there has not been a case of treason since Louis Riel. Mr. Speaker, the way this government is going, and the way the quasi-governments of some of the smaller nations today are going, it will not be long in my view, before we shall have cause for concern about treason.

In my view, my right hon. friend expresses a very valid concern. Moreover, his concern about the effectiveness of the committee in dealing with such a clause is well founded. I can easily understand what would happen at the committee stage. I have sat through all the proceedings in connection with Bill C-83 for many weeks dealing with the clauses of the so-called peace and security package. I have seen amendments introduced by the Conservatives and by the New Democrats, amendments which were well reasoned and unobjectionable. But on grounds of policy, because the idea of resistance has been engraved on the brains of Liberal backbenchers, these amendments were voted down en masse. What else could one expect?

The view of some abolitionists is that if parliamentarians support capital punishment, they will have on their hands the blood of the people who are destined to pay the supreme penalty, be it by hanging or in some other way. I wonder whether these abolitionists take the same attitude with regard to the victims. I wonder whether they feel they have the blood of the victims on their hands. If I had to make a value judgment on that point, I certainly would not opt for having the blood of the victims on my hands.

A government, of necessity, legalizes war. It is kill or be killed. A government may, of necessity legalize, approve, adopt or implement capital punishment. I accept absolutely no responsibility. I have no conscience or concern about having blood on my hands when some murderer faces the supreme penalty. I do not agonize over this bill. My mind has been made up. I was convinced of the position I have to take prior to my coming to the House of Commons. I do, however, agonize for those true abolitionists who for one reason or another are sincerely concerned about the reintroduction of capital punishment.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). We have heard comments from physicians on both sides of the argument in the course of the present debate. I cannot but feel that those of us who have, in one form or another, worked in the healing arts for many years and who have inherited or developed a special degree of compassion or concern for their patients, must reflect on the important question of whether this same degree of compassion and concern can be expressed with reference to a murderer. Doubtless there are physicians who may not have been able to transfer their compassion from their professional background to the House of Commons. And there may be physicians—in fact, there are—who have been able to sever that particular connection of compassion in reference to the bill before us. I agonize for those who most genuinely and sincerely, perhaps by virtue of a deep-seated sense of compassion, feel that capital punishment is the wrong road. But I do not apologize to these people.

I was concerned, when reading the addresses of other members, to note that some of them failed to make a distinction clear between first and second-degree murder. Just recently I was reading the address made to the House by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). It was obvious in the arguments that he was putting forward in favour of abolition that he was not prepared to define the difference between crimes of passion and the "contract" murder. I object most strenuously to the attempts to brainwash the Canadian people that have been made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I think it is basically dishonest. I liken—

● (1540)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I do not have any objection to the hon. member, or to any other hon. member, disagreeing with what I have said from time to time, but to declare openly in this House of Commons that what I have said or done is dishonest should be ruled out of order, or the remark withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Brisco) West that he is skating a very thin line, that he should get back to the subject and withdraw that last remark.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to withdraw the remark provided the minister would give me a chance to complete what I was saying.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. Once again, I suggest to the hon. member that he is skating a very thin line, that he should be careful in what he says.

Mr. Brisco: I will be careful, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to complete my statement. There is a basic dishonesty in informing the public of one side of the argument and not informing the public of the other side of the argument. That is where the basic dishonesty lies. To present members of parliament with the report of Ezzat Fattah from Simon Fraser University and with arguments very persuasive of the minister's cause is one thing, but is it not more honest to present both sides of the argument in a similarly persuasive fashion? This is what the minister has failed to do, and that is where I see the dishonesty. I am not alluding to the minister's integrity itself, far from it. I have every regard for the minister as an honest member of parliament. It is the policy that I consider to be dishonest. Having made that clear, I wonder whether the minister would care to comment.

Mr. Allmand: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is suggesting is something that I have never heard suggested in the House of Commons in the whole history of this place. Presumably, when a minister or member of parliament puts forward a policy, he puts forward arguments to support that policy. He does not put forward arguments to support the other side of the question. I would not expect that from the hon. member who supports the retention of capital punishment, so I do not see why he should expect me to put forward arguments in favour of retention. We all strongly argue our points of view and put forward arguments in favour of them, but I do not think that is dishonest. We put forward what we think is right, and we argue our point of view. We do not argue the other point of view. I have never seen this done by the government, by the opposition or any member of parliament.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I should not say "the same point of order", because I do not think the matter raised by the Solicitor General is a point of order. I would think it is rather a point for debate, though I think I understand what he is driving at.

If I could look into the minds of some members of the House with respect to this matter, I think this is a little different from an ordinary party position on a matter, or at least I have always understood it to be. This matter is subject to a free vote by members exercising their discretion based on all the information available. If I understand him correctly, the hon. member was indicating, in this rather unusual kind of situation, that there might be a duty on the part of the government to put forward both sides of the question. I think that is what he had in mind. In any event, I do not think this is a point or order in accordance with the rules of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is raising a point for debate. It is government policy, and has been for many years, to introduce government measures. If the other side object and put forward their side of the argument, there is then debate. I would suggest to the hon. member for Kootenay West that he had better get back to the subject of Bill C-84.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Bill C-84 is one of those rarities of the parliamentary process in which we have a free vote, or a so-called free vote, in which we have a mutual sharing of thinking on both sides of the House in regard to both sides of the coin, I consider it incumbent upon me to present to my constituents both sides of the question. However, when my constituents are made aware of the fact that the Solicitor General handed out a contract to the research and systems development branch of his department—although he says that the views of the author do not necessarily represent his own views—and when I see in the report that the author, Mr. Ezzat A. Fattah of Simon Fraser University, an institution of cynics and socialists, tells the Canadian people that it seems that the better educated tend to be more tolerant in their attitudes toward punishment and more opposed to the death penalty than the less educated, and when he goes on to indicate that those who are in poor financial circumstances are more apt to be in favour of capital punishment than the well-to-do, then I am inclined to turn that around.

It is very simple to turn that around, Mr. Speaker, and to ask this question. Is Mr. Fattah suggesting, since the people of Kootenay West, on the basis of the poll that I conducted, support capital punishment by the astonishing figure of 92 per cent, that this is a reflection on their intelligence? Is this, then, a reflection on their income? Is this, then, a reflection on the fact that they are uneducated? Is that what this gentleman is implying? Indeed, the same expression could be applied to every riding in Canada. To extend the argument a little further, those areas of the country that show a high degree of support for capital punishment are, according to this report, those sections of Canada where there are large numbers of unemployed and uneducated people.

I have a great deal more regard for the intelligence of my constituents, the hard working and industrious people of my riding, than apparently this report or this fellow from Simon Fraser University has. He goes on to indicate that there is a very strong pattern in favour of the death penalty associated with income and religious belief. He concludes that the few studies which have attempted to examine some psychological determinants of attitudes to the death penalty tend to show that people who approve the death penalty are people who are insecure, who were severely brought up and who are socially maladjusted. That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what this professor, so-called, has said. What a condemnation of the Canadian people! How can the minister possibly accept the thrust of this man's report when he makes a statement like that?

Mr. Allmand: Let us hear the quotation verbatim.

Mr. Brisco: I just gave it to you. He says that the few studies which have attempted to examine some psychological determinants of attitudes to the death penalty tend to show that people who approve of the death penalty are people who are insecure, who were severely brought up and who are maladjusted socially.

Mr. Allmand: Read the rest.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Brisco:

People who are opposed to it are people who feel secure, who were brought up by mild disciplinary methods and who are pleased with life.

Is that a statement that the minister can accept? Is it a statement that this House accepts? Is that the position of this government?

● (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Solicitor General rises on a point of order.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My department has financed many studies, including one by Professor Bibby of the University of Lethbridge, and Professor Grenier, and so on. These many studies have presented many views, some of which I think would support the hon. member's position. I just want to make clear that these studies are done from time to time and they do not express the views of the department, as the hon. member said at the beginning. Even in that regard, I don't think he was being fair because he quoted at random from the report. He could also quote from other reports financed by our department which give the opposite view, such as those expressed by Professor Bibby and Professor Grenier.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could respond to the minister. He has indicated that his department has produced other reports which apparently deal with the other side of the coin. That is the very point I was making a few minutes ago in respect of which the minister challenged me.

Mr. Allmand: Because you were wrong.

Mr. Brisco: I was wrong; you just finished telling the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to the Solicitor General and the hon. member that they are getting into a debate. I suggest that the hon. member get back to Bill C-84.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It would seem that the Solicitor General is overly concerned about my remarks.

An hon. Member: He is a bit touchy.

Mr. Brisco: Yes, he is a little touchy today. If the minister wishes, I am quite prepared to read into the record all the opening statements by this individual, and if he cares to trot over some books and reference papers in support of capital punishment, I would be pleased to read those into the record also.

Mr. Allmand: You were giving just one side of the story, and there are two sides.

An hon. Member: You never circulated the other.

Mr. Allmand: Oh, yes.

An hon. Member: But not widely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West has the floor, and I suggest that we listen to him.

An hon. Member: Tell the minister to be quiet.

Mr. Brisco: It is unfortunate that I am getting all this heckling from the Solicitor General. Quite frankly, I do not mind it too much because I do not find it difficult to respond to.

Mr. Allmand: I didn't start it.

Mr. Brisco: One of the most strange parts of this capital punishment matter and the hanging of murderers is the absence of concern and alarm by the public when a convicted child murderer or rapist pays the supreme penalty in a prison at the hands of other inmates. In that case do we see agonizing in the press, and do we see many letters to the editor?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Brisco: Do we then hear the expression of concern in the House, or elsewhere?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, very often.

Mr. Brisco: The minister knows, as does everyone here, that the degree of concern expressed in respect of justice taken into the hands of inmates in this type of case is very minimal compared with the type of press and concern reflected in the House and outside when such an event takes place as the one in Saskatchewan last year when a murderer took the life of two small children. We know that according to the testimony of the murderer, one small child asked him, after witnessing the death of the other, "Are you going to kill me, too?" When I think of that kind of response from a child, when I think of the brutalizing of children, and when I think about our concern for the victim—which so rarely seems to be expressed—I think it is time people of that ilk started to pay the supreme penalty. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that society simply does not need these mad dogs. Society knows full well that these people are beyond the pale, and 25 years in jail is not going to contribute anything to their recovery.

Today, in cities such as New York we see apartments and office buildings under security, with armed guards and wire fences. The same situation exists in Philadelphia and Chicago. How far are we away from this situation in Canada? How long will it be before we see this kind of security escalate in Vancouver and Montreal? How long will it be before we see security escalate in the House of Commons? In my view, we are progressively moving into jungle warfare, with criminals having declared an open season on innocent victims. The question is: Should we stand idly by, or should we begin to fight? Are we going to allow this guerrilla warfare to overwhelm us, and turn the other cheek?

Some abolitionists, in their arguments, tell us how horrible and barbaric it is to hang a murderer and what a terrible thing hanging is to witness. Perhaps we could appeal to the public conscience and cause nationwide revulsion for capital punishment if we televised the event. Let me suggest that if we are going to televise that event, it should be preceded with a few pictures of the victims, particularly the children. Let us precede that with pictures of drug pushers who have run afoul of their bosses, with their hands wired behind their backs, shoved into bathtubs and machine-gunned. Before the coverage of the hanging, let us fill the television screens with pictures of the brutality inflicted by contract murderers.

Contract murder is a lucrative business, the hours are short and the responsibility is nil. This House and this country would condone that kind of thing: we would put these people away for 25 years. Perhaps it is mercenary to refer to the cost of putting these people away. Perhaps that is an unfair part of the argument. Perhaps it is distasteful to suggest that in terms of dollars and cents it is very expensive to the state to incarcerate these people. If I am not mistaken, it costs the taxpayers of Canada, at the present time, $17,000 a year to keep a criminal in jail. The Solicitor General would be more conversant with these figures.

Mr. Allmand: That is the per capita cost, not the incremental cost.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you. If we work that out over 25 years, and allow a rate for inflationary escalation, it would not be too hard to extrapolate that figure to a quarter of a million dollars for a contract murderer, a murderer of a child, or a rapist. I wonder if the taxpayers of Canada feel comfortable with that thought? Murder in British Columbia is no different from murder in Quebec. It is just as horrible, revolting, and just as final. I wonder what the circumstances are now in respect of the parole date for the murderer who ran wild in the Christian Valley between Rock Creek and Fauquier. He went on a rampage, shooting and killing several people and wounding many others. He cut up some of his victims and conveniently surrendered in such a fashion that he would save his own hide, because he knew that his hide was on the barrel. He knew full well—indeed, he spoke of it—that if he did not think of the manner in which he was to give himself up, he could very well end up dead like his victims. Is this the type of man society wants to protect?

● (1600)

Then there was the murderer in the Creston area who slew a woman and some children some three or four years ago. He did not kill just one, but three or four. He was on a real shopping trip. We talk about capital punishment as a deterrent! Not too long ago—and the Solicitor General will be more conversant with the case then I am, because all I had was a one-shot version on television—a criminal in Quebec, along with another criminal, had taken a hostage. He was being interviewed on television. He was asked whether or not he would have killed the hostage. He indicated that he was fully in accord with the actions of his partner and, if it became necessary, yes. He was then asked if he had killed anyone else. He did not say yes, but he did not say no. Because of the manner of his answer, the television audience at least was left with the strong impression that this man in fact was not new to the game of murder. Certainly, there are many persons in the criminal element in Montreal who are not at all unfamiliar with the game of murder.

That is the deterrent factor. Would this man have been in a position to take a hostage if he had been apprehended and convicted in the manner suggested by the Minister of Justice today? Quite frankly, I cannot see some panacea or some sweeping effect this legislation will have on Canadians and on crime. I fail to see an indication in Bill C-83 or in Bill C-84 that all of a sudden, overnight, we will change the system of conviction. We will have a lot more, and we will have a lot more apprehensions. In my view this is simply a red herring and has nothing to do with this particular bill.

Because of the type of legislation this government has been introducing, I would not be surprised if before long it also decided to certify the unions that are being talked about in prisons. I really do not think that the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice would accept that, but it certainly gives many people cause for concern. I wonder what the government's response is to that question, in its peace and security package.

Let us talk for a moment about the clause in the bill dealing with treason. Truly this is the treason season. This is the time of the year when Canada, by drafting this piece of legislation, is saying to the terrorist such as the PLO or any other ilk of the same nature, "Come on over fellows. There is no death penalty here. We do not even cut off your hands. Come on over and murder." One of the most shocking comments I ever heard with reference to the PLO question at the last Olympic Games was an endorsement of their action and their conduct by one of the leading members of the labour movement in Quebec, a man who subsequently to my utter consternation was endorsed—not in the same context; I would not want to delude the House in that way, because it was in respect of another matter—by a former leader of the New Democratic Party, David Lewis. I must say I was shocked that David Lewis would lend any kind of support to Mr. Chartrand after he had supported the actions of the PLO and felt that they were doing the right thing. Are we to be witnesses to the same tragedy this time around? Hopefully, not.

Because the treason season is here, because this is the terrorism time of year and the government has decided there shall not be capital punishment, we are inviting these people over here, at enormous cost to the taxpayers in respect of security, a cost which is escalating daily. The other day a soldier told me he was being discharged from the army. He told me that he had been asked to stick around until after the Olympics. He refused. I do not blame him. In dealing with this legislation, the government is in my view swatting at gnats while swallowing camels.

Many speeches have been made in which the Bible has been quoted. It has been asserted, and I think rightfully so, that indeed one could argue in this way on both sides. I believe the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) suggested that prostitution, arson and any other crimes could be argued on both sides of the question in biblical context. Although I shall not quote from the Bible, I will repeat that the government is swatting at gnats while swallowing camels.

Let me say to the minister and to the House that I accept the mandate of the people of Kootenay West that capital punishment should be retained. I respond to my own feelings and to the feelings of the people of Kootenay West who by 90 per cent plus are in favour of the retention of capital punishment. That, Mr. Speaker, is the way I shall cast my vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in the House on such an important matter as Bill C-84 which among other things deals with the abolition of the death penalty in Canada.

In connection with the decision of any hon. member on this matter, it seems to me that in our system we are not delegates to Parliament but members elected to Parliament. If we want to establish a system aimed at sending delegates to Parliament, to a democratic assembly, then those individuals would have to vote, according to the specific mandate given to them, this is another thing. But under the present system, a member must obviously listen to his own electors, his fellow citizens, even try to find their position and understand them, but having done that he ought to take the decision.

If the issue involved changing the system, I would oppose it because, in my opinion, a member of Parliament must have a political conscience, a social conscience, and he must be concerned especially by those issues. That is why he must take a decision after listening to the various points of view and having made an effort to understand them.

Mr. Speaker, this leads me to a remark made by my predecessor while concluding his speech. He said, and I heard him clearly, that 90 per cent of his voters were in favour of the retention of capital punishment. I would ask him how can he come to such a conclusion. How can anyone tell at any moment what really is the opinion of the general public, what really is the opinion of Canadians on capital punishment or on any other issue? Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to reach such a conclusion. What these members should say is that they made a survey, an analysis, scientific or otherwise, and give the number of replies they received. But one cannot reach a conclusion until such a survey, scientific or otherwise has been made, then one cannot say in all fairness that Canadians think this or that on capital punishment or on any other issue.

● (1610)

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question on the point he just raised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): That is not a point of order. I believe the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is to be the next speaker, and I suggest that if he has time left the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) may accept a question.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I would have been ready to accept the question now, but I will abide by your ruling.

Mr. Stevens: May I ask the question Mr. Speaker? The hon. member raised a very interesting point. I wonder if he would be prepared to recommend to the House that we have a referendum in Canada on the very important issue of capital punishment in order to determine the will of the Canadian public on this issue.

Mr. Breau: I probably would have come to that point. I am happy that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is so interested in my speech that he anticipated what I was going to say. I think we live under a system in which issues like this one should not have to be decided by a referendum.

Mr. Stevens: Why?

Mr. Breau: A short while ago I was speaking about the social and political conscience of members of parliament in our system. In my view we are elected to consider these questions, to study them, to listen to the Canadian people—

Mr. Stevens: And ignore them!

Mr. Breau: —and to search for their views, but once we know those views we should have the courage to decide what we think is right or wrong and we should have the courage to make up our own minds on this question.

[Translation]

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that under our system a member of Parliament is not a delegate to Parliament, but he is elected, and when the constituents in his riding elect him, they are sure he will listen to them, he will try to understand them and he will truly represent them in the House.

I have listened seriously and very attentively to all the arguments coming from my constituency. I have even tried to understand more fully the position opposed to mine, I mean the position advocated by those in favour of the retention of the death penalty since I support this bill and may be described as a total abolitionist. Yet I have tried to understand the position of those opposed to this legislation.

In my opinion, the views I have heard fall into three categories. First, there are those who, as a matter of conscience, are in favour of capital punishment, those for whom it is a matter of morality, of religion, a spiriual matter, a matter of conscience and who are proclaiming: An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. I am referring to those who believe that society should, in revenge or otherwise, take the life of those convicted of having taken someone else's life, the circumstances being taken account of, and the circumstances in their position, of course, can vary depending on whether the murder is qualified or not. To that group I must say that I have the duty, not only as a member of this House but also as a citizen, to accept and respect their point of view, and I respect it. I never tried to convince someone who tells me that he believes in conscience that capital punishment is not only a solution, but is acceptable in Canada or elsewhere. I respect that point of view.

As for the second and third groups, however, after discussion I found that their position is less based on conviction than on their intepretation of the facts, the law or the penalties. The second group is composed of those who believe that capital punishment is an effective deterrent to murder or crime. It seems to me that these people ought to prove their point clearly before deciding in favour of capital punishment, because when you decide that the state must remove somebody's life, you have to make sure beforehand that the decision is fair. Nowhere in all the studies I have seen—I probably did not see them all but I did look into several of them—nor in all the arguments I have heard have I found anything indicating clearly that the death penalty is an efficient deterrent. Nothing indicates that clearly. Some studies seem to indicate that it is not an efficient deterrent. Opinions vary in this regard.

To my mind, it behoves those who claim capital punishment is a deterrent to prove their point, more so than those who claim the contrary. Until such time as an international scientific study is made, since all men are very much alike, until such time as I have seen such a study indicating clearly that capital punishment can be a deterrent, I must tell those people that they may be wrong.

A while ago I said that three groups want to retain the death penalty. The third is made up of those who are concerned about crime in our modern society, who are concerned about the fact that society does not seem to be protected well enough. Those people favour capital punishment but, very often, what they really want, is better protection.

They are told that in many cases, these are administrative matters, these are judgments made by civil servants, law officers of other groups. They are told that it is possible to amend some laws and to modify administrative procedures to ensure that those who are guilty of murder, individuals who are really sick from the social and human viewpoint, who have no control over themselves, are kept away from society.

And it is important to remind the House, and those people from the third group, of the change brought in for example by clause 21 of the bill. Clause 21 redefines the process through which first degree and second degree murderers will be eligible for parole. And I do not want to take the time of the House to read clause 21 entirely but I think we can sum up by saying that there is a fundamental and important principle to be considered in redefining first degree and second degree murder. And one of the important elements is that life imprisonment represents 25 years, for first degree murder and up to 25 years as well for second degree murder, depending on the judge.

About first degree murder, which is the planned or contract murder, there is an important change in the process of parole: the National Parole Board itself will no longer be able to realease anybody convicted of first degree murder, planned or contract murder before 25 years. That person will be released only through a commission of judges of the same court where he or she was found guilty and the comission will review his or her case after 15 years. Then and only them, after 15 years, will the judges be allowed to consider the eligibility for parole of the prisoner or the convicted person.

It is a major change because right now releases on parole are determined by a simple body such as the Parole Board which is made up of civil servants and full time commissioners and it is possible that this board, at least many think so, may not be so sensitive to the situation as are those whose responsibility it is to consider the eligibility of prisoners. If society undergoes a change, those persons may be isolated and as a result their judgment would not be reliable for other members of society.

The fact that judges are brought into the picture, that a panel of judges will decide on the eligibility of a prisoner beore the board considers his case is, I think, a fundamental change. Even if we did not have this 15 year minimum before judges may consider one's eligibility for parole, the judgment will remain very important.

Therefore I tell them that there are ways to protect society against dangerous criminals which might be released without being completely rehabilitated. Of course, there are other changes such as those in Bill C-83. Although we cannot hope to cover all cases, we are trying through firearms control to reduce at least the accessibility of dangerous persons to firearms and ammunitions.

I would like to point out another matter in this debate, which has often been discussed by jurists or legal experts because it is normal that the public, facing such a question, turn towards the legislators and ask them to find a solution. It is normal that the public exert pressures on politicians and say: We want you to solve this problem, we want you to try to fight crime in Canada and perhaps you may do so by reinstating capital punishment and particularly maintaining it.

It is normal because we have to be elected, we are known to people, they know that we sit in the House and it is thus normal that pressures be exerted on us. Consequently, it is normal that people require this from us. But one must not believe that all decisions concerning murders or any crime in any circumstances, in any region of the country, in any of the various sub-societies of all countries or in any of the various sub-cultures of our country, one must not believe that the House can pass whatever legislation which could, once and for all, ensure a balanced justice and fight crime or murder or make sure that murderers will never live out in society.

That is impossible to do. Why? Because by its very nature the system is in a way fragile, flexible, sensitive. For instance, the guilt of a person accused of murder is not determined by the law-makers, nor even by a judge. There is the question of the Crown attorney. How competent can he be? What kind of morality does he want to follow? What is his background and what kind of culture does he have? What are the views of the Crown attorney and of the defence attorney?

Many people know that the jury system can be influenced by the level of qualification or competence of the defence attorney. An emotional plea, for instance, by a defence attorney who is a better orator than an another attorney. It has often been heard that a poor person had been found guilty because he or she did not have the best lawyer. Some will say that we now have a judicial aid system and that no one will appear before a Canadian court without judicial help. That is true. However with the kind of society we are living in we will never be able to provide individuals without the necessary financial means with the best legal defence possible, we will never be sure that a judicial assistance system could assure them the best lawyer or the best legal defence possible.

There is, of course, the jury. It is an essential factor, sometime more important than any others. We want to have a supposedly sociological, political and social representation of the community to assume the judgement. Consequently, we are not the ones, as legislators, who have something to say but we bear however, the public pressures. We are not the ones who decide those issues. It will be the jury and the judge and it is, to a large extent, what gives its strength to our society, its flexibility but in some cases it can bring about a lack of unformity in sentences. The competence of the Crown or the defence attorney can decide the issue of a trial. Consequently, those factors will decide whether or not a person charged with murder or any other crime is guilty or not.

Mr. Speaker, I only want to answer those who stress before us the illness of our modern society, its weaknesses which make some individuals choose to commit criminal acts, to harm others, to attack them and even take their life. Faced with that problem, although we, as members of Parliament, are subject to public pressure because we are in the public eye, having been elected, society must not, nor must we believe that that problem can be solved, because even if Bill C-84 is defeated, even if all those people convicted of crimes, whether it be love tragedies, deliberate crimes or contract crimes, there is nothing that says that those who are charged with murder will actually be convicted of murder, precisely because of the jury system, because of the system of legal defence. I said earlier that nothing really proved that by applying the death penalty, even if it were applied to all people convicted of murder, first or second degree, or only even first degree, we can actually make sure that all people guilty of murder would be brought before the courts and convicted.

● (1620)

So I think, Mr. Speaker, that a factor in my decision is the fact that a mistake is always possible when it comes to judgments. I said earlier that there could be degrees of competence, that there can be an influence due to the environment, culture or history which may be quite different in Newfoundland and British Columbia because this is a diverse country. We live in a pluralistic society, so it is quite normal to have different points of view in different areas of this country. One must also take into account the degree of competence, the quality of the defence, the quality of the prosecution and the element of error. It is possible to have a better police force in one area of this country than elsewhere. It is possible for certain police elements to be more aggressive in one area of this country at a certain time in certain circumstances than elsewhere. The police in certain areas could be prejudiced against certain groups in society, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that is one of the major reasons why I cannot accept that capital punishment be acceptable to our society.

I do not see much difference between murder and capital punishment. I think the individual who takes away someone's life is a sick person, a person with something wrong. But I cannot accept that the state cold-bloodedly, after consideration, after legal defence procedure, after action by the police, action by the experts, the Crown attorneys, after all that, probably six months, one year and maybe two or three after the crime, society, the state can coolly decide to take someone's life. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this penalty is not useful, that it will not necessarily protect society, because the number of murders in Canada is perhaps 10 or 20 times higher than the number of people who are found guilty by the courts. How can we say that the death penalty can really protect society efficiently?

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would like to say I am sorry that in this whole matter, in the House and elsewhere, we forget an important factor of criminality, we forget that there still are human, social and community conditions which result from human, cultural and often deep problems which contribute to violence. In poor urban or rural environments, young people of 14, 15 or 16 have known only bootlegging, drug trafficking, broken families, crime or other unpleasant things. If someone starts on the road to crime at 14, 15 or 16, I wonder if he should be the one to be punished.

I would hope that society, instead of emphasizing punishment, would try to show him that there may be some people who love him, that society is not limited to the environment he has lived in. I find there is within society as a whole a lack of understanding, delicacy, common sense, kindness and love for teenagers who are living in some environments. If we had not known something else, we would most probably do the same.

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I urge the House to pass this bill because it is in my view a humane measure, one which says that the state cannot coldly take someone's life, and which, when considered against other government administrative measures or legislation, says that whenever there are sick elements within our society, it should do everything in its power to find a humane, non-violent solution, designed to rehabilitate these people or at least their environment when their own rehabilitation is impossible.

● (1630)

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have lost count of the number of times I have taken part, since 1957, in debates on this important subject. I can honestly say that this is not the most inspiring, nor the greatest of debates in which I have participated. I thought the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford)—because I am his friend, I think he will not mind my saying this—was less than inspired and less than inspiring when he attempted today to defend the bill. It is not for me to read another man's mind; but, I wonder if he has lost the confidence in this measure which some of his predecessors in earlier days displayed. I remember well, when we discussed amending the Criminal Code to provide for a five-year partial ban, thinking I would not be so narrow-minded as not to give the five-year conditional ban a chance. But we have not been given that five years and in that regard the government has made an egregious error.

I think, too, that many members of this House and many citizens of this country are troubled by the way this matter has been orchestrated, are troubled by the coupling of Bill C-84 to C-83 and the confession of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that, in order to get as much as he could under the one bill, he had to include as much as he could in the other. This kind of calculated quid pro quo is hardly conducive to a high-level, inspirational debate on a matter of conscience. The fact that the minister found it necessary to make the confession is not helpful. I am convinced that no matter how I decide to vote on this bill—and I have not yet decided—my vote will bring me no great feeling of pride or satisfaction, because the bill contains many things which it ought not to contain and the existing legislation contains many provisions which in my judgment are reprehensible.

I have always opposed the sort of idea central to legislation we passed last time. In most sections thereof we subscribe to the idea that capital punishment is not a deterrent, yet when it comes to dealing with murderers of policemen and prison wardens we say that it is a deterrent. In all logic, if the imposition of capital punishment is a deterrent, let it be applied. But let it be applied in the case of the little girl who was raped and murdered, of the old gentleman in the corner store who was robbed and killed, and in the case of the Canadian citizen who was the victim of violent assault leading to death. Logically, capital punishment is either a deterrent or it is not.

Clause 5 of the present bill disturbs me. It provides:

> Every one who commits first degree murder or second degree murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

I am neither jurist nor lawyer; yet, surely, if we have learned anything from the advance of criminology, it is this: there is a vast difference between first and second-degree murder. I do not like this little extra provision thrown in for the so-called hardshells in order to make the bill more palatable for them. I wish, sir, I could be in that easy position of some of my colleagues and stand up and say, "I am against the taking of life on moral grounds and for moral reasons, and the taking of life by the state is a sin." I do not believe that. If I were convinced that the taking of life by the state would make society safer and the lives of citizens more sacred, I would subscribe to no moral code which would prohibit my allowing that to take place.

Nor am I in that other happy category of those who say, "Hang them all, the short and the tall; that is the way to make society better." It would be easy to say it, but I don't believe it. Nor am I in that other category of those who say, "My constituents say, do thus and so; therefore I must do thus and so." I agree with the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) that in the final analysis we have to make our own judgment and we have to live or die politically by the exercise of that judgment.

● (1640)

I want to say how very much I was moved by the speech of my seatmate, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), one of the great medical practitioners of this country. I was much moved by his thoughful considerations respecting the whole matter of life expectancy of those who are under duress of state action. I was much moved by the eloquent address of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), one of the articulate and sincere members of the party who in my judgment has a great contribution to make to Canadian public life. However, as is well known, we in this party enhance our reputation one with the other and our regard one for the other by the candour of our remarks, and I would disagree with him on one matter. I refer to the suggestion that the Palestinians, or PLO, are terrorists or that the PLO is responsible for the dreadful and heinous activities at Munich.

While I could be critical of the Solicitor General, I will not suggest that anything he is doing in his advancement and manoeuvrings in respect of this measure is in any way connected with making it easier for terrorists. In fact, I sometimes criticize him, through his department, for making life a little too difficult for a lot of innocent Arab people who, with good intent in mind, want to come to this country.

We have to try, with this measure, to make a clear, conscience-based judgment. I regret the bill makes that difficult. I would be happier—and I have never been a starry-eyed abolitionist—had the government come forward without coupling gun control, without throwing in the tough penalty for second-degree murder and all these extraneous things and asked us to make a judgment. I think it would have been a more meaningful and a more intellectual exercise.

Underlying the whole aspect is that no matter how we talked in the last decade and a half, it really did not matter. The government, through its executive clemency, made this a de facto abolitionist country no matter what hon. members said or thought. This has entered into the whole discussion an object of resentful unreality, if I may call it that.

The Solicitor General this afternoon indicated what I have said for a long time. While technically we are engaged upon a free vote, it is in fact something less than a free vote. He suggested that, naturally, he could not produce argumentation on the other side of the question. If this were a free vote, a mere testing of parliament, why would he not? I sat in this House when we discussed this measure when it was a private member's bill. That is the way it should be today if it is truly to be a free vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I have said many times, and I say it with endearment to my beloved whip, there are too many votes on which the whip is on. This parliament should express itself on many, many issues without the whip being put on. Naturally, I exclude the budget speech and the Speech from the Throne. However, when you have a measure brought in by an individual minister, knowing full well the whole cabinet is going to abide by the law of cabinet solidarity, which the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) may forget occasionally, but not for long, you do not have a 100 per cent free vote. It is not right to suggest to the Canadian people that that is what is taking place.

Generally, this debate has been on a high level. However, I do not think this issue has been helped much by rumours that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Solicitor General would resign if it did not go through. That makes it too close, not only to being a government measure but a political measure. If I were not holding my conscience in very close check, I would be tempted to vote against the measure for these reasons. However, I think that would be wrong. They have no right to say on the left hand, the weaker hand, that it is a free vote, and on the right hand that they will resign if it does not go through and have cabinet solidarity laid down.

The debate generally has been on a high level but there are two aspects which I have resented all the way through. I do not appreciate retentionists telling me that because I do not support the return of the noose 100 per cent, in some way I am supposedly helping the criminals, that I do not believe in law and order and that I like all these rotten stinkers who make society a hell for decent people. On the other hand, I do not like to have it suggested to me that all civilized, sophisticated people are abolitionists. I do not think that is the case. This is an exercise through which we must move our way carefully and intellectually, guided by the fullest possible information available and by our own feelings as citizens who want the safest, freest society for our people.

I would be quite prepared to stand up and call for the reinvocation of the death penalty if I could be convinced that by that means society would be safeguarded and the rights of the individual would be more secure. I have been looking for many years for that evidence. It is that evidence that I find great difficulty in obtaining. I do not know whether the findings of Mr. Justice Branca have been put on the record. If they have, I will say that I agree with them and support the hon. member who put them down before. In a very brilliant speech to the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, in British Columbia not long ago, he gave a little catalogue of countries which were abolitionist and countries which were retentionist. He gave the murder rate as follows. In 1965 it was 2.8 in abolitionist countries and 4.95 in retentionist countries; in 1966, 3.45 in abolitionist countries and 5.9 in retentionist countries; in 1969, 4.0 in abolitionist countries and 7.0 in retentionist countries; in 1970, the latest figures available, 4.65 in abolitionist countries and 7.65 in retentionist countries.

Noting the dreary and dreadful indication that it is increasing terribly in most countries, I cannot draw the conclusion that the retention of the final penalty has in fact curtailed, limited or diminished the murder rate. This is a significant, stirring and saddening statistic. When I relate that as best I can with the anomalies and contradictions in the bill, I will try to make up my mind fully how I shall cast my vote on this very important subject.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Immigration—Medical examination of immigrants—Government action to ensure adequacy; the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)—Industry—Proposed closing of RCA Laboratories in Montreal—Government action to prevent; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Publications—Possibility of action to control distribution of magazines—Government position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (1650)

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of Bill C-84, the legislation currently before this House which, if passed by parliament, will introduce a new and significant phase into the criminal justice system of this country. This has been an extremely difficult decision for me to make, and I want to assure the constituents of my riding that I have reached it only pursuant to a great deal of discussion, research and careful thought.

There is no question that the preponderance of the voters of Scarborough West will disagree with the position I am taking in connection with this controversial aspect of social legislation. As a parliamentarian, I have no choice but to live with the knowledge that, having in the final analysis made up my mind against the justification of continuing with capital punishment legislation as a legitimate form of penalty, I am casting my ballot on this issue in a direction which flies in the face of the current trend of thinking, not only in the riding of Scarborough West but, quite clearly, across this great nation that we are all so proud to call our homes and native land.

All I can say to those I represent during this thirtieth parliament is that I have indeed considered very carefully each and every representation which has been made to me, whether in writing, in the course of the six public meetings held in Scarborough West in recent months on peace and security issues, or in numerous and often heated private discussions.

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that I have also considered it part of my mandate and my specific responsibility, as an elected member of our nation's parliament, to conduct private research on the issue through those many facilities available to me and, as well, to listen carefully to those Canadians, including members of parliament, who have definite and well developed views on the opposite side of the issue. This research and these latter discussions, based as they were on circumstances in some ways uniquely available to me as a member of parliament, have led me through an agonizing period of indecision to one clear conclusion.

The conclusion I have reached is that the onus must fall on the supporters of capital punishment as a legitimate form of penalty in today's society to prove their point that the advantages to Canadian society to be gained from this brutal and violent form of punishment, one which is really nothing more nor less than a legalized form of state murder, be it by way of hanging or whatever other method might be evolved, outweigh the disadvantages that become so obvious when the state is empowered through legislation to execute some of its members. Thus, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, in spite of the feelings of my constituents on the question, that logic dictates I really have no alternative other than to support a Criminal Code in Canada which, in attempting to both make the punishment fit the crime and at the same time ensuring adequate protection to Canadian society from those who would do its members harm, moves away from the last vestige of state-sanctioned physical violence that still includes murder, killing, hanging, or call it what you will, as a desirable method of handling some of the more heinous crimes which may be committed from time to time. Surely we must not permit our governing authorities in this day and age to engage in this form of legal violence unless the benefits outstrip the detriments accompanying such action.

Let us examine what is really being proposed in the legislation. Whether we like it or not, there has been a de facto absence of capital punishment as a form of penalty in Canada since 1962. A similar situation has existed in Belgium since 1863, and in such countries as Germany, Finland, Italy, Mexico, New Zealand, Portugal, Sweden and Great Britain of more recent date. None of these countries has completely legislated the death penalty off their books; they simply refuse to implement it through various legal means available to them under their respective laws. That has been the situation in Canada. Our criminal Code provides that the Governor General has the authority to commute death sentences. The fact of the matter is that the cabinet must review the record of evidence and recommendations from a judge who orders the sentence of death.

On the basis of this review it becomes a responsibility of the cabinet to recommend to the Governor General whether or not the death sentence should be carried out. What has been of some concern is that all such reviews have resulted in deferral of dates of execution or outright commutation of the death sentence. What I believe is less understood and less appreciated is that there have been only six commutations since 1967, half of which concerns cases which came to cabinet with the jury's recommendation for mercy.

Mr. Speaker, one must ask why all these automatic checkpoints are built into the legal system. They are not there in the case of any other sentences. Are we afraid, as a society, to make an error? If so, why are we less afraid in the case of other penalties? Why have we in years past carried out the death sentence in such secrecy, with as few witnesses present as possible? Have we been ashamed of our actions? Why have the cabinet and governors general of this country not authorized any executions since 1962? Surely the answer is obvious. Those in positions of authority and responsibility in Canada—and, I might add, in most other western countries—have had a nagging and horrendous feeling that the process was brutally wrong. Therefore, they have simply avoided the responsibility by exercising those safeguards provided in the law to the fullest extent possible.

I have no particular sympathy for the man or woman who takes the life of a fellow citizen in cold blood, regardless of the degree of provocation save complete self-defence. I really have no idea whether such persons can ever be completely rehabilitated or restored to society as normal human beings. There may be some who will respond to treatment, but I fear a large number will not. On the other hand, I am concerned about the families of the victims and earnestly believe that our criminal justice system should direct far more attention to their needs. I intend personally to work toward seeking improvements in this area in the name of a just and honourable society. The point remains, however, that my concerns for the victim and his or her near and dear ones, plus my lack of any particular sympathy for the guilty man or woman, do not in themselves lead me to accept that, even if such persons may have lost their right to live in society in the normal way, the state somehow inherits the right to take away all possible vestige of life itself through the brutal and final act of hanging them until they are dead.

Mr. Speaker, the state can be empowered by its citizens to be the weapon or the instrument—depending on how you look at it—for any deed we may consider to be desirable and within the means of the state to perform. On this basis, the reinstatement of capital punishment could be argued to be acceptable even if it meant restoring physical structures for that purpose in some provinces where they have long since been destroyed, for the provinces are called upon to administer the hanging procedure; even if it meant reverting to condoning a violent form of punishment by the state at a time when society is supposedly searching for every available means to reduce the amount of violence in society; even if it meant going it alone, as it were, as a nation when most countries of the industrialized west have long since abandoned this form of punishment.

● (1700)

Yes, the state can be given this power and this authority, but the question before us today is whether or not it should be given such power when for nearly 15 years we have indeed limited the authority to such an extent as to almost encourage the governing bodies of the state to choose not to exercise the brutal legislation at all. We seem to have done everything we can over the years to support what might be referred to as almost a weasling-out attitude on the part of authorities so that they might virtually ensure a discontinuance of this act of execution. We have done everything, that is, with the exception of removing the penalty itself from the statute books.

I have stated my position on the issue and have indicated some of the rationale leading me to the conclusion that, in the context of Canadian society in the latter half of the 1970s, it is my view that the proponents of the death penalty must be prepared to support their case against the increasingly forceful arguments that prevail on the other side. I have mentioned, among the latter, the situation prevailing in other western nations, the de facto experience, as it were, in our own country over the past 15 years and the obvious reluctance of governing authorities actually to implement the death sentence for whatever purpose or reason.

I would like to move, now, to the argument as to why the death penalty is inappropriate. If we are to give the state the power to take the life of a citizen by legal means—whether or not they implement it is almost beside the point—then this authority must, as mentioned earlier, be based on the argument that the existence of such power will surely act as a deterrent against future crimes of a like nature and/or that the carrying out of such a sentence is a suitable and appropriate form of retribution—that is "the punishment fits the crime" philosophy.

Let us look, first, at the deterrence aspect. A careful review of all available statistics reveals that at best there is an extremely marginal case to be made for the death penalty as a deterrent; and on the other side of the coin there is indication of a reducing rate of first-degree murders where capital punishment has long since been abandoned as a legitimate punitive measure. Looking back a few centuries, we see that during the 38-year period of the reign of Henry VIII in England, from 1509 to 1547, there were 72,000 executions in that country, or an average of about five every two days. Bear in mind the relatively small population of the country at that time. Obviously, these executions were having little or no effect on the number of crimes committed for which the death penalty was considered an appropriate punishment to fit the crimes of the day.

By the year 1810, some 300 years later, England had moved to the position where some 300 different offences were punishable by capital punishment. Forty of these offences related to the area of forgery alone. It was only through the intervention of the banking fraternity itself—with some 1,000 bankers presenting a petition to the House of Commons at the time of Sir Robert Peel—that most of the forgery offences were deleted from the list of offences punishable by execution.

The simple reason for the reluctance to move was the concern that the absence of the authority of the state to take the life of the offender would indeed lead to an increase in the number of crimes relating to forgery. It never happened, Mr. Speaker. After 150 years of debate, England ultimately passed an act of abolition in 1965. This was followed by a continuing decrease in the number of murders per 100,000 of population in each of the next six years, with the exception of one. A recent move to reinstate the death penalty, owing largely to the terrorism rampant in some parts of the country, was turned aside by the British House of Commons. At the time the Home Secretary argued simply that to bring back the death penalty would be wrong and counterproductive in the fight against violent crime and terrorist murders. So much for the deterrence argument. In my view it contains little or no substance.

I want to move now to the argument whether the reinstatement of the death penalty in Canada, bearing in mind its de facto absence over a 15-year period, would be just and appropriate as a form of penalty best designed to fit the crime of first-degree murder. Here we are referring to the retribution argument. In speaking to this aspect, Mr. Speaker, let me make one viewpoint quite clear—one that my six public meetings in the riding confirmed as being largely in tune with the thinking of the electorate—and that is the clear intent that capital punishment, if continued as a legitimate form of penalty in Canada, should be made applicable to all those convicted of first-degree murder and not simply restricted to the murder of prison guards and police officers. It is my understanding that the police officers themselves would share this viewpoint, and so would many constituents who were abhorred over the cold-blooded murder of a Scarborough taxi driver a year or so ago. Thus, we are talking about the legitimacy of the death penalty for first-degree murders, period, with no restriction as to its limited application over a designated sector society.

It seems to me that the retribution argument must in itself be viewed from at least three aspects, Mr. Speaker. First, there is the age-old argument of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Surely this went out long ago. Philosophically, we might compare the teachings of the New Testament to this Old Testament concept. That, alone, is some 2,000 years ago. In the intervening period we have seen the disappearance of most sadistic and torturous forms of punishment imposed by various states in their endeavour, presumably, to relate the punishment more closely to the nature of the crime. Some people argued, at my public meetings, for a return of some of these crime-related punishments. However, by and large the most convinced retentionist does not argue in this vein.

Accepting this, why should we accept capital punishment as an appropriate form of penalty for the crime of murder? If we refuse to accept a violent form of state-instituted bodily harm, such as stretching, dismemberment, or, indeed, the cat-o'-nine tails in today's society as a fitting retribution for heinous crimes by the guilty person on the body of the victim, why continue to accept the violence of breaking a person's neck in two for a crime of murder? I have received no satisfactory answer to that question.

The second aspect of the retribution issue is the expressed desire to ensure an adequately severe form of punishment for what is undoubtedly the most brutal of all forms of crime—taking the life of another person. In my view, imprisonment for life may result in an even more severe form of punishment in many aspects than the relatively simple and "once and for all" aspect of hanging. There has been one recent and well publicized example of this, where a lifer being interviewed on television stated unequivocally that he would rather hang than linger on indefinitely behind bars with little hope of any form of normal life in the distant future. It seems to me that is a most forceful argument in favour of life imprisonment in that the guilty person himself looks upon it as a more severe penalty than the single and yet final act of execution.

The third aspect of the retribution argument relates to life itself and who should have the power or authority to take it away. The state grants each one of us the freedom under which we live, but it by no means is the instrument through which we were granted life. I would thus argue that the state is quite entitled to remove our individual freedom at any time we indicate an inability to use this freedom in a responsible manner, as in the case of the commission of a crime against another member of society.

● (1710)

However, this entitlement does not extend, in my view, to the taking away of life. That is a matter that should be more appropriately left in the hands of those responsible for giving it in the first place. Thus, I can readily accept the argument of a murderer having lost his right to freedom and a normal life in society. What I cannot accept is this argument being extended to the point where society commissions the state as the appropriate authority, not only to ensure that the loss of freedom aspect is respected through the means of imprisonment but, further, that the state be empowered to take the violent step of dispossessing the guilty individual of life itself.

I have attempted to present my argument in a rational and logical manner, eliminating as much as possible the emotional aspect. Yet I know and respect the emotions that are generated among Canadians today, both in Scarborough West and elsewhere in the country, when they witness an increase in the area of violent crime in general and a seeming disinclination on the part of the courts and the justice system to act in a speedy and definite manner to apprehend and punish the offender in a suitable way. I share this concern and, in addition to prodding the government to give more careful consideration to the needs of the victim and his or her close family, I also intend to press for more concerned action in the area of speedy apprehension and trial of persons charged with crimes against other members of our society.

I also intend to watch carefully over provisions relating to the early release of those charged with more serious offences. Many of these aspects are covered in the legislation accompanying this bill, and I believe it is essential that both Bills C-83 and C-84 receive the approval of this thirtieth parliament as quickly as possible. This will enable Canadian society to take a major step toward securing a reduction in the extent of violent crime in our country.

While my stance today indicates my objections to capital punishment both as a deterrent and as an appropriate form of retribution in the context of today's society, I do not condone an overly lax or inattentive attitude to the frustrations of society and its law officers to the problems relating to inadequacies in the administration of our justice system.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon there was an exchange in the House between the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the member who was speaking at the time in which I was involved in the form of a point of order. There was a question raised as to how the government ought to have proceeded in respect of the dissemination of material setting forth both sides of this issue. At that time I advanced the argument that this was a free vote—at least, in terms of our party it is to be absolutely and completely free—and that perhaps in those circumstances there was a duty on the government to advance the arguments, statistics and learned writings on both sides of the case.

I found later on that there was in fact a precedent for that point of view during the time of the late Hon. Guy Favreau when he was minister of justice and there was prepared a guide for parliamentarians in respect of the legislation put forward at that time. I regret very much that that kind of attitude was not taken and that that kind of material has not been made available to hon. members of the House at this time.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to point out to the hon. member that the material he has referred to which was put out under Hon. Guy Favreau was brought up to date in 1973 and put out again. This was the Grenier report to which I referred in answer to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco). I pointed out there were other reports that covered both sides as well. The one the hon. member referred to originally was put out under Mr. Favreau and was brought up to date by my department in 1973 for the debate then. Recent statistics put out have brought that up to date again.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It seems to me, though, Mr. Speaker—and this is the reason I raised it—that this debate has taken upon itself something less than a free vote—something less than it ought to be. I am, quite frankly, very much concerned by the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated, in terms of the Liberal party, that this is a matter of solidarity at least in so far as the position of the cabinet is concerned.

An hon. Member: He never said that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We can debate that point, and there will be other speakers follow me who will refer to it. This is a government bill in so far as the cabinet is concerned. I am very much concerned about this matter in terms of the freedom of the vote.

The other thing which worries me is the attempt by the government and those who would ask us to support the bill to suggest there is some form of onus on those who would oppose the bill to justify the position they have taken or will take when they vote. We heard that this afternoon, and we heard it pretty well every day during the course of the debate. I am not questioning the good faith of those who argue for this bill but, quite frankly, I think that aspect of our affairs is completely reversed.

I recall in 1973, when we last dealt with this bill and when I came into the House for the first time, listening carefully to the speeches made at the time, listening carefully to the solicitor general of the day put forward the bill, and listening to those who supported him by indicating it was a reasonable and proper proposition at the time to ask this House to support a bill which continued the experiment of abolition of the death penalty which had gone on five years before. Those who supported the measure at that time also said there was a good case for continuing the retention of the death penalty for the murderers of policemen and prison guards who were murdered in the course of performing their duty.

That proposition was put to us on the basis of the evidence that existed at the time. I supported the bill at that time. But the question I must ask myself today, as a member of parliament considering this legislation and who must stand by himself to vote and decide, is whether the circumstances of our society to which this bill applies in terms of the death penalty are better or worse today, and whether in view of those circumstances I can in the exercising of my right to vote in this place change the position I took in 1973.

● (1720)

Quite frankly, I have thought and I have worried about it because I do not take any vote lightly. I have come to the conclusion that the circumstances are such that I cannot support the proposal by the government which would abolish the death penalty for the killers of policemen, prison guards and other people in authority acting in the course of their duty.

The interesting thing about this bill is that it does not make a different individual out of a policeman or prison guard as a person, but only relates to that person in the course of his duty. We ask something of prison guards, of policemen, of constables, of custodial officers, of wardens, of jailers, of keepers, of guards and of permanent employees of prisons, to use the words of the statute, that we do not ask of ourselves—that is, we ask them to enter into circumstances for our protection. If there is an argument to be advanced, or if there is a statistic to be advanced which would indicate that the position taken by the government in 1973 ought to be different in 1976, then I would like to hear it. Until I hear it, and until I can be satisfied that that position is changed for the better, then I think I am bound to be consistent with what I stood for in 1973.

Given the very limited circumstances in which we speak of retention as opposed to abolition, the other question that has arisen in the course of this debate is the whole matter of deterrence. What has happened in the course of this debate, and even this afternoon out of the mouth of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), is that we have heard arguments both for and against capital punishment as if we were talking today about a law which said that all murderers were to be hanged. But we have gone far beyond that. I say, with respect and with some deference, that it is coming quite close to intellectual dishonesty to use the arguments that would have applied in the day when we were discussing the first movement away from the death penalty, at a period of time when we are now discussing the death penalty as it applies to a very narrow class. That is the first point.

I have looked for, and I have not found, one statistic which advances or supports the limited position. We are asked to accept the argument that in no case is the death penalty a deterrent. I cannot believe that is so. I cannot bring myself to accept the position that in every case involving the death of persons in the cases I have described, which are set forth in section 214 of the Criminal Code, where there has been an opportunity, in a way perhaps of husband and wife, or businessmen dealing one with another, do not have the opportunity to premeditate and think in advance, the death penalty is not a deterrent.

It is my fate, I suppose, as best I can, with my training and background in the law as a defence counsel, and as a Crown attorney—and I am very proud to have served in both capacities—to have to put my feet in the shoes of the accused and ask myself, if this were me, would I be deterred by the knowledge of the penalty?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If this were "I".

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I stand corrected. If this were I, and I had a certain knowledge of the consequences, namely, the imposition of the death penalty, would I be deterred from committing a crime that would lead to that even? Looking at it personally, I have to say that I cannot conceive of a situation, given a level of understanding or given a level of sanity, in which I would not be so deterred and in which other people would not be deterred. So I believe it is a false argument to say that the death penalty is not a deterrent, because I think there are cases where it is. If there are cases where it is, as I believe we can find, I think it is incumbent upon us to ask ourselves what we are asking of those who, as the Minister of Justice said, are acting in the protection of society. We should ask ourselves what they are undertaking, with the setting aside of the death penalty.

So far as the statistics are concerned, when we are dealing with a matter of this nature with respect to the number of murders that have taken place, it is my respectful submission that there is no statistic available anywhere to indicate the number of murders that have not taken place as a result of the consideration of the penalty. Surely, if lesser penalties are regarded as deterrents for lesser crimes, then the supreme penalty must be regarded as a deterrent for the supreme crime, the taking of human life. So, sir, I do not intend to support this bill.

Another matter which has come up in this House is the whole question of conscience. I refuse to accept that in one way or another votes taken by members of parliament on an issue of this nature are matters of conscience and that other votes are not matters of conscience. I think that in one way or another all votes taken by members of parliament are matters of conscience. While I would want to retain the independence of my own conscience, in terms of any vote I take, whether on capital punishment or otherwise, I cannot condemn, and I would not condemn, members of parliament who have decided that as a matter of conscience they wish to represent, in their vote, what they feel are the wishes of their constituents.

Surely, if a member wishes to represent the 100,000 or so people who sent him or her here, this is a matter for the conscience of that member of parliament. We are sent here to make judgments. We cannot confer on every issue with our constituents. We have to decide how we will vote, we have to decide on what basis we will vote, and we have to decide what will motivate us with respect to voting. I have not taken a poll in my constituency. I do not think I have to do that. I think I know my constituents well enough to know that in terms of their feelings about this piece of legislation and the issue of capital punishment they feel as strongly as any other group of Canadians.

● (1730)

However, with that feeling which I know exists, as a member of parliament I have to make a decision on the legislation which is put before me, on the debate I have heard and on the consequences, as I see them, if this bill passes in terms of the custodial people I have described. I believe we will be doing them and, indirectly, society a disservice if we do not make the proper decision. I do not accept the argument that the retention of the death penalty for the limited number of people it would affect in any way is exclusive to the whole issue of improving conditions in society. Nor do I accept that there is no place in our system of justice for the proper use of the royal prerogative of mercy. The emphasis has to be on the words "proper use".

I recognize too that there can be difficulties in terms of the trial of an accused. Mistakes can be made in the course of trials. Those mistakes can be made no matter what crime or accused is being tried. We might consider the offence a lesser offence or a greater offence, but those are the vicissitudes which have to be faced in any human institution. The system of justice which we use in this country as it is incorporated in the Criminal Code in terms of criminal law and the appellate process is perhaps the best in the world, and if those aspects of the legal machinery should fail there is a place for the proper use of the royal prerogative of mercy. I think that if there is any doubt in terms of whether an accused was properly identified, whether evidence was admitted which ought not have been admitted, whether there was some question of the mental balance of the accused, or a host of other matters which might arise in a capital case, then no one who is reasonable in this country could condemn a cabinet for exercising that royal prerogative of mercy.

I know that generally cabinets in the past—and I assume cabinets of the future will do so—perhaps took more time with respect to commutation matters than other matters which might have come before them. The cabinet decision has a profound effect on the life of a human being, and that is as it should be. However, the responsibility to administer the law and to act in accordance with the law is an important one. What has happened, unfortunately, in the operation of our system is that there has been a suspicion abroad that government decisions have been based more on how ministers feel—although perhaps honestly and strongly—than on administering the law. I hope that that is not so because I do not believe we should be subject to the rule of man but rather we should be subject to the rule of law.

This is not a very easy speech for me to make, and it will not be an easy vote for me. I am not a violent person, but I believe that there is a case to be made for the retention now in the law on the basis of the deterrent effects the death penalty can have on those who have an opportunity to think about what they are doing, and having had that opportunity, go ahead and act anyway. It is because of that very important aspect of premeditation that the present law ought to stand and that this bill should be defeated.

I respect the opinions of those who differ with me. I am sure that those who differ with me feel as strongly as I do. I believe that this House should come to a decision fairly quickly with respect to this matter, subject to the right of each hon. member who wants to speak on the principle of the bill to do so.

I had not intended to speak at all in the course of this debate, but after I read and listened, I felt that I had to rise and put my position as honestly, fairly, succinctly and as briefly as I could, and I want to thank the House for its respectful attention to what I have had to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, this has to be one of the longest debates I have seen in the House of Commons since I became a member of parliament back in 1968. I think this is one of the issues upon which hon. members have really had to dig down deep and put their thoughts, minds, hearts, and souls on the line because it is an issue which deals with life and death. These life and death issues are not always easy to deal with.

I am not going to speak very long in this debate. Many of the arguments have been made, and made well, by speakers on both sides of the issue. This will be a free vote for all of us, despite what some hon. members opposite might try to say. It will be a free vote for the cabinet.

Mr. Stevens: Oh, no.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): It will be a free vote for the cabinet despite what some hon. members opposite might think or say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I know each member in our caucus, and with all honesty and from my own knowledge of each of them I can say that they will truly be voting according to their consciences and according to what they believe. In my own case, I have wrestled back and forth. There was a time in my life when I was a retentionist, absolutely. I was concerned about some of the rather heinous crimes, the rather rotten crimes that were foisted upon us by criminals, such as the killing of young children, young men or young women. But after I surveyed the issue and looked at it very carefully I came to the conclusion that there is no place in the law books of our country, a civilized country like ours, for the death penalty.

● (1740)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am going to support Bill C-84 and vote in favour of abolishing the death penalty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): The chief motivation I have for voting for the bill is my respect for human life. There is a lot of opinion on this side of the issue and I think some of it is best expounded by the various churches. I think the largest group of public opinion that makes the point on this side of the issue comes from the churches, and I should like to read some brief statements by the churches that back up my statement. Bishop G. Emmett Carter, President of the Canadian Catholic Conference, states:

> Parliament should abolish the death penalty and "bring about the reforms which are necessary in our penitentiary system and in all areas of justice.
>
> A society which really respects life cannot use the death penalty to protect itself and at the same time create an atmosphere wherein other human rights will be respected. Moreover, violence engenders violence and the death penalty is a violent act. The spirit of the gospel is one which leads us to favour mercy and clemency."

The seventeenth General Council of the United Church of Canada states:

> We affirm our belief that capital punishment is contrary to the spirit and teaching of Christ.

The statement of the Anglican Church, written by Dr. Leonard Hatfield, is equally profound:

> Surely the taking of life is not conducive to the recognition of the worth of the individual and the consequent protection of society.
>
> There can be no question about the unfortunate influence of an execution upon many other persons. For instance, prisoners often identify themselves with the condemned person. They see in his death the ultimate rejection of those who through life have been rejected by society, so they hate society the more.

There are just some of the statements. I could go on. There has been a lot of debate about whether capital punishment is a deterrent. I think if people read with an open mind and and open heart all the information that is available they should be convinced, as I am, that no case can be made for taking a man's or woman's life as a deterrent to murder. It just is not so. You can look at the statistics and consider the body of opinion and you will see fluctuations and changes from year to year all around the world.

Countries that have been abolitionist have shown fluctuations, and countries that still use the death penalty have shown wide fluctuations in their views. One year the statistics would be very high and another year they would be very low. If you look at the so-called murder graph, if you want to put it that way, in terms of countries that are retentionist versus countries that are abolitionist, it comes out very clearly on the side of those countries that are abolitionist.

In 1975 the murder rate in abolitionist countries was 2.8 per 100,000 population; in the retentionist countries it was 4.95 per 100,000 of population. In 1966 the figures were 3.45 abolitionist, 5.9 retentionist; in 1967, 3.25 abolitionist, 6.35 retentionist; 1968, 3.9 abolitionist, 6.7 retentionist; in 1969, 4.0 abolitionist, 7.0 retentionist, and in 1970 they were 4.65 abolitionist and 7.65 retentionist. I think these figures show very clearly that taking a human life is not a deterrent to murder.

One of the fears that many of my constituents have is that people get out on easy parole terms and I must say I have been somewhat concerned about that as well. I am glad to see that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has taken steps to change the law so that there is really no such thing as easy parole.

I am also pleased to see a clause in Bill C-83 that would deal with the habitual criminal. Criminologists and others who deal with the penal system know very well that there are some people who can be described as an accident looking for a place to happen. These people will no longer be turned out into society if it can be shown that they really are in the category of an accident looking for a place to happen. They just will not ever get out again. I think that is fine, because society must be protected. That is what Bill C-83 and Bill C-84 are all about—the protection of society. We must be concerned with it, and we must find the best way possible to protect society against violent crimes.

From 1920 to 1974 182 persons were granted parole often a death sentence. Only 14 had their parole revoked for misbehaviour, and only nine of these had again committed an indictable offence.

Between 1867 and 1975, in the entire history of our country, only one who had his death sentence commuted committed a second murder. These are pretty substantial bits of evidence that the death penalty is not a deterrent.

I said in the beginning that I was not going to speak very long, and I shall not, as I think there are other members who wish to speak. I just wish to reaffirm my position that I shall vote in favour of Bill C-84. I do not think there is any place in a civilized society for the death penalty, and it should be abolished.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I for one was not going to enter this debate until I saw some of the tactics being used by the government to manipulate the House into an early passage of Bill C-84. As a result I have reviewed the situation, and tonight I should like to say a few words touching first of all on the whole question of urgency. Why does the government seem to feel it is so urgent that this legislation be passed quickly without, I would suggest, due committee review, and before the House recesses?

I say that because the last time we dealt with this general question was in the last parliament. It was only in December, 1973, that we passed Bill C-2. It provided the limited continuation of the death penalty, until December 31, 1977. You will recall that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) almost pleaded for the bill to be accepted; he said he needed extra time in which to gather statistics in order to make a meaningful review. He was concerned about an 18-year review, and specifically about figures relating to the periods 1956-62, 1962-68, and 1968-74. He made a good argument at that time.

● (1750)

Having read the minister's most uninformative statement as reported in Hansard, and the 55-page statement which was not reported in Hansard but which was delivered outside the House on the same day, I conclude that the minister glossed over certain statistics; which were allegedly, the very reason for his wanting an extension of the provisions of Bill C-2 to which I have already referred.

The minister indicated that the murder rate per 100,000 of population rose from 1.2 in 1962 to 2.4 in 1974. He included these facts in the statement, made in this House and outside. But he did not point out that in the previous six years the murder rate had remained static at about 1 per 100,000 for the period ended 1962. In those previous six years it hovered at approximately one per year, and the significant increase in the murder rate occurred in the last 12 years.

I believe, as does my party's House leader, that if the government was serious about allowing a free vote on the bill the Solicitor General would have presented as ably as possible all statistics bearing on those three six-year review periods to which I previously referred. Therefore the first point with which I wished to deal this evening was the question of urgency. There is no urgency.

Second, I wish to touch briefly on the 55-page ministerial statement to which I alluded earlier. I shall quote certain parts of that statement to show that it contains conflicting positions. Before I do so, I wish to deal with this general proposition: is capital punishment a deterrent? I shall review the experience of other countries.

Contrary to what the Liberals and socialists like to think, there is no stampede on the part of the world's nations in the abolitionist direction. States are not stampeding to become abolitionist. Certainly United Nations records make that clear, records prepared by United Nations officials who themselves, obviously, are abolitionists, show capital punishment is increasing. They state, in despair, that the nations of the world are increasingly imposing the death penalty, that such imposition is on the increase, not on the decrease. I point out that the Communist states of the world are uniform in retaining the death penalty. Not one has done away with the death penalty; yet those in this House who espouse the virtues of some of those states say we should be abolitionists.

Mr. Gilbert: I didn't know you were a Communist.

Mr. Stevens: Such hon. members are selective when referring to their Communist friends in other countries. They like to quote them when it suits their purpose and to ignore them if it is embarrrassing.

I should like to review specifically the provisions of the bill itself. Some hon. members including those on the government side, have spoken about so-called tough parole provisions. I wish to refer hon. members to certain specific clauses to which, for some reason, the minister did not refer, either in his lengthy statement made outside the House or in the statement he put on the Hansard record. For example, there is this provision: even though a man may be imprisoned for life, he may leave jail if he has an escort. Mr. Speaker, I have checked this. The bill would give a person who has been jailed, presumably for life, the privilege of absenting himself from jail, provided he has an escort. How can you call that being harsh with the criminal, being harsh with the convicted murderer?

I am sorry the minister did not deal specifically, clause by clause, with some of these provisions on which I wish to touch later this evening.

Mr. Allmand: This is second reading.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member cannot do that at this time. He should discuss the clauses of the bill in committee.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member on my left says I cannot do that at this time and that I should leave the discussion of such matters until the bill is in committee. Are we not to comment on certain provisions in the bill, which the minister introduced, which are unduly lax? When the hon. member speaks of the committee review I ask, what sort of committee review will take place with regard to this bill? The guillotine is to be used. The chairman of the committee is an abolitionist; he has sat in the House, pounding his desk to applaud every abolitionist speech made in the House. But still we are told that there is to be meaningful review in the committee, a committee dominated by government members without the courage to accept this bill as a straightforward, government bill, and without the courage to ask the nation to endorse, or otherwise, their actions. We are told that the vote on the bill is to be a so-called free vote; but the cabinet is required to vote en bloc.

If I had time before six o'clock I would quote the minister's words, words which suggest that this is a government bill and that, contrary to the suggestions of certain ministers, the vote, as far as the cabinet is concerned, is not to be a free vote.

Mr. Allmand: How can you sleep at night?

Mr. Gilbert: He doesn't.

Mr. Stevens: I say this because some in this House wish to act in a manner against the will of the Canadian public. To me, if democracy is to flourish, it must continue to evolve. This House must facilitate the expression of the public will and provide for the implementation of that will. I suggest that our system has developed certain rigidities which allow the few, in this case the abolitionists, to impose their view on the majority in this country. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, before the six o'clock adjournment I was touching on various matters coming under Bill C-84. I felt I should set the record straight this evening concerning the question of a so-called free vote with respect to Bill C-84. When this matter was before us in October, 1973, in the last parliament, the question of the free vote was dealt with, and at that time the Solicitor General was relatively free in his comments. I draw the attention of the House to Hansard for October 18, 1973, page 7015. At that time, referring to Bill C-2, the Solicitor General stated:

This is a government bill. For the members of our party and all other parties, as far as we are concerned it is a free vote, but not for the government, meaning the cabinet.

I refer to that because as far as I know—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is quite correct that I did say that. However, within a few days I was corrected by both the House leader and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said, contrary to what I said, that it was a free vote for the cabinet and all those on the government side. I was, therefore, corrected in that.

Mr. Stevens: If the Solicitor General is correct with regard to my reference in 1973, perhaps he will be rising on a further question of privilege in a few moments because, on February 12, 1976, dealing with Bill C-84, the bill before us, there is a long exchange between my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and the Solicitor General, at which time my colleague was trying to get this identified. He asked whether in fact the Prime Minister said he would resign if this abolitionist legislation did not go through. There was some fencing that went on, and finally my colleague from Calgary North asked the Solicitor General, and I quote:

—I should like to ask him pointblank if he can assure the House on behalf of the government, and particularly members of cabinet, that there will be a free vote in this House on capital punishment when the bill is presented?

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, it will be similar to the last occasion when we dealt with this. There will be a government bill to which the government will be committed, but members of this House who are not with the government will be free to vote on it as they see fit.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) then said:

You have said it all now—no free vote.

Mr. Allmand: I was again corrected after that. Maybe I tried to give expression to my wishes.

Mr. Stevens: The Solicitor General keeps commenting that he has been correcting statements made on earlier occasions in this House. I think it is fair to ask him when do we believe him and when do we not. On two separate occasions dealing with two separate bills, C-2 and C-84, he categorically stated it was a free vote for everybody but the cabinet. Then he says that on two separate occasions he corrected the record after discussion with two members of the cabinet.

● (2010)

An hon. Member: He was corrected. He did not correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the floor and I suggest he be given the chance to make his point.

Mr. Stevens: One or two members on the government side are obviously feeling very touchy about this item. They ask, "What has it got to do with the bill before us?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I suggest it has everything to do with it. This is a government bill and the fact is that there will not be a free vote. The government does not have the courage to tell the Canadian people that it is trying to inflict abolition on the nation against its will.

Before the House rose for dinner I mentioned that in my view for democracy to flourish it should continually evolve. I believe it essential that public opinion should be allowed to express itself. I said our system had developed certain rigidities, a situation which is presently allowing a minority, in this case a minority of abolitionists, to assert its will over the majority of Canadians. The parliamentary system is allowing this because there has been so little change in that system over the past century.

Governments have learned that by catering to minorities they can secure re-election and deal harshly with certain sections of public opinion. They have learned that they can frustrate the will of the majority—it is just the question of choosing the right time. In the view of the administration, this is an opportune moment, about two years away from the next election, to inflict abolition on the state. That is one of the issues I intend to deal with tonight.

Few electors in this country can comprehend the degree of power held by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today, though many senior officials in the public service and his intimate advisers do. Oscar Wilde's quip, made some 80 years ago, that democracy meant simply the bludgeoning of the people by the people might well be an apt description of the government's approach to this legislation. It appears that between elections there is little need to court public opinion. After an election date is decided upon, the wooing process begins. New programs are offered with particular appeal to vocal minorities. Regional interests are championed. Stress is laid on proposed new handouts with little mention of their eventual cost to the public at large.

Once re-elected the government is subjected to little restraint or discipline. With a majority in parliament, it is supreme. This situation has arisen here and elsewhere after 30 years of Liberal-socialistic rule in western democracies. Those who once were reformers, who indeed sought democracy, have become unresponsive to the wishes of today's majority and impatient with the democratic process itself. They now use our parliamentary institution as a device to impose their minority views on the majority. They are confident the next election will turn little on today's issues and more on personalities and the floss of the day. Examples of this attitude are numerous.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), leading spokesman on this bill for the NDP contingent in parliament, speaking in favour of the government's bill to abolish capital punishment, sums up his thinking when he says, as reported at page 13096 of Hansard for May 3, 1976:

I regret that so many people in our society misunderstand and think that they have the right, because they believe they have a majority, to decide how we should vote.

I hope all members noted the odd terminology used by the hon. member for Greenwood while, in effect, seconding the passage of this bill on behalf of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Abbott: You hate democracy.

Mr. Stevens: That is right. The hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) said "They hate democracy." The hon. member put it very well. If he reads what the hon. member for Greenwood said a little later on he will find he elaborated on this question of how parliamentarians should relate their votes to the wishes of their constituents.

I would draw attention to the fact that the Solicitor General took the same tone with respect to this bill as did the hon. member for Greenwood, saying—as can be confirmed by reference to page 44 of the prepared text of his speech—that somehow or other members should sit in this House and vote according to their own consciences or according to their own convictions, in spite of evidence that the public will would have them do otherwise. Both those hon. members referred to Edmund Burke, a Conservative, to justify their stand on this issue. Mr. Speaker, Edmund Burke is a well-known authority, but surely for two members, the minister and the hon. member for Greenwood, to suggest we should be bound by the views of a Conservative politician 202 years ago is absolutely ridiculous. I question whether either of them troubled to check out the situation in England at the time the speech to which they were referring was made to the electors of Bristol in 1774.

At that time, when Burke spoke of his role as a member of parliament, the total number of people who were actually able to vote in England was less than 100,000. Members were in fact elected through "pocket boroughs" and other cozy arrangements; the age of widespread enfranchisement in England had not yet been reached. When Burke spoke, the population of England was some seven million. Means of communication were sketchy. There was, of course, no radio, no telephone network, no television. There was no way in which the public at large could be rapidly informed concerning the issues of the day.

What I find interesting is that when members opposed to abolition quote from the Bible or from other religious sources concerning capital punishment, the response from the other side is always, "Do not take those statements out of context." Yet this is exactly what those very members have done with respect to Edmund Burke's comments. What he was saying was merely this: he was asking the voters of Bristol to realize that when he went to Westminster they should not expect him to vote only in the interests of the electors of Bristol but, rather, that they should expect him to vote in the interests of the nation as a whole.

Put in a different context, he was saying that when a member is elected from Toronto he should not be expected to go to parliament and become a protagonist for the interests of Toronto as against, for example, the interests of Montreal or some other city. Edmund Burke was suggesting that we should sit here to consider the interests of the nation, not local issues. If I may quote him directly, he said:

● (2020)

Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interest each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one purpose, that of the whole;—

I hear the House leader applauding that.

—where, not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament.

I was hoping that the Solicitor General and the House leader as well as others on the government side would applaud that as they did, since they do not seem to know in subsequent years Edmund Burke said something entirely different. For example, in his speech in 1780 on the economical report Edmund Burke had this to say, and I would draw it to the attention of the Solicitor General he said that the people are the masters.

Mr. Sharp: Of course; the people can throw them out.

Mr. Stevens: The House leader says that the people can throw them out. I can assure you that the people will throw you out if you give them half a chance. Call an election on this issue before us today and just see what happens.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. Would the hon. member please address the Chair.

Mr. Stevens: Edmund Burke, in his tract on the property laws, also said this:

In all forms of government the people is the true legislator.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Read it all. Tell us what he went on to say next.

Mr. Stevens: That is the quote that is relevant. If the hon. member wishes to quote Edmund Burke he can get up a little later and do so. Let me give the House another quotation from Edmund Burke, since this has been introduced by abolitionists in an attempt to make members of this House feel a little better when they vote against the wishes of their constituents and on the basis of their own convictions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the floor.

Mr. Gilbert: I thought Edmund Burke had it.

Mr. Stevens: The whip on the government side was asking for some additional quotations from Edmund Burke. In his letter to the sheriffs at Bristol, Edmund Burke had this to say:

> If any ask me what a free government is, I answer, that for any practical purpose, it is what the people think so.

The point I want to make is that in a democratic society it is wrong for any government to be imposing the abolition of capital punishment on the people without at least asking for their views by way of a referendum, so as to guide the government. The people want retention. So do I. That is why I oppose this bill.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Why does you leader support it? Tell us about Joe Clark.

Mr. Stevens: I would ask the government why it has consistently refused to hold a referendum. As we all know, in California five million people, some 67 per cent of those who voted on the plebiscite or referendum in that state, voted for capital punishment, and the California state legislature in 1974 re-enacted capital punishment in response to the referendum. Why does this government wish to duck out of the issue and not consult the public on this important question?

Mr. Allmand: That provision is in their constitution.

Mr. Foster: Why don't you become an American?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I find the comments from hon. members opposite typical of an arrogant government that is ready to fall. In fact one of their members was telling me just before the break that he was hoping to get on tonight with his abolitionist speech because he was wavering and may have to speak for capital punishment tomorrow, he was so undecided.

Mr. Allmand: That shows how free the vote is.

Mr. Stevens: The Solicitor General keeps raising this question of a free vote. Perhaps he could clarify this. Does he anticipate that any member of the Cabinet is going to vote against his bill?

Mr. Allmand: Are you asking me a question?

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps in due course you can answer that. I said before the break that I intended to review the situation with respect to capital punishment in other countries. As I was saying, some kind of aura has been put around this to try to show that Canada is out of step with other countries of the world, that we are one of the last retentionist countries, or will be if this bill should not pass. That, Mr. Speaker, is just not true.

I refer hon. members to various publications of the United Nations, including one that was published on February 23, 1973. In that publication there is a review of the state of the death penalty around the world, and paragraph 73 on page 21 of the report reads as follows:

> Since the intention of the General Assembly embodied in resolution 3011 is to promote abolition, it would seem that there is still much more to be done. Opinion polls made in abolitionist countries as well as retentionist countries show a majority of people favouring capital punishment. It is also evident that on a world scale, Governments are inclined to favour the maintenance of this penalty.

Mr. Allmand: How many are democratic countries?

Mr. Stevens: Paragraph 74:

> The death penalty is always used when a particular problem seems to grow out of proportion and frightens public opinion or when a political opposition has to be crushed.

The report then states that all communist countries have the death penalty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: —and it makes the point that many countries have made no progress at all towards abolition of the death penalty. Indeed, in some cases it has been used more widely, and harsher methods have been used to put the condemned to death.

As I say, that report was published in 1973. Then on February 12, 1975, an updated report was published which is really more startling. At page 6 of the report it is pointed out that only nine member states were abolitionist by law; that is, that the law does not provide for the death penalty. Since this report was published one more country has been added, making a total of 10. In other words, we would be the eleventh abolitionist nation if we approved this bill as proposed by the government.

Mr. Allmand: How many have de facto?

Mr. Stevens: Some 101 countries retain capital punishment for ordinary offences, the report points out. If the Solicitor General has not read this report I would recommend that he do so because it gives the number of executions carried out in Japan, for example.

Mr. Allmand: Carried out where?

Mr. Stevens: Japan. Would you like to know the number?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Stevens: The Solicitor General wants to know how many. In the period under review, 71 persons—69 men and two women—were executed in Japan. Does that satisfy you, Mr. Solicitor General?

● (2030)

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Stevens: At page 9 of this updated report of the United Nations, Item No. 48 states:

It remains extremely doubtful whether there is any progression towards the restriction of the use of the death penalty. Periods of abolition or non-use may be succeeded by widespread executions in a highly unstable political situation or by a sudden return to the death penalty as a sanction where a State feels insecure. Moreover, in a few States where serious forms of terror and violence have been experienced, the death penalty has been used increasingly as counter-terror, or deterrence.

That is an interesting new conclusion in that report, and I invite hon. members to read both reports because I believe, unlike the Solicitor General's presentation, this report is a fair presentation of the state of the death penalty at this time around the world, written incidentally by abolitionists, in the sense that the United Nations has hoped for more abolition than there is presently in the world.

I mentioned earlier that I would like to touch upon certain provisions in the legislation. I was rather surprised that the Solicitor General did not give some type of overview of the various provisions, but I realize he should not be referring to them clause by clause. I would point out to hon. members that general impression has been created, that somehow when we adopt abolition there will be tougher parole laws and tougher treatment of those people adjudged guilty, but that is not in accordance with the facts as you will see if you read this bill. There are provisions dealing, for example, with time spent in custody. Before I read the bill carefully I did not realize that the minister contemplated that when he had written in the reference to a firm 15 years or 25 years, he meant it to be clear that the time started running from the time an individual was charged and not from when he was convicted.

Let me point out that there are three individuals awaiting execution on July 15, 1976. One was first charged in October 1971, the second was first charged in February, 1973, and the third was charged in June, 1973. I would think it reasonable to anticipate that a person could spend five years, perhaps, and certainly three, going through the various judicial procedures prior to final conviction, and that that time apparently would be included as part of the time to be served in prison.

There are two provisions I find particularly interesting. The first is a provision which allows the parliament of Canada to enact, by express reference to the act we contemplate passing, a new act freeing a man who has been duly convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. This is something I do not think the public fully understands. This bill does not just contemplate doing away with the death penalty by requiring a person to be imprisoned for life. Nobody need be imprisoned for life under this bill if he can get this parliament or a subsequent parliament to take up his case and enact a special act to spring him. For those who say that somehow or other a life imprisonment is worse even than hanging, let me point out that no one, even if he is sentenced to life, need despair because he can take up his case with the government or any member of this House who can try to secure his freedom through the passage of another act, making reference to the part I referred to in Bill C-84.

There is another clause in this bill which I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members. It states that:

Notwithstanding the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act, in the case of any person sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole for a specified number of years pursuant to this Act, no absence without escort may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act and no day parole may be granted under the Parole Act—

That made me very curious. I wanted to know what was meant by "no absence without escort". Here we have a convicted murderer imprisoned supposedly for life, and yet he may absent himself from prison as long as he is escorted. I checked the Penitentiary Act and I found there were two people who could let any criminal out. First, the commissioner can let such a criminal out for an unlimited period for medical reasons and for a period not exceeding 15 days for humanitarian reasons, or to assist in the rehabilitation of the inmate. In addition, the officer in charge can allow a prisoner out for a period not exceeding 15 days for medical reasons and for a period not exceeding three days for humanitarian reasons, or to assist in the rehabilitation of the inmate. Mr. Speaker even if you are not a retentionist, how can this House support such soft treatment for a convicted murderer? I believe it is important—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the hon. member would be given unanimous consent to continue.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Why did you say no?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair heard somebody say "no", so the hon. member for Peace River has the floor.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I accept the keenness of your hearing, Mr. Speaker. I would not disagree with the Chair's right to hear, as that is one of the few benefits that accrue to distinguished people like yourself who occupy that office.

Before I begin some of my comments I want to touch for a minute on some of the things said by other hon. members, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Before doing that I want to say simply and categorically that I intend to vote for the bill. I say that immediately to make it easier for those who do not want to stay and listen to my reasons, but who may wish to depart.

Having regard to the very valid suggestion by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), I believe we should consider very seriously the necessity of assuring that this bill receives second reading. Apart from some of the major issues in respect of which we may differ, the parliamentary practice at the present time leads us to the conclusion that third reading is the stage at which we can best deal with a bill of this kind, that is, when we see it in its finished form.

There are those who feel some improvements ought to be made, and there are those who feel, as did the Minister of Justice, that if the people come to the conclusion that capital punishment is a suitable penalty for certain types of offences, they should have the right to attempt to obtain the approval of their colleagues in this House during the free vote, and that hon. members should have the right to move the kind of amendments that are available under our rules in an attempt to reach a consensus.

I say it once that I will vote for the bill as it stands. I like the bill as it stands, and I have been a constant opponent of capital punishment for well over 40 years. I would prefer to see the bill passed in its present from. However, if it were the will of this House, expressed by a majority that there be some exclusions, and I were driven very hard to it, I would sorrowfully and regretfully vote for such an amended bill. I hope it will not come to that. I hope we will have the chance to hear all of the proposals which might lead to amendments, deal with them in this House and in the committee, as we should, with the net result that the bill will come back in its present form for third reading.

● (2040)

On the question of a referendum I would refer hon. members to a very considerable speech made in the 1973 debate by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who dealt very extensively with this issue. He made quite plain in his speech that members of this House had a duty which was not consistent with a system of referenda. I will come to this again.

If we are to abdicate our responsibility I can see a situation in which we would watch carefully the statistics which come out from Statistics Canada. Members of this House would set their sights at objectives which Statistics Canada, or the polls taken by an institute of polling, would suggest indicated the course of conduct which at that particular time the people of Canada would prefer the government to adopt. What kind of consistency of approach in respect of government would we have under those circumstances? My experience, Sir, over a very long period of time as a practitioner of law, as a soldier, and as a member of this House is that people do change their approach to a number of the problems they face.

Twenty-five or 30 years ago, I think a majority of the people in this country were opposed to capital punishment, for reasons with which I will deal briefly. The pendulum has swung since then. Now I think the majority of people for certain reasons favour the return of capital punishment. But there is nothing to suggest that 25 or 30 years from now the pendulum will not swing the other way. From my experience and my knowledge I suspect very strongly that this will be the case. Therefore while it is essential that any member of parliament or any person elected to office should have a very serious responsibility to consult with his constituents, to make shift and to understand their thinking, and to speak to and to listen to them—any elected member who does not recognize that responsibility is a fool and does not deserve to hold elected office—I do not think this should mean that such a man may not exercise his judgment and discretion or be free to yield readily from time to time to the changing ideas, trends, and whims of a number of people in his constituency, or in the country.

I think in our approach to this issue we should be very careful. I made a speech in favour of the abolition of capital punishment well over 40 years ago in a church basement in a small community, where there were members from many denominations. I spoke in favour of abolition in a speech which was accepted. I never wavered in my support for the abolition of capital punishment. I have spoken on numerous occasions both in this country and elsewhere. Although it has not been a major issue in elections, certainly during the course of the 1972 election and the 1974 election I was asked on a number of platforms what was my stand with regard to capital punishment. I was able to reply simply that I stand where I have stood before, that is, that I am opposed to capital punishment. I told them I believe in abolition and if they elected me they would be electing me with that point of view. I was elected with a substantial majority in 1972 and in 1974. I feel, as I think any other member sitting in this House will feel who was asked the question and took the stand I did, that I came into this House with this format and can vote as I indicated my position at the time of the election.

Like on the other occasions on which we have discussed this momentus issue, this has been a marathon debate. I do not say this disparagingly, although I had hoped we could take a quick decision as was the case in the United Kingdom during the course of the last two debates they had. However, this is a matter of great concern. While it affects only a comparatively few people it goes to the wellsprings of our civilization, our society, our culture, and our religious beliefs. It certainly is an issue on which no one should be denied the right to speak. I have listened to some of the speeches made during the debate. I have read others.

I take my mind back to some of the debates in this House in the last 18 or 19 years by some of the great members and leaders. I spoke of the right hon. member for Prince Albert and his speech. I have heard the present and former leaders of our party make very excellent contributions, great speeches, in which they expressed their views on the subject. I have heard the leader of the New Democratic Party and its two preceding leaders on the issue. I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the previous Prime Minister, the late Lester Pearson, speak on this issue.

I think one of the greatest speeches was one made by Arthur Maloney, now the Ontario ombudsman, who sat at that time in what was the rump of our party when we overflowed in those glorious days on to both sides of the House, a position which we are again rapidly approaching at the present time. He rose to his feet on a private members' bill, I think one introduced by the Hon. Frank McGee, and made one of the greatest and most eloquent and articulate speeches on this particular issue. Paul Martin, who was sitting in the House, told me that his opinion it was one of the greatest speeches he had heard on this issue. It convinced people. It is interesting to note that just a few weeks ago right in this House Mr. Maloney, with Bishop Carter, chairman of the Catholic Congress of Bishops, and other eminent people in this country who had come here for a seminar, showed that he had lost none of his eloquence or his conviction that capital punishment must be abolished, and abolished permanently.

I have noted with interest that members on both sides of this House and on both sides of this House and on both sides of this issue have quoted from Scripture. I think it comes out even. I do not think it is necessary for me to quote from the Bible. This has been done by members on both side of the issue.

As I suppose have other members, I have received a number of letters containing quotations from the Bible. I have also received submissions from members of the public which dealt with different methods of execution. Some have recommended easy and painless methods. This, I think, would be quite difficult. In any event if it should be the wish of this parliament to have state executions become part of our social system, then it would be inconsistent with this wish to attempt to soften the effect by searching diligently for nicer, neater or tidier ways of killing that would be more acceptable to the condemned person.

I have pointed out before that I, as well as other members of this House, have appeared on behalf of a number of people, well over a score, who have been charged with murder. At various times during the course of briefing myself I took it upon myself to talk to them, previous to preparation for trial, to know their motivation, to know their purpose, to know what happened and how it happened. I think it is very essential to anyone who accepts the responsibility of defending a man or a woman charged with an offence which is punishable by capital punishment to do that. To that extent I suppose I have had a little better opportunity than quite a few people to make some clinical examination of the question of motivation.

● (2050)

People who spoke to me under those conditions in prison cells had no motive to conceal from me the true facts, and no reason to try to exaggerate their feelings, their viewpoints, and their attitudes, and I say to hon. members in this House that in not one instance of all those more than a score of people I talked to did it develop that the question of what might happen if they were caught, if they were convicted and if they were executed, enter their minds at all. That does not mean that it might not with regard to some people, but my observation of the people I spoke to, the people I had to consult with professionally, and the people whom I was charged with defending in a court of law, led me to the irresistable conclusion that the question of deterrence was not an issue which was in their minds at or immediately prior to the time their offences were committed. That is the clinical study which persuades me that there has been an exaggerated attitude and an exaggerated importance given to the question of deterrence.

The question of deterrence has been raised in a number of ways. For example, I noticed in a news report some months ago that those who were in favour of retention were able to given some prominence to statements made by two convicted murderers who said that, in their opinion, 25 years was a much harsher sentence than death, and that they would prefer to be executed rather than to sit out 20 or 25 years in jail. If that is the case, surely that gives the lie to those who suggest that the death penalty is an adequate deterrent, because if in the minds of those two people, who are intimately concerned about this issue, 25 years is a greater deterrent—and 25 years is the penalty suggested in this legislation—then it speaks to me quite plainly. It says to me quite plainly that, if there is a deterrent, the deterrent is in the harsh prison sentence and not in execution by hanging.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Now I will refer to some of the comments made in the very excellent paper—I do not agree with the paper, but it was well put together—which was the submission of the police chiefs. As I read these submissions I came to the opinion that buried, but still quite apparent, in these various submissions was the attitude that these police people and those who presented briefs for them did not really believe philosophically that, in a general way, capital punishment was a deterrent. What they said about deterrence was very simple. If a man commits murder and if he is captured, tried, and executed, that is a deterrent in the sense that that man cannot commit another offence. That is the point they made from their observations, and I think they veered well away from the issue of deterrence generally. They were submissions which were full of candour, they were brief—mercifully brief—and well put together. As I say, they represented a point of view with which I very heartily disagree, but they expressed honestly and candidly the other side of the argument. I think the only conclusion one can draw from examining what they said and wrote is that capital punishment is not a deterrent generally in a philosophical sense.

Finally, Mr. Woodburn Thompson, who was engaged by the police chiefs, and whose brief was the last one to appear in their submissions, said that in his opinion, as a result of his examination, to use capital punishment as a deterrent was barbaric. That was contained in the submissions put forward by the police associations of Canada.

Now we come to another group of people, those who are generally abolitionists by nature, thought, and attitude, but who feel that it might be better to keep the punishment of hanging with respect to one or two certain specified offences. Personally I find it very difficult to follow such logic. If the fear of death is not considered to be an adequate deterrent to prevent potential murderers from committing one kind of murder, how can it be said that it would constitute a deterrent in respect of another kind of murder?

Are we to assume that human nature can be so compartmentalized that a person planning a murder for revenge, or a cold blooded killing for some monetary consideration, would not be deterred by the fear that he might ultimately be placed on a scaffold and hanged, but that a person considering killing a policeman or a prison guard, or committing treason, will stop, reflect, and tell himself, "I had better not commit this crime because, if I do, I will face the ultimate penalty"?

I just fail to reconcile the kind of logic which suggests that while I like to feel I am an abolitionist, and while I am generally opposed to the state taking life, yet it may well be necessary to leave open the right for the state to hang people for one certain type of offence. How can that be reconciled with the belief such a person must hold that capital punishment is not a deterrent? And that person generally takes the tolerant and proper attitude that it is no more right for the state to take life than it is the right of any person to take life. I fail to follow that kind of argument. For this reason I hope that this bill will receive at least second reading, so that if there is an argument to be made by such people it will be made and presented in the normal course of events in the committee, and come back into this House so we will have the opportunity of considering it sensibly and logically.

Therefore I think this brings us down to the real nature of the argument, that is, the true character of capital punishment. Once inflicted, it has the clear and simple effect of preventing the person who will have been executed from committing another crime. There is no doubt that many people who are in favour of capital punishment are in favour of it for that reason. In my opinion it is a simple form of institutionalized state vengeance.

Let us be honest and face the fact that this sort of thing has always represented a very strong element in our social structure. I do not agree with it, I do not like it, but we have to be realistic and remember that it was only several hundred years ago when inanimate objects which accidentally brought about injury and death to people were dealt with almost as if they were criminals themselves. Those inanimate objects might have been sticks, stones or weapons. If a person met his death or injury because of some accident involving inanimate objects, these objects were put on trial. Later we had trial by ordeal, and the fact that the crime of treason was punishable by the convicted person being hanged, drawn, and quartered.

● (2100)

Five hundred years ago is a long time to us, even to some hon. members who have been in this House for some time, but it is a heartbeat in the life of a society, in the history of mankind, and the characteristics of those earlier days are not easily eliminated. Particularly is this so at the present time when we live in a state of frustration felt in a society which is badly fractured, which is fearful and annoyed by the apparent toleration and encouragement of permissiveness, by government which moves against rather than with the grain of human nature.

I feel very strongly that it is this fear, this anxiety, this frustration, this anger which in many cases constitutes the compelling reason behind what appears to be the bloodthirsty mood of the normally mild, reasonable, and moderate Canadian people. Many of the views and much of the opinion of those who favour capital punishment seem to me to be part of this anger and this frustration, and the noose has become a symbol rather than a remedy.

I think people who stand up and talk about hanging do so not because many of them want to hang people or put their hand on the hand of the hangman as he springs the trap which sends condemned people down to choke to death, but because they feel this frustration. They want the right for their families to walk the streets, they want security and stability in society, and the noose has been picked as the symbol which suggests to them some way of restoring the things they seek.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot do anything but vote for this bill on the basis of such arguments as this. There has been a sort of mythology grow up that those who are in favour of capital punishment are strong, tough, he-men, and those who are opposed to it are weak and unable to deal with the true question of human nature; that they are squeamish and soft. I disagree with that. I fought in a war; I saw death, bloodshed, carnage, savagery—all completely regrettable but which probably resulted in the winning of a war which, hopefully, permitted us to make improvements in our society. It also, of course, permitted us to make some regrettable mistakes.

I consider too that death is part of life, part of that long road of life that leads to the ultimate gate through which we all must pass. I think it is in that sense that we can approach this issue. It is not because we are adverse to the fact that people must be punished; not at all.

It seems to me that the return of capital punishment would be a retrograde step. It would have some effect in brutalizing segments of our society. I do not think there are compensatory factors which would make up for that.

On this issue as well as on others, what lies before us is the gigantic scale of decision. I suggest that if we place the weight of abolition on one side and all the evidence which we can glean from study, from speeches, and listening to other people, and if we can place on the other side the weight of those people who believe in the infliction of capital punishment, the scales would balance. If that be the case then it is not good enough for those who have come to that conclusion to simply say, "The general trend of opinion is moving toward hanging; the world is disturbed; there is more violence and, in spite of my doubt, I will go along with those who want the return of capital punishment." I believe that is wrong.

If the scales are evenly balanced it is essential to pour into the pan of abolition the invisible but heavy weight which says that society does not improve by deliberately killing anybody, and the onus must lie on those who say that one killing deserves another.

With all our sense of tragedy and sorrow for those who have been murdered, I doubt very much if they are standing in the next world demanding that we who are left here to organize our society are bound to dispatch their murderers by dropping them through a scaffold.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for his remarks, many of which I subscribe to.

Even before we began our debate on this bill it was apparent to all of us that this is an issue that arouses a highly emotional response, by the members of this House and by those people whom we represent. Therefore I think it is especially important that we approach this issue with as dispassionate and rational an outlook as possible—without, however, ignoring the dictates of our conscience.

Those in favour of retaining the death penalty, or extending its application, argue that to abolish capital punishment is to show weakness toward the criminal element, to somehow reduce the protection of society, and encourage the commission of crimes. I do not believe there is any justification for this view whatsoever.

First, it should be emphasized that there has been no proposal to remove the penal sanctions for the crime of murder, as some opponents of the bill have implied. The proposal in the bill is to replace capital punishment with a mandatory 25-year prison term, with severe restrictions on parole; this "life sentence" would in fact be the mandatory punishment for a greater number of crimes than are now punishable by death. I do not think this can be properly construed as a softening of attitude toward crime.

I think it can be shown conclusively that the death penalty is not an effective deterrent to murder, and that to view it as a solution to the problem of crime is extremely simplistic.

Mr. Stevens: Let us see the figures.

Mr. Robinson: Of all the offences, murder is most often committed in times of extreme emotional stress—during domestic quarrels, or in moments of panic during the commission of another crime. The deterrent effect of any punishment in such circumstances is negligible. This limitation of the deterrent theory of capital punishment was stated in a 1966 study done by the John Howard Association in Chicago. It said:

> The kind of rationality assumed by the deterrent theory of capital punishment may be present in the minds of legislators at the time of their deliberations about crime and punishment and may even be present in the minds of most persons in their reflective moments. To attribute the qualitative thinking of a deliberative body to the participants in an emotional situation that leds to murder, however, is gross over-simplification of the psychological forces involved in homicides.

There is no more reason to assume the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent to the planned and deliberate murder. These crimes are most often committed by people with psychological abnormalities, who may not, however, fall within the legal definition of insanity. This type of personality is not deterred by the threat of remote punishment, no matter how severe, for some higher risks incurred by their behaviour may even increase the attraction to the crime being considered.

This is also true of the professional criminal, who merely accepts the risk of arrest and the prospect of punishment as part of the job. He is more likely to develop sophisticated techniques to avoid detection, that to be inhibited in his criminal conduct.

Experience in a number of countries bears out the theory of the ineffectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent. In the United States, for example, during the 15 year period from 1951 to 1966, the number of executions actually carried out in a year declined from 105 to one. During that period there was not significant change in the murder rate. When Denmark abolished the death penalty in 1933, the number of murders actually declined in the next few years.

Studies which compare American states retaining capital punishment with abolitionist states reveal that homicide rates follow the same trends in both groups; there is no difference in the number of killings that can be attributed to either the presence or the absence of the death penalty. Similarly, in states where the death penalty was reintroduced after a period of abolition, there was no significant decrease in the number of murders. As Professor Sellin states:

● (2110)

> If any conclusion can be drawn from all the above data, it is that there is no evidence that the abolition of the death penalty generally causes an increase in criminal homicides or that its reintroduction is followed by a decline. The explanation of changes in homicide rates must be sought elsewhere.

The death penalty has been shown, in numerous studies, to be no more effective than long prison terms in deterring crime; and if it is not an effective restraint then its retention cannot be justified.

It is essential that the state use no more force than is absolutely necessary to accomplish its appointed task when acting to protect the community from the commission of future crimes; when taking measures to rehabilitate criminals; or when inflicting punishment on those who have broken the law. This principle is inherent in our system of criminal justice; to depart from this principle and allow the legal system to administer excessively severe punishment is to undermine the values that the system is attempting to uphold. This view is supported by the Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers in a brief submitted to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). In calling for the total abolition of capital punishment the Association notes the failure of the death penalty to deter crime; it is, moreover, a weakening influence on our ethical and moral code since it reinforces the concept of the worthlessness of human life by an officially sanctioned violent act.

I might add that 15 years ago, at the University of Toronto School of Social Work I and Arthur Martin, who then was one of the most eminent counsel in Canada and now has been elevated to the Ontario Court of Appeal, participated in a debate on capital punishment. I spoke as an abolitionist. Two eminent counsel opposed us. I have never changed my mind.

A special commission established in Massachusetts to investigate the question of capital punishment reached the same conclusion, namely:

> The existence of capital punishment tends to cheapen human life. It tends to encourage both children and adults to believe that physical violence, the ultimate form of which is putting an individual to death, is a proper method of solving social and personal conflict . . . The only moral ground on which the state could conceivably possess the right to destroy human life would be if this were indispensable for the protection or preservation of other lives. This places the burden of proof on those who believe that capital punishment exercises a deterrent effect on the potential criminal. Unless they can establish that the death penalty does, in fact, protect other lives, at the expense of one, there is no moral justification for the state to 'take life'.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the death penalty can be shown as protecting lives; I do not believe that its retention can be morally justified. We have a duty to protect society from the criminal; we must punish, and we must use all the methods within our competence to rehabilitate. But we must not seek revenge for an act already committed; revenge neither restores the victim nor expiates the crime.

Opposition to the abolition of capital punishment has been expressed by some of our police forces. While they have a legitimate concern for their own safety, I do not think the death penalty would reduce the hazards of their job. It not only fails to deter, but also creates an added risk. The criminal facing certain execution has nothing to lose by taking advantage of any means possible either to avoid detention or escape from custody. Prison guards and police officers would therefore be in even greater danger during the inevitable lapse of time before the death penalty could be carried out. The task of law enforcement can be made less dangerous only by reducing the level of violence in our society, and imposing capital punishment has precisely the opposite effect.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would refer to the emphasis that has been placed in the course of debate on this bill on the increasing crime rate, particularly the rapid rise in recent years in the number of murders. Certainly we must not ignore the social context in which this bill has been introduced. It is imperative that the government proceed with a co-ordinated and comprehensive program to attempt to reverse this trend of increasing lawlessness. We have had an undertaking by the minister that prison facilities will be made more secure. Revisions of the Criminal Code and the abolition of all unearned remissions of sentence have already been proposed to the House. This type of effort, combined with thorough study and extensive social programs that attack the root causes of crime are, in the long run, the only means of ensuring the safety of our law-abiding citizens. The hanging of a handful of criminals will do nothing to further the attainment of that goal of security.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, more than anything else, this debate has shown how thick is the skin of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) when an abolitionist speaks and how thin it is when a retentionist speaks.

An hon. Member: Here we go again!

Mr. Allmand: Hon. members are making personal arguments. Discuss the issue, not the man.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, in many instances we rely on the information which is made available by a minister responsible for a bill. Although the minister spoke of engaging people who have looked into the matter of retention, to the best of my knowledge none of that literature has been delivered to my desk. I checked again today. Therefore if the minister's skin is somewhat thin, he has himself to blame.

I have a great deal of respect for the opinions of some individuals and am disappointed at not being able to support the position of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), for whom I have the greatest respect. As a man, he is most persuasive.

An hon. Member: And very sensible.

Mr. McCain: That is a matter of measurement. The hon. member may have prejudged, instead of keeping an open mind.

Mr. Peters: He adopted an enlightened position.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, no member takes lightly his responsibility for voting on this bill. Each member will vote only after he has given the matter a great deal of thought and consideration. After all, each one of us must decide, as democratically elected members of this House, how best we can preserve the safety of the individual in society, how best to preserve law and order so that people feel safe. If any hon. member is of the opinion that the interests of law and order are better served with the retention of capital punishment, then, no matter what his conscience may tell him in some respect, he is obligated to opt for capital punishment. That is the situation we face.

I agree that in many instances capital punishment probably will not deter a person from taking the life of a fellow citizen. For instance, I am convinced that it will not normally deter the individual who quarrels at a party or quarrels at home, and is irritated to the point of reacting in such a fashion that he takes the life of an individual. No, there is no way by which a law of man can deter such an act on the part of a fellow man. But I am convinced that we must bring law to the land.

● (2120)

As long as I knew I would probably get a concurrent sentence, as has been given in our courts too often, in the course of a robbery I would probably be quite prepared to take a life if it meant I could escape undetected and free. Any individual may be prepared to rob a bank and brandish a gun, but is he prepared to face capital punishment as a consequence of that act? At that point in time it has to deter the individual from a course of action which might bring him a consecutive sentence rather than a concurrent sentence, or which might give him capital punishment as a reward.

When an individual is incarcerated for an extended period of time, he probably has little if anything to lose if he is going to get a concurrent sentence for a further crime within the institution in which he is confined. However, I doubt very much if he will put his life on the line by taking the life of another individual while in that institution. In that instance he would at least have cause for thought, and it probably would be a deterrent to that individual.

We have come through a cycle in which law and order were preached, taught, respected and understood. The periods of time which have been cited as examples for the reason why we should abolish capital punishment are in an era in the thirties, and come forward to the forties and fifties. Let us briefly go back to that period of time and look at the type of law and order which we had.

The Queen of England and her husband visited Canada in 1939. She rode in an open touring car or convertible, with the top down when the weather would permit. When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister of this country, as well as when Mr. Pearson and Mr. St. Laurent were Prime Minister, they rode in ordinary cars bought on the street which they purchased themselves. They did not have bullet proof glass or armour plate.

An hon. Member: They had it for the Queen.

Mr. McCain: They did not have it for the Queen on either of the two visits I mentioned. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has two automobiles, both of which are armour-plated and both of which have bullet proof glass. That is very symbolic of the level to which law and order have sunk. It is time we began to appraise when a man has lost his right to live in the society of his fellowmen. We have to think of that in terms of the good of all society.

I could not possibly vote for this bill for the same reason that the right hon. member for Prince Albert could not vote for it. In an act of treason, an individual or group of individuals who commit that act are not necessarily acting against the life of an individual. They are acting against a multitude, which is the state, and they are prepared to endanger that multitude regardless of what may be the consequence to the perpetrator of the deed. That is a heinous crime indeed. It should and must remain on the statutes of Canada.

Let us move to other types of crime. What about the individual who was putting bombs in mail boxes, mailing bombs through the mail, placing bombs in public places, endangering, and in some cases succeeding in taking the lives of innocent people? That man, representing his own personal position which is not the position of society as a whole, has sacrificed his right to live in society. Society will only be safe when he is no longer among us. We are responsible to society to make decisions which may be hard to come by in our consciences but which are in the best interests of the total good.

What about the individual who, for personal or philosophical reasons, chooses to try to hijack an airplane and endangers the lives of scores of people? Should that man or woman be given the right to continue life among us? I submit that society is looking for the punishment which may deter the act of such an individual. That is what society is at least hoping for.

What about the contract killer? He is present among us whether we like it or not. Whether the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice dismiss this man in any way, shape or form, he is among us in Canada. He is for hire, for the objective of the individual who hires him at a varying price which is reputed in some cases to be quite low indeed for the removal of an insignificant individual. Yet that man may have made his living for quite some time by removing people from among our numbers. A perpetrator of a deed like that who is willing to do the same deed again has sacrificed his right to live in society.

I am not one who wishes to dangle the noose nor do I associate capital punishment with the noose. I believe we can at least extend a more civilized means of extermination. I am sorry there is no better word to use. However, I do not associate it with the noose nor would I want to see the noose used if we do have capital punishment.

We have reports from those working in the psychiatric field. None of those people are prepared to give at any point in time a qualified yes or no as to whether an individual has been rehabilitated. It does not mean that because an individual has been in jail under the best of instruction, guidance, and treatment for up to 25 years, he will change his way of life. Nor does it mean that his psychology has reached the norm which can be expected and respected by the psychiatric profession.

We are dealing with something to which statistics do not apply. We are dealing with the erratic behaviour of an individual who is not normal or he would never have committed the crime about which we are talking. That is the individual over whom we have no control, or any measurement or capability of predicting his future.

I am concerned about one thing. I would appreciate it if at some point in time the Solicitor General would give us the date and the name of the individual who corrected the position he outlined in this House in respect of this bill. I am not arguing with him, but I would like to have the reference. If the government were to disrespect one last tradition, and it has disrespected many that relate to democracy as we know it, and had tradition been the guideline of government, there are cabinet ministers who would not be holding that position today. They disrespect tradition. But the Solicitor General advises us that the cabinet will have to vote with the government because the bill was introduced by a cabinet minister and is a government bill.

I submit that regardless of the rank or position of anyone in this party, there has been absolutely no pressure to vote any way as far as any Conservative has been concerned since I have been associated with this bill. The same cannot be said of those to your right, Mr. Speaker. It might be traditional that when a government bill is introduced all cabinet members vote for it, but on the basis of the past behaviour of the government this tradition should not be any problem in connection with the bill before us. I hope the vote will be free.

● (2130)

Mr. Blais: What are you speaking for, then?

Mr. McCain: Would the hon. member who is chirping over there speak up? I cannot hear him.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, so that I can chirp louder, the point I was attempting to make was this: if the hon. member is against any suasion being used, I am wondering what he is doing speaking this evening.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order. It is a point of stupidity.

Mr. McCain: I am expressing an opinion of my own, but one which I hope is shared by others.

I have been elected only on two occasions, not for many years as have other members of the House. My position is well known in my constituency. I have answered every letter I received on this subject, whether from my constituency or from elsewhere. I have expressed my opinions as I am expressing them tonight. I have expressed them to church organizations which favour abolition, I have expressed them to individuals who favour retention.

I have said to public meetings in my constituency that I favour the retention of capital punishment, though not clear down the line, as used to be the situation 20, 30 or 50 years ago. I do favour it for those crimes of murder which symbolize to society that citizens are not as safe as they should be, and for crimes which involve the lives of more than one person. Society deserves this protection from the House, and it is our responsibility to provide it.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been hanging around the House for a long time now.

Everyone who has spoken, everyone I have heard, has been sincere in his comments and has given reasons for being prepared to vote one way or the other.

We have heard all kinds of statistics. One thing we learned from that, if nothing else, is that you can always find statistics to prove whatever point you wish to make. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), a friend of mine for whom I have a great deal of respect, quoted statistics which clearly show that the murder rate in countries where abolition is in force is lower than it is in countries where retention is the law. I have some other figures. They come from a book which was prepared for the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) himself, at his request, and they show the opposite. They compare France, a retentionist country, with three other countries. I wanted to put these figures on the record because it seems logical to balance the information given.

In France, the murder rate is 3.28 per hundred thousand compared with the rate in Germany of 4 per hundred thousand. The rate in Austria, an abolitionist country, is a little lower. A similar rate prevails in Norway. But in the case of Germany, an abolitionist country, the murder rate is indeed higher. What this proves is that it is impossible for us, in the context of our own country, to use figures from other countries around the world to determine what effect either abolition or retention might have on the murder rate here.

We have conflicting reports regarding the efficacy of capital punishment in reducing murder rates. In the case of our own country, virtual abolition has resulted in a substantially higher rate. Look at the figures from 1940 to 1959. The murder rate was almost constant at about 1.2 per 100,000. Since 1959 it has risen to 2.4. we also know that the last hanging which took place in this country was in the early sixties and that since then there has been an increase in the murder rate amounting to 150 per cent. I do not believe any statistician will argue that this is not a significant increase.

I want to suggest something new. One of the criticisms made by members on the government side who want this debate to end quickly is that little which is new has been said—that no new proposals are being made. The proposal I wish to make is not new in terms of being an original idea, but it is new in terms of this bill. At least I have not heard it expressed in the debate so far.

If we are research-oriented and believe that through scientific research we can come up with the best answers to problems facing our country, we should be thinking of another five-year period of research. We have gone through eight years of abolition by law and a lot more than that, perhaps 15 years, of de facto abolition by commutation. The result has been a 150 per cent increase in the murder rate. We must now decide whether to abolish capital punishment or to retain it. The best thing to do, I suggest, is to try another five-year period of enforcement of the death penalty. It seems to me that if we do this, and if the murder rate goes down, it can be taken as evidence that capital punishment is indeed a deterrent to murder. But if the murder rate continues to go up we would know there is not necessarily any kind of relationship.

To some this might appear to be a strange suggestion. But I do not think it is possible to determine the effect of capital punishment in our own national context in any other way, for example, by comparing the situation here with the situation in European countries or in Africa or anywhere else in the world. I do not think their figures are necessarily significant in this context since other countries are different in many ways. Their social conditions, laws, attitudes, religion, culture, way of life and their problems are different, so I suggest we cannot really compare ourselves with other countries because it is something like comparing apples and oranges. Even social conditions in Canada change from one year to the next, but if we could find the closest possible similarity in some kind of experimental setting then I would think it would be worth considering. Perhaps an amendment of this kind could be made to the bill, which I suggest would make it a little simpler to deal with.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

● (2140)

One of the most compelling arguments against capital punishment, I think, is the possibility that an innocent person might be hanged. I do not think anyone would argue against that possibility. Nevertheless we must consider the other side of the coin, which is the possibility that a convicted murderer might kill again. According to the figures that I have been able to obtain from the best source available to me—indeed I obtained this information more by rumour—there has been one innocent person who was hanged in this country, and this took place some 30 or 40 years ago. On the other hand, figures from Statistics Canada show that since 1963 there have been seven repeat murders. Seven other innocent victims have been murdered by people who had been found guilty of murder and then paroled or released from prison having served their sentence. Or perhaps the second murder took place while they were still in custody. That is another statistic that should be considered. Weighing the possibility of a repeat murder occurring against that of hanging an innocent person, the chance of a repeat murder occurring is seven times greater. I think that figure speaks in favour of capital punishment for convicted murderers.

Some people have suggested that capital punishment might be used for other than the traditionally accepted reason. I am thinking here of people who are involved in the illicit drug trade, such as heroin suppliers and distributors. We often hear of heroin addicts dying from an overdose of heroin and I wonder how often these overdoses are accidental. It seems to me that if someone involved in the importation or distribution of heroin thinks that a user could report him to the police, there would be no simpler way of disposing of that user than by supplying him with a much stronger dose which the user would inject and thus kill himself. Perhaps the bill should be broadened to include such possibilities as this.

In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, the real issue here is not necessarily whether capital punishment is a deterrent or is not a deterrent. Rather the real issue revolves around our responsibility as the elected representatives of the people. As all hon. members will admit, we have a responsibility in this House to speak on behalf of those who sent us here. This is why we have representative government. Our whole democratic system is based on the principle that we are elected to this place for the prime purpose of speaking out on behalf of those who sent us here.

According to surveys that have been made, about 80 per cent of the people of this country feel that capital punishment should be retained at this time. If members of parliament choose to ignore this supposed will of the people, then we have to ask ourselves whether representative government, or democracy, is indeed functioning at all. If we take it upon ourselves to go against the will of the people, we being the representatives of the people, then we are behaving in no better fashion than as an autocratic dictator imposing our will upon the people, telling them what is good for them rather than reflecting their views in this House.

I am not trying to belittle the importance of the conscience of an individual member; that is a most important consideration as well. On the other hand we must keep in mind our responsibility to those who elected us. A lot of people in Canada feel that revenge is not necessarily all bad, that the principle of an eye for an eye is not necessarily all bad. As a matter of fact a lot of people think it is a good idea. I am not expressing my own personal view, but it is something that must be kept in mind.

Much has been said about rehabilitation of murderers. I am informed by my statistical source that the rate of rehabilitation has been rather good; that less than one per cent of homicidal offenders who were paroled in the U.S. have been returned to prison because they committed another murder. However, a larger percentage is returned for other reasons. Even though we know that some murderers cannot be rehabilitated, the figures point to the fact that most of them do not murder again.

There have also been comments about the cost of keeping men in prison for 25 years. This bill proposes to keep people convicted of murder in prison for 25 years. I am informed that the cost of keeping a person incarcerated is approximately $18,000 a year. Multiplied by 25, that works out at about half a million dollars per prisoner, in terms of 1976 constant dollars. We must ask ourselves whether a taxpayer who has already suffered because someone close to him or someone he may have known—an innocent person—has been murdered, should be asked on top of that to spend another $500,000 to keep the convicted murderer in jail for 25 years. It seems to me that that is a rather expensive proposition.

I was interested in the comment the other day of the whip on the other side. The governing party takes the position when talking in public that there is going to be a free vote on this bill, although we know that there is not really going to be a free vote at all. The other day the government whip stood up in the House and proudly announced that he was a retentionist. Then in the very next breath, the next sentence, he said, "Let's hurry up and get this bill passed". I wonder just how much of a retentionist he can be when he wants to pass a bill to abolish capital punishment. That is the kind of consistency we have seen from him ever since he has been a member of parliament.

● (2150)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I did use the expression "passed quickly" I really meant I would like to see this particular matter dealt with. I will rectify the wording, if I may, and say that I would like to see the vote taken soon, getting the matter over with as soon as possible.

Mr. Paproski: One way or the other.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am glad to hear the whip clarify his position, because he still looks fuzzy in his position over there, and I am afraid that does not help clarify how he really feels about it. I only have a few minutes left until ten o'clock and I am not sure what time I started, but I do want to put on the record some other reasons why capital punishment is perhaps a good idea, and these are some of the reasons accepted by the United Nations.

One reason is that capital punishment represents a political necessity for the protection not merely of society but of the social order itself. Another is that if the state is to be denied the right to take the life of one of its members, then by the same token it should be denied the right to deprive that member in perpetuity of his liberty. In other words, if the state does not have the right to hang somebody, does the state have the right to put him in jail for 25 years? That is a question I have not heard answered in this place.

I think the key argument that should be stressed here is that capital punishment is a just and appropriate one in so far as murder is concerned. Perhaps above all other punishments it marks society's detestation and abhorrence of the taking of life and its revulsion against the crime of crimes. Capital punishment is required in the case of a subsequent murder in prison or in the course of escape by a convicted murderer, because if this existing deterrent were removed, apprehension would exist concerning the safety of the prison staff and the general public from prisoners for whom, because they are already serving life sentences, a further sentence of imprisonment could have no deterrent effect. In other words, if a man were serving a life sentence for murder and he knew he could not be hanged for another murder, why not murder again in an attempt to get away? This is a fairly compelling argument in favour of capital punishment.

There is also the argument that capital punishment is a painless and more humane form of treatment for a murderer than life imprisonment. Life imprisonment, it is argued, is more cruel, but that is a matter of opinion, of course.

The punishment inflicted for a grave crime should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens, and the ultimate justification of any punishment is not that it is a deterrent but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime, and from this point of view there are some murders which demand the most emphatic denunciation of all, namely, the death penalty.

It is reasonable to suppose that the deterrent force of capital punishment operates not only by affecting the conscious thoughts of individuals tempted to commit murder, but also by building up in the community over a long period of time a deep feeling of peculiar abhorrence for the crime of murder.

Where murder is premeditated it is only common sense to assume that not only the chances of detection but also the consequences in the vent of detection are ordinarily taken into consideration. The death penalty may be the only effective deterrent against a life prisoner making a murderous assault on a fellow prisoner or member of the prison staff.

Statistics, which ordinarily fail to demonstrate the deterrent effect of capital punishment, are for the most part assembled by those who wish to abolish the death penalty. In other words, such statistics are not compiled on the way to reaching a conclusion but, rather to support a conclusion already reached morally, philosophically or intuitively. Statistics are susceptible to different interpretations, and are unreliable and misleading. It is almost impossible to draw valid comparisons between different countries owing to differences in the legal definition of crimes, the practice of the prosecuting authorities and the courts, methods of compiling criminal statistics, moral standards, customary behaviour, and political, social, and economical conditions.

Upon the view that the deterrent effect of capital punishment resides primarily in its long-term effect on the attitude of society to murder, it is not to be expected that variations in the number of executions from year to year would be directly reflected in a rise or fall in the murder rate. A negative conclusion to be drawn from statistics does not imply a conclusion that the deterrent effect of the death penalty is not greater than that of any other punishment. It means only that the figures afford no reliable evidence one way or the other. It would be equally difficult to show statistically a direct relationship between the severity of any other punishment and the incidence of the crime to which it relates.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, for those who are in the habit of pointing out the countries where the murder rate has dropped after the death penalty has been abolished, those statistics do not in any way imply that the murder rate would not have dropped even more had it been retained.

There are many ways that we must look at these statistics to be sure we do not get fooled by them because, as I said at the beginning of my comments, anyone can find statistics to prove the conclusion he has already reached. We have seen many examples of that in this debate, rather than looking at the statistics and trying to conclude something from them. Mr. Speaker, may I now call it ten o'clock and conclude my remarks on another occasion?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—MEDICAL EXAMINATION OF IMMIGRANTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE ADEQUACY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am again referring to a question I asked the minister on May 19 as recorded at page 13663 of Hansard. This relates to a comparatively new exotic disease in Canada, and the question was asked with that in mind. I want to use the city of Toronto as an example to lay the groundwork for this matter.

It has been estimated there are about 10,000 in that area living underground, sharing living quarters with people who conceal their presence from officials. This, of course, causes a drain in taxes to the legitimate taxpayer in the area. These people living thus are denied the basic social services and even the protection of the law. They are vulnerable to unscrupulous employers and are paid below the minimum wage. Their fear of being exposed makes them more vulnerable, leaving them open to further exploitation.

These people can become a public health problem as many of them are harbouring parasites common in their country of origin and they have had no adequate treatment. In the field of pediatrics it is becoming more and more apparent that, due to the multiracial society in which we live, and this is very true in a city like Toronto, we are developing a considerable range of tropical and sub-tropical diseases. These diseases are imported not only by immigrants but even by travellers who have visited tropical countries.

● (2200)

Many times doctors who look at them have had no experience in the treatment of tropical medicine. Therefore a doctor often misses the diagnosis, forgetting even the geographic area from which the patients came. The question for the tourist is, where have you been and when?

This incidence in the increase of such diseases is particularly true in the city of Toronto where over half the old downtown area is composed of immigrants, many of whom cannot speak English. Certainly the majority of their children of pre-school age cannot do so. These people often have been let into the country with a health certificate which states that they have been examined in their own country. Such an examination could have been carried out six months before the person left the country and such a person could have become infected in the meantime. The possibilities are there. In any event the measure of capability of these countries to find and pick up infection is not of the same high standard as practised in the western world. In other words, patients can get a certificate stating that they are free of parasites only to find here in Canada that they are infested with parasites.

We need immigrants in Canada; there is no question about that. We are all immigrants. Certainly immigrants have done work Canadians would not do, and they have done it willingly. However, an added strain is placed on the immigrant when he is accused of harbouring tropical diseases such as intestinal parasites.

I should like to congratulate the minister for the proposals he announced today of a new control mechanism for the issuance of social insurance numbers. I think this is a good move. Visitors to Canada who wish to obtain work will have a distinctive number nine as the first digit in their social insurance card. I suggest that the minister should provide that these people be given another number to go with the new social insurance number, with which they would be able to go to a clinic, be examined, and be declared free of intestinal parasites. This would save thousands and thousands of dollars and would spare the immigrant and his family the humiliation of harbouring parasitic disease. This, I feel, is how the problem could be solved.

It would be ideal of course if this work could be done in the country of origin just before the immigrant comes to Canada, especially if it were done in such a way that we could depend on the validity of the certificate which would be rendered stating that the person is free of infection. But as I have stated before, this is almost an impossibility.

All these people should be insured under our medicare plan. This also includes foreign students. Often these people are afraid to go to a doctor and tell him of their illness because of the fear of going to hospital and having their illness exposed. Certainly is is up to the Department of Immigration to see that these people, upon application for a social insurance number, also are required to have an examination and that the information is indicated on the card stating that they have been examined and are free of disease. If there is parasitic disease, this then could be followed up by physicians who are trained in the treatment of these infections.

Because of large scale immigration from tropical and sub-tropical countries, where standards of sanitation are much lower or non-existent, we have been flooded with infestation rarely seen before. Only recently has the Department of Immigration made it mandatory to have stool cultures done on applicants from certain countries. Anyone infested is a potential carrier and contaminator of others such as family, friends, and so on. Worms and parasites are passed on due to poor hygiene. Most parasites are found all over the world, and the precentage of any population harbouring them is determined by public health standards, living conditions, and so on.

Toronto's main parasitology clinic is at the Toronto General Hospital. It is certainly one of the biggest in Canada. But the clinic is able to treat only about 1,500 cases a year. It is inadequately funded, and its waiting lists are far too long. More personnel must be recruited and trained in tropical medicine so that cases can be seen, speedily treated, and handled. That would save a lot of money. Sufficient funding is needed to do this necessary work. Let us not be penny wise and pound foolish as we are at the present time. I suggest to the minister that he can now take a little more glory for himself for putting the number nine on isurance cards. Let him put another number on to be sure that this work I have mentioned is fully carried out.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) raised the matter regarding the medical examination of immigrants the minister gave a brief account of the situation and pointed out that other efforts were being made in this area.

Any immigrant seeking admission to Canada must undergo a medical examination pursuant to the provisions of the Immigration Act, and before he leaves his native country he is judged on the basis of the universal standards as set by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Because of the number of non-immigrants, some 40 million, who enter Canada each year it is impossible, considering the expenses that practice would entail, and inappropriate, considering our desire to facilitate the admission of visitors, to have everyone of them undergo medical examination. So our policy is to have a medical examination for people most likely to present a risk to public health. It is estimated that the degree of risk increases with the duration of the stay and the nature of the activities of that person while he on she remains in Canada. All non-immigrants who plan on staying a year or more must undergo a medical examination and so do people who intend to take up a job in certain fields such as food preparation, the hotel business, hospital care, and so on. In addition, in cooperation with the Department of National Health and Welfare the department for which he is responsible intends to have other groups of non-immigrants undergo a medical examination when they are likely to present a risk to public health.

In addition, an increasing number of Canadians take holidays or a job for a prolonged period in certain countries where certain diseases exist. When they return to Canada they are granted admission as of right and they do not have to take a medical examination. That explains at least in part the emergence of certain diseases in Canada.

I would like to reassure the hon. member that the department of which the minister is in charge, in cooperation with the Department of National Health and Welfare, is doing its best to ensure that the Canadian public is not exposed to parasitic or other diseases.

[English]

INDUSTRY—PROPOSED CLOSING OF RCA LABORATORIES IN MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, On May 28 I asked the following question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson):

Is the minister yet in a position to report to the House as to whether the government has been able to prevent the RCA research laboratories in Montreal from closing at the direction of the RCA head office in the United States? Inasmuch as such a closing would clash directly with the principles of international business conduct which when tabled in the House last July were stated as reflecting government policy, could the minister tell us whether the government will take steps to make a reasonable degree of compliance with these principles mandatory and to fully monitor the extent of such compliance on the part of all foreign-controlled enterprises in Canada, the firms to which the government has said these principles apply?

The minister replied in part:

What action we may be able to take in law or what kind of enforcement measures we may be able to undertake are questions I am considering at the present time. But I am at present carrying on talks with the RCA company in an effort to see whether they can be persuaded to change the policy. The second part of the question was somewhat more complex than I could follow, since it was related to the RCA issue. Perhaps my hon. friend would wish to ask a supplementary.

Since it is evident to hon. members that government members are rarely, if ever, recognized during the question period to ask supplementary questions, I asked that this question be set down for the adjournment debate to give the minister a chance to respond to the second part of my question.

● (2210)

As I pointed out, last July 18, 1975, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce tabled in this House a new set of guiding principles for good corporate behaviour. In the statement he made at that time he said in part:

> Like the earlier set of "Guiding Principles of Good Corporate Behaviour", the new set of principles reflects broad government policy regarding the activities and responsibilities of foreign-controlled business enterprises in Canada. They thus provide an added indication of the sort of benefits the government looks for in assessing investment proposals under the Foreign Investment Review Act. But they are directed toward all foreign controlled enterprises doing business in Canada, whether they are involved with the Foreign Investment Review Act or not.

It seems to me that the recent decision of the head office of RCA in the United States to close its Canadian research laboratories in Montreal clearly clashes with these principles. Let me point to three of them in particular. Principle one says that foreign-controlled firms in Canada should:

> Pursue a high degree of autonomy in the exercise of decision-making and risk-taking functions, including innovative activity and the marketing of any resulting new products.

Principle two says that foreign-controlled firms in Canada should:

> Develop as an integral part of the Canadian operation an autonomous capability for technological innovation, including research, development, engineering, industrial design and preproduction activities; and for production, marketing, purchasing and accounting.

Principle four states that foreign-controlled firms in Canada should:

> Strive for a full international mandate for innovation and market development, when it will enable the Canadian company to improve its efficiency by specialization of productive operations.

At this laboratory a team had been built up of some 62 highly-qualified research scientists and engineers. The press has reported that the closing of this laboratory will mean that only 16 of this group will be found other jobs in RCA plants in Canada. The other 42, according to the press report may—not necessarily will but may—be found jobs not in Canada but in plants or laboratories in the United States operated by the U.S. parent company.

This Canadian research facility is being closed not because the Canadian company is in difficulty, not because the laboratory is not productive. It is being done because of the management difficulties of the world-wide RCA interests and the resulting efforts of the new head office management of RCA to deal with the situation created during the term of its predecessor.

It is time to ask again what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been able to achieve in his discussions with RCA to get that company to change its decision to close the laboratory, on a voluntary basis. If this decision has not been reversed—and for that matter even if it has been—this situation shows the importance of making these guidelines mandatory in the sense I outlined in my question.

The company claims it is adhering to the guidelines but I say what it is doing appears to clash with the definite words of the guidelines. I challenge the president of the company to show how it will meet the guidelines if the laboratory is closed and research work, to whatever extent it is carried on, is continued only in divisions of the company in Canada. The guidelines are government policy, but the government has no way of ensuring that foreign-controlled companies comply with them. The company claims it does not need the laboratory because the climate is not right due to the government's increasing intervention in the economic system.

RCA did not class it as excessive intervention when it accepted $20 million from the government—then it was not excessive or undue interference.

Industrial research and development in Canada are not increasing. They have declined as a percentage of the Gross National Product. The government needs new programs to stimulate this, and part of its efforts must be to deal with the situation created where decisions are made by foreign-controlled firms with the head office following world-wide priorities which clash with Canadian priorities in spite of the viability and economic strength of the Canadian operations in question.

To conclude, the government must act promptly not only to correct the RCA case but also to ensure that it is not the first of similar, unwarranted decisions taken by other foreign controlled firms in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate the hon. member for having raised this situation which is the subject of much discussion and concern on the part of some hon. members, especially those from the Montreal area.

It is true that the company has recently announced in a brief press release its reorganization plan in Canada. The minister discussed this with the chairman and the chief executive of the company and particularly tried to find out how this project would affect the present research activities of the company. We have learned that this decision would be reflected in fact by reductions of the research and development expenses of RCA in Canada and that this must be considered in the following context: First, the major part of the yearly sales of the company come from two main sources, that is the manufacture of television sets, including picture tubes, and the division of electronic systems for the government and private companies, that I shall simply call the space division. This division manufactures microwave material, transponders for satellites and satellite ground stations. The research and development work for the manufacture of television sets has never been pushed very much in Canada. Most of the research of RCA Limited has always been aimed at its space division.

In 1974, the work accomplished until that time in the various commercial divisions was regrouped in a single research laboratory. This laboratory continued to serve commercial divisions, but it also got involved in more and more projects bearing no relation with the industrial activities of RCA. The result of the recent decision to centralize research facilities will be that all research for commercial divisions will be done in each division. Only the research elements having no relation with the industrial activities of the company will be relinquished.

The company has assured the minister that this will not affect at all its present production commitments, which insurance seems to us particularly important for the space division. This division is the only one to produce for the parent company transponders that go into the manufacture of all the commercial satellites that it sells in the United States and elsewhere. The division also holds sales rights throughout the world for all the products that it manufactures and it has in fact sold abroad much of its telecommunication and satellite ground station material. It is therefore inaccurate to say that RCA will stop its research activities. But it is true that it will pursue in the future only those which can meet the needs of its various divisions.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to make a few remarks on some of the government legislation designed to ensure respect for international principles in matters of trade ethics, namely that the problem of obtaining reports based on those guiding principles are now being actively studied in the more general context of trade relations. The government is concerned about reducing as much as possible the burden of reports the Canadian businesses have to fill out. On the other hand, we must see to it that enough pertinent data is placed at the disposal of the government and the private sector to allow for formulation of a reasonable and realist policy. It is very difficult to conciliate those most desirable objectives, but I trust it will be possible to lighten the present burden of reports while, at the same time, obtaining enough information to allow control over the type of conduct mentioned by my hon. colleague.

[English]

PUBLICATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF ACTION TO CONTROL DISTRIBUTION OF MAGAZINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on June 1 as reported at page 14027 of Hansard, I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) the following question:

> ... The minister has frequently expressed concern about foreign domination of the film distribution industry in Canada and has in fact encouraged provincial departments to initiate legislation in this area. I would like to ask the minister whether he has worked with the same intensity to bring magazine distribution under domestic control and in a way which would limit exploitation of sex and the almost unabated flow of pornography into this country.

The Minister replied:

> No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would approach that with the same degree of zest.

I would applaud any effort on the part of the minister to repatriate Canadian dollars which would otherwise flow to another country. If he can also do something of benefit for the film distribution industry in that regard, I would applaud him for that action too. But I am discouraged. Although the minister takes initiatives to help the domestic part of the film distribution industry, which is outside his jurisdiction and, essentially, under provincial jurdisdiction, he does not show the same concern for the distribution of magazines in our country.

It is good to promote independence, Mr. Speaker. But that kind of independence he is promoting is lopsided. On one hand he will eliminate Time magazine because he thinks it is a shame that any of our Canadian dollars should go south of the border to United States. I again underscore the fact that I would like to see those dollars remain in Canada.

● (2220)

He is making a very dismal choice. He is encouraging the decline and the demise of Time magainze. At the same time he is not doing anything to discourage the inflow of magazines such as Penthouse, Playboy, Hustler and other pornography. The minister says he does not have the same kind of zest for stemming the flow of that kind of product into the country.

It seems a little bit inconsistent that we spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on caps for medicine bottles so that children cannot open them and destroy themselves. We spend thousands of dollars advertising on behalf of household safety with regard to medicines, fire, and swimming pools. However, here we have a major pollutant which destroys the perception and expectations of children, and which is much more readily available than patent medicines. In its own way it is just as destructive, yet the minister says he does not have the same zest for steaming that tide.

This self-appointed, self-proclaimed prophet of Canadian culture, the Secretary of State, becomes very concerned when Canadian dollars go south into the bank account of Time Incorporated. However, he does not mind if by way of American distribution companies Canadian dollars flow south into the bank accounts of gangster organizations.

I have before me a page from the Toronto Star, dated Saturday, May 22. The headline reads: "Maclean's Brass Charged Over Skin Magazines". I remember when we were dealing with Bill C-58, the chairman of the board and the president of Maclean's magazine appeared before the committee. Oh, the saccharine piety those two men spewed out about the great Canadian culture that we have. They referred to Birks, Hudson's Bay, and all the other great symbols of Canadian culture—and all the time they were promoting a distribution company in the city of Toronto of which the main profit was derived from the distribution of pornography. What kind of hypocrisy is that?

The minister, the self-proclaimed self-appointed cultural czar of Canada, was really up tight to make sure that Time got out of Canada. He also wanted to get rid of Reader's Digest. However, he says he does not have the same kind of zest for getting rid of pornographic magazines.

You can go to any magazine shop in the country. The display of magazines will be somewhat in this order. On the very top shelf, almost out of reach of even adults, are magazines like Field and Stream, Better Homes and Gardens, and other such magazines. On the bottom shelf, six inches off the floor where all the little kids can get at them, you find Oui, Penthouse, Playboy, Hustler and all those other magazines. However, the minister says he does not have the same kind of zest for stemming the flow of that kind of literature into Canada.

It is discouraging when a minister of the Crown has a great concern about a few tax dollars going south of the border, but no concern about the mental, spiritual, and emotional health of kids when they read this kind of pornography. This minister should re-evaluate and reorder his priorities and perspective to be sure he serves the Canadian people well by preserving the mental and spiritual health of our young people.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise in response to the hon. member on behalf of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Miss Campbell), who is absent on official duty.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member I should like to emphasize that there are now 16 distributors in Canada operating on a national scale. Of these, four are wholly Canadian-owned, 25 per cent. Rather than contemplating the restriction of the activities of the foreign-owned operators, the government is focusing on a more positive approach, namely, the improvement of the promotional and distribution capabilities of Canadian-owned publishers and distributors. The Canada Council administers a $1.5 million program annually to this end.

There is no intention to curtail the entry into Canada of foreign magazines above and beyond certain tariff regulations. For instance, item 99221 restricts the entry into Canada of periodicals, postcards, inserts or coupons printed outside Canada and containing 5 per cent or more advertising aimed at the domestic Canadian market.

On a second point, it should be noted that tariff item 99201/1 already prohibits the entry into Canada of "books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations—of a treasonable or seditious or of an immoral or indecent character." The application of the Criminal Code to the dissemination of such material falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 15, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Monday, June 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to conclude my remarks which I began last evening.

I had indicated that during the past number of years, approximately since 1962 which is about the time capital punishment was abolished in this country in fact if not in law, there has been an increase in the murder rate in Canada of some 150 per cent. I think those who argue that this is not significant do so on the basis that there has been an increase of a similar proportion in other violent crimes. It seems to me, however, that we have a situation in which the general application of law in this country has been of an excessively permissive nature. We have a peculiar situation where the federal government takes the position that it does not want to enforce its own laws.

When the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) piloted the last bill through this House some three years ago, he quite plainly indicated during that debate that he was retaining capital punishment for murderers of policemen and prison guards simply as a conciliatory move toward policemen and prison guards while indicating at the same time that he did not have the slightest intention of applying that law. I think the result of that kind of attitude on the part of a solicitor general is that it sets a bad example. It indicates that he does not have the desire or the backbone to apply the law as it stands, that he is chicken and, finally, I think the most drastic result is that it creates a situation in which there develops a disrespect for the law. People do not believe that the law will be applied and ask why they should pay attention to it, particularly when they consider the position taken by the Solicitor General.

Three or four years ago I had the interesting experience of visiting the Isle of Man and talking to the attorney general there. You may recall, sir, that the Isle of Man is one of the few places in the world that retains corporal punishment as well. Perhaps to come to grips with the argument that even though the number of murders has increased the number of other violent crimes has increased as well, it might be useful to try to correlate that with the abolition of corporal punishment. In conversations, the attorney general of the Isle of Man suggested to me that because they still use corporal punishment for violent crimes such as assaults, rapes and things of that nature, the incidence of those kinds of crime is substantially less on that island than it is any place where corporal punishment was abandoned a long time ago. Perhaps there is reason to give consideration to the whole question or permissiveness and the reapplication of some of those former methods of dealing with various types of crime.

I think it has been shown during the course of this debate that statistics concerning whether capital punishment is a deterrent or not, are not very helpful. Those who speak in favour of abolition provide backup statistics showing that the murder rate in abolitionist countries is no higher and possibly even is less than that in countries where capital punishment is retained. Those who favour the retention of capital punishment have provided statistics showing that the murder rate is lower in countries where capital punishment is retained. The statistics therefore are not very helpful in that people select statistics which are useful to substantiate their position. Unfortunately, statistics for other countries do not apply to Canada. One cannot determine if capital punishment alone affects the murder rate in a country; one must consider a host of other cultural and economic factors as well. Perhaps we can draw important conclusions from an examination of statistics applying to other countries, but only an examination of relevant Canadian statistics will allow us to come to valid conclusions about conditions in Canada. As I said, the present murder rate is 2.4 per cent per 100,000 of population; before 1960 it was 1.2 per cent. One could argue that the partial abolition of the death sentence has brought about a 150 per cent increase in the murder rate.

● (1110)

To determine if capital punishment is a deterrent, I suggest we should reinstate capital punishment for a five-year period, with a view to studying if the murder rate comes down again. If such a study were carried out under scientific conditions in one country, it would, perhaps, give us the most accurate reading of the effects of capital punishment. I also wish to call attention to the cost of incarcerating a man. We are told that it costs about $18,000 per year to keep one person in prison; therefore, keeping someone in prison for 25 years would cost about $.5 million. The question is, should the taxpayer shoulder that kind of burden?

Another point to which I referred last evening has to do with the hanging of an innocent person. According to statistics I have seen, there has been only one such case in this country in recent memory; on the other hand, there have been seven repeat murders, that is to say, murders committed by convicted murderers who have been released for some reason or who were out on parole. Therefore, the ratio of deaths inflicted on innocent people to deaths inflicted by repeat murderers is seven to one. From cold statistics it is clear that fewer innocent people will die if murderers are hanged that if they are not hanged.

I am about to make a suggestion which will make judges and juries shudder. The law requires juries to be certain beyond any reasonable doubt about the guilt of the accused before convicting. I suggest that judges and juries should be given some added responsibility in cases where a mistake is made and an innocent person hangs. Perhaps we should devise methods for making judges and juries accountable for their decisions. Such provision, perhaps, would lessen further the possibility of innocent persons being hanged.

We must consider the question of the responsibility of members of parliament to their constituents. Without question, the primary responsibility of the member is to represent in this House those who elected him. The member of parliament is the spokesman for, perhaps, 100,000 constituents; he speaks on their behalf in this House. I do not wish to belittle those hon. members who say that they will vote on any issues in accordance with their consciences, but I say that while it is the member's responsibility to exercise his judgment, at the same time he must keep in mind the stated desires of his constituents if it is possible to determine those desires clearly. I suggest that with regard to the particular issue we are debating at present, the desires of constituents are clearly known.

As I said, I suggest that we should introduce again for a five-year trial period. Capital punishment for capital murder. Only that way can we determine accurately the effects of capital punishment and see whether, in the context of our social and economic conditions, it is a deterrent in Canada. We might consider allowing the prisoner to choose whether he will be in prison for 25 years or executed. Since we live in a democracy, we might consider such an idea. It might require amending the legislation, to give the prisoner that choice. I say this as many feel that a 25-year prison term is more cruel than capital punishment. I do not think anyone should make the decisions for another person. Only the convicted murderer should be allowed to make that choice. Such provision would require an amendment to the legislation now before the House.

We must also consider whether people feel the law provides enough protection. Some feel that if murderers were hanged for capital murder society would be more effectively protected. Surely, the imposition of capital punishment shows emphatically that society abhors murder. Capital punishment emphasizes society's total rejection, total abhorrence of the cold-blooded, calculated killing of another person, without just cause.

Finally, I conclude by suggesting that this debate, at best, will only provide an interim solution to the problem of how we are to treat murderers. In the final analysis we must consider ways of prevention. Neither imprisonment for 25 years nor hanging will stop murders being committed. We must dedicate ourselves to undertaking intensive research programs to determine why people commit murder. What factors shape personalities; what personality traits lead to the commission of murder? Once we know why certain people tend to commit murder, we may be in a position to bring in ultimate solutions which will prevent the occurrence of murder. In the long run that must be the aim. In my view this bill, at best, will deal with the problem only in the short term.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, for those who believe that human life is a value in itself, that in the most literal sense it is a precondition for all other value systems, it must be obvious that the issue of capital punishment is, from a moral perspective, probably the most important issue on which a politician is asked to make a judgment.

By this I mean that before one can debate the morality of any social or political system, liberalism, socialism or conservatism, one must assume at the outset that all mankind has a preceding moral right to exist, that all men have an equal claim at the outset, once they are born, to continue to exist. It is for this reason that I believe most seriously that those who favour capital punishment have upon themselves the moral onus to prove that this form of killing by the state is justified. It may turn out that their case can be persuasive, but it cannot be denied that it is up to them to establish their case. That is the crucial moral consideration, because what is involved in the debate on capital punishment is the right of the state to kill. It has to be put as bluntly as that. Those who are arguing for capital punishment have to present to us a moral argument for the right to kill a human being.

● (1120)

I believe that based on this fundamental assumption, the deliberate taking of a human life is warranted in only two kinds of situations, both of which rest on a common assumption. The first is self defence by an individual. If a man, woman or child is attacked by another human being, in my view that person has the right, in order to protect his or her life, to kill, if necessary, the attacker. The second circumstance in which I believe it is morally appropriate for killing to take place is when one nation or state declares war or, even without declaration, invades another state with the purpose of imposing upon that second state their rule by force, violence and killing. Under those circumstances also I believe it is right and morally justified, horrible as it is, to kill. That is collectively those members of a state have the right to defend themselves against others.

The two points, as I say, really are identical in principle. One is the right of an individual to protect his or her life from a violent threat upon it. The other is the collective right of a state or collection of individuals to do the same.

I have not been persuaded that there is any other situation which justifies the killing of another human being. In short, I am not persuaded that capital punishment can be supported by reason or moral argument. I have not, of course, been here for the full debate that has taken place in this House, but I have consulted the arguments put forward by both sides of this issue by all members.

I want to make it clear at the outset that I am not questioning the integrity of those who have reached a decision that is different from my own. I am questioning the reasoning, the moral reasoning in particular, which has led to the conclusion reached by those who favour capital punishment.

What are the arguments that have been put forward by the retentionists in favour of capital punishment? I repeat, morally it is up to the retentionists to prove their case for the right of the state to kill another human being. There are three arguments that have been presented and I would like to discuss them.

The first argument comes in two forms. It is that the majority of Canadians want capital punishment. Another variant of the same argument is "the majority of my constituents want capital punishment". Many members have argued that they have an obligation to vote for capital punishment because a Gallup poll survey of the nation indicates that most Canadians or most of their constituents favour capital punishment.

The acceptance of this argument largely depends, in fact entirely depends, on the acceptance of the view that democratic government rests simply on the notion of head counting. In my opinion, this view is erroneous both as a general theory of democracy and as one which holds in particular for representative democracy. The great democrats in the whole history of democratic government from Pericles in ancient Greece to John Stuart Mill, the great democrat of the nineteenth century, have always argued that discussion based on reason and evidence is an essential aspect of democratic decision making. When the community is small enough, it is possible for everyone who is affected by a law to actually make the law. That was possible in the model of the traditional Greek city state or in the early communities established in North America. In little villages, it was possible for all those affected by the laws of those communities to take part in open debate, to listen to the pros and cons, the evidence for or against a particular motion. They could be present for the debate. The argument makes sense in that context.

However, rational discussion in which all the citizens can hear the arguments and consider the evidence is impossible in a large democratic state like Canada. This is why in the last century representative democracy came into being for the first time. In this instance, the instance of representative democracy, it is those who are elected by the people who have the obligation to consider basic principles, listen to each other in debate and consult the evidence that is to be found both within their own country and abroad. Our constituents do not have the time to weigh the evidence and consider the arguments. They are preoccupied on a day-to-day basis with earning their livelihood. That is their serious, immediate and pressing concern. They do not have the opportunity that we in this chamber have to look at the evidence and listen to each other in order to formulate a final opinion. We, therefore, must make the decision. As elected members of parliament, we must take the consequences, not only on capital punishment, but on all other issues.

The point I am making does not merely hold for capital punishment. It holds for all law-making in a democratic society. This is so fundamental to the notion of representative democracy that, frankly, I have been somewhat amazed by a number of members of parliament arguing the contrary case, namely that you can simply go to your constituency and count heads or get a public opinion poll survey from the country as a whole. In my view, the argument that a member of parliament must simply respond in a direct way in opinion surveys or head counts is not merely wrong; it is anti-democratic. It denies that other crucial element in democracy, namely that decisions are to be reached after reasonable discussion, hours of persuasion and the thorough consideration of evidence. All of these must have their day.

Mr. Yewchuk: Do you not think the constituents have the ability to do that?

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member did not listen to my argument. I said that they do not have the time to consider the evidence and weigh all the factors which we have a prime obligation to do. Therefore I conclude that any member of parliament, whether he is for, or against capital punishment, has a crucial democratic responsibility to make the decision himself.

● (1130)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If that is the case, I want to consider the two arguments which have been put forward to justify capital punishment and which could be used to influence members on either side who are prepared to exercise their responsibility to reach a decision. The first argument goes as follows: the punishment must fit the crime, and the supreme crime merits the supreme punishment. From the point of view of criminology I accept the principle involved—the more severe the crime, the more severe the punishment. I think that is proper. I think that is just. The idea embodied in this principle is to be found in the very bill we are considering: there is a distinction made between first degree and second degree murder; there is a distinction made in the length of sentence imposed; there is also a distinction between the severity of sentencing a man or a woman for murder and sentencing a person for a lesser crime. So I accept the principle that the punishment must correspond in some sense to the severity of the crime, and repeat that it is embodied in the bill which is before the House. That is not the issue, however.

The issue for those who argue in favour of capital punishment demands a positive answer to the following question: does murder by an individual require murder by the state? Is that the conclusion one must reach after accepting the general principle that punishment must correspond with the crime in degree of severity? I conclude that those who say that murder requires capital punishment as a form of justice are erroneous in their reasoning and I should like to make the case in the following way.

If a group of men or women are involved in a brawl and some of them are severely injured in that brawl, perhaps permanently maimed, we do not under our judicial system in the middle of the 20th Century say that the state must set about imposing a similar kind of physical violence on those who perpetrated the wrongdoing. If a man breaks another man's leg, deliberately and callously, the state does not say that the guilty person must be taken to jail and have his leg broken in a corresponding fashion. It is essential we recognize this to be the case. Those who are arguing in favour of capital punishment make the same kind of serious mistake in their moral reasoning when they conclude that a murder by an individual calls for a corresponding murder by the state. I am sure they would not argue that if a man breaks another man's leg the state has an obligation to break his leg. To my mind, the same idea is involved in the two instances. So, if it is acknowledged that severe punishment is required, this does not lead to the conclusion that a heinous murder must in justice require an equally violent death imposed by the state or the person who committed the first act.

Now, I turn to what is, at least for me, the only serious argument which could be advanced in favour of capital punishment if it were well-founded on evidence, that is, the argument that execution is a deterrent. If those who have argued for capital punishment could bring before the House, either in terms of the Canadian experience or the experience abroad, substantial evidence that capital punishment, horrible as it is to my mind, is a significant deterrent to murder I would be prepared to give the matter serious consideration.

But what is the evidence? I shall not trot out the statistics; they have already been presented by members of all parties and, in particular, by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I want to pay tribute to the Solicitor General for the outstanding job he has done in presenting the moral issue. The Solicitor General and others have shown that the evidence—and I shall not put it stronger than this—is simply not persuasive. One can look at other countries—I am thinking particularly of the United States—and reach conflicting conclusions. Some of the evidence would lead to the conclusion that capital punishment is, indeed, effective as a deterrent. But this is only so long as one does not look at the position in a neighbouring state in the United States, for instance, or in a country in western Europe, at which point one finds that the removal of capital punishment has not led to more cases of capital crime. In my judgment, the evidence is, on balance, more strongly on the side that capital punishment is not a deterrent, though I am prepared to concede to those who argue in favour of capital punishment that it is not absolutely clear whether it is a deterrent or not.

Now I come back to my first comments. If it is not clear that it is a deterrent, and if we are by no means certain that the brutal killing of a human being can be justified on moral grounds, how else can we reasonably reach the conclusion that capital punishment is permissible? After all, capital punishment is undeniably brutal; we put a noose around a person's neck and let him drop, and hang, and die. The issue has to be seen as seriously and as intensely as that. If the evidence is not overwhelmingly persuasive that we are likely to head off murders, what moral justification do we have as human beings to kill another human being? I say we have no such justification and therefore I conclude that the deterrent argument, in the face of this moral reasoning, is not an acceptable one.

I draw a further conclusion, Mr. Speaker. If we do not accept capital punishment as a form of primitive justice, and if we do not accept it as a deterrent, then how can we accept it? To those who approve the reasoning on those two points and still insist on capital punishment I would say, as did the great French author and playwright, Albert Camus, that the only justification which is left, the only psychological motive which is left, is the latent, emotional hangover of vengeance. We cannot base any law in Canada on the notion of vengeance.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

● (1140)

This bill does recognize the seriousness of murder. Those of us who argue against capital punishment would also argue with the same degree of seriousness and concern against any act of murder. Sometimes those who take a contrary position suggest that those of us who are abolitionists are somehow soft on crime or indifferent to human cruelty. I think just the contrary is the case: those of us who are determined abolitionists I suggest are equally determined in our opposition to violence in society as a whole, quite apart from the issue of capital punishment. We have concern for the victims of crime, very much so. What we want is to change society as much as we possibly can to remove the causes of murder and other forms of violence. I for one do not claim to have all the answers to violent murder. But this is where the real effort must be made in the years ahead.

Recognizing the moral wrongness of murder, we support the view that there has to be severe punishment to make it clear that our society does not condone that kind of behaviour. I suggest that the distinction in this bill between first degree and second degree murder does precisely that. It makes a distinction between the motive for and cause of the different kinds of murder. In my view, the punishment imposed for either degree of murder is sufficient to deter anyone in the land from contemplating in a cold-blooded way an act of murder, if that person is the kind who will be deterred at all. We do not need capital punishment as a further deterrent.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I urge all members of this House in particular to reject what I regard as the terribly irresponsible argument that in a democracy we are required simply to count heads, whether in the nation or in our constituencies. That surely cannot be justification for voting either for or against capital punishment. I ask all members to consider very carefully whether we want to have a system that perpetuates the doctrine of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth and have the state indulge in cold-blooded violence as a reciprocal act against any man or woman who has murdered someone else in society—an argument that I reject.

Alternatively, Mr. Speaker, I ask them to consider dispassionately and with reason the evidence on the question of deterrence. I suggest to those members who are still wavering, particularly on the deterrence argument—because I think that is crucial—to consider this, that if the evidence at best is ambiguous, if at best it is not clear or totally persuasive, then they have a moral obligation in this debate to come down on the side of life, on the side of those who oppose capital punishment.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House it is my intention to take a few moments to express my point of view on this very important matter. I do so not with the expectation that anything I say will change one iota the view of any other member. The length of this debate alone has indicated the importance that members attach to it. After all, there is a very heavy responsibility on all of us to try to come up with what is the most logical and sound decision on this legislation. I feel, too, that I have a responsibility to the people I represent; they should know not only how I vote on a matter such as this, but why I do so.

I say at once that the sincerity of no member can be questioned, regardless how he votes on this bill or what his views may be. This is a subject on which all members of the House have done a great deal of soul searching. We have, in a sense, held in the balance at the present time the lives of certain people, not only those on death row but those of our citizens who may commit murder in the future. As far as those on death row at the moment are concerned, I think there might be justification for making them exempt from the provisions of this bill. That fact might sway some members from voting as they otherwise might do.

I want to say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I am going to vote against this bill. We are, of course, concerned, regardless which side of the argument we are on, with the sanctity of human life. I think that our differences stem not from that but from the way we interpret it. The leader of the New Democratic Party who spoke a few moments ago I think debased the language by equating capital punishment with murder. I think that the two things are entirely different. The end result is the same in that a life is terminated, but under entirely different circumstances.

Murder results when someone, who may be the best citizen possible, who walks uprightly in the eyes of his fellow citizens and in the eyes of God, has his life taken away by another person under conditions over which he has no direct control. No person in this country need ever be hanged, regardless what the law provides; all he need do is not murder anybody. Our law takes every precaution to see that no one in this country is ever unjustly accused or convicted, but after the due process of law is carried out I find it difficult to understand why people cannot bring themselves to approve of capital punishment because they claim to have a reverence for life. Yet large numbers of those same people in many cases have approved abortion on demand. To me that is a much worse act on the part of society. In the one case you are taking the life of an individual who has had his chance and who could have lived his life in a way that society would approve rather than have to condemn. On the other hand, you are taking a life which has never had a chance, a life entirely before the individual. I find this a contradictory kind of thinking.

● (1150)

Much has been said as to whether capital punishment or the lack of it is a deterrent to crime. I think it is not an immediate deterrent either way. A potential murderer does not suddenly change his mind at that very instant and commit a murder. Therefore, even if we can devise a law that is a real deterrent it will have little or no deterrent effect on the hardened criminal or on the person who is so callous toward the right of other people to life that he does not hesitate to take someone's life if that is convenient. Any deterrent effect will not become evident for a generation at least, because the important point in life when our character's are formulated is when we are very young. I believe that as a twig is bent, so is the tree inclined. I get a little tired of people trying to reform hardened criminals. Once they have become hardened and have been through the legal process and are in a penitentiary for years, in some cases, then in most cases it is already far too late.

What society has to do is impress on the people in the days of their youth and their childhood that there are certain things society will not allow and will not tolerate. It is our belief as civilized people that each one of us has the inalienable right to life, and if someone takes it upon himself to take away that right unjustly society will not accept that kind of behaviour. It is abhorrent to society. We must impress upon all our people that there are certain things which are just not tolerable by society, and one of them is cold-blooded, planned and deliberate murder. This is something society will not accept. Therefore, to make society's attitude with regard to that kind of behaviour abundantly clear society should in my judgment decide that anyone who plans in cold blood to take someone else's life should forfeit his own.

In addition there are other categories of behaviour which deserve and warrant capital punishment. Treason under certain circumstances is one. We should not eliminate the possibility of capital punishment for treason. Mass killing, such as putting bombs on aircraft in order to collect the insurance on someone, or for some other equally abhorrent reason, is such callous and outrageous behaviours that anyone who contemplates that kind of conduct should know in advance that if he carries it out he will pay the supreme penalty of capital punishment.

Those are some of the reasons I feel capital punishment should not be completely eliminated. I am not entirely satisfied with the interim law, the life of which is five years and which will not expire for another year and a half, but I think it is better law than the law represented in this bill. Therefore, I will vote against this bill.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that very few if any of us consciously contemplated, when we decided to run for public office, that we would find ourselves playing a decisive role in the resolution of a question as awesome as that of life or death. Yet, here we are, with all our individual limitations, required by the office we hold to make a decision on as profoundly an important issue as has ever divided responsible Canadians.

It is not open to anyone among us to take refuge in the comforting illusion that we are debating nothing more than an abstract theory of criminal justice, and that it will be the Cabinet's sole responsibility to decide the actual fate of individual murderers if this bill is defeated. I want to make it very clear that, if a majority of hon. members vote against abolition, some people are going to be hanged. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by this House on this bill.

[Translation]

I say that, Mr. Speaker, not from any desire to be morbid or melodramatic, nor from any desire to try to absolve the cabinet, in advance, of its share of responsibility for the taking of human life in the future, if this bill is defeated. I say it in order to impress upon the House as strongly as I can that what we will actually be deciding, when we vote on this bill, is not merely how the law of the land will be written, but also whether some human beings will live or die.

At this moment, eleven men are being held in Canadian prisons under sentence of death for the murder of policemen or prison officials. Some have exhausted their rights of appeal. Others have not. Therefore, while it is impossible to pre-judge how cabinet will treat any individual case when the time comes to decide whether to invoke the royal prerogative of mercy and commute a death sentence to life imprisonment, it is inevitable that the defeat of this bill would eventually place the hangman's noose around some person's neck. To make that quite clear: if this bill is defeated, some people will certainly hang. While members are free to vote as they wish, those who vote against the bill, for whatever reason, cannot escape their personal share of responsibility for the hangings which will take place if the bill is defeated.

It is in that context, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to place my remarks on the issue before us. Any discussion of capital punishment must begin with the identification of its intended purpose, which is clearly the security of society, the protection of innocent people against the ultimate criminal violence. It is not that goal which divides us. It is a goal we all share. What divides us is the question of the appropriateness of state execution of murderers as a means of achieving that goal.

● (1200)

It is clear that the protection of innocent people against assaults on their lives and liberty is one of the highest duties of the state. It is equally clear that this duty requires the aggressive and effective prevention, prosecution and punishment of criminal violence. It is essential that people have confidence in the law, essential that they have confidence in the ability of the legal process to protect them against the lawless. Reinforcing that vital sense of confidence and security is the primary aim of Bill C-83, the companion piece to the bill we are now debating.

Longer mandatory sentence and the tightening of parole regulations in relation to convicted murderers will give society the assurance it needs that those who have unlawfully taken the life of another will be removed from our midst for a very long time. Other provisions are designed to restrict the availability of guns, the most common murder weapons, and to strenghten the ability of our police forces to prevent and solve crimes.

There is every reason to believe that such measures will effectively inhibit criminal activity, whereas capital punishment offers no such assurance. That is why the time has come for Parliament to decide whether we should remove capital punishment from the Criminal Code. The crux of the question before us is whether execution is an effective and therefore justifiable weapon for the state to use in order to deter potential murderers.

There are those who sincerely believe that no man or group of men ever have the right to end a human life. They believe that life is a divine gift which only God has the right to take away. I am not one of those who share that belief. Our law, from its earliest beginnings, has always recognized the rights of an individual to kill another when there exist reasonable grounds for believing that killing an aggressor is necessary to the protection of one's own life or that of another. Moral philosophers and theologians have recognized for many centuries the right of a country to defend itself in a just war, even when such defence involves the killing of enemies.

[English]

So the question before us is not whether execution by the state is justifiable per se, in itself. The question is whether state execution is an effective deterrent to murder, and therefore a justifiable act of collective self-defence.

The deterrent effect of capital punishment is at the very core of the issue, and since one's moral view of the justification of capital punishment is entirely determined by one's judgment of its deterrent effect, the proper focus of this debate is factual data and logical induction, not moral philosophy. In that sense, the issue before us must be resolved by a practical rather than a moral judgment.

I repeat my argumentation. Unless you are of a certain sect, or if you are a conscientious objector, in a moral sense the act of killing can be permissible in certain circumstances, like self-defence. Therefore, you have to make the practical judgment if, in a precise case, you are actually engaged in self-defence or vengeance. That, I think, is a practical judgment. Is it a good way for society to defend itself to hang people? I know there are those who say execution is justified because it prevents a murderer from ever again committing the same crime. It certainly does. If you hang a man, he will not go and shoot anyone else. But if you rely on that kind of reasoning, you are killing a man, not because his death may deter others from following in his footsteps but because of what he might possibly do at some future time. To justify such a preventive execution there would have to be some reasonable grounds for believing that a convicted murderer, if released into society—and, as we are seeking in Bill C-83, after a very long period of time—would murder again. In fact, the probability lies strongly in the other direction.

We know of only four people who have been found guilty of murder by a Canadian court, and convicted of murder a second time. In order to be absolutely sure that no murderer would murder again, we would have to take the lives of all persons convicted of either first or second degree murder, even though the probability is that an infinitesimal percentage of them would ever commit murder again if allowed to live. To me, that is an unacceptably high price to pay in human lives for a sense of security insignificantly greater than we have now. I might ask those who would execute a person to prevent a future murder how they could logically avoid advocating the execution of mentally-ill people who are found to have homicidal tendencies? You may say, "Let's execute the murderer for the crime he has committed. Let's take a life for a life. Let's remove a savage animal from the human race." I do not deny that society has the right to punish a criminal and the right to make the punishment fit the crime, but to kill a man for punishment alone is an act of revenge—nothing else. Some would prefer to call it retribution because that word has a nicer sound. But the meaning is the same.

Are we, as a society, so lacking in respect for ourselves, so lacking in hope for human betterment, so socially bankrupt that we are ready to accept state vengeance as our penal philosophy? Mr. Speaker, I think I have some understanding of the feelings here because I have received correspondence from relatives or friends of murdered people. I understand individuals who fight back at the murderer of a loved one and kill him in a frenzy of passionate grief. I understand that they sometimes have been excused by the courts because they were thought to have temporarily lost control of their reason. I repeat that I have received letters and telegrams from relatives or friends of murdered people. I have been deeply moved by them and am deeply sympathetic to the suffering of those who endured such a tragedy and cruel loss of a loved one.

But the state cannot claim the excuse of blind grief or unreasoning passion. Long after the provocative act, long after calm and deliberate consideration, long after time for assessment and time to cool off and assemble its reason, the state cannot claim that justification when it kills a man. It should be understood that my primary concern here is not compassion for the murderer. My concern is for the society which adopts vengeance as an acceptable motive for its collective behaviour. If we make that choice, we will snuff out some of that boundless hope and confidence in ourselves and other people which has marked our maturing as a free people.

● (1210)

We will have chosen violence as a weapon against the violence we profess to abhor. Who is so confident that he knows for sure that such an official endorsement of violence will not harden the society we were elected to improve, will not pervade gradually many different relationships in our society? Who is so confident that he knows for sure that acceptance of state violence will not lead to the greater social acceptance of lesser forms of violence among our people? Vengeance and violence damage and destroy those who adopt them, and lessen respect for the dignity and rights of others among those who condone them.

There is only one other possible justification for capital punishment—the one we started with—the belief that execution of murderers will protect society by acting as a deterrent to the commission of murder by other people. There are some who adopt an experimental approach to the question of deterrence, like a scientist experimenting with different combinations of chemicals in the search for a new healing drug. "Let us try it," they say, "and see if it works. If it does, we will keep it. If it does not, we can always stop using it. Let us not slam the door, "they say," on a possibly effective weapon against murder," on some specious philosophical grounds." There are innocent lives at stake. If capital punishment prevents just one murder," they say, "it will be adequately justified."

That is compelling rhetoric, but it contains a fatal flaw, namely, that we would be experimenting with human lives. Respect for human life is absolutely vital to the rights and freedom we all enjoy. Even the life of the most hardened criminal must be accorded some degree of respect in a free society. If we take that life without proven purpose, without proven necessity, then we weaken dangerously one of the fundamental principles which allow us to live together in peace, harmony and mutual respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That is why free peoples have always insisted that the onus is on the person who would interfere with another's life or liberty to prove that such interference is necessary for the common good. Strictly speaking, therefore, it is not up to me, as an abolitionist, to prove that the execution of murderers will not prevent other murders. It is up to the advocates of capital punishment to prove that it will. If they cannot, their case must fail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Otherwise, this debate turns into a guessing game and the lives of human beings become so many chips on the poker table. That is not good enough. I do not want to hear your guesses about the deterrent value of capital punishment. I do not want to hear about gut feelings. I want proof. Not absolute proof. Not even proof beyond a reasonable doubt. A preponderance of evidence will do. A preponderance of available evidence showing that executions are likely to deter other murders would serve as an adequate justification for the act, an adequate guarantee that a human life was not being taken capriciously.

Show me the evidence that capital punishment anywhere, at any time, has deterred other people from committing murder. My own reading of the speeches made here on this issue since the first week of May, together with the Solicitor General's (Mr. Allmand) daily monitoring of the debate, have indicated that no such evidence has been placed before the House. The evidence does not exist, either in the Canadian experience or in the experience of any other jurisdiction. At best—and I realize that statistics have been put forward on both sides—the statistics are inconclusive. They prove nothing. They prove there is doubt. There is no evidence proving that the use or non-use of capital punishment has had any effect whatsoever on murder rates anywhere in the world.

I must confess I cannot understand why anyone would agree to kill a man without the least shred of assurance that his death would accomplish any worth-while social purpose. If penalties applied by the state against lawbreakers cannot be justified for their rehabilitative, punitive or deterrent value, they cannot be justified at all—not in a civilized society. Capital punishment fails on all three counts. To retain it in the Criminal Code of Canada would be to abandon reason in favour of vengeance; to abandon hope and confidence in favour of a despairing acceptance of our inability to cope with violent crime except with violence.

It is because I have an enduring confidence in mankind, and confidence in society's ability to protect itself without taking human life, that I am eager to support this bill and vote for the abolition of capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words in the debate on Bill C-84 to abolish capital punishment in Canada. There have been many speakers on both sides of this question. There have been speakers who have quoted the scriptures, logic, philosophers, learned judges, statistics, psychiatrists, historians and sociologists to support their particular point of view. I do not intend to use those disciplines in any depth in the comments which I wish to make today. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his remarks made reference to letters which he had received from the families of victims who have been murdered. That is the particular point that I want to talk about today. He said he had a great deal of feeling, compassion and understanding for them. I suppose each of us who takes part in this debate is to some extent ruled and governed by, and our logic is oriented around, the experiences we have had in life. I want to speak from the point of view of the family and close friends of the victims of murder, for they are equally victims with the persons who lost their lives because of a crime of violence.

I know, personally, people who have lost a member of their family to a murderer. In the main, the family and the friends are lost to society, sometimes forever. There is no society, group, agency or government which really cares for those who have lost a member of their family to a murderer. Many of these people never make it back into the mainstream of society. They are lost, empty and sad. There is a sadness about them that many of us cannot comprehend. Some become bitter and withdraw from society because in their view there is no justice. The accused is tried, found guilty and sentenced to death, then has his sentence commuted to life, and in a few short years is back on the streets.

● (1220)

In my riding, like some other large urban ridings, there have been murders. I held in my arms a man who lost his wife and an 18-month old son to a murderer. Not only the family and friends of the murdered victim are lost, but many witnesses who gave testimony at the trial live in fear of their lives as well. They fear for their safety because they know that the accused will possibly be out on a weekend pass or on parole in a few years. The date of parole really becomes a focal point in their lives.

I have a neighbour who lives just around the corner from me who regularly writes to me, and I, in turn, write to the Solicitor General, about a murderer who took his daughter's life. This man also murdered three other women and received ten years imprisonment for each murder, the sentences to run concurrently. What can I answer to this constituent? He knows that the man who murdered the four women is going to be out—I believe 1978 is the last date I was told. How do you answer these people? How do you console them? How can they pick up their lives and start anew? What possible help can we give them? How can we allay their fears when they express their concern about a murderer who is about to be released on parole? "Has he fulfilled his debt to society," they ask? "How do you know he will not do it again?"

It has been suggested that some of the money used to keep prisoners in jail should be used to rehabilitate the family. I think this suggestion is worthy of consideration. Some who have spoken for the abolition of capital punishment have said that if you ever saw a man hang, you would not vote to retain capital punishment. To them I can only say, "If you ever saw a person murdered, you would never vote for abolition; or if you had ever looked into the hopeless faces and hopeless lives of the family of the victim, you would never vote for abolition."

I do not suppose that anything I am going to say here today is going to convince anyone one way or the other, but I should like to say a few words on terrorism. We used to think it could never happen here, that those terrible crimes happened elsewhere, that terrorism could not happen in this country. But in the last few years we have seen that terrorism knows no boundaries, respects no nationality or person. Terrorists kill indiscriminately for money or a cause they believe in. If some innocent victim happens to be passing by, this is his tough luck.

I do not know whether any member of this House has been involved in an incident of terrorism. A few years ago I was travelling on business from Madrid, Spain, to London, England. It was a regular British European Airways' flight. We boarded the plane, and it was held up for a few minutes. At the last moment, several high dignitaries from Spanish Morocco were ushered in and seated in the first-class section. The aircraft taxied out for take-off, and we stopped short of the main runway. Then we were herded off the aircraft and taken some distance away. After a wait of about an hour, the luggage was removed and we were required to look through a heavy steel plate to identify our luggage. There were three pieces of luggage unclaimed, which were removed.

Later, we learned that these three pieces of luggage contained explosives. Someone had called airport officials and warned them that there might possibly be a bomb attack. Along with 75 other innocent people, I might have been the victim of those bombs. Some political or religious group was out to murder the high officials from Spanish Morocco. It was an urgent business trip, and throwing caution to the wind I reboarded the plane and proceeded to London, England. Once we were in the air, those of us who went on wondered whether all the explosives had been removed from the aircraft. Fortunately, they were; but it really was a frightening experience.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this bill. I think I have read more on this subject than any other member since coming to parliament. My mail reflects the concern of the people in my riding. I do not want to deal with the statistics of murder. I agree with the Prime Minister that the statistics are generally inconclusive. I have a healthy suspicion of statistics most times, anyway; they can be twisted and turned to support whatever position you wish. But I think one point is missed by those who like to quote them, and that is that the definition of capital murder has been changed several times in the past few years. It differs from country to country and from state to state. The very basis for the statistics, I believe, is faulty to begin with. I am not convinced that a person who commits a premeditated murder can ever be rehabilitated. I am not convinced that he or she can ever become part of society again, as we know it.

As we know, surveys have been taken in the country, and I think that generally speaking they support the position that we should retain capital punishment in Canada. A referendum was taken in California about five years ago which was signed by seven million people; the outcome was a request to restore capital punishment. I believe most of the people in Canada are saying to us that we should retain capital punishment. In a package of documents that we received from the Solicitor General, which accompanied the bill, he stated in one place that capital punishment was not a deterrent. Yet, Mr. Speaker, when he was interviewed on CTV he stated that he did not feel capital punishment was any greater deterrent than a 25-year sentence. He confused the issue, as he has done so many times. I am not criticizing him for this, Mr. Speaker, but I think he is a bit mixed up. First, he says it is not a deterrent; then he says it is no greater deterrent than a 25-year sentence.

I think it is evident that most Canadians want capital punishment restored because they are recoiling from what they regard as the loose administration of justice which they have had from this government. They have had enough of kidnappers being released after a few years of confinement. They have had enough of police officers being shot down and their murderers escaping the penalty they deserve. They have had enough of giving priority to the criminal, and neglecting the victim. They have had enough of easy parole and leaves, when they find that many parolees become criminals again and leaves of absence become a door of escape. They have had enough of easy bail, when they find freedom given to thugs, hoodlums and addicts who use it to pillage, assault, molest, and murder. They have had enough of all this and are saying to parliament, "Change this and give us some protection under the laws, the kind of protection that Canadian citizens want and used to be confident of receiving."

No one who speaks for the retention of capital punishment has ever suggested that it will prevent all murders. Surely we would not expect that, any more than we would expect that not having capital punishment would prevent all murders. There has never yet been a penalty devised that would restrain everyone. To dismiss the death penalty because it does not eliminate murder should, logically, mean we should abolish prison sentences because they do not eliminate bank robberies. The point is that the threat of capital punishment does deter some people from murder, just as the threat of imprisonment deters some from robbery.

To say that when you have capital punishment you also have some murders is really offering no more evidence than to say that when you have long jail sentences you also have some robberies. We know that. Although the imposition of the prison sentence does not deter some from robbing, pillaging and assaulting, we have reason to believe that the imposition of the supreme sentence, the death penalty, deters some from the act of murder. That is partly why the average man supports the restoration of the death penalty. One can quote all manner of statistics and draw all sorts of graphs to back one's argument, but still find that the common sense, average Canadian thinks the death penalty deters. He knows it deters him and knows it deters others.

● (1230)

I know others want to participate in this debate and I shall not prolong my remarks. I have, as have all my colleagues, received a great deal of correspondence on this subject from constituents. I have heard from high school students, clergymen, learned judges, and lawyers. The correspondence runs 90 to 10 in favour of the retention of capital punishment. I was particularly touched when I received a series of essays on the subject of capital punishment, written as an assignment by a group of students in Dundas, Ontario. I was amazed to see, after the positions pro and con had been plotted on a graph, that 86.3 per cent of those high school students between 15 and 18 years of age favoured the retention of capital punishment.

I have discussed this subject with my constituents at meetings in my office, in my constituency and in my home. Overwhelmingly, they urged me to support the retention of capital punishment. I made it known, since I was first elected, that I was in favour of retaining capital punishment. I have said I will keep an open mind, and if someone can convince me that I should take the contrary position, I will consider such arguments. Since the debate of 1973, the capital punishment file in my office has grown larger than all other files. I have read every bit of information I can lay my hands on dealing with both sides of the question. Having read this material, I am not convinced that we should abolish capital punishment. Therefore, when the vote is called I intend to vote against passage of this bill.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, capital punishment is a difficult subject with which members of parliament must deal because of the high emotions it generates and the wide and deep variations of opinions among constituents. All wisdom does not reside on one side or other of the question. Those in favour of abolition are sincere, honest and entitled to their opinions. Those who feel that the state should not surrender its right to impose the ultimate sanction in cases of capital murder are also honest and entitled to their opinions. Outside these groups there is an army of sociologists, penal and rehabilitation experts, prison guards, psychiatrists, police officers, all of whom have a right to be heard. There are those who have gone outside the law and who have opinions on this question. There are also the victims and their families and relatives: the still, quiet voices of the victimized, too often not heard in the land.

Those who are opposed to capital punishment may be divided into the following categories: those who oppose on religious or moral grounds, it is wrong to take a life; those who oppose largely on the pragmatic ground that capital punishment is not a deterrent—this includes some newspaper editors—and those who oppose on the ground of miscarriage of justice, which includes many criminal lawyers.

The proponents of capital punishment include, first, those who, on religious or moral grounds, believe in adequate retribution—an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. On that ground, no dentist would be safe. Second, those who believe capital punishment is a deterrent. Third, those who on economic grounds feel it is too expensive to build special prisons to constrain a growing army of killers. Fourth, those who feel that capital punishment remains society's ultimate line of defence against lawlessness, that it is a matter of protection of the individual and that it should not be surrendered. In this group are police officers and a growing number of citizens disturbed about increasing crimes of violence and murder.

Capital punishment is reserved for the capital crime of murder. In our society it has now become applicable only to those who kill police officers and prison guards and, in practical terms, not even to them. Quite a few police officers and guards have been killed and their killers have not been subjected to the ultimate sanction.

There are many kinds of murder, and perhaps it is useful to look at some of them. Murder, essentially, is the deliberate and cold-blooded taking of a human life. Some people believe that abortion comes within this definition. Curiously enough, some who shudder at taking the life of a person who has deliberately killed another are in favour of removing life from an urborn child. This indicates the contradictions inherent in questions of morality and ethics. The taking of life is not the issue here, because lives are taken every day in hospitals and rarely are there complaints. Doctors stick knives in people, remove their vital organs and place substitute parts in their bodies. This is accepted because the intent is to preserve life, although it is not always successful.

The intent of murder is to deprive a person of the right to live. A question arising out of this is whether one who deliberately takes the life of another person can continue to assert his own right to live. There has been a great deal of talk about crimes of passion, crimes committed in the heat of a moment's aberration, crimes committed to defend or to punish another person. These are regarded as one-shot crimes. The assumption is that a person who has once lost his or her head will not do so again. It is hard to see why this should be the case. The reverse would seem equally logical, and in fact is borne out too often by experience.

When one has gone through all the crimes of passion, crimes committed in the heat of the moment, crimes under emotional stress, and so on, there remains a solid body of criminal activity, including murder, undertaken coldly and deliberately for personal gain or personal advantage. There are people who murder for profit. An example was George Joseph Smith, in England, who drowned half a dozen women in the bath for their insurance. In this category are poisoners, of whom the records of criminality are eloquent. They are seldom caught with the first victim. Sometimes they are never caught.

● (1240)

There are many cases on record of people killing for mean or petty objectives, insurance benefits and similar questions of personal gain. This applies over the entire field of criminality, not merely murder. Arson, robbery, embezzlement, fraud and kidnapping are crimes in which the objective is the personal advantage of the criminal. Such criminals sometimes resort to violence, including murder. Many of those who claim that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder nevertheless would not want to do away with jail terms for breaking and entering, robbery with violence and similar crimes. They feel that while capital punishment is not a deterrent, a prison term is.

There is a new kind of crime. In recent years we have seen the emergence of a new type of crime—syndicated crime. This has led to a new type of capital crime, syndicated murder or, as it was once described, "murder incorporated." In this category murder is undertaken for a variety of reasons, largely mercenary, or to remove someone in the way of organized crime. Most people take a broad view of this kind of thing and believe that its proper place is on the TV screen or between book covers. Nevertheless, it happens.

[Mr. Paproski.]

With the spread of crime syndicate activities in the field of labour and industry, syndicated murder has made its appearance in those areas. We have also seen the emergence of a particularly evil type of crime once thought to belong to the dark ages, political assassination—not the kind with which we are familiar in this chamber, but with guns and bullets. One need only mention Martin Luther King, the Kennedys, to recall the vileness of this particular type of development. In Canada we had a case in October, 1970.

There has also been a resurgence of the crime of kidnapping, once punishable by death. Some kidnappings, like the Hearst kidnapping, are politically motivated, some motivated by gain, some both. Political motivation is also behind underground guerrilla activities and aircraft hijackings on an international scale. These activities have caused the loss of innocent lives. This kind of international guerrilla violence appears to be beyond control except through the administration of capital punishment. At least, the effect would be to discourage recruiting for movements of international violence.

Whether capital punishment or the threat of capital punishment is a deterrent, or not, I leave to others to resolve. In the context of protecting the rights of individual citizens, this becomes irrelevant. Nor do I intend to embark on statistics to show the rise in crimes of violence of a peculiarly sadistic character, including molestation of the young and helpless. All of these things may be symbols of a sickness in our society. Perhaps Judy LaMarsh can get to the bottom of that phenomenon. What I think can be taken for granted is that there has been, in the past decade, a notable increase in crimes of violence of the kind described above and this may account for the uneasiness of Canadians and their reluctance to surrender the ultimate protection which society affords.

There seems to be an idea abroad that our kind of society, a free society, has no right to defend itself. This is a fatal misapprehension. For many people, the issue is further complicated by a statement from Roman Catholic bishops urging that the state—that is, society—surrender its right to apply the ultimate penalty. The bishops, like others, are within their rights.

This is not, however, a question of faith or morals, and therefore others are equally within their right in disagreeing with the proposal. I know that in the constituency which I represent there is a great deal of uneasiness, in view of the rise in crimes of violence, about any proposal which appears to lessen society's ability to afford protection to its citizens. To many Canadians aware of the various facets of this proposal, the issue resolves itself into a few major considerations: first, the knowledge that there are in society certain classes of criminals who murder coldly and deliberately for personal gain or in line with the objectives of criminal groups or organizations.

In summary, then, many Canadians feel, and will continue to feel, regardless of what this House decides, that they have a right to resort to ultimate action to defend their lives, homes and families. The final consideration arises when an individual is found guilty, after due process of law, of having deliberately and wilfully taken the life of another person or persons. The state has a responsibility to see that society is protected from such a person. The application of a fixed 25-year sentence does not provide the security that citizens feel they must have. Such a sentence will certainly be subjected to immense pressure toward a reduction, and governments which play politics with capital punishment cannot be relied upon not to bow to pressure to reduce the 25-year sentence. Can a 25-year sentence deter, if hanging does not?

The question of the moral responsibility of the state is one which concerns a number of people. There have been suggestions that the state has no right to take life. Let us look at self-defence. Any person has the right to defend his life. Individuals surrender this right to the state, as they surrender the right to make war and collect taxes for public purposes. This does not mean that an indivudal no longer has the right to defend himself. The individual in our society looks to the state to protect him in his daily activities to keep the streets, playgrounds and schoolyards safe. When the state is no longer able to guarantee protection of the individual and his rights, then the individual will resort to other methods.

Most people will feel that inability by the state to guarantee protection of property and person represents a betrayal of the fundamental rights of individuals in a free society. Such rights as protection of property and the person, and defence against aggression, are fundamental in any society, and the state which cannot fulfil these basic duties is inviting a collapse of public confidence.

The assertion of the state's right to exact the ultimate penalty necessary for the protection of the individual in society is not a question of hanging every person found guilty of murder; nor should the issue be placed on that basis. There is no question of that, nor has there been for at least a decade. Is the ultimate sanction necessary? The question is whether society, faced with an increase in crimes of violence and the emergence of new kinds of organized criminal activities, can preserve and guarantee the rights of its members without retaining the ultimate sanction. This does not involve, in any way, the automatic application of capital punishment in all cases. This determination should be taken out of the hands of cabinets and returned to juries, where it belongs.

The effect of placing the question of clemency in the hands of the government has made clemency a political issue of the most blatant kind. Clemency should not be a political football. Clemency should be a matter for juries to recommend on the basis of common sense and a knowledge of the facts. Faced with this issue, cabinets invariably take the road of least resistance, which in political terms means that the law is simply left in abeyance as it has been for several years. This has been a factor undermining the confidence of Canadians in the application of justice. The ultimate sanction should be applied only when there is no recommendation for clemency by a jury. On that basis, very few people in this country will face the penalty of hanging. Society should not be left without the protection which most Canadians feel they are entitled to as a way of safeguarding their lives and the lives of their families.

● (1250)

Finally, the artificial distinction between official protectors of the public peace and the general public should be discarded. A householder beaten to death in his own home—and there have been many such cases—or patrons of a public place overtaken by a gang feud are as much entitled to the full protection of the law as are policemen and prison guards. Again, this is a matter which should revert to the collective wisdom of juries, and where there is no recommendation for clemency, the law should run its course. In this way, justice would be satisfied and at the same time the confidence of Canadians in their system of justice would be restored.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the matter would be discussed from the standpoint of the government's duty to protect society, rather than "hawkish" appeals to jailhouse sentimentality. There is very little emotionally appealing about someone who deliberately sets out to take away the life of an innocent person for reasons of personal gain, malice or self-aggrandisement. In summary, the question is this: Are we justified in depriving the citizen of his right to protection by the state?

There have been cases in recent months of persons committing murder while already having been convicted of a previous murder. We have granted bail to persons charged with murder. We have even released killers on weekend passes. The result is that citizens are uneasy and feel they are not being protected in the way in which they are entitled. Certainly, a bill which deprives the state of its power to act in protecting citizens from the ultimate crime of murder is not a good bill.

Most people will feel that the threat of 25 years imprisonment is not a good guarantee of protection in the case of a criminal who may already have killed once and may be fleeing from the scene of a crime while heavily armed and dangerous. If the threat of hanging is not a deterrent, why should the threat of 25 years in jail be a deterrent? If hanging is not a deterrent, nothing is. If hanging is not a deterrent, then it is silly to talk of putting criminals behind bars for armed robbery, rape and other crimes of violence. The ultimate conclusion is that nothing is a deterrent and you may as well let them all roam free, which is very nearly the situation at the present time.

A person who coldly and deliberately commits murder—and there are some in that category—forfeits his claim to life. A person found guilty of deliberate murder, under due process of law, certainly cannot claim the right to life, a right of which he has already deprived his victim and, in some cases, more than one victim. It is my contention that only a jury is in a position, having heard the evidence, to make a reasoned judgment on the question of capital punishment. Where a jury does not see fit to recommend mercy, then the government should not put itself in the position of going beyond the intentions of the jury. Under the circumstances, the law should be carried out.

Society must be protected against hijackers, urban guerrillas, professional killers and criminal syndicates part of whose stock-in-trade is murder. Recently, the editor of the Guiness Book of Records in Britain was callously, ruthlessly and deliberately executed for having dared to advocate capital punishment for terrorist killings. A society which cannot protect its own citizens against professional assassins is a society on the way out. It is issuing an invitation to anarchy. Far too many killers are murdering for a second or third time, encouraged by the loopholes and laxity of our laws and our system of criminal administration and bail requirements. Perhaps these are reasons surveys show that the majority of Canadians feel that for the sake of the protection they are entitled to have from society, the state should not give up the right to impose the ultimate sanction when it is necessary to do so.

That, Mr. Speaker, ends my contribution to this debate. I believe there are other members who would like to say a few more words.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East-Hants): I could make my speech in about six minutes, Mr. Speaker, if members were willing to ignore the clock, but there may be one or two more who would wish to speak after me.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BUSINESS ACTIVITIES OF CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Prime Minister's recently expressed concerns on the topic of conflict of interest, in view of the fact that the chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal has been actively promoting his private business interests in a large scale manner while holding a senior position in the employ of the government of Canada, and in view of the fact that these activities include lobbying of our military, including the chief of the defence staff, General J. Dextraze, and extolling the apparently dubious—according to our military tests—virtues of a Swedish rifle sight called "Aimpoint", for which he and his associates have been actively seeking exclusive marketing rights, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the activities of the chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal as they relate to his own private affairs, vis-à-vis his official duties, be investigated under the Inquiries Act, also that his activities with respect to contacting our chief of the defence staff, General J. Dextraze, as well as his relationship with financiers such as Mr. Jens Moe of Montreal, form part of the terms of reference for the inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Paproski.]

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF COMPANY AUDITORS BEFORE COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of conflicting reports in the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, June 12, concerning the financial problems of Air Canada in which an Air Canada public relations officer denied that problems existed because, according to him, Air Canada is subject to continuous external audit procedures, and since this is in direct conflict with the Estey report and known cases of financial mismanagement in the Air Canada finance branch, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House instruct representatives of the Ottawa firm of Cooper and Lybrand, chartered accountants for Air Canada, to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications along with the public relations officer for Air Canada to have them explain the financial fiasco in the Air Canada finance branch.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

PROPOSAL THAT GOVERNMENT ADMINISTER ACT WITH VIEW TO CURTAILING FOREIGN INVESTMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that in 1975 the outflow of funds from Canada in interest and dividend payments and service charges to foreign investors and companies reached a record $6 billion and is projected to be even higher this year, and that Canada's current account deficit will be at least $25 billion by the end of 1976, which illustrates that the Foreign Investment Review Act as it is now being administered is ineffective in controlling foreign investment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House instruct the government to administer the Act with a view to curtailing rather than facilitating foreign investment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 which requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REASON GOVERNMENT FAILED TO PRESENT DETAILS OF COST-SHARING PLANS AND TO HAVE CONFERENCE DISCUSSION OPEN

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given that the principle of the federal position on equalization had been presented to the provinces by the federal Minister of Finance in April, and that similar federal principles on cost sharing had been made available on June 8, will the Prime Minister explain why the federal government came to the June 14-15 conference unprepared to attach specific financial details in percentages, dollar terms, base years, possible options to their previous statements of principles?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. lady has been seriously misinformed. The proposal we made to the provinces yesterday was made for the first time to the provincial premiers. It is true that as a matter of courtesy to them, because it was a very complex and technical matter, we did brief their officials a week ago in order that the premiers would, indeed, understand what we were talking about. It was very complex.

An hon. Member: I'm glad you made it easy for them.

Mr. Trudeau: I think we did make it easy for them, and they thanked us for having briefed them in advance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I told them we were always disposed to do that, but there was a difficulty because the opposition is very jealous of its position and it does not like us to do that before telling them. This is the kind of dilemma I found myself in on Friday when the hon. lady asked me to table certain documents and I said they had not been given to the premiers yet, so I would prefer to wait. The upshot is that we were making this proposal for the establishment of a program of financing for the first time yesterday.

Regardless of the figures, the premiers have not been able to say with any firmness yet whether they agree to one or other of the formulae that we proposed. We have indicated that if they would take some position in principle we would, indeed, be able to give their financial officers some figures at the July meeting of Ministers of Finance. That is the situation we are in, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: You just contradicted yourself.

Mr. Trudeau: What is your problem, Mr. Fraser?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I can now understand the dilemma of the provincial premiers in the last couple of days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Does the Prime Minister not consider that secrecy is being carried to the extreme when he convenes a closed session to discuss fiscal arrangements and then refuses to place the federal fiscal position on the table and, knowing that this was going to be his method of operation, why did the Prime Minister not inform the provinces that discussions would take place only on the level of general principles so they might have agreed to hold the conference in open session, thus providing the general public with an opportunity to witness this debate on principles to which the Prime Minister attaches so much importance?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is not that I attach importance to it, it is that we are talking about a co-operative system in respect of which we want to act with the understanding of the provinces. If, as the hon. lady suggests, we had brought in a statement of principles right away and said: Here are the amounts and this is what we are going to do whether you like it or not, I am sure the hon. lady would be full of indignation and ask why I did not ask them what they thought about the new scheme. I can understand why the hon. lady does not understand the scheme as she got the paper for the first time yesterday. The premiers have had this in their hands for a week. The lady should understand it is a basic departure from our previous practice. We are now giving the provinces what they have been asking for for years which is more fiscal room. I understand an hon. member opposite has a supplementary. Perhaps you would be good enough to recognize him, Mr. Speaker.

● (1410)

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS IN VIEW OF IMPORTANCE OF CONFERENCES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could put forward a proposal which the Prime Minister might consider. Given that decisions involving the expenditure of billions of dollars affecting major policy areas in health, regional disparity, urban affairs and education are being made at federal-provincial conferences, the result of which has been to shift power from both federal and provincial parliaments to these conferences, thus altering significantly our federal system, would the Prime Minister—and I ask him this quite seriously—undertake to establish a special committee on federal-provincial relations so that parliamentarians would be more involved in this process and not restricted to mere ratification.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will undertake to do more than that, Mr. Speaker. I will undertake to put legislation before Parliament so that we can know what the opposition thinks about these things.

Mr. Fraser: Before or after you have made your deal?

Mr. Trudeau: One of the shared costs programs has to do with post-secondary education and the expiry date is next April. Another has been given a five-year notice which expires in 1980 I believe. There has been some discussion on an earlier expiry date if the provinces agree among themselves. So the House will have ample opportunity right here in this chamber to say whether or not it agrees with the proposals. Surely, in respect of what is proposed in a scheme which involves the transfer of $5 billion in cash and in tax points to the provinces it is important that we inform the provinces that these present measures are coming to an end and that we have various options for renewal. We have made these options known to the provinces and the provinces at least have had the decency to give us some reaction to these proposals. I have not heard any from the hon. lady now.

Miss MacDonald: You are hearing it now. Just listen.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FUTURE EQUALIZATION FORMULA WILL PROVIDE FOR INEQUALITIES BETWEEN PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Before introducing legislation perhaps he might answer a couple more questions. The government has proposed two changes in health and education funding arrangements with the provinces; one, the per capita grants would seriously affect the poorer provinces which are less capable of providing matching funds. The additional tax room, of course, would be unequal in that it depends on the provincial tax base. Can the Prime Minister give assurance that any future equalization formula will recognize these inequalities and will in fact be sufficient for all provinces to maintain the standards of service provided in, say, the two or three wealthiest provinces.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the paper I presented to the provinces, and which was tabled in this House yesterday, answers some of the points raised by the hon. member. It indicates that our proposition would have the effect of helping in a general way the less fortunate provinces because they would not be shared-cost programs; they would not be tied to a 50 cent dollar offered to each province and therefore the poorer provinces would not be dependent on spending their 50 cents in order to get our 50 cents. What we have proposed at this time is an outright transfer either of tax points or cash or in fact a mixture of both. In this way the less fortunate provinces would receive the transfer without having to spend equivalent amounts themselves. This would be advantageous to them in the sense that in the past they have fallen behind in some of the expenditures because they could not afford to put the 50 cents into the program which drew the 50 cents from the federal government.

Now we are saying, you will have it regardless of what you spend, providing you spend our funds which we will offer you or our tax funds in the areas of health and post-secondary education. This seems an advantageous way of bringing more equity to the poor provinces and, more particularly, of not upsetting their priorities. We are not forcing them to enter into a certain field in order to qualify for federal help. They will get the help whether or not they do anything in the fields of health and education.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

I think the hon. member would support this if he studied the theory.

Miss MacDonald: It is not theories we want, it is dollars.

POSSIBILITY OF WITHDRAWAL FROM EQUALIZATION SCHEMES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is with respect only to the theories because the Prime Minister has not been willing yet to put dollar figures to any of these schemes. Could he indicate why at the same time as these two examples, the tax room and per capita grants were being established, which will undermine the poor provinces, a suggestion was also made that any adjustment or change in the equalization formula will in effect likely be a withdrawal rather than an increase in trying to establish some form of equitable service across the country. Perhaps he could explain it to the House because the provincial premiers have failed to understand it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must repeat my disagreement with the preamble of the question of the hon. member. Obviously he has not listened to my earlier answer. It is not meant to hurt, it is meant to help the less fortunate provinces. I can explain it again if the House wants me to repeat it. I see Mr. Speaker shaking his head.

With regard to the second part of the question, the hon. member is misinformed again. We are not proposing a withdrawal from the equalization schemes. We think that they are very important schemes for the equality of all regions in Canada. They were brought in years ago by a Liberal government, then they were modified by a Tory government and improved again by Liberal governments. We do not intend to withdraw them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: What we have said to the provinces—there is no misunderstanding and I am convinced they did not say what the hon. member says they said—is that we were concerned with the rate of growth of the equalization payments in the past five and ten years. They have grown faster than the federal revenues out of which they have to be paid. We have told the provinces that as with our other programs we are trying to moderate the rate of growth of federal expenditure and that we are trying to do that also with these programs. I hope that when the opposition understand this, we will have their support.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder if the Prime Minister can indicate—because he has referred directly to the growth of equalization payments over the last four or five years—whether he expressed the opinion to the premiers of the several provinces in receipt of equalization funds that they have spent too much on basic public services. In addition, why has the federal government taken such strong opposition to the possibility of different federal tax rates which might off-set some of the other proposals we discussed a moment or two ago?

Mr. Trudeau: I fail to understand the suggestion on federal tax rates. If the hon. member wants to repeat it, I might be able to deal with it.

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT ABANDONING CO-OPERATIVE FEDERALISM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the premiers who broke up and left the meeting at 11 o'clock this morning will, I am sure, see through the sophistry in which the Prime Minister has been indulging this afternoon. Would the Prime Minister agree that the new position taken by the federal government in the discussions that have just ended amounts to a complete abandonment of the approach taken by former Prime Minister Pearson on the question of co-operative federalism, and specifically does not the position taken now by the Prime Minister stop the federal government from showing leadership in a number of social areas of spending that his predecessor exercised and which were so instrumental as one means of establishing conditions of equality from coast to coast in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member suggests sophistry on my part but he gives no proof of that. I suggest that what he is saying is absolute rubbish and if he gives me time, I will prove it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

REQUEST FOR ASSESSMENT OF EFFECT ON PROVINCIAL REVENUES OF FEDERAL PROPOSALS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will have his chance to prove his case. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if his government has done an assessment on the effects on the revenues going to the provinces which would accrue to the provinces five years from now or would have accrued to the provinces five years past if the principle that his government has been putting forward on cost-sharing in the negotiations with the provinces in the last two days had been accepted in the past and would be accepted five years from now, specifically the proposal that the federal government offer a mixture of cash grants and increased tax revenues to the provinces? Have you got the figures and will you present them to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is confusing two questions, the established program item on the agenda and the equalization one. On the first part of his question, which I take it deals with equalization, the Minister of Finance gave some figures this morning which indicate quite clearly that equalization payments over the past five years have been growing at a rate of 20 per cent, whereas federal revenues have been growing at a rate of 16 per cent. We are not saying we are going to cut equalization back to zero. We are saying, and I hope we have the support of the House, that expenditures cannot continue growing faster than revenues without something happening to the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We are not proposing a withdrawal, I repeat, from these expenditures. The Minister of Finance indicated this morning that there were three approaches—a global approach, a representative tax approach and a mixture of both. We asked the provinces for their reactions to these various options and we got some reactions this morning. I expect we will get further reactions. We told them that when they knew which approach they prefer—and I know they will look at figures for themselves, since Quebec already had a presentation which indicated they had made some calculations as to what these approaches mean—we will discuss these various approaches with them. What we are saying is that we will continue to have equalization programs which are of utmost importance for our brand of federalism—which was also Mr. Pearson's brand of federalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Who are you kidding?

Mr. Trudeau: They will not and should not, from the point of view of this side of the House, continue to grow at a rate which is faster than our revenues.

Mr. Paproski: O'Hagan is doing a good job.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, that was sophistry No. 2. As the Prime Minister knows, the minister of finance of Manitoba pointed out that his revenues have been going down simply because they cut taxes. If you want more revenue you raise your taxes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: My question to the Prime Minister, the one I asked him a minute ago, had nothing to do with equalization but had everything to do with cost sharing. I should like to repeat it. Does his government have estimates as to what the financial effects will be for the provinces five years from now in terms of their revenue position, in terms of payments from the federal government, if the federal government proposals are accepted? If he has those estimates would he provide them for members of the House because he did not provide them to the provincial premiers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the provincial premiers can work on our proposals. We also indicated that we thought the cash portion of the federal grants should grow at a rate roughly proportionate to the rate of growth of the gross national product.

Mr. Broadbent: Why? What is the connection?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks why, what is the connection.

Mr. Hogan: You are freezing social services.

Mr. Broadbent: What is the connection?

Mr. Trudeau: I will explain the connection for the hon. member, if he does not get too excited and is prepared to listen for a moment. These are long established programs; that is the nature of them. That is why we are prepared to give grants which are not tied grants, not conditional grants and not 50-50 grants. We are telling the provinces that, these programs having been established, we propose, for starters that they should grow at a rate roughly equal to the rate at which Canada is growing. If that is not an obvious connection—

An hon. Member: It is not.

Mr. Trudeau: We also indicated—

An hon. Member: It is the status quo.

Mr. Trudeau: We also indicated to the provinces that if they have other views, they can tell us that, no, they think health expenditures should continue growing faster than the Canadian economy is growing.

Mr. Fraser: That is not the issue. What are the provinces going to get?

Mr. Trudeau: Maybe they should—

An hon. Member: Another couple of steps and you'll reach the Mace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, maybe they should. We are now in this position: the two official opposition parties want expenditures for health, expenditures for hospitals, expenditures for medicare and, now, expenditures for equalization to grow faster than the country is growing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There is also the proposition before—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

[Translation]

FINANCE

PROPOSED USE OF BANK OF CANADA TO REMEDY FINANCIAL SITUATION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the provinces have naturally said they are dissatisfied with the financial proposals and fiscal arrangements put forward during this conference, and as the Prime Minister and the government may also be tired of constantly being asked to transfer to the provinces the fiscal fields that are rightly theirs, do the Prime Minister and government not consider it important to restore the financial situation in Canada by using the Bank of Canada and in so doing reducing federal expenditures? We are now spending almost $5 billion a year on debt servicing. That would enable the federal government to reduce its expenditures while giving the provinces a better tax base and financial system.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say, first of all, that we have told the provinces that we are responding to the request they have been making for a long time, namely that their tax base be broadened by the transfer of tax points. That is what we are suggesting. So, it is not fair to say that the provinces did not react favourably to that suggestion. They are in the process of figuring out how much those points are worth in taxes, and so on and so forth. But as far as the principle goes, I am absolutely convinced that the province the hon. member has in mind certainly agrees with it.

As for the Bank of Canada and the suggestions of the hon. member, he may be right in making them. But I must say that no province made those suggestions, not even the Social Credit province of British Columbia.

Mr. Rondeau: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. No doubt the Prime Minister is aware that such provinces as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia have made those requests a few years ago, and I think this government is perhaps slow to understand the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada. Is the Prime Minister, in 1976, in view of the financial dead end the provinces and the federal government are stuck in, not prepared to consider at least a little this way of holding the provinces without any prejudice to the federal government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not saying the provinces are not considering it nor working towards it, I do not know. I am simply saying that the provinces did not make this proposal to us, not this morning nor yesterday. And I am saying that even the so-called Social Credit province of British Columbia did not make it. So perhaps the hon. member could talk with his colleagues from out there to make sure whether his ideas are good in their opinion.

* * *

● (1430)

[English]

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister of which I believe the government House leader has given him some notice. Is it the position of the Prime Minister that the chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal, during his tenure of office, ought to devote his full time and attention to his official position and refrain from commercial activities of a private and personal nature either for his own benefit or the benefit of associates? I ask this question with particular reference to Section 21, subsection 7 of the Anti-Dumping Act?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): If I may reply, Mr. Speaker. I received notice that the hon. member intended to ask the question. The chairman of the tribunal is absent from the city today. I was not able to reach him before the House met. I will take note of the Standing Order 43 and also this question. I hope to be able to report to the House further on this tomorrow.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of Finance for his answer. I now ask him this: Is it the position of this government that activities of the chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal which seem to involve extensive and long-term efforts to secure marketing rights for various military and para-military products as well as other commodities, and his related activities in supplying information about bond market and interest rates in Canada for commercial ventures, and in lobbying such diverse organizations as the Canadian armed forces, and foreign military powers like Morocco, Egypt and Turkey, and reporting on tests by various armed forces for a rifle sight manufactured in Sweden for which the chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal sought and obtained exclusive marketing rights for North America, constitute acceptable behaviour?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making quite an attack on a public servant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I can only say this. The hon. member has set out what amounts to a very detailed criticism of the activities of the chairman. This is all the more reason why I should have an opportunity of talking to the chairman in order to respond properly.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE OF ALLEGED COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance as the minister to whom Mr. Gauthier reports. Can the minister indicate if in the drawing up of the anti-dumping tribunal estimates or in any other conversations with Mr. Gauthier or others he was informed of the various dealings Mr. Gauthier has been having in countries around the world; not only Mr. Gauthier, but Mr. Bissonnette, another member of that tribunal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have heard of these particular dealings. I should say that Mr. Gauthier retired as chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal in December last with the intention of taking on a new career. At the request of the government, he remained on contract on an acting basis to the end of this month. He did indicate to me that he would be undertaking another career which would not be in conflict with his present responsibilities, but that he would discharge his responsibilities as chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal until the end of this month.

Mr. Stevens: Is the Minister of Finance willing to conduct an investigation forthwith to determine to what extent the lavish anti-dumping tribunal offices in Place Bell Canada have been used for private business purposes and to what extent foreign trips in the name of the tribunal, paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, have in fact been made, at least in part, for private business reasons?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in my last answer I believe I referred to the anti-inflation tribunal rather than the anti-dumping tribunal. I wish to correct that. I undertook to make inquiries of the department on behalf of the hon. member for Central Nova. I will take into account the further allegations made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

* * *

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR AUDITOR GENERAL TO CONDUCT AUDIT OF COMPANY—DATE OF APPEARANCE OF OFFICIALS BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. For the first four months of this year, Air Canada shows a deficit of $14½ million, $2 million more than the total deficit of $12½ million for last year. Financial analysis for Touche Ross and Company have stated that if Air Canada had realistic accounting applied to it, its loss last year would have been around $100 million. This is in addition to the charges of financial mismanagement laid by the Canadian Airline Employees Association. Will the Prime Minister now reconsider and direct the Auditor General to conduct an immediate audit into the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made allegations before in this House. As has been indicated, the financial management of Air Canada was investigated not very long ago by a commission of inquiry. The report of that inquiry is before parliament. The minister has indicated on a number of occasions that in due course legislation will be coming forward in consequence of that. The minister also mentioned, and this has been the subject of discussion in the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, that Air Canada will in due course in the context of that legislation be called before the standing committee for its usual appearance. With those assurances, the hon. member will have adequate opportunity to put the questions which he has to the proper people, namely, the management of Air Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Will the parliamentary secretary give a firm date as to when the Air Canada officials will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications as charges are being laid daily by the news media and the national—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McKenzie: Can the parliamentary secretary give a firm commitment as to when the officials of Air Canada will be asked to appear before the committee?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, that is a subject to be determined in the proper course by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. In particular, it has already been the subject of discussion in the steering committee. I presume those discussions will go forward and an appropriate date will be arranged.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR MORE HUMANITARIAN INTERPRETATION OF ACT IN CASE OF MR. VALDEZ

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in view of his absence, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

Following the question I asked the minister last week concerning the Valdez family and the telephone call I received from his department, for which I want to thank the minister, and also the month of delay he gave that family, given the excellent reputation it enjoys and the fact that it could not be held responsible for the illegal entry of the husband in Canada, and in view of the humanitarian sentiments of the Valdez family, does the minister not think that time has come to interpret immigration regulations more humanely?

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately there is nothing I can add at this moment. The minister is aware of the question raised by the hon. member, and I think that within a few days he will be able to give him an answer.

* * *

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT PUTTING CEILING ON SHARED-COST PROGRAMS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It is in the same area as the question put by my leader about the substantial change.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You will have to do better.

Mr. Saltsman: I am sure that members opposite will be quite anxious to hear their Prime Minister respond to my question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: My question is with regard to the cost-shared programs and the departure of the government in terms of the open-endedness of those programs. The Prime Minister insists this is not a departure from traditional policy. However, it seems to be a very important departure from traditional policy. The Prime Minister says the negotiations are open and that he has offered options to the provincial governments. It is the sort of option of whether they want to be shot, hanged or garroted. He said there is a ceiling or cap being put on.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Saltsman: Will the Prime Minister level with the House of Commons and indicate whether this is a sharp departure from past government policy and if he intends to put a cap on expenditures of the provincial governments in these cost-shared programs?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is, indeed, a sharp departure in one sense. It is acceding to what the provinces have been requesting for a long time, namely, that they should be allowed more flexibility in the spending of federal funds, that they would not be obliged to match dollar for dollar everything we spend in these areas of health and education. It is acceding to their request that they should have greater flexibility in the spending of these funds. Then again, the proposals would do away with the necessity for complicated accounting procedure to enable the federal government to see what the provinces are spending in their hospital insurance scheme, and so on. It is a concession to the provinces in another sense: they have been asking for more tax room and this proposal gives them more tax room.

What the hon. member is suggesting is that we are seeking not to make it open-ended. I must concede that he is right in his conception. We are saying we must be able to plan in the future, to know what our costs are likely to be; that they should not be automatically tied to any level of spending by provinces no matter how improvident or fanciful it might be; it has to be predictable so that we can budget properly. It is for this reason we are suggesting a rate of escalation roughly corresponding to the increase in the gross national product. I said to his leader that formula is debatable—we could hear representations with regard to that—but we are suggesting it should not be completely open-ended as was the case, perhaps, in the past.

We have brought before the House measures to cap some of these programs as the bill in the name of the Minister of Finance, presently before parliament, is doing. It is a question of whether we should set growth arbitrarily at a rate of 15 per cent, for instance, or whether we should say the growth ought to be held at a rate equivalent to the growth of the gross national product. A choice can be made. The hon. member who asked this question is a very responsible member and critic on financial matters and he will certainly understand that it is reasonable for the federal government and, indeed, for the provincial governments, to be able to plan future expenditures with some certainty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I appreciate the right hon. gentleman's estimation of myself as reasonable and I will therefore ask him a reasonable question. I agree with him that governments have to be able to plan and that they should know what their expenditures are likely to be. But that is not the point of the argument. What we are asking is this: why should something as important as health services or education be geared to the percentage growth of the gross national product any more than he would restrict, say, the growth of ESSO to the expansion in the GNP? I ask him whether he is prepared to find a formula which, while it might cap expenditures, would allow the growth of these important public services to be in excess of the increase in the GNP or of historic standards.

Mr. Trudeau: I am certainly prepared to consider that proposition if it is put forward by the provinces. To my recollection, and I see the Minister of Finance is agreeing with me—at least, I think he is—the provinces have not made such a proposal. They, too, want to plan their future growth. Hon. members ask: why tie it to the gross national product? The premiers asked, as did hon. members opposite: why tie it to the gross national product? We said: why not? It is a reasonable basis and I explained the basis of that answer to the leader of the New Democratic Party. These are established programs. Health delivery services in Canada are among the best in the world—certainly they are among the most generous, and the arrangements for post-secondary education are very generously financed. It may perhaps be reasonable to say that they should not continue to grow at a rate of 15 per cent or 18 per cent when the economy is growing at a rate of 5 per cent or 10 per cent. That is the proposal we have put forward and which the provinces will consider.

Let me say, also, that this applies to the cash part of the grants. As far as the tax transfer is concerned it is, of course, not tied to anything but the rate of growth of the economy of the province which has the tax point.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Trudeau: We estimate that the rate of growth will be slightly in excess of that.

* * *

ENERGY

BASIS OF MINISTER'S VIEWS ON PROVISION OF ELECTRICITY FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES—POSSIBILITY OF STUDY OF PROBLEM

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): If the Prime Minister were sincere about wishing to hear the views of the opposition he might have made a statement on motions instead of these rambling discourses.

I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising from the position he has taken with respect to power rates in Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces.

Mr. Muir: He said "To hell with Nova Scotia"; that is what he said.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister tell me whether his views about the way in which power should be integrated in the maritime provinces and savings thus produced are based upon a detailed analysis which he is prepared to make public or whether they are based upon certain general approaches which he is advised are correct?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): They are based on information which all informed people understand—that is, if we are to be able to secure for the people in the maritime region sufficient electrical power for their future needs at a reasonable cost, let us say the lowest cost, we shall have to plan the electric power generation of the whole region. The time has come to forget planning on a provincial boundary basis. The time has come for a wider approach. My proposal to the premiers was that we should undertake a study which the federal government is prepared to fund completely. I went on to invite the maritime premiers to participate with us. I might say I have already received an acceptance in principle from one of the premiers on that aspect.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it that to date the minister's views are based upon general considerations and approaches he believes to be valid rather than on detailed studies. In view of the confusion which has been created by his statement of his position and the counter-charges which have come, for example, from Nova Scotia, I want to ask him whether the Government of Canada is prepared to have such a study made objectively in such a way that informed people can examine the data and reach an opinion, both here and in the maritimes, as to the best way in which to solve this horrendous difficulty facing the people of Nova Scotia in terms of power. Is the minister prepared to have such a study conducted in an open way?

● (1450)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have a very open mind on this question. I want to make it quite clear that I think the way to approach this is not to make a unilateral declaration that it will be done this way and that way and these are the parameters. It is very important that the federal government and the premiers of the maritime provinces agree on the best method of going about this very important task. I shall seek their advice as to how they feel the most informed kind of report can be put together.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry but this is a very important matter, and I am pursuing the issue because I should like to get to the bottom of it. I am asking the minister a very simple question. Quite apart from the views of the government of Nova Scotia or the government of any maritime province, is the minister prepared to have the study made openly and in public so that the public can be informed? If the minister wants a political attack he will get it, but I am trying to get to the bottom of this. As far as he is concerned, even though it may turn out that the provinces object to this kind of approach, is he prepared to have an open and public examination of this problem?

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would welcome a full, comprehensive, open and informed discussion. This may involve taking evidence in public, but quite clearly at some point the experts will have to put their heads together and a report will be written. When that report is written, I would expect it to be made public to the people of Atlantic Canada as well as to the members of this House.

* * *

[Translation]

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBILITY OF PATRIATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Given the co-operative attitude of the federal government towards the provincial governments, has the Prime Minister been able to detect among his colleagues a more obvious willingness to patriate the Constitution, a move which would meet the wishes of the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Chambly for this important question. Indeed this problem has been discussed at some length by all the first ministers, and I think the most we can say at this stage is that the provinces asked me once again to wait for their August conference in Edmonton, where they will try to come to a consensus, to a better understanding of this problem. They are committed to report to me after this conference. Meanwhile, it would be premature for the federal government or Parliament to act without waiting to know what their attitude will be.

* * *

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

OBJECTION OF PILOTS AND TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS TO USE OF FRENCH—REQUEST FOR COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE SAFETY ASPECT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as both the air traffic controllers and the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association are concerned about the introduction of French into their working environment to the extent that both groups are prepared to strike, would the Prime Minister appoint a royal commission to look into the matter in an endeavour to assess the potential danger to the safety of passengers, air crews and aircraft?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the air traffic controllers and the airline pilots are right to be concerned about this matter, as the opposition and the government are also concerned. The Minister of Transport and his parliamentary secretary have said repeatedly that safety is the first and most important factor in this area. What we are asking all concerned—the workers, members of the opposition and indeed members on the government side—is to have an open mind on and objective approach to, this question. The hon. member knows that the former minister of transport and the present one have tried to study the results of applying bilingualism, first in visual flights and then more latterly in simulated and instrument flights. We have no preconceptions, Mr. Speaker. We are deeply committed to bilingualism, but of course bilingualism would have to be shown to be compatible with the safety of passengers. All we are asking from the air traffic controllers and the pilots and everybody concerned is to have an open mind on this and not to decide the question by strike or otherwise before it is properly resolved.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as the French airline pilots association has petitioned the government of France to declare that English be the only language of use at Charles de Gaulle, Orly and Le Bourget airports for controlling aircraft, and inasmuch as the French airline pilots have told our Air Canada and CP Air captains that, in their view, it would be the height of folly to use two languages in Canada for controlling aircraft, would the Prime Minister consider these facts and opinions and agree that international safety as well as domestic safety of air passengers, air crews and aircraft must be the first consideration and appoint a royal commission to bring out all the various factors?

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Kempling: It is true.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, without at all accepting the argument that has just been put before the House, the hon. member knows very well that the Minister of Transport has already indicated his intention to appoint a commission of inquiry to investigate this very area. Work is going forward on that particular commission. The minister is seeking a suitable replacement for the gentleman who resigned earlier from the commission and work will go forward on this important matter as quickly as it can.

INQUIRY AS TO NAMES OF POTENTIAL COMMISSIONERS SUBMITTED BY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary following along the question he has just answered. Has CATCA submitted any potential names to the Minister of Transport in response to the minister's request? If so, when was that done and what has been the minister's response to any submissions that were made in terms of potential commissioners?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a submission was in fact received. I am afraid I cannot give the precise details that the hon. gentleman requests, but I can assure him that the minister and his officials are conducting a very broad search to try to find the very best possible people who can be found to do this very important job of inquiry.

CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF MEMBERS IN EVENT OF STRIKE BY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council. I think all of us have to admit that this is a volatile situation. I wonder whether the government has in place any contingency plans to ensure that members of parliament from all across the country get here in their places in the event of a strike in order to vote on Bill C-84? Have such contingency plans been made and could we have some advice from the President of the Privy Council in regard to this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it is one situation if there is a legal strike but it is a different situation if it is an illegal strike, and I certainly would not want to do anything that would encourage anyone in this country to go on strike illegally.

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF HANSEN REPORT ON BEATINGS—POSSIBILITY OF CRIMINAL CHARGES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. In answer to a question of mine on May 31 the Solicitor General told the House that he was receiving the following day the Hansen report on the Millhaven gassings and beatings. In view of the fact that a considerable period of time has now elapsed, is the Solicitor General now able to say whether he has received the report, and will he undertake to table it in the House in its full and unabridged form?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did meet with Miss Hansen the day following the question put by the hon. member and I discussed the report with her. While she had completed the writing of the report it was not yet ready for publication. She said it had to be proof read and other technical things had to be completed, but she promised to have it in my hands for tabling and publication before parliament adjourns; that is, before July 1.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Solicitor General would inform the House whether or not, on the basis of the report and investigation, it is contemplated that any criminal charges will be laid respecting the incident that took place in Millhaven in November of last year.

● (1500)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be more appropriate for me to make the report public before I made any statement such as requested by the hon. member. On the other hand, I should point out that any criminal charges would be laid by the government of Ontario through the Attorney General, not through the federal government.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF BOTSWANA

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members would wish to join me in calling attention to the presence in the gallery of a most distinguished visitor in the person of His Excellency Seretse Khama, President of the Republic of Botswana.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DRESS PERMISSIBLE IN CHAMBER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. member for Palliser, supported by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, raised a point of order concerning dress in the chamber. Investigation reveals that while there may not be technical rules that are easily interpreted in precise terms, the standard which has been adhered to is that which has been enforced in the discretion of the Chair. Reference was made to the presence in the chamber yesterday of an hon. member who was not wearing a necktie in the ordinary sense of the word as we know it.

Representations have been received from other members, by correspondence, and it would seem appropriate—and I will take the first opportunity that ought to present itself the day after tommorrow—to discuss this matter with the House leaders in order to determine whether some expression of definition on this matter might be forthcoming from members, perhaps from the Committee on Procedure and Organization or the Committee on Management and Members' Services. In the meantime, I would propose that until such expression comes forward from either of the committees, or as otherwise suggested by the House leaders on Thursday, I will continue to rigidly enforce, and expect co-operation from all hon. members, the rules in respect of dress and decorum which have prevailed in this House since, so far as I am aware, its inception, one of which is that male hon. members of this House shall wear a shirt, a tie and a jacket, as has ordinarily been accepted up to this time.

I would indicate that if there is a feeling to the contrary, I would expect all hon. members in the interim to abide by and respect this rule, at least úntil such time as suggestions are made to the contrary and those suggestions are taken up by the House as a whole.

* * *

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD

TABLING OF REPORT ON LEATHER OUTERWEAR

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table, in both official languages, a report on an inquiry respecting leather outerwear from the Textile and Clothing Board. I hope that this outerwear is satisfactory for wearing in the House!

Order Paper Questions

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Senate have passed certain bills.

* * *

[Translation]

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication has been received:

Government House
Ottawa

June 15, 1976

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th day of June at 9.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière,
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 3,520, 3,640, 4,427, 4,619, 5,120, 5,129, 5,141, 5,175, 5,234, 5,247, 5,424, 5,443, 5,465 and 5,535.

[Text]

CTV NETWORK

Question No. 3,520—Mr. Cossitt:

Did any person from the Prime Minister's Office communicate with the CTV Network on or about November 4, 1975 advising that a decision had been made not to allow any television cameras to take photographs of furnishings and equipment in the offices of members of the Cabinet and, if so (a) what is his name (b) who gave instructions for him to make such communication (c) for what reason was such decision made (d) had some members of the Cabinet already agreed to permit such photography to be taken on or about November 5, 1975 and who communicated with the Cabinet Ministers advising them that such permission would be out of order?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No. The only call to the CTV network which came from the PMO originated with the Press Office and was to deny the network's request to film the furnishings of the office of the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

PRIME MINISTER'S TRIPS

Question No. 3,640—Mr. Cossitt:

What has been the entire cost to the taxpayer of all trips made outside Ottawa by the Prime Minister or any members of his family between the dates set out in Part 1 of Question No. 69?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): A number of questions have been asked concerning specific trips during that period to which replies have been given. See the following questions answered during the First Session of the 30th Parliament: 25, 32, 1,158, 1,225, 1,226, 1,521, 2,333, 2,679, 2,708, 3,085, 3,120, 3,267, 3,900, 4,110, 5,121, 5,122, 5,123, 5,124, 5,125, 5,126, 5,127, 5,139, 5,140, 5,144 and 5,339. See also House of Commons Debates for February 3, 1976 in which it is stated in reply to question 69 that Members of the Prime Minister's family do not travel at public expense unless accompanying the Prime Minister by MOT or DND aircraft or by car.

ROCKWOOD INSTITUTION—LIVING UNIT OFFICERS

Question No. 4,427—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. For the years 1970 to 1975, what was the number of living unit-officers at Rockwood Institution?

2. Was their education (a) less than grade 10 (b) grade 10 to grade 12 (c) some college (d) beyond a first university degree?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Nil.

INCOME TAX COLLECTED FROM UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AND OLD AGE PENSION INCOME, 1973

Question No. 4,619—Mr. Caccia:

Does the 1975 edition of Revenue Canada's Taxation Statistics report that in the 1973 taxation year, 1,880,911 income tax returns listed income from unemployment insurance benefits and 1,068,902 returns listed old age pension income and, if so, what was the amount of income tax collected by the government (a) on its own behalf (b) on behalf of the provinces from (i) unemployment insurance benefits (ii) old age pension income for the 1973 taxation year?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The numbers stated in the question for tax filers reporting Unemployment Insurance benefits and Old Age Security benefits are correct. Since under the Canadian income tax system the tax is levied on the sum total of income from all sources and not on individual components, it is not possible to provide accurate estimates of tax collected in respect of a given individual item.

PRIME MINISTER'S TRIPS

Question No. 5,120—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many trips outside Ottawa have been made subsequent to those listed in the answer to Question No. 69, namely, since September 22, 1974, by the Prime Minister or any members of his family, in whole or in part, at public expense?

2. In each case (a) by whom was the trip made (b) what places were visited (c) what was the purpose of the trip (d) what was the specific means of transportation (e) what was the total cost to the taxpayer (f) in all cases where applicable, was the trip made for private, holiday or political purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1 and 2. The information requested does not warrant a question on the Order Paper since, as stated in paragraph 4 of the reply to question 69 in the House of Commons Debates for February 3, 1976, information about trips of the Prime Minister is communicated to the media as a matter of course. The information sought is therefore already available from public sources accessible to the Honourable Member. See also paragraph 1 of reply to question 69 in which it is stated that members of the Prime Minister's family do not travel at public expense unless accompanying the Prime Minister by MOT or DND aircraft or by car. See also in the House of Commons Debates replies to questions about individual trips made since that date.

Question No. 5,129—Mr. Cossitt:

Since June 1, 1975, has the Prime Minister on any occasion used commercial aircraft for trips made to points outside Ottawa and, if so, in each case (a) on what dates (b) to what destinations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The information requested does not warrant a question on the Order Paper since, as stated in paragraph 4 of the reply to question 69 in the House of Commons Debates for February 3, 1976, information about trips of the Prime Minister is communicated to the media as a matter of course. The information sought is therefore already available from public sources accessible to the Honourable Member.

MONITORING OF WATTS LINE CALLS

Question No. 5,141—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has the Department of Communications given instructions to Bell Canada government telephone operators to listen in, check or otherwise monitor in any way, government Watts line calls at certain intervals to determine if there is conversation on the line and, if so (a) at intervals of how many seconds does such a procedure take place (b) what are the reasons justifying such instructions (c) are calls of Members of Parliament included in those checked?

2. Have steps been taken to prevent the content of phone conversations being noted and (a) if so, what are such steps (b) if not (i) for what reason (ii) on what date will such steps be taken?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): 1. Yes. (a) The checks which do not exceed two seconds are carried out to ensure that lines are disconnected by the attendant on completion of a call. These checks are conducted on approximately 50 per cent of the operator handled calls, at the Ottawa switchboard complex, and the interval between checks depends on the volume of traffic being handled by the operator; (b) This practice is necessary because an automatic indication whether these lines are in use is not available with the switchboard equipment currently in use. Means to alleviate this situation have been incorporated in current plans to modify and improve the intercity voice network; (c) Calls arrive at random and as a consequence all are treated in the same manner regardless of the point of origination.

2. All operating staff engaged in the Government of Canada switchboard complex are governed by Bell Canada policy regarding secrecy of communications, and it is understood by all such employees that the disclosure of any confidential information could result in the laying of criminal charges. This policy is enforced by supervisory staff during all hours of operation, and, once a year, relevant sections of the Criminal Code are reviewed and discussed with employees individually to remind them of their responsibilities.

AUTOMATIC FIRE ALARM SYSTEMS

Question No. 5,175—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many buildings in the National Capital Region are owned or leased by the government?

2. (a) How many have automatic fire alarm systems (b) how many are connected with a central station?

3. Do plans exist to improve the situation of automatic fire alarm systems being connected to a central station and, if so, what are they?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. The Department of Public Works manages 683 federally owned buildings and 253 leased buildings in the National Capital Region.

2. (a) Automatic fire alarm systems are installed in 135 federally owned buildings and in 17 of the leased properties; (b) Eighty-three of the federally owned buildings and 10 of the leased buildings are connected to a central station system.

3. There are no plans, at this time, to extend central station connections to buildings other than those recommended for such service by the Dominion Fire Commissioner. However, due to the installation charges and high recurring annual costs for testing and maintenance, a feasibility study is being made on the cost effectiveness of operating a federally owned central alarm receiving station.

SELECTION OF CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 5,234—Mr. Reynolds:

What are the criteria used in the selection of Census Commissioners and what is the (a) length of appointment (b) renumeration?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports the following: Men or women may be considered for the position of Census Commissioner. The candidate must possess the following qualities: Personal: be in good physical condition; be mature, responsible, energetic, and conscientious; be a resident of the Census Commissioner District in which the duties are to be performed; be bilingual in those Census Commissioner Districts designated as bilingual; have the use of an automobile; be prepared to work in the evenings, on Saturdays and, at times, long hours. Administrative: be able to pass the Personnel Selection Test demonstrating an ability to understand written instructions and read maps; be able to organize efficiently and carry out given assignments; exercise good judgement in selecting suitable Census Representatives qualified to do the job; be able to train, direct, and supervise the work of others; show, through work history, an aptitude to undertake such functions. Candidates for Census Commissioner Positions are required to take a Personnel Selection Test and as well, they are required to undergo a personal interview conducted by staff from Statistics Canada. A Census Commissioner must not be connected in any way with the levying or collection of municipal or other taxes. Remuneration: Census Commissioners will receive $3,000 for their duties in the 1976 Census, in three instalments: $500 on or about April 30, $500 on or about May 31, and the balance less the applicable deductions when the enumeration of the Census Commissioners District is completed to the satisfaction of the Chief Statistician. If authorized, mileage and other expenses as per Government Travel Regulations will be paid periodically as travel claims are submitted according to a predetermined schedule. Length of Appointment: Census Commissioners will receive training in three stages, in March, April and June covering all aspects of census work and are expected to begin work on the 1976 Census of Canada immediately following their first stage of training in March. It is expected that they will be involved in the Census part-time in March, full-time during April, May and June, and again part-time until completion of duties in mid-July.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 5,247—Mr. Marshall:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,070, has the Anti-Inflation Board determined as yet its policy on establishing additional regional offices and what is now the position with regard to a request by the Government of Newfoundland to establish an office in the Province?

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): In principle, the offices of the Anti-Inflation Board were established to serve the Regional Members of the Board in Halifax, Quebec City, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. For example, the Halifax Member of the Board and Office serve the whole of the Atlantic Provinces. The Anti-Inflation Board is not considering the establishment of additional regional offices at this time.

PRIME MINISTER'S TRIP—APRIL 24, 1976

Question No. 5,424—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Prime Minister travel from Toronto to Ottawa on Air Canada on or about Saturday, April 24, 1976 and, if so (a) what was the flight number, time of departure from Toronto, and time of arrival in Ottawa (b) what are the names of all persons accompanying him and what are their job designations (c) what are all the reasons that the Prime Minister travelled on a regularly scheduled commercial flight (d) how is this consistent with the Prime Minister's frequently expressed reason for using government aircraft for pleasure and political purposes on the grounds that flights on regularly scheduled commercial aircraft do not meet with the approval of the RCMP and would be against their advice (e) has the RCMP changed its advice to the Prime Minister and, if so, on what date (f) has the Prime Minister changed his previous policy in that he will now travel on trips of a political or holiday nature on regularly scheduled commercial airlines (g) was there any cost to the taxpayer for this travel by the Prime Minister or any others accompanying him and, if so, what was the amount (h) while in Toronto, did the Prime Minister attend the annual meeting of the Ontario Liberal Party and, if so, did the Prime Minister or the Ontario Liberal Party, pay the cost of transportation from Toronto to Ottawa and, if not, will either one of them be billed for such costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See replies to questions 69, Hansard 237, page 10579, dated 3 February 1976; 5339, Hansard 294, page 13153, dated 4 May 1976; and 5129 answered this day.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

IDENTIFICATION OF GUEST INCLUDED ON PASSENGER LIST

Question No. 5,443—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,120, which stated in part that the $11,640 public cost of the Prime Minister's 1975 summer recess holiday trip to the Northwest Territories by DOT Jet Star had the Prime Minister's son and one guest on board, what is the name and the address and any other identifying details of the guest involved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Citation 171 (d) and (r).

Question No. 5,465—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,144, which stated in part that the passenger list on the aircraft used at public expense by the Prime Minister from Quebec City to Ottawa on June 7, 1975, included a "guest", what is the name, address and any other identifying details of the "guest"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Citation 171 (d) and (r).

GASOLINE CONSUMPTION REVIEW

Question No. 5,535—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Is the government monitoring the effect of the 10¢ excise tax imposed upon gasoline in the June 23, 1975 Budget upon the conservation of gasoline, particularly as it applies to the private passenger car and, if so, what device is employed to do so?

2. (a) Has there been a significant reduction and, if so, by how much (b) are there any comparative statistics available for pre-tax consumption?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes, by carefully reviewing motor gasoline consumption data against previous expectations.

2. (a) and (b) In the first half of 1975, gasoline consumption in Canada increased by 4.8 per cent over the corresponding period in 1974. In the second half of 1975, after the imposition of the excise tax, the rate of growth from 1974 declined to 3.5 per cent. It would be premature to try to measure the contribution that the excise tax might have made to the moderation in the rate of growth but it undoubtedly had an effect. Furthermore, the government also anticipates that the excise tax will have a longer term effect on gasoline consumption to the extent that consumers shift to alternative means of transportation and purchase more efficient automobiles.

[English]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I have had to rise in this House to bring attention to question No. 4040 which I placed on the order paper on February 6. About a month ago I asked whether an answer might not be provided. I still have not yet received the answer, even though I have had some assurance from the parliamentary secretary. I would dearly love to have the answer.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on that point I join the hon. member in the concern he has expressed. There remain some 950 questions on the order paper which have not been replied to. We are endeavouring to have all those replies forthcoming before the end of this session. I fully recognize that I indicated to the hon. member that I thought the question would be answered forthwith, and that was my understanding at the time. However, there are sometimes breakdowns in communication and perhaps the House is not as able to control the number of questions answered as it ought to be.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—HEALTH RESEARCH FUNDING

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca) moved:

That this House views with great alarm the ill-considered and illogical decisions of the government which fail to give adequate priority to health research funding.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time in the past twelve months I have risen in this House to make a major address on the subject of medical research in this country, and this is because I think it is one of the most important subjects this House could deal with in terms of the effect it has on the ills and the life of Canadians everywhere. I do not think anyone would argue with the fact that medical research is an integral part of the health education system and, indeed, that it is as important as any other aspect of the health care delivery system.

I should like to look at some of the complaints we have heard from around the country resulting from the ill-considered policy the government has been following in regard to medical research and, indeed, in regard to research in general. We heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) before the committee not too long ago indicate that he supports slow growth and expansion of research in general and medical research in particular. If we examine the record of performance, we see there has been a slow but steady erosion of the research dollar on a pretty well continual basis since 1971. Indeed, this year there has been a freeze which has resulted in a substantial cut in research funds and research projects that have been under way for a long time the cut being necessary because of the uncontrolled inflation which still rages in this country.

We have a situation in which the priorities of this government fall under serious question and must be reassessed very carefully. The minister has told us that some 60 researchers left the country in the past year, while 100 have come in from the U.S. I think that if we look at the loss to our country in relation to the size of our population, and the loss to the United States in relation to the size of its population, we can see very clearly that our loss is much greater in terms of time and the cost of training of the people who have been leaving.

● (1510)

We note from the history of two months ago that some 40 per cent of ongoing research projects in this country have been terminated and that of the new applications which number in the vicinity of 400, only 10 per cent were accepted for funding as of April this year. I have here a letter which I want to read, because I think it indicates fairly clearly a story which has been repeated over and over in this country in recent months. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not here. I realize that he has been involved with the federal-provincial conference, but I understand it is now over and it cannot be used as an excuse for his not being here. I am also very sorry that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) is not here, because he is the individual who has a good deal to say about the kind of funding which takes place.

I think the absence of these two ministers indicates very clearly the attitude of the government toward research in general and medical research in particular. This is a shameful situation. Those ministers, who should be here and are not, should be thoroughly scolded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I will now refer to this letter which comes from a researcher in Ontario, a man involved in the area of eye research. It reads as follows:

At the First International Congress of Eye Research in 1974, of several hundred delegates attending from around the world, I was the only Canadian present. As far as I know, our group is the only one in Canada at present, funded by the Medical Research Council of Canada, which is performing biochemical research on lens differentiation and cataract.

I am sure everyone knows what a cataract is. It is a disorder of the lens of the eye. It "turns the pupil grey" and makes it impossible for the possessor of such an eye to see very clearly. Later, when it becomes worse, the person cannot see at all. The letter continues:

Beginning in 1967, in my laboratory at the University of Western Ontario, we have carefully nurtured a program in research on the development of the eye lens. Studying the regular growth and differentiation of such normal cells may enable us to compare these normal processes to the abnormal ones in cancer cells. With this knowledge we may be better able to define what makes a tumour cell different.

We hope that our program will eventually result in information about the lens protein changes which appear to be the root cause of cataract formation. Such information would be invaluable in preventing certain types of cataract, especially senile cataract.

That refers to a cataract in an old person.

We have developed special techniques for growing cells of the lens outside the body on microscope slides, and in sterile bottles. Using these techniques we hope to be able to test different drugs for their effects in preventing the aggregation of the lens proteins which causes the lens to become milky in cataract. This milkiness may arise in much the same way that an egg white changes from clear to milky white when it is cooked. When scientists find drugs which will prevent this "milkiness" from appearing, or cause it to disappear, we may be able to treat many cataracts by eye drops.

At the present time the only possible treatment for cataracts is surgery. Because of this cataracts remain the leading cause of hospital admissions for eye operations in North America. In addition, approximately 15 per cent of all individuals in the United States who are considered legally blind have cataracts as the underlying cause.

I think the statistics indicate that the disease of cataract of the eye, which represents a leading cost in respect of hospital admissions in North America, could be resolved, with a saving of millions of dollars in respect of surgical and other associated expenses. It is a clear indication that this is the kind of investment which indeed would be an investment rather than an expenditure. The letter continues:

> Cataract surgery often is possible only after a long period of waiting for the cataract to ripen. While the cataract ripens, the afflicted person, who is often elderly, must endure a state of near-blindness and restricted activity. Both of these are bad for his attitude and over-all health.
>
> Until this year, the main support for this research has been obtained from the Medical Research Council of Canada, and we have painstakingly built up a small team of research workers in my laboratory whose salaries and whose experiments are funded by an annual grant from the Medical Research Council.
>
> The latest government funding increase to the Medical Research Council has limited its total budget to $48 million instead of the $55 million requested. My grant has been terminated. This means that I am to be granted only enough funds to keep my laboratory running until the end of November. Before then the team will be broken up, as some workers in the laboratory seek other employment. So even if the project were to be reinstated then, when the Medical Research Council meets again, much valuable time would be lost. If no last minute reprieve comes, Canada will have lost perhaps its only biochemical research group on lens development and cataract.

This gentleman touches pretty well on the key points with which we are concerned. I am sorry to see that the former minister who was recently evicted from the cabinet is scoffing at this whole business and seems to think it is funny that medical research is being cut, with the result that hundreds of projects are being disbanded and research teams are being disbanded and asked to undertake other work. If he thinks this is funny, I hope he will have the courage to get up in this House and explain this to the research people and to the citizens of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I do not know the name of the riding of the hon. member who just interjected, but perhaps that is a good thing. He is from Toronto, in any event, and he seems to exemplify the attitude other members on that side have taken. When a group known as Canadians for Health Research came to Ottawa on May 20 of this year and were receivd by members of the government party, rather than listen to the proposals and the brief presented by the group known as Canadians for Health Research, the Liberals at that time decided to assault the group for blackmailing the government because they expressed their views publicly.

Instead of taking a serious look at the problem, the Liberals took the position that the researchers were simply blackmailing the government for some kind of political motive. I think nothing could be further from the truth. The President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have indicated that the freeze on medical research is necessary because we are in a period of restraint, and that somehow this kind of freeze will save Canadians millions of dollars. Because of that statement I want to point out the kind of savings successful research has produced for Canada and for the world.

● (1520)

First, I want to look at the field which is known as immunology. I have here a report from the United States which indicates that expenditures in research are very minor in nature in comparison with the savings which a country achieves in terms of hospital and medical costs. I am referring to a brief which was sent to our committee by a researcher from the University of Manitoba. I should like to quote from it.

The brief suggests that the eradication of polio, which was dependent on basic Canadian research leading to the development of the Salk vaccine, is saving the U.S. treasury $2 billion a year. The discovery of the measles vaccine is saving about $180 million a year. Basic research alone on the eradication of Rh hemalytic disease in the newborn, by Dr. Bruce Chown of the University of Manitoba, is saving $60 million a year. The identification of the transfusion hepatitis virus is saving $100 million a year. Organ transplant immunology and replacement of dialysis is saving another $100 million a year.

Considering this very restricted area of research, namely, immunology, the conclusion was that based on the annual immunology research budget of $33 million, the annual cost benefit was $3.3 billion. In other words, the saving in hospital and other costs required to treat these diseases which were formerly not preventable was about 100 to 1, or for every $1 invested in research in immunology there has been a saving of $100 in the long run. I think that quite clearly shows that if the minister feels he is saving money for Canadians by cutting the health research budget, he is indeed misinformed and doing Canada a great disservice.

We have also heard members of the cabinet suggest that we do not really have to do research in this country because we can simply read the health journals and get without cost the finds of research done in other countries. I think that is a most irresponsible position to take. As a matter of fact, the minister who proudly lays claim to that view, the minister of science and technology, is in the House, and I am glad to see him here because I want him to know that this party disapproves vigorously of such an approach. Indeed, as a Canadian I am ashamed that a minister of our government would talk like that. That attitude can only bring us losses.

One of the factors we must consider is that if we have no well developed researchers, no well developed and well trained scientists in a given field, essentially what we have is no one accurately to interpret the research which is being done in other countries. Secondly, we know from past experience that if we have a well developed research centre located in our country at one of the universities, that centre attracts some of the best research people in the field, the result is that we have the best research people available in the world to teach our physicians, and thus we wind up with the best educated physicians possible.

So I do not think that we can accept the statement of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) that we do not have to spend money on research ourselves, that we can simply act as parasites and take it from other countries and be as well off in the long run. That is another fallacy which I want to dispel.

If you look at our expenditures on health research in comparison with that of other countries—and I think the best country with which to compare ourselves is the United States—you will find that we are behind them. They are spending in the vicinity of four or five times the amount that we are spending, on a per capita basis. The result is that researchers who are not being funded adequately here often go south of the border where funds seem to be much more easily available. What we have in this country is a government which claims to be committed to medical research but its actions have proven otherwise. We have had a "stop and go" policy in funding, making it virtually impossible to develop a feeling of stability and security in the research community.

I want to make some suggestions in the course of my remarks, in the hope that someone will take note of them. What we need is long-term planning incorporating a policy of long-term stability in the research field. There are several reasons for that, one of them being that it takes some 12 years to train a medical researcher at considerable cost, and it takes a number of years to assemble a research team, laboratory technicians and other workers, and to get a project under way. It seems almost criminal to decide, for no particular reason, to dismember such a team and to create a situation where the head of the team must either leave the country if he wants to continue research, or go into some other field of work. None of these reasons make good, logical sense.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare announced recently that there was to be a $2 million addition to the Medical Research Council funding for this year. That happens to be about 30 per cent of the amount required to bring research in this country up to last year's level. I suggest that what must be done immediately is a further $4.6 million allocation in order to allow the researchers to continue at last year's level. We, as a party, want to put forward a long-term policy, and I think a good suggestion that we should aim for is to not only stay at last year's level of activity in Canada but over the next five years catch up with the United States, West Germany, Sweden and other countries which so far have been ahead of us in terms of funding of medical research. This is an objective which this party has accepted as party policy.

The other things which we must consider are to accept once and for all that medical research is part and parcel of the health care delivery system and must be given adequate attention at all times to ensure that it survives and flourishes in this country. We must also consider giving sufficient funding and sufficient commitment to research to ensure that there is an adequate research base for education in the health field, to make sure that there is an expansion of scientific and technical knowledge as a basis for health care. We must improve the application of scientific principles to health care; we must support adequate training of research investigators in the health field and, finally, we must support research contributions to new knowledge in the health field.

Even though it may have been somewhat clumsily expressed, I have just outlined what I think would be an excellent long-term policy with the long-term objective of bringing Canada up to par with other developed countries in the world in the area of medical research. We recognize that we cannot be best in all fields. We agree, perhaps, that we should be doing more research in the areas in which we are particularly capable. At the same time, we must ensure that we have adequately trained people in a wide variety of fields. Perhaps we can work in some aspect of every field, although not in all aspects of every field. Only in this way can we expect that in the long term Canadians will be the beneficiaries of the best health care system in the world. In the long run this is also the only way we can expect to improve the health care delivery system as far as keeping costs down and providing proper education for individuals who are providing our medical services.

● (1530)

The item I read at the beginning of my comments which dealt with an eye research project was of particular significance because the funding the researcher asked for was in the vicinity of $22,000 for this year to keep his project going. I want to point out very dramatically the kind of priorities this government decides upon when it cuts research into the development of cataracts on the eye. The Ottawa Citizen of March 23 ran a picture of an office, with the caption in big, black letters:

SPLENDOUR

Urban affairs minister Barney Danson's office in the restored La Salle Academy on Sussex Drive, was enhanced by $37,400 worth of restoration work to return it to its original 19th century splendour.

I wonder whether there is something wrong with the priorities of the government, when it spends $37,400 on an office to bring it to its nineteenth century splendour but does not have $22,000 to fund a project on cataract research.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I think the fact that it was nineteenth century splendour reflects the thinking of this government which is perhaps even earlier than that century.

An hon. Member: Seventeenth century.

Mr. Yewchuk: The middle ages, or dark ages. I think that is where we are going if this government remains for very much longer.

I am glad to see the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) in the chamber. He is also guilty of the misuse of funds. A satellite was launched last fall, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you received a great, glossy brochure with pictures and beautiful drawings, the total cost of which was $17,000. I should like the minister to stand in this House and tell us why that brochure was necessary. What did it do to help the satellite perform its function? Was it really necessary? Could he not simply have written a letter and had his secretary type it to explain that a satellite was going up in the sky? That would not have cost anything. But to pay for the brochure, a research project somewhere in this country had to be cancelled. I have an example of such a project right here, Mr. Speaker.

Here is a letter from a researcher at the University of Manitoba who was trying to develop a method of treating cancer using the concept of immunology. This project was initiated in 1972-73 as a result of a pioneering observation that if particular drug-induced tumours of guinea pigs are infiltrated with certain kinds of cells they are able to kill rapidly-growing tumour cells in a test-tube. After an encouraging initial funding by the Medical Research Council for the next two years, an increase barely equivalent to the inflation rate was given, which was followed by a serious cut and a terminal grant this year. The project is now being terminated—and all that was needed for this year was $18,000.

If the Secretary of State had not spent $17,000 on that fancy brochure, this cancer research project could have survived and may have found a cure for cancer. I hope the Secretary of State who is sitting there scratching his beard, feels very guilty about that gross abuse and misuse of public funds. There is a gross mix-up in what the priorities of this country should be. It seems to me that the only solution to overcome all the serious problems is to replace a government that has so little concern for the health of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I should like the ministers to whom I have referred to look around this chamber and tell me which of their colleagues they would not mind dropping from a heart attack in the next year, or which one of their colleagues. I see the Minister of State for Science and Technology pointing at me, Mr. Speaker. That is very unkind of him, and I am sure he does not mean it. I should like him to look around on his own side and see which of his colleagues he would not mind dropping of cancer in the next five years or so.

That is exactly what is happening, with research. Instead of facing the problem and realizing the importance of it and funding it, we have an expenditure of $1.5 billion on Petro-Canada, a totally unnecessary structure. I do not know how many hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on the Canada Development Corporation for no reason except political expediency. There is no way anybody can point to a need in this country for the Canada Development Corporation, yet it is using up hundreds of millions of dollars. Nobody can say that medical research is not useful or is not needed, yet it is being totally ignored. I cannot understand that. I have some other suggestions to make, Mr. Speaker. The average amount of money requested for many of the research projects which have been cancelled—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my gratitude to hon. members. I thought they on the other side were asleep, and perhaps that is the only reason they allowed me to carry on. But because of their curtesy I shall try to wind up very quickly.

The Prime Minister's swimming pool could have funded ten research projects—$250,000 divided by 25, and you have ten research projects. Then there is the Canada Development Corporation, which you can figure out for yourself. If we abandoned Petro-Canada and put that money into medical research, there would be no need to seek money elsewhere, not only to match medical research in the United States but to surpass it. It seems to me that if the members of cabinet, who control spending in this country, gave the matter some thought, they could only come to the conclusion that their priorities must be re-examined, changed and placed in the proper order so that Canadians could receive what they expect from their government. They should have the kind of funding for medical research to which people residing in a well developed, industrialized, western nation are entitled. Until this is done, I am afraid there is no way that I can support this government in anything it does.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

● (1540)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), criticizing, as it does, the failure of the government to give adequate priority to health research funding, is timely. Not only is it timely in a general sense; it is significant in that it is being debated this very day when the federal government has taken a stand with the provinces in which it has produced a total package of which changes with respect to health research funding is a significant part. We want to indicate our full support of the criticism implied in this motion. If I may say so without calling for too many retorts from my friends of the Progressive Conservative party, I think we support this motion more strongly than they do.

Mr. Alexander: I do not understand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was hoping an hon. member would interject so that I could explain what I have in mind. The motion being debated in the House today has been moved by a Progressive Conservative member and it has the support of that party. At the same time, Progressive Conservative premiers, such as Premier Lougheed and Premier Davis, are saying they are satisfied with the fiscal rearrangements the federal government is proposing.

Mr. Grafftey: That is a non sequitur.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The two positions are completely and totally unrelated. When any provinces, especially wealthy provinces, agree to a rearrangement of the fiscal priorities of this country so that less wealthy provinces have to work that much harder for health and education, it means that the federal government will feel it can cut back on medical research funding or, at least, not keep such funding in line with the cost requirements of that research. I hope that my hon. friends to my right who have taken an important and significant stand in the House on this matter today, as they have on other occasions, will have some heart-to-heart talks with the conservative premiers of the wealthy provinces.

If Canada is to be one country from coast to coast, a country in which Canadians across this land have an equal opportunity to participate in important and essential services, I suggest that we must make a better deal for our people than the sort of deal which has resulted from the last two days of federal-provincial conference. As I say, that conference dealt generally with post-secondary education and health in all its aspects, but the question of medical research and funding for such research is part of the whole package. If the government, with the blessing of Premier Lougheed and Premier Davis, gets away with providing less money to the provinces for health services, it will also get away with providing less money for medical research. In our view, this situation is most serious. All that has been highlighted by what happened yesterday and today, and it is of great importance to Canada.

I agree with my friends of the official opposition about the particular importance of funding for medical research. Answering questions today, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seemed to have a great deal to say about a particular cliché, namely, that we should not spend at a rate faster than the growth of the gross national product. Actually, I have seldom seen the Prime Minister as excited as he was today. He walked out into the aisle farther than I have ever seen him walk since he became Prime Minister. On two occasions he turned round and addressed himself to members of the Liberal party. That was his only way of getting applause.

Mr. Grafftey: That was one of our finer parliamentary moments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That cliché sounds plausible. The proposition that one's expenditures should not increase by more than the growth of the gross national product certainly should apply to total expenditures, whether one is speaking of a state or a person. But it is also true that a person or state can rearrange spending priorities. Although our total expenditures may not increase beyond the increase in revenues, or the increase in the gross national product, it is still desirable and possible to cut down on some other things to make sure that we can adequately and properly fund health delivery services and health research. We contend, therefore, that the government's policies are shortsighted and unfair to the Canadian people, both of this generation and of future generations, in that they do not provide for the maintenance of adequate funding for medical research.

I presume we shall be given figures today to show that more dollars will be spent this year than were spent last year, and perhaps more dollars will be spent next year than this year on medical research. But everyone in this House knows that we are concerned not just about the number of dollars but about the value of those dollars. Unless the number of dollars spent in this area increases in proportion to today's costs, it means that a cap has been put on expenditures, or funding for medical research has been frozen. The result will be that persons engaged in medical research will have to give up their projects, go elsewhere, or what have you, and Canadians both of this and future generations will suffer thereby. With all these considerations in mind, we welcome the present opportunity to speak on this subject today. We regret that the rules of the House do not allow us to vote on this motion. If we could vote, we would support the motion.

I know that we all get letters when an issue of any importance comes up. Perhaps reading from letters is not the most hard working way to make a speech. When I looked at my file today, I found many letters on this subject. I confess I was impressed by the number of letters I received from doctors and professors of medicine across the country, particularly from my own city of Winnipeg. The hon. member for Athabasca spoke of some researchers in my city. I do not intend to read at length from letters, but I do wish to indicate the kinds of persons from whom I have received letters on this subject. Many of them have also written to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), or the Prime Minister. Copies of those letters were sent to me.

I was sent a letter by Dr. J. C. Haworth, professor of paediatrics, director of clinical investigation and research at the Children's Health Sciences Centre in Winnipeg. Another letter came from Professor Alec Sehon, director of the medical research council group for allergy research of the faculty of medicine, University of Manitoba. Another letter came from Professor Frank S. LaBelle, department of pharmacology and therapeutics, faculty of medicine, University of Manitoba, in Winnipeg. Next, one came from Professor Roma Z. Hawirko, department of microbiology, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg. Then there is a letter from Dr. Victor Chernick, of the department of paediatrics, University of Manitoba. Actually, he is paediatrician in chief at the children's centre. Then I got a letter from Sister Ruth C. Hickey, who is vice-president of St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg. There is also a letter from Professor Peter E. Dresel of the department of pharmacology and therapeutics, faculty of medicine, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg.

Professional people of that calibre and standing in the community, busy as they are, do not take time to write letters to the government or members of parliament unless the issue about which they write is of deep concern. As I say, most of the letters I have had are letters which have also been sent to various responsible ministers. All the letters make the same point strongly: this cutback is a case of false economy. By cutting back on funding for health research, or limiting funding in such a way that health research cannot be carried on, we are betraying Canadians of this and future generations. I mentioned a number of letters that I received, all of them from Winnipeg. I would like to mention one letter that came from somewhere else in the country because I want to quote briefly from it. It is from Dr. H. Arnold Steinberg, chairman, Canadians for Health Research, whose address is Westmount, Quebec.

● (1550)

Mr. Drury: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought I would get a response from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) on that. The Minister of Public Works is also the Minister of State for Science and Technology, and I gather that is the capacity in which he will be dealing with this matter. It is always good to have him on these subjects, although I had hoped the Minister of National Health and Welfare might have been here as well. At any rate, I want to read a couple of paragraphs from Dr. Steinberg's letter because I think it sums up what most of these letters have said. I quote:

> The quantity and quality of medical research affects every Canadian in two principal ways: 1. It is the only practical answer to reducing health care costs by finding cures to those diseases which randomly strike thousands of people necessitating government expenditures now in excess of $7 billion annually.

That point in itself should be enough to move this government to reconsider its position. One sure way to decrease the cost of medical care is to do something about medical research. I quote the second point set out in Dr. Steinberg's letter:

2. Most outstanding physicians and surgeons are attracted to those teaching hospitals that carry on active research programs, a majority of which are funded by the Medical Research Council. While allowing a 16 per cent increase in overall expeditures, the government has frozen the MRC budget at last year's level. This has caused a major cutback in medical research activity. Leading investigators are being forced to move elsewhere to conduct their research work. This will have a profound impact on the quality of hospital care and on the quality of teaching of medicine across the country.

We are dealing with something that is extremely serious. As I have already said, the decisions made, or at least handed down, by the federal government at the conference centre over the past day or two have been very serious for the future of this country. I suggest the most serious of all is what is being done in the field of health.

There is one other quotation I should like to read from one of my many letters from doctors. This comes from Dr. Peter E. Dresel of Winnipeg, to whom I have already referred. I quote this because I think it makes the point very clear.

Because the budget of this council—

The reference is to the Medical Research Council.

—is already so small, because it has not kept pace with inflation in the costs of research for some years, and because it supports a very high percentage of all medical research in Canada, the budget freeze will cause inordinate damage to Canadian medicine. Medical research is a prerequisite to good medical teaching and is basic to medical practice and the delivery of health care. The development of young teacher-scientists and of clinicians with skill in investigative medicine must remain a high priority for a government interested in the future welfare of the Canadian people.

Canadian researchers are in general agreement that government spending must be controlled.

That, of course, fits in with the line of thinking of the government. Although a copy of this letter was sent to me, the original was sent to the Minister of Finance.

They do not ask for special treatment, but only that the guidelines of limited increases be applied to extramural research as they are to all government efforts.

In my view, the fact that so many professors and doctors, experts in the health field, are expressing this kind of concern underlines the seriousness of this issue. I hope the government can be persuaded by this day's debate. It is in addition to other days we have had on this subject to review the position with respect to the way it is treating the Medical Research Council and, in turn, medical research in this country.

I have referred to various letters from professionals in the health field, doctors and professors. I have another letter I should like to read. It does not come from the medical field itself, but from one of the societies that is concerned about a particular disease, the ravages of which hit a great many Canadians. I shall read from the spring, 1976, publication of the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada. On one page of this report there is an open letter signed by Peter J. Lowry, the president of that society. It is headed "Tell your MP", and reads as follows:

I'm mad. And you should be too. Our federal government is sticking its head so far into the sand on the question of medical research funding that the only part of the legislators' anatomy still above ground is that part which offers the right amount of flesh for a good kick.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Sure, I believe in restraint in government spending. But not when the end result could be the further weakening of our ability to do medical research in this country. The federal government has restricted the growth of Medical Research Council funds to the point that we are in danger of losing many of our best researchers. This is not just short-sighted or stupid; it's a crime against future generations of Canadians.

It has been said that some members of the federal cabinet believe that Canada can just import medical research because it is too expensive for Canada to make a contribution. Obviously that kind of thinking was not around when Canada gave insulin to the world. Wiser Parliaments in the past have given Canada a strong and vital medical research capability and the momentum has to be maintained.

We are working too hard in this Society to raise funds for research to see the ground cut out from under us by federal penny-pinching. The basic funding has to be done by the government. Funds for MS research cannot be spent on the facilities or administration of research centres—our funds are for work on solving the mystery of MS. Even the funds from the Cancer Society and the Heart Foundation are inadequate to fill the gap being left by the federal government.

So, tell your MP. Tell you friends to tell their MP. If you don't and your friends don't, then your MP will continue to think that nobody cares about medical research. Tell your MP that you care. Write him or her a friendly letter saying you care. Don't send an unfriendly letter—they are probably getting too many of those; or just send this editorial—they'll get the message. You don't need to put a stamp on it if you mail it to your MP at the House of Commons, Ottawa.

I have brought two types of quotations before the House. One is the professional opinion of doctors and professors in our medical schools. But I have read Mr. Lowry's letter because it represents the view of one society that is working in a particular disease area, trying to help the people who suffer from it. I suspect that represents the thinking of the lay people who work in all kinds of societies that are concerned with health problems. This is a very serious situation. It is enough to make some people angry, as Mr. Lowry says in his letter. I hope the government will seriously consider the message that this House is trying to give to it today; that it is false economy and a betrayal of Canadians, both now and in the future, not to provide adequate funding for medical research in Canada.

● (1600)

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the mover, the hon. member for Athabaska (M. Yewchuk), who is giving us an opportunity today to deal with a subject on which I feel very strongly since the last budget was introduced because this government does not give health research financing the importance it should have.

Every time I had an opportunity to do so I constantly drew the attention of the government to those deficiencies, and asked it to review its policy on medical research, particularly at the university level. I am happy to hear today what the first two parties of the opposition that preceeded me had to say so the whole opposition could rise to protest the government's policy on research and be the spokesmen for the entire medical corps, all students, all research technicians across Canada who blame and particularly urge this government to come back on its position in the area of research.

On March 29, 1976, dealing with that famous Anti-Inflation Act I pointed out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) that he was imposing a freeze in priority areas such as assistance to university research while at the same time increasing budgets like national defence or construction of federal buildings. Later on, as reported in issue No. 54 of April 12, 1976, I asked the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) at a sitting of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, as follows:

Mr. Minister, I was listening to you a while ago, I do not have a copy of your statement, but you mentioned increases, mainly concerning cost-sharing programs with the industry for industrial research. Is it the intention of your government in the future to go for these cost-sharing programs and to progressively abandon the research made by the universities?

Here is what the minister replied:

Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago, the researches made by the universities are at a high level comparatively to other western countries and Japan.

Always that comparison with other countries without wondering about the needs of this country.

But the need for industrial research is more urgent; this is more evident in the industry and mostly in the private industry, which we are trying to upgrade as much as possible, through all of our assistance programs, which are cost shared programs, as you mentioned a while ago.

We want to keep on doing that, but at the same time, I think we should not neglect anything and permit a small increase for the research in the universities which is also very important for the graduates.

Coming back to this matter, I suggest this is moderate in my view, being a 4 per cent reduction only as compared to other areas. Don't you believe that such restraint may be responsible for the loss of many scientific researchers? The minister answered, and I quote:

I think there will be loss, not as much of our scientists than of the technicians, whose salaries increase every year. That is good as far as the industry is concerned; if they quit the university to go to the industry where they are needed, that is not a bad thing. But if they quit their research to do something else, then, that is a total loss. Unfortunately, this year, there will be a decrease in the number of laboratory technicians in the universities due to the salary increase of the technicians and there will be no comparable increase of money supplied in the budgets of the universities.

This means, Mr. Speaker, the minister was aware of our losses of technicians and university research scientists.

I put another question to the minister:

Looking through the past years, I notice, unfortunately that our research people, you say you would be happy if they went to Canadian industry, but unfortunately they leave the country. Going to the States, I was surprised to meet many Canadians whose studies we have financed and who are down there because they cannot live in Canada.

They cannot find work in Canada and use their knowledge to serve their country. I talked with those people and it is not because they want to live out there, it is because they could not live here.

Do you think that danger will grow by decreasing the reasearch budget of the universities? It is nice to say that the industry needs them, we will try to supply them to the industry, but they have to be trained.

The minister also tells us that he is well aware of that problem but he cannot do otherwise. I think we have got evidence. I want to quote from a letter which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) quoted a few moments ago. I thought he was going to quote the name of the group. Let me complete his quotation by simply naming the group of medical researchers whose letter he quoted:

I wrote to this particular group asking it to describe itself. I received the following answer:

About three months ago, the medical research group was created on the initiative of a group of responsible citizens, of organizations of voluntary people and medical researchers following the government decision to freeze the budget of the Medical Research Council. After only a few meetings, the movement now gathers citizens from one ocean to the other and the groups are made up of thousands of Canadians from all over the country.

I think the minister knows something about this group because not only they came to meet Mr. Steinberg but they also came to meet us and the minister too.

● (1610)

The organization has several major objectives including drawing the attention of the public to the role played by medical research in the daily activities of each Canadian.

This is followed by the passage read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I shall not repeat this passage, but I would simply like to mention, after I met this group of university physicians who are called active researchers, what we can deduce from the protests made by these research groups:

According to official government estimates for 1976-77, the three subsidized councils will have the same amount as last year for university research:

Mr. Speaker, the same amount with a cost of living increase of 12 to 15 per cent means a reduction.

Canada Council, $27.7 million

Medical Research Council, $48.8 million

National Research Council, $91.3 million

Last year, the NRC gave out $78.9 million in scholarships and research grants. The present disagreement concerns only the bookkeeping of the government. For instance, for 1976-77, grants in the field of atomic research were included in the NRC budget and the difference between last year's budget and that for 1976-77 is nearly entirely allocated to atomic research.

And the department says: We have not reduced grants! If everything is aimed at atomic research, how can you operate a research project?

The same estimates show that the federal government will increase its expenditures by about 16 per cent. In that case, why should scientists suffer greater restrictions than the government since the freeze it has imposed will mean the elimination of 10 to 15 per cent of all research projects?

ACCOUNT OF RECENT MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER C. M. DRURY AND 80 RESEARCHERS FROM OTTAWA UNIVERSITY

Here are a few questions that the researchers asked:

RESEARCHERS: They are trying to convince the minister that the combined effect of the lack of government assistance and inflation are endangering research efforts in Canada.

MR. DRURY: He said repeatedly that we were living in a year of restrictions and that everybody should make the sacrifices necessary to stop inflation.

This is not what is being done at national defence, Mr. Speaker.

RESEARCHERS: In their opinion, the current financial conditions discourage young graduates from going into research. They wonder where future scientists will come from.

We probably wait for them to come up from the United States, while we force ours to go over there. And the question is the following:

QUESTION—Does the government intend to support only the best research and let the remaining aside? Does the government realize that the scientists who are forced to leave research will never go back to it? Has it considered the impact of such a loss? Will these people be able to find adequate jobs elsewhere?

MR. DRURY: He disappointed his audience by answering only to the last question, saying that if those highly educated people were unable to get a job elsewhere, it is because the university was doing a bad job . . .

That is easy to say, Mr. Speaker. You get all the evidence you want when you visit universities, and meet groups of graduate researchers and you can see how sincere and dedicated they are; when a minister dares speak that way, I find it a bit exaggerated.

There is no doubt that the freeze ordered by the government does not represent a decision based on a scientific policy but rather a financial decision. Indeed, when he was asked in the House whether he was aware that the recent cuts would be a mortal blow to researchers, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, president of the Treasury Board, replied that he did not agree with that assumption. The scientists note two long-term effects from those cuts: the manpower problem and that of the level of health care. As for manpower, the scientists are concerned that researchers who will be dismissed will never come back, that many technicians will lose their jobs and that the young scientists will not have an opportunity to make a career in research.

Recently, two University of Manitoba professors wrote to the federal members to explain the importance of manpower. About health care, the Canadian College of Medical Geneticists stated the following:

Solutions to problems and the practical application of knowledge can only be provided by active research programs undertaken in Canada. As professionals involved in genetics, we regret that Canadians at every level will eventually have to suffer from those short-term budgetary decisions.

You have heard the voices of a group of university researchers across Canada. I have in my hand the opinion of the Quebec researchers: "Quebec researchers look at the future with cautious confidence". I do not have time to read the whole document but it is significant that they said, quote:

Quebec researchers are badly affected by the financial crisis involving university research in Canada. Quebec researchers are emerging from this long and hard winter of cuts in financial research more determined than ever while at the horizon there seem to appear the first signs of the unfreezing of federal sources of financing.

The crisis prompted them to tighten their ranks and work together to join the common front of Canadian scientists for a pressure campaign on Ottawa. Then, they mentioned in this article the most critically affected areas, among which, medical biology. As for biology, I had the opportunity, during the year, to follow from a distance a group of researchers in the University of Ottawa. There I was able to realize the plight of those groups, in the field of finance and equipment. The trouble they had getting the material necessary for their projects. Not only did they have difficulty to raise the funds necessary for their projects, 50 per cent only since they gave 50 per cent of their time for nothing—but they did not even have enough money to buy instruments and material for their projects. It is then that I saw the shortcomings or the lack of understanding of the government in the area of university research.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Recently I met the Canadian association of professors in the University of Ottawa who had sent me this letter which I quote:

You are no doubt already aware that the Minister of Health has announced that the freeze on medical research financing is lifted and that the council would get an additional $2 million. Surely this is good news for the researchers who are members of our association. This will allow a number of research teams to keep going, which would otherwise have been, as you have underlined, broken up because of lack of funds. Nevertheless, this increased funding does not make allowance for cost increases brought about by the current inflation rate.

In our opinion, however, it is rather unreasonable that the government should increase subsidies for the Medical Research Council without increasing those for university research done under the National Research Council and under the Canada Council. The National Research Council finances university research in non-medical fields such as agriculture, forestry, biology, chemistry, physics and geology. As for the Canada Council, it finances university research in the fields of humanities and social sciences. The CAUT is presently urging Mr. Drury and Mr. Faulkner to see to it that the NRC and the Canada Council get additional funds the same way as the Medical Research Council. We would then be very grateful to you for helping us bring pressure to bear on the government. On the other hand, if we could be of any help in providing you with additional information . . .

And I got plenty of it, but I will not have time to quote much of it since the time allotted to me has elapsed; but I have here all the necessary tables to show the two ministers concerned the evidence that there is—

● (1620)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Thank you, very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to deprive any member, so in conclusion I just want to say that there is certainly discrimination, first of all, at the university research level in respect of other fields and especially discrimination against industrial research.

I believe that too much importance is given to industry. Industry and industrial research are important, but priority should go to medical research. Further, if we want to keep our technicians, we have to take hold of the situation. We must keep technicians in our universities so that they will not only train other technicians, but also take part in the research being conducted in our country, so that we must not always rely on other countries, as I heard the minister say. If that is not done, we have all the American technicians and they can bring us all the new discoveries. If we continue to rely on the United States to live, tomorrow we will be forced to go and buy all our food supplies south of the border.

I believe time has come for Canada to wake up, to live as a responsible country and to keep our men in places to be able to ensure the required medical care to our people.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I recognize the hon. Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury).

An hon. Member: Now we will hear the good news.

An hon. Member: Where is Yewchuk?

Mr. Paproski: He had to go to a graduation. His daughter is graduating, but he will be back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say to the hon. minister that the member who moved the motion and brought on this debate this afternoon has to attend the graduation of his daughter. He is sorry that he will miss the minister's speech, but he will be back in half an hour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I cannot see the opposition getting excited over a thing like that. After we have listened to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) in respect of our own ministers, he should take his own pill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, it does seem that the opposition might well think about planning their days with a little more care. Hon. members opposite knew, for example, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) could not be present today because of the conference of first ministers, and that the parliamentary secretary to the minister had to be absent. The hon. member opposite who moved the motion has to be away for an event that is important to him. Surely a little forethought in choosing the subject and the right day would do a great deal to enhance the prestige of this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest this is not a point of order but is getting into the area of debate.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, we are addressing ourselves to a motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). I appreciate the fact that he has other obligations and duties to perform, but I certainly agree with the point just made, that it would seem difficult to take seriously a party which has put forward a motion and has complained when that group chooses a day on which they know in advance that the minister had out of town obligations, and knew in advance that the parliamentary secretary was not only out of town but out of the country on government duty. That group also chose a day when the mover of the motion merely had time to have his say, for what it is worth, and then depart on other duties. This may be a method of getting some words on the record, but it hardly constitutes what in my view would be a debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: If, unfortunately, the hon. member for Athabasca could not afford the time to be present to hear what is said on the subject on which he speaks, one can hardly expect him to be taken very seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, all those who have spoken so far have suggested that perhaps the government should take another look at its priorities. Some of their suggestions were thoughtful, but some were, unfortunately, a little less than ludicrous. I will comment on those suggestions later.

In relation to the question of priorities, perhaps one should look at this problem of research, particularly medical research, in the larger perspective. We have in Canada quite an investment in research which is carried out in a number of ways, a number of places and funded from a number of sources. One should recognize that research, basically, is an investment in the future, and to the extent it is not done one is not being prudent in preparing for the future. If all one's wealth and resources are devoted to research, namely, an investment in the future, then the present never arrives. We have to strike a balance between making adequate investment in the future, based on an act of faith, and enjoyment of the present.

A survey conducted in this country in 1973 by OECD indicates that on a per capita basis research in industry in Canada appeared, by comparison with similar research being done in other countries, to be virtually at the bottom of the list. We ranked ninth. When one looks at the quantum of research in Canada in industry, compared with the quantum of research in other OECD countries in industry, he will find we ranked nine out of ten countries. Having regard to research done in government laboratories, on a per capita basis Canada ranked third among OECD countries. Clearly, by this measure we are doing a fair proportion, if all the others are right, of our research in government and a very low proportion indeed in industry.

In respect of research in universities and institutions of higher education, we ranked fourth among OECD countries, exceeded on a per capita basis only by Sweden, Germany and the Unites States. This indicates that our effort must urgently be on the highest priority for fostering research and innovative processes in the manufacturing industry where we are away behind our industrial competitors, the other OECD countries. To this end, a number of government incentive programs were devised. There was a general decision taken that here is where all the additional resources we can find should be directed toward installing more research or more innovative capacity in industry, given that in comparison with our OECD competitors we were up at the top of the procession in respect of research conducted in and by the institutions of higher learning and universities. It is against this background that one looks at the numbers which have been brought out today. I would suggest that far from lagging behind in respect of research, including medical research conducted in the universities in teaching hospitals, Canada ranks high compared to the OECD countries which should provide a reasonable basis for comparison.

● (1630)

I should point out that what we classify in Canada as medical research is performed or is funded or supported not only by the Medical Research Council but by some other agencies. In fact there is, in the current year, devoted to medical research something in the order of $100 million, and in round numbers about half of that comes through the Medical Research Council. Another fraction, about $12 million, comes from the Department of National Health and Welfare quite independently and distinct from the Medical Research Council. The balance, about $35 million, is funded by institutes of higher education, by provincial governments and, very importantly, by private organizations which this year will be putting up some $20 million.

This means that today, when one directs attention purely to the phenomenon or the mechanism of the Medical Research Council, one is not referring to the whole medical research structure. However, the Medical Research Council, as I think everyone will agree, is in the process of doing very good and very useful work. There is little, if any, suggestion that any of the money put through the Medical Research Council is ineffectively or wastefully used. This is my own view, which I believe is shared by most members of the House. But the Medical Research Council is a relatively recent creation.

Some years ago the medical research on behalf of the federal government was largely carried out by the National Research Council. In the 1960s the Medical Research Council was brought into existence as a separate granting council and it has grown from nothing, then, to the position where it has a budget currently, as I indicated, of very close to $50 million per annum. Its growth in terms of funds available to it in the period 1970-71 to 1975-76 has been of the order of 49 per cent in current dollars, or 1 per cent in real terms. Those who talk about cutbacks even in real terms are unaware of the fact that there has been no slipback in respect of real improvement in the Medical Research Council during that period.

If one looks at the period 1970-71 to and including the current year, the rate of growth in nominal terms has been 61 per cent, which is not a bad rate of growth over a period of some seven years. In the same period there has been a real growth in the order of 2 per cent. This, then, is the answer to those who talk of cutbacks.

I am not suggesting for a moment that this is all the Medical Research Council wants, nor indeed all a great many of us here in this House would like to see put at the disposal of the Medical Research Council or, indeed, the other granting councils for research purposes. Prudent people—and I think most members of this House are prudent—like to see the largest possible investment in the future while still meeting current demands which have to be met. In the current year I think we are all sharing in this process of endeavouring to limit the growth in expenditures by all Canadians, including the federal government. This process of limiting growth is a difficult one. It is one in which I think everyone, including researchers and medical researchers, would want to play their part. As I say, even in real terms, discounting inflation, the Medical Research Council over the period 1970 to 1976 has shown a real growth as I indicated.

A number of instances have been put forward where researchers have felt that their particular grants had either been limited or terminated unreasonably. Certainly, the termination or limitation was a source of intense dissatisfaction. However, in real terms the funds have been growing year by year and the allocation of those funds, both those that are continuing and the increases, is made on the basis of value judgment by the doctors' peers. This, I think—and most people would agree—is the best system we have been able to devise to get the fairest allocation of funds of this sort in very complex and frequently competing fields.

● (1640)

Hon. members will realize that the budget of the Medical Research Council has received continuous increasing support, and I hope this will be so in the future. I have indicated in dollars the share of the total research funds for medical research which passed through the Medical Research Council.

I would like to say that the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Athabasca was rather harsh in his judgment not only of the government's motivation but also of its actions. I hope that shortly, perhaps this weekend, he will be able to return to his native province and invite Albertans, as the government of Alberta has indicated it will do, to participate in a substantial grant through the Heritage fund to cancer research. I have not included this prospective large sum of money in the figures I have quoted because so far the government of Alberta has only indicated an interest, rather than a firm intention, in undertaking this funding. I think the hon. member for Athabasca would be pleased if the government of Alberta were to come through with funds for this very worth-while cause.

The hon. member offered some suggestions as to how the system of funding could be improved. One of his suggestions was that more money should be allocated. That is an easy answer, but at a time of limited funds for all federal as well as provincial government operations, more money is no answer at all; it is merely a form of escapism. However, I suggest that one of the problems in relation to the council was what he called the stop-and-go nature of the grants, the uncertainty among the recipients as to how much money will be granted and for how long they might receive it.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has recognized this problem, and perhaps the hon. member for Athabasca got this idea from the minister himself at a committee meeting when the minister indicated that work was going forward within his department to try to see if grants by the council could not be reorganized to provide more certainty of continuity than perhaps has been the case in the past. Improvements could be made in this area even without additional funds. Certainly the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I support this kind of initiative.

The hon. member for Athabasca suggested that we should catch up with both the U.S. and Sweden in the area of medical research. Perhaps this is desirable in terms of giving ourselves a glow of well-being, but given the fact, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out as recently as this morning, that we are in the situation of trying to consume more in a year than we are able or willing to produce—

Mr. Paproski: Did he just find that out this morning?

Mr. Drury: No doubt the hon. member has been absent or he would have heard this on many other occasions. I said the Prime Minister pointed this out again as recently as this morning.

Mr. Paproski: We will hear about it again in 1978.

Mr. Drury: While it might be attractive to think that we are doing more in medical research than either the U.S. or Sweden, this is perhaps another case where our ambitions outstrip our abilities to perform. Consequently, we are in the process now of having to make selections between what we can do and what we cannot do, what we want to do and what we want not to do. In the case of medical research, case histories have been read out to the House. This could go on forever. The list of human ailments is almost without end, and the list of people who would be interested in pursuing cures for them is also very large indeed. The fact of the matter is that we as a country cannot afford to undertake all the research that requires to be done, given the limited resources both in people and in money that we have available for this purpose. Selections have to be made and the method of making these selections in this area is through the granting councils.

It has been suggested that the Medical Research Council has been denied the amount of money that they need in the current year to keep up with their level of operations in the previous year. I am told that the advice was given to the Minister of National Health and Welfare some months ago that in order to maintain the November, 1975, level of activity in the current year an additional sum of $1.2 million would be needed. The minister was able to find in his departmental budget, from other prospective activities, the sum of $2 million which was allocated to the Medical Research Council, so that the allegation that the council does not have sufficient funds this year to keep with last year's activities is demonstrably unfounded. Indeed, more money than the minimum they said was needed has been furnished to the council.

This is not, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said on a number of occasions, as much of national resources going through the Medical Research Council for medical research as we would like to see. To be quite frank, this is not as much as I would like to see. One hopes that with the intention of the government to reorganize the three granting councils—which, unfortunately, given our legislative timetable, is not possible before June 30, which, however, with the co-operation of the opposition I hope we will be able to process through the legislative machine next fall—the cause of research will be better served.

● (1650)

With that legislation, the prospects for the new science and engineering council, the humanities and social science council and the Medical Research Council working closer together to adequately serve the cause of research in the universities will be much better than at the moment.

The hon. member for Athabasca indicated, rather loosely I felt, that the cause of research in Canada was "totally neglected", to use his words, by the government. I would suggest that in the case of medical research, continuous real growth, after discounting inflation over the period of the seven years I have sketched, does not correspond to total neglect. Like so many other things, I have indicated it is not as much and as often as a number of us would like, of course. Those who are worried about the lack of investment, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), should remember that in the current year we are operating within a framework of rather severely limited resources, but this does not represent a cutback in any sense of the term.

The hon. member for Athabasca made one statement which I should like flatly to contradict. On the strength of some rather dubious arithmetic he indicated that proportionately more researchers were leaving Canada for the United States than were coming here, and that we as a country are providing the training for them at our cost and thus are the net losers. I am advised that from July 1, 1974, to June 30, 1975, 24 Canadian researchers went to the United States and 58 came from the United States to Canada, a net gain of around 100 per cent of the Canadian movement. This is not simply an isolated phenomenon peculiar to this one year, but is a trend that has been persistent for the last few years. Those who try to bolster a weak case with this kind of phony endeavour to frighten people weaken what is a good cause by trying to support it with fallacies.

The hon. member for Athabasca also indicated that I said somewhere, sometime, that we should depend on the United States for our research. I am not sure of his exact words, but they are so foreign to my notion of what it should be that I could not quite catch them.

Mr. Paproski: I think he said there was a duplication of research.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the minister to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members on both sides of the House for allowing me to participate at some length over my regular time in the debate. In respect of the importation of technology, I made the statement that we in Canada—and this applies particularly to industrial research and, to a minor degree, to a number of other fields—are in a unique position in the world. I said at the outset of these remarks that the OECD comparative survey of Canada and the other OECD countries indicated that very much less research was being carried on in industry in Canada than in the other OECD countries. I suggested that the reason for this is the unique position in which we in Canada find ourselves. We have access, at relatively low cost, to the greatest source of new technology in the world, the United States. We, alone, are privileged to be allowed to avail ourselves of this: we are allowed to be the transferee of this technology in a way that the other OECD countries are not. Not only that, but we get it at bargain rates.

It has, consequently, not been necessary for a long time for Canadian industrialists to invest in their own research, because they can get it easily and cheaply from the United States. This has resulted in relatively little investment by Canadian industry in research because of the lack of necessity for it. Information on innovations can be obtained relatively easily and cheaply from our neighbour to the south. Access to it and the economics of it are not available to industrialists in the United Kingdom, The Netherlands, Germany, France or Japan.

While this has resulted in economies for us and has given us, in investment terms, an advantage over the years, it makes us very vulnerable to the possible drying up of this source of technology for one reason or another. It is the view of the government that we should develop more self-sufficiency and more innovative capacity in our own industry. A number of incentive programs have been provided to that end. That, however, is perhaps not relevant to the question we are dealing with this afternoon, namely, medical research.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made an eloquent plea for more resources for this worthy purpose—a plea which I support in principle: I do not condemn it. I want, and would like to see, as much of it as possible but, as I indicated earlier, there are limits in a difficult year—and this is a restrictive year, in fiscal terms—to the kind of increase and investment that the hon. member is seeking. He did say that one way of reducing health costs is to do something about medical research. With that I cannot entirely agree. I commend him for his support of medical research and more medical research. The suggestion that the way to reduce health costs in Canada is with more medical research is only partly true. If one looks at the record of our expenditures on medical research one will see they have been rising year by year for the past ten years. But rising even faster have been per capita expenditures on health care. One could, in a statistical way, show that the faster our expenditures on medical research grew, the more our responsibilities for health delivery grew.

● (1700)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Drury: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I may tell the minister that I am prepared to stand by that statement as one I would make, but may I ask if he recalls that I read it from the letter which came from Westmount?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I suppose, as the representative of that distinguished constituency I would be ill-advised to suggest that any one of my constituents could ever be wrong. That constituent was very likely quoting something which came from Winnipeg.

The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) indicated—

[Translation]

. . . in his speech that almost all the increase allotted to the National Research Council would go this year into atomic research. It is only fair that there should have been an increase of almost $10 million earmarked for the National Research Council project, namely the TRIUMF accelerator at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver. The hon. member must know that, though this is a meson accelerator in the nuclear field, it will serve mainly in medical research. I attended the inauguration of the very new institute where this accelerator will be used to treat cancer. He describes the additional expenditures to be made this year as being devoted to atomic research. In fact, these will be mostly medical research. To my mind, it must be clearly understood the research is being conducted in the field of health rather than that of destruction or weaponry.

[English]

He also, in a philosophical way, suggested that I told some students and faculty at the University of Ottawa that if a university graduate were unable to secure employment in the subject in which he had been trained, the university had not done its job. I wish to make it clear that my remark really was this: the most useful formation intellectuelle which a university can give any young man or woman is that of adaptability. If all you want to learn is a repetitive skill and to apply it without changing it or yourself, you should go to a vocational training school. You go to university to learn how to take existing knowledge and apply it in new and different ways in new and different situations. That is what I mean by adaptability. If the university has not succeeded in inspiring the graduate or in making him, or her, able to do this, I can only say that a graduate like that has not been able to get out of his university training that for which most people go to university.

Over the years the government has followed a policy of consistent support for medical research. As I said earlier the fact that the medical research budget has increased fourfold in the last ten years indicates that commitment. Hon. members should understand that the budget of the Medical Research Council does not represent the total amount of money spent on medical research in this country. The total funding provided in 1976-77 for medical research is, as I said earlier, in the order of $100 million, of which about 63 per cent consists of the contribution of the federal government alone.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the next hon. member, it is my duty at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Air Canada—Dispute with employees of finance branch in Winnipeg—Government action to settle; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Request for report on alleged break-in of Quebec newspaper office by members of the force; the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise)—Agriculture—Request for embargo on importation of cheese.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—HEALTH RESEARCH FUNDING

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Yewchuk:

That this House views with great alarm the ill-considered and illogical decisions of the government which fail to give adequate priority to health research funding.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I must initially compliment the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for introducing the motion condemning the government's lack of support for medical research in Canada and outlining deficiencies in the government's program for sustaining a viable medical research community.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) back in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have not been away.

Mr. Holmes: I was surprised to hear him say almost in his opening comments that the NDP is as concerned, perhaps more concerned, about medical research as is my party. I suggest that if he reviews Hansard and testimony given before the standing committee he will find that, at least while I have been a member of this House, my party has been most concerned about medical research.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But what about the Tory premiers? How concerned are they?

Mr. Holmes: I noticed that the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) conveniently managed to defuse this afternoon's debate which, basically, has to do with medical research in Canada. He used arguments which have been used in the past. Although he spoke of funds for research being available from provincial sources, federal sources, and private individuals, it is important to remember that today we are debating the federal government's direct responsibility in medical research.

Since my first election in 1972 to the House of Commons the issue of adequate funding for medical research has been a recurrent theme. The biomedical research community has limped from one financial crisis to another. We have seen a reduction in the spending of constant dollars, a termination of programs of excellence, a rejection of projects submitted by highly qualified scientists, the introduction of disincentives which do not entice able young men and women to take up research careers, and a lack of long term fiscal policies to ensure stability and responsible growth in the research community.

If one were to examine all speeches made in this House since I became a member, examine testimony presented before the standing committee, look carefully at the annual reports of the Medical Research Council, assess the great volume of correspondence members have received on this subject, and read the editorials and reports in newspapers on this subject, one point above all would become obvious, that is that the federal government has been and is prepared to sacrifice the medical research community, on the basis of a very feeble excuse that the relatively small amount of money required for its continued viability is not present. We should be very clear in this respect what we are talking about. For example, in this fiscal year we are talking about a sum of money less than the interest incurred by the federal government in terms of the Orion program or the federal funds allocated to Habitat which, I understand, by all criteria has been a failure. Therefore we are talking about relatively small sums of money.

● (1710)

If one compares the moneys required to sustain a constant and steady growth in the research committed vis-à-vis the money committed to a variety of other government programs during my four years in this House of Commons, it must lead one to ask why the continued disinterest by the government in biomedical research. Its propensity for spending in recent years, and I understand there is a projected increase of 16 per cent for this coming year, makes a mockery out of the statement that it cannot find an additional $2 million or $3 million for this present fiscal year.

Why has the government refused to develop a long-term policy to ensure the stability of this very significant component of our health care system? Surely strategy that would ensure the future health of our most important resource, people, should receive the same attention as the government attempt to develop an energy policy, which I remind hon. members for the most part is a non-renewable resource.

The answers to these questions are by no means clear. However, I think it is worth noting that an unprecedented dissection of the health care system has occurred since the introduction of the Hospital and Diagnostic Services Act and medicare. I believe it is the rapidly escalating cost of medical care and not health that has precipitated the debate as to how the health professions function today. I want to emphasize that. It is the escalating cost of medicare and not health which has really precipitated this debate.

The preoccupation with health care costs has produced an endless stream of reports frequently suggesting oversimplistic solutions to solve a very complex problem. Indeed, it has become fashionable in recent years to become an instant expert with ready made solutions. The least that can be said for these well meaning individuals is their uniformity in failing to resolve the shortcomings in the health system with their suggestions.

I do not for a moment under emphasize the importance of escalating health costs, and indeed there is ample evidence to substantiate that the consumer cost of hospital care has risen rapidly and that furthermore, contrary to the impressions created by the government, the costs continue to be unevenly and inequitably distributed.

The reasons for the rising costs are many. Some are understandable, justifiable, and inevitable. In many instances the rising costs of certain kinds of medical care have often been presented in highly misleading ways that do not take into account the changes in the sophistication of services offered. For example, to compare the cost of treatment for a heart attack 15 years ago with what it costs to treat the same illness today in a coronary care unit is like comparing the cost of a Model T Ford and the cost of a Concorde jetliner just because both represent a vehicle of transportation.

The ongoing debate in the search for alternate forms of delivery of health care to ensure the services of the right kind, at the right time, to the right person, has propelled us into the era of consumerism.

I have not sensed major objections to assessing the shortcomings to our health care system and to developing tools for measuring the quality of care rendered both in and out of hospital.

During this period of self-examination and social analysis, which is characteristic of any society or problem plagued by unrest and uncertainty, the government has seen the failure of its social programs to correct internal problems and yet is reticent to admit these failures. Health care has not escaped this examination.

The government, in my view, has not recognized the complexities of the problems, and because the basic issues do not fit into convenient and conventional economic and political pigeonholes they are interpreted as being insoluable, with the predictable consequences of inaction, overreaction, or the introduction of simplistic solutions. Biomedical research has been one of the victims of this mentality.

I believe it is fair to say that during the forties and fifties there was a simplistic belief that unlimited funds put into biomedical research would produce instant understanding of disease entities that would be transferred immediately to the market place and to the consumer. During my post graduate years in Washington, D.C., this Alice in Wonderland attitèude was expressed by the presence of such institutions as the National Institute of Health. Notwithstanding the gains in knowledge and major accomplishments of biomedical research which I will refer to in a moment, this unrealistic attitude which was never fostered by the scientific community at that time or today resulted in unrealistic expectations which have overshadowed monumental accomplishments. I have sensed this attitude is present in the government and has been interpreted by the government as a failure of the research community to resolve complex health problems which, unfortunately, have permeated its thinking with the resultant effect that biomedical research has been designated as a non-priority item.

It should be noted in passing that the government has an unmistakable loss of confidence in the value and effectiveness of science. It touches science in general, and medicine in particular. I was glad that the Minister of State for Science and Technology was here today because we talked about this recently on an opposition day where science in general was the focal point of that particular debate.

The government, in its inability to grasp the complexities of the problem, has sown the seeds of doubt about the capacity of science to solve our health problems. The doubt generated by the government has not unexpectedly generated intense public anxiety, and genuine fears have suddenly been replaced by acupuncture, copper bracelets, transcendental meditation, or astrology.

[Mr. Holmes.]

The question can be logically asked what has transpired in recent years to generate such criticism of our health care system? Why is it fashionable for so many to say there is nothing good in the system? I believe the answer to that question, at least in part, is related to the misunderstanding of technology, and not economics, as suggested by the government.

How many in this Chamber recall when our hospitals were filled with lobar pneumonia, when meningococal meningitis and scarlet fever took their annual toll, when outbreaks of diptheria would plague urban centres, when typhoid fever and erysipilas would cause fear and panic at the mere mention of the word? With the introduction of sulfanamides, penicillin, streptomycin, and other antibiotics a revolution in hospital care evolved, unprecedented in history.

Can you visualize the problems in hospital financing today if all the subsequent changes that have occurred, including hospital insurance, had not been accompanied by the technology to control major infectious diseases? It is important for each of us to recall this bit of history since it has and will repeat itself in the future if we continue to get results to which we are entitled from the biomedical research community.

The point which must be emphasized, and which the government has not grasped, is that the future of hospital economies is clearly bound up with the future of medical science and technology. In this I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Dr. Lewis Thomas, president of the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Centre in New York, and professor of Pathology and Medicine at the Cornell University College of Medicine, has defined three quite different levels of technology in medicine so unlike each other that practitioners of medicine and the analysts of our system will be in trouble if the differences are not understood and kept separate.

● (1720)

First there is the large body of what he termed "non-technology". This is impossible to measure in terms of its capacity to alter either the natural course of disease or its eventual outcome. A great deal of money is spent on this, and it is highly valued by the professionals as well as by the patients. It consists of what is commonly called supportive therapy and includes what physicians must now do for patients with intractable cancer, severe rheumatoid arthritis, multiple sclerosis, strokes, and advanced cirrhosis, to name but a few. The cost of this non-technology is very high and getting higher all the time. It represents the efforts not only of a substantial segment of the health professionals in coping with this kind of problem but obviously represents a substantial segment of the health sector.

The second form of technology defined by Dr. Thomas is termed "half-way technology". This represents the kind of actions which must be taken after the fact to compensate for the incapacitating effects of certain diseases. It is a technology designed to make up for disease or to postpone death. Examples in recent years are transplantations of hearts, kidneys, livers, other organs, and the invention of artificial organs. In the public mind this kind of technology has come to appear as the equivalent of the high technology of the physical sciences.

The media tends to present each new procedure as though it constituted a break-through or a therapeutic triumph, instead of being the make-shift it really is. This type of technology is at times, by its very nature, highly sophisticated. Yet it is still primitive. It is the sort of thing one must do until there is a general understanding of the mechanisms involved in disease. Such technology, embracing as it does the development of costly apparatus to manage heart attacks, specialized ambulances, distinct hospital units, and electronic gadgetry is characterized by the necessity of investing enormous sums of money in hospitals, hospital facilities, and highly trained people. This portion of medicine will be with us in the future and our only hope of removing this level of technology lies in the new information which can be obtained through research.

The third kind of technology which is described by Dr. Thomas is the kind which is so effective that it seems to attract the least public notice; it is the kind which is taken for granted. I referred previously to the revolution in hospital care which came about with the introduction of antibiotics and modern methods of immunization against diphtheria, whooping cough, and childhood virus diseases. Our capability in dealing with tuberculosis and syphilis was a major medical triumph despite the fact that, in my view, full use has never been made of this potential. The treatment of endocrinologic disorders with appropriate hormones following basic research in immunology in Liverpool, England, is now virtually wiping out hemalytic disease of the new-born which occurs in Rh-negative mothers. There are other examples, but the truth is there are not as many as the public has been led to believe.

The point to emphasize about this kind of technology, one which implies a genuine understanding of disease mechanisms, is that when it becomes available it is relatively inexpensive, relatively simple, and relatively easy to deliver.

I refer to the influence that the discovery of antibiotics had on medical care. If a case of typhoid fever had to be managed today by the best methods of the mid-thirties, the expense would be staggering. Counting about 56 days of hospitalization during which demanding standards of nursing care would be required, careful dietary consideration, constant laboratory monitoring, and surgical intervention in certain circumstances, a conservative estimate of the cost of the illness would be around $10,000 in today's terms. The cost today would be a bottle of cloramphenical and a day or two of fever.

Mr. Philbrook: Would the hon. member accept a question? Would he acknowledge that many of the discoveries he has mentioned, particularly in the field of antibiotics, were the result of accidents such as in the celebrated case of Dr. Fleming's discovery of penicillin? Or would he not agree they were discoveries in the private sector, particularly within the pharmaceutical industry, rather than the results of long-term and expensive research at the universities?

Mr. Holmes: The question is only partly pertinent. I was attempting to make the point that biomedical research, whether in the universities or in the private sector, has been responsible for the major break-throughs we have seen.

The hon. member for Athabasca referred earlier to the statement by Dr. Fudenberg before a sub-committee in the United States about a year ago. This statement gave evidence of other areas in which large savings had been made as a result of discovery in the course of research into immunology. The point I wish to emphasize is that it is the responsibility of the federal government to ensure that this basic research is carried on in an acceptable fashion.

I want to say a word now about target research, or applied research. Although there is general agreement that applied research should be encouraged in certain key areas I believe it would be an error to do this at the expense of basic research or by restricting the freedom of our scientists. If freedom is severely curtailed, scientists will lose their enthusiasm and become less productive or, more tragic still, move to a country where greater freedom exists.

Traditionally the major function of a university is to teach and generate new knowledge through research. In my opinion it would be tragic if research priorities were established by government, as suggested in the Speech from the Throne and subsequent statements by the former minister responsible for science and technology, thereby placing the major burden of applied research on the universities. I do not suggest that applied research cannot be structured into such institutes, and indeed there are examples of successful endeavours in this respect. However, it should be noted that universities are involved in important tasks in connection with higher education and the development of new knowledge. In existing circumstances it seems unreasonable to ask the universities to maintain high standards of performance while accepting new responsibilities for government-directed research.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member may continue?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Holmes: I thank the House for permitting me a few more moments in which to speak. I shall try to summarize. I only wish I had more time to give a detailed account of the many problems which are presently facing the research community. However, it is my personal belief that future action in the medical research community is really predicated upon an understanding of the basic importance and the problems of medical research. I hope that in the very brief time that I have taken this afternoon I have persuaded the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the government of the importance of this particular sector of technology, and I have attempted to define technology as I see it and as viewed by many. I hope the government will develop a long-term policy to restore confidence to this important segment of our health care system.

● (1730)

I should like to conclude by quoting an article entitled "The Technology of Medicine" by Dr. Lewis Thomas which appeared in the New England Journal of Medicine in 1971. He concluded the article with the following observation:

It is when physicians are bogged down by their incomplete technologies, by the innumerable things they are obliged to do in medicine, when they lack a clear understanding of disease mechanisms, that the deficiencies of the health care system are most conspicuous. If I were a policy maker interested in saving money for health care over the long haul, I would regard it as an act of high prudence to give high priority to a lot more basic research in biologic science. This is the only way to get the full mileage that biology owes to the science of medicine, even though it seems, as used to be said in the days when the phase still had some meaning, like asking for the moon.

One can only hope that the minister, who has been present today, and the government will grasp the implications of this very famous physician's observations.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we are faced today with a motion of the opposition which describes very well, in my mind, how the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk) sees his role as a parliamentarian either in this House or in standing committees. I could elaborate further in a moment if the hon. member wants to be patient.

I would like to say, however, that I am not against medical research nor am I opposed to basic medical research financing in Canada. First of all, I would like to mention that I have enough scars on my whole body to say how much I appreciate the advancement of sciences which have enabled me to recover my health.

It is however obvious for anyone who has read the text of this motion put forward today that it is filled with partisan views, that it is basically negative and reflects failure of its sponsor to propose valuable and responsible solutions and to advocate some kind of alternatives.

And how easy it is with a subject like this one which receives the support of the majority of Canadians, I am not afraid to say so, how easy it is to indulge in demagogy! Obviously, any objective individual who has followed the development of medical research funding in recent years will admit with me that the achievements of this government are certainly not as described by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) or his colleagues.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), through his positive attitude, his availability, his flexibility, his wish to engage in a dialogue that will lead to new cooperation avenues does much more for Canada, for the welfare of Canadians, for medical research than the individuals who see only the bad side of the situation and live in isolation without any regard for other sectors of the Canadian economy.

I referred a moment ago to the open-mindedness of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and to his will to cooperate. As evidence I wish to quote some of his remarks made before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on May 18. This is what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) said:

With regard to medical research, once more—and I have said so—I felt that the increase was inadequate. Even with the additional $2 million—

[Mr. Holmes.]

And here the minister refers to the announcement made the same night about the $2 million increase in the medical research budget which he took from elsewhere in his department. I think it is satisfying evidence of his good will and his good intentions. I continue the quotation and it is still the minister who is speaking:

—I am not boasting that we are really rushing ahead and putting money into medical research. It is just going to allow medical research to keep up, roughly with where it was last November. It is nothing to boast of, in the sense, as I said, that we are just a country being over generous.

So, Mr. Speaker, the minister is frank and sincere beyond reproach.

I go on reading his comments, and I draw here the attention of the author of today's motion to the following passage, hoping he will see in it not illogical and irresponsible decisions, as he says, but a sense of organisation and planning. I quote:

But, once more, you have to look at it in a longer perspective than that of one or two years. You have to realize that over the last decade we have put a relatively high priority on the total funding of medical research.

And to support what the minister was saying in 1966-67, the budget of the Medical Research Coucil was $12,350,000 and for the current fiscal year, it has been increased to $50 million, Mr. Speaker.

I think what we should be looking at over the next few years, and what I am most concerned about in medical research, is those fluctuations, those cycles in medical research. I think this is most unfortunate. One year you get an 18-per cent increase, the next year you get 2 per cent. As you yourself, or as some of your colleagues, have said . . .

. . . he was speaking to a member of the committee, Dr. Halliday . . .

You cannot just turn it on and off as if it were a water tap. What we are trying to develop is a kind of formula or criterion, by which research . . . particularly medical research . . . will be able to count on some reasonably steady rate of growth in its expenditures.

● (1740)

I have argued with some people saying, even if we were to say 5 per cent a year or 3 per cent a year, at least we would know what to expect, and the researchers would know what to expect. Those who found it not good enough would leave, abandon, or do something else, but at least there would be some direction. I hope it will be higher than that, and that it will be related to some other criterion.

I think one of the big problems we are facing in medical research, and research generally, is the establishment of some criterion upon which researchers will be able to plan on the basis of a longer term than in the past, and I hope we will be able to arrive at that this year.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for quoting in full such a lengthy extract from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, but I think it was important today, in the absence of the minister, to record his views so that Canadians will know exactly that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a righteous and honest man devoted to the welfare of all Canadians.

What I find most encouraging, Mr. Speaker, in this whole matter, is the will to co-operate that we seem to have suddenly discovered. On the one hand, we have the medical research community which says it needs more money for the current fiscal year, to which the minister replied by a $2 million increase, and on the other hand, federal restraints are now being felt in every field. It will be remembered that on December 18 last, the President of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Jean Chrétien announced the action taken by the government under its anti-inflation program.

The Medical Research Council was not the only one affected by this action, but the fact remains that at that time, the President of the Treasury Board, while admitting the restraints, still allowed a budgetary increase of $1 million, plus $414,000 which were transfered to the Department of National Health and Welfare from the Department of Veterans Affairs, and this was in addition to the $2 million announced last month. This is therefore a rather large increase when we know that other departments were not as lucky.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk) wants to put a question to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin).

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to go on with my remarks and I shall be glad to listen to the hon. member for Athabaska at the end of my speech, if time allows, because I am aware that it is a favourite tactic of opposition members to interrupt other members during their speeches, and I am against it.

It is interesting to note, still in the minutes of proceedings and in reply to an inquiry from the hon. member for Athabasca himself, that the president of the Canadian Society for Clinical Investigation, Dr. John H. Dirks, said the following:

> On the long term, I mentioned some of the issues in terms of maintaining stability, including consideration and careful monitoring of the costs of research which is being done now, including setting new directions by the MRC in terms of new programs or changing their programs in terms of looking at the schools that have special needs that need to be developed. I think these are some of the categories to look into. We have proposed to the minister that perhaps a meeting of interested people in government, political parties—

I have some doubts about this—> —,scientists, and MRC be held to discuss in greater detail the issue of long-term funding. I hope that will come to fruition.

In fact, we all know now that these meetings have started and that they will go on during the summer, which is to the credit of all people of good will who do not simply criticize, as the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk) usually does, but who unceasingly and conscientiously work at a very complex problem in a society which is always asking and demanding more from its governments.

As far as catching up is concerned, and particularly in the field of medical research, it is suggested that a per capita contribution similar to that in the United States or Western Germany would be a good thing for Canada. This is maybe a commendable aim but it is a bit too simplistic. As I said in the beginning, this is like living in isolation. Even if we admit this relative progress by those countries, it remains that they have some catching up to do with our policies here in Canada and with our financial support for social programs such as medicare, hospital insurance and the many social programs which I will not enumerate here but which are all familiar to us and which excite the envy of many other countries, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said today during question period.

I shall not drag on refuting more than necessary today's motion. Several colleagues want to take the floor and they are perfectly able to come to grips with that question but I am obliged to recognize that, on top of being essentially negative, the motion is pessimistic and it does not take into account all that has been done for some time to promote a dialogue between the scientific community, the government, the Medical Research Council and—why not—the politicians in senior positions.

I shall end by quoting, as I have done during my remarks, the minutes of proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I have to quote myself to put the question in its true context. During the Friday May 28 meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, where Dr. J. Gordon Kaplan, President of the Canadian Federation of Biological Studies was one of the witnesses, I asked the following question:

> Is it not true that we have reached this critical threshold of readiness of mind and of practical and open dialogue?

Dr. Kaplan answered:

> It is true that the dialogues have started. I must add that it already existed between the hon. Health Minister and the medical research community of Canada.
>
> For the past two or three years, his door has always been open to us and we have been able to talk frankly with him, although you know what consequences this may have: unfortunately, an open dialogue does not guarantee that medical researchers will have enough funds. Nevertheless, I agree with your optimism and we hope that this true dialogue will lead to the development of a long-term policy on medical research subsidization.

And why put all the burden on the government, Mr. Speaker? It seems to me that the medical community has, too, the responsibility and duty to plan its own research, to establish its own priorities and not to rely always on the government.

It is obvious, from the statements I quoted today, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the medical research community, including the Medical Research Council, are much more optimistic than the hon. member for Athabasca and his party as regards the future. That is why I cannot support this motion. I feel the remarks of the hon. member for Athabasca add nothing of substance to the debate, and that the minister has already taken into account all the representations made in committee of the House. An attempt was made to politicize a problem which, to my mind, is now in the process of being solved.

The doctors and medical researchers lobby is possibly the best organized and among the most powerful in the land; to my mind, it was not necessary to draw the attention of the House to this matter today. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I come from an underdeveloped area of the country, which is often badly developed. I should have thought that on the Progressive Conservative side the hon. members would have preferred taking up the matter of regional disparities, of equal opportunities, instead of rehashing the same old arguments in a lobby that it is quite capable of taking care of its own needs, which indeed it has proved very ably.

[English]

I just cannot be turned on by today's motion and the plea for more medical research funds in the way the motion is worded. After listening to all opposition spokesmen I am more than ever convinced that the object of today's debate was to try to score political points against the government, and not so much a concern for the benefit of the medical research community in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbin: That is not to say, and I would like to repeat, that I am against medical research. I am for medical research for the same reason I am for motherhood, for fatherhood, or the sacred cows of India, or democracy. The real question is whether or not the government is administering the public moneys in a responsible and balanced way. I believe it is. The question really is a matter of balance, balance of job creation, equal opportunity throughout all areas of the country and a happy life, and balanced growth in all departmental expenditures.

● (1750)

In conclusion may I say I am surprised that such a motion would come forward today from the hon. member for Athabasca after the poor show we went through on Friday a week ago when this House had referred back to it from the standing committee a bill to control smoking in public transit facilities. The committee spent something like six full meetings debating the question. In the course of those meetings it was proven that smoking is obnoxious to non-smokers. Money was spent on interpreters, on printers, and on other salaries in respect of the committee. The committee referred the bill back to this House in a modified form. Who opposed the measure to improve the health of Canadians? None other than the hon. member for Athabasca, and that is a bloody shame!

Mr. Yewchuk: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has just terminated his speech with what comes closest to the unusable term. He told an untruth at the conclusion of his speech. If he had bothered to listen to or read what I said in the committee or in the House when that bill came back, he would know that I supported the bill all the way. He should withdraw that falsehood. It is unacceptable. The bill was spoken to by five members, including members from the other side, during that hour of debate, and they must take just as much blame as we do for the bill not having passed at that time. I think the hon. member should withdraw that falsehood.

Mr. Corbin: I will be fair with the member from Athabasca. It is quite possible he did not understand the way I put the question. He may not have been opposed to the legislation, but he certainly organized the blocking of the passage of that legislation in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the point of privilege raised by the hon. member was well taken. Perhaps I might be permitted to mention to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) that he should not inpute motives. He is not entitled to impute motives over and above stating the facts. I would hope the question would be resolved in good understanding. Perhaps the hon. member would qualify his statement again.

[Mr. Corbin.]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, with all the respect I usually direct to the Chair I certainly will abide by your recommendation in respect of my clarifying the statement I just made. I will withdraw what the hon. member for Athabasca has asked me to withdraw, which is the statement that he opposed the legislation, but I will say that he blocked the passage of that bill.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I would have to draw to the attention of the hon. member who has just spoken that it is patently obvious that he has failed to read the debates dealing with the anti-smoking bill. Otherwise he would realize that what he has stated with regard to the hon. member for Athabasca has absolutely no truth in fact.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member does not want to bring the Chair into the debate which took place in the committee. I think the question is resolved at this time, and that I should recognize the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday).

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it would be the wish that I call it six o'clock to allow the government member time to cool down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock as suggested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 5.58 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, before we recessed for dinner tonight we heard the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) launch into what might be called a tirade not on the subject of our debate today but rather on the matter of the provision of separate accommodation for smoking in public conveyances. Therefore I think it might be apropos to review what the motion before the House today is. It reads as follows:

That this House views with great alarm the ill-considered and illogical decisions of the government which fail to give adequate priority to health research funding.

We are talking about research, Mr. Speaker, not about a bill which was before the House some time ago.

I want to approach the subject for debate today from two or three aspects that are somewhat unnconventional and different from what we have heard of late. First, I want to allude briefly to some of the peculiar attitudes of the government toward research. Second, I would like to touch on some of the philosophies behind health care research which do not seem to be understood by the government. Third, I want to speak about aspects of medical research to which adequate consideration has not been given by the speakers from whom we have heard so far in this debate in the House or in the committee, namely, research into the practice of family medicine, a very important part of the health care delivery system in Canada.

First of all I should like to get rid of some rather unpleasant comments which I feel I must make about the govenment's approach to the subject of medical research in the last year or so. It was disappointing to me when it was brought to my attention by some people from the research community who were on Parliament Hill in the last month or two that they received a very discourteous and unfriendly reception from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) when they visited him in his office not long ago. That does not get any marks for the government or for the whole principle of medical research.

The second point which concerns me has been alluded to by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) when he led off very capably for the official opposition, and that is that there has been an obvious lack of attendance by some important members of the government who should be here. I am the first to admit that reasons were given why the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his parliamentary secretary could not be here, and I accept them. I presume the same is the case for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien). However, it is gratifying to see here tonight the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) because he, like the Minister of Science and Technology (Mr. Drury), comes from a community in Canada where there is much interest in medical research. I am surprised that those two ministers have not been able to come up with a more effective program for the provision of research funds in view of the local interest which exists in their communities.

There is a third matter that concerns me regarding actions of the government. It relates to what has gone on in the Department of National Health and Welfare in the past and up to the present. I want to raise one particular instance and I hope I will not offend anyone. It has been brought to my attention that Dr. Jack Wiggin, who was employed in the Department of National Health and Welfare as head of the health research grant program until about the end of 1975, had a very difficult time as head of that branch. His role was to assess and rule on grant applications which came before the department. As most hon. members know, these grants are scrutinized by at least three separate committees. One was a committee of the department itself, another was a committee of outside experts, and there was a third committee, all of which could offer opinions on grant applications.

● (2010)

There is one glaring example of where an application was made for a grant, was approved by all three committees, and it had to be vetoed by a man higher in the department than the director of the branch itself. That was so deplorable that the committee threatened to resign and the chairman of this branch has since resigned. That is the kind of department that tries to run the program of research grants in this country, and it is disappointing to learn of it.

Recently a well known medical educator in this country told me how disappointed he was with the status of the staff in the Department of National Health and Welfare. He said it has gradually gone down hill in the last five or six years and that he could count on one hand five competent people in the department now as compared to the situation some years ago.

Dealing with the attitude of the government, there is one other area to which I should like to allude and which has been discussed in some detail by other members. It concerns the spending attitude of the government as it relates to medical research. I can summarize this whole thing rather succinctly in a quotation from an article by Dr. Daniel H. Osmond, Associate Professor in the Departments of Physiology and Medicine at the University of Toronto. I will quote from the article which appeared in the spring edition of The Graduate, a publication of the University of Toronto. He was referring to the feelings of research workers after the announcement last December of the freeze on research grants. The article was headed "Sickness in Canada's Health System" and he wrote:

> This much was clear: the financial noose was firmly in place. Inflation would steadily complete the strangulation.

That is the attitude and feeling of research people across the country toward the government's conduct of medical research.

While discussing the peculiar attitude of the government I should like to touch on something to ward off an obvious argument the government has brought forth in committee on many occasions about recommendations from the official opposition to the effect that there should be an increase in spending in certain areas. We are always told that we cannot have it both ways.

I was very interested to read an article not too long ago in a magazine called Farm and Country, which is circulated to 86,000 farmers across Canada. It is a lay organization as far as medical research is concerned and as far as the costs of health care are concerned. The government tries to tell us that we must follow a policy of restraint and that the only way to do it is its way. But, Mr. Speaker, there are other ways of looking at it. I have been upset when this point has been brought up with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and he has just replied that we are not going to have any deterrents, as though there is something bad about the word. I do not like the word myself, but he is using it in the wrong sense. When we use it on this side of the House we mean to stop the over-use and abuse of the health care system. If the minister would look at it that way he could find ways to save the extra money that the research people need.

The editorial in Farm and Country of May 25, 1976, dealt with the closing of the hospital in Chesley. It is a layman speaking on behalf of farm and country people. It reads:

> It gives us little satisfaction to note that five years ago we predicted that neither Ontario nor Canada could afford a lavish health system. At that time we pointed out that comprehensive medicare was bankrupting Britain, and the same would happen in Canada. Politicians of all parties, who fostered the something-for-nothing attitude among the electorate, must share the blame for the present crisis.

Apart from that perhaps negative approach to the problem, the editorial advanced three rather constructive suggestions which I would recommend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. One comes from the chairman of the Chesley and District Memorial Hospital board who suggests a fee of $4 per day for people using the hospital.

Another suggestion comes from one of the board members of the same hospital who thinks that patients, who are able to, could pay $100 per year for their health care bill. This, if applied nationally, would save hundreds of millions of dollars which could be applied to medical research. He also suggested—and he is talking about OHIP because he happens to be in Ontario but this would apply to any government-sponsored health care plan—that in the area of cost cutting there could be a new approach to billing OHIP. He says that when patients visit a physician's office they never see the amount the government run service is charged for the consultation or treatment.

I can suggest a fourth way in which the minister could save money for medical research. The patients could pay the physician directly and then collect the money from the appropriate source, be it the government or a private plan. The government could save money in many areas but it pretends the only way it can do it is by cutting back on the funds available for medical research.

Going on to deal with some of the problems of the philosophy of the government in regard to medical research, I should like to read a quotation from the magazine I referred to earlier, The Graduate. The article entitled "Sickness in Canada's Health System" by Dr. Osmond reads as follows:

"For the first time in 20 years," says one head of a medical science department in Toronto, "I would advise graduate students to leave Canada."

There is a problem in medical research funding no matter what the Minister of State for Science and Technology says, or what the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria says, or how they try to juggle the figures to prove it is not so. It is obvious there is a problem, and the system is being down-graded because of lack of funds.

Another area which is certainly very important and is often not recognized as being a problem is that the Minister of State for Science and Technology does not understand what medical research and health care are all about. To go back to the article I just quoted from, it reports Dr. Malcolm Brown, President of the Medical Research Council, an agency of the Department of National Health and Welfare, as saying:

The effect of research on the quality of teaching and on patient care is evident in the ways in which patients seek out teaching hospitals for treatment. The evidence supports the view that there is a positive relation between the amount of research, the quality of teaching, and the amount learned.

The Department of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of State for Science and Technology do not seem to appreciate the fact that there is a close connection between research, teaching medicine, and the quality of health care, and that any restraint in expenditures in these areas is going to affect adversely medical teaching and thus the quality of care which Canadians receive.

I should like now to discuss two areas which come under the heading of the concepts or philosophies of research and health care. There must be a distinction between research and development. We hear a lot about "R & D" which is carried out by many government departments at the present time. Of course research is something entirely different from development. Research is something you spend money on without knowing exactly where you are going and what the results will be. Development is where you spend money on a program that you know is going to achieve a certain result. Unfortunately our government does not appreciate the distinction between the areas of research and development. Because of the long term implications it seems unwilling to spend money on research. It would rather spend money in the area of development.

[Mr. Halliday.]

● (2020)

We must also consider the problem of in-house research, a new term which connotes the concept that research should be carried on by people in the Department of National Health and Welfare. The researchers who have been on Parliament Hill during the last few weeks have brought to our attention a deplorable situation. Apparently in the most recent spending estimates there is to be a 16 per cent increase in moneys allotted for "in-house" spending. That represents a considerable sum.

While on this topic may I quote from page 94 of report No. 22 of the Science Council of Canada, entitled "Science for Health Services", dated October, 1974. A note of dissent was sounded by M. Bonneau, a well-known health care worker and educator in Quebec. Speaking about in-house research he said, as the report notes on page 94:

. . . Judgments on the scientific quality of the researcher and his project can be made only by experienced people, capable of understanding the objective and evaluating the correlation between the means and the end.

. . . Any structure for the encouragement and co-ordination of research efforts must be removed as fast as possible from the administrative and political area.

I submit that we should curtail in-house medical research and allow experts in the field to conduct such research.

I am concerned about the government's lack of consistency in medical research spending. In this regard I wish to quote Pavlov. As hon. members know, Pavlov left the world a legacy in the field of the conditioned reflex. In a message to youth he said:

What would I wish for the young people of my motherland who dedicated themselves to science? First of all—consistency . . . Consistency, consistency and again consistency . . . Inculcate in yourself the habit of strict consistency in acquiring knowledge . . . Restraint and patience . . . Modesty . . . Do not let pride take possession of you . . . Be passionate in your work and in your quests.

I suggest that the medical researchers of this country have been patient, have been consistent and, above all, have been passionate in their work. They passionately plead for more money for medical research.

In my remaining few minutes I wish to touch on the important subject of research related to the practice of family medicine. I have some experience in this area. In Canada health care in the majority of cases for the majority of people is delivered by the family physician. It is about time we spent more on research relating to the practice of family medicine. The previously alluded to report of the Science Council of Canada touches on this subject at page 82. Under the heading "Adequacy of Funding", we read the following:

The R & D on health care delivery ... is less than half the above amount.

The author is referring to the fact, alluded to in the previous sentence, that Canada spends 1 per cent of the costs of health care on R & D in health services. I continue quoting:

Such a low level is inconsistent with sound industrial practice. An increase in the small outlay on health care R & D is obviously needed to improve the value obtained from the much larger outlay (over 200 times) on health care itself.

The report lists a number of government departments and various other agencies which spend money on R & D. The Department on National Health and Welfare ranks ninth on that list.

The report goes on to say:

It is not an impressive illustration of the relative importance currently being attached to health care R & D. This would be of little significance if the needs for new knowledge in this field were reasonably well satisfied. However, the preceding pages should have shown that the extent of the outstanding need for knowledge is such that it will have little chance of being met without a major increase in funding.

The foregoing illustrates why we should spend much more on medical research and on research in family medicine. We could examine many areas of family practice. Time does not permit me to deal with them. I will do this on another occasion when I can put facts in more detail before the House.

May I now draw to the attention of the House some comments made by Dr. Donald I. Rice, executive director of the College of Family Physicians of Canada, at the national conference on research in family practice held in Miami, Florida, in January, 1975. He said in part:

The appropriate funding of family practice research is a must if we are to encourage an adequate number of researchers to become involved in research activity. Research costs money as well as time, and we must do what we can to find the necessary funds to support legitimate investigations in family practice. Here the practising family doctor interested in research is at a distinct disadvantage vis-à-vis his confrere with an academic appointment.

He went on to say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to inform his that his allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Halliday: I thank hon. members for their indulgence. I shall speak only a few more sentences. Dr. Rice went on to say:

Major funding bodies must accept that family practice research will play an increasingly important part in determining the future direction of health care in our respective countries, and they must be encouraged to invest the necessary research money to ensure that adequate numbers of family physician researchers are being trained, and that appropriate investigations are being carried out.

Finally, I cannot do better than quote Hippocrates, known as the father of modern medicine. He said, in about 400 BC:

Other discoveries will yet be found out, if a person possessed of the proper ability, and knowing those discoveries which have been made, should proceed from them—to prosecute his own investigations.

Medical Research

Following the words of Hippocrates, Canadian researchers will be unable to prosecute their investigations unless the government reconsiders the provision of medical research funding.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, for the second time in two years I participate in debate on this subject. I think the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) told the House he has participated in similar debates three times. I hope that we shall not participate in any more such debates for some time, considering how this debate has been carried on. I cannot help but agree with the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) that this debate has been disappointing, to say the least.

Mr. Brisco: What has been disappointing?

Mr. Philbrook: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is not here; his parliamentary secretary is not here, and the Conservative spokesman, the hon. member for Athabasca, could not be here himself this afternoon. Worse than that, throughout the afternoon attendance in this House was poor.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I point out that I was here all this afternoon, except for one hour when I went out to attend my daughter's graduation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Apologize. Withdraw.

Mr. Philbrook: According to my recollection, there was, generally, poor attendance this afternoon on the part of members of the official opposition party. Sometimes fewer than five were present.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Fewer than five!

Mr. Philbrook: The same goes for the other opposition party, the NDP.

Mr. Brisco: If that is a demonstration on your debating skill, you can quit now.

Mr. Philbrook: At one time the hon. member for Athabasca spoke of heart attacks. As he said, we do not want any member of this House to have a heart attack. You know, we could translate the work of researchers into concrete results if we work at it. For example, the pamphlet put out at the initiative of the Minister of National Health and Welfare having to do with a new perspective on the health of Canadians deals with physical fitness and how physical fitness can prevent heart attacks. I wonder how many of the hon. member's colleagues have lately used our gym facilities to improve their own physical fitness. It is not just research that is important. It is using the results of research as well.

● (2030)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Philbrook: I ask the opposition to accord our speakers the same kind of respect and silence that we accorded their speakers.

Getting back to the subject for this opposition day, I will not comment on the statement by my good friend and medical colleague, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), because I have a great deal of respect for him. With regard to some of the remarks he made tonight all I will say is that I thought he knew better.

The subject of this opposition day is criticism. Why not? There is criticism all around us these days. It is an era of criticism. Everybody criticizes everybody for everything. In this particular case there is criticism with regard to federal government funding of the Medical Research Council, that it has not been sufficient to meet the growing demand of the medical science community. Often there are demands from people in an ivory tower who think that because they are in splendid isolation they are entitled to the taxpayer's dollar without supervision. In fact since 1973 the real value of government allocations to the MRC has declined in terms of 1966 constant dollars. Why not? Many other things have too, the stock market, for example.

This trend had been exacerbated further by the freeze announced on December 18, 1975, keeping this year's contribution at the same level as last year, $48.8 million. Therefore the MRC budget for 1976 is identical in real terms to that of 1969. Even with the additional $2 million provided as of May 18, 1976, it is still felt that another $4.6 million is needed for the council to meet this objective for this year. That is fair enough coming from the medical research community, and I think we all accept that.

Let us look at the reasons behind that. Federal funding has fluctuated so strongly over the past several years that it is impossible for MRC to establish a long-term strategy in the provision of research grants. That is a fair criticism and worth examining. On the other hand, however, many other things have the same difficulty in these times of inflation and recession.

A word about the nature of medical research in Canada. Unlike most other advanced western nations, notably the U.S., Britain, and France, Canada does not have any medical equivalent of a central research organization which has its own research facilities. Unlike many countries, as well, such as the U.S. and Switzerland, Canadian industry does not engage in as comprehensive medical and pharmaceutical research. Therefore most medical research here is carried out in the universities, and these are highly dependent upon outside funding, particularly from the government. It is the responsibility of the MRC then to ensure that the government subsidies are distributed to gain the maximum yield in furthering medical knowledge. That is a sacred trust to the public. As such it is purely an administrative structure.

With respect to the attitude of the scientific community toward the MRC, the medical research community is unanimous in its approval of the purpose and function of the MRC. It is also largely content with the manner in which the MRC has distributed the funds it is given. The main area of complaint remains the amount provided to the MRC for distribution.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

With respect to the attitude of the medical research community toward government restraint, medical researchers are sympathetic toward the government's desire to bring the economy under control, as are all Canadians. They feel, however, that much less than being contributors to economic disorder they are victims of inflation. They feel that medical research should receive the same increases that government departments and government-conducted research facilities received last year, which averaged 16 per cent, as opposed to the MRC's budget increase of 2.9 per cent.

With regard to the funding of medical research in Canada, I wish to deal with the breakdown and perspective. From 1959 to 1963, under the Tories, federal funds provided to MRC went from $2,008,000 to $4,300,000. By 1967, under the Liberals, this figure had reached $12.3 million. From 1967 to 1976-77 federal support has more than quadrupled to $50,848,000. Over the long run, therefore, the Liberal government has demonstrated clearly its support of medical research. I emphasize over the long run.

An hon. Member: What about the United States?

Mr. Philbrook: We will get to that. You like to compare us to the United States when it is in your favour, but when it does not make your point you are pretty quiet about it.

It must be kept in mind, as well, that government support of medical research does not stop with the MRC. For 1976-77 the MRC allocation of $50 million comprises only 79 per cent of all federal government support of medical research in Canada and only about 50 per cent of the over-all amount spent in this area.

For example, the MRC contributed $50,848,000, and all other government department programs $12,804,000, with a total federal expenditure for 1976-77 of $63,652,000.

The other main sources of funds for 1976-77 are contributions from provincial agencies, $12,600,000; contributions from major voluntary agencies, $19,997,000; contributions from other voluntary agencies and foundations, mainly foreign, $1,500,000. Over-all, these contributions add up to a total of $100,749,000 to be spend on medical research in Canada for this fiscal year; not bad for a small, young country.

I wish to say a word about participation of the voluntary sector. Over the past ten years contributions from the voluntary sector have kept pace with the growth of the MRC budget, quadrupling from $5 million to about $20 million. This growth in participation has been attributed to gradual improvement in the medical research community's ability to publicize its cause, as well as better organization in efforts of the contributing organizations themselves. Aid from the voluntary sector is quite uneven, however, with some groups increasing their contributions substantially, others remaining constant, and yet others decreasing their financial support.

With respect to private industry, apparently the MRC has never made direct representations for support of medical research. Personally I think that is unfortunate. I have had experience, as perhaps other members have, in this area. It is an area which is very important in many other countries. I mentioned before, the United States and Switzerland. It is an area where Canada has not even begun to scratch the surface. There is a great deal of potential there in spite of the fact that most of our private industry is foreign owned and controlled. A lot of people think that is perhaps an inhibiting factor to the private sector. I believe a great deal more can be done.

I also wish to say a word about government explanation of medical research funding cutbacks. The government is aware that many worth-while projects have suffered as a result of its cutbacks in this field, but it is felt that no area of government spending can be fully exempted from the government's current austerity program designed to overcome the most pressing immediate problem, namely, inflation. It is wrong to look only at the last two or three years and assume this represents a typical pattern in the government's attitude toward medical research. Combating inflation, hopefully, will not be a permanent preoccupation for the government. I think if we honestly look we will see some significant early results in the battle against inflation, in fact in all of the industrialized countries in the western part of world, as recently reported by the OECD.

● (2040)

It is acknowledged by the government that contributions to medical research are inadequate at the present time. Certainly they are more inadequate than we would like them to be. But this inadequate funding is seen as such only in contrast to a previous decade of reasonably generous support. Regarding the need for stability in funding from one year to the next, this too is acknowledged by the minister to be a serious problem. What is lacking is a workable formula or set of criteria whereby an appropriate growth rate can be determined for funding. The minister for science referred to that today and I believe the matter is being seriously considered.

There are a number of arguments which might be put forward in defence of the current level of government funding of research. For example, how is one to determine what is the optimum level of federal funding? This is a problem in all areas of federal funding. There is no easy answer. It has to be arbitrary. Is all research good? Is all research valuable and worth while, particularly when it is done with the taxpayers' money? Hopefully the situation will change, but in this area there is resistance, there is unfamiliarity with business management, with cost accounting, with the setting of strict objectives, particularly in the basic research area, and our changing times demand a more cost-efficient approach.

Even if certain research is deemed imperative, must it be expensive? Yes, a great deal of it must be expensive, but must it all be expensive, or as expensive as it is? After all, the greatest medical discovery, that for which this country is famous around the world, was the discovery of insulin, and this was done on an extremely low budget, using very simple means.

The opposition talks at times about return on investment. The official opposition critic referred to a number of discoveries in respect to which there has been good return on the money spent. That is true in those cases. But the information he gave us is a bit loaded. He was speaking only about the research which has worked; the examples given did not reflect the cost of all the research which is carried out.

Medical Research

The government must weigh demands from many different sectors in society. Every one of them has a legitimate claim for more funds. As we all say these days, everybody wants decreased government spending but nobody wants particular cuts. Where would the critics have us make these cuts, in transport? In a country like this? In regional expansion? In social welfare? In development of culture, in communications—

Mr. Stevens: We showed you where you could save a billion.

Mr. Philbrook: —in native and northern development, in health and sports? In business and economics, where a great deal of money goes? In foreign aid, perhaps? Would they have us make cuts there? It is easy to say these things when you are not in government, when you are the critics. Particularly during times such as these, when the government must lead efforts in restraint to bring the economy back in line, the administration can expect to be subject to particularly strong pressure from all sectors attempting to avoid the squeeze. This kind of austerity should provide needed pressure on the researchers themselves to encourage maximum efficiency and rationalization in their operations. There is no question about that.

In prosperous times everyone grows a bit fat—the universities are no exception and the research laboratories are no exception either. The university organizations themselves have been concerned about this. They have set up studies to encourage rationalization, to increase efficiency, to prevent duplication. In industry when we were approached for funds, when we were approached to buy expensive equipment for university departments, we often found that the equipment requested was already there in another department, next door. It was simply duplication. Yet the two researchers had not talked to each other about it, had not co-ordinated their requests. This would have been money down the drain had somebody not been careful.

Times such as this should as well provide an added opportunity for researchers and private industry to get together to their mutual benefit. The greatest potential for increasing funds for medical research lies in one heretofore untapped reserve—and I referred to this a little earlier, Mr. Speaker—a process of working together involving private industry, government, and universities. It is well done in many countries, by countries such as our great neighbour, the United States, by many European countries, particularly Switzerland. There seems to be some disinclination in this country for these sectors to work together. In the meantime the work is not getting done or, if it is getting done, it is being achieved in a more expensive way.

I would like to quote from a committee report of May 18, 1976, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare was addressing the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. He said:

> I am advised by Dr. Bois that the MRC itself has not made representations to private industry about contributions to medical research.

That would be my impression as well. I think the situation is the same with the universities and private industry—a certain aloofness which is a little hard to define and hard to explain.

As I said before, various members of this House have had some direct experience with medical research, some of us in private industry, and we found that in great contrast to other countries the co-ordinated effort simply is not there. Private industry does possess considerable resources and it is my experience that if the effort were shown on both sides, foreignowned or not, they would be more than willing to work with our research community and help answer a great deal of our concern about funding. At one time, when with industry, I recall approaching the head of MRC, a very fine man who has done a fine job in most of his functions, with a concrete offer for some kind of tripartite arrangement between MRC, the universities, and industry, to work together for a better research effort than we could do alone. Mr. Speaker, there was no significant response. Yet MRC has performed most of its functions well. But both the MRC and the universities will have to look at their relations with areas such as private industry to generate new funds and to use the funds they have more efficiently.

I also believe that medical research in this country has a great friend in the deputy minister for science, Maurice LeClair, with whom I have discussed this subject. He certainly knows medical research and is very sympathetic to the cause, including this concern about funding. I believe, by the same—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Has the hon. member the consent of the House to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Philbrook: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will wrap up my remarks very briefly. I believe time will prove that medical research in this country has a very great friend in the Minister of National Health and Welfare, indeed in members on the entire government side. I believe that all members of parliament and the general public too are appreciative of the research community. But there are problems which must be worked out. There is no sense kidding ourselves. One of our concerns must be the efficiency with which funds are used, and whether we are experiencing difficult economic times or normal ones, those things must be worked out. If we do this we will be a better research country and a better medical community for having done so.

● (2050)

In the meantime I think it is fair to say that our researchers will need to come down from their ivory towers and learn a little more about what the world in general is like. They will need to learn to sell to the public and to the government their very important function better than has been the case in the past, and thus compete with all the other important and vital needs that are facing this country. I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and would like to thank other hon. members of the House for giving me the extra time.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to listen to the remarks on this subject of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) who said that he had had experience in the field of medical research. Be that as it may, I would say from the tone of his remarks that he also indicated he had had very little experience in the field of economics.

This debate on the failure of the government to give adequate priority to health research funding in Canada takes place in an interesting context. A first ministers' conference has just concluded at which a major item on the agenda was a revision of the cost sharing arrangements with the provinces for the medical care and hospital insurance programs. Including the value of abated tax points to the province of Quebec, these programs will, according to the estimates, cost the federal treasury approximately $4 billion this fiscal year. One of the goals sought by the federal government at the first ministers' conference was to hold down the rate of growth of these expenditures through the implementation of a new formula.

The sum of $4 billion is an impressive amount of money in anyone's language. One of the aspects of this debate revolves around a smaller and less impressive amount, the approximately $4 million in additional funding that is required to maintain the level of medical research at last year's standard. The bearing that these two amounts have on one another is very important.

I want to say at the outset that I am fed up with the stock response we always hear from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), which has just been reiterated by the hon. member for Halton, when the request is made for additional funding for medical research by members from this side of the House. We have all heard that response, Mr. Speaker: It goes something like this, "You are always telling us to restrain government spending. We practice it in this specific area and now you complain. Why can't you be consistent?"

That is a phony argument, and the hon. minister, who I regret is not here tonight, shows his contempt for the House by employing it. If he does not know that it is a phony argument then he does not know the difference between restraint and false economy, between being penny wise and pound foolish.

The whole point of our argument, which the President of the Treasury Board has never refuted or even attempted to refute, is that this is an expenditure that will not only save lives—a consideration that I would hope would be of some importance to him—but it is an investment that will save the federal and the provincial taxpayer money that will more than repay that investment.

The so-called restraint that has been imposed on Medical Research Council funding, following a cutback in funding, is equivalent to a cost cutting program in a business that begins by terminating the fire insurance policy or deferring replacement of worn out machinery that must be kept in operation to keep unit costs down.

The savings the minister boasts of today are in reality ensuring higher costs in the future, and probably in the very near future. If the aim is to hold down health care costs, let us not throw away the tools that will enable us to do so not just this year, but on a long term basis, perhaps in some cases even on a permanent basis. An ounce of prevention is still worth a pound of cure. Four million dollars more this year may save us tens or even hundreds of millions of dollars later on; and if that seems extreme, consider how much it would cost us today in treatment, rehabilitation, and welfare to care for those potential victims of polio who were saved from that dread disease by the discovery of Salk vaccine.

Many Canadians, both members of this House and countless thousands across the country, have pleaded the case for increased medical research funding on humanitarian grounds and on the hope for a better quality of life. I think of the many people who have written to me expressing their concern at the government's insensitivity to the need for more research funds. I think not only of medical researchers—although many of them have written me—but of concerned citizens who consider the good health of Canadians to be one of the nation's prime assets. Many were prompted to write because of personal knowledge of the ravages of as yet unconquered diseases. Some have family, friends or relatives who stand to benefit from breakthroughs in the major diseases threatening mankind today—cancer, heart disease, multiple sclerosis, muscular dystrophy, cystic fibrosis. Many others simply expressed their understanding of the need to use our financial resources wisely in researching new methods to combat disease.

Canadians are interested, tremendously interested, in this matter. Each year through voluntary donations they give a large amount of money to medical research. And their interest is such that each year their contributions increase, up 20 per cent this year over last year. Ordinary Canadians are doing their part, but at the same time they have had to watch the government reducing its commitment in this field.

For every dollar spent in research today there is a saving of $20 in 10 years' time—some estimates of the cost-benefit ratio are even higher. This represents a better than 20 to 1 payoff on investment—an opportunity that no businessman could resist—but an investment that the government fails to comprehend. Dr. Vivian Abrahams, a medical researcher and teacher at Queen's University, one of these researchers who the member of parliament for Halton says continually live in an ivory tower, in his appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) summed up the frustation of so many researchers when he said:

> This generation has benefited hugely by the efforts of previous generations and we have a responsibility to generations to come to devote a reasonable and fair proportion of our resources to the support of medical research.

The direct savings in future medical care costs are convincing enough, Mr. Speaker, but equally important is the potential contribution to the Gross National Product through earnings and productivity of the many who have been spared, because of the successes of our medical research teams, the crippling effects of once terrifying diseases and even premature death.

The economic logic for increased support of medical research is so compelling that it is the ultimate in frustration and bewilderment to witness the lethargy of the government over the past few years in allowing the erosion of the medical health research capability of this country, with all the demoralizing consequences that that entails. What is happening in the field of medical research is indicative of the government's negative approach to science and technology, as was so well set out by my colleague from Halton-Wentworth during a recent debate in this House on science policy.

● (2100)

What the government does not seem to realize and does not seem to comprehend is that the prime requisite in successful scientific research is continuity. It cannot be turned off and on like a tap, and yet that is the course the government has been following.

In the middle and late 1960's the government moved to alleviate the inadequacies of the facilities in our medical schools and research labs. This period was marked by considerable expansion in Canada's medical schools, with a clear understanding of the symbiotic relationship of research and teaching to an over-all improvement in the quality of our medical schools. Ten years later, just as Canada is moving into a position to enjoy the fruits of this investigation, we are witnessing instead the painful and slow dissolution of our research capacity caused by government restraint in medical research funding.

We cannot afford to lose our bright young medical researchers. We cannot afford it in economic terms, and we cannot afford it in human terms. But, because of uncertainty and declining opportunities in the field of medical research, there has been a serious reduction in the number of medical graduates entering the research field. Only 1 per cent of graduates is expected to go into research this year as compared to 5 per cent in 1970.

Dr. Alex Sehon, head of the Department of Immunology of the Faculty of Medicine of the University of Manitoba said recently:

> It is absolutely essential to the success of our biomedical research that we provide for our brightest young people the appropriate milieu to develop their talents. These are among the best dollars we can spend in terms of the value received. Clearly, no investment in research can be expected to yield its full harvest by an "on-again and off-again" policy which puts the whole research establishment in a state of chaos and does not allow for long-term planning. Neither parliament nor the Canadian public can expect to reap the promising harvest of medical research by discouraging potential research workers from entering a research career, when the continuance of research activities by existing medical scientists is being threatened.

And threatened that future is in Canada, threatened by the government. Studies and statistics can be cited to prove it.

A study in process by the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges shows that there has been a decline of 23 per cent in the past four years in the number of medical research grants per 100 students in our medical schools. Figures for this year show that 127 projects which the Medical Research Council's selection committee considered of sufficient calibre to be worthy of funding had to be turned down because of the lack of funding; because of the lack of $4.6 million. If you want to put that figure in another way, that is 3/20ths of 1 per cent of the over-all health care budget of the federal government. That is 3/20ths of 1 per cent of what the government now spends trying to correct the health state of this country. As I mentioned earlier, this is a government that is penny wise and pound foolish.

Harry Gunning, President of the University of Alberta, summed it up well in a speech last month to graduating classes of the university when he said:

> There are obviously many ways in which the federal government can push this nation towards bankruptcy. Perhaps the most efficient method of achieving this undesirable goal is to so stifle and starve the innovative spirit of this country that we are forced to rely almost entirely on other countries to provide us with the highly sophisticated goods and services that we must develop as an industrialized scientific nation. In this respect the present government is doing an outstanding job.

Canada is a highly industrialized nation. Our researchers are held in high regard throughout the world. Yet the erosion of our medical research capability will transform us into medical mendicants when it is incumbent on us to be developing excellence in this field here in Canada to alleviate the problems of less developed nations. Is Canada to be a parasite on the developed nations, importing medical advances from other developed countries? Where is our sense of pride? What has happened to our ambition to want to contribute rather than borrow? This government recognizes neither.

A growing concern in the scientific community, and one which deserves immediate attention, is the thrust of the government's science policy to encourage targeted or mission-oriented research at the expense of basic research. The resulting imbalance in the various research divisions has serious implications for our scientific effort.

Applications for targeted research quickly become known throughout the scientific community as "safe", that is, more likely to be successful in receiving funds from the Medical Research Council. Applicants understandably are tempted to tailor their proposals to strengthen their chances of obtaining grants. If the tendency on the part of the government to recognize targeted research continues, basic research will suffer. Testimony after testimony from scientific researchers supports the necessity of giving priority to basic research.

I should like to quote from an article by Dr. Louis Siminivitch, geneticist-in-chief, Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto. He says:

> The idea that scientists are self-serving and are not directing their efforts to the important problems of our society also represents a lack of understanding of the scientific process. Practical problems such as the development of treatment modalities for disease or the solution of energy problems, are also not solved in a vacuum. Their investigation also rests on the total body of knowledge in science and, in fact, many such problems may simply not be resolvable at this time because of the absence of key fundamental facts. The development of a vaccine for polio or of the laser required knowledge gleaned from several directions by many investigators of various levels of quality, and over many years. The importance of the polio vaccine and the utility of laser in problems as diverse as subway construction and eye surgery, need not be elaborated here. What is important is to realize that these are not isolated examples, and they are introduced here just to underline the fact that the development of medical cures and other such practical advances are, of necessity, a continuous process which feeds on what many might consider to be basic non-practical research. The lack of recognition and support of a strong basic science effort mortgages our ability as a nation to meet the many important practical challenges of the future.

Dr. Fudenberg of the Faculty of Medicine of the University of California said, and this is interesting to note:

> Had funds been awarded for "practical research" in the late 1940's, they would have been to build a better respirator—and perhaps polio would not still be with us.

In fact a comprehensive study by Comroe and Dripps shows conclusively that of the major advances in certain areas of medicine, basic research had yielded key discoveries almost twice as often as all other types of research and development, yet the government's tendency is to downgrade basic research.

I began my remarks by making reference to efforts to restrain health care costs at the first minister's conference during the past two days. Let me conclude by referring to another recent development in federal-provincial relations designed, I presume, to serve the same purpose. I refer to the health review and the proposals made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to the provincial health ministers earlier this spring to share the cost of relatively inexpensive alternative services to hospital and medical care in return for a commitment to hold down costs in those relatively expensive areas. This proposal has much to commend it, but surely only a minister with tunnel vision would fail to see that a review designed to shift the focus from high to low-cost health services in the interests of restraint must include as an integral element an adequately funded medical research program designed to seek more efficient and effective alternatives to present treatment methods. Some money will be saved by treating people out of hospitals once they fall ill. Considerably more money will be saved if you invest in research that may prevent illness in the first place or shorten the period of time in treatment facilities.

● (2110)

Those solutions will come not only from targeted research in specific areas but as spin-offs from pure research and from research in related fields. But we must give those discoveries a chance to happen with adequate research funding, and not delude ourselves into thinking we save money by short-changing those research scientists who will hold down our costs in the future. Even disregarding the economics of this expenditure, the case for it in terms of human lives, human health, and maintaining a cadre of trained research personnel in this country is overwhelming.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that her allotted time has expired. She may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does she have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Surely there should be no melodramatic conflict between saving dollars and saving lives. We have an opportunity to do both. Only the most shortsighted government, a government such as the one we are saddled with at the present time, would let such a rare opportunity slip by.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, if one were to ask the question, is there a doctor in the house, the answer would have to be that there are many doctors. The member who led off the debate is a medical doctor, and three of the last five speakers are medical doctors. However, once you and I have heard the way these doctors have analyzed the problem and have given their cure, it is obvious that if we were to follow their cure the patient would still be sick and incurable. This is why it is necessary for a layman to participate in the debate in order to give some direction and guidance concerning this very serious problem.

We heard the lead-off speaker for the Tories this afternoon read the motion in which he said that this House views with great alarm "the ill-considered and illogical decisions of the government which fail to give adequate priority to health research funding." I am sure, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, we in the New Democratic Party support that principle. But what really happens is that our Tory friends are really great on analyzing the problem; they have a multiplicity of words, but are very weak on the cures and the answers.

I will put the lead-off speaker for the Tories to the real test. I will ask him to move a motion tomorrow under Standing Order 43 which will read: "That this House views with great alarm the ill-considered and illogical decisions of the government of Ontario which fail to give adequate priority to hospital and medical care." It will be interesting to see the response of his Tory colleagues to such a motion, because when I heard some of their speeches with regard to Bill C-68 I realized that they were basing all their arguments on the question of restraint while at the same time their own Conservative government brought forth a measure which closed hospitals across the province, which caused unemployment, and which created a great deal of uncertainty, all in the name of restraint.

I have also noticed that my Conservative friends are great when it comes to marching across this country and talking about the great problem of inflation. They say there are two things we must do. We must cure this problem. That is their first cure. Second, the government is issuing too much money. That is their second cure. What would happen if we were to follow those two great cures of the Conservative party? We would have real problems in respect of inflation. We would have real problems in respect of unemployment, and we would have real problems with regard to health care across the country.

When I heard the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) a few moments ago talk about the one and one-half day conference of first ministers, yesterday and part of today, I realized that what is happening in respect of that conference is that when we discuss the great problem of health care and education across the country it is the province of Ontario, the province of Alberta, and the province of British Columbia which are causing the greatest division and complexity with regard to that conference. What they really want is all the tax-sharing points to themselves. They want to determine just how the money should be spent. They do not want to follow the national principle that was enunciated by the late Mr. Pearson, and which has been followed in past years with regard to co-operative federalism in which we have a national standard concerning health and medical care as well as education. No sir.

What they want is the lion's share of the tax points so that they can control those measures and those programs themselves, and not worry too much about the people in the have-not provinces, such as the Maritimes and Newfoundland, who need proper health and medical care.

The Tories seldom tell what they would cut. However, they did this in one instance. During the budget debate we in the New Democratic Party put them to the test. The Liberals said, "We must have restraint; we must make cuts; we will hit the working man; we will increase the qualification for UIC from eight weeks to 12 weeks." After hearing from the Tories in all their great restraint, and after hearing the many complaints by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), we put them to the test. What did they do? After hearing the speech of the premier of Nova Scotia on the consequences with regard to the people of that province what did they do? They voted against the amendment of the New Democratic Party. They are great on words but they are very weak on cures and answers. Let me deal with the Liberal party for a few moments, Mr. Speaker.

Miss MacDonald: Why not deal with medical research?

Mr. Gilbert: In April of 1974 the Minister of National Health and Welfare called for more research on accidents, heart disease, mental illnesses, drug abuse, physical fitness, industrial toxicology, high blood pressure, and at-home drug therapy. The Lamontagne Committee Report of 1972 recommended that Canadian research must double by 1980 to bring Canada in line with most other advanced countries. Those are very laudable principles, but when one studies the actions of the Liberal party one finds that they amount to very little. They amount only to the very disappointing programs that they have brought forth.

● (2120)

So that the impact of what has happened with regard to recent budget commitments concerning health research can be fully appreciated, I should like to quote one example. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) quoted many medical researchers from across the country who feel very gloomy about the austerity program of the government. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Citizen of March 1, 1976, from an article by Bob Cohen, part of which reads as follows:

> Dr. William G. Schneider, president of the National Research Council, has worried publicly about "the serious risk in underinvesting in science".

He says that money is tight and the country's policy makers evidently feel they can ignore research and development with political impunity. The article states:

> One of the problems with research and development, in terms of political appeal, is that it can be arcane and long-term. Things do not happen overnight. When they do happen, the public invariably has a tough time getting a handle on what they mean in ordinary terms.

The article also states:

> Times have changed, and science has been left out in the treasury cold.

That is a very sad comment about what is happening by reason of the programs of the federal government. Just to show the impact in Ontario let me quote from an article in the Globe and Mail of April 13, 1976, which reads in part:

> The last batch of this year's research termination notices have just been sent out from Ottawa to Canadian medical schools.
>
> As a result of the federal government's decision to freeze the Medical Research Council budget, more than 21 University of Toronto projects have been given three to eight months to close down. These include research into calcium disorders, liver damage, fat breakdown, abnormal bone growth, stress hormones, blood and clotting diseases, marijuana and drug detection, bone and joint transplants, kidney transplant rejection, heart output measurement, male infertility and many others.

In addition, another 60 U of T requests for starting new projects were turned down. These include research into asthma, cardiac angina, infections, plasticity, arthritis, diabetes, obesity, ozone pollution, pineal function, kidney diseases, bronchitis, barbiturates, emotional disorders, allergic pathology, sex hormone abnormalities, anti-hypertension drugs, geriatric diseases, stroke, homosexuality, senior citizen retirement, pituitary diseases, noise pollution and leukemia.

That indicates the importance of medical research into these problems, and it indicates the carelessness with which the government sets its priorities with regard to national health.

We spend close to $1 billion on foreign aid, and even $1 billion is not sufficient for that purpose, and we spend $50 million on medical research. This indicates how twisted our priorities are at times. We in the NDP oppose the positions taken both by our Conservative friends and the Liberal government. We have repeated this many times and we will continue to repeat it until health receives the top priority it deserves, because we think that there are certain rights which Canadians should have. They should have rights with regard to full employment, housing, health, environment, and education.

Health is a very important right because we must have physical and mental health, and research is a necessary part of it. This is why Stephen Lewis, the leader of the NDP in Ontario, has had such success. He has underlined problems with regard to asbestosis which causes lung cancer, problems with regard to mercury poisoning affecting our native people, and problems with regard to lead poisoning, also causing cancer. These are some of the human problems that the leader of the NDP in Ontario has underlined. Is it any wonder that the Liberals in Ontario are fading into oblivion and that the Tories are shaking in their shoes?

Mr. Beatty: How many people in Ontario did you have before the last election?

Mr. Gilbert: I might say to my hon. friend one thing about our party: we really possess quality. It is one thing he should remember.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: I have said, and so has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the research community is upset. When I heard this afternoon the Minister of Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) say that Canada is getting a free ride with regard to research and development in the industrial field, I felt like getting up and telling him that not only are we getting a free ride but we are suffering a terrible loss of physicists, scientists, and engineers who are not developing research in Canada but who are going to the United States after graduating to do research and development for multinational corporations which come to Canada, do their business here, and then take their profits back to the U.S. and elsewhere. When I heard the Minister of Science and Technology say that this afternoon, I was really disappointed, and I was also disappointed in the lead-off speaker for the Tories because his great solution was to get rid of Petro-Can. If we had the money saved from Petro-Can, we would have a tremendous thrust forward with medical research, he said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: I happened to be over in Iraq during the Easter break. One of the ministers connected with the oil industry was pointing out that Iraq was in the same situation as Canada in so far as oil was concerned, that the oil industry was under the domination of multinationals. He said that prior to nationalization in 1973 they received $600 million in taxes and royalties, but last year they had a $7 billion profit from the oil industry in Iraq. If we were to nationalize oil companies in Canada, you can imagine the amount of money we would have for medical research, housing, or environmental problems.

Then we heard the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) propose his great cure-all. He said that what we need is deterrent fees.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Gilbert: Well, one of the remedies he prescribed—and I do not know whether this is part of his party's national policy—was to prescribe deterrent fees.

Mr. Halliday: No, deterrents to abuse.

Mr. Gilbert: Let us talk about deterrents. Just whom do deterrent fees affect? Do they affect the rich people? Not for a minute. They affect moderate income people just slightly, but they affect the poor people always.

Mr. Halliday: Never.

Mr. Gilbert: This is the great remedy. How much do we need medical research in Canada? For the last two weeks I was out in Vancouver at the Habitat conference and I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say that we must have a conspiracy of passionate love. The next day when some of the great men at that conference told him that we should have a moratorium on nuclear reactors, he said, no, we have to sell them to other countries. What do we have? We have problems with regard to nuclear power, with regard to reactor safety, and we have radioactive waste. These are the problems attendant on nuclear power.

● (2130)

You probably heard the announcement on the "National News" last night that the Nuclear Reactor Association is not going to be set up. It was to go across the country publicizing the greatness of nuclear reactors and it was going to use half a million dollars to do it. What we need is a body that will go into the nuclear reactor problems with regard to safety and radioactive waste, in great depth.

When I heard the host of physicists at the Habitat conference speak, as well as Barbara Ward and Margaret Mead, it made me realize, and it should make all Canadians and people throughout the world realize, the dangers attendant upon nuclear waste and the safety problem with regard to reactors.

In the few minutes I have left, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it seems to me we are suffering from two types of sickness. There is the political sickness in that most of the leaders today are aimless in purpose, they are drifting, and their priorities need to be rearranged. And there is the physical sickness. Has there ever been a time when there was so much sickness around the world, when there was so much cancer, so many heart attacks and diseases? The government is cutting back on medical research which could help solve these problems.

What is needed is hope. What is needed is courage, and the courage comes when the government sets forth its priorities in their proper order, when it gives medical research its proper attention, and nuclear reactors its lowest attention, when it gives housing and employment full priority. It is only when these priorities are established that we can justly and proudly call ourselves Canadians.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the topic before us today, that of an appropriate level of funding by the federal government for medical research, is an important one with serious implications for the lives of Canadians.

As was pointed out in the preface to "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians," a working document published by the Department of National Health and Welfare in 1974:

> Good health is the bedrock on which social progress is built. A nation of healthy people can do those things that make life worth while, and as the level of health increases so does the potential for happiness.

The fundamental importance of measures to maintain and improve good physical and mental health has long been recognized by the provincial governments and the Government of Canada and, as a result, we have prepaid medical and hospital insurance, public health protection, programs to counter environmental pollution, accident prevention programs, and safeguards and requirements for food and drugs. Medical research, whether in-house research carried out directly by the Department of National Health and Welfare, or research funded by the department through the Medical Research Council, or research funded by private organizations cannot be considered in a vacuum but must be seen as one factor in a very broad spectrum of factors that contribute to the health, happiness, and quality of life of Canadians.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), in his preface to "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians", commenting on the fact that physicians, surgeons, nurses, and hospitals spend much of their time treating ills caused by environmental factors and behavioural risks, stated:

> It is evident now that further improvements in the environment and reductions in self-imposed risks . . . are necessary if more Canadians are to live a full, happy, long and illness-free life.

At a national symposium on health research priorities held at McGill University on May 25, 1973, the point was made that many proven advances resulting from basic and clinical research are not being applied at the level of the practising physician. If one accepts this, one might see measures for more co-ordinated and effective use of existing knowledge as having higher priority than the search for new knowledge.

Examination of mortality figures in Canada shows a very high proportion of deaths which with our present knowledge could be avoided. For example, the highest single cause of death in males between 15 and 24 is the motor vehicle accident. Other accidents, whether domestic accidents in the case of young children or industrial accidents, also account for a disconcertingly high proportion of deaths. Avoidable diseases of life style including those relating to abuse of tobacco, alcohol, or drugs take a high toll.

Another concern that emerged from the McGill symposium was that an insufficient proportion of research money is allocated to clinical, socio-medical, and organizational aspects of health and health care. This is not an issue of which we have heard much in recent months. The groups who have been lobbying members of parliament have placed their emphasis, for the most part, on basic biological research. Many of the people we have seen, too, have been unwilling to come to terms with the important questions of priorities and with choosing among conflicting options. One scientist, whom I asked for an indication of his priorities, told me that all applications from universities should be funded, that there is no possibility of bad or incompetent research being done in universities because of the peer review system.

Miss MacDonald: You should quote his name.

Miss Nicholson: I find this somewhat less than realistic. No group in society can claim an unlimited right to have their productions unexplained, unexamined by members of other disciplines, and funded uncritically with tax dollars.

At the other end of the scale from the person who says all applications for medical research from universities should be funded, is the person who is extremely critical of all work that is not done in his or her own department. The working paper "A New Perspective" commented on the need for researchers to develop:

> . . . a unity of purpose which has often been lacking because of the destructive competition for limited funds. Balanced progress in all fields can only be obtained when researchers pull together toward the common objective of raising the health status of Canadians.

A very gentlemanly sidestepping of anything that looked like "destructive competition" was achieved by a member of a group lobbying for "more research" who, when I asked him to define areas which he considered priorities, explained that his organization represented people with many interests and could not promote any one area of endeavour without offending some members.

The Oliver Twist cry for "more" is understandable but is singularly unhelpful to legislators unless it is defined and some priorities set in terms of contemporary health needs.

Prior to 1974 the federal government limited its activities in the health field to its traditional responsibilities such as quarantine medicine, protection of the food supply, product safety, ensuring accessibility to personal health care through financial assistance to provincial health insurance plans, and financing research. The basis for concentrating its interest in these areas was the belief that the improvement of personal health care was the principal means of raising the level of health of Canadians.

The 1974 working paper, "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians", stated:

The evidence uncovered by the analysis of underlying causes of sickness and death now indicates that improvement in the environment and an abatement in the level of risks imposed upon themselves by individuals, taken together, constitute the most promising ways by which further advances can be made.

The paper continues:

Accordingly, it is the intention of the government of Canada, first, to maintain at a high level the services and support provided through its present activities in health protection, research and the financing of personal health care. To these will be added measures directed at specific national health problems, chosen in consultation with provinces, consumers, professions and associations according to their gravity and incidence, and aimed at removing or reducing the factors underlying sickness and death.

● (2140)

Some of these measures in time will no doubt be directed at environmental factors; others will be directed at lifestyle risks; still others will expand the horizons of health research and yet others will encourage more personal care services to neglected parts of the Canadian population . . .

Since direct health care is already consuming some 7 per cent of the wealth that Canadians produce annually, it is evident that the rate at which the Government of Canada can expand its activities in the field of health is severely limited by financial considerations. It is also true that measures directed at the prevention of illness will take some time before they are translated into savings in the costs of providing curative health services.

Later the report went on to say:

. . . with the recognition that the good health of Canadians is an objective that shines brightly above . . . special interest groups, the Government of Canada proposes to take steps that will start the nation on the road to levels of health even higher than those that Canada now enjoys.

To achieve the aims of reducing mental and physical health hazards for Canadians whose risks are high and improving access to good health care, five strategies were proposed:

(1) A health promotion strategy aimed at informing, influencing, and assisting both individuals and organizations so that they will accept more responsibility and be more active in matters affecting mental and physical health.

(2) A regulatory strategy aimed at using federal regulatory powers to reduce hazards to mental and physical health, and at encouraging and assisting provinces to use their regulatory powers to the same end.

(3) A research Strategy designed to help discover and apply knowledge needed to solve mental and physical health problems.

(4) A health care efficiency strategy the objective of which shall be to help the provinces reorganize the system for delivering mental and physical health care so that the three elements of cost, accessibility and effectiveness are balanced in the interest of Canadians.

(5) A goal-setting strategy the purpose of which will be to set, in co-operation with others, goals for raising the level of the mental and physical health of Canadians and improving the efficiency of the health care system.

The paper contains 74 proposals of which 15 deal with research. These are:

1. An ongoing dialogue between health planners and the research community on the priorities for mission-oriented health research while preserving for the research community the setting of priorities in basic research.

2. The implementation of a regular national health survey to determine the prevalence and nature of acute and chronic mental and physical illness, to permit an assessment of the health status and needs of Canadians and to measure changes in status and needs.

3. The institution of a special program for identifying health status indicators and high-risk segments of the Canadian population, for the evaluation of the nature and gravity of mental and physical health risks, and for the proposal of measures to abate the level of risk.

[Miss Nicholson.]

4. Measures to help integrate, improve and use, on a national basis, the data and statistics being recorded at various governmental and institutional levels.

5. The establishment of a well-designed comprehensive system for the reporting of accident statistics which would, among other things, identify accident-associated products.

6. The promotion of increased support for research on underlying causes of coronary-artery disease.

7. Support for more research on the cause and treatment of mental illness.

8. The support of projects designed to evaluate the results of present mass-screening programs and to test the effectiveness of future ones.

9. The establishment of a national drug abuse institute covering all abusive drugs including psychotropic drugs, both licit and illicit, alcohol and cigarettes, and responsible for gathering statistics, supporting research, evaluating preventive and treatment measures and recommending policy.

10. The undertaking of a broad continuing study into the ways and means of effectively informing the Canadian people on changes in behaviour which will significantly reduce self-imposed risks.

11. The continuation and strengthening of present research into the effect of the physical environment on health.

12. The establishment of a program for assessing the effect of social and environmental change on health, including the calculation of risk factors due to lifestyle.

13. The continuation of support for research on physical and mental fitness and for fitness testing.

14. Continued and increased support for research into better ways of providing health care.

15. Continued support for research consistent with the scale of the health care industry.

The emphasis on applied or clinical research as opposed to basic research is clear: but obviously the position of the latter is protected, especially by recommendations Nos. I and 15.

Within the Department of National Health and Welfare a sum of $11,088,000 has been assigned this year to the national health research and development program. Some of the representations received in recent months from university employed scientists have expressed opposition to in-house research but have not offered reasons for their opposition and, in the absence of clearly stated reasons and supporting data, I cannot accept that research, in order to be valid, must be completely controlled by a university.

Several provinces have allocated moneys to health research or have indicated that they intend to do so. The voluntary sector is increasingly supporting research.

Finally, let me turn to the Medical Research Council for which main estimates for 1976-77 provide $48,848,000 for research support programs, and $1,142,000 for administrative costs. To put these votes in perspective it may be useful to remember that for 1966-67, a decade ago, main estimates provided $12.3 million for research support through the Medical Research Council. This figure has therefore almost quadrupled in the intervening ten years. The present provision of $48.8 million represents 79 per cent of the support for research provided this year by federal agencies, including the Department of National Health and Welfare, which have some major responsibility for health research. It is about 49 per cent of the total support expected to reach extramural health research in Canada this year from all sources.

On December 18, 1975, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) reported to the House a decision to limit the actual increase for the Medical Research Council over 1975-76 to $1,414,000. Subsequent to that decision the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that he had been able to re-allocate an additional $2 million from within his department to the Medical Research Council. This limiting of the rate of growth has been misrepresented as a cut in the funds available for medical research.

It may very well be that more funds should be allocated for medical research this year, but the onus is on those who think so to make the case more clearly and effectively than they have done to date, and to state unequivocally what elements of health programs should be given up or reduced in order to free additional funds.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, before I sum up what has been said today it should be noted that we have in this country developed decent health care facilities. We have built up in Canada an infrastructure for an effective research establishment which does its work from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

We are at a point in our history at which provinces have undertaken studies to determine how best to provide decent health care services for Canadians. As I went from coast to coast four years ago researching this matter, everyone agreed that, whether you are talking about basic research, clinical research, educational research or research into actual delivery of medical and health care services, centrifugal to the quality and the decency of these services in maintaining a decent research establishment. What does the government do? Unilaterally, without any logical reason whatsoever, it cuts back on funding of meaningful research in this country.

● (2150)

Above politics, I do not hesitate for a minute to pay tribute to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who, years ago as premier of his province, pioneered with other members of parliament and people in public life one of the better health schemes on a provincial level in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: We have in Canada today, for a relatively young country, both from the private sector and from what we have done with medical and health care services vis-à-vis medicare, every reason to stand up and say that, looking back historically, we should be the one country in the whole world that can today deliver the best, the most decent, and the most humane medical care services in the world.

An hon. Member: We do.

Mr. Grafftey: No, we do not, especially because of our contemporary shortsightedness, what you are doing with the provinces today vis-à-vis cutting back on these programs, what you are doing unilaterally, cutting back on funding for meaningful research, not just this year but over the past three or four years.

Stop being political. Open your ears. Talk to the medical and health leaders of this country. They will tell you that because of the shortsightedness of the government, services at the local level are slowly but surely slipping from excellence to mediocrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Apart from the humanitarian considerations, and I do not even like to say that, how can you measure the cost—

Mr. Lessard: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Minister, if you do not have anything better to do, go out and amuse yourself. Don't intervene in this debate. You are doing a bad enough job running your own portfolio.

I have already said, and I believe the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) alluded to this, we are not just talking about pure biomedical research, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) talked about. We are talking about clinical research, research in education, basic research in terms of how better can we, not in an institutional way, deliver medical and health care services. There is no use talking about savings in medicare or medical and health care programs until we put some meaningful research dollars into the whole area of how we are better going to deliver medical health care services.

An hon. member alluded in a political way to what the premier of Ontario is doing. He knows what the premier of Ontario is doing. He is finally doing what the former Minister of National Health and Welfare said years ago. We must have meaningful planning where the community hospital is the central institution for the total delivery of medical and health care services. The minute one premier has the guts and do on the local level what the federal government should have been doing in the past four or five years, what do you say? Politics. The Ontario minister of health has been a statesman in many instances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have now expired.

● (2200)

ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills.

Bill C-81, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act with respect to the escalation of certain payments thereunder—Chapter No. 99.

Bill S-34, an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act—Chapter No. 100.

Adjournment Debate

Bill S-35, an Act to amend an Act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act—Chapter No. 101.

Bill S-33, an Act respecting United Grain Growers Limited.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR CANADA—DISPUTE WITH EMPLOYEES OF FINANCE BRANCH IN WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the past few weeks I have been calling for a complete examination of the Air Canada finance department operation in Winnipeg by the Auditor General's department because of the huge deficit experienced by Air Canada in 1975 amounting to $12.5 million; and for the first four months of 1976 the deficit has reached $14.5 million.

Before listing further reasons for the necessity for a complete examination into Air Canada's affairs, it is my understanding that a new Air Canada act is to be introduced by the government later this year which would separate Air Canada from being audited by an auditor appointed by the CNR, which makes a lot of sense. But due to the gravity of the situation in Winnipeg, the government is obligated to take immediate action to clean up the mess.

The government's repeated answer to me that MP's can question Air Canada in committee is nothing but a cover up. The committee system is not the area to conduct an audit; nor are MP's able to conduct an audit and investigate whether Air Canada has proper accounting procedures. Air Canada should appear before the committee for questioning in other areas.

A proper audit can only be done by qualified accountants and auditors who would have to spend considerable time at the finance branch examining Air Canada's procedures. Further, Mr. Speaker, the auditor's report contained in the 1975 Air Canada report from Cooper and Lybrand of Ottawa states that their examination includes a general review of the accounting procedures. It would seem that their terms of reference must be very limited.

Serious charges of financial mismanagement have been laid by CALEA and they have been documented charges, not supposition. An Air Canada public relations officer has denied these charges and has stated that the air line is subject to continuous external audit procedures by independent auditors appointed by the federal government. "We are under constant scrutiny", he said.

I have discussed this matter with Air Canada employees and they inform me that no independent auditors have scrutinized their procedures at all. So, Mr. Speaker, we have a direct contradiction and a further reason for an immediate investigation to be conducted into Air Canada's financial procedures, which were highly criticized in the Estey report.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Also, Mr. Speaker, a member of the accounting firm of Touche, Ross and Company has stated that if Air Canada had realistic accounting procedures the 1975 loss would be about $100 million instead of the reported $12.5 million. This is a serious charge and cannot just be swept under the rug.

Further charges have been laid by CALEA that the present billing work being contracted out across Canada is a cover-up designed to "get rid of all the embarrassing material". To date the contracting out of Air Canada finance work has cost a quarter of a million dollars. This ridiculous practice should be stopped and all billing work returned to the finance branch in Winnipeg. I am informed the contracted work is returned with a 50 per cent error factor, further compounding the problem.

● (2210)

The Saturday, June 12 edition of the Winnipeg Free Press in a front page copyrighted article by John Sullivan under the headline "Work Slowdown, Mismanagement Cost Air Canada Millions" stated:

> Millions of dollars in revenue has been lost or written off by Air Canada in the last year because of inadequate or non-existent auditing practices, according to confidential financial reports by the airline's strike-bound Winnipeg financial workers.
>
> In releasing the reports to the Free Press this week, local officials of the Canadian Airline Employees' Association . . . said a lack of adequate financial control has cost the publicly-owned airline enough revenue to "almost or perhaps totally" account for Air Canada's record $12.4 million deficit last year.
>
> The financial study, conducted by union leaders late last year, says Air Canada has written off millions of dollars in unreported ticket sales by airline sales offices, travel agents and commercial subscribers.

I should like to remind the parliamentary secretary, who I assume is here to answer me tonight, that we are dealing with a Crown corporation and the taxpayers' money. This is not a private organization and we cannot have repeated slough-offs like I have been receiving over the past few weeks. The article continues:

> More millions have been lost because the airline is simply paying out refunds and flight coupon billings from other airlines and accepting sales reports from travel agents and commercial subscribers without auditing them for errors, the union claims.
>
> Interest on this revenue which has been lost, as well as the Crown airline's practice of farming out financial work to private firms in recent months, because of a huge backlog in processing, has also cost millions, the study says.
>
> In short, the union leaders say Air Canada financial controls are in a mess, aggravated but not caused by the long-simmering labour dispute:
>
> "The problem is one where the system originally devised for the audit and accounting process of the finance branch cannot accommodate the volume of work. Until such time as an automated process relieves the congestion, or until an adequate level of trained staff is reached, Air Canada will continue to have no protection for its revenues—strike or no strike".

I have also pointed this out to the parliamentary secretary and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on a number of occasions. The article then states:

> The CALEA study apparently was written and released to the union's membership last year in a series of "progress reports" on the effects of a work slowdown and work-to-rule campaign by the employees.
>
> Contract negotiations between Air Canada and the union—which began last April—broke down in December over the issues of job security and employee classifications—

This has nothing to do with poor accounting procedures.

—after the existing contract expired August 25. The dispute is now under federal mediation but CALEA's slowdown and rotating strikes have continued for months with no end in sight.

The union says an Air Canada official at corporate headquarters in Montreal had admitted to them last year that "labour unrest in the accounting services division was costing $300,000 a week and this has been going on for two years."

A high-ranking official at the Winnipeg finance branch—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Winnipeg, as my hon. friend knows, is a particularly difficult one because of the various circumstances he has described this evening and on other occasions in the House. We have two separate issues involved that continue to complicate one another, and continue to muddle the situation. On the one hand we have a very difficult and complex labour situation, and on the other we have the allegations that have been made about faulty accounting and auditing procedures in that particular part of Air Canada's finance branch.

The labour situation described by the hon. member has, indeed, been under discussion for a very long period of time. Relatively recently, of course, we have had the submission of the report of the conciliation commissioner which has been reviewed by the company, the union, and the Department of Labour in light of the anti-inflation program.

The issue which has kept the two parties apart the longest in connection with the labour dispute, as the hon. member knows, is the matter of job descriptions and job security. For the past two years Air Canada has devoted an enormous amount of time, money, and effort in an attempt to resolve this issue. The advice of two outside consulting authorities has been sought, and when their various proposals did not prove acceptable to the union a commissioner, Mr. D. J. Jessiman, was named by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). Negotiations which had broken off in the early spring of 1975 were resumed under his jurisdiction in July last year. They continued until mid-September when the union requested the commissioner to take evidence and submit his report.

As I say, every effort has been made by the government and the company to bring this lengthy dispute to a conclusion. At the same time as the discussion on the labour dispute has been going on, we have had as well the problem that has been mentioned by my hon. friend in connection with the auditing matters.

As he has mentioned this evening we do have before parliament and the country the very comprehensive Estey Report into this whole question affecting Air Canada which, as he mentioned again tonight, will result in useful legislation. There is, as he has mentioned as well, an outside auditing procedure already in place, and there are also the ultimate safeguards of parliamentary scrutiny of the operations of Crown corporations. Beyond those assurances and the explanation with respect to the complicating factors of the labour dispute interfering with the other matter, I think for the time being this evening that is where I would leave the explanation.

Adjournment Debate

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED BREAK-IN OF QUEBEC NEWSPAPER OFFICE BY MEMBERS OF THE FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are many members in this House of Commons who, like myself, would like some more background on the rather bizarre sounding incident of our national police force, the RCMP, breaking into the premises of a Quebec newspaper sometime ago. I know that members of all parties have asked questions about it. I recall the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) asking a question about it on behalf of the Social Credit Party. My friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) also made an inquiry in this House about the information and background surrounding this incident.

Tonight, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make another appeal to the minister or his parliamentary secretary to give the House of Commons a little information. The minister indicated on several occasions he would do this. If my memory does not play me false, I think it was on March 31 of this year that he indicated he hoped to give the House as much information as was possible once he received an RCMP report on the matter. On April 2 he repeated that remark in effect, and again on April 28, I believe as recorded at page 12952 of Hansard, he said the same thing for the third time. Then on May 18 he admitted that he had received a full report from the RCMP, but instead of reporting to this House as he had promised he turned the report over to the Quebec Solicitor General to, as he said, determine whether something illegal had taken place.

Any force as large and complex as the RCMP inevitably makes mistakes. They are entitled to make a few mistakes because most of the time they do a tremendous job. But like fire, the RCMP is a good servant but a bad master. If there are occasions, and we all know there are, when mistakes are made, I think it is incumbent on the minister who is responsible for the conduct of our national police force to come into the House of Commons and tell us in effect what went wrong. I do not wish to go into many incidents to make my point, but I think it is of some interest that, for instance, here in Ottawa on the very premises of parliament a member of the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires and his family were considerably embarrassed by the RCMP who made what turned out to be an unfortunate mistake by coming into his premises on a mistaken apprehension that there may have been drugs there. This of course resulted in an action being taken against them, for which this man and his family were compensated. That is fine. We all understand this.

What I would like to know, and I am sure other members would like to know, is what the implications are in respect of this unfortunate incident with regard to the Quebec newspaper L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec. Obviously there was no warrant. The RCMP took part in a joint venture with other police forces. I would like to know more about this. Whose responsibility was it to have made certain that the entry was done properly? Perhaps under the circumstances it could not have been done properly, which makes it all the more serious.

Adjournment Debate

● (2220)

Without straying too far off the subject I would like to say that so far as I am concerned I really believe that the rank and file members of the RCMP would support a crackdown, or a check, on some of the procedures and methods used on occasion which result in these unfortunate types of incidents. It would be a good idea for the responsible ministers and the government to exercise a little bit more supervision over the force. However, I will not talk on that topic because that is not the issue here tonight.

I would like to remind the parliamentary secretary that as a member of parliament I feel that this House is entitled to more information about this incident than we have received. It is all very well for the solicitor general for the province of Quebec to have an investigation to ascertain what happened. He has responsibilities there as well to see what part the force played vis-à-vis MUC or the Quebec provincial police, but there is only one minister responsible to the House of Commons for the RCMP, and that is the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand).

So without saying anything more this evening I am simply inviting the parliamentary secretary to give us as much information as he can and to assure us that this incident, which has rather alarming overtones, was in fact an isolated one and that remedial steps will be taken. Without wanting to sound as if I were asking that people be punished if mistakes were made, I want to remind the parliamentary secretary again that members of the force in the past have been severely disciplined, and often discharged without a hearing, for incidents which on the face of it sound to me a great deal less serious than permitting something like this to happen with respect to that procedure, whatever it was, affecting the rights of this small newspaper in Quebec.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be as co-operative as I can with the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). I know he has a real concern in these matters and he has made it a special interest of his in the House. He is very well aware of the fact that the Solicitor General of the province of Quebec is responsible for the administration of justice in that province and it is he who must determine the need for a complete investigation of all the facts from all the police forces involved and whether or not further charges should be laid in this matter. However, I will attempt to provide further information to the hon. member who last June 8 asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) if he was prepared to give the House a complete report on the break and entry into the L'agence de Presse Libre du Québec.

As most hon. members are aware, this break in is supposed to have occurred in 1972. The minister did not become aware of the break in until 1976. Upon learning of it the minister requested details from the RCMP. Officials in the RCMP were able to confirm that there was a break in and that officers of the RCMP, along with members of the Montreal Urban Community Police Force and the Quebec Police Force were involved in this act. Originally the minister stated that the RCMP had played a supportive role, but later was informed that the event was a combined effort. He was also informed that as far as the RCMP were concerned there was no warrant obtained before the break-in.

The RCMP have completed their investigation into the role which any of its officers may have played in this break-in. The minister has also had the opportunity of discussing the matter with the Solicitor General of Quebec. On any criminal act which may have taken place in Quebec, Mr. Lalonde has asked that the RCMP report be made available to him. The report is now in his hands.

The Solicitor General wishes to emphasize that only the report of the RCMP involvement was made available to him. The reports involving the other two forces were naturally given to the Quebec Solicitor General.

The Solicitor General of Quebec will therefore be responsible for determining whether or not criminal charges should be proceeded with. The minister wishes to advise this House that any action which he may take will have to await the decision of Mr. Lalonde.

AGRICULTURE—REQUEST FOR EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF CHEESE

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, the question I raise deals with a subject somewhat different from those raised by my two colleagues. I want to remind the House that on May 25, 1976, the Globe and Mail published an article which indicated that an attempt was being made to re-condition rotten imported Feta cheese for the purpose of moving this product on to our domestic market as a fresh commodity.

During the question period later that same day I raised this matter, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) replied in part:

> I understand there is every possibility that this cheese was inspected when it was brought into Canada, but it has been in Canada for over a year. It was when it was brought out of storage that it was found to be unfit for human consumption.

It was found to be unfit for human consumption only after a Canadian cheese manufacturer "blew the whistle" and requested that this product be inspected. The Minister of Agriculture went on to comment that "over 4,000 inspections of imported cheese were carried out last year." Granted, Mr. Speaker, 4,000 inspections seem substantial, but one has to remember that applies to 50 million pounds. That represents only one inspection on every 12,500 pounds of imported cheese. It becomes even less significant when you consider that many of these cheese imports are prepackaged and shipped in small packages ready for the retail market.

It is interesting to note that the reported facts in this particular case, according to the district supervisor for the Department of Agriculture, include the admission that although his department monitors all cheese imports to see that weights are labelled correctly and butterfat composition is up to standard, there is no monitoring of these products for freshness. Indeed no regulations exist governing the freshness of imported cheese products. The supervisor went on to comment that the department does not inspect every shipment that comes into the country, but rather it depends on the importer's record as to whether or not we take samples for inspection.

It is interesting to note as well that, according to comments from a spokesman from the health protection branch, when imported food comes into this country it is not checked by health inspectors for bacteria contamination unless there has been some complaint.

Regardless of the minister's answer to my question on May 25, and likely including the reply that I am about to receive tonight from his capable parliamentary secretary, one must remain convinced that under the present policy of the government our own Canadian cheese industry remains at a serious disadvantage right here at home in relation to foreign competitors.

In the case of Feta, Mr. Speaker, it wholesaled for $1.40 a pound compared to 90 cents to $1.29 for imports, and this particular shipment of 18,000 pounds was being offered by the importer at 50 to 60 cents a pound below market price if it could be cleaned up.

Cheese imports have been a bone of contention to the Canadian cheese manufacturing and Canadian dairy industries for some time. The present 50 million pounds of imports is estimated to be costing our own industry over $3.6 million.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that if the minister continues to refuse to reduce or place an embargo upon cheese imports, then I submit he is obligated at the very least to take immediate steps to place imported cheese under the same type of rigid inspection regulations that are currently applied to our Canadian producers. Anything less than this is totally unacceptable, grossly unfair, and highly dangerous to the health and well-being of Canadians.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on May 25 an article appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail which was entitled "Mould Scraped Off Cheese". This article, by its implications, may have caused concern to consumers. I am pleased to have the opportunity of touching briefly on the actual fact of this matter.

● (2230)

[Translation]

In late 1974 and early 1975, several shipments of Feta cheese from Denmark were imported in Toronto. This cheese was packed in barrels and covered with brine. Only the last shipment, dated March 10, 1975, brought difficulties; due to the evaporation of the brine, part of the cheese was no longer covered by the solution, which caused the growth of mould.

[English]

In an attempt to determine the best disposition of this product, some of the cheese was scraped clean of mould, rebrined, and repackaged. This reconditioned cheese was tested by the health protection branch and was found to be suitable for human consumption on the basis of analyses performed to date. Additional tests are currently being run to make absolutely sure that this assessment is correct.

[Translation]

We got in touch with a Canadian manufacturer of Feta cheese to see whether he was interested in reconditioning a certain amount of cheese. This business is in direct competition with imported Feta cheese. The Health Protection Branch which was very careful in this matter has been retaining all the mouldy cheese since April 30.

[English]

The foregoing prompt action is illustrative of the effective control of both imported and domestic cheese which is exercised by the actions of the food inspection system of the Government of Canada. It would be unfortunate if erroneous impressions were gained, by situations such as this, that the food inspection system of Canada was not effective and efficient, since, indeed it is efficient.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 16, 1976

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF GUIDELINES FOR DECENTRALIZATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the importance of a policy of decentralization of government installations to the operations of government, to the public service and indeed to the people of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the President of the Treasury Board table all Treasury Board guidelines with respect to the government's policy on the decentralization of government departments and agencies.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

PERFORMING ARTS

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF POLICY TO ENSURE PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF CANADIAN FILMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, motion pictures have a profound cultural and economic effect on all Canadians. No one concerned about the preservation of Canadian culture can deny the influence of films on our attitudes and way of life in general. Since Canada is now the largest foreign market for United States films in the world, where for example 96 per cent of the feature films exhibited in Ontario are U.S. made and, considering that the distribution of motion pictures in Canada is largely American controlled, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House urge the government to bring forward a film policy which will ensure the development and distribution of a viable and sustained production of Canadian films.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF CONTAMINATION OF FISH IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the incredible statement just made by Quebec minister Claude Simard that although they are highly contaminated by PCB and unfit for consumption, one should not worry since eels taken from the St. Lawrence are 97 per cent sold on export markets; and considering that this poor specimen of humanity was echoing similar statements by two federal ministers—including the present Minister of State for Fisheries—despite the fact that serious reports indicate a PCB rate averaging eight times higher than the maximum security standard allowed by the Department of National Health and Welfare, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House now discuss the entire matter and review the duties and responsibilities of the authorities as regards pollution and health to avoid on one hand that Canada and Quebec be accused of poisoning foreign countries and on the other hand to avoid that the Canadian people lose further confidence in their leaders since they can no longer rely on food security standards within the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

* * *

[English]

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PREVENT LOCKOUT OF EMPLOYEES OF FINANCE BRANCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I have been informed that the management of Air Canada intends to lock out the employees of the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg. In the light of the continuing internal problems of the Air Canada finance branch, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

Finance

● (1410)

That this House instruct the Minister of Labour to take the necessary action to prevent a lock-out of employees at the Air Canada finance branch by Air Canada management until the federally-appointed mediator has had an opportunity to complete his inquiries into the labour problem and file his report.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTION DECISION IN CASE OF WORKERS AT THOMPSON BE REPEALED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board has rolled back the wage settlement of Local 6166 of the United Steel Workers of America in Thompson, Manitoba, to a point at which it is below the salaries earned by steel workers in Sudbury; in view of the fact that this decision not only contravenes a section of the Anti-Inflation Act which allows for wage parity within a sector but also creates difficulties in persuading people to accept work in Thompson, and in view of the fact that the government has the authority to over-rule a decision of the AIB on exactly those grounds, and has done so in the past, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House instruct the cabinet to over-rule the Anti-Inflation Board on this issue and award Local 6166 of the Steel Workers of America a contract equal to that of steel workers in Sudbury.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

FINANCE

PROPOSED EXAMINATION OF PRACTICE OF TRUST COMPANIES OF GIVING ONE-YEAR MORTGAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provision of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that some trust companies are turning mortgages over on a one-year basis and encouraging this practice by offering discounts of one quarter per cent on the initial mortgage, which poses serious problems to home buyers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Finance examine the practice of trust companies selling one-year mortgages.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be considered by the House only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

* * *

[Translation]

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Considering that bilingualism in air communications is an essential matter that will determine to what extent Francophones can put any confidence in the future of bilingualism in Canada and considering that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) said himself how impressed he was by bilingualism in air-to-ground communications in Paris, which proves that bilingualism is also possible and logical in air-to-ground communications in Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House call on the government to establish immediately and without delay a policy of bilingualism in air communications, since it has been proven that in this field it is possible and logical to respect the policy of bilingualism which is essential to the survival of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion, which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS TO HOLD A LEGAL STRIKE—DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR TO MR. KEENAN

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It has to do with the air traffic controllers dispute and the prospect of a nation-wide strike. Since it is the position of the air traffic controllers, based upon their assessment of the situation, that a contract has not been formally ratified, nor has a collective agreement been duly signed, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he can clarify the position of the government in this regard, in particular, the statement he made himself outside the House with respect to the right of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association to hold a legal strike?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): According to Treasury Board lawyers this strike would be entirely illegal and we shall take whatever steps are needed to prevent illegal actions.

Mr. Mazankowski: My supplementary arises from the nature of the minister's reply and the fact that the government has been unreasonably slow in resolving the prime issue in this dispute, namely, the appointment of a suitable replacement for Mr. John Keenan—I might say this slowness has had the effect of jeopardizing the good relations which had developed between the parties during the negotiating process. Would the minister tell the House when an announcement might be made regarding the appointment of a successor to Mr. Keenan, and can we expect it before this weekend?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is possible to appoint a replacement for Mr. Keenan before the return of the Minister of Transport who is now travelling abroad.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for clarification purposes. Having regard to the statements which have been made by the president of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association, Mr. Livingston, to the effect that an air traffic controllers' strike now appears inevitable, may I ask the minister to clarify recent press reports and advise the House whether it is now the position of the government that it has definitely taken a decision to apply for an injunction if a strike is called?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday that in the last two years we have tolerated no illegal strike and that we will take whatever action is available to us to make sure there are no illegal strikes. If we have to go to court, we will do so.

* * *

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SAFETY ASPECT OF BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL WITH BE LEFT TO INQUIRY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since it is the shared opinion of both the government and the opposition that safety, and safety alone, is the issue at hand, would the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that any decision as to the safety of bilingual air traffic control will be left to the commission of inquiry and not to the ex cathedra judgments of an absentee Minister of Transport?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has made it very clear that safety is the first and most important consideration.

Mr. Fraser: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister said that safety was the first and most important factor in this area, but then he went on to say, as reported at page 14514 of Hansard:

> What we are asking all concerned—the workers, members of the opposition and indeed members on the government side—is to have an open mind on, and objective approach to, this question.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is this. Would the Acting Prime Minister assure us that until there is some judgment on safety from an independent commissioner, the hon. Minister of Transport will be asked to refrain from making a difficult situation even more difficult by making statements that indicate that the government's mind is already made up, no matter what the evidence may be?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I see nothing in anything that the Minister of Transport has said to indicate that he is not entirely objective and acting in the public interest, and I resent any suggestion to the contrary.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT ON PROVINCIAL REVENUES OF ALLEGED CHANGE IN TAX SHARING FORMULA—STUDIES OF EFFECT ON REVENUE FOR POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that the federal government guaranteed to the provinces in the tax changes announced in 1972 that they would not get less revenue during the course of that revenue sharing agreement, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister why the federal government has now unilaterally changed that formula with the result that retroactively all of the provinces are now going to get less revenue than they had anticipated?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a question that should be directed to the Minister of Finance who will be back in the House very soon, I expect. The government is very conscious of the undertakings which were made at that time. I believe they have lived up to them and I do not think the kind of conclusion that the hon. gentleman has put forward is valid.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It would have surprised me immensely if the Acting Prime Minister had admitted the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to go to a minister who should know something about the changes in the formula and direct my question to the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State's department done a study of the proposed changes in cost sharing proposed by the federal government and of the effects of the changes in terms of the share of revenue paid to the provinces for post-secondary education?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if there have been any studies done on that matter, they would have been done by the Department of Finance.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that as the minister responsible for this program—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

An hon. Member: Ask your question.

Mr. Broadbent: I will go back to the Acting Prime Minister. Assuming that the studies have been done, will the Acting Prime Minister now take steps to ensure that these studies will be made available to all the provincial premiers, many of whom complained about the absence of this data, and specifically I am thinking of the request of Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister dealt with these questions very adequately I thought yesterday, much to the discomfiture of the opposition. There is nothing I can add to that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF PROVISION DISQUALIFYING PERSON FROM BENEFITS WHO WAS WORKING ON AN EXTENSION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could the minister advise the House whether he intends to remove from the Unemployment Insurance Act section 36.3, under which a claimant is disqualified if he has the heart to go to work on an extension? If he works for six weeks and his employer goes bankrupt, that claimant is disqualified under section 36.3 and is no longer entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if, as I understand, the hon. member is referring to what we call the 4-week rule under which a person cannot work more than four weeks without having his claim terminated, it is certainly our intention in the amendments we are presenting to the House to correct this situation which we think should be changed.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REACTION OF PROVINCES TO PROPOSALS RELATED TO MEDICAL CARE AND REVIEW OF JOINT PROGRAMS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that put by the leader of the NDP and is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House what the reaction of the provincial premiers was to his established program financing proposal in so far as it relates to the Medical Care Act and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought the reaction would have been given by the Premiers of those provinces. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not expect us to repeat what we hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The premiers, as far as I can see, are able to speak for themselves very adequately.

Mr. Yewchuk: In view of the repeated mention in his established program financing proposal of a joint federal-provincial review of health legislation and programs, would the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether he and the premiers had any discussion about the circumstances of such a review?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will direct that to the Prime Minister who was present at the meeting, which I was not.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE BY RAILWAY WORKERS AS RESULT OF VOTE ON HALL REPORT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that arithmetically the railway workers actually rejected the Hall Report by a narrow figure, can the minister advise whether the railway workers realized, when they voted, that significant items had been settled before the appointment of the Hon. Emmett Hall, and that the Hall Report was confined to matters of wages only?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that there may be some question as to just how many of the 95,000 railway workers in this country who voted really knew there were a lot of items, almost all, outside of wages that had been negotiated and removed from the bargaining table prior to the ballots going out. There is no question about that. I would also advise the hon. member that although a simple majority did marginally reject the Emmett Hall report, ten of the 16 unions had a majority within their own unions accepting it. The formula in terms of the constitution of the various unions committed the minorities to what the majority did. On that basis, in terms of the bylaws of the unions involved, it works out in theory to an acceptance of the Hall report by 54 per cent. Thus the associated railway unions advised me of their acceptance yesterday and are prepared now to sit down with railway management to negotiate an agreement on the basis of the Hall Report. I believe that means optimistically that there will be no strike in the railways as for as this year is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

POSSIBILITY MINISTER WILL ASCERTAIN WHY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS WANT TO STRIKE

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

As there has already been an agreement between the CATCA and the Treasury Board and as that same association has decided to go on strike because of racism, is the Minister of Labour willing to meet the union to ask how they justify the possibility of a strike and to persuade them not to strike strictly on the basis of their contempt for the French fact in Canada?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member, as I am sure he is aware, that the employees in question here—I understand his question although I did not hear the earlier part of it unfortunately—who are direct employees of the government do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Labour Department. As you know, we are involved in disputes for all those employees in federal jurisdiction outside of direct employees. So we have no direct role in this matter. Although I have some considerable sympathy with the area the hon. member is talking about I think his question probably should be directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

* * *

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION OF DUAL CHARGES—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. I should like to know whether a successful agreement has been negotiated between the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and the province of Saskatchewan where a situation has existed in which some $500,000 was siphoned off as a result of dual levies, first for the filleting cost at the local level and, second, the charge that was added because of the over-all filleting costs at the central plant.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, while not accepting at all the premise and the words used "siphoned off" which were indicated in the hon. member's question, I know that some weeks ago I met with the minister responsible for this area in Saskatchewan. We had agreed at that point that the position could be shared on the problem of recognizing Saskatchewan's particular situation. This would be a decision of course for the board of the corporation. I have no indication that this has not taken place but I will check into it.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, when the minister is carrying on his discussions will he determine whether the agreement that apparently may have been reached will result in greater returns to the fishermen themselves or whether it will only be the processors in Saskatchewan who will be in a better financial position.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I understand that both problems are closely related, since many of the fishermen belong to the co-operatives engaged in the activities in Saskatchewan. I certainly think that anything which allows the fishery in Saskatchewan to return better prices to the fishermen should be encouraged. On the other hand, I would remind the hon. member that the province did ask the federal government to put together this corporation. Their input should not be limited so that it is only on the sideline and only looks to the benefits to their own province because there are four provinces involved.

* * *

URBAN AFFAIRS

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER THAT TRUST COMPANIES ISSUING ONE-YEAR MORTGAGES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, I would direct my question to the acting minister. Keeping in mind that interest rates on mortgages have been increasing by three-quarters of one per cent for the last four years, I am wondering whether the minister is aware that some trust companies are offering one year mortgages, and if he is aware of this what action is he taking to correct that situation or to look into it.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a well known practice of mortgage companies to offer lower interest rates on mortgages of one year. They also offer five-year mortgages which are renewable after five years and the interest rate of course is a little higher. If the hon. member has a specific case he wants us to look into, I guess I would accept the question as notice.

Mr. Whiteway: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would direct this question to the parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that trust companies are offering a discount of one-quarter of one per cent, I wonder if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is aware of this and what they intend to do about the come-on offered by the trust companies in view of the long term implications this has on the amount of interest paid by Canadians taking out mortgages.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just answered. It is common practice to offer lower interest rates on one year mortgages.

* * *

● (1430)

[Translation]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION TO REDUCE QUEBEC'S TAXATION FIELD

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the fact that the federal-provincial conference came to an end yesterday and it seems that, in any event, the provinces will lose $750 million as a result of it, and that in the case of Quebec, it will mean a decrease of $250 million, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether in his discussions with the Quebec premier, the latter was given guarantees which might leave him some hope that the federal government will reverse its decision and that he will comply with the settlements already agreed upon? As a result of his statement, we have to believe that the Quebec premier still hopes to recover those $250 million. If he does not, it would seem that the Quebec premier is trying to keep the truth from the Quebecers.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand there will be a meeting of finance ministers in July and certain points will be discussed again. This enables Mr. Bourassa to say that there may be some hope. But on the other hand, the agreement concerning the guarantee to the provinces which was reached at the time of the tax reform terminates in 1976. Thus we meet our part of the commitment.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Considering the minister's remarks, it seems in any case that if I stick to his concrete answer this represents a decrease in income of $250 million for the province of Quebec at this time. Is it right?

Mr. Chrétien: Not this way, Mr. Speaker. At the time of the Canadian tax system reform, we assured the provinces we would protect them against changes during a certain period of time, but this period is already terminated and the Minister of Finance undertook to discuss the conditions of the new agreement, if any, during the meeting of the finance ministers next July.

* * *

[English]

TRADE

UNITED STATES IMPORT QUOTA ON SPECIAL STEEL PRODUCTS FROM CANADA—POSSIBLE DIVERSION OF FOREIGN SHIPMENTS TO CANADA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the United States has imposed import quotas on special steel products from Canada, can the minister say what action the government is contemplating, if any? Will a complaint be lodged under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that if we are going to take any action I would not want to indicate it specifically in advance. However, we have indicated a complaint, not in the GATT context as the hon. member has mentioned but to the U.S. directly, and we are considering what further steps may be undertaken.

Mr. Murta: In a supplementary question I would like to ask the minister whether there is any possibility that foreign shipments destined for the U.S. may be diverted to the Canadian markets, thus compounding the problems that our steel manufacturers will have. Has the government looked into this problem and, if so, could the minister inform the House?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, to some extent. I have not heard of it in precisely that fashion but if the hon. member or anyone else for that matter knows of any such action, we would be glad to hear about it. I think the hon. member would know as well that one company is primarily affected, and of course we are in constant touch with them.

* * *

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

BASIS ON WHICH GRANTS MADE TO PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF EFFECT ON PROVINCES OF FEDERAL PROPOSALS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. Will he assure the House that if the Prime Minister is really as concerned about equalization grants being as effective as possible for the low income provinces, as he stated yesterday, that his government will base those grants on the two top provinces within our federal system?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I have heard this proposal made on behalf of certain provinces. It will be considered, but I could not give any assurance that that would be equitable across the country. I am sure the hon. gentleman understands the importance of some restraint in government spending and I hope he supports us in this point of view.

Mr. Hogan: I want to suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that it would be the most equitable to do. In relation to the Prime Minister's remarks yesterday on cost sharing I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will table in the House or present to interested members of parliament the federal estimates of the effect of the federal proposals that were made at the first ministers conference, for example, on a province like Nova Scotia or New Brunswick over the next five years.

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I could not undertake to do that.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Sharp: These discussions are just in the preliminary stage. As my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has said, there will be further opportunities when the finance ministers meet to look more particularly at these problems. The purpose of the federal government in putting these proposals forward was to get some sort of reaction in principle before getting down to the necessary bargaining.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION ISRAEL HAS STOCK PILE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the government's posture of devout nuclear virginity and stern anti-proliferation of nuclear arms, may I ask if in the light of sustained and widespread reports of possession of substantial nuclear stock piles by the Republic of Israel, the minister can advise if the government of Canada has made any investigation of, or inquiry into, the serious allegations and, if so, has it cautioned the friendly government of Israel regarding the dangers of adding further highly incendiary elements to the already explosive Middle East situation?

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF LOCKOUT OF AIR CANADA FINANCE BRANCH EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I have been informed, and it has also been announced in the news media in Winnipeg today, that the management of Air Canada intends to lock out employees of the Air Canada finance branch in Winnipeg. I would like to ask the Minister of Labour to take necessary action to stop the lock out of employees of the finance branch until the federal mediator has completed his inquiry into the labour problems and filed his report with the Minister of Labour.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I believe the hon. member is well aware of the fact that we have had a mediator in on this situation for considerable time. Unfortunately, up to date, he has not been able to resolve an outstanding issue between the parties over which there is considerable emotion. I must say that this news about the possible lock out by Air Canada of the finance division is a relatively new development in the whole situation. We are looking at it very actively in the department right now. What we can do we will do in order to resolve this dispute and ameliorate the effects of any dislocation to the maximum extent possible.

Mr. McKenzie: If Air Canada proceeds with this lock out, I understand this will be the first time that a Crown agency or a government agency has locked out employees. Will the minister investigate to see if Air Canada has the legal right to lock out employees?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I certainly will, although I would be less than frank if I did not say that I believe that just as the union is in a strike position, so can the employer, from the legal point of view, be in the lock out position.

EDUCATION

PROPOSAL TO CREATE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL BODY TO DEAL WITH CERTAIN ASPECTS—POSITION OF PROVINCES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the government wants to attach strings to post-graduate education by the creation of a federal-provincial body to oversee certain aspects of education, can the minister tell the House if the provinces have agreed to this and what the make up of this proposed body might be?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member's description of our proposal is very accurate. I do not fault him for that, but it is not accurate. What we are saying at the federal level is that there are areas of national concern, areas to be described as national goals in post-secondary education. What we would like to do is to set up a mechanism, with the co-operation of the provinces, within which we can talk about these things, and we specified certain areas. Without putting words into the mouth of the provinces let me say that there was general sympathy for the idea and concern about the exact forum. I have written to the chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education suggesting that ministers of education and myself meet early in July to examine this proposal more fully, and I am optimistic that I will get a favourable response to that proposal.

Mr. Ritchie: Can the minister tell us if this proposal is primarily concerned with language training and post-graduate education?

● (1440)

Mr. Faulkner: Certainly, it is true that we are concerned about the implications of two official languages at the level of post secondary education, but that certainly is not the only area we would like to explore with them. We have talked about the state of Canadian studies and the problem of accessibility of low income students to our universities. These all seem to be issues of national importance. We are not trying to insinuate our way into the curriculum development of the university. We are not threatening academic freedom. We just believe these are issues of national importance, and in view of the fact that we are participating rather handsomely in terms of financing the post-secondary level, we should have an arrangement to discuss these matters with them.

* * *

[Translation]

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED PROHIBITION OF EXPORT OF CONTAMINATED FISH

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fisheries.

Since Mr. Claude Simard admitted yesterday at the Quebec National Assembly that the St. Lawrence eels are contaminated by PCB—polychlorinated biphenyl—and unfit for human consumption, and since 97 per cent of all eel catches in Quebec are exported, can the minister tell us if he will take the necessary action with his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to stop the export of poisoned fish or if he will warn those responsible to stop this pollution to keep the good reputation that Canadian exports enjoy?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I hope that what the hon. member said about poisoned fish will not have any repercussions on our market. I believe this type of statement can be irresponsible if it is not based on facts and well controlled scientific data. Having said this, I want to point out that we are extremely strict for export products. The inspection services of the provincial fisheries department and those of the federal government have close relationships in this regard. For inspections, in fact, the powers are delegated to federal authorities by the provincial government of Quebec. However, I do not foresee any difficulties. I shall check on the statements of the hon. member, but until then I hope no one will make any alarmist statements.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House whether he is cooperating with his provincial counterpart from Quebec, Mr. Claude Simard and, if so, why has Mr. Simard made such a statement? This did not come from me. The statement was made by Mr. Claude Simard and reported by newspapers this morning. I am well aware that it is nonsense to say that fish exported by Canada to other countries is poisoned. I find this ridiculous, but if they work together, how can the Quebec minister report such nonsense that could discredit our exports?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the normal precaution before reacting to a verbal statement based on a press report is to check exactly what was said. This is what I shall do.

* * *

[English)

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PROTECTION OF LANGUAGE RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES BEING MOVED FROM OTTAWA

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services, of which I have given him notice. In the welcome move of the superannuation section of the minister's department to Moncton, what assurances were sought by the government of Canada that the rights of the public servants who are being moved will be protected under the Official Languages Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question.

Treasury Board is now reviewing the conditions under which the government decentralization program should operate, in the case of employees. Of course, I made sure with local authorities about the extent to which a government unit using French in a proportion of about 30 per cent would be welcomed, and I am sure that local authorities are prepared to cooperate fully with the federal government. As to protecting the acquired rights of employees now working in the government pension division, this of course comes under the policy known to everybody and adopted by Parliament.

* * *

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF OVERRULING ANTI-INFLATION BOARD DECISIONS IN CASES OF WORKERS AT THOMPSON AND KITIMAT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour in the absence of the Minister of Finance. In the town of Kitimat, some 20 union members have now been arrested and jailed as a result of their belief in the AIB guidelines—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: —and it is also true that in the town of Thompson, Manitoba, we have another community being torn apart. In view of the confrontations which are now developing in the country, not between the companies and the unions but between the AIB and the unions, would the minister advise if he has investigated the option of overruling these AIB decisions, particularly when an historical relationship has been the problem, and whether his government has investigated whether any action can be expected from this government to overrule AIB rulings when northern communities are torn apart and strikes develop as a direct result of those rulings?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out two instances, but I have already indicated that the railway unions, in which there are 95,000 men involved, are prepared to negotiate on the basis of the Hall settlement, which hardly indicates a widespread confrontation over these particular guidelines.

In any event, not to detract from the hardship of the two communities about which the hon. member is talking, let me advise him that I hope the unions and the membership involved are aware of the appeal procedures now applicable in this situation. As far as Thompson is concerned, the administrator is in Thompson today gathering facts with respect to the situation in order to make his final ruling. There are procedures set out in the Act for appeal from his ruling and also reference to the cabinet. I am sure that the leadership is aware of that situation and will take advantage of the appeal provisions of the statute.

Mr. Leggatt: In the town of Kitimat it was a case of the workers in that town believing the AIB guidelines and winding up with an 8.9 per cent settlement, whereas their counterparts at Eurocan in the same community received an approved 18 per cent settlement from the AIB. My question is this: where this kind of disparity arises, not as a result of that decision but as a result of the confidence of the workers in the anti-inflation program, will the minister now make some representation to the company and the AIB to re-open that contract and see that these massive inequities are corrected in these northern communities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The appeal procedures are available under the Act, and I might say that the party of which the hon. member is a member made strong representations with respect to the inclusion of these appeal procedures, to which we responded.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Just a minute, please. I believe that there is enough latitude there to have this situation reviewed, if they wish to take advantage of the procedures. Certainly, in terms of any contact with the Department of Labour or our staff with respect to these difficulties and any requests for representations to be made have not been made with respect to the Kitimat situation.

* * *

FISHERIES

POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR INCREASED SURVEILLANCE WORK AND USE OF "BRAS D'OR" AS PATROL VESSEL

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). The minister has indicated that his department plans to double the level of boardings and inspections this year in the ICNAF area, which will mean about 1,200 boardings carried out with the assistance of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport. This will, of course, require additional funds for new ships, and I would like to ask the minister whether there will be supplementary funds provided for this purpose.

Second, since the taxpayers of Canada have contributed $58 million toward the construction of the 200 ton experimental hydrofoil ship HMCS Bras d'Or, commissioned in 1971 and now mothballed until 1981, has the minister given any thought to utilizing this expensive prototype in fisheries surveillance work, even though the ship does not have a weapons system or sonar devices, which are not necessary for surveillance?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the doubling of the number of boardings can be done with the present hardware available in terms of ships and planes. In the case of the tracker aircraft there will have to be some upgrading of the present equipment, particularly radar. We do not expect to have a supplementary estimate for this. We are absorbing part of it in the fisheries program by cutting corners in other places, and other departments involved are also absorbing the increased cost, utilizing the existing destroyers and the existing aircraft, and in the case of the Ministry of Transport, existing vessels, particularly icebreaker capacity which we need in the region of Hamilton Inlet and off the Labrador coast at certain times of the year.

● (1450)

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? In trials in 1969, the year after she was launched, the Bras d'Or established the reputation of being the fastest warship in the world by reaching the approximate speed of 62 knots. Since she will be 12 years old in 1981, the end of the mothballing period, does the government intend to let the ship wear out while sitting high and dry at a yearly cost of $30,000? What are the government's plans for this expensive prototype?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON STATIONING AIRCRAFT AND SHIPS IN NEWFOUNDLAND FOR PATROL WORK

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of State responsible for fisheries concerns the maximum use of existing aircraft and surface craft. Bearing in mind the doubling of the number of boardings for enforcing ICNAF regulations and the increased surveillance which will be necessary as a consequence of our declaring our 200 mile economic zone, does the government intend to station aircraft and surface ships in Newfoundland, in order to maximize their use?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I do not necessarily accept that there will be need for increased surveillance in the 200 mile zone. There is the right to arrest, the right to issue permits, the right to cancel permits, etc. There will be the obligation on the part of the foreign vessel to inform Canadian authorities where it intends to move from week to week, and so on. This should simplify matters but I do not disagree that we will need a credible surveillance. As for the stationing of aircraft, I might say that at the moment it is planned to have aircraft stopping in Newfoundland with crew changes to take place after one week or ten days, depending on the requirements of the military. The servicing of these aircraft, which have reached a certain age, can best be carried out at the Halifax facilities, but we intend in future to have a greater surveillance capacity in Newfoundland than we have at present.

* * *

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING GUIDELINES ON DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, before the question period I tried to move a motion under Standing Order 43 with respect to the decentralization of government departments. My motion may have been misconstrued. I was not asking for cabinet minutes with respect to that matter. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board if guidelines have been established by cabinet or Treasury Board in a form which can be tabled in this House to do with the decentralization of government departments? I ask this because it is a matter of importance for the administration of the Public Service of Canada, the personnel involved and areas and municipalities involved. Are there such guidelines? If there are, can the minister arrange to table them? If not, will he arrange as soon as possible to have them prepared, so that everyone will know the ground rules with respect to decentralization?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have myself made a few speeches on the matter and outlined the ground rules for the federal government decentralization policy. I will inquire whether there would be some information I could table and which could be acceptable to the hon. member. I must say, however, that, according to my recollection, we established this policy last year and afterwards it became one of the most important planks in the leadership campaign program of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain seeking to be elected leader of the party. He is now leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

* * *

[English]

PUBLIC WORKS

REGULATIONS GOVERNING USE OF POLYCHLORIDE PLASTICS IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister please tell the House if his department has internal, I stress internal, regulations strictly governing the use of polychloride plastics in the construction of public projects, owing to their potential danger as a fire hazard?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. There are extensive regulations coming under the national building code and the Canadian Government Specifications Board as well as regulations under the national fire code. In cases where we, ourselves, do not have them, reference may be made to the American society for testing materials. All of those comprise a thick document covering a whole range of polychlorides. If the hon. gentleman is interested in something specific, I will be glad to advise him.

* * *

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR FAILURE TO LABEL POLYCHLORIDE PLASTICS AS HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the minister's reply, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? If the Department of Public Works considers polychloride plastics as a fire hazard so serious that they have introduced strict regulations regarding their use, why does the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not even require such products to be labelled under the Hazardous Products Act?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall simply have to find out and inform the hon. gentleman.

FAILURE OF FORD MOTOR COMPANY TO REPLACE DAMAGED TRUCKS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since Harley Peterson of Condor, Alberta, purchased a new one-ton Ford truck in June, 1975 which he found, after taking delivery, to have been damaged in transit, and since the Ford Motor Company of Canada has refused to replace the vehicle with a new, undamaged one, would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in his efforts to protect Canadian consumers, personally put ministerial pressure on that company and ask it to fulfil its obligation to Mr. Peterson, and thereby protect Canadian consumers generally?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Since it will soon be two years since Dr. Noel Hall was given the important assignment of reviewing all aspects of railway pensions, is the minister in a position to give a new forecast as to when that report might be submitted and presented to the House?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had notification from Dr. Hall approximately three weeks ago indicating that he has taken time off from the university, gone on a sabbatical, taken the various material and actuarial studies with him, and would complete the report shortly. I expect it any time, hopefully by the end of June or the middle of July.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How long is the sabbatical?

* * *

INCOME TAX

KNOWLEDGE OF DEPARTMENT OF PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON MORTGAGE TO OFFSHORE LENDING COMPANY

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Has he determined the answer to my question of June 14, as to how the government knows if Canadians who are paying interest on off-shore or foreign mortgages have declared this obligation to the Canadian government?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have looked into this matter, as raised by the hon. member. Unfortunately, we can do little. Really, it involves a bookkeeping problem for banks in the United States. We ran into the same situation in Florida but were able to convince the internal revenue service that something should be done, and it was. We shall make similar representations in the area about which the hon. member is concerned, as well.

* * *

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POSSIBILITY OF MOVING A BRANCH OF DEPARTMENT TO CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. I apologize for not sending him notice; at the same time I commend him for his recent announcement about the decentralization of government services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister will soon be in the position to announce a similar decentralization involving Cape Breton Island, an area which, as the minister well knows, suffers from very high levels of unemployment. If the minister cannot answer today, we are very patient and will be glad to hear from him in the next week or so.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, up to now my rate of announcements has been one a year. I expect the hon. member will have to wait one year before we announce another decentralization.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting Reports from Standing and Special committees.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period the Minister of Labour inadvertently misled the House when he suggested, with respect to the contract under which workers at Kitimat are controlled, that there is some appeal procedure available to them under the AIB legislation. The reverse is the fact. The contract has been signed; the problem is with regard to re-opening the contract. There is no provision in the law for that. I do not think the minister would wish to leave the wrong impression with the House, and perhaps would like an opportunity to correct what he said.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity the hon. member has given me in this regard. I was considering getting up tomorrow. I was referring to the Thompson situation when I indicated that there is an appeal procedure open to those workers and that my office would be available to them also. I was not referring to the appeal procedure as it applies to Kitimat.

● (1500)

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PERFORMING ARTS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION BY WORKERS IN ANGLOPHONE FILM INDUSTRY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of the film workers in the Anglophone Canadian film industry. I advise you, Sir, that the member of parliament for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) and the member of parliament for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) are associated with me in this presentation.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are marked by an asterisk.)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 5,091, 5,163, 5,166, 5,330 and 5,552.

[Text]

$500 HOME OWNER GRANT—CONSTITUENCY OF TÉMISCAMINGUE

Question No. 5,091—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

Since the implementation of the programme of grants awarded for the purchasing of non-commercial housing (a) how much was spent in the Constituency of Témiscamingue (b) how many persons in the Constituency expressed their desire to receive such grants (c) how many received a grant (d) what was the distribution of such grants in the Constituency?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: (a), (c) and (d) See Table following; (b) Data on the number of applications are not available.

NOTE: Data on activity under the NHA are compiled by municipal county in Quebec, and not by Federal electoral constituency.

$500 Home Owner Grant—Municipal County of Témiscamingue

Municipality	Number of Grants	Amount $
Angiers	1	500
Belleterre	3	1,500
Duhamel West	1	500
Évain	31	15,500
Lorrainville	5	2,500
Moffet	1	500
Noranda	23	11,500
Notre-Dame-du-Nord	3	1,500
Rouyn	110	55,000

Order Paper Questions

Municipality	Number of Grants	Amount $
St-Édouard-de-Fabre	3	1,500
St-Placide-de-Béarn	2	1,000
Témiscamingue: Town	17	8,500
Ville-Marie	7	3,500
Unorganized	2	1,000
Total	209	104,500

TESTING OF SMOKE CONTROL SYSTEM—PLACE DU PORTAGE

Question No. 5,163—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the smoke control system tested before completion of the building at Place du Portage and were certain deficiencies found and, if so, what were they?

2. Was the system retested on completion of the building and (a) if so (i) on what date (ii) by whom (b) if not, was a letter sent to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs asserting that everything was in order and, if so (i) who signed it (ii) on what date was it sent?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. (a) The Division of Building Research of the National Research Council conducted a series of research tests in March 1973 prior to the completion of the building and submitted a report to the Dominion Fire Commissioner. As a result of these tests, the National Research Council modified and refined the criteria for smoke control system design which were published as Change Series 3 of the National Building Code in October 1973; (b) Deficiencies found in these research tests were: (i) The smoke control shaft was found to be leaky in the sense that concrete block is more porous than poured concrete. (ii) The air supply ducts were interconnected between floors which tended to neutralize the suction pressures of the venting action by the smoke shaft. (iii) The roof hatch of the smoke shaft was found to be defective. (iv) Unsealed openings were found in masonry walls through which ducts and pipes entered vertical service and pipe shafts. (v) Air flow was found to be diverted into stairshafts on opening of an exit door to a stair on test floor. Doors were installed in stair shafts to prevent chimney effect in a stair enclosure.

2. (a) No. (i) Not applicable; (ii) not applicable. (b) No. (i) Not applicable; (ii) Not applicable.

SPRINKLER PROTECTION SYSTEM—PLACE DE VILLE

Question No. 5,166—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was a sprinkler protection system programmed for completion on all floors of Tower A of Place de Ville during 1976 and, if so (a) how far advanced is the installation (b) what is the estimated date of completion?

2. Was a similar sprinkler protection system programmed for Towers B and C and, if not, for what reason?

3. Was such a system actually ordered for Towers B and C by a directive of the Department of Public Works and, if so, for what reason was this directive ignored?

4. What are the reasons such a sprinkler system was not installed in all three towers at the time of construction?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. No. (a) Not applicable; (b) not applicable.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

2. No. These are privately owned leased buildings and subject to requirements of City of Ottawa Building Bylaws. Sprinkler systems were not required by the National Building or Fire Codes except in basement areas.

3. No.

4. At the time of construction, there was no requirement in any code or bylaw for sprinkler protection in other than basement areas of a building.

SENIOR CITIZENS HOUSING—CONSTITUENCY OF TÉMISCAMINGUE

Question No. 5,330—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

Has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation granted loans to certain municipalities in the Constituency of Témiscamingue for the construction of senior citizens homes and, if so (a) what municipalities are concerned (b) what are the names of the establishments (c) what are the (i) amounts (ii) terms of the loans?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: CMHC has made one loan to Quebec Housing Corporation to finance the construction of a housing project for senior citizens, in the municipal county of Témiscamingue. The project, Maison Pie XII, is located in the City of Rouyn, and the loan totalled $790,844, to be repaid over a term of 50 years at an interest rate of 6-7/8 per cent.

NOTE: Data on operations under the NHA are compiled by CMHC on the basis of Municipal Counties in Quebec, not on the basis of federal electoral constituencies.

BILINGUAL DISTRICTS

Question No. 5,552—Mr. Horner:

1. How many bilingual districts have been named in each province to date?

2. In each case, was the (a) provincial government (b) municipality involved consulted before such districts were designated?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The Official Languages Act provides under Section 9(1) for services to the public in both official languages in certain locations, including 'the National Capital Region'. Section 12 of the Act provides that '... the Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation establish one or more federal bilingual districts ... '. The Governor in Council has not proclaimed any bilingual districts to date.

2. Not applicable.

* * *

[Translation]

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 5,469?

[Text]

*REDUCTION IN PURCHASE OF MANITOBA LIGHT CRUDE

Question No. 5,469—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has there been a reduction in the purchase of Manitoba Light Crude by 40% and, if so, for what reason?

2. How long will this reduced allocation last in this time of oil shortage?

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the hon. member's question is as follows: 1. During the month of April 1976, an equipment failure in the refinery of a major user of Manitoba crude oil caused a temporary reduction of about 5,000 barrels per day in the demand for this oil. 2. Demand for this oil was restored in May.

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* * *

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My question No. 4,957 has been on the order paper since March 15. It deals with complaints with regard to price increases and rollbacks by the Anti-Inflation Board. The question relates to a board which ought to be able to give the answers very, very quickly. However, this has not been the case. I ask the parliamentary secretary to take notice of my point of order and to ensure that the Anti-Inflation Board expedites the answers to these questions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—STATE OF TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East) moved:

That this House views with alarm the accelerating collapse of the Canadian textile industry, rejects the fatalistic inertia of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and demands serious action to counter the ruinous pressure from excessively high import levels.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, before touching upon the particular and central subject of this debate, namely, the Canadian textile industry, I think it is very timely that we discuss in this House this afternoon some of the things relating to the economy and the atmosphere created by the government vis-à-vis business in general.

It goes without saying that governments are not meant to represent big anything; they are meant to represent the people. That is almost a cliché. It is something we sometimes forget. Of course governments are not meant to represent big institutions, be they unions or big business.

I want to underline time and time again this afternoon that a government cannot and should not be the spokesman for any particular segment of society or the economy. Having said that, I want to state that the government has absolutely no excuse for what I call the degree of anti-business bias that it has shown under eight years of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), our former leader, mentioned in Nova Scotia some nights ago that the time for confrontation between major interests in society is over, and the time for conciliation is here. I agree. If anyone in this House thinks I am kidding about that, just go from one end of this country to the other and talk to businessmen. They will say that never in the last 40 years have they been given such a hostile reception as they have been given by this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members opposite do not like to hear the truth. It is going to take more than the seraphic smile of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) to rectify this situation. This anti-business bias and anti-business climate are even exaggerated in the case of the Canadian textile industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, what are we dealing with in the House today? We are discussing whether or not, in the near future, we shall have a textile industry in this country and I wish to state most emphatically that unless we do something right now, we shall not have any.

[English]

It has been said time and time again by businessmen in this country that business leaders and businessmen from other countries receive here in Ottawa a much more cordial and decent reception than our domestic businessmen. I think the minister will have to explain this. We have brought this motion before the House of Commons today purely and simply because we on this side of the House believe that if immediate action is not forthcoming, not just promises and words, much sooner than later we shall not have a Canadian textile industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I spoke with several executives in the textile industry. In my view there is no cooperation in this area between the Ottawa officials and the industry which can compare with the kind of cooperation existing in the United States between Washington and the textile industry.

In Ottawa decisions are made without consultations with the private sector, with the industry. I do not wish to blame the minister in question all the time but his officials are often in the foreground and he is responsible. On many occasions, and I am sure many hon. members will agree with me, businessmen and textile manufacturers are informed by government officials that a decision has been made without any previous consultation.

● (1510)

[English]

I think it is very important to call attention to this state of affairs. For the last five or six years, as I have gone around the country, businessmen in the textile sector have been telling me they cannot understand the hostility shown to them by federal civil servants. It is almost as though they were not welcome here in Ottawa. I know the minister is not entirely to blame.

I want to say at the outset that I agree with much of the government's policy in connection with the textile industry. The fact is, however, that the policy we build up in the House of Commons is not carried out or, when it is carried out, it is too late—the damage has been done. This is a general consideration, one we should speak and think about in the House. I am not going to start being sensational, but I believe this is a problem which faces each and every one of us as parliamentarians, be we on the government side or on the opposition side. In the last year or so I have talked to many ministers who have told me privately that on many occasions the intentions of the bills and the orders we have drafted in the House of Commons have been completely controverted in subsequent regulations made by the bureaucrats—the whole intent of the law has been controverted by civil servants interpreting it in their own fashion or putting up roadblocks or, as in the case of the textile industry, failing to apply it. This applies to many policies which we have approved as legislators in the House of Commons. This being the case, as I believe it is, let us debate the issue openly because it is my opinion that in many instances the government has built up a monster in the form of a bureaucracy which nobody can control.

[Translation]

As far as textile is concerned, I fully agree with the policy as a whole but, unfortunately, we are here to find an answer to a very serious problem for several members, especially members from Quebec. I would say that in general I totally agree with most of the government's policy but it should act responsibly, and it is not a policy which is implemented often enough by the officials concerned.

[English]

I would simply like to say this: I am very suspicious, after being around here for a few years—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are just a young fellow.

Mr. Grafftey: I am more than suspicious that some very influential officials and some cabinet ministers believe that the textile industry in Canada is expendable. They are not alone in this point of view. I have talked to businessmen in big cities, men who have nothing to do with the textile industry and who have never lived in textile towns, who say that the textile industry is expendable. That is the conventional wisdom within much of the bureaucracy which has to apply textile policy.

The minister is a good minister in many ways. He is loyal to his civil servants, unlike some of his colleagues. But if he is really frank with the House he will admit he has run into this head-in-the-sand conventional wisdom that, for one reason or another, the textile industry in Canada is expendable. If this is what the minister is hearing from his advisers, whether in the private sector or in the public service, I think he should level with us because we are talking now about the survival of an industry which is important not only to Eastern Canada and to various other areas of the country, but to Canada as a whole. It is imperative that we find a good solution and a long term solution to the problems of a troubled industry.

In my view it would be disastrous to accept the conventional wisdom that somehow or other we can get along very well in this country without a textile industry. I want to make it abundantly clear that we in the Progressive Conservative party are committed to the existence of a viable textile industry here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: I can almost hear the minister saying, when he replies to the debate, "We, too, are committed to that objective." But, Mr. Speaker, ministers on the other side have been saying that for far too many years, and every year the situation has been getting worse and worse. I am not speaking only on behalf of the industry. I am speaking on behalf of all Canadians who want this industry to continue. Ministers whose responsibility this is will have to replace mere words with action and prove the sincerity of their undertaking. The industry does not need any more studies, commissions, reports, and committees of investigation. What the industry needs is a firm declaration from the government that there is a national will in favour of its continued existence, along with concrete measures which will bring some hope for the future.

I have always said that the federal government is shortsightedly living off the short-term windfall benefits resulting from the sale of our natural resources while letting in cheap imports. This is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that these imports will always be cheap. Once we have destroyed the means of Canadian production, what happens? One of the hon. members who sits opposite said to me the other day that he used to be able to go into a store and buy shirts, for instance, made in the Far East at a price far cheaper than anything we could match here, but that this situation was now coming to an end; the imported shirts were getting more and more expensive.

The government talks about the benefits the public derives from cheap imports. Mr. Speaker, those benefits are very short-lived. Take binder twine, for instance. We warned the government time and time again of what would happen if a domestic supply of binder twine were not available to farmers. People who should have known better allowed this industry to be destroyed by cheap imports, using the excuse that the farmer was benefiting from lower prices. What has happened? Only a year or so after the local industry was destroyed the price has risen by three times.

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Grafftey: I apply this situation, by analogy, to the textile industry. Consumers should not swallow the bait that they would be better off by getting short-term benefits. Quite apart from that, what happens when our natural resources run out? From what source can the government expect further windfall benefits to finance social programs?

The point is this: we have been saying, both inside and outside the House for a number of years, that the government has no industrial strategy. If we are wrong, then in the name of goodness will you tell the House what it is? Will you tell the businessmen about it because they are waiting to hear you? I do not intend to get mixed up in philosophy, in a discussion of the merits of private industry and free enterprise versus socialism, and so on; what I am asking is this: in the name of goodness tell us where you want business to go, because we don't know. I am not saying we want Mr. Howe or his ghost back. I am asking for some indication of a general industrial strategy for this country.

● (1520)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to intervene, and I do not do so because the time of the hon. member has expired, far from it. I would just invite the hon. member, who has been addressing himself directly to the minister, to address himself to the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly correct my mistake, and I apologize once again.

[English]

I just want to underline in general the necessity for an industrial strategy for Canada, which is no more emphasized than by the situation in which the textile industry finds itself at the present time. I should like to make one last general remark before citing some global statistics vis-à-vis the textile industry. I have always felt that, unlike any other country that I know of, particularly in the western world, many of our senior bureaucrats and some ministers of the Crown think that the textile industry is expendable. They have this old-fashioned international trade philosophy, which I suggest is about 40 years out of date, that says "So long as you guys take our natural resources, some of our foodstuffs and our raw materials, to heck with the textile industry, it is expendable". I have heard that alluded to, being on the opposition side for so long, and I am sure the minister would like it to be prolonged.

We do not always get to talk with the senior bureaucrats as frankly as the minister does, but I am pretty darned sure that that is the advice he gets. It is a saw-off—"You take our natural resources, our foodstuffs and so on, and we will keep talking to the textile industry and try and keep them happy, though we really do not think they are viable". That is a disastrous situation.

Mr. Pelletier: You are too much.

Mr. Grafftey: You say I am too much.

[Translation]

Did the hon. member talk with the leaders of Sherbrooke?

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, at meetings that you did not even attend.

Mr. Grafftey: I want to put a question to the hon. member because his intervention seems quite strange at this time. Did the hon. member talk with the union leaders, with the heads of companies? Are they satisfied with the present government's textile policy?

Mr. Pelletier: That is not the question.

Mr. Grafftey: I agree, that is not the question. You have the answer and the best thing for you to do now is to keep quiet a little while.

[English]

There is also the question of the Third World countries. I am proud to be a Canadian, and I say that in a non-partisan way, in terms of our responsibilities in international trade and so on. There is nothing partisan about this. But there is another conventional wisdom which says that if we get tough in the textile sector we will be damaging the ability of the Third World countries to export. I have heard that debate. The fact is that Canada is doing one heck of a lot more than any other country in terms of permitting the Third World to be viable exporters, whether of textiles or any other materials.

I am not going to get into the general debate as to whether we are tough negotiators or not. I am as aware as any member of this House of the rightfully legitimate aspirations of emerging Third World countries, emerging not in the political sense but in the economic sense. But while we are leading the world in our understanding of this, I am sure that even the Third World countries do not want our textile industry to disappear completely, as it is beginning to do at this time. The reason we are debating this question today is that we on this side of the House firmly believe——that if immediate measures are not taken in the very near future, the textile industry will disappear.

[Translation]

[English]

Are we talking about completely sacrificing this traditional industry when we talk about our position in relation to the third world? This is nor an original statement of mine, but I will repeat it. Obviously what is needed is a rationalization of our approach. Some might say, what does the word "rationalization" mean?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but there is a point I should like clarified by the hon. member and the House at this time. It concerns a point of procedure.

Hon. members are aware that the motion before the House at this time is one moved by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour). The fact that be moved the motion means, according to citation 166(4) of Beauchesne, he is considered as being the spokesman for the official opposition, and he is considered as having spoken. He is also the one who is entitled to speak for 30 minutes as spokesman for the opposition and according to Standing Order 58(13) only one member of the official opposition and one member of the government are entitled to 30 minutes. Since the hon. member for Regina East, under the rules, is considered to have spoken, and that right having been used, hon. members will agree with me, perhaps by unanimous consent, that the House would allow the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) to go beyond his time and complete his remarks. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to thank you sincerely. I understand your ruling and I appreciate the House's courtesy. That means that I still have 10 minutes left. I took the 20 minutes allowed to me.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have asked for more than that and the House agreed. If the hon. member wants to limit himself to 10 minutes, that is his own decision.

Mr. Grafftey: To those officials and others who declare the conventional wisdom that the textile industry is expendable, to those in their ivory towers who have never visited a textile town, I am going to say this. I realize that the textile industry is spread across Canada in every province. But in my own part of Canada when you talk of a textile town you are talking of a one industry town. These are towns with a population of 12,000, 15,000, 25,000 people. Very often a large primary textile plant is the only employer. Do not ask me why. Sometimes these towns have industrial commissaires, as we say in French, but they never have any industry in addition to the textile industry. Up until recently labour has not been generously paid; les salaires ne sont pas fameux. Especially the older workers lack mobility. In human terms and in terms of suffering, it is not just ordinary unemployment that hits a textile town; it is devastating unemployment, grinding unemployment, unemployment of the worst kind.

These workers not only lack mobility, Mr. Speaker, especially if they have been working until they are 45 or 55 years of age and then have to find work somewhere else. Apart from the fundamental consideration that any country with a secondary industrial base, such as Canada, must have a viable textile industry, I appeal to those—and I declare there are many—who say that the textile industry is expendable to reconsider their point of view, and I ask them to visit towns not only in Quebec but all over Canada that depend on this one industry.

If the United States government had let happen in the U.S. what we are now letting happen in Canada, the United States textile industry would have disappeared over five years ago. Domestic consumption in Canada accounts for about 46 per cent of textile output, extending to approximately 200,000 jobs. Compare this with Japan where 90 per cent of the industry is domestic. I have already alluded to the United States. Eighty per cent of the consumption of textiles in the United States is of goods from the domestic industry, as is the case in many of the EEC countries. As I am sure many hon. members are aware, this is accomplished through quotas instead of by tariffs. If we can hold our own with the EEC and the United States there would be a minimum of 150,000 more jobs created in Canada. This is not going to be easy. There are 200,000 jobs involved in making the textiles imported into Canada from abroad, and I suggest that 150,000 domestic jobs could be created because of the superior productivity of Canadian textile manufacturing.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

● (1530)

The Canadian textile trade represents 1 per cent of the world-wide market or, as I said before, 200,000 jobs, and imports represent 54 per cent. That is, there are 200,000 jobs approximately in other countries, and I have already alluded to the increased productivity in Canada, so that we stand a good chance of creating 150,000 more jobs here in our own country. Canada's consumption is 2 per cent of world consumption, whereas manufacturing represents 1 per cent of world production.

Having listened, not only to industrial spokesmen, but to many others including union spokesmen, it is my view that if we froze imports we could bring production up to a satisfactory level. That would not mean we would diminish the status quo of the Third World countries. It would probably take four years to get production up to the level of 80 per cent of the domestic market by Canadian manufacturers.

As I said before, the United States has comprehensive quotas from yarn to finished product, and I believe this is what the Canadian industry vitally wants. It is the domestic industry which keeps prices low. If we lose the viable domestic industry, and I have already made the argument in respect of the binder twine situation regarding agricultural products, then prices may well skyrocket. This is arguable but not so arguable as prices are now; however, if we eliminate domestic competition I suggest prices will skyrocket.

Trade agreement rules are the same for the United States, Canada, and many other countries. As I have said time and time again——and at the beginning of my remarks, the rules as applied in other countries are not applied by the civil servants here in Canada.

[Translation]

[English]

Of countries that are rapidly developing, only Canada is short-term in its outlook in that we do not have comprehensive tariffs, although I have argued this afternoon basically for the quota approach. The suggestion is to freeze the basic quota on imports, and the domestic percentage of production increase will be Canadian without affecting the status quo of Third World imports. Quotas should conform to the average of U.S. and EEC quotas.

The Canadian textile industry is advocating a quota policy similar to that of the United States instead of placing the emphasis on tariffs. Foreign imports would not be cut back, but instead would be frozen until Canadians regained a share of their market equal to the United States control of its domestic market. When this occurred this freeze on imports would be replaced with a quota system which would be kept on par, with U.S. quotas.

It is fair to say that we are talking about a four-year period or something in that general time frame. I think it is also fair to say that Third World countries would understand the rational approach we are taking in this regard.

Before moving the motion, and I think from what you have said, Mr. Speaker, I might have some difficulty in that regard, but we will cross that bridge when we come to it—

An hon. Member: It has already been moved.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I am very fortunate when it comes to the rules in being not too far away from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The Standing Committee of the Senate on Banking, Trade and Commerce was seized of many problems concerning the Canadian textile industry. Before moving the motion I would like to put on record some—

An hon. Member: At least you are consistent.

Mr. Grafftey: I would like to put on record some of the more salient points that were touched upon there. The minister is already aware of them, but I think they should be headlined.

In spite of increasing textile and clothing exports the Canadian negative trade balance has grown by an average annual rate of 16 per cent since 1969, and had reached $1.1 billion by 1974. This is not only a serious matter for the textile industry; we on this side of the House suggest it is a serious matter also for Canada. I have already referred to the delays that take place in implementing decisions, and I note here the lengthy and damaging procedural delays which often follow the completion of any inquiry of the Textile Clothing Board. We know that in nine separate cases four months lapsed between the time the board's reports were submitted to the minister and the date when the reports were tabled and made public.

We often hear, and I think very unfairly, that the domestic industry in Canada does not have a good rate of productivity. Let me point out simply that, compared to other countries, and I have already underlined this in terms of job creation, productivity is pretty good. Let us consider comparative statistics here in Canada. Productivity in the textile industry has increased over the past decade at an average rate of 5.1 per cent compared with 4.2 per cent for all manufacturing. I think that is a pretty good record. Let me say to all those critics who suggest that some parts of our textile industry are obsolete, they are obsolete in many instances because the industry will not invest in new, modern plants until it gets some long-term direction from the federal government.

In addition to problems created in the industry by delays and the lack of vigorous administration of textile policy, there are many elements of the policy itself which militate against its stated objective, that is, to provide a sense of direction and a framework and conditions within which the textile and clothing industry can plan and invest with a greater degree of confidence.

Finally, another element of the policy, or lack of it, which has adversely affected the whole industry relates to the required climate of confidence and stability and the necessity of the board to recommend immediate removal of restraint measures or to refrain from recommending new measures on the basis of short-term marketing considerations. I think anyone who recognizes the working of the appeal board and the delays in the short-term considerations recognizes what an important matter this is.

In closing I would say it is apparent to us on this side of the House that the Canadian textile industry is in serious danger. We brought this debate on this afternoon because we believe that unless we have no more commissions, no more studies, no more of this and that, but instead immediate action, the industry will be in greater danger.

I sympathize with the minister because he will have to come down pretty hard on a lot of senior officials who will say to him behind closed doors, "We are expendable, and many of these things will have to go down the drain before we can export this, that, and the other thing." I hope the minister will level with us and give the country in general, and the textile industry in particular, a strategy of hope for the future.

[Translation]

For the reasons I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I cannot move this motion. Would you enlighten me, Mr. Speaker? Frankly and sincerely, I find the situation rather complex. May I second . . . but the motion is already seconded—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion has already been moved. Notice appeared on the Order Paper and the motion was moved by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour) and seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The hon. member was just speaking on the motion.

● (1540)

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I thank you ever so much for your very kind assistance. Under the circumstances, obviously the only thing for me to do at the end of my three speeches is to ask the House to support our motion.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, even though the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) did not move the motion I should like to congratulate him for his good intentions. I certainly also wish to express my admiration for his passion regarding the position of the textile industry. I think this does him a great deal of credit. Nevertheless, I think I would be less than frank if I did not say that I found some of his remarks somewhat too simple in the sense that they did not answer the questions. While I can understand the deep emotion behind his concern about the industry, the situation is not as straightforward as he would put it, nor do we have any really clear indication what the Conservative party would be prepared to do officially in this regard.

When the hon. member says that he wants quotas put on and wants to lower imports from other countries completely over a period of years, I can understand that as it affects Canadian workers. However, I cannot understand it as it concerns our international responsibilities. Surely the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, who is well known in this House of Commons for his sentiments regarding assistance to countries around the world, is not serious when he says that Canada should stop all imports from other countries, if I understood him correctly, or place an immediate quota on them until the industry revives, and then when the industry revives, establish some high level of import quota.

Mr. Grafftey: I did not say that.

Mr. Saltsman: The other thing he did not make very clear is whether his party is a high tariff party and whether it wants to see the tariff increased. There is in fact a very considerable tariff on textiles now. I fail to understand his argument when he says that if there were no foreign textile industry Canadian prices of textiles would be higher than they are now. In fact the reason we have some of the highest textile prices in the world is the protection given to the textile industry in Canada, as inadequate as the hon. member may think it is.

The point is that the consumers of Canada are clearly being asked to pay higher prices for the goods they consume in order to protect a vital industry in this country. The question is to what extent can we bring up the level of protection, and to what extent does his party officially stand as a high protection party, and is his leader prepared to go back to Alberta, or to any of the other western provinces which historically have had a grievance with Quebec and Ontario, where the textile industry is located, and where the people have said that they have had to pay through the nose in order to provide jobs in Ontario and Quebec when they could have bought this type of goods at a much lower price, and advocate that?

I think it is grossly unfair for the hon. member in this kind of a situation to say that he thinks there is a problem. In some ways I think this motion misses what is the core of the problem, not only in the textile industry but in other industries as well. I agree with the hon. member when he says that the absence of an industrial strategy is one of the problems. The government never has developed an industrial strategy or, if it has, it has been a piecemeal policy that is squeezed out of it from time to time by accident. Nor do I understand why the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi would take off on the personnel of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The fault lies squarely with the government. A government is responsible for policy.

Why is it that whenever anything goes wrong the Conservative party always places the blame not where is squarely belongs on those who have authority but rather on the public servants. The public servants take orders from the minister and the government who are responsible for policy. If there is something wrong with textile policy they should blame the government and the minister if they wish, but they should not blame the public servants who will do whatever the government tells them to do.

Surely the hon. member is not telling us that if his party were to form the government they would not be able to do anything because public servants would prevent them doing it, or that they would have to have wholesale layoffs of public servants in order to have a textile policy. Surely that is not the case.

I think the most serious reason we have this great present difficulty in the textile industry is the high level of unemployment. When you have 7.4 per cent to 7.5 per cent of the population unemployed no one can think straight about what should be done in terms of our responsibilities to our own people as against our responsibilities internationally. Everyone starts looking inwards and tries to protect every single job. That is very understandable. The point is that there can be no solution for the textile industry or any other worthy industry so long as 7.4 per cent of the people are unemployed, because then the first priority of every member of this House becomes one of getting people back to work and ensuring jobs for the future. The danger is that jobs may be found to our detriment as a country living among other countries in terms of our own responsibilities to other people.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

While we have problems in this country and must consider those problems, I do not think our problems are of such a nature that we have to turn our backs on the rest of the world and say Canada will become protectionist and that what happens in other countries is just too bad, that charity begins at home. Therefore it seems to me that the first priority must be full employment in order to get the textile industry going again. Only under conditions of full employment can any rationalization of industry take place. I have been a person who has looked at this industry over many years. The industry has been in trouble as long as I can remember. There has been one trouble or another. When we have a high level of unemployment such as exists now, then of course demand is low in the country and the purchasing power is not there to pick up a lot of the output. But the industry was in trouble as well when we had a fuller level of employment.

It was not so many years ago that representations were being made to members of parliament to open the flood gates of immigration in order to feed the textile industry of Canada because it could not get people to work in the industry. The point is that under full employment, as difficult as that may be, what happens is that change can take place. When you have full employment, when there are alternate jobs, people can move between industries. The industry can rationalize itself. It knows that there is consumer purchasing power.

What has happened is that some of our textile firms have done very well. They have upgraded their products; they have adjusted the kind of products they make to the high style market and to the kinds of things that do not have to compete with the low wage countries or the mass-produced textiles which can be produced in other countries around the world. They have adjusted, but they have done that under conditions of full employment.

The other concern I have about the speaker who preceded me is that the whole tone of his speech up until the very end was one of concern about investment in the industry, about the employer in the industry. We in this House of Commons must be concerned about everyone. I start from a somewhat different premise. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi I guess was saying that what is good for employers is good for the workers. I have come to another conclusion, that what is good for the workers has to be good for the employers because workers are far more numerous than employers and are less able to look after themselves or adapt to employers.

● (1550)

Under conditions of full employment workers in the textile industry have a number of choices they can make. They can be retrained or they can go to other jobs. Because industry is changing they can find employment, and there is a much better future for them and often for their employers as well. It is a disgrace in this country, and I blame the government for it, not the public servants of this country—I blame the policy makers of this country for the state of our manufacturing industry.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there is an article by Wayne Cheveldayoff in which he lists the deficit in our manufacturing industry. He writes:

> Last year, Canada imported $9.8 billion more of manufactured, inedible end products than it exported—more than double the $4.5 billion deficit of 1972.

Part of that, of course, was textiles but all of it was end products, the kind of things that provide jobs in this country. I agree with the mover, or rather the non-mover of the motion, that the government has traded off raw material irreplaceable exports for jobs in Canada. This was just as true when the Conservatives were in office as when the Liberals were in office. They could never make up their minds whether they wanted Canada to be an exporter of raw materials or to develop its secondary manufacturing industry. They were going to please everyone, but the point is that you cannot please everyone and the evidence is quite clear.

To the extent that we export raw, unfinished goods, we have to import something in exchange. You cannot go on exporting without importing. What is there to bring back? We do not need raw, unfinished goods, so we bring back manufactured goods such as textiles, but textiles form a relatively small dollar part of the sum of $10 billion. What we are doing in fact is exporting jobs when we export raw materials. That is the kind of thing over which the bureaucrats do not have any control. That is a policy decision of the government, or the absence of any policy decision in terms of an industrial strategy, and that is what causes our problem.

The effect of continuing the export of raw materials is to raise the value of the Canadian dollar, especially when on top of exporting raw materials we start raising a hue and cry about the vast amount of capital we have to import into this country in order to build things like the Mackenzie pipeline and other kinds of high capital intensive units such as opening new mines and establishing the infrastructure associated with mines. You cannot create jobs that way. The effect of importing capital is to raise the value of the Canadian dollar, and as that happens it destroys the competitiveness of Canadian secondary industry and it creates a high level of unemployment in this country.

I think it is important when we deal with a subject of this kind to lay the blame where it belongs. We call for the appropriate solution, which must be a policy of full employment. The government has obviously turned down that solution as evidenced in its last budget when it is quite prepared to accept 7.4 per cent unemployment in the country. Difficult as it is for the textile industry, it will be equally difficult for every other manufacturing industry in the country. I think the government must stand condemned for its failure to bring in an industrial strategy, its failure to understand the economy of this country, and if it does understand it it must stand condemned for not acting in terms of its budgetary measures to reduce unemployment in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to thank the sponsor of today's motion which relates to the textile industry and is extremely important, as was said earlier, particularly for Quebec and Ontario. Everyone knows the great importance of this industry for the economy of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario as well as other parts of the country.

As everybody knows, textiles are essential to the life of a modern people. Is it any wonder that Canadians are among the largest users of textile in the world? Annual purchases of textiles in Canada average in excess of 33 pounds per capita. Canada comes second after the United States for the average textile consumption. Canadian textile plants are located, as I just said, in industrial parts of Quebec and Ontario, close to the large urban markets. More than 80,000 Canadians, that is 6 per cent of the entire manufacturing labour in our country works in the textile industry. Every job in the manufacturing sector creates employment for 1.17 other people in the service, maintenance and repair sectors.

Therefore, the textile industry gives employment to more than 175,000 people who themselves support families, which adds up to over half a million people. The annual production exceeded $1.8 billion last year and the industry is 80 per cent Canadian-owned, which is quite important when one considers that any mature country must have its own textile supplies.

Mr. Speaker, these figures are extremely interesting and show how important the textile industry is in Canada. On the other hand, this industry is not a new one. In Canada, during the forties and the fifties, the primary textile and clothing industry came first as regards the number of jobs provided. In 1972, however, it fell to third place and primary textile plays a crucial part in regional development, particularly in Quebec. The textile industry is typical in that it employs mainly a large number of women. This industry, as I just said, is 80 per cent Canadian-owned.

● (1600)

And in the paper published in the February, 1976 issue of the Canadian Textile Journal, statistics and solutions are suggested which, I am sure, the officials in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have or should have taken into consideration. To this date, we have not seen any recommendation from the federal government taking up the suggestions made by the textile industry itself. Whenever you make recommendations to this House, you are told it has not been proved right. It has been said that there were contradictions in the requests filed by certain manufacturers.

And yet, after having read the briefs submitted by the Textile Manufacturers Association, we have still not seen any government action involving the textile industry. Again this week, I asked a question of the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) on a similar industry, the footwear industry. He answered that the only recommendation he had made was first to ask the Minister of National Revenue to make inquiries under the Anti-Dumping Act. Inquiries made under the Anti-Dumping Act will not now solve the problem of the textile and footwear industries.

His second suggestion was he hoped the footwear industry would fall under the jurisdiction of the textile industry. Now, the February 1976 issue of the Canadian Textile paper said the Textile Board was not as efficient as we believed it would be when it was established. According to the textile industry, it seems to be bogged down in bureaucracy. We have serious ground to believe that, to raise questions and to put some to both levels of government. The Canadian Textile industry is not the only one to blame for a reduced production, because the provincial government and the federal government especially cannot escape their responsibilities. They have an important part to play in promoting development and growth in the textile industry through better control of imports.

This is becoming increasingly important, especially in view of the fact that while the textile trade deficit was $347 million in 1964, it had reached $918 million in 1973. This means that during the 10-year period, the deficit increased 165 percent. The question arises whether some other industries favoured imports to that extent, and which. However, the Canadian textile industry maintained its activities at the best possible level of efficiency. Capital investments by the industry during that 10-year period totalled $1.5 billion. However, it is unthinkable that any industrialized country would accept to import over 50 percent of its requirements, but unfortunately this is what is happening. It is also unthinkable that any industrialized nation should accept to import over 50 per cent of a basic product as essential as textiles. We have experienced a substantial growth in Canadian consumption in terms of pounds per capita.

The Canadian textile industry offers wages and conditions comparable with the best in the world for that industry. In Canada, a worker gets two weeks' pay after one year of service, compared to one week in the United States. On top of that, the Canadian worker gets 10 paid statutory and other holidays each year, while six only are provided in the United States. I say all this to prove that the textile industry is an old industry in Canada, a basic industry, a specialized industry, and that manufacturers are competent, that they have properly administered their industry. Nevertheless imports are their most dangerous enemy.

Here I am going to be told that we cannot avoid imports, that because of the standard of living in other countries, products which cost less in western countries must be allowed to come in and that we cannot prevent the Canadian people from buying less expensive products when they can be imported. We have here, Mr. Speaker, problem of political economy. We have here a problem of dollars and cents. The result is that, if we are to keep our industry in Canada so as to be our own masters in our own house, as we said on many occasions and particularly as the Liberal government opposite did at the last election, by investing at home and having our industries here, we must have a protectionist policy, and we must have protectionist without penalizing the Canadian people. This means that we must protect both our industries and the consumer. But we cannot protect the consumer because the salaries we have to pay make it impossible for us to produce as cheaply as eastern countries which are able to export textile into Canada because even the raw material in cheaper overthere than here because of the differences in living standards and labour cost. Therefore since we cannot compete with those countries we must protect our own industry and adopt protectionnist trade policies and we must also have a protection policy for the consumer and his purchasing power, otherwise there is no way out. We shall always be submerged, flooded with those foreign products which we could very well manufacture ourselves. Instead of producing textile, footwear, furniture and other essential products, we shall see our skilled workers, our experts and manufacturers unemployed or bankrupt. As for those people who will be unemployed, we shall have to give them welfare and unemployment insurance benefits.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Mr. Speaker, we cannot solve the problem solely by regulating imports. We must have commercial and economic policies which give individuals and consumers the required purchasing power to buy domestic products according to the standard of living and salary conditions that exist in Canada. Mr. Speaker, this economic system would allow us to balance purchasing power, prices and our production capacity. We shall never be able to compete against other countries. This minister, like his predecessor, who is now president of the Anti-Inflation Board, did not solve anything by creating a Textile Board.

Absolutely nothing has been solved and now the same thing is offered as a solution to the problems of the Canadian footwear industry. This is what shoe manufacturers have asked, but for my part, I have absolutely no confidence in a board which was unable to solve from an economic view point the textile situation in Canada and which will be now asked to solve the problems of the footwear industry in Quebec and the rest of our country. This board, which was unable to solve the problems of the textile industry, will not be able to solve those of the footwear industry.

Canadian shoe manufacturers have in good faith asked the government in their brief submitted in February, that the Textile Board control or supervise the footwear industry. Those manufacturers may not then have realized that the Textile Board, like all other boards unfortunately is a sham established to convince the peopel that the problem will finally be examined, that solutions will be found and that the problem will be dealth with. And that does not happen.

● (1610)

They spend time, they spend money, they exchange correspondence, the minister tells the House he will urge the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) to look into the Anti-dumping Act with regard to cheap imports. But for months and years we have been hearing in this House Ministers of Industry, Trade and Commerce repeating the same tune. And each week we see industries that have to go out of business.

As the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) said a moment ago, in my riding and his in particular, an industry with hundreds and hundreds of employees has recently been forced to wrap up its operation; I am talking about Brock Mills. It was a prosperous, well managed industry which had proven its merit, which produced good quality and which was exporting throughout the world. Well, now, that industry, because of the department's inertia in the field of textile as in other fields—they always hide behind excuses such as our international trade—has been forced out of business. The government takes refuge, it always hides behind the problem of our imports.

Mr. Speaker, as long as the government will rely on imports from other countries to provide Canada with the necessary products and to satisfy the Canadian consumer, either our imports will cost millions and billions of dollars or our unemployment and social welfare measures will cost millions and billions of dollars. We cannot indefinitely come up with the excuse of external trade to solve the problem of the textile, footwear, clothing, and furniture industries and those of the other basic industries in Canada. We must have an economic policy which could help balance the national purchasing power of Canadians with the total of prices.

We must also have a protectionist policy for the Canadian consumers, producers, employees and employers, otherwise we won't find any solution. Tomorrow, Japan will not be our main competitor in textile, it will be another country. The day after tomorrow, again it will be another country which does not have the same standard of living, the same working conditions, the same salaries, which does not live like us, Canadians; however, we are obliged to have idle labour or people who live on welfare benefits even if they are experts, even if until now they have made a living in some basic industry in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the government could say; give us the solutions. We offered some time and time again to finance ministers and to industry and trade ministers, but they do not take them into account. Why should we waste our time giving solutions to this government which does not want to know anything, which does not want to hear anything and which relies only on its bureaucracy.

We can only criticize the government. Why? Because it does not want to hear about solutions. They seem to think that the solution is only within the Liberal party. Only the Liberals have received the light from the Holy Spirit and only they can rule the country. In spite of all the solutions we propose in the House, nobody listens to us. The solutions put forward by members of Parliament are not taken into account any more than those put forward by Canadian manufacturers in the footwear, textile, clothing or other basic industries. They are laughed at. For example, the same problem occurred recently in the agricultural field.

Bureaucrats run our administration and, unfortunately, our ministers in the House only repeat aloud what the bureaucrats think. I am sorry, I hate to say this to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) whom I consider as a nice guy, as someone who gives answers in the House, but, on the other hand, I think that the bureaucrats hiding behind the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce do not advise him as they should. I also regret, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as a minister tries to "shake his officials, his bureaucrats and his technocrats and begins to assert himself, he is transferred to another department.

As soon as a minister begins to take control of his department, to know his way around and to assert himself in order to find worthwhile solutions, unfortunately he is transferred to another department, and we are back to square one. When I see a cabinet shuffle, I am sad because I feel the minister being transferred was just about to find the proper answers. Would it be because he has become too troublesome, too much of a nuisance for his officials that he has to be transferred? I am getting very suspicious, Mr. Speaker.

We only have to read the numerous briefs submitted to us to find, for instance, that the Canadian footwear industry lost 46 per cent of its domestic market. During the first six months of this year, Canadian manufacturers shipped 23,158,000 pairs of shoes, or 46 per cent of all shipments on the Canadian market, while imports accounted for 27,628,000 pairs, or 54 per cent of the market.

Mr. Speaker, those figures were given to us by the industry, by those who made that footwear. The brief was presented to the Canadian Committee on Tariff and Trade on October 10, 1975. At the end of the brief, on finds the recommendations or conclusions put forward to the various departments and, in this case, to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Still, those solutions are not to be found in the act. They are no longer acknowledged, nowhere to be found. That means that they are not taken into account, that the arguing and "fooling around" continues in the system that had been set up.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have to speak in this fashion. We are aware of the difficulties our domestic industries are experiencing, we know that every year people come to us out of concern when they realize the industry is decreasing its output by 25, 30 or even 40 per cent. Those people wonder, at 40 or 45 years of age, where, after having worked in the textile industry for 20 or 25 years, they can find a new job when that industry has to fold up.

Those are the problems put to us, the representations made to us by our constituents and we must take them into account. That is why I say that, if we had praise and congratulations to offer the minister, we would be happy to do so. On the other hand, as we have to bear the pressures of the public, of the people who earn their living in the footwear industry, on the employees and employers whose livelihood depends on that industry, we are forced to bring those matters to the attention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is responsible for the situation. However, I do hope we will not have to wait ten years till this is achieved, and that the minister will take whatever means are necessary to remedy the situation in an industry that is extremely important to Canada and especially to eastern Canada.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can undertand to some degree the confusion on the part of hon. members opposite as to who was the mover of the motion before the House, since I think the language is more that of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) than that of the hon. member under whose name the motion appears. I know there are many humorous stories about "politicians viewing with alarm," but I never thought I would see this language included in a motion moved in this House. In case hon. members have not noted the excessive language in the motion, may I read it to them? It says:

> That this House views with alarm the accelerating collapse of the Canadian textile industry, rejects the fatalistic inertia of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and demands serious action to counter the ruinous pressure from excessive high import levels.

It would be hard to include in that kind of motion many more spectacular words.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wish I had said it.

Mr. Jamieson: I am glad this motion was moved, because it gives me the opportunity to say some things about the textile industry.

First, of course, the textile industry is a problem sector of the Canadian industrial economy. After listening to hon. members opposite—indeed, I suppose to many people on this side—one might get the impression that this is the only country in the world in which the textile industry is in difficulty; whereas I know, from my travels, that the industry is in great difficulty in all industrialized countries, and in some less developed countries as well. What we have heard today has been, for the most part, largely a repetition of the sorts of things which have been said about the industry for many years. I think it is fair to say that, by and large, they are generalizations.

With the greatest of respect for the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, whose speech I enjoyed immensely, as I always do, he used "textiles" as an all-embracing, all-encompassing word, as if only a single commodity were involved; whereas the textile industry is made up of many different sectors.

Mr. Lawrence: The whole thing is sick.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member suggests that the whole industry is sick. I do not know where his shirt was made; probably it was made in Taiwan.

An hon. Member: The industry is your responsibility.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not mind if hon. members want a little sparring match, but I wanted to be serious and give hon. members some information. I hope hon. members will do me the courtesy of allowing me to make my remarks.

Mr. Lawrence: We are waiting.

Mr. Jamieson: As I was saying, the textile industry is complex and involves many different sectors, some of which are frequently at odds with each other. I am thinking, for example, of the basic material aspect of the business as opposed to the finished goods aspect. I hope in the time that I have to demonstrate where quite frequently these can be at odds and can make it even more difficult to devise a comprehensive and all-embracing policy.

● (1620)

Let me first put to rest something which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said or suggested, that is that in some way or another there is a view in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that this industry, and I think I use the word he used, is expendable. The simple truth is that that is not so. He asked me to level with him and the House.

I can say that I do not recall a single instance in which anybody has made that point. I might say that is one of the documents at which I was looking, there is a clear-cut comment by the department that a viable textile industry is an important sector for Canada and that it is a large employer. It confirms in fact something which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said, namely, that they are an employer of a particular type of worker for whom it is not always easy to obtain alternative employment. For that reason it is even more important for it to be kept in as good a shape as possible.

Statistics that have been thrown around in this debate can be read in many different ways. However, I hope that some I quote will give a rough idea that things are not as bad over the whole industry as has been said. Nor are we as much the victims of imports as has been suggested.

For example, in the total textile market, that is, primary and made up goods, and I make that distinction because it is important, in dollar terms, domestic producer shipments amounted to 77.6 per cent of the total market for 1975. In dollar terms, of total textile imports, and this is an important point, 72 per cent came from industrialized countries and only about 20 per cent from low cost countries. That is something that very frequently gets overlooked.

We tend to assume that the problems of the textile industry are because of large imports from some of the so-called low cost countries. In fact the biggest country from which we import and the largest quantities is the United States, followed by some of the countries in Europe. I make that point because it indicates that the idea of tariffs, or even of quotas in the conventional sense of the word, is not really going to be all that much help in terms of the United States market. For example, in recent weeks a good deal has been said about certain kinds of polyester yarn coming in from the United States. It has been suggested that this has obviously been harmful to the Canadian industry and, in fact, that there might be dumping involved. The truth is that there is no evidence of this. In fact it is primarily because the polyester market in the United States is soft. Therefore prices have come down in that country.

This brings up a continuing problem in this industry. That is the fact that styles, fashions, and public demands change. In this particular case there has been a dramatic decline in the popularity of the double knit market in terms of fashions. There are other members of the House who might be better able than I to comment on this. This has had a very traumatic effect in terms of that aspect of the industry.

There are three factors that exercise the greatest impact on the structure of the textile industry. I should like to address myself to one of these because it relates to something which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said, namely, the size of the domestic market. Part of the difficulty we have in this industry, as in many others, is the relatively small domestic base on which we have to work by comparison with, for example, the United States or some of the larger areas such as the European Economic Community, or Japan. In other words, we do not have that very big domestic market on which to draw. This gives us problems in the textile industry in terms of scale and also in terms of the range of the demand of the public.

In Canada we cannot produce the whole range of textile products, apparel, and related items because of our comparatively small domestic base. This is one problem that is related to the question I mentioned a moment ago, that is, that consumers desire variety which tends to fragment the production line and makes it much more costly.

Somebody in the textile industry said to me the other day in one of my meetings that if you stood at the corner of St. Catherine and Peel in Montreal for the whole day, you probably would not find two ladies going by with exactly the same kind of dress or same pattern of dress. That gives some indication of how broad the range is that has to be produced. I repeat, since it is a relatively small base on which they have to work, it adds to their costs.

I already mentioned the proximity of the United States. Incidentally, in comparing the Canadian textile industry with its counterpart in the United States, and I have said this before, there is some validity in the examination. It can also be misleading since the economies of scale which I mentioned allow the United States to get better production runs and better costs.

In this connection it is interesting to note some of the references that were made only recently by one of the largest unions involved in the textile industry. I would like to quote from it because I think it is a carefully thought out study. The union is the Centrale des Syndicats Démocratiques, the CSD. It recently presented a highly professional analysis which I recommend to hon. members who have a special interest in this subject. I quote from the study:

> Imports are the scapegoat of this industry. We do not mean to say that their importance is negligible—we have already noted the increasing part of the Canadian market which they are securing—but rather that, even if the domestic market were completely monopolized by Canadian producers, the rate of expansion in textile industry would still not be comparable to that of the key industries. As we said earlier, the decline in this sector is partly due to its very nature (i.e., the weak revenue elasticity of the demand for its products).

In the same report there is a reference to comparisons with other countries and the base in terms of how we protect our industry versus other countries. Here they quote the industry spokesmen:

> Textile imports, they maintain, are respectively $10, $22 and $9 per capita in the United States, the United Kingdom and the European Community, whereas they are $30 in Canada in 1969-70.

This may have changed somewhat since that time, but probably not significantly.

> According to these figures, Canadian producers seem to have relatively little protection against foreign competitors.

That is the impression given by the statistic.

> In fact, the situation is quite different. Per capita imports in no way indicate the degree of protection; these figures are based essentially on two factors: the size of the country and the relative cost of production of textile fabrics in each country. The size of the country determines its reliance on the outside world;

That is what I was commenting on a moment ago.

> —the larger the country, the lower the figure for per capita imports ... If these comparisons are limited to countries similar in size to Canada, Canadian textile producers seem well protected, per capita textile imports being respectively $78, $63 and $69 in Holland, Belgium and Sweden,—

These are countries of smaller populations, relatively speaking, than ours, but in the same general range. Therefore the suggestion that we are less protective is not borne out by the facts or statistics.

Also there is some real question as to whether short of total abolition of imports, you can carry out the protective mechanisms in terms of textiles very much beyond what we are doing at the present time without increasing costs, as the hon. member said would happen if we let the textile industry die. The same would probably apply if we put on very heavy tariff protections beyond what we have now. When all is said and done, we are going to need and will continue to need considerable fabrics from offshore.

I mention here what I referred to in my earlier remarks, namely, the difficulty between the finished goods manufacturer and the primary goods manufacturer. Obviously in most instances the finished goods manufacturer wishes to get his materials from as wide a range of resources as possible. He likes to have in large part an assured domestic supply, and at the same time to be able to draw on offshore markets.

One of the reasons for continuing studies, and I agree with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that they can go on interminably, but unfortunately are necessary, is that we have to get the apparel people and the primary production people together to try to figure out if we are going to go to a global quota system, as has been recommended, and how this would work in a satisfactory way for both sectors and for that whole range of products.

● (1630)

As I mentioned earlier, the industry is not in as bad a shape as some of the worst "doom and gloom" commentators suggest. The fact is that a recovery is now under way in several sectors. Other sectors are, as I mentioned, in real difficulty; nobody quarrels with that statement, and we are considering what additional steps may be necessary, particularly with regard to the polyesters and related products.

Incidentally, I should like to get together with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi because the statistics I have on employment in the industry differ from those he quoted. In any event, proportionately there was exactly the same percentage of lay-offs in the United States in the year 1973-74 as in Canada. In other words, there was a general recession brought about primarily by the oil prices of 1973; so many of these products have a petroleum base that large inventories were built up world-wide as a hedge against anticipated problems. These did not materialize to the extent expected and there was subsequently, therefore, a sharp decline in production and sales. To a large extent, that situation has now ironed itself out and here in Canada a recovery is in progress in most sectors. Indeed, some are working at effective capacity, so the picture is not one entirely without promise. I have already mentioned the double-knits; I want to see what we can do about the materials used in these.

There is increased capacity in certain low-cost countries which produce garments, and this has resulted in increased pressure from imports, for example in the area of men's suits, shirts, and outerwear. In all those categories, action has been taken by the Textile and Clothing Board. Virtually all the low-cost countries from which we import are subject to some form of quota. The only case in which we have not gone as far as the board has suggested relates to certain types of outerwear, and we have placed these under surveillance to determine from which country these garments are coming so that we may consider in realistic terms what quota arrangements might be necessary. Only last week, for example, we put a global quota on work gloves. A whole range of other finished goods and materials is already subject to quota. Thus I do not think it is fair to say that no action has been taken or that public servants have not moved as quickly as possible when crises develop.

I do not, however, deny the legitimacy of the claim that the process is on the slow side. I have looked into this and asked that once a report comes in from the Clothing and Textile Board there should be no delay in taking appropriate action. In this connection I am faced with something of a dilemma. We could table the report quite quickly after it is received from the board, but the policy has been to hold off publication of the report until a decision has been made on the action to be taken.

I notice the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is laughing. My point is that if we table the report without announcing simultaneously a decision as to the action to be taken, a whole new series of representations might be generated, and this might delay the process still further. For the present we think it advisable to receive the report, decide on a course of action, and then make an announcement accordingly. If hon. members believe a variation in that procedure would spend up the process I would be glad to hear their views.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi made some comments about studies. While this is not my first line of attack on any problem, I might tell him that we do have a study under way at the present time at the request of the parties concerned. Incidentally, I have appointed a union representative to the committee for the first time. The group to which I refer has instructions to report by the end of this month and its terms of reference, together with the preamble, might be worth reading.

In the light of representations that have been received to the effect that:

(a) the Canadian market for textiles and clothing continues to be severely disrupted by imports,

(b) there is a need for improvement in the administration of the import control elements of the textile policy, and,

(c) the currently employed "selective" approach to special measures of protection against "low-cost" imports is ineffective, it has been decided to form an ad hoc committee composed of three senior executives from the Canadian primary textile industry, three from the Canadian apparel industry, one representative from each of the provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, the Assistant Deputy Minister, Industry Development and the Assistant Deputy Minister, International Trade Relations of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Committee will be chaired by the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Operations, of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The mandate of this committee shall be to:

(1) review current conditions and prospects in the textile and clothing industries and in their market situation,

(2) review the administration of the policy in relation to import competition,

(3) examine the appropriateness, given existing legislation and instruments, of implementing the policy in terms of Articles 3 and 4 of the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles and Article XIX of the G.A.T.T.,

(4) report its findings and recommendations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce not later than June 30, 1976.

This committee, I am informed, is working very effectively and is considered likely to come up with firm recommendations for immediate implementation. I have no hesitation in saying that I am prepared to move quickly once some consensus is reached as to what the appropriate action ought to be.

