Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, time is running short. I think the hon. member had ample opportunity to make his contribution so I would prefer he waited till I had concluded my remarks. The Vancouver shipping registry office is run by a staff of only four and is a very effective and efficient operation. I would not want to guarantee that the same degree of efficiency will be maintained if the move that is presently contemplated is carried out. The port registry performs a valuable service for all boat owners, most of whom know from personal experience the courtesies extended by the staff there. The inconvenience to the general boating public will be incalculable. Those who want to register bills of sale or mortgages will run into additional red tape which will make things more difficult.

If I may speak on behalf of these people, even though some accommodation has been reached, I understand, I still maintain that a service that has been satisfactory and that has offered personalized service to the people should be left as it is, instead of being moved as is currently under consideration.

I should like to move on to another aspect of the bill. Having read the debate on second reading of this bill I was very impressed with the argument put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), regarding the necessity for developing a Canadian merchant marine. I think the time has come for Canadians to be made aware of our shortcomings in this area and for the government to get on with the job and encourage the growth and development of this particular industry. I know government supporters will probably say that this is what is being done by Bill C-61, but I cannot see how the bill will accomplish this.

I think much of Bill C-61 is essentially negative in nature and does little to encourage shipbuilding, which is really what we must start with in developing a merchant marine. I say it is negative because its provisions restrict the right of foreign ships to carry on the transportation of goods and people from one Canadian port to another. That is negative enough, Mr. Speaker, but in addition it contains no provisions to substitute or provide additional Canadian carriers for this purpose.

If I could draw an analogy in this respect—I realize it is not exact in every respect—it would be the government's policy on energy. We in Canada have a great resource and a great reserve of oil. I believe it would be sufficient for Canadian uses for many years to come if it were handled in the proper way. It is still in the ground or in the tar sands, and requires as well additions to our transportation system. We are running into this problem and we are now facing an emergency because of the lack of foresight and planning.

Now we have the government moving forward and placing restrictions on transportation before we have had an opportunity to provide for an adequate supply of Canadian carriers to transport our goods and our people from place to place. The situations are similar in respect of potential self-sufficiency in energy and potential self-sufficiency in the matter of transportation.

The measure before us calls attention to several important aspects, and I should like to comment on one or two of the statements made during the course of this debate. Let me also put on the record some facts taken from a study conducted by the government of British Columbia under the auspices of the Hon. Jack Davis, provincial minister of transport and communications. I know hon. members across the way groan whenever they hear this gentleman's name. Nevertheless he was held in fairly high regard when he was over there. We looked upon him as one who was earnestly endeavouring to fulfil the responsibilities that were his in that ministry.

Let me refer first of all to the minister's references to agreements with the maritime ministers of transport. This has been denied by some of the members taking part in this debate. They have pointed out that this was not so, that they did not reach an agreement. They suggested there may have been an agreement is some particular respect, but there were so many ambiguities, so many things not above board and not on the table that there was no really effective agreement as far as the maritime ministers of transport were concerned. Certainly I do not think there was any as far as the transportation ministry of the province of British Columbia was concerned.

My colleague read from a document that pointed out just the contrary. The minister has given the assurance that all the guarantees necessary have been given and that there will be a high degree of acceptance before the implementation of these provisions.

Again I should like to refer to some statements made in the past. I am not going to take the time to document them, but we have had assurance after assurance and guarantee after guarantee, yet all of us in the House, at least those on this side, realize that the guarantees which have been given in many instances have not come to fruition, or have not been fulfilled. I think it is straining the intelligence of the people in the western part of this country to expect them to take the word of the minister that certain things are to be done and certain things will not be done. There must be more than that.

Let me now put on the record some conclusions which are drawn from the study that was conducted, as I already indicated, by the British Columbia government. I have not had time to check all these out, what amendments have been suggested or accommodations reached, but I will give some of the conclusions in order to pinpoint some of the concerns of the British Columbia government regarding Bill C-61. The conclusions drawn are:

1. A very powerful competitive influence on transportation rates of other modes will be lost.

2. Users of both intercoastal shipping and transcontinental transport services will be required to pay excessive and otherwise avoidable inflated freight rates when this competitive influence is lost.

3. The policy will have a significant direct negative impact on major B.C. industries, particularly those in forestry, mining and construction.

My colleague, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), and also my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), have mentioned these particular issues.

The conclusions then continue as follows:

4. Virtually no Canadian-flag vessels exist for use in intercoastal movements, certainly not on the west coast.

5. The past history of intercoastal traffic will do little to encourage the building of Canadian vessels for the service.

6. The beneficiaries of the policy will overwhelmingly be in eastern Canada as a result of developments in off-shore and eastern Arctic resources where there is reason to give protection to Canadian interests.

7. This is not sufficient reason to include intercoastal trade, which is a totally different economic activity, in a blanket application.

8. No in depth cost-benefit analysis has been conducted to show where and to what degree these cost-benefits accrue.

This has been dealt with by a number of members and there is no need to enlarge upon it at the moment.

9. The policy, as administered and controlled through the regulations, will be slow, unresponsive and costly to B.C. interests.

10. Domestic products will become much more susceptible to substitution in the domestic market.

11. The massive subsidies required to maintain the protectionist policy for the U. S. coasting trade have failed to prevent a steady decline in the U.S. coasting fleet.

It concludes:

The province of B.C. is therefore strongly opposed to intercoastal trade being restricted in any way from employing the services of a foreign-flag vessel if it is to the advantage of the shipper to do so. The intercoastal trade must be given permanent exemption from the restrictions proposed in Bill C-61 for other aspects of the domestic coasting trade.

There is just one additional thought I should like to add before concluding. There has been the argument that consultative efforts have been made, and have been made consistently. We think of the confrontations which have taken place between the federal and various provincial administrations. When there was supposed to be negotiation and consultation there was confrontation. I suggest the same argument could be made in respect of this particular matter. We have an amendment before us and a subamendment. While the subamendment goes to some extent in meeting the need, I do not believe it is adequate. It is my belief that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Capilano should receive the endorsation and entire support of the House.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would entertain a question before concluding his remarks?

An hon. Member: There is a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has requested the right to ask a question of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson). I think we should put his request to the hon. member, who may accept or refuse it. Is the hon. member ready to entertain such a question?

Mr. Patterson: Yes.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to ask the hon. member if he is aware of the work done by the standing committee in relation to the registry to which he referred in the early part of his remarks. These provisions were substantially amended.

An hon. Member: That is an insult.

Mr. Goodale: I refer particularly to that aspect dealing with regional deputy registers. His remarks might have referred to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I wouldn't even answer.

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you. That is just an insult.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are looking for a ministry, that is what you want.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the discussion that went on. I made the statement that while there was a degree of accommodation, I still believe that the planning and the program that are in operation at the present time are far superior.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I might raise two points of order about the business before the House. The first is to seek a change in an order of the House made earlier this day for the taking of the vote on Bill C-68. It was agreed at that time that the vote would be taken tomorrow evening at 9.30. We have had subsequent discussion because there is another event of some importance taking place which some members would like to attend. Therefore it is agreed that instead of being taken at 9.30 p.m. the vote will be taken shortly after 8 p.m. I say shortly after 8 p.m. because I think the bells ought to ring twice—once to summon the members and then, after a short interval, again to bring members to a vote. If that could be agreed I would come to the second point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister. We are very happy to accommodate him for the special event that is necessary. It will probably be the only happy occasion in that particular location for quite some time. We are very happy to agree.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this change is acceptable and we agree to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There seems to be agreement that the vote on Bill C-68 be taken shortly after eight o'clock tomorrow night. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I come to the second point of order. It relates to the business for the rest of the week. There has been some discussion among the House leaders, indeed going beyond the House leaders because the subject under consideration is Bill C-84 which is the subject of a free vote in which all members of the House have a special interest. I would therefore like to move, with unanimous consent:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order:

1. The House shall not sit from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. on Tuesday, June 29, 1976;

2. The House shall not sit on Friday, July 2, 1976;

3. The House shall revert to Presenting Reports from Standing and Special Committees at 10:00 p.m. this day;

Maritime Code

4. The report stage of Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and other serious offences, shall be taken into consideration when the Orders of the Day are called on Tuesday, June 29, 1976;

5. Notices of amendments to be proposed at the report stage of the said bill shall be considered to be properly given if received no later than 12:00 noon on Tuesday, June 29, 1976; and

6. The Clerk shall be authorized to publish a supplementary notice paper before 3:00 p.m. on Tuesday, June 29, 1976 for the purposes of part 5 of this order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House give consent to the President of the Privy Council to move the motion at the present time?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion and I am glad the hon. gentleman characterized the discussion in the way he did. Speaking for myself, and I hope for others in that context, there is consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the details set out in the motion read by the minister have been discussed. We agree to them and are prepared to support the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we had discussions with the leaders of the government with regard to the business of the House, and we agreed with them. On the other hand, I should like to point out that it is a pity we could not get the unanimous consent of the House to get the day off after St. John the Baptist Day as we will this Friday, that is the day following Dominion Day. I regret having to point this out, but I do think we should see to it that this does not happen again in coming years.

An hon. Member: You'll have to convince the Progressive Conservatives.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not note any objection so there would seem to be unanimous consent. Does the House wish to proceed by way of a motion or an order of the House? It might be simpler if the House considered the wording of the motion as a House order as accepted and implemented unanimously. Is it agreed and accepted unanimously that the terms of the motion as proposed by the House Leader be made an order of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By unanimous consent it is agreed and so ordered.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURES TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-61, to provide a Maritime Code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions, be read the third time and do pass.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the remaining two minutes would only take away from the excellence of the remarks I wish to make, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. According to the order previously accepted the House will now revert to Presenting Reports from Standing and Special Committees.

FINANCE—PROPOSAL THAT CAPITAL GAINS TAX NOT APPLY TO SALE OF FAMILY FARM

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight on the capital gains tax on farm property are based on the questions I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on June 17 as recorded at page 14611 of Hansard of that date. The first question was:

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It relates to the capital gains tax on family farm property. A family farm operator, during his lifetime, directs all his profit to the improvement of his farm and equipment. When the farm is sold upon his retirement, the proceeds become his sole private pension fund. It is therefore grossly unfair to use capital gains tax to seriously reduce this pension. Will the minister consider amending the Income Tax Act to permit a once-in-a-lifetime sale of a family farm without attracting capital gains tax?

The minister's reply was simply this:

Well, Mr. Speaker, there are certain provisions now with regard to family farms but I do not see at this time the opportunity to be able to expand those.

The second question was a supplementary and along a similar line. It was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, since the capital gains taxes collected on family farm property amount to only 10 per cent of the total collected on property generally, would the minister weigh the appraisal and accounting costs, plus the major irritant effect of this tax, against the net revenue derived and hopefully remove this unfair and unjust tax altogether?

I felt that the minister's response was altogether too brief. He simply said:

. . . it of course has to be relevant also to the question of equity to other taxpayers.

I suggest that the answers were entirely unsatisfactory in the light of the importance of capital gains taxes and the way they affect farmers, particular family farmers, and also small businessmen.

The reason for this particular question relates to activity going on in the riding I represent, Norfolk-Haldimand. There has been expropriation or threat of expropriation of a very large section of farmland. This is to serve as the industrial sites for hydro, Stelco and Texaco, and also for the satellite city which is to be built in that area. The province has just completed a land assembly program there. This, of course, resulted in the forced sale of many farms. I think there has never been such a concentration of farmers paying capital gains tax in such a small area as the one I just described.

The farmers whose properties have been sold in the manner I described are having income tax returns reassessed, and a whopping capital gains tax is being imposed upon them. Tax paid, of course, is on one half of the capital gain derived from the valuation day value subtracted from the value at the time of the sale. The government land appraisers have assigned abnormally and unrealistically low valuation day values of something in the neighbourhood of $350 to $400 per acre. The sale value has been in the neighbourhood of $2,000 plus per acre. Therefore the capital gain is $1,600, and the tax on half of that is a tax on $800 per acre. On a 100 acre farm that is a capital gains tax assessed on an amount of $80,000, which is certainly drastic and exorbitant.

A $400 valuation day value is totally unrealistic. The government appraisers are not in touch with reality, and one wonders if any of them have ever operated a family farm.

The farmers are angry. They are pooling their resources to fight the assessment of capital gains in the manner described. They are going through the formal appeal procedures as laid down in the act. They are going through the courts, and if necessary, they will even go to the highest court in the land to see that justice is done.

The minister is aware of this situation because of previous letters from me to him on this matter, and I feel it is time to face up to this giant rip off which is being perpetrated against the farming community in Norfolk-Haldimand.

Let us examine the effects of this unconscionable action. As I said in my question, it destroys farmers' retirement funds. During his lifetime a farmer puts his profits back into improving his farm, his buildings, and his equipment. The value increases. Upon retirement he sells the farm. The proceeds become his pension fund; he has no other.

The bandits from National Revenue pounce upon this fund and wipe out this one opportunity to retire with dignity. The farmers have pride. In my opinion they are the last bastions of independence and free enterprise. The tradition of providing for their own retirement goes back for generations.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Surely it should be the responsibility of the government to foster and encourage this independence and the retention of self-esteem. Instead, the present system of taxation discourages and stifles initiative. The farmer is tempted to give up, to resign himself to allowing big brother to take his savings, and he reasons that he might as well take a handout from the welfare state, along with everybody else.

The second reason is that it removes the opportunity for the younger farmer who does not want to retire to purchase another farm. Such a farmer hopes to use the proceeds from his forced sale to purchase a new farm. Again the capital gains tax so erodes the net proceeds of his sale that sufficient funds do not remain to enable him to relocate. In this case he is also completely frustrated by this grossly unfair and iniquitous tax.

The case of the small family business enterprise is exactly parallel to what I have described. The profits of the small business are the only means by which it can amass capital for expansion, so the businessman ploughs the profits back into the business. Like the farmer he expects to sell the business at a profit, which is his retirement fund. He faces equally disastrous results at the hands of our present tax laws.

The solution that I suggest is simple. The family farm or small business could be sold once in a lifetime without attracting capital gains tax. It would need only a very simple amendment to the Income Tax Act, and the time is now opportune. Only today the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) on behalf of the Minister of Finance introduced certain changes to the act.

Could I just have one more minute, Mr. Speaker, to finish my remarks? It should be noted that in the publication "Preliminary Taxation Statistics" issued by the Department of National Revenue, for the 1974 taxation year at page 47 in Table K under the subheading "Occupation Class" it is shown that the revenue received from capital gains on farm property is only 10 per cent of the total of the capital gains tax. The loss would be minimal, Mr. Speaker. Surely the government could forgo such an iniquitous tax.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) has reiterated the question he posed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on June 17. He went on to describe a situation which is quite different, however. I think I would agree with him that if it were the disposition of the farm and the accumulation of the capital, that perhaps it should be looked at closely. What he is talking about, however, is something entirely different. He talked about expropriation, and I believe he mentioned Stelco and Texaco. I think it is a different problem altogether. He spoke of a rollover once in a lifetime of the value accumulated. I have some sympathy with his view and I agree it should be looked at in that particular light, but not necessarily in the way he posed the problem.

What he has said, and what should be said is that farmers, having worked for many years and accumulated a particular amount of property, should not be penalized when they dispose of it. That is the point at issue; not the expropriation aspect, but whether a farmer, having worked in some cases 25, 30 or 40 years to accumulate the property, should be penalized.

He talked about what this brings in to the national revenue, but that is not the question either. It is the aspect of whether the farmer who if he has not any sons or daughters who want to carry on, and he wants to dispose of the property, should be penalized. That is the question to which we should address ourselves. I have some sympathy with it and I shall make sure it is looked into—not to discriminate against any other taxpayer but to make sure that the farmers who contribute to the economic life of this country should not be penalized in our tax system.

I shall make sure that is not the case and that they are treated fairly.

COMMUNICATIONS—PROPOSED USE OF BALANCED ARMATURE RECEIVER BY BELL TELEPHONE—REQUEST FOR DELAY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I think most of the members of this House would agree that once a group of people in this country has established a right to a service it ought not to have that right unilaterally taken away.

I think we all agree that Canadians should not lose the right to health services, education, or any other service they now have. But unfortunately very soon one group of Canadians is going to be losing part of the rights it has to communication services. I am speaking of the hearing impaired in this country and the full rights they presently have to use telephones.

The Bell Telephone Company has decided it is going to save some money by installing a device in its telephones called a balanced armature receiver. The problem is that this balanced armature receiver does not produce a strong enough magnetic field to activate the hearing aids and teletype machines in the homes of the hearing impaired. The present telephones make this possible, but when the new technology is installed, starting this July, these persons with hearing disabilities will no longer be able to use the telephone for communication purposes; at least they will not be able to use the telephones of the Bell Telephone system.

A group of people, concerned about the loss to the hearing impaired of full access to our communications system, has approached both the Bell Telephone Company and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission over the last year to make its concerns known and to push for delays or changes in technology which would ensure equal right to communication by telephone for the hearing impaired. The Bell Telephone Company, however, has refused even to delay installation of these devices. Instead it has merely promised that it will begin to go to work researching hearing aid designs. It also promised that it would make pay telephones and telephones in the homes and work places of the hearing impaired compatible with present hearing aids. For use with other telephones Bell has offered to produce an adaptor, which is the size of a hockey puck and costs $8.

[Mr. Trudel.]

The steering committee on the telephone receiver and the hearing impaired has taken the position that this does not go far enough, and I agree with them. Why should the hearing impaired be forced to carry adaptors around with them when they do not have to do this now? And who is going to pay for these adaptors and their maintenance? Why should the hearing impaired be forced to have this additional nuisance and expense? For that matter, I am sure all hon. members who have children with hearing difficulties realize how absurd it is to ask active children always to carry an adaptor with them. Beyond that, this also means that in emergencies the hearing impaired will no longer be able to use the telephones of their friends and neighbours or even the phones of strangers, something which all of us take for granted.

If this is going to cause so much inconvenience for the hearing impaired, why is Bell going ahead with it? Does it want to save, relatively speaking, a paltry $7 million to $10 million over the next ten years? This might sound like a lot of money, but keep in mind that it comes to less than .04 per cent of Bell's budget. Keep also in mind that if Bell were to put a device called a fluxcoil in its phones the whole problem would be eliminated, because this device would create the necessary magnetic field. But Bell is unwilling to do it, because it would cut its savings by one third.

Many might think that not a lot of people are touched by this issue; but keep in mind that up to 10 per cent of our total population suffers from hearing handicaps. That group includes almost one third of our pensioners. Bell's action will affect all these handicapped people; not to mention their families, friends and fellow workers, all of whom must communicate with the handicapped and whose telephones might be needed by the hearing handicapped.

Let us also keep in mind where this will hit the hearing handicapped hardest. With three quarters of a million people out of work now, the hearing handicapped already have a special disadvantage finding work. Now they will have to go to prospective employers and tell them they must go to the added inconvenience of adding special phones if they want to hire a hard of hearing person. And make no mistake, businesses will be the first to get these new devices.

The telephone company has said that this will not become a problem for some time because it will not have large numbers of the new telephones installed. But beginning next month it will start installing the new receivers; without doubt, the hearing handicapped will begin to feel the effects very quickly.

When I raised this question in the House on June 9 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fleming) said that the CRTC was trying to get the two sides to co-operate and that he would bring the matter of the fluxcoil to the attention of the CRTC. We see how much good that has done. Bell Canada has refused to delay the implementation of the new receiver and next month will begin use of its balanced armature receiver. The CRTC has not shown, a few days before the end of June, any indication that it intends to force Bell Canada to postpone the implementation of this technology.

I call on the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), who has ultimate responsibility in this matter, to inform Bell Canada directly that it cannot change its receiver program until the large groups of impaired and defenceless Canadians are provided with equal access to telephone use within the Bell system.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as most hon. members are aware, Bell Canada and the Steering Committee for the Hearing Impaired have been trying for some time to resolve their differences created by Bell's plans to upgrade the existing telephone receiver at a considerable saving which hopefully would be of benefit to consumers. While the two sides have not been able to reach an agreement, it should be noted that the matter is not easily resolved. While the concerns of the hearing impaired are very important, even the Consumers Association of Canada hesitated to support a resolution outlining the demands of the hearing impaired at the recent CAC meeting in Winnipeg.

The Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission has now—if I can make that correction for the hon. member—at the senior staff level heard representatives from both Bell Canada and the hearing impaired. The executive committee of the CRTC will in the very near future be considering both sides of the issue in an effort to find a constructive course of action which will bear in mind the best interests of the hearing impaired and the consumer at large. I know that the CRTC will do its best to lead these two parties to a positive conclusion in the best interests of all Canadians, and particularly bearing in mind the needs of the hearing impaired.

My minister has asked me to assure the House that meanwhile she and her officials will continue to watch the situation closely and to encourage Bell and the steering committee to find a solution acceptable to both.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ALLEGATION ISRAEL HAS STOCK PILE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on June 16 I asked the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> In view of the government's posture of devout nuclear virginity and stern anti-proliferation of nuclear arms, may I ask if in the light of sustained and widespread reports of possession of substantial nuclear stock piles by the Republic of Israel, the minister can advise if the government of Canada has made any investigation of, or inquiry into, the serious allegations and, if so, has it cautioned the friendly government of Israel regarding the danger of adding further highly incendiary elements to the already explosive Middle East situation?

I was amazed that no reply was given to this question dealing as it did with nuclear weaponry, a matter I would think of some considerable importance. The minister was abroad and I am sure the parliamentary secretary was on official duty, but the system here provides for questions to be taken by an acting minister.

On March 23, under the provisions of Standing Order 58, this House had a full length debate on the issue of proliferation of nuclear weapons. At that time the minister spoke at length about the issue and Canada's zealous devotion to non-proliferation; there were references to the Club of London, and a long narrative of our assertions and exertions on the noble side of this matter. But I am impressed by the lack of response to or visible concern about serious and recurring reports of the possession, by Israel, of a stockpile of nuclear bombs. The reports do not deal with peaceful uses of atomic energy but with weaponry.

It has been something of an "open secret" for some time that Israel has nuclear warlike capacity. As recently as April 12 Time magazine carried a chilling story about the possession of nuclear bombs by a country in the most dangerous and explosive area of the world today. It records:

> At a briefing for a group of American space experts in Washington recently, an offical for the Central Intelligence Agency estimated that Israel had between ten and 20 nuclear weapons "available for use." In fact, Time has learned, Israel possesses a nuclear arsenal of 13 atomic bombs, assembled, stored and ready to be dropped on enemy forces from specially equipped Kfir and Phantom fighters or Jericho missiles. These weapons have a 20-kiloton yield, roughly as powerful as those that obliterated Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The newsstory goes on to relate that in the face of Arab victories in the early days of the 1973 war, the then premier, Mrs. Meir, authorized the use of the Doomsday weapons. Actually no bombs were activated, the Israelis having reached a much more successful stage in the conventional warfare.

Most of us will recall that serious and mysterious red alert sent out by the U.S. in 1973. Time's explanation is worrisome to say the least:

> Did Israel's nuclear capability play a part in the U.S. global military alert of Oct. 25, 1973? According to Time's sources, the Israelis were convinced that the Russians had learned of the newly acquired nuclear potential, possibly through a Soviet Cosmos spy satellite over the Middle East. What is certain is that on Oct. 13, the Russians dispatched nuclear warheads from Nikolaev—the naval base at Odessa—to Alexandria, to be fitted on Russian Scud missiles already based in Egypt. The U.S., in turn, detected the Soviet warheads as the ship carrying them passed through the Bosphorous on Oct. 15 and issued a warning to Moscow by means of a world military alert.

Many years may elapse before we will know how close we came to a dreadful nuclear confrontation. It is difficult to know how fully accurate is the Time story, although the account of the Dimona nuclear installation in the Negev seems authentic enough. I would not suggest that Canada ally itself to one or other of the Middle East protagonists. All I have ever sought is a policy of genuine objectivity. But surely there should be no failure to recognize the awful danger which the introduction of nuclear bombs would bring upon that region and indeed all of us.

I think we can be sure that the use of nuclear arms by one of the parties to the dispute would invite and assure intrusion by the great powers, and after that who can describe or delineate the range and extent of the chaos into which we should all be plunged?

One of the most astute Canadian observers of the Middle East is Reverend Dr. A. C. Forrest, Editor of the United Church Observer, who wrote a stirring, challenging editorial, "Israel and the Bomb: Why Doesn't Somebody Scream?" It is an article to which I invite the minister's attention. The following is an extract:

> An astonishing silence followed in the wake of Time's disclosure of Israel's arsenal of atomic bombs and near use of them. Press and radio in Canada didn't seem to be surprised or alarmed. And the pulpits, church courts, editiorial writers and other would-be prophets and opinion-makers seemed to have nothing to say.

If it were revealed that some other world leader—a Russian or British prime minister or an American or French president—had given approval for the use of the bomb, we wonder what would have been said. But when Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan decided it was time to press the button, well, that's Israel, and it seems impolite to say anything.

The world has been warned and warned again that the Middle East is the most threatening situation in the world. The Arabs have demonstrated that they can inflict economic disaster by withholding oil exports or sharply increasing the price. Israel is politically unstable, economically dependent, and divided about what to do about the West Bank. She is a threatened colonial island in a hostile sea and has demonstrated what we suspected—her ageing leaders would commit national suicide in fact of defeat.

Church leaders and others who have some responsibility for communicating information and creating public opinion should not ignore the Time revelation and what it means. If we can't agree on everything, we should at least agree that the postponed Geneva Conference should be held, and the Palestinians should be there. And soon. For the Middle East is moving inexorably towards Armageddon.

Mr. Speaker, to a Bible-reading Presbyterian, that word Armageddon is chilling and penetrating.

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to say to the hon. member that I hope he was not criticizing the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and of his parliamentary secretary on June 16. The minister was attending the CIEC Conference of the group of industrialized nations in Paris and I was opening a photographic exposition called "Between Friends"—"Entre Amis"—in the second biggest city of the United States, beautiful and hospitable Chicago, for the American bicentennial.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I am sure all members of the House share this expression of friendship for our neighbour to the south.

When I returned to the House I read the question which had been asked by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and which had not received an answer. I thought that might have had something to do with the way in which his question had been formulated.

Without acknowledging the accuracy of these speculative reports to which the hon. member refers, I can assure the House that Canada has been active in all appropriate fora in warning the international community of the dangers of nuclear proliferation and has taken concrete initiatives to strengthen the international non-proliferation system.

With specific reference to Israel, it is not my practice to comment on media reports, especially those concerning important international issues. We are, of course, anxious to avoid the addition of any destabilizing or "incendiary" elements into the Middle East conflict. This Canadian view is frequently brought to the attention of the international community and is well known to all of the parties to the conflict, including Israel.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

NON-SMOKERS' RELIEF ACT

SUGGESTION BILL C-242 BE PUT FORWARD AS GOVERNMENT MEASURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), I move:

That Bill C-242 which deals with smokers in transit be put forward as a government bill in order to facilitate its passage through the House prior to adjournment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Once again I express serious reservations about procedural matters being contained in motions moved under Standing Order 43. In any event, the motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED CENSORSHIP OF RUSSIAN LANGUAGE BROADCASTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity with regard to copies of certain internal documents of the international service of the CBC which have come into my possession and which indicate, among other things, an attempt by the Department of External Affairs to influence and censor CBC Russian language broadcasts critical of the Communist system on such matters as persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union; and a direct attempt by the Department of External Affairs to silence comments by CBC Russian language commentator Dr. F. Yaroshevsky of 30 Judith Drive, Toronto, as outlined in a series of questions on today's Order Paper. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That an immediate parliamentary inquiry be made of the programming of Radio Canada International to countries in eastern Europe, particularly the Soviet Union, for purposes of determining the degree of censorship exercised by the government, in particular by the Department of External Affairs and certain senior CBC personnel, in influencing program content away from criticism of the Communist system, Soviet mistreatment of Jews, the subjects of politics, economics or religion; and finally, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be required to apologize publicly on behalf of the government to CBC Russian language commentator Dr. F. Yaroshevsky of 30 Judith Drive, Toronto, for slanderous accusations made against him and subsequently proven false.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT FRENCH ONLY BE USED IN AIR COMMUNICATIONS IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion about an urgent matter calling for immediate attention.

Since the information paper issued to members of parliament by CALPA insists that CALPA is not Anti-French but in favour of using a single language, and since CALPA maintains as well in that paper that the use of two languages may cause air accidents and jeopardize air safety, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the government to respond to the very commendable concern of CALPA about safety by establishing French unilingualism in air communications in Canada so as to avoid the hazards which could result from the use of both languages in air communications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, such a motion cannot be put.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

PROPOSED REVIEW BY BOARD OF HALL REPORT ON CONTRACT OF AIRCRAFT OPERATIONS GROUP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board has rejected the carefully reasoned judgment of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall on the wage recommendations concerning the Treasury Board and Aircraft Operations group contract and as the AIB has ignored the amended Section S-67 of the AIB regulations which allows increases over the $2,400 ceiling in special cases, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to instruct the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board to implement an immediate review of the Justice Hall report and provide a complete written statement to the Treasury Board and the striking aircraft safety inspection group on their findings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION GOVERNING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS IN VIEW OF STRIKES—CONSULTATIVE ARRANGEMENTS WITH LABOUR CONGRESS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the growing number of industrial disputes which have been witnessed in this country, particularly in the public sector, since the establishment of wage and price controls, will the Prime Minister advise whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation governing industrial relations following the summer recess?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to bring back before the House the matter of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, but I do not plan to go into any detail. This, as the House knows, is the kind of thing that is dealt with at the time of the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Mazankowski: Inasmuch as the CLC seems to have committed itself to a withdrawal from the existing consultative mechanism with regard to establishing government labour relations in this country, at least until the control period ends, what sort of consultative arrangements are being considered by the government during this period?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I must disagree with the premise of the hon. member's question. The CLC has been meeting with the government. We had a meeting about ten days ago. We are planning one in about another ten days for a whole day and perhaps even two days. Therefore, there is certainly an indication by the CLC that they are interested in discussing with the government the future of this country.

ALLEGED DISCREPANCY BETWEEN MINISTER'S FIGURES AND OFFICIAL STATISTICS ON MAN-DAYS LOST AS RESULT OF STRIKES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance. As man-days lost as a result of strikes are up to two million in the first three months of 1976, representing an increase of 60 per cent over 1975, and as the Minister of Labour said in the House on June 17 that man-days lost are decreasing, can the Minister of Finance explain the discrepancy between the figures and opinions of the Minister of Labour and those of official government statistics?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring the hon. member's argument to the attention of my colleague.

Mr. Ritchie: Has the minister any statistics to bear out the claim made by the Minister of Labour that the anti-inflation program has substantially reduced the number of man-days lost in view of the figures for the first quarter which indicate that the opposite is the case?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me the hon. member is making the same argument over again.

HEALTH

MERCURY POISONING—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON MONITORING OF HEALTH OF NATIVES IN AREA AFFECTED

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and supplementaries for the ministers of manpower and environment. Bearing in mind the inadequacy of fast responses by the government to the dangers of mercury poisoning, and now that the presence of the dread Minamata disease has been confirmed in the Grassy Narrows Indian Reserve for the first time in Canada, I ask the minister whether the federal government is now prepared to conduct an intensive and ongoing monitoring of the health of the people in the area affected, including regular blood tests, so that individuals may be advised of the danger of mercury poisoning as it pertains to their own case histories?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member does not seem aware of all the measures which have been taken already during recent months in this field in the whole Grassy Narrows area. Those measures have already been implemented for several months with teams of medical experts and the tests carried on those Indians will go on extensively. In fact, the cases identified up to this day were discovered following the policy which was recommended and implemented by the government.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS BE DECLARED WATER QUALITY CONTROLLED ZONES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): The minister knows full well that those are only random samplings. I should like to direct a question, now, to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact that the mercury-polluted English river/Wabigoon river system is an interprovincial waterway, will the minister now acknowledge federal responsibility and begin discussions with the Ontario and Manitoba governments preparatory to declaring the area a water quality controlled zone under the provision of the Canada Water Act, or, in the event of failure to get provincial co-operation, take unilateral action as the Act empowers him to do?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that we are constantly trying to eliminate mercury from the environment. We have established standards in this respect. We continue to do so and keep cooperating with the provinces to eliminate not only mercury but PCBs as well. If, in this specific instance, there is something which could be done, I shall be very happy to.

MANPOWER

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR NATIVES OF WHITE DOG AND GRASSY NARROWS RESERVES IN VIEW OF LOSS OF WORK AS GUIDES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I see the buck-passing still goes on. I will try once more. In view of the fact that the Indians living on the White Dog and Grassy Narrows reserves depend on fishing and guiding for employment and that mercury pollution is destroying not only their health but also their livelihood, I would ask the Minister of Manpower what special plans he has to provide alternative employment for those residents who are desperately in need of assistance?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We have had some discussion with the government of Ontario in connection with special employment programs for that whole area. The program would extend not only to those directly affected but to others in the area, and I expect to announce some specifics in the not too distant future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PUERTO RICO SUMMIT CONFERENCE—EFFECT OF DECISIONS ON CANADA

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the important meeting just held in Puerto Rico. I am happy that this time Canada was invited to this economic summit and, Mr. Speaker, this is to the credit of the Prime Minister and of the Canadian people.

My question is this: can the Prime Minister tell the House what will be the impact of those talks on the domestic administrative policies of the country and also whether he made any commitment on behalf of Canada towards the chiefs of state he met?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no decision which could affect the domestic administration of any country, including Canada, was taken. We exchanged views, statistics and data which enabled the countries represented to try developing a common knowledge of economic issues and freedom problems in general.

POSSIBILITY OF SENDING ADDITIONAL FOOD SUPPLIES TO THIRD WORLD

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether during those discussions someone raised the possibility of allocating new funds for additional food aid to be sent to countries in the Third World?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was a rather lengthy discussion on aid projects for the Third World. Each country participated in this discussion. The Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs also spoke at length as co-chairman of the conference on economic co-operation in Europe which is being held in Paris, but there were no precise commitments made by any leader of participating governments. Of course Canada has played a major role in encouraging member countries to help Third World nations.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED MASSIVE FRAUD INVOLVING 200 COMPANIES—INQUIRY WHETHER INVESTIGATION BEGAN BEFORE VOLUNTARY DISCLOSURE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and is related to the alleged massive tax fraud involving 200 different companies and $400 million uncovered by a journalist for the Montreal Gazette and which was the subject of a radio interview on the CBC. Can the minister inform the House whether his department is investigating this allegation, whether charges are contemplated, and what generally is the department doing to plug this loophole?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the figures cited by the hon. member are impressive, but once again I must plead the confidentiality of any investigation that we may be conducting. It seems to me to be appropriate, if we are conducting an investigation, that if an individual is found to be innocent the matter should not be reported. If it turns out that the individual is guilty, then that should become public information and it seems to me that that is the time to make a public disclosure.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since it is reported that most of these firms have been allowed to make voluntary disclosures of their attempted fraud, can the minister advise the House whether the investigation to which he makes reference was underway before the voluntary disclosures were accepted by the tax department, or was the investigation launched after the disclosures were made?

Mr. Cullen: First and foremost, Mr. Speaker, I did not say there was an investigation; the hon. member suggested that there was an investigation taking place. I should make it quite clear that no one is permitted to make a voluntary disclosure or to abide by our rules under that heading if it comes about as the result of an investigation that is being conducted. So, if we initiate an investigation, no one is afterwards permitted to make a voluntary disclosure. I might say that that is comparatively new. There was a court case in which the department was reprimanded for not taking this action and we do take that action nowadays. If it comes about as the result of our investigations, no voluntary disclosure is permitted.

Mr. Oberle: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister please tell the House whether there is or is not an investigation into this alleged massive tax fraud, which is obviously a contravention of every rule of the tax department?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is precisely the question that the minister answered in the first instance.

Mr. Oberle: No, Mr. Speaker, he did not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR RESTRICTION ON TRAVEL TO FOUR COUNTRIES ON MEMBERS' PASSPORTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week I asked him a question about restrictions that had been imposed without notice either before or after passports has been issued to members of parliament, and possibly to others, in respect of certain countries. The minister said that he would look into the matter and give an explanation if possible.

[Mr. Oberle.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the matter and it is true that the practice has been established of indicating in special and diplomatic passports that these passports are not valid for entry into four countries. These are countries which at the present time Canada does not recognize. It is not a new practice; it was applied, for example, in the case of East Germany which at that time Canada did not recognize.

I believe that the holders of both diplomatic passports and special passports usually hold these passports because they are on public business or because they hold a special position and expect, in accordance with international practice, to receive better than normal treatment at the hands of the host government. Since these passports constitute a signal to the host government which might be construed as a form of recognition, this particular insertion is placed in the passport. Obviously it is not my intention to restrict the travel of members to any country they may wish to visit, of course, with an ordinary passport. That is the explanation for the practice.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister why this is now done surreptitiously without notice either before the passports are called in, allegedly for endorsation that a member is part of an official delegation, or following, and why this endorsation is put in somewhere at some page without any indication given afterwards? The minister did not even know this when I asked him the question last week! In addition, would the minister give an explanation in regard to the case of Taiwan which, when this government cravenly and in a bootlicking way decided to kowtow to Mainland China, altered the status, and members on the government side and on the opposition side—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Members on the government side and on the opposition side have received no special consideration. This has been the case since the time the government decided to withdraw recognition of the very well established government in Taiwan. Why is this being done now and what is the rationale, or is this just some special kowtowing that is going on?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not special kowtowing; it is the result of the circumstances which I have already explained. This is a policy that applies to others, not only to Taiwan, a country we do not recognize. We do not have a two-China policy and that has been a well established element of Canadian foreign policy. We cannot attempt to provide recognition to Taiwan indirectly which we withdrew formally in extending recognition to China. That is the basis of the policy, and it applies as well to Rhodesia and Namibia. It is based upon a precedent that has already been established. I am sympathetic to any point of view the hon. member may wish to make in respect of members of parliament whose mobility and rights I have no intention of disrupting or impeding in any way, consistent—

An. hon. Member: You have.

Mr. MacEachen: Not at all. I do not intend that, consistent with the fact that Canada does not intend, through this form or method, to provide indirect recognition to any of these régimes.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSAL THAT AIRLINES PAY FULL SECURITY COSTS AT AIRPORTS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in light of earlier statements by the Minister of Transport to the effect that there would be an announcement on June 1 indicating whether the airlines would be compelled to pay full security costs at MOT airports across Canada, I would ask the minister whether consultations with interested parties have come to a conclusion, and will a statement be forthcoming?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a conclusion was arrived at, and is subject to some further consultation, that reduces the figure significantly from the earlier one proposed; I believe to 20 cents from 65 cents.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN ALLOWABLE EARNINGS OF RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the difficulty being experienced by war veterans allowance recipients in earning a little more income to provide for the necessities of life, will the Minister of Veterans Affairs advise the House whether any consideration is being given to increasing the casual earnings allowable by a single or married recipient of war veterans allowance?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member will recall that this was looked at approximately a year and a half ago as well as three years ago. It is now one of the things to be looked at again, and we are doing this at present in my department.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would give in a little more detail the amount of the increase in the casual earnings he is considering, in view of inflation in the last few years.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the present amount is $1,000 of allowable earnings for a single person and $1,500 per married couple. I would prefer not to make figures known today until we have a little more study on them.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE OF RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF LOWER ST. LAWRENCE AREA

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I would like to ask the minister if he could give the House a progress report on the discussions and negotiations with Quebec authorities about the renewal of the agreement on the development of the lower St. Lawrence, of Gaspé and of the Magdalen Islands and if we can expect this agreement will be reached as soon as possible?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question of the hon. member by telling him first that we are not negotiating a renewal of the agreement itself. In fact, it is a new agreement under the general development agreement we signed with the province of Quebec more than two years ago.

As a matter of fact, we are negotiating this agreement. The civil servants at both levels of government met on several occasions. My counterpart and myself will soon have another meeting to evaluate the work accomplished, take some decisions and give a certain direction to our civil servants.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN DEPORTATION TO CHILE OF SERGIO PERES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the government intends to proceed tomorrow with the deportation of a Chilean refugee identified as Sergio Peres who was active in Chile, both in the trade union movement and politically as a supporter of the murdered President Salvador Allende, and in view of the fact that such a respected international observer as George Cram, the overseas development project officer of the Anglican Church of Canada, has said that Peres "could certainly be detained, could well be tortured", and that he personally had interviewed many political prisoners in Chilean jails who had less political involvement than Mr. Peres, could the minister postpone any action in this matter until he can be thoroughly acquainted with the dangers faced by Mr. Peres should he be returned to Chile?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the case just came to my attention this morning. I have examined it to the extent that I note that the gentleman's application for refugee status was, of course reviewed by the interdepartmental committee and found not to be valid by that organization. It was then referred to the Immigration Appeal Board for second review and the refugee claim was not upheld. Having said that, and having just had the opportunity to alert myself to the situation, I will look at the case and as the hon. member suggests satisfy myself that it is the proper course of action.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE DISCUSSION OF PUERTO RICAN CONFERENCE OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN INFLATION RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In answering a question put by the hon. member for Richmond the Prime Minister indicated that the Puerto Rican meeting was an exchange of ideas and certain data. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate if he picked up any idea when he was in Puerto Rico as to why United States inflation rate is down to almost 6 per cent currently while ours is still almost 9 per cent with controls?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not have to go to Puerto Rico to know the proper answer to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Every informed member of this House knows that the Canadian economy was out-performing the United States economy very substantially, including the year 1975, when there was a recession of some 6 per cent in the United States and in Canada there was a GNP growth of only minus one. So there is a different phasing between the two economies. We did indeed talk a great deal about that and the dangers to economies if they tried to recuperate and pull each other into an excessive stimulation which would lead to increased inflation. This whole problem was discussed and of course I informed them about the Canadian position.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF PUERTO RICAN CONFERENCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister could indicate whether he intends to make a statement concerning the conference and if not why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to table at the proper moment, when orders of the day are called, the communiqué in both languages which was issued at the end of the conference yesterday. On the question of why not make a statement, I am following my habit of not making any statement after my travels abroad because I find that generally they are counter productive.

FINANCE

EXTENT TO WHICH LINES OF CREDIT TO ENGLAND AND ITALY HAVE BEEN CALLED UPON

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance who also attended the Puerto Rican conference. I am wondering if he could indicate to what extent our lines of credit to England and Italy have been called upon and has there been any request for the lines to be increased?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was no request for an increase in Canada's stand-by credit to the United Kingdom. There has been a drawing on this but I have been advised by the Governor of the Bank of Canada that it has been the general practice not to indicate the amounts drawn at any time specifically on this particular credit. There was no further discussion about extension of credit to the United Kingdom, although there was extensive discussion about the balance of payments problems that Italy faces at the present time and some consideration of the possible actions that might be taken in the international monetary fund to assist in this regard.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BASIS ON WHICH TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS ENDORSED ON MEMBERS' PASSPORTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to know first, who made the order to deny to members the use of passports wherever they choose to go. Was it done by the cabinet or was it done by officials in his department, because it is a very serious interference with the principle of the charter of the United Nations that there shall be free egress and ingress. I should like to know on what this practice which is being carried out is based?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman will certainly be assured to know there is absolutely no effort to contravene the charter relating to entry or exit from any country. All that has happened has been that diplomatic passports, and passports of a special category, are not valid for entry to those countries under the present action that has been taken. Hon. members are free to travel, as are other citizens on ordinary passports which do not imply a possibility of recognition to regimes which Canada does not recognize.

The right hon. gentleman has asked under what authority. The special and diplomatic passports are issued under the authority of Order in Council 1956/1373 dated September 13, 1956 and regulations can be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs under that particular Order in Council or administrative action can be taken by officials of the department under delegated authority. It is the latter category under which this action was taken. I am presently reviewing the action in light of the comments made by hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day the minister did not know of the existence of this at all. He looked very abashed and unusually suavely silent. If he is looking into it, he must be convinced there is something wrong. I would ask him whether he has been so convinced because this is a dastardly interference with Canadian rights.

REASON DEPARTMENT CENSORING RUSSIAN LANGUAGE BROADCASTS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it is on the subject of CBC international programming to the Soviet Union. Will the minister tell the House why his department has been attempting to influence the nature of such programming, and particularly why his department played a part in censoring a broadcast by the CBC Russian language commentator Dr. F. Yaroshevsky of Toronto reporting on a demonstration in Toronto against the mistreatment of Jews in the Soviet Union?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my department is not responsible for the operations of the CBC. We have absolutely no authority nor control over the broadcasting policy of that corporation.

REASON FOR RESTRICTIONS ON SUBJECTS MENTIONED BY COMMENTATORS ON INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): The minister honestly misunderstood my question. I realize his department has no authority over the CBC, but it was his department that committed the act to which I have referred, and that is why I directed the question to him.

I will direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State responsible for the CBC. Is the minister prepared to explain to the House why CBC radio international personnel have been forbidden to give background information on the news or to comment on any political or economic matters, and especially why persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union has been specifically censored from certain broadcasts at the request of the Department of External Affairs?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any of that, but I will be pleased to look into it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REASON FOR DELAY IN GRANTING INCREASE PROVIDED TO EMPLOYEES BY AGREEMENTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who was behind the curtains a while ago.

An hon. Member: Ring the bell, he will return.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes. Well, I am waiting for him.

An hon. Member: He is coming.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Well!

An hon. Member: You could put the question to his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for telling him to come back.

He has already been asked several questions in the House—at least four if memory serves—concerning decisions taken about collective bargainings in the public sector granting salary increases to several professional groups, such as biologists, sociologists, statisticians and agronomists. Some of those decisions were deferred and others referred to the Anti-Inflation Board. I would like to know whether the minister has inquired about the matter, because the employees involved have been waiting up to 12 months for the results of those decisions.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, according to the information which I have obtained, in the case of biologists—and that question was put to me yesterday by the member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta—their retroactive payment, in accordance with the agreement, was mailed to them and they all have now been paid. As for the others, I have no information about them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister be prepared to make an investigation on the other questions and report to the House? Some of them have been waiting for 12 months.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, every time there has been an interim agreement, I asked my officials to expedite retroactive payments to civil servants. I have been told that, generally, this is done within 90 days, as required by law. I must admit that in the case of biologists, following the agreement with the union concerned and the ruling of the Anti-Inflation Board, the delay did extend beyond 90 days and I asked my officials to make sure this does not happen again.

AGRICULTURE

BLUE TONGUE—STEPS TO ENSURE VETERINARIANS RESPONSIBLE FOR QUARANTINE PROGRAM WILL NOT STRIKE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. In light of the minister's statement on June 15 in which he announced the imposition of a new blue tongue quarantine in British Columbia, what steps is the minister taking to ensure that the federal veterinarians responsible for the program will not go on strike?

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, no agreement has yet been signed with the veterinarians but the minister will be making a statement soon on the subject.

[English]

Mr. Patterson: Has the Minister of Agriculture passed along to the President of the Treasury Board his views concerning the importance of these veterinarians so that the latter might reassess his pathetic 8 per cent wage increase offer to these underpaid veterinarians?

PUBLIC WORKS

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1974-75

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): My question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware of the fact that the last published annual report of his department was for the years 1973-74? In the committee, on May 12, six weeks ago, I asked the deputy minister what the status of the 1974-75 annual report was and he replied it was due and was presently at the printers. I am sure the minister is aquainted with the situation. Could he confirm that the report is in fact at the printers and advise us as to when we might receive it?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the hon. member would consult the records of the House, he would discover that the Clerk of the House has received the 1974-75 report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR OPENING OF TRADE MISSION IN TAIWAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On April 2, as recorded at page 12406 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with regard to the possibility of opening a trade mission in Taipei so that we could assist Canadian exporters to improve their trade opportunities in that area. The minister referred the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Republic of China's foreign trade during the first four months of this year totalled $4,500 million, when rated in U.S. dollars—an increase of $1,300 million, or almost 40 per cent more than during the same four months in 1975, has the minister met with members of his party concerning the possibility of securing some of this increased trade, as promised in his reply recorded at page 12407 of Hansard; if so, what are the results of this discussion?

[Mr. Patterson.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at present we have no intention of opening a trade mission in Taiwan, not only because of the general political situation but because of the announcement that was made by the Prime Minister to the effect that for the next period of time no new posts would be opened abroad.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STATUS OF NEW OFFER BY LOCKHEED FOR SALE OF "ORION" AIRCRAFT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. On June 22 I asked the Acting Prime Minister about what might be called the possible revival of the deal with Lockheed for the purchase of Orions, and he replied that the government had received an offer. In another place it was disclosed that Lockheed had said that the offer required to be made definite by the end of June. As the end of June is now very close, and I also hope that the end of the session is fairly close, will the minister tell the House what is the status of this offer and whether a statement with regard to the negotiations will be made in the House before it recesses?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the new proposal has been received from the Lockheed company. It is now being studied by cabinet. I do not expect that a decision will be announced before the House rises, but I cannot of course be certain of that because I do not know exactly when the House will rise.

Mr. Brewin: May I put this question by way of a suggestion to the minister? Even if the deal is not completed, in view of all the surrounding circumstances he should make a statement to the House about how the negotiations are progressing before the House recesses.

Mr. Richardson: I will be pleased to answer any questions, as always. I have already done that.

HEALTH

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF PROGRAM AIMED AT REDUCING CONSUMPTION OF ALCOHOL

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it arises out of an answer he gave to a question I put to him yesterday concerning his plans for advertising of alcoholic beverages. In view of the fact that Canadian cigarette manufacturers initiated the practice of putting a health warning on packages of tobacco on April 1, 1972, and in view of the fact that the minister's own department made a press release on January 2, 1975 and again on January 7, 1976 containing figures that indicated the number of smokers has remained exactly the same since the beginning of this warning program, would the minister care to revise his grossly arrogant and flippant answer of one day ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is not at all, for the good reason that if the hon. member refers to the press release in question, he shall realize that if the trend which was apparent several years ago had been maintained, there would be in Canada 500,000 smokers more than there are now. Moreover he would realize that during the same period the number of smoking adult males decreased by 12 per cent. Therefore I would suggest that he look very carefully at the press releases issued on the subject.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would agree to look at his own figures. He would see that the trend has not changed since 1972.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF BENEFITS FROM 1976 CENSUS—SUGGESTED RETURN TO INTERVIEW SYSTEM ON TEN-YEAR BASIS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the budget for Statistics Canada has increased substantially this year, and in view of the criticism by Canadians who either refused to answer the complicated questions on the 1976 census forms or are questioning the necessity of such an intricate and costly system of instructions, particularly relating to agriculture, can the minister unequivocally assure Canadians that there will be benefits in return for this inconvenience and added expenditure?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that there has to be very definite benefit from this kind of survey and this kind of census. The statistics are clearly necessary in the judgment not only of Statistics Canada but of this House and all the other bodies that have asked for and have from time to time endorsed this kind of census taking. I am not sure if I got the real point of what the hon. member was asking, however.

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that census takers who worked in earlier years as well as in the current census say that in their opinion the previous method was much superior, will consideration be given to reverting to the interview system on a ten-year basis rather than the five-year, or to, having the census taken in conjunction with the provincial or municipal census to avoid duplication and thereby cut administrative costs?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the most I can do at the moment is to say that I will be glad to consider it. I think the fact that it is being done on a five-year basis, at least to some degree in order to supplement the ten-year census, is an indication that a great many people including literally thousands of representations from outside, argue that the ten-year time span was too broad. I will be glad to take it as a representation and give the hon. member an answer from the people at Statistics Canada.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLEGED DELAY IN RECEIPT OF OLD AGE PENSION CHEQUES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in respect of the tardiness of cheques, both for old age benefits and supplementary benefits, which are now late. This is said to be as a result of a foul up in the computer. Have the brain surgeons in the computer field been able to put this thing back together and when can the beneficiaries expect to receive the cheques up to date and in proper amounts?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this case to my attention. If it is a situation that is particular to his region or riding, I will be glad to look at it specifically, but I was under the impression that the problems which cropped up a few months ago had been solved for some time. If there are specific cases the hon. member would like to bring to my attention I will be glad to examine them carefully and see that measures are taken to correct them.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE IN CASE OF AIRCRAFT OPERATIONS GROUP

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister contact the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board on behalf of the aircraft operations group, many of whom are still on strike, as the minister must be aware, because their contract was negotiated in good faith and by mutual agreement with the government? I wonder if the minister is also aware that in Toronto alone 600 aircraft are grounded because certificates cannot be issued?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, parliament has enacted the Anti-Inflation Act for the purpose of controlling prices and also incomes, in particular in the public sector. I would have to say that the view I have generally taken is that parties who feel aggrieved by the decision of the board should resort to the procedures that parliament has provided. I, as minister, should not deal with the various individual decisions affecting parties by directing the manner in which the Board should dispose of the matter.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR MORE INSPECTORS AT TORONTO TO TAKE CARE OF BACKLOG OF WORK

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. I hope when the office is open again the minister will give consideration to having more inspectors in Toronto to look after the backlog of aircraft that are grounded. Perhaps they could be transferred temporarily from some of the more remote offices where they are not overworked.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to be able to do that but unfortunately backlogs exist almost everywhere. I hope when we get back to normal operation some provision may be made for some extra time and special efforts in order to catch up the backlog.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT FROM UNITED STATES ON KILLING OF ANNA MAE AQUASH—STATUS OF INVESTIGATION IN UNITED STATES AND AVAILABILITY OF RESULTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that the Canadian government is said to have received a report from the United States government concerning the killing of Anna Mae Aquash in the United States, can the minister tell the House whether such a report has been received and if so, what information was contained in it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, from the State Department we received a report prepared by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on the circumstances surrounding the autopsy and identification of the person in question, as well as an explanation of the procedures that were employed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. From memory I can recall that the Federal Bureau of Investigation said that it did use procedures in the identification which were clearly used in similar circumstances and of course at a time when it was impossible to know the identification and obviously the citizenship of the person in question. Subsequently, Anna Mae Aquash turned out to be Canadian. Nevertheless, at that time that fact was not known to the United States authorities. In addition I should comment that the United States authorities are continuing their investigation into the circumstances of what is now considered to be death by foul play.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question and may I first thank the minister for his answer. The Mountain States Regional Office of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, an agency which reports to the President and Congress on matters relating to human rights, recently stated in an internal memo that there is sufficient credibility in reports reaching that office to cast doubts on the propriety of actions of the FBI and to raise questions about the impartiality and focus of their concern. In view of this and the fact that the minister stated the United States Attorney General has launched an investigation into this incident, can the minister inform the House whether he is aware of the status of the investigation at the present time and if the Canadian government has received assurance from the United States authorities that the findings will be made available to this government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to advise the hon. member on the state of the investigation but I shall follow up the second part of the question.

DEPARTMENTAL REPRESENTATIVE ON MANAGEMENT BOARD FOR PURCHASE OF LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT—MR. STOPFORTH'S NEW DUTIES

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services? In view of the costly blunders made by his department in the LRPA program to date, can the minister tell the House what steps he has taken to reorganize his department? Specifically who is the department's representative on the LRPA management board, who is the replacement for Mr. Stopforth and at the same time, could he tell the House what Mr. Stopforth's new duties are?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot see the need to accept the suggestion of the hon. member. As for the representative of the department on the board of management, he was appointed by the deputy minister according to the normal procedure.

Order, please. With respect to the order of the day, hon. members will notice that by special order of the House a copy of a special addendum to today's order paper has just been distributed. It is a collection of report stage amendments on Bill C-84. This one copy has been available even though by special order the deadline for filing such amendments or motions was noon today. One copy of it has been made available to each party and as other copies are made available they, too, will be distributed. We hope to publish an order paper in proper form, despite its volume and the shortness of notice, as quickly as possible. I hope hon. members will bear in mind the shortness of time and importance of the subject and will join me in recognizing that the staff, who worked most diligently to produce this document in a short space of time, deserve our congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I always hesitate to rise on a point of order to question Your Honour's ruling, and I do so reluctantly today. My point of order relates to the question I asked the Minister of National Revenue in which I referred to serious allegations regarding a massive tax fraud. If the allegations are correct, it would be cheaper for Canadian taxpayers today to defraud the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member's point of order relates to his inability to be recognized for a third question, he has lots of company in that regard today. If his point of order is to that effect, I will be glad to hear it. But if it is simply a disagreement with the answer given by the minister, it does not constitute a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, perhaps a question of privilege might better identify my concern. I asked the minister whether an investigation into this serious matter is under way, and the minister, in answering my question, did not say whether such investigation was under way. Surely to God it is the right and privilege of members of this House and the Canadian public to know whether such an investigation is under way. I see the minister has left the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The substance of the ruling was that the hon. member had asked the question and received a response from the minister. If the hon. member is not satisfied with the answer to the question, that is a matter of disagreement.

TABLING OF REPORT ON PRIVATE RETIREMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I should like to table two copies, in both official languages, of the report on private disability retirement and survivor programs, submitted by the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee in May 1976.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, in his question, managed to make two statements which, if left on the record, would not be according to fact. I point out, first, that we do not have in Canada a demonstrated case of Minamata disease; there is a suspected case which is not yet confirmed. The Indian concerned is being examined today in Winnipeg and we will have a report on that subject later.

Second, the survey made in Indian reserves is not a random survey. The two reserves concerned have a population of 954. In early May we had already examined over 800 people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Frequently I recognize opposition members to give a minister the opportunity to correct an impression which may be left on the record. The first part of the minister's point of order surely may have something to do with that, that is to say, whether or not there has been an established case of the particular disease mentioned. The second part was simply an amplification of his answer and ought not to be permitted at this time.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, if I may rise on the same point of order, I do not know in what kind of hair-splitting the minister is indulging since my question was strictly limited; I was asking whether the ministry is taking blood samples on an ongoing, continuing basis. According to my information, this is not taking place with respect to every individual on the reserves, and I was asking about that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REPORT STAGE AND THIRD READING OF BILL C-84

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise to suggest a change in the notice of motion appearing on today's order paper at page VII in my name. There seems to be a typographical error in it which changes the meaning of the proposed motion. That it is an error is confirmed by a reading of the French version which appears on the opposite side of the page, where "et" appears.

The motion as it is now on the order paper reads, in part:

That any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage of the third reading stage of Bill C-84—

Obviously, one should read "or" instead of "of". If that is acceptable, I should like to see if there is unanimous consent to proceed with this motion as it would be amended today. When I put it down on the order paper yesterday, I did not know that we would reach the report stage of Bill C-84 today. That was a subsequent decision of the House. I think it would be desirable, if the House is ready to proceed today, to accept this order so that there is some certainty about the taking of votes both at the report stage and at third reading.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Beaudoin: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The question, therefore, is: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Allmand, moves:

That any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage and the third reading stage—

Some hon. Members: "Or."

Mr. Speaker: The text I have here reads "and". However, it is agreed that it should be "or". Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Allmand, moves:

That any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage or the third reading stage of Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and other serious offences, shall be held at a time to be fixed by the House leaders, provided that that time shall be not more than one week after the request for the division.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I would like it to be clear with regard to amendments at the report stage. Is the minister talking about five days for amendments, or will these be voted upon as they come up for approval?

Mr. Speaker: The motion has been introduced for debate. The hon. member has raised a question. I would assume, by way of answer, that the deferred divisions will likely be dealt with in the usual course with respect to the report stage motions.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I will not take up too much time of the House, but it seems that this strips away the whole façade of a free vote on the capital punishment matter. Here we have a motion introduced by the House leader on behalf of the government—

Mr. Sharp: On behalf of all parties.

Mr. Lawrence: —in respect of a matter that is supposed to be a free vote according to the free will and conscience of individual members. In other words, there is not supposed to be any party discipline. There are not to be any whips on, or any such matter in relation to this bill. I can certainly see an informal arrangement being worked out for the better dealing of the matter in respect of a formal vote on third reading. However, I must request a far more detailed reason in respect of the amendments which may or may not be found in order with regard to the report stage of the matter.

I feel that on a matter that is supposed to be absolutely free of party discipline, and free of party whips, this is a wrong move. The onus should be on the government House leader to indicate in a far more complete way than he usually reports to the House on a procedure such as this. For example, all these matters have to be voted on in respect of the report stage before we can get into third reading.

Mr. Blais: Of course.

Mr. Lawrence: All right. However, that may unduly delay the rising of the House for the summer recess. Hon. members should think about that. I can see an informal arrangement being worked out for the third reading vote. However, it is a backward step, on an issue as touchy as this, to begin having the party whips or party leaders, no matter what their party, invoking a little bit of discipline in respect of the votes at report stage. Quite frankly, I would like a full explanation before we vote on this motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was not my understanding that this was a government motion. I thought it came out of discussions that had taken place among the House leaders and that its purpose was simply to make the necessary provision so that neither side would be caught with a snap vote.

Whatever our views may be on Bill C-84, I think we all agree that what we did on second reading was a good idea, namely, that we designate when the vote will take place so that both sides can make sure their supporters are here. The only difference between the proposal in this motion and the proposal we had previously is that the previous one related to only one vote, namely, second reading, but this relates to the votes at the report stage and at third reading.

In response to the point raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, may I point out that under Standing Order 75(11) it is already in the power of the Speaker to defer any or all recorded votes on report stage amendments. I realize there are now 46 amendments. If they are all allowed, that will accumulate a rather massive number of votes. However, I suspect there will not be 46 recorded votes. Let us say there will be three, four, five, or whatever the number may be. The Speaker already has authority to defer the taking of those votes until the debate at report stage is over.

As I understand it, this motion says—and this is what we were talking about as House leaders—that when that point is reached, when the debate at the report stage is over, the House leaders will meet and suggest a day, not more than a week later, when those votes should be taken. After the report stage comes third reading and we go through the same process again. Quite frankly, I do not see anything sinister or out of the way about it. When the four House leaders meet, we represent both views of the question of capital punishment. This motion represents what both sides would like, namely, a clear understanding as to when the votes will be taken. I hope, therefore, that the House will accept this motion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was quite right when he indicated that this was a completely free vote situation. I have said before that as far as this party is concerned, that is so, making no comment about any other party in the House of Commons.

As opposition House leader, I have felt a certain duty to the members of my caucus. That duty, in terms of a free vote situation, is to ensure, to the greatest possible degree that I can, that members who have business elsewhere, regardless of what their position might be with respect to legislation before the House, will know when they are to vote. This is a way of bringing certainty to the vote, not to end or foreshorten discussions, as you will notice from reading the motion, as to the time of the vote. The purpose is to benefit all members of the House, particularly my colleagues.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this because it marks a very important milestone with regard to what is becoming an established precedent in the House of Commons, namely, the forecasting of when votes will occur. It makes it easier for each one of us to represent our constituents. We can play golf. We can be away. We know when the vote is coming. I read from time to time in the press that parliament has lost its aura, that it no longer really matters, that is has become humdrum, that no one attends, that no one is interested. The purpose of the bells ringing is to summon members to vote. Members are supposed to be within the call of the bell. That is the principle. It is your job, Mr. Speaker, to ring the bells until all members who can possibly be summoned have been summoned, and a vote is then taken. We shall abide by whatever the House decides on this issue, but I believe I would be remiss in my duty if I allowed this matter to pass as an accepted principle.

That great expert on the rules who has spoken—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: —believes he is a protector of parliament. How many times have parliamentarians given him that credit? I hope the good Lord strikes me dead if I ever do. He believes he is a protector of parliament, yet in his endorsement of this motion he is in some small way contributing to the erosion of the importance of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I have watched this practice grow in the last three or four years, this postponing of votes to deal with amendments. It is one which, for example, links my amendment with five or six others, something which detracts from its importance; it becomes one of a hodge-podge of amendments on which votes are taken. If parliament is to regain any importance in the minds of those who sit here, and in the minds of the people, votes must be recorded with respect to these amendments. It is an important part of a member's duty. If this process of erosion continues, before too long there will be proxy voting in the House of Commons. It would be easier that way. Members would not need to bother to go to Ottawa at all; they could just send in a signed statement.

As I say, I will abide by the wish of the House on this issue, as will all members, but I cannot allow this point of order to pass without putting on record my view that it is a contribution to the erosion of the importance of parliament and of our parliamentary system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I, too, would like to take exception to this proposed motion. In addition to the arguments which have been advanced by several of my hon. friends in the opposition, I would point out that it would be most unfortunate if you, Mr. Speaker, were to follow this procedure during report stage, because many of the amendments which will be before us are interrelated and it might well happen that if a particular amendment were carried, further amendments would not need to be debated. In the long run, an arrangement of this type might even delay the proceedings, rather than expedite them. This is a dangerous precedent and I do not think it is called for in the circumstances. Surely members who are interested in this debate should be in their place ready for a vote, whenever that vote might come up.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, to explain my approval of the special order put forward by the government leader, I have to say that my understanding is that there will be a vote at report stage and another no more than five days after the conclusion of the debate on third reading of Bill C-84. I am not speaking on behalf of my colleagues since this will be a free vote, but I should like to say that it would be better if we knew when the vote on third reading and the vote at report stage will be held.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has already spoken in the debate, although it was a very short speech. He might have been under the impression he was raising a point of order rather than making a speech on a debatable motion. In any event, if he is to speak now, unanimous consent will be necessary. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reynolds: I merely wish to support the position taken by the hon. member for Crowfoot. Members from British Columbia will be here next week and they will be listening every day to speeches made on the report stage and third reading of this important bill. They will not be in their ridings; they will be attending and voting on this bill. I see one difficulty here. When we reach report stage it will be necessary to give members notice to enable them to get here. What shall we do between-times before we reach the debate on third reading? Maybe the bill will be defeated at the report stage. I shall vote against this proposition.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, this is partly for clarification somewhat along the lines mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham relating to the various amendments which might be brought forward either at report stage, which we now have, or at third reading. Does this involve deferred votes for individual amendments during the report stage, or just on third reading?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, allow me to make one or two very simple points. First of all, in support of the House leaders of the other parties in their statements that this was a proposal put forward as a result of discussion among the House leaders, it was not specifically a government proposal but it was one put forward on behalf of all the House leaders who felt, as I did, that it would be undesirable to have snap votes without notice on a measure which is not a government bill in the ordinary sense because no question of confidence is involved.

The views of members are being sought as individuals, not as members of parliament, and that is why this sort of provision is being made, just as it was on second reading. It would, of course, be possible that any of the amendments at the report stage could change the whole nature of the proposal which is being debated in the House, so the voting at the report stage is almost as crucial as the vote on third reading. That is why we have had to include report stage amendments as well as the vote on third reading. We considered this matter at some length, and the conclusion we reached is one which is, in my view, irrefutable.

May I say, in response to the hon. member for Crowfoot, that as far as I know I have not been party to a proposal of this kind in relation to an ordinary government bill. This is a special procedure which relates to a measure which is of a different character, one in which each member has an equal interest. It is not a question of partisan support or party loyalty, but a matter of individual conscience, and for this reason I hope the House will support the motion.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

And more than five members having risen:

● (1550)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is upon the motion of Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Allmand, who has moved that any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage or the third reading stage of Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and other serious offences, shall be held at a time to be fixed by the House leaders, provided that that time shall be not more than one week after the request for the division.

In line with the proceedings adopted at second reading, which seemed to meet with the approval of members on all sides of the House because of the special nature of the vote, the vote was taken in a special manner at second reading, it would seem that we should take our votes at this stage in the same manner. I would therefore ask all those in the first row to my right to please rise.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the result of the change in the time of voting, there seems to be some confusion. I should like to indicate to the House that we will be voting this evening, at 8 p.m., on Bill C-68.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: Here's Mitch.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to welcome the government House leader back to the fold. It is obvious, from the vote, that he would have been the only one to have voted against the motion, and therefore, because of the freedom that was so obvious on the other side, he was left outside, behind the curtains. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be a disposition in the House to consider taking now the vote which would be postponed until eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The status of the vote at eight o'clock this evening is enshrined in a House order which was made last night. I wish to make it clear that really there is no procedure even for seeking the unanimous consent for any departure from this order. I think it would be contrary to our procedures to even ask for this at this moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the order for the vote to take place this evening was made after much consultation and after certain hon. members had made plans. We do not wish to see it changed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the House that we are still in routine proceedings; we are still on the taking of motions. We have yet to take questions on the order paper to finalize routine proceedings, following which we will proceed to orders of the day, which will bring about the calling of the report stage of Bill C-84.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we proceed much further, I wonder if the government House leader, or you, Mr. Speaker, could explain the motion on which we just voted. Exactly what will take place, and how?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: As I understand it, all amendments accepted by the House will be dealt with at the report stage. Then, before a vote is held on them, they will be set aside and we will debate third reading of the bill.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think we should get into a discussion on how the proceedings will take place at the report stage of Bill C-84. We will be in the report stage on Bill C-84 in a few minutes. When we come to that point, there can be some clarification, but first of all there will be a point of order on a number of the motions appearing in the order paper. Surely the intended arrangement is to follow the practice in the past of deferring divisions. The difference here is to have them come forward at some agreed time. That will be clarified as we get into the report stage of the bill.

What companies in Canada does the Department of National Defence consider capable of doing the design work for the ships in the fleet replacement programme now underway?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): See reply to Question No. 5,241 answered today. The consideration of companies for design work will not be undertaken until the studies of the fleet replacement needs are completed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—TENDERS FOR SHIPS DESIGN

Question No. 5,241—Mr. Forrestall:

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes. (a) Not applicable; (b) Not known. Studies of the replacement needs of the fleet are still in progress.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FLEET REPLACEMENT DONE OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 5,242—Mr. Forrestall:

Is the Department of National Defence under any specific instructions to have the design work for the fleet replacement programme done outside Canada and (a) if so, who issued such instructions (b) if not, is DND under any instructions which would deny its ability to invite tenders on design work from Canadian firms?

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Question No. 5,246—Mr. Marshall:

What are the provinces and the cost-sharing arrangements under the Department of Transport and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with regard to highway strengthening programmes or for assistance in reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: Nil. DREE has no Highway Strengthening Programme as such, nor does it provide assistance in reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway. The Department does assist some provinces in respect to specific highway projects necessary to regional economic development. In so far as Transport Canada is concerned: A Primary Highway Strengthening Programme is in effect in three provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There is no cost-sharing under this programme as such but an agreement under which the three provinces have increased load limits on the primary highway network to 110,000 lbs. gross vehicle weight, to correspond with prevailing limits in British Columbia and Ontario. In return, the federal government is providing base payments for the three provinces of $78.5 million, spread over five (5) years commencing in fiscal year 1974/75. An additional indexed payment is also made to offset the rising cost of asphalt paving material and placement. A second phase to the programme, if warranted, is expected to be negotiated prior to the end of the first phase. Transport Canada has no assistance programme for the reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY

Question No. 5,399—Mr. Beatty:

In 1975, which were the ten countries whose diplomats most often invoked diplomatic immunity to avoid being prosecuted for violations of Canadian law and in how many instances was diplomatic immunity invoked by each of the ten?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The following is the list of the ten Commonwealth and foreign posts in Ottawa whose officers and staff were accused most often in 1975 of violating Canadian law, and the number of instances attributed to each embassy or high commission: Uganda, 611; Nigeria, 328; USSR, 256; Ivory Coast, 226; Arab Republic of Egypt, 212; Gabon, 198; Tunisia, 197; Zaire, 185; Italy, 182; France, 151.

CEMA

Question No. 5,453—Mr. Beatty:

1. Were three carloads of eggs, imported by CEMA in the week of April 25 to 30, 1976, sent directly to the distributors to whom they were ultimately destined and, if not (a) was the Porter Produce Company paid a handling fee (b) for what reason were they not sent directly, thus avoiding handling fees?

2. In the past year, has the Porter Produce Company been used as a first receiver for western eggs shipped into Ontario and, if so, how often and how many eggs were involved in each case?

3. Has the Porter Produce Company received handling fees for eggs imported into Ontario from Western Canada and, if so, what was the amount in each case?

4. In the past two years, what other companies have been used as first receivers for western eggs shipped into Ontario and, in each case (a) on what date (b) how many eggs were involved (c) what handling fees were paid (d) what (i) was the transportation cost (ii) was the name of the transportation company who shipped the eggs (e) by whom were the transportation costs paid?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. CEMA did not import three carloads of eggs in the week of April 25 to 30, 1976, but the Porter Produce Company imported eggs on behalf of CEMA. (a) Yes; (b) Upon entry to Canada, Revenue Canada allows movement in bond to importer for inspection by Agriculture Canada inspectors prior to official entry into Canada. Eggs are off loaded for inspection and then reloaded for delivery to customers whether in truck load or less-than-truck-load quantities.

2. Yes (a) Respecting Toronto area, Porter has been used most frequently because of his facilities and the service provided. Another dealer has been used when volume moved requires additional capacity for segregation into requirements of final receivers (by grade and by volume). Respecting other areas different first receivers are used; (b) Shipments are by truck load of 1,500 boxes of 15 dozen each.

3. Yes, 3 cents per dozen for handling case space and re-sorting truckloads into requirements of buyers—the same fee for all first receivers.

4. Since the appointment of the current General Manager of C.E.M.A., this national agency has had the responsibility of coordinating the sale of Canadian eggs surplus to Canadian table egg requirements in the area of surplus. Since January, 1976, four Ontario firms, in addition to Porter Produce Co., have been used as first receivers. These are Loughcrest, Hallview; McCartney, Ottawa; Bradford Cold Storage, Forrest; Winchester Storage, Winchester. They respectively handled 5, 2, 4 and 4 loads of 22,500 dozen each. A uniform handling fee of 3 cents per dozen was paid to each firm. In each case, the transportation cost of 3½-4 cents per dozen was paid by C.E.M.A. The transportation companies used were: Atomic, Mid-West, Quinn, Millar & Brown, and C.P.

HEADLINE IN "OTTAWA CITIZEN" OF MAY 12, 1976

Question No. 5,488—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Prime Minister aware of the eight column headline which appeared on the front page of The Ottawa Citizen of May 12, 1976 and which reads "Trudeau's Popularity Hits Record Low" and, if so, is it his intention to make a statement concerning it?

2. Is the Prime Minister or his office (a) in the possession of information indicating the state of the Prime Minister's popularity (b) conducting an investigation into the matter of Prime Ministerial popularity and, if so (i) what has the investigation shown (ii) will all information resulting from such investigations be made public?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. It has always been government policy to comply with the rules and practices of Parliament. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms has for many years been considered to be an authoritative guide in these matters. Citation 171 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne clearly indicates that "in making a question, observations which might lead to debate cannot be regarded as coming within the proper limits of a question".

2. See answer to part 1 above.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out to the House that in the short time that was available, one motion, motion No. 1, was placed on the special order paper in error. It stands in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). It was never his intention to move an amendment to delete clause 1 of the bill; therefore, the motion has no status whatsoever and ought simply to be deleted from the order paper. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Miss Campbell (South Western Nova).]

Mr. Speaker: Rather than renumber all the motions on the order paper, I wonder if we might simply agree that motion No. 1 has been withdrawn and that we will therefore proceed to take the rest of the motions as they are presently numbered, without changing any of the numbers?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The obvious point, before proceeding with all the report stage motions, is that a glance will indicate that a number of them would propose to reinstate or return to the Criminal Code some form of death penalty under different curcumstances or to make amendments which would in some way relate to the death penalty. Before getting into report stage, setting up the amendment for discussion and ordering any discussion and vote, surely the first point the House ought to address itself to, and certainly that the Chair would want to hear argument upon, is whether any amendment—this being a bill which has the effect of eliminating capital punishment from the Criminal Code—which would in fact re-establish capital punishment, in any sense contravenes the principle of the bill. That is the point at issue.

If the Chair were to find an amendment in this way contravene the principle of the bill, obviously the order of arguing and dealing with amendments would be drastically affected. There are so many of them that I would feel it quite proper to call upon any member interested in developing arguments in that respect to do so now. Then perhaps I will have an opportunity to carefully consider such arguments and reserve decision while the House goes on with some other amendment, and I shall deliver the decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the amendments, which now amount to 45, one having been deleted, concern the question of the penalty for various kinds of murder—whether the sentence or punishment should be a life sentence or in some cases, in reference to the amendments, the death penalty. I should like, first of all, to develop the argument of whether the amendments are against the principle of the bill. In developing the first argument, may I refer to the title of the bill which is as follows: "Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences". I should like to draw attention to the fact that this bill, like many other bills in reference to part retention and part abolition and abolition or retention, is an amendment to the Criminal Code. The big point in reference to the principle of the bill is in relation to the punishment for murder.

My first point is whether the punishment for certain kinds of murder—whether it be first-degree murder, second-degree murder, or whether it is categorized as capital murder or non-capital murder—should be life imprisonment or the penalty of death. I say that the title of the bill itself, which says "punishment for murder and certain other serious offences" shows that punishment for murder could be life imprisonment, could be a term certain, or could be death, and therefore I say at the outset that it does not change the principle of the bill.

I want to refer, first of all, to May's Parliamentary Practice, the eighteenth edition which was issued in 1971, at page 494, the section under the title "Functions of a committee on a bill". Of course, the same rules would apply in reference to amendments in the House. Before I commence on that argument, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the same point was raised by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs who ruled against the amendment saying it was against the principle of the bill. I submit that the first course of the committee or the House is to go through the bill clause by clause, but that only applies in committee itself. The question at report stage—and I am going to ask that question again—is whether substituting the death penalty for life imprisonment is against the principle of the bill. I submit that by having regard to the title of the bill, which is "an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences", moving an amendment in reference to changing the punishment does not change the nature of the bill.

The second argument I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention is that Bill C-84 is not totally an abolition bill. I believe this argument was presented to the committee by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Under the National Defence Act we still have the death penalty for certain offences, whether Bill C-84 passes or not, so it is not totally an abolitionist bill; it is still partly retentionist.

It is interesting to note, and this will please my good friend, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), that Senator Argue's Bill S-23 presented in the other place, a bill entitled—and it is in order—"an act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment), confirms this position. In other words, Mr. Speaker, my point is that this is not totally an abolitionist bill; it is part retentionist because there are still certain offences under the National Defence Act where the death penalty applies. That was pointed out by Senator Argue in the other place, and that is why he presented Bill S-23. The title of his bill is "an act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code", which confirm this position. This proves that Bill C-84 is partly a retentionist bill, and therefore amendments are admissible. That is my second argument.

I come to my third argument. I refer the House to Volume V of the Debates of the House of Commons, of 1967. On November 23, 1967, the House was considering Bill C-168, which was partly a retentionist and partly an abolitionist bill. I was a member of the House at that time, and I remember that we treated the bill then under consideration in much the same way as we had treated the previous bill on the subject. We acted according to law, and that law still stands.

The Speaker at that time, Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, who subsequently became a senator, permitted amendments, as becomes obvious if one reads page 4629 of Hansard. For example, he allowed an amendment providing that if a victim who was being raped was murdered, the death penalty should apply. I moved that amendment. It was seconded by Gordon Churchill, who was then a member of the Privy Council and a member of this House. Mr. Speaker allowed the moving of another amendment saying that anyone convicted of murdering a police officer was subject to the death penalty. The reason for that amendment was this: as Your Honour knows, if a police officer or a group of police officers asks a citizen for help and assistance, the citizen must help. Failure to provide help and assistance is an indictable offence.

We moved an amendment to cover a person in that position, because the death penalty applied to the convicted murderer of a policeman or prison warden. I maintained at that time that if a person is acting as a police officer or warden, the same penalty should apply to his murderer. Those amendments were allowed to be put by Mr. Speaker Alan Macnaughton. If the Speaker allowed those amendments to that bill which was partly retentionist, partly abolitionist, I say that Your Honour ought to allow amendments to this bill which is also partly abolitionist, partly retentionist. That is my third argument.

I come to my fourth argument, which I borrowed from the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). He drew attention to a similar bill being dealt with by the British House on December 25, 1965. It is interesting to note, from what happened in committee and in the House, that the sorts of amendments we are proposing at the report stage were permitted and declared admissible by the Speaker of the British House. For example, the following was proposed:

> That the death penalty should be retained for a person who committed murder a second time . . .
> That the death penalty should be retained for the murder of a police officer acting in the execution of his duty . . .
> That the death penalty should be retained for a convicted murderer who in the course of life imprisonment murdered again—

I will not read the entire list of amendments; it is enough to say that they were allowed. That bill was practically on all fours with Bill C-84 presently before the House, with one exception: the British parliament retained the death penalty for high treason and other offences of treason, and those penalties are still retained.

I might mention that the chairman of our committee, in making his decision, admitted that he was intrigued by the argument presented, and particularly intrigued by facts we had mentioned concerning the other bill considered in the Senate. But he said, with the greatest respect to you, Mr. Speaker, that he was faced with your ruling on the former bill given when you were the distinguished chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As you will recall, the abolitionists had moved an amendment which was to do away with the death penalty for all offences, but you ruled that it was against the principle of the bill. I realize that since you made that decision you have distinguished yourself even more. I am sure that since you are now the Speaker, and since you have had the experience of being chairman of the justice and legal affairs committee, you have grown wiser and will be able to reverse your previous decision.

I think the chairman of the standing committee handled himself with distinction. This is not an easy subject, being charged with emotion as it is. There were, on the committee, abolitionists and retentionists. I felt he was most fair in his decision, and if one can disregard that one decision which Your Honour made when you were chairman of the committee, he was pretty sympathetic to the arguments we presented. But, faced with your previous decision made when you were chairman of the committee, he felt that Your Honour had set a new precedent and that he could not follow the authorities I had mentioned.

I ask Your Honour in all seriousness to consider the precedent I mentioned, to consider arguments relating to the title of the bill which mentions the punishment for murder, and to consider arguments relating to what May says about the principle of the bill. Although one cannot move amendments which change the principle of a bill, surely the title has something to do with the principle. I pointed out that in 1967 Mr. Speaker Macnaughton allowed amendments and told Your Honour what the British did with regard to a similar bill. In light of those authorities, I ask Your Honour to give serious consideration to all amendments calling for the substitution of the death penalty for life imprisonment. I ask Your Honour to permit such amendments to be debated in this Chamber and to be brought to a vote so that decisions on them can be made.

This bill is very wide, Mr. Speaker. It abolishes the death penalty for treason. I think we are one of the few countries to go this far. Also, it abolishes the death penalty for all who murder a second time. In this regard I will not quote any pertinent statistics in my possession. This bill provides for those guilty of planned and premeditated capital murder to be sentenced for 25 years, a provision which will cause grave anxiety to those whose responsibility and duty it is to guard those unfortunate enough to be sentenced to 25 years of incarceration. I ask, in light of the facts just mentioned and in light of the seriousness of the bill, that Your Honour reverse himself and permit these amendments to be debated and voted on at the report stage. I thank Your Honour for hearing me, and I thank all hon. members for paying such close attention.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to traverse the ground covered by my colleague from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). Bill C-84 amends certain sections of the Criminal Code. If an amendment to modify a clause of Bill C-84 were to carry, since Bill C-84 is to modify the Criminal Code the amendment as proposed would, of course, be in order; because a section of the Criminal Code is the basis of the amendment and anything which serves to amend the pertinent section of the Criminal Code in any way whatsoever must be acceptable. There is that basis for the change; and if the House is prepared to accept that change, that modification is made.

If, on the other hand, an amendment as proposed, if carried, merely negatives a clause of Bill C-84 but leaves the section of the Criminal Code unchanged, then I say that is merely an expanded negative. It should not be accepted, because the same result is achieved by voting and defeating the clause in the bill. As my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out, there is no other principle to Bill C-84 than to amend the Criminal Code with respect to certain offences. The fact that they are related in some ways to capital punishment cannot hold. There is, for example, the introduction of the penalty for high treason. It does not exist in the present Criminal Code. Therefore, there is no other principle to Bill C-84 because there is treason in the Criminal Code.

Let us look at those clauses which deal with high treason. They are entirely new. There are other features in Bill C-84 which introduce new considerations into the Criminal Code. I therefore state, with the greatest respect, that it is wrong to say that the principle of Bill C-84 is the abolition of capital punishment. Nothing is further from the truth. It is a bill to amend the Criminal Code in certain features.

In some instances the bill changes the nature of the penalty from a capital sentence to varying categories of terms of imprisonment, but only in certain respects. As my colleague said, and I will repeat some of his argument, capital punishment will not be abolished in this country until it is done under the National Defence Act as well. Bill C-84 does not touch that. Therefore, one has to be very careful about these amendments and simply say that if the same result can be achieved by voting and defeating the clause in Bill C-84, all well and good. That does not, then, amend the Criminal Code. However, if the purposes of the amendments now before the House for consideration are, if carried, in any way to serve to modify even a colon, to introduce even a semi-colon, or introduce a preposition into the Criminal Code, the amendments must be attacked. I put it to Your Honour that such should be the case.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I am sure the thought that is going through Your Honour's mind, even questioning some of these amendments—as I certainly believe that proposition will be made from the government's side—is that the main principle of the bill is the abolition of capital punishment and, therefore, any amendment which has the effect of retaining or reinstituting capital punishment is out of order because the main principle of the bill was discussed and voted on in this House on second reading. My submission is that the abolition of capital punishment is not the main principle of this bill. The main concept and the main thrust of this bill is simply the reorganization, in a far more logical way, of the homicide sections of the Criminal Code.

I merely point out that where before there was a blanket provision for activities relating to treason, there is now a differentiation between high treason as a crime and treason as a crime. We never had that differentiation before. To my knowledge, this is the first time we have had that concept in the Criminal Code, certainly in recent years. It is a logical and sensible differentiation.

With regard to murder, for the first time we have a differentiation between first-degree and second-degree murder. My submission is, quite simply, that the main principle behind the bill is a complete reorganization of the classifications of homicides in the Criminal Code, and in the Criminal Code exclusively. If that is so, the penalties for those reclassifications of various types of homicide is ancillary to the main principle. If that is the case, they are debatable and amendable at the report stage. It is as simple as that.

Let me put the hypothetical position to Your Honour. Even though one or two members of the House earlier publicly indicated they were going to amend certain other penalty clauses, a brief look through the motions before Your Honour indicate there are no amendments along those lines. However, let me just put the hypothetical proposition. In two of the cases, for example, in first-degree murder and second-degree murder, there are penalties that mention a 25-year period of imprisonment and a 15-year period of imprisonment. If there were an amendment before Your Honour to change the 25-year period to 30, 20, 40, or 15 years, would that be out of order?

I cannot believe that would be out of order. I believe the Chair would rule that the penalty clause was ancillary to the main principle and, therefore, amendable and debatable at the report stage. Similarly, the question of life imprisonment and the death sentence for certain of the reclassifications of homicides is a referral to the penalty clause only. If it is a referral to the penalty clause only, that is ancillary to the main principle of the bill and, therefore, it should be debatable and amendable at report stage.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, following the question raised by the Chair as regards the acceptability of amendments dealing with capital punishment and its enforcement, in putting the problem as if Bill C-84 in its principle dealt only with capital punishment, I think I should join the previous speakers in contending that the principle of Bill C-84 as such has nothing to do with the abolition or retention of the death penalty. In Bill C-84, the government seems to be dropping capital punishment as a means of fighting crime. As was said earlier, through Bill C-84 the government tries to amend the present outdated and obsolete Criminal Code, to reclassify the order of crimes and to provide for a new class of crimes; therefore—and this is only the result of such reclassification—unmistakably the government also provides for a degree of sentence in relation to the crime. In Bill C-84, one can find sentences such as commutation, detention for a specified period and even some provisions for parole after a given number of years in prison.

Mr. Speaker, as the title of the bill indicates, the bill before us is designed to amend the Criminal Code. This is the principle of the bill. I wish to make a comparison in support of my argument by referring first to the Fourth edition of Beauchesne, citation 246, paragraph 3.

It deals with a precedent relating to "money" bills, bills which aim either at spending some money, or at reducing or increasing expenditures. As the House and the Chair surely know, a member of Parliament cannot introduce a bill aimed at opposing the government's view, or involving public expenditures; but this would not prevent any member of Parliament from introducing an amendment providing for a different distribution of taxes that would be raised through the government bill.

In other words, a member of Parliament cannot reduce a tax on his own initiative through an amendment, but he can amend the legislation so that the distribution will be different from the one proposed in the bill. I will not read paragraph 3 of citation 246 of Beauchesne, but this is precisely the principle it puts forward. This is where I relate it to Bill C-84. I have in my name in the order paper a number of amendments that are being considered by the Chair and I suggest that those amendments, particularly No. 37, are simply designed to classify in a different way from that provided by the minister—the Solicitor General, who sponsored this bill—the penalties which will be involved in relation to a first or second degree murder.

I shall also refer to citation 276 of the same edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, paragraph 1, which reads:

> In early editions of this book (Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice), it was stated that "the Crown has no concern in the distribution of taxes." Hence amendments were at first pemitted which proposed the substitution of a different tax for a tax proposed by the Government . . .

I shall refrain from reading the whole paragraph, but I wish to show once more that a member of Parliament has some power. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if your decision were that any amendment aimed at changing the way the sentence is to be carried out, the sentence being either life imprisonment, or life imprisonment with possible commutation, or death with possible commutation, or again imprisonment with possible parole, one readily sees that that enumeration deals with the consequence of an act that was committed.

What the government is interested in is fighting crime. That is the principle in the bill which indicates the government has decided to revamp the Criminal Code as a whole. I for one say that the means proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in his bill, not the itself, are inadequate, and I suggest that one of the means to achieve the objective of the government happens to be the death penalty. What inspired me when I drafted motion No. 39—which I will simply recall without quoting—it to say that in the amendment I want to extend imprisonment in certain cases, rule out parole in others or simply deal with the sentencing to life imprisonment in yet other cases.

Well, Mr. Speaker, and that boils down to the opinion expressed by the hon. member who spoke before me, if that kind of amendment is out of order it means the bill itself is strictly a bill to abolish capital punishment, regardless of the crime rate in Canada, regardless of the categories of murders, regardless of the categories of crimes and regardless of the means used. That is why I say that the House of Commons should not become entangled in this kind of procedural snare because hon. members would have no other choice but to vote on a principle that would be either abolition or rentention of capital punishment. I say for my part that as a Parliament we have the power to go further in the same way we do with bills dealing with public outlays in the sense that we have the power to suggest to the government amendments to distribute its taxes in a different way, and then there is a vote. I say that the purpose of Bill C-84 which is to revise the Criminal Code is commendable, that the purpose of fighting crime is also commendable but that the means proposed by the Solicitor General are inadequate. That is my opinion. That is why I am taking positive action in not touching the bill, nor its title nor its basic principle but rather the means the government intends to give itself to fight crime, to control crime or to penalize a criminal convicted of first or second degree murder.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks by saying that the principle of Bill C-84 is not to establish the mode of punishment but to catalog a number of crimes, establish categories and therefrom establish penalties. The principle of the bill, as I said, is not to establish a mode of punishment, but rather to catalog and specify a type of crime and give the government tools to fight that crime. That is why I am moving this kind of amendment to give the government an additional tool, a serious tool—the death penalty.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In speaking on the admissibility of the amendments which are before you, I would draw Your Honour's attention to two facts. One of them has already been referred to by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). First, the impression hon. members may have that this is an abolitionist bill, in the true sense, is not a sound one. This is a bill to amend two existing statutes, the Criminal Code and the Fugitive Offenders Act. I refer to the schedule on page 16. Though it amends those two acts, it specifically does not amend the National Defence Act, and the National Defence Act does contain extensive provisions covering situations where the death penalty applies in the event a person is convicted of certain stated offences—and I am referring to literally dozens of cases under the National Defence Act where the death penalty can apply.

It is, therefore, my submission that this bill is simply a modification of existing law with respect to the death penalty; it merely suggests that the death penalty with respect to certain offences be removed. On the other hand, the offences referred to in the National Defence Act are not covered. In short, it is simply a question of degree. In these circumstances I maintain that the argument put forward by various hon. members that the principle of the bill being abolition, the Chair cannot accept any amendment which goes against that principle, falls to the ground. To strengthen this contention I would draw attention to a bill presently before parliament, Bill S-23, introduced for first reading on March 13, 1975. That bill, I suggest, is a true abolitionist bill. It is entitled "an act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment)". We are in an odd position in that we do have a truly abolitionist bill before parliament at the same time as a limited retentionist bill or a limited abolitionist bill. Any amendment to the limited abolitionist bill, C-84, should be found by Your Honour to be in order.

I will go further and refer Your Honour to a ruling of your predecessor that appears in the House of Commons Journals for February 13, 1969. That is a ruling which turned on an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). In those proceedings he proposed that a private bill, known as S-6, which was then before the House be amended by deleting clause 1. The odd fact was that that was the only clause in the bill.

There was a lengthy debate on the issue, to which I hope Your Honour will refer, as reported in the Debates for February 13, setting out the arguments pro and con as to whether it was in fact in order to delete a clause which, in effect, negatived the whole bill. During the argument, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is still with us, very effectively argued that it was quite in order that this deletion be proceeded with, and he won his case. If I may, I should like to refer to certain observations made by the Speaker in his ruling. I point out that this ruling was given shortly after the rules that now exist were agreed upon. The paragraph in the existing Standing Orders which was referred to was Standing Order 75(5).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is now, it seems to me, on a point which will be more relevant to the next argument that we are going to face since we have a number of amendments deleting clauses in the bill which have the effect of re-establishing clauses that now exist in the Criminal Code, obviously without the effect of the amending statute. The problem that now arises is one that the Chair is very much aware of, and it was referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), if I recall his words, as being an expanded negative.

As I say, that point is one that we will face in the motions to delete clauses. I understand that the hon. member is drawing a parallel to the effect that if you can do it that way, you ought to be able to do it in the way that is now before the House. I appreciate the point, but in terms of a full development of the point I would ask for further argument since there is a series of amendments before us which proposes to do precisely what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Stevens: If I may, Mr. Speaker, the main thrust of my argument is that I hope that the ruling by your predecessor to which I have referred will be considered a precedent to follow in regard to motions 7, 11, 13, 36, and possibly others. In addition to that, if we read the full wording of the Speaker at that time, I think that what is before us today in regard to all these amendments is equally true, and that that precedent can be used not only to indicate that motions Nos. 7, 11, 13 and 36, which delete clauses, are in order but to justify Your Honour's finding all of the amendments before you in fact in order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with Your Honour that the question of how the Chair should rule on report stage amendments that seek to delete certain clauses of the bill is a separate issue from the one before us at the present time. The issue that has been raised at this time is a fundamental one, namely, whether it is in order to move amendments that seek to set aside a decision which is the main thrust of the bill.

I recognize that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in particular have argued that what we have before us is not an abolition bill but a bill to amend the Criminal Code. I should like to remind them and Your Honour of the title of the bill, which reads, "an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences".

I submit to Your Honour that Bill C-84 is not just a bill containing routine amendments to the Criminal Code. That argument might have been made about Bill C-83, but it certainly does not apply to Bill C-84. Bill C-84 is directed specifically to the question of what the punishment should be for murder and certain other serious offences.

At the present time, the Criminal Code provides that the punishment in some of those instances is death. Bill C-84 changes all that and provides that the punishment for these offences cannot be death but can be, at the most, life imprisonment. I submit that is a very precise proposition and that the vote of the House on second reading for the principle of this bill was a vote in favour of abolishing death as the punishment for crimes set out in the Criminal Code. It was a vote in favour of other degrees of punishment. I submit, therefore, that an amendment that seeks to bring back what the House voted against on second reading should be declared out of order.

I was interested in the fact that my hon. friend from Calgary North read a bit from page 494 of Erskine May's eighteenth edition. I wish he had gone on to read one or two more paragraphs. In the middle of the page I find this paragraph:

(1) A committee—

I realize that this is the British practice in committee, but I think it can be applied to the report stage.

—is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

I do not see how we can get away from the fact that the principle on which we voted on second reading was on the question whether to retain capital punishment for murder and certain other offences, or whether to change to life imprisonment or certain terms of imprisonment. That decision having been made, it seems to me that amendments which seek to reverse that decision are not in order. I am not suggesting that it is not open to the House to change its position by defeating the bill at the report stage or at third reading. It can go back on that decision. But the principle having been approved on second reading, I submit that all the arguments on page 494 of May's eighteenth edition are against amendments that seek to bring back the death penalty.

I would also point out, just to read a Canadian work, that at page 170 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition is a very well-known citation, citation 202(12), which reads:

An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

Surely, an amendment that seeks to negative directly a decision made by the House on second reading is a direct negative or an expanded negative and therefore should be ruled out of order.

In his remarks, the hon. member for Calgary North referred to amendments that were allowed by the Speaker of the day to one of the previous bills; I think he was referring to the legislation of 1967. In any case, he pointed out that amendments to extend the death penalty to some other crimes not already in the bill were allowed. I would point out, with great respect, sir, that the bill of 1967—indeed, all the bills we have had in this sphere up until now—was a bill that only partially abolished capital punishment. The death penalty still existed, and I think the Speaker's rulings on those occasions were that since the death penalty still existed it was in order for members to move an amendment applying it to some other crimes than those set out in the bill. This is a vastly different bill which we now have. Those previous bills were bills that did include the death penalty and, indeed, were also bills covering only temporary five-year periods. We now have a bill which is for total abolition of the death penalty on a permanent basis and approved by the House on second reading.

Some hon. members have tried to say, and I think the hon. member for Calgary North used these words—I hope I am not twisting them at all—that this is not a total abolitionist bill but it is a partial retentionist bill. I do not think the member should be allowed to get away with that. It may be that with the National Defence Act being unchanged, our total law is not totally abolitionist. There may be provision for my friend, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) across the way, to conduct a firing squad, or what have you. However, he comes from Winnipeg and would not do that. Even though there might be the provision for a form of capital punishment in another act, namely, the National Defence Act, as far as the Criminal Code is concerned, as far as civil law in this country is concerned, this bill before us is totally abolitionist. There is no provision in this bill, anywhere, for the penalty of death to be applied in respect of any crime set out in the Criminal Code.

Like my friends who have taken part in this debate by referring only to procedural matters, I shall try to stay away from the substance of the bill. It does seem to me that this is a pretty important issue in procedural terms. The principal point is that it is a bill to make a change in punishment for murder in so far as the Criminal Code is concerned. The House has made a decision on that point, and I confess to a little bit of surprise that some of my friends who voted against the bill because it was for total and permanent abolition should now say it is not a total and permanent abolition bill because of certain provisions in the National Defence Act. Perhaps this is a bit of an aside rather than an addition to the argument.

I think I have made the case as I see it, Mr. Speaker. What is before us is not just a set of routine amendments to the Criminal Code. It is clearly defined in the title as a bill to amend the Criminal Code in relation to publishment for murder. The present law says that the punishment for murder in certain cases is death. This bill abolishes death as an instrument of punishment for crimes under the Criminal Code and, the House having made its decision, I do not think it is open to members to move amendments that would either reverse or alter the result of that decision already taken.

It is open to hon. members to argue for their amendments. It is open to members to try to defeat some of the clauses, and it is open to members to try to defeat the bill on third reading. In other words, the second reading vote does not stand for all time. Some of us are very conscious of that, and will be until the issue is over. But an attempt to amend the bill and by that method to bring back the death penalty which was voted against on second reading is something that I submit would be out of order at this stage.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I listened to all the persuasive arguments made this afternoon, but I was most impressed with those made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I will deal with them in a moment, if I may. First of all, I should like to address myself to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I find myself in agreement with many of the things he said.

Those amendments which purport to substitute for that which the government has clearly put forward in this House, that is, that capital punishment shall hereafter and always be abolished, would be clearly out of order. To substitute the death penalty in certain circumstances for that which the government has suggested would clearly be against the principle of the bill. That is the matter to which I would address myself and that is the subject matter of many of these motions. May I indicate the motions that would attempt to amend and substitute death for what the government of Canada, and this House on second reading, have determined should not hereafter exist. They are motions Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 35, 37, 38 and 40.

It is clear to most people on this side and, indeed, on the other side of the House, that those who argued against the bill with great conviction because they were for the retention of capital punishment in this land were arguing against the principle of total abolition of capital punishment as a sanction in respect of murder and other serious crimes as they exist in the Criminal Code. That is the principle against which they argued so vehemently for 17 days of debate in this House, in 119 speeches. Had they not believed that was the principle, I think they would have voted for the bill on second reading, particularly if it was only a bill to determine what ought to be done with persons who had committed the most heinous crime, namely, murder. They did not do that. They addressed themselves, in each and every speech from this side and the other side in respect of abolition and in respect of retention, to the issue of capital punishment.

In my humble submission, the matter which Your Honour ought to address and concern himself with in determining whether these amendments are or are not in order is whether the principle of the bill is total abolition of capital punishment as a sanction for murder and other serious crimes as found in the Criminal Code.

As the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) indicated both in the committee and here, we are addressing ourselves to an issue of parliamentary procedure and how it affects the issue to which we are addressing ourselves—and that is the bill now before this House. It is a bill to amend the Criminal Code, not a bill to amend the National Defence Act or any other act. It is my submission that within the four corners of the bill it is clear, not only in the words of the bill but in the reactions of the people of this country and members on all sides of this House, that the one and only fundamental issue is whether this House and this country will abolish capital punishment at this time.

Therefore, I say to you, sir, that any amendments, and specifically those which I have enumerated, are out of order because they go beyond the principle of the bill. In support of that I should like to refer to some precedents, some quoted by the hon. member for Calgary North and included in the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for June 20, 1973. At that time we had a most distinguished chairman who said, among other things, when he was discussing the rules that the chairman of a committee ought to consider:

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

> The third rule is that they must be within the scope of the bill or they must come specifically within the four corners of the statute that we are dealing with. This is particularly so—and this is perhaps a refinement of that rule—when you are dealing, as we are now, with an amending statute which seeks to amend the Criminal Code because it is clear that amendments to such a bill must not go beyond the amending statute and try to amend the Code, which we are doing, but must strictly deal with amendments to Bill C-2 itself.
> There are restrictions on how far amendments can go; they cannot delete clauses in a bill. That obviously must be done by negativing the clause when it comes to a vote, and if it is negatived, by replacing it with another clause.

● (1710)

Further, that most learned chairman said, as recorded at page 20.5:

> In other words, depending on your view, as it has been said many times in the argument, one of the principles of the bill is that there shall be a partial retention or a partial abolition of capital punishment in Canada. I think it is valid to say that if the view of the government which put forward Bill C-2 was different than that so that it favoured a total abolition of capital punishment, that was the principle which should have been put in the original bill.

Mr. Speaker, may I humbly say that that ruling and the subsequent reasoning from it was sustained in this House by your most distinguished predecessor in the chair who found that indeed the ruling of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs was proper and right in the circumstances. In the Debates of the House of Commons of July 20, 1973, as recorded at page 5841—I am sure Your Honour is well aware of this, so I shall not go into it—Mr. Speaker sustained the ruling by the chairman of the committee on justice and legal affairs.

Subsequently, when Bill C-2 went from this House to the other place, the chairman of the committee on the judiciary of that House, whose name has been referred to here as having been a Speaker of this House in 1969, I believe, when a similar question was before the House, sustained the decision made by the very learned and distinguished chairman of the committee on justice and legal affairs of this House and the Speaker of this House with regard to the decision he made on the amendments proposed in respect of Bill C-2. I am not unduly flattering you, Mr. Speaker, but I am referring to these very recent precedents to indicate that they are far more powerful than anything that may be quoted from other jurisdictions or from this parliament in earlier times.

Without going into detail in respect of what was said at those times, with which I am sure you are most familiar, the fundamental principle and rule is that there is no amendment acceptable in this House, in committee or at the report stage, which would violate the fundamental principle as defined at the time of passage of second reading. All those motions I enumerated violate that fundamental principle, as argued on both sides of this House with great sincerity but nonetheless passed, which is that capital punishment at this time as a sanction for capital murder and other serious crimes as defined in the Criminal Code, not in other statutes or other bills but within the four corners of that statute, shall now be abolished at this time in Canada. In that respect I submit, very respectfully, that all these amendments are out of order.

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am not one of the legal minds in this House, so I have not been up on one of these things before. However, I have some deep concerns about the possible ruling you may make on this decision, because I know we have some members here who might switch their vote and I would hope they would have an opportunity to debate what they think are legitimate motions in respect of this bill.

I have done some research and have dug up some arguments relative to this bill which I think show that members have a right, on a bill of this type, to get their arguments before the House and have a vote. I did not hear the whole of the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), but I believe he brought up the point I raised in the committee yesterday, that in the United Kingdom in 1955-56, amendments were put at the committee and report stage which were very similar to the types of amendment put forward today. The Speaker did not make a ruling at that time because there was no argument. It was, therefore, impossible to come up with anything from that ruling, so I went to the library and, with some assistance from the kind people there, I dug up some decisions, some of which were made by yourself, sir, which I think are relevant to this bill. I should like to quote one by you, Mr. Speaker, on Bill C-58:

> My view is that the bill is a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. Pursuant to the Income Tax Act as it now stands, without passage of Bill C-58, it is possible for taxpayers to advertise in foreign broadcasting undertakings and deduct those expenses from their income. The purport of Bill C-58 would be to change that and take away from those advertisers the opportunity to make those deductions from income. Whether it be that clause 3 contains an actual provision or not, the fact of the matter is the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) would in fact propose what seems to me to be middle ground—

Mr. Speaker, my argument is that on that bill you took the middle ground. I would say, in respect of this bill, that the abolition of capital punishment is one ground on which part of the House is voting, that the retention of capital punishment is the other ground, and yet the amendments which relate to this bill—some of them, certainly—are the middle ground. I know that some people who have voted for abolition may change their vote if they cannot get one or two of those amendments on middle ground. I should like to complete the statement you made in this ruling:

> —that is, advertisers who advertise in foreign broadcasting undertakings would be permitted to deduct from income the expenses paid for those advertisements, provided certain conditions are met. The conditions are complex and will need some explanation, but that bears on substance and their acceptability to the House by way of a vote. It does not bear, in any way that I can see, on procedural regularity.
> It seems to me that the hon. member ought to be able to put that kind of motion by way of amendment to this particular clause. It would be my view that motions ought to be debated and voted upon.

Mr. Speaker, one of my arguments would be, in that situation, that you allowed a vote on middle ground and I would state that some, not all, of the amendments in this area which purport to retain capital punishment for certain offences are in the middle ground of that bill and I would hope you would allow them. There is another quotation here from November 28, 1974, on a bill regarding the B.C. Telephone Company. On that issue it was the Deputy Speaker who made the ruling which I should like to quote:

> The hon. member said to the House he has in his hand a letter from the company stating that it would be happy to have its name made bilingual. Of course, the normal channel to have that change made would be for the company to have a new private bill introduced to amend its name.
> Having said that, although hon. members do not doubt the word of their colleague, neither the Chair nor any member of this House have a copy of that letter, and the rules of this House do not provide for the tabling of such documents. I think everyone will agree to take the word of the hon. member. I must also refer him to different citations from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms respecting amendments, particularly citation 202 on page 169 and citation 203 on page 171 which state explicitly, and I quote:
> 203. (1) It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.
> The hon. member knows that the bill before us is a bill on the financing of the company, which has never been presented to the House to amend the name of the company or some other aspects of its administration.
> If the hon. member keeps on reading citation 203, he will come to paragraph (3), and I quote:

(3) An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

This being said, and considering that hon. members seem to be in a good mood and considering also the limited effect of the amendment the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) is proposing at the report stage, which nonetheless raised an important point as the hon. member said, the Chair would be willing to consider the motion and let the House decide. But that could be done only by unanimous consent.

I do not know whether all members followed my remarks, but the Chair feels that this kind of amendment should not be accepted in our general procedure. Noting that the intent of the bill is not to amend in any way the name of the company, or anything other than the financial structure, and noting the co-operation that seems to exist following the remarks of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), if there is unanimous consent the Chair would be ready to accept the amendment for debate. Is that agreed?

It was agreed. Mr. Speaker, I would say, in that sense, that this House, in general agreement, thought that although there was an amendment that was out of order, it should accept it, and the Deputy Speaker at that time allowed that amendment to be put. He said: "... let the House decide". I suggest that the rejection of some of the amendments that are being put forward will have an effect on the bill, and I would not want to see that happen. I think that a member should be able to vote on it in accordance with his conscience, and I would not want to see members change their minds one way or the other because an amendment which they wanted to see brought before the House and voted upon was rejected. I suggest there are a number of people who will change their votes if they cannot debate some of these issues.

The last precedent appeared in Hansard of November 28, 1974. There were two in one day. This one had to do with Bill C-14, put forward by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). Mr. Deputy Speaker said on that day:

I make this point now in order to clarify that in accepting the present amendment proposed by the hon. member I do not in any way intend to go contrary to the previous position taken by Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker said he had some reservations about the amendment on two grounds. He suggested first that it was contrary to the basic principle of the bill, and that the interpretation clause should not be used to enlarge on the scope of the bill in the way attempted by this amendment. He added that this was not the basic nature of a definition section, and that this would go far beyond the scope of an interpretation clause, usually being a simple definition clause as opposed to a substantive clause.

On the other hand, having listened to the remarks and the points made by hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), Mr. Speaker indicated his desire to take into account those representations, and indicated that he did not want to deprive any member of the opportunity of discussing the important point in this proposed amendment, which was defective mainly because it was attached to the interpretation clause.

I feel it would be very difficult for me to question the amendment put before the House at this time by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton with the knowledge that Mr. Speaker, in his conclusion, said that if the House would give consent to the tabling of an amendment at eight o'clock he felt that might take the House out of the then rather awkward procedural position. Although I do not wish really to invite a debate on the procedural acceptability of the amendment, some hon. members might wish to suggest there is a substantive factor in it. However, on account of everything that was said by Mr. Speaker, I feel I should give consent to the hon. member to present his motion. Therefore I would be willing at this time to put the amendment unless there are strong objections.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

I use these three precedents from this session of parliament because they relate to the same type of bill, and I hope they will have some effect on your decision, Mr. Speaker, so that we can get down to debating the clauses of the bill and doing what the majority of members of the House want, that is, to debate some of the issues, vote on them and finalize this issue of capital punishment once and for all. If we do not get an opportunity to debate some of these issues, we will see this bill back before the House in five or six years' time, but if we can debate the issues and clear the air now, we might solve the matter once and for all.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the debate since the beginning and I want to say that I do not belong to the group of lawyers who took part in the discussion this afternoon and I am quite glad of it. I think we are witnessing a legal contest among lawyers and it always happens when such bills are considered to decide what is the principle of the bill. I think the first mistake is found in all bills and that is they are not clear enough. Instead of "An Act to amend the Criminal Code" if it had been merely referred to as "Bill against the death penalty" it would be clear, everyone would understand and such a debate would not have been held this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

I recall that a few years ago a member of our party had asked that the texts of the bills be made clearer so anyone would understand. But then a lawyer had risen to say: "Mr. Speaker, if this is going to happen, what will lawyers do, how will they earn their living?"

I think we have another proof today of a protracted legal debate between lawyers. First of all, the principle of the bill is discussed; then, the amendments moved must not go beyond this principle. Well, I also have something to say about these amendments. We move amendments and the Chair rules them as contrary to the principle of the bill. Can you imagine that! Capital punishment is to be abolished and we are forbidden to talk about it! It is prohibited because abolition is sought, because a minister, the Solicitor General, wants to completely abolish the capital penalty.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said a few moments ago that he does not want to allow any longer this kind of slaughter. I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre what he thinks about the slaughter of all the innocent victims of these hired assassins? What does he think of those slaughters? But I want to remark that you allowed him to say that. Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot leave those words unanswered. I am talking against the decision made today that if we do not object 75 per cent of our amendments will be ruled out simply because we are not of the same opinion as the government. I say this is ridiculous and that once more we are witnessing party dictatorship and a minority trying to impose its will upon us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to point out to the hon. member that we are simply discussing the question of order and procedure with respect to the amendments, namely whether the amendments are against the principle of the bill.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I want to show that they are not against the principle of the bill, that it is the principle of the bill that is false.

I do not know if they will understand, but I would be very glad if hon. members were to quit calling me to order. It is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to call me to order and not up to hon. members. I want to say quite simply that these amendments are not contrary to the principle of the bill, as we understand it. Quite simply, the principle of the bill has to be changed, and then it will be possible to discuss on another level. As long as the principle of the bill remains what it is, we suggest that our amendments are in order.

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know that we have already debated this question of procedure in great detail this afternoon, and it is always interesting to take part in a discussion on a question of procedure because, of course, it is almost impossible to become inflamed when we simply deal with the Standing Orders of the House. It goes without saying that the decision you will make in due course, a decision on procedure and on the receivability of arguments, is one which will be yours and which the House will have to obey.

I think that during the debates this afternoon, we heard from various quarters, particularly on the part of the spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), arguments which admitted things which went so far that it was not even necessary to quote authorities or to talk about principles because, in all his arguments, the hon. member clearly admitted that if his amendments were against the principle adopted on the second reading, then his amendments should be rejected outright. He clearly admitted the principle, which is indeed well supported by authorities, yourself, your predecessors in this Parliament, as well as by the Parliament in London.

He also endeavoured to prove that the principle of the bill is not the abolition of the death penalty. And one of his colleagues, during the debate, referred to the fact that under the National Defence Act, the death penalty is maintained in specific circumstances. In short, what he forgot, Mr. Speaker, is that the House is now studying a bill that deals with a specific act of Parliament, a very specific statute, namely the Criminal Code. The fact is that this bill is intended to remove, everywhere in the Criminal Code, any and all mention of the death penalty and substitute other penalties for it.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, what we are now discussing in this House is the abolition of the death penalty in the Criminal Code and I do not think we have to concern ourselves with all the other acts passed by the Parliament of Canada at some time or other.

Mr. Speaker, as I have no intention of referring to specific authorities, my hon. colleague the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Poulin) having already done so, I merely wish to add that I consider that argument as basic.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I feel we must look into the arguments dealing with procedure, taking into account the consequences and effects, and that, with what I would call common sense. In short, if procedural arguments and legalistic considerations lead to an absurd situation, I feel we should come back to basic principles and interpret them, if possible, in such a way as to take common sense into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, to get their argument through, they have to say that this bill has really nothing to do with the principle of abolition or retention of the death penalty.

When I look back at what happened in Parliament during the 119 speeches which have been made, when I think of what happened since the introduction on first reading of Bill C-83 and Bill C-84, I realize, Mr. Speaker, when appealing to the common sense, that if some members opposite did not view the debate as one dealing with the death penalty and common sense, I wonder then what they understand and what they did talk about in their speeches.

Members on both sides of the House always considered that it was indeed a debate on the death penalty, on abolition or retention of the death penalty. All hon. members of the House were even called retentionists or abolitionists. Certainly information media viewed the debate in that perspective and so did the public itself.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to accept the interpretation of our opponents, we must then conclude that no one in this country understood the debate which has been taking place in the House for two months. Therefore I would be deeply concerned about the parliamentary institutions of our country.

This debate is directed to the public. Our constituents talked a great deal about it. What we are told today is that there is only a handful of lawyers in the House, particularly on the other side of the House, who seemed to have understood the debate as one whose goal was really to make a distinction between high treason and treason.

Their impression was that the debate did not have anything to do with capital punishment, that it was really incidental, not within the scope or principle of second reading. The actual purpose here would be to define first and second degree murders. Of course it is pure fantasy and it does not stand common sense scrutiny.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I think our conclusion must be totally opposite. Some have read the English version of the title of the bill but we could refer also to the French which reads "Loi modifiant le Code criminel (meurtre et certaines autres infractions graves)"—not a literal translation but both versions are official. Then, when we look at the bill, we see that there was a decision on principle, a position taken by those who introduced the bill which deals with abolition of capital punishment and according to what has been said, it is piece of legislation which considers abolition of the death penalty and proposes alternatives in the case of murder.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I support of course the argument put forward by my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Poulin). I do not intend to draw again to your attention the authorities of which you are already perfectly aware. Besides, I contend that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who was the official spokesman for his party, said there was no dispute, no disagreement whatsoever as regards principles, but that the only matter of dissatisfaction was that in the 119 speeches that were delivered, here, hon. members have not really dealt with the abolition of capital punishment, but rather with a variety of other issues; in other words, the Canadian public as a whole were deceived about the nature of this debate, and himself and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) as well as, perhaps, the members for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) are the only ones who really understood this debate.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is their interpretation, in light of the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General and others in this House, that their arguments should be rejected and most of the amendments which attempted to reintroduce the death penalty in the Criminal Code should be ruled out.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by a comment on amendments which attempt to remove a subclause of Bill C-84, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that usually one cannot do indirectly what cannot be done directly. Should you rule that amendments which reintroduce the word death in the Criminal Code cannot been retained, then the amendments which attempt to remove a whole subclause and which would result in reintroducing the death penalty in the Criminal Code should be rejected as well under the principle, Mr. Speaker, that one should not do indirectly what cannot be done directly.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The last point raised by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fox) is an interesting one. I am sure we are going to meet it later because there are a number of motions for deletion, but those motions really come under a special classification at the report stage, specifically under the terms of Standing Order 75(5), and are provided for at report stage as motions to delete. Therefore despite their effect, the analogous arguments that may follow from their effect, and although they appear to enjoy the same special status of protection which therefore makes it difficult to argue analogy, the point is by no means missed.

I notice that two other hon. members want to contribute to the discussion which has been rather full. However, if there is a necessity to add to the arguments that have already been made, which I think are rather complete, I do not want to shut any member out of the discussion. It is a very important one and, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) said, it can affect the opportunity of members to express themselves on specific points and bring the House to a vote. It is therefore a procedural question which has rather substantive overtones to it. I shall hear further argument, but I hope that hon. members who now participate will add to what has been said rather than repeat it.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long. Basically I shall deal with the last point that you brought to the attention of the House and that was dealt with by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fox).

[Mr. Fox.]

When we look at the total number of motions presented we see that to all but eight of the clauses—and there are 30 clauses—there are substantive motions for deletion. When we look at the clauses that are left out of the motions for deletion we see that they are basically procedural clauses.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I have a mistaken impression of the remarks of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais), but we are now dealing only with those amendments other than motions to delete. After coming to a disposition of that series of motions it will leave a number of others that are clearly in order, plus a number of motions to delete. I think we ought to deal with the argument on all motions to delete at the same time after we have disposed of the argument before us now. That is only a narrow argument on whether or not amendments which propose to return the death penalty to the Criminal Code are out of order because of their contravention of the principle of the bill.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the only aspect of the motion to delete that I want to draw to your attention at this time is the argument that I think could be made more fully later on. I support the members of the government who have spoken relative to the principle of the bill.

The total effect is an attempt to defeat the principle of the bill. In totality the motions presented, particularly motions relating to the principle, attempt to re-establish the death penalty. In other words their total effect is the attempted defeat of the bill. I am referring to motions containing substantive provisions which would change the principle and re-establish the death penalty, to motions dealing with deletion, and to other motions still to be debated. The point is that the total effect of all those motions is completely to obviate any necessity for third reading. Therefore they offend against the rules in much the same way as those motions dealt with in committee offended against the principle of the bill. They are disorderly, since the House is called on to deal seriatim with a series of motions the votes on which would duplicate any vote which may be required at third reading.

I shall return to this argument when we deal with the deletion motions. I wanted to give Your Honour notice of my intention to debate that particular point.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak very briefly. I am surprised to realize that so far in this debate no one referred to the provisions of Bill C-84 as a whole in order to answer the very simple question: What principle is Bill C-84 based on? I suggest to you that each of the 30 clauses of this bill has a direct impact on the abolition of capital punishment. I think that it is by examining this very specific question of fact that you can come to a decision and to the application of the principle that you cannot bring an amendment that would change the principle of a bill which passed second reading.

Then, it is a simple matter of fact, and when you study Bill C-84 and consider, for instance, clause 1, that is the short title, no complication there, but clauses 2, 3 and 4 define treason, piracy and murder, that is offences which were punishable by death under the Criminal Code. Those three changes have a direct influence on the abolition of capital punishment. Clause 5 amends section 218, which included a provision describing an offence explicitely punishable by death. Clause 6 amends section 511 which dealt with capital punishment. Clause 7 amends section 534 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 8 amends section 535 of the Criminal Code concerning capital punishment. Clause 9 amends section 538 of the Criminal Code dealing with capital punishment. Clause 10 amends section 562 of the Criminal Code which deals with capital punishment. Clause 11 amends section 589 of the Criminal Code dealing with capital punishment. Clause 12 repeals section 597 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 13 simply amends the sentence in accordance with the new definition of second degree murder, an amendment which results from the abolition of capital punishment. Clause 14 repeals section 604 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 15 deals with the sentence for first degree murder, resulting from the abolition of capital punishment. Finally, clause 16 amends section 607 of the Criminal Code dealing with capital punishment. Clause 17 amends section 609 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 18 amends section 618 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 19 repeals section 619 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 20 amends section 662.1 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 21 amends sections 669 to 681 all dealing with capital punishment. Clause 22 amends section 682 dealing with capital punishment. Clause 23 repeals section 684 dealing with capital punishment. Finally, clauses 25 to 28 inclusive are transition; the principle of Bill C-84 does not lie there. Clause 29 deals with consequential amendments. The principle of the bill does not lie there. And the last one, clause 30, deals with the commencement of the act. The principle of the bill does not lie there either.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, my contention is that there is nothing like reading a bill to discover its principle. It is erratic from the start to rely on its title, as some hon. members did, or to take some clauses out of the bill, to read them out of context to interpret them subjectively and to claim before the House that the principle of Bill C-84 is to redefine treason under two categories, high treason or plain treason, or to redefine piracy or first and second degree murder. I have just ascertained, simply on reading Bill C-84, that each and all of the clauses of Bill C-84 have a direct impact on the abolition of the death penalty and I think there is nothing more obvious than facts which speak for themselves and make it possible to come to a reliable decision, namely to invalidate amendments to alter the principle of a bill which appears plainly following the reading of each clause in Bill C-84.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention a word of fundamental importance. We are told in the notice of motion presented to hon. members by the Clerks of this assembly pursuant to Standing Order 75(5) that we are to consider the report stage of Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences. I bring to Your Honour's attention the word punishment. Certainly, unless the House of Commons is not prepared to mete out certain forms of punishment, we should recognize that the key word in the title is punishment, I think this was brought to Your Honour's attention earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) who said we are seeking the middle of the road approach.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I say, while we await the messenger from the other place, that arguments put forward on this point have been most interesting and helpful. In every case the arguments were well put up and touch on the important decision which must be made with respect to further debate on amendments at this stage.

I shall reserve on this matter. I may be able to bring down a decision after the eight o'clock vote and will try to do so if I can.

I see the messenger from the other place is here. I repeat that I will take arguments presented under consideration during the supper hour and endeavour to bring down a decision after eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Bon appetit!

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The question now is the determination pursuant to Standing Order 75 of the procedural acceptability of motions introduced at the report stage of Bill C-84.

This afternoon I indicated some difficulty with the long accepted axiom of the House which was referred to so frequently and clearly in arguments put forward this afternoon. I will point out for the sake of clarity that it is stated on page 509 of May's Eighteenth Edition that:

> An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on second reading, is not admissible.

We have before us a number of amendments at the report stage of Bill C-84 and the Chair indicated this afternoon some difficulty with those amendments which would reintroduce into the Criminal Code some form of the death penalty. Because of the proposition that had been put forward in the committee and discussed quite generally that the principle of the bill was to abolish the death penalty, any amendment which would propose to reinstate the death penalty would contravene the axiom to which I just referred.

Many hon. members participated in the discussion this afternoon which lasted until almost six o'clock. There were interesting contributions from members on both sides of the question, although not so much on both sides of the House. Many argued that the principle of the bill was different from that which had been suggested by others, the principle being the abolition of the death penalty. The discussions were interesting and the contributions were well prepared and well thought out, but in the final analysis the question reduces itself to whether, when the House pronounced itself upon second reading of the bill, it pronounced itself on a question of principle and, if so, what that principle was.

With the greatest respect for all the arguments to the contrary, I have tried to conclude that the principle of the bill is other than the abolition of capital punishment for crime under the Criminal Code. However, I cannot come to that conclusion.

It seems to me, in respect of all the speeches and comments that have been made, that many members have addressed themselves, in the agony they feel in making this decision, to the fact that for the first time a bill has been put before the House which is different from those which have been put before the House in the past which have retained capital punishment for certain offences, and have been for a temporary period. The distinctive feature of this bill, which has caused so much concern and so much agony of decision, is that it proposes the total abolition of capital punishment for crimes described in the Criminal Code.

If the rule that amendments after second reading cannot contravene the principle adopted by the House on second reading has any meaning at all—and I know that in the past all the precedents, which strongly and clearly set out that axiom give absolutely no assistance in attempting to define what is the principle of a bill—maybe it is wise and intelligent, and certainly I accept the admonition, and will in no way attempt to generalize on that proposition. In other words, I have to decide whether this bill has a central principle and, if so, what it is.

Having regard to all the debates and comments, and all the circumstances of this bill at second reading, I can come to no other conclusion than that this bill has a central principle, it being the abolition of the death penalty for crimes described in the Criminal Code. Therefore I must conclude that any amendments at this stage which seek to reintroduce the death penalty under any circumstances contravene the principle and are out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: For the benefit of hon. members I will list the motions ruled out of order. They are Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, and 8. Motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) introduces a rather novel proposition to the capital punishment argument in that it leaves the option to choose the death penalty to the convicted person. That is not, in the true sense of the word, imposition of the death penalty by mistake, but really leaves the option to the accused person to choose the death penalty or imprisonment for life. It has interesting implications, but in procedural terms—which is all with which the Chair is dealing at this point—I have some difficulty in classifying this amendment as proposing the reintroduction of the death penalty which would offend the principle of the bill. I will only say that I will not put this amendment and others related to it in the same category as others which I rule out of order. It may be that further arguments will convince the Chair that that amendment and others related to it put forward by the same hon. member giving the same option are in fact out of order. All I am saying is that, because it gives the option to the convicted person, it separates itself from all those amendments which seek to reintroduce the death penalty imposed by the state. Therefore I separate that motion from others.

Motion No. 5 is out of order. So are motions Nos. 6, and 8. Motion No. 9 is related to motion No. 4 and therefore is reserved for further discussion. Motions Nos. 14 and 15 are out of order.

Motion No. 16 in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) would not, on the face of it, be out of order but seems to be consequential on the passage of an amendment which is out of order. However, on the face of it, it is not out of order and perhaps the hon. member should be left to proceed with it or withdraw it. Motion No. 17 is out of order.

Motion No. 18 is related to motions Nos. 4 and 5 in the name of the hon. member for Oxford in that it also gives the option to the imprisoned person.

Motion No. 19 is out of order.

Motion No. 20 appears to be in order but appears to be consequential. Again, on the face of it, it is not out of order and I will leave it to the hon. member to give the House some indication as to whether or not to proceed with it.

● (2040)

Motion No. 35 would be out of order. Motion No. 37 appears to be consequential again, and therefore it would be left to the hon. member to indicate whether it will proceed or not.

Motion No. 38, put forward by the hon. member for Oxford, relates to the method in which the death penalty will be carried out in the event that the accused person takes advantage of the option. Therefore I should not say that that motion is yet out of order; it will have to be deferred until further consideration.

Motion No. 40 appears to be consequential and it will be left to the hon. member to indicate whether it will proceed or not.

Motion No. 45 deserves some special comment, I think, because this motion in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) provides for certain circumstances under which the House might address itself in a special way to the reintroduction of a resolution which would—it mentions the death penalty but in fact it again is a rather exceptional procedure which I do not include in those amendments which would seek to reintroduce the total bill directly. While it might be subject to further discussion as to its procedural regularity, it is not struck down again by the recent ruling I have made with regard to those amendments which would directly seek to reintroduce capital punishment.

Therefore remaining in those classifications of motions is the very large group which seeks to delete clauses. Some discussion was initiated this afternoon by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), or at least I think it was first mentioned by him, that in fact clauses to delete in those circumstances may be no more than an expanded negative. Reference was also made by many others who participated in the discussion this afternoon. Although almost precisely opposed to the view that I began with this afternoon, it is true that in many cases a motion to delete at this stage is in fact nothing more than a procedure requiring that a vote be made on an individual clause. It is in fact a negative, and the precedents clearly indicate if such a motion were to be put forward in the standing committee to delete a clause, the motion would be struck out on procedural grounds because it would be the reverse proposition of the carriage of the clause.

In standing committee, however, the clauses have to be voted one at a time. At report stage the clauses are not voted one at a time and Standing Order 75, particularly in subsection (5) says that means motions to amend or delete—the language is there. The whole of Standing Order 75 describes the report stage process, and therefore while motions to delete at this stage may in fact be simply a negative of the clause in question, and in fact by defeating or proposing the defeat of the amendment to a clause would have the effect of returning to the original clause in the Criminal Code which has in its provisions the imposition of the death penalty, therefore would accomplish what has already been struck down in the ruling I have just made. Be that as it may, the fact is that Standing Order 75(5) says that motions to delete are in order at this stage, and therefore while they may offend some other precedents they are in line with the Standing Order in that paragraph.

I would have the greatest difficulty in attempting to rule aside motions to delete, particularly in face of the precedent cited by the hon. member for York-Simcoe this afternoon which seems to me to be the extreme of this case, that is, at report stage a one clause bill was met with a motion to delete the one clause.

The motion to delete is envisaged clearly in the Standing Order. It may be that if the rule were abused the procedural committee might want to recommend an amendment to the Standing Orders or the deletion of Standing Order 75(5) so that it could not be used in an abusive way.

My duty is to apply the Standing Orders as they appear. Therefore, notwithstanding a number of inconsistencies with the precedents I have just cited in the ruling I have just made, motions to delete pursuant to Standing Order 75 appear to me to be in order.

I have some considerable sympathy with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond Delta (Mr. Reynolds), which was that it would be a pity to strike out the amendments—which I have just done—because it would deprive hon. members of addressing themselves to the motion on an individual basis. The fact is, whether it was intended to be so or not, that the effect of motions to delete at this stage is to do that very thing. I therefore would be inclined again to sympathize with the right of hon. members to take advantage of Standing Order 75(5) to put down motions to delete to force the House to go to a vote at report stage. Again I say if it is the wish of the House that the procedure be changed—then change it. The duty of the Chair is to enforce it as it exists, subject to argument which I will now invite. That is my initial indication.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with you on that interpretation of Standing Order 75 (5) if the word "delete" were not accompanied by the words "amend" and "insert or restore". Mr. Speaker, there is no question but that any motion to amend at report stage that would seek to amend by introducing a principle which is foreign to the bill, would not be held by Your Honour to be in order. Your Honour has just ruled a number of amendments to be out of order because it was your finding that those amendments sought to reintroduce in the bill something which was repugnant to the principle of the bill at second reading.

If that is the case with reference to amendments, surely that should be the case with reference to deletion as well. When we are speaking of deletion, if the effect of that deletion is to bring back into the bill something which is repugnant to the bill at second reading, surely that deletion ought not to be allowed in the same way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: If there were an attempt to restore an amendment that had been defeated in committee or that had been overruled in committee on the basis that it was unacceptable as being repugnant to the principle of the bill, surely that restoration or attempted restoration could be ruled upon on the basis of its acceptability.

My argument therefore is that Your Honour ought not to be bound simply by the wording of subsection (5) of Standing Order 75. Your Honour ought not to be prevented from making a ruling on the acceptability simply because of the use of the word "delete". "Delete" itself has no absolute magic. It must be construed as a procedural word in the same way as "amend" and in the same way as "restore".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Therefore in itself it cannot have this concept of orderliness. To my mind that is self-evident. I know Your Honour is not served by a number of precedents in this matter, but I suggest that the report stage provisions in the Standing Orders are extremely difficult. That is my first argument. I point out that if my argument is accepted, clauses 2, 3, 4, 10, 12, 18, 19, 20, 21 and 23 all dealing with the principle of the death penalty in the original statute which the present bill seeks to repeal seek to make amendments in principle by way of deletion and therefore ought not to be allowed on the ground that they are out of order.

My second point may be unnecessary, since I am persuaded of the validity of my first point. I argue, Mr. Speaker, that wide discretion is given Your Honour under Standing Order 75 relating to the report stage. There is wide discretion with respect to the moving of motions, vote to be held, and so on. That discretion ought also to be exercised in cases of evident abuse of our procedures. It has been recognized in all parliamentary proceedings that, basically, every bill is read the first, second, and third time. In this House there is provision for reference to a committee; that provision has been included in the Standing Orders since 1969. Mr. Speaker, the report stage was not intended to duplicate the committee stage. It was introduced to prevent abuse.

Mr. Horner: You were not here when that rule was made.

Mr. Blais: I was not born when the hon. gentleman was galloping over fences, either. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the report stage was introduced to permit this House to deal with specific amendments with which members of the committee ought to have dealt, but did not. It was not instituted in order to bring a fourth reading stage into the parliamentary process.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Blais: There are before the House motions to delete every clause of substance; they go to the principle of the bill. If Your Honour finds that that is an acceptable procedure, you will invite members of this House every time a bill is brought forward at the report stage to move motions for deleting each and every clause of a bill. In effect that procedure would reinstate the committee of the whole in this House even though the bill has already been dealt with in standing committee. That would mean that we have passed a redundant measure. Surely it cannot be said that so poor is our judgment that we have increased the redundant processes of this House, because that, I suggest, would be the effect of accepting these amendments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that it is not my decision whether Standing Order 75(5) can be taken advantage of in a certain way. The Standing Orders of the House are there. It would be equally applicable to suggest that Standing Order 43, providing for the introduction of certain matters into our proceedings upon unanimous consent, was originally included in the Standing Orders so that the government might intervene in regular proceedings, with unanimous consent, if there were an emergency and, therefore, that that rule ought now to be reserved for that purpose and not used by opposition members; yet that Standing Order is used almost exclusively by opposition members. It is not for me to interpret what the intention was, only what the letter of the law is at the present moment. Therefore if a certain advantage lies with members in proposing amendments pursuant to Standing Order 75(5) I say again, if that is to be changed, it will have to be changed by the procedure committee and not by the Chair. Does the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) wish to intervene on a procedural point?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in commenting on proposed amendments you said you would reserve judgment on the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) and hear argument on the point. I respect the good will of the hon. member for Oxford in putting forward these amendments but feel that I should make the following comments—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to interrupt the Solicitor General but wonder if we might not deal with the amendments of the hon. member for Oxford, in order, when they arise.

My only concern at the moment is whether the Chair ought to entertain that series of motions which seek to delete clauses, and no other question—should the Chair decide whether they should be ruled out of order at this time—I would leave any other amendments or any procedural argument on them to the moment when those individual motions are called.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from participating in the earlier procedural arguments because they were arguments which were placed before me last night and on which I ruled as chairman of the committee. But since this argument is raised for the first time in this House, and since the situation in the House is different from that pertaining to the committee, I think it might be appropriate for me to make some brief comments.

One could dispute the interpretation that Standing Order 75(5) makes a deletion in order. But I am prepared to accept that position this evening for the purposes of argument, to underline an argument which my hon. friend has already made. No matter whether deletions themselves are in order or out of order, and that is not the question on which Your Honour must rule this evening, surely any deletion which would contravene the principle of the bill falls under the ruling which Your Honour has just given. That ruling relating to the principle of the bill surely must govern all clauses of the bill, whether the proceedings be by way of deletion or otherwise. I therefore suggest that the previous ruling covers the situation with which we are dealing and that there is no necessity to rule at all on the question of deletions.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis Fox (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): To sum up, my intervention closely follows the one just made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). Standing Order 75(5) reads as follows:

(5) If, not later than twenty-four hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete . . .

First, I consider the wording:

. . . of any motion to amend, . . .

On the words motion "to amend" you just ruled that not all motions "to amend" are in order but only those motions "to amend" which do not go against the principle that what has been accepted by Parliament on second reading cannot be contradicted at this stage.

Well, if that principle applies to the words "to amend" it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it must apply all the more to the word immediately following, namely the word "delete". It is obvious that certain motions "to amend" can be rejected as you just did for motions aimed at bringing back the death penalty into the bill.

It then seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the same rule of interpretation must be followed for the word "delete" which comes immediately after the words "to amend", and then only motions "to delete" which do not go against the principle of bill itself are in order. If the principle of interpretation that you applied to the words "to amend" applies to the words "to amend" it must all the more apply to the words "to delete" because if the other interpretation were accepted that would mean that all motions "to amend" a bill would be in order in the same way as all motions "to delete" a clause.

But, once again, if you say that certain motions to amend are not in order because they go against the principle accepted on second reading, the same ruling must apply to the words "to delete" which immediately after the words "to amend" and only the motions "to delete" clauses of the bill, that is motions which do not go against the principle adopted on second reading, must be accepted.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, I listed the clauses of the bill one by one to show that each clause had a direct relation with the abolition of the death penalty and with the principle of the bill.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, you could use this same argument this evening for not having made a ruling allowing to do indirectly what you have forbidden to do directly. By your ruling, Mr. Speaker, you have ruled out amending the bill in such a way that the principle would be affected. Whether the principle is affected by amendment or simply by the deletion of a clause, the result is the same. The proof of this, Mr. Speaker, is that the amendments, the provisions, the clauses that would be deleted from the bill are clauses 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 24. I do not want to repeat everything I said this afternoon, but what I say holds for every one of the clauses that would be deleted. If you accept the deletion of clause 8, for instance, you allow section 535 of the Criminal Code, which deals with the death penalty, to remain. This creates an absurd situation.

I therefore agree completely with the two previous speakers to interpret Standing Order 75 (5) in the following way. If it has been decided that during the report stage of the bill, the bill cannot be amended in such a way as to change its principle, I do not see why the deletion of a clause from the same bill should be allowed if the results are the same.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, what is important here, the principle that we want to protect is the following: It is essential not to change the principle of the bill. You have just made a ruling on this matter. We must determine by what means it cannot be changed, and I believe that it cannot be changed either by amendment, or indirectly by the delection of clauses of the bill which would keep in the Criminal Code sections which would still provide for the death penalty in certain cases.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, as I am convinced that you do not want to allow to be done indirectly what you have just ordered not to be done directly, and that you do not want to create an absurd situation, I believe that the logical and reasonable way to interpret Standing Order 75 (5) is the following: To proceed so as to insure that this rule is applied without changing the principle of the bill by amending or deleting clauses.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have made reference to the precedent cited this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Simcoe in which a one clause bill was met with a motion to delete. I listened carefully to the arguments by the Parliament Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) and the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) who, incidentally, made a very effective and direct presentation in contribution to the debate on the point this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I would be prepared to accede to those arguments against motions to delete were it not for the fact that Standing Order 75(5) appears to give them a sanctity that does not extend to other motions.

It may be that that provision was inserted originally because the changes in the procedures adopted along with that provision had the effect of taking the committee of the whole stage of the bill out of the House and sending it to a standing committee. Therefore the House never really pronounced itself on clause by clause votes. That provision may very well have been inserted in the Standing Orders because of the power to introduce amendments at the committee stage. That power required a counterbalancing power of the House, really for the government I suppose, to introduce motions which would delete amendments which had been added to the bill in the committee stage. That is idle speculation at this point.

What I have to determine is whether Standing Order 75(5) and the precedents, particularly the precedent cited this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, extend to hon. members who seek the opportunity to put motions to delete at the report stage.

If I were to rule out motions to delete at this stage on arguments that have been presented, namely, that they have the effect of contravening the principle of the bill, I would face a situation here where, for example, one member has put down only one motion to delete. Other members have put down several motions to delete. If I were to take those collectively and say that their effect is to change the principle of the bill, one member who put down a motion to delete would lose that right. It seems to be going far too extensively beyond the Standing Orders to suggest that, because the effect may be in sum or in their collectivity to change the principle of the bill, every member who wants to put down a motion to delete at this stage ought to be deprived of that right. I cannot accept that.

I must say again that there is an area here of some uncertainty as to what the rights are at this stage. In my opinion that uncertainty ought to be cleared up by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. In the meantime the benefit of the doubt will be given to the member who wishes to put down a motion at the report stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It would be my proposal to find procedurally acceptable all of those motions pursuant to Standing Order 75(5) which now seek to delete clauses. I think we ought to move on to the consideration of the report stage of the bill.

One area remains. That is the precise compilation of those motions which were ruled out of order as the result of my initial ruling this evening. Motion No. 39 would clearly be ruled out of order on that basis. What I might do while the House is in discussion on the first of the motions to delete that has been accepted is perhaps examine those for a moment to see where that takes us. I might ask that a precise compilation of all those amendments which have been ruled out of order be made so that I can give it to the House before we proceed with the debate. Motion No. 1 has already been set aside. Motion No. 2 is out of order. Motion No. 3 is out of order. That brings us to Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). That again opens up a procedural argument to which the Solicitor General has indicated he wants to address himself. First, I will hear the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) on a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to withdraw two amendments standing in my name which for purposes of brevity I will refer to as motion No. 16 and motion No. 20. They are both dependent, I believe, on other motions that Your Honour has ruled out of order.

Will you please note, Sir, that I am not withdrawing Motion No. 40, which you indicated perhaps I would, because if the deletion clauses in relation to the treason and piracy sections remain, there is certainly room for an amendment in respect of the commutation of the life sentence.

I would similarly point out that Your Honour ruled out of order my motion No. 35, relating to the method of carrying out the death penalty. There again, if both the piracy and treason sections remain as a result of the deletion motions before you, I respectfully suggest that motion ought to stay in at least until that point in time.

Mr. Speaker: The last point of order raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is well taken. To put it more clearly, while the motion of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) remains in question, and I have not made any determination procedurally, motion No. 35, which would seek to redefine the method by which people would be put to death, ought to remain. I am sure the House will accede to the suggestion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham that motions Nos. 16 and 20 now be withdrawn. Motions Nos. 35 and 40 will remain for further discussion, as the case may be.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if Your Honour could indicate at what point you may be exercising your right under Standing Order 75(10) which gives you the authority to combine certain motions, some for purposes of debate, some for purposes of voting. It seems that in view of Your Honour's ruling, which I have to think was procedurally correct, that the motions to delete are in order, maybe some consideration might be given to the possibility that in a number of cases they are related and might be combined for purposes of debate and for purposes of voting. I just wonder whether Your Honour is yet ready to do that or whether you may be in a position to do that tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am faced with a procedural argument in respect to the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Oxford. I propose to deal with that and see where that leaves us. After that, possibly we could get into some discussion with regard to the grouping of those motions which remain.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the motions proposed by the hon. member for Oxford. I respect the spirit in which he has put them forward. These are motions 4, 9, and 38. In Motion No. 4 he says a person shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life or, if the convicted person so chooses, shall be sentenced to death. Then in Motion No. 38 he says:

> The sentence to be pronounced against a person who is sentenced to death shall not be that he shall be hanged by the neck until dead but shall be in conformity with any humane method of execution as the Governor in Council may establish by regulation.

In accordance with this amendment responsibility for the execution still rests with the state. The state would have to carry out the execution of the convicted person should he wish to be executed. In other words, the hon. member is not suggesting that the convicted person be allowed to commit suicide—I shall not comment on that aspect—but he is suggesting the state should execute that person should he wish to be executed.

I submit that such an amendment contradicts the principle of the bill, which is the abolition of the death penalty by the state. Were it adopted, the state would still have to maintain the whole apparatus for public execution whether the method were by injection or the administering of a pill, or by any other means. The state would have to maintain an executioner and draw up rules and regulations to cover public executions. I submit that this amendment, which places a burden on the state to carry out an execution, should a convicted person demand that he be executed, is in contradiction to the principle of the bill which is that we abolish the death penalty in Canada for all crimes.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I first thank you for recognizing that these three amendments and the consequential amendment involve a different approach to this question and that they deserve consideration. Your Honour has ruled that the primary principle of this bill is the abolition of capital punishment, but inherent in that philosophy is the idea that the state imposes the decision. The Solicitor General takes offence because the state is called upon to carry out a decision made by the convicted person. In my view, as an abolitionist, the heinous part of putting a person to death is not the actual carrying out of the death sentence but making the decision that he should be put to death. I would hate to do that. It is probable that only a very few cases which will come before the courts—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is naturally tempted to speak in support of his own motion. My concern is whether or not the motion is procedurally acceptable. If there are others who wish to address themselves to the procedural point I will hear them. Otherwise I will conclude that the basic principle the Chair ought to follow is that the right of members to put motions before the House ought to be interpreted in favour of those who want to put such motions forward.

I have already ruled a number of amendments to be out of order because there is a clear precedent that motions which offend the principle of a bill after the House has pronounced itself on that principle on second reading are out of order. I have said that the principle of the bill is the abolition of capital punishment. Do the motions put forward by the hon. member for Oxford impose capital punishment when the House has decided in principle against it? I would have to say, no.

There may be many arguments on the merits, but that is another question. I have to decide whether the motions offend the principle of the bill, and because they vest in the convicted person the option to ask the state that he or she be put to death it seems to me that the principle that the state does not impose capital punishment of its own will is not offended, and therefore I have to conclude that the amendments in the name of the hon. member for Oxford are procedurally regular.

These are motions Nos. 4, 9 and 38, I believe—I want to be sure that those are the only three motions to which he has addressed himself. I believe that motion No. 38 is consequential.

An hon. Member: Motion No. 18.

Mr. Speaker: So there are four in all. It is certain we have now brought ourselves to the threshold of motion No. 4, which obviously must be grouped with motions Nos. 9, 18 and 38. All those motions should be grouped and voted on together. If the House is prepared to turn to the discussion of motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38, they could be considered. That would give the Chair the opportunity to give some thought to the grouping of the remaining amendments.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, I appreciate Your Honour's ruling but on looking over motion No. 4 and the subsequent motions proposed by the hon. member for Oxford I have difficulty in understanding how that motion does not contravene the principle of the bill since in the last line it contains the words "shall be sentenced to death". Even if a person chooses—

Mr. Speaker: Those may be arguments upon the merits. The fact is that the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Oxford contains the words "if the person so chooses" and this appears to avoid a course contrary to the principle of the bill. It seems to me that the principle of the bill is not offended when the thrust of the amendment is that the person himself should have the option. I have so ruled, and the discussion on that matter is concluded.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When Your Honour grouped motions 4, 9, 18 and 38 did you group them both for debate and voting purposes?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. All are founded on the same basic principle and they should therefore be grouped together for discussion and dealt with in one vote. The hon. member for Oxford.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I again commend you on your decision. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that for a long time I have been an abolitionist and that I still am. I do not want to be misunderstood. In the second place I want to acknowledge the fact that parliament has a responsibility to protect the citizens of this country. Because of this, I feel this motion must be introduced this evening. The third—

● (2120)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should take this opportunity, while the hon. member is referring to the introduction of his motion to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the motions of the hon. member have not been really been put. Perhaps I should put them at this time and then let the hon. member complete his speech.

The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) moves:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 37 to 45 at page 2 and lines 1 to 17 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life or, if the convicted person so chooses, shall be sentenced to death.".

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 23 to 24 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"able offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life, or if the convicted person so chooses, shall be sentenced to death.".

Motion No. 18.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 34 to 38 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"guilty of an indictable offence and shall,

(a) for a first offence, be sentenced to imprisonment for life, and

(b) for a second offence, be sentenced to imprisonment for life or, if the convicted person so chooses, be sentenced to death.".

Motion No. 38.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in Clause 21 by adding, immediately after line 43 at page 8 the following new subsection:

"(2) The sentence to be pronounced against a person who is sentenced to death shall not be that he be hanged by the neck until dead but shall be in conformity with any humane method of execution as the Governor in Council may establish by regulation."

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, you have now put us on the right legal track so that the rest of the discussion will be in order. I was referring to the fact that my theory behind these four amendments is based on the recognition of several basic premises. The first is that I am an abolitionist; I favour the abolition of capital punishment. Secondly, parliament has a responsibility to protect Canadian citizens, and I feel that this bill fails to do this in certain respects.

The third point I want to make is that it is claimed by many people that absolute life imprisonment, that is, imprisonment for the remaining days of one's life, is indeed worse than death. I am not here to judge whether or not that is so, but I am prepared to accept that that might be true. If it is true I feel that most citizens in this country, and certainly I, would like to see the most humane punishment possible instituted, and some provision should be made for a person to choose a death sentence if that is his wish.

There is a fourth point which also involves a basic premise that I feel needs to be considered by members of the House. The laws of this country should reflect the same degree of compassion and consideration for the families of the victims of murders as for the criminals themselves. There is a feeling in this country today that we in parliament appear to have more concern for the welfare of criminals than for the welfare of their victims or their victims' families. On that basis I feel the amendments serve the purpose of recognizing these four tenets or premises.

I should say at the outset that as Canadians we have always felt that to be humane was one of our cardinal rules for life in society in Canada. Neither do we want to submit prisoners to any unnecessary cruelties. We in Canada also want to protect the public against any unneccessary hazard or risk that could fall their way.

I submit that Bill C-84 fails in several respects to meet these basic needs of the Canadian people. I sense this from talking to many constituents in my riding. During the last few weeks many have spoken to me and are very disappointed at the stand I took on capital punishment. I have stood very firm, explaining to them that I have a strong and intense inner feeling that it is wrong for the state to order the taking of a person's life. Many of my constituents respect my view even though they do not agree with it. But those same constituents are very quick to point out that we in parliament do not seem to be giving enough attention to the protection of society; hence one reason for these amendments. If I can elaborate on this point, Mr. Speaker, amendments Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38 do exactly that.

What I am trying to do by way of these four amendments is to put some teeth into Bill C-84 in order to protect society against a few criminals. I would be the first to admit that everybody in society can make a mistake once, and I would be the first to give that recognition even to a person who commits first or second degree murder. I feel that such a person may be able to mend his ways with appropriate help, and that this is a sound approach to take.

On the other hand I have an entirely different feeling toward those people who have been given a second chance yet commit the same or a similar offence a second time, whether it be first degree or second degree murder. I have then very little sympathy for them. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I feel that such people have proven not only to themselves but to the citizens of this country, and to us as parliamentarians, that they are unable to learn a lesson. I think that society deserves to be protected against the sort of person in society who cannot learn a lesson. There is no provision in Bill C-84 as presently worded to correct this situation. I submit that by providing that such people spend the rest of their days in prison, this is the best way to protect society against a repeat performance on the part of someone who has already shown he will not learn a lesson. That is one of the main reasons that I feel motion No. 18 is essential.

In addition to that, I abhor the idea of the state taking the decision to invoke capital punishment. I feel that such action is inhumane. It is not the actual carrying out of the death penalty because there are other ways that are not inhumane at all. But the decision on the part of the state to take somebody's life is, in my view, unacceptable.

On the other hand I have practised medicine long enough to see plenty of cases of people who cannot tolerate any prolongation of their lives, and one cannot help but have sympathy for them when they are successful in taking their own lives in one way or another. We as physicians, all have inbred and inculcated into us the desire always to save lives, and that is what we do. There is an inner feeling that I certainly have as a physician, that when a person has tried several times, yet because of the failure or the inability of medical science to help them, the kindest thing is to have sympathy for that person when he is eventually successful. It is because of this that I feel some of these criminals are virtually in that state of mind and personally want to commit suicide. They are deranged people or they probably would not be attempting suicide. Out of kindness, compassion and humaneness we should at least provide them with the option if they wish no longer to continue living that kind of life in prison for the rest of their days.

Many people have said it is worse to be in prison for the rest of one's life than it is to be dead. I am not in a position to argue that one way or the other. I do not know the answer, but I am prepared to accept the fact that for some people it may well be true.

I should like to see this bill make provision that if an individual wishes to be relieved of his suffering in this world he can indeed be relieved of that suffering in a humane way. Of course that is the purpose of my final motion, No. 38, which is consequential on the other three. I have suggested that these three amendments are quite similar. I want to go on in a bit of detail about the fact that we have to consider a repeat murderer in order to protect society against further repetition.

Let me refer briefly to the other two amendments which deal with acts of piracy and high treason. Perhaps others would like to add to that list such things as kidnapping with force and so on. I was interested last night in the committee hearing on this bill. When I put this same proposal to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) he made one point that I thought was very significant. It was a point I had not been aware of, and not being in possession of the minutes of that meeting I will essentially have to paraphrase what the minister said, and I certainly will accept correction if what I suggest is wrong.

The minister took as an example those people who commit the act of piracy and intimated that studies had shown that these people seem to have some derangement of mind making them unamenable to the point that they cannot accept any type of deterrent. I would be the first to agree with the Solicitor General that this is probably true. There are those few people who are deranged mentally in a way that we do not really understand fully in a medical-scientific way. They have the emotional drive to commit some act of piracy, or some similar act which is abhorrent to society. There is no effective type of deterrent, even capital punishment, which will dissuade them from their goal.

This being the case, I suggest the Solicitor General has played along nicely with my argument. There is only one treatment for that kind of criminal, particularly if you hold the stance of an abolitionist, and that is that the person must be removed from society for the balance of his days. If there is no possible deterrent, then in no way should that man or woman ever be allowed out in society again, particularly if we cannot change the personality of that individual to preclude the possibility of the individual commiting the same act again.

I submit that the only thing we can do is amend this bill to provide that those very few individuals, who admittedly are deranged, and who admittedly we cannot help at this present stage of our knowledge, be put in some type of institution for the balance of their days, purely for the protection of society. This is one of the issues my constituents are very upset about, and I think many of them are more upset about it than about the fact that according to my principles I am an abolitionist.

If we are going to show the kind of humanity and compassion I think all Canadians want to show, we have to give that poor criminal, that man who cannot be helped, the alternative of being allowed out of his suffering, whether we look upon his suffering as being free in society with the temptation to commit these acts of piracy or high treason and so on, or the suffering he will have to endure for the balance of his days in prison. Whichever it is, in a sense of compassion and humanity we ought to make the provision that such an individual may decide, not the state, that the kindest thing for him is to be out of circulation as a living being on this earth. We as a parliament here should make that provision for those few people.

I made reference to the fact that this applies to those who are convicted of piracy. I would want to include in that, as one of my three amendments does, those who are convicted of high treason. I realize that high treason has never been the subject matter of a charge laid here in Canada for dear knows how many years. However, the mere fact that the government has seen fit to include this in Bill C-84 suggests that it should also be included in the amendment to make it fairly complete. I intimated a few minutes ago that undoubtedly hon. members could cite other examples which might well be added to the list. I would welcome those suggestions from other speakers.

Let me reply to the comments made by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I appreciate the fact that he finds some difficulty in accepting the amendments as they are written. I confess that these were not written by myself. Not being a lawyer it was my feeling I could not do this well, and I had some help at the last minute this morning. As a matter of fact these were turned in to Mr. Speaker about four minutes to 12. I was not completely satisfied with them. I anticipated exactly the question the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre raised with Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member suggested that it looked almost as though the wording suggested we will sentence these poor criminals to death. Of course that is not the intent. The effect is that the individual would be allowed to make the choice, and this would negate the argument of the hon.

member for Regina-Lake Centre. Nonetheless, I would certainly welcome any amendment or changes to the wording of these three basic amendments which would clarify that point.

I am the last one to want any suggestion in my amendments that the state will in any way impose capital punishment on these poor criminals. I want to make it very clear that my intent is that we must leave it up to the criminal, and if he so chooses the state will oblige him. That is my intent. I hope the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre appreciates that. I have made the suggestion in all sincerity, and I am sure his questioning of the wording of my amendment was done in all sincerity. I do not want to leave the impression that the state will in any way whatsoever invoke capital punishment.

It remains for me to comment on my last amendment, No. 38, which in fact is really a reassertion of my feelings, and I think the feelings of almost all the members of this House and of many Canadians who are in favour of capital punishment. If we need capital punishment there are more humane ways of carrying this out than by hanging. I am sure all hon. members realize there are painless ways which involve no suffering whatsoever. Perhaps the most effective would be the intravenous injection of a prescribed drug. Some have mentioned gas, and so on. I am willing to accept any suggestion in this regard. As my amendment suggests, this would be left to the discretion of the governor in council by regulation. I am prepared to leave this to the wisdom of the government.

Before I close I want to allude briefly to something which is not in this bill, but something on which I would dearly love to comment. I dare say it cannot be included for some technical reason. In fact it is the point I made reference to at the beginning of my comments. We must have something in the laws of this land that will allow for better provision or compensation for the families of those who are the victims of murder. We raised this point again last night in the committee. The Solicitor General did not have figures at hand at the time but took upon himself—and I thank him for it—to provide us later in the day with the best figures he had available on short notice in respect of this particular matter.

The information is that there is in fact a cost-sharing agreement between the federal government and the provinces of Canada whereby a certain sum of money is provided as compensation for the families of victims. I think it is desirable that we have this type of compensation. However, may I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House that if a citizen of Canada is working as a miner or as a logger and is somehow killed in the course of his work, society looks after his family much more effectively than it does now the family of a person who is unfortunate enough to be the victim of a murder. It seems to me that under the workmen's compensation provisions and so on, society adequately looks after the families of persons involved in that type of death, but for some strange reason which I cannot quite comprehend we seem to accept little if any responsibility for the families of victims of murder. This is incomprehensible to me.

I submit that it would be very difficult for me to vote for this particular bill if I do not see some real attempt on the part of the government to show that it does in fact care about the families of these victims. There is no such indication. I should like to quote the figures which the Solicitor General supplied. In the year 1974-75 I believe there were approximately 1,000 instances in which compensation was paid out in respect of some type of crime. The amount of the compensation paid by both levels of government amounted to approximately $2,300,000 in respect of approximately 1,000 cases. That represents about $2,300 per case. The Solicitor General was unable to provide us with more specific figures. Although I am subject to correction, I suspect that in fact we do not compensate the families of the victims of murder adequately. These figures seem to suggest that.

Surely the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) should be in a position, if he hopes to get some of the abolitionists in this House to support his bill, to give us some assurance that in actual fact the government does care about the families of the victims of murder. It would seem to me that the government has shown little concern for these families.

I shall summarize by saying that I am an abolitionist. I voted for this bill on second reading because as a new member of this House I was under the impression that second reading meant approval of the bill in principle. I am the first to agree that I do approve of this bill in principle. I approve of the abolition of capital punishment. I also approve, however, of the complete protection of society against repeaters of murder, people who would be intent on piracy and people who would be intent, if it should happen, on high treason. I submit that the government by way of Bill C-84 has made no effort to assure the people of Canada that it is concerned about this and does not want people to go on committing murder after murder after murder. I acknowledge that this does not happen often. I know there have been only two or three cases in a period of several years.

I refuse to accept the fact that a person who is unable to learn from having committed a heinous crime should be allowed, because of the very generous terms of the law, to be paroled after 15 years. If such a person is unwilling or unable to learn after committing a second crime, then there is a problem in respect of protecting society. I believe the government must give some assurance that it does care about the people in Canada who deserve protection against the worst offenders, those who go on committing murder after murder. As I say, I admit that there are only a few such cases. All of our constituents are upset about such cases. They keep bringing these cases to our attention and suggest that we are not concerned about protecting the average citizen of Canada when we let such people out again.

Although it might seem inappropriate, I should like to commend the government on the principle of the bill. However, I have grave doubt about the way I will vote on third reading because now we are in a different ball game. It is not a vote on principle. I am concerned about the provisions in this bill. I must reconsider my first vote because I do not believe the government is concerned about these two crucial matters; first, the protection of society against repeaters of murder and, second, the question concerning when the government will tell the Canadian people that it does care about the families of those who have suffered because of unwarranted murder in this land.

I would close by saying I hope we can hear from either or both the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice. I notice both ministers are here tonight. I hope we can hear from one or both of them that they do care about Canadians, that they do care about these two issues, and are willing to close the loopholes which presently exist. I think this bill is a disgrace to this parliament if it should pass as it is. Thank you.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would accept a question?

Mr. Halliday: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Beatty: I appreciate having the opportunity to ask a question of the hon. member. I share many of the concerns he has expressed. I appreciate that this is a very difficult decision for him to make. One of the bases on which the hon. member defended his proposal tonight in respect of in essence giving convicted murderers an option to commit suicide or receive a death sentence was that this would act as a deterrent against a second offence. Could the hon. member tell the House how in his mind he feels this would provide an additional deterrent because a person who is convicted for the first time of a murder and sentenced to life imprisonment, and in fact preferred to be killed, could only get that option by committing a second offence?

The other question is in respect of the euthanasia aspect of what he proposes. I think it is correct to paraphrase what he meant by referring to it as mercy killing. Would the hon. member indicate whether he would also propose in the case of the chronically ill and people in great pain that this be extended to them as well?

Mr. Halliday: I appreciate these questions from the hon. member. I think perhaps he has misunderstood me a little, or perhaps I have misunderstood his question. Obviously my amendment in no way would preclude, or is unlikely to preclude, a person committing a second murder. Being an abolitionist I am prepared to go along with the government in respect of first degree murder or second degree murder, but what happens then if someone at some stage, whether on parole or after release, commits another murder? To me there is no protection for society. What we must do then is see that they are in jail for the remainder of their lives.

The hon. member asked about euthanasia. According to my understanding this is not euthanasia. What I am proposing could be referred to as legalized suicide, but it is not euthanasia. Euthanasia is where society decides that another person should be put to death, for whatever reason. In other words the primary move is by society. It may be by a physician, but the physician represents society.

In this instance this is not euthanasia, it is more like legalized suicide when the state countenances suicide. But normally the state does not countenance any kind of suicide. As I explained in my earlier remarks, there are indeed a few instances of people trying suicide on repeated occasions, and it becomes obvious to thoose involved in their care that the kindest thing for those people would be if they could only be successful. So my answer in short is that I am not talking about any kind of euthanasia but rather about legalized suicide.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say a few brief words about these motions. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) proposes that for high treason, piracy, and for second murders there should be either a life sentence or an opportunity to be executed, which would be the choice of the person convicted of these three offences. In his amendment No. 38 he sets out the way in which the death sentence would be carried out.

He said he did not draft the amendments himself, and perhaps that is the reason for some of the loopholes in them. He says he put forward these amendments for humane reasons, because he feels that for certain offences a person should have the choice of either being put to death or being imprisoned for life. But what I think has been overlooked is that in the present bill a person, for the crime of treason, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life and would be eligible for parole in 25 years, and perhaps in 15 years if a jury agreed that his parole eligibility date should be shortened. So he would be sentenced to imprisonment for life subject to the minimum parole eligibility date.

With respect to piracy, when we discussed this in the committee last night the hon. member referred to the hijacking of aircraft. I made some comments with respect to people who are suicidal and had martyr complexes. A study was made with respect to aircraft hijackers in recent years—people who hijacked aircraft to Cuba, Algeria, and so on. The mistake he made was that his amendment was with respect to section 75 in the Criminal Code which deals with the piracy of ships. That section is a very old section in the Criminal Code and the death penalty still applied to piracy of ships. The sections relating to hijacking of aircraft provide a maximum life sentence, not a minimum life sentence. So in fact what he is doing is to say that for piracy we should have, instead of the death penalty, imprisonment for life, which, by the way, would be subject to parole in ten years, but the hon. member says that person should have the choice of being executed, if he wishes.

The third type of offence is a second murder. That is a difficult case. There are other amendments here also dealing with second murders. All I can say is that this is a very rare occurrence. In Canadian history we had only five examples of this. One of the five examples was of the second murder having being committed in the United States after the individual escaped from a Canadian prison.

The second one of these examples is of an inmate who killed another inmate who was his accomplice in the murder that brought them both to prison. In other words, these two individuals committed a murder and, when they were sentenced to prison for life, one of the individuals killed his accomplice.

The other three cases are of individuals who committed second murders, and in one of these cases an individual was hanged in the early forties. So it is a rare occurrence. I am an abolitionist and I believe that the answer in case of second murders is a better security system in our prisons and a better parole system.

With respect to the principle in the hon. member's proposal, I do not question his sincerity but I feel that the very fact he says "execute these people" makes it a type of suicide. If you read his amendment No.38, it is the state that must do the execution once the convicted person decides he wishes to be executed rather than serve his sentence. This means that the state must provide all the apparatus for the execution—have an executioner available, and so on, and deliberately execute the individual even though he has agreed to it. It seems to me to be a cold blooded ritual and I would prefer that we do not accept that type of procedure.

The hon. member has made some other points with which I agree. He says that we should show concern for the victim. I have stated repeatedly that my first concern is for victims, or to ensure lack of victims. My first goal as Solicitor General is to do everything possible to prevent crime and to reduce the number of victims.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Of course our programs for crime prevention and crime reduction are not in Bill C-84; they are found in many other bills. For example, Bill C-83 is directed to crime prevention. Bill C-71, passed by the House in January, was directed to crime prevention. When we submitted our estimates to the House for this department we provided an increase in the estimates for the RCMP, which is law enforcement and crime prevention. We were dealing with the protection of the public. There are many programs geared to crime prevention and public protection, but they are not in Bill C-84.

With respect to the compensation of victims of crime, we have a program now covering this. That program is under the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). Under the program he cost shares with the provinces in their provincial programs in that area. I believe that he has agreements with all provinces in Canada. Terms of those programs differ from province to province.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but it is close to ten o'clock.

I said earlier that I would give to the House a precise compilation of amendments considered up to now. Three motions have been withdrawn: Motions Nos. 1, 16 and 20. The following motions have been ruled out of order: Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 14, 15, 17, 19 and 39. Therefore remaining for consideration are the four that have been grouped for debate standing in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), namely, motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38. In addition to those are motions Nos. 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 21 to 37 inclusive, and 40 to 46 inclusive.

In respect of the grouping of these motions perhaps House leaders might agree that the Chair should attempt to put forward suggested groupings of amendments tomorrow morning, which would only form the basis of discussion. The Chair would try to get these suggestions into writing and into the hands of House leaders and into caucus before noon tomorrow. By three o'clock tomorrow when the order is called there could be comment on these groupings, and then we would resume discussion on the four motions before the House at the present time.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST THAT ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS BE DECLARED WATER QUALITY CONTROLLED ZONES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to raise this issue on the adjournment debate because of a question I put to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand) earlier today concerning the mercury poisoning in the English and Wabigoon river systems in northwestern Ontario. I was not satisfied with the answer I received. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) was also involved in some of the questions I asked earlier today and I thought his attitude typified the attitude of the federal government when he disputed the finding of the mercury poisoning specialist, Dr. Newberry, that the first case of the dreaded Minamata disease had been diagnosed in northwestern Ontario.

The attitude of the federal government in this whole matter of mercury poisoning has been one of extreme caution. Ministers will not take effective initiatives until in their own minds absolute proof is there that we have mercury poisoning among the inhabitants of these Indian reserves.

I submit the proof is staring the government in the face. The symptoms of Minamata disease and of mercury poisoning—that is to say, numbness of the limbs and lips, slurred speech, tunnel vision, difficulty in walking and co-ordination, and in extreme cases fits and ultimately death, are there and have been documented.

I fail to see how the federal government can persist in denying there is a problem with Minamata disease in light of the expert testimony of visiting Japanese doctors who are familiar with the problem, and of this most recent diagnosis by Dr. Newberry.

The attitude of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of the Environment astounds me. It is as if they want a victim from Grassy Narrows—as if they want someone to die first so that they can have an autopsy and conclude with absolute certainty that the person died of Minamata disease. This is little consolation to the victim, Mr. Speaker.

We are facing disaster in the English and Wabigoon river system yet the government persistently refuses to take effective action. It has done so little, which in my opinion is more despicable in the face of the evidence gathered over the world, especially from Japan and Sweden, on the symptoms and lessons of the causes of mercury poisoning. No effective action has been taken. That is why I asked the Minister of the Environment to acknowledge federal responsibility in this matter and to exert some kind of leadership.

The provincial government of Ontario has a history of ineptitude and procrastination in dealing with mercury poisoning. In 1975 the province of Manitoba tried to sue the polluter of the river system but the supreme court ruled that because it was an interprovincial waterway, Manitoba had no jurisdiction. Therefore I suggest that it is clear that this mercury pollution comes under federal jurisdiction. We are dealing with an interprovincial waterway, and no longer can the federal government say that it is a provincial matter and pass the buck in this fashion. We have heard that only the federal government can take effective action and provide leadership.

What has the federal government, especially the federal Ministry of the Environment, done? May I quote from the submission prepared by the National Indian Brotherhood for the research directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare? I quote:

> On November 24, 1971, Minister of the Federal Environment set chlor-alkali mercury effluent standards. On March 26, 1970, the Ontario Ministry of the Environment issued a control order under section 50 of the OWRC Act re: Dryden Chemicals Ltd., stating that no mercury-contaminated brine is to be discharged to the environment under any circumstances . . .
> According to EPS of Environment Canada, no independent cross-check of effluent data (collected and analysed by the company and sent to the Ontario and then to the federal government) has been done.
> Therefore, on April 13, 1975, NIB sampled the effluent of Dryden and McMaster University analysed this sample twice giving values of 15.0 and 17.5 ppb mercury. NIB calculations based on company data for flow rates yielded a daily discharge of 7.46 pounds of mercury which is in great excess of the federal regulations of .005 pounds of mercury per ton of Cl^{o} per day.

We have seen in the past that the federal standards have not been lived up to by the company, yet the federal government has taken no effective action. I submit the Minister of the Environment has authority under the water management legislation to declare the English-Wabigoon river system a water control management area. Section 9 of the act says that in the case of any waters other than federal waters the water quality management of which becomes a matter of urgent national concern, the minister may set up water quality zones. If the incidence of mercury poisoning is not a matter of urgent national concern, I do not know what is.

The act is wide in scope, allowing the minister to set up water control areas, to design, construct and operate water treatment facilities, to collect charges from the company for the maintenance of waste treatment facilities, to monitor on an ongoing basis waste discharged into the river system, and to do such other things as are necessary to achieve effective water quality management in those waters.

The minister says that he is discussing in a broad sense this problem with the provinces. I ask if he will undertake, after discussion, to take action under the terms of the Canada water management legislation to resolve this crisis which ought not to be allowed to continue.

Adjournment Debate

I note that the government moved speedily to clean up environmental pollution at Port Hope resulting from radioactive waste.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member whose allotted time has expired.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the particular chlor-alkali plant which was the major contributor to mercury contamination of the English-Wabagoon river system converted from mercury cells to membrane cells, terminating the use of mercury completely in October, 1975. Thus there will be no further mercury added to the system from that source.

In March, 1972, Environment Canada issued the chlor-alkali mercury effluent regulations under the Fisheries Act, limiting the quantity of mercury that could be discharged to receiving waters from these plants. Since then all the chlor-alkali plants have reported daily figures of their mercury discharges to liquid effluents as well as their purchases of mercury for any use. These records indicate that direct discharges of mercury to receiving waters, including the Dryden plant, have been reduced to a level of only about 1 per cent of that discharged prior to the discovery of the problem.

The whole process has now been changed in the Dryden plant. Unfortunately the vast amounts of mercury discharged to the environment in the past are now contained in bottom sediments from which they will continue to find their way into the food chain.

We have an estimate of approximately $350 million to dredge and dispose of the contaminated river sediments; however, physical removal of contaminated river and lake sediments may cause more release of mercury due to disturbance than would occur from the undisturbed sediments. On the basis of analyses over several years it now appears that the problem is decreasing year by year. However, estimates of time for complete self-recovery of the English-Wabagoon river system can be placed at 20 to 30 years.

We are actively continuing a policy of collaboration with provincial governments. As suggested by the hon. member, the Canada Water Act is one of the available strategies. However, that act is not normally used to deal with this type of problem and is not considered appropriate in this case.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—EXTENSION OF COVERAGE TO ISOLATED AREAS—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question I directed to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), who is responsible for the CBC, concerns the inefficiency and not upholding a promise to extend television coverage to remote areas of Canada.

I have been raising this matter for eight years. All I have received are tales of woe and excuses. If a CBC producer would look into my files, he would find the greatest story that could be told. It would not cost a cent for this story that could run for 13 weeks on television. It concerns the extension of television coverage to citizens in remote areas of Newfoundland. These people are Canadian citizens. They listened to promises when they came into Canada. They heard about the good things Canada offers all its citizens.

After reading the speech by the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), I was prompted to direct this question to the Secretary of State. It is hypocritical the way she agrees with everything I say. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will also agree because she lives in a rural area.

The minister indicated in her speech that the CBC signals can be made available to communities in the North Atlantic and that, as funds become available, and provided the people want it, there is no reason why any of these small remote communities should lack CBC radio and television. However, all I get from those concerned in the CBC are tales of woe.

In the 1974-75 annual report one of the excuses they give is a shortage in Canada of engineers and technicians specializing in broadcast transmission. If that is the case, why could a small satellite not be put up which would extend television coverage to northern Newfoundland? People in five small communities there have been waiting for years to get this public service which they deserve. They are denied this because of a lack of efficiency on the part of the CBC. I realize the problems they have, financial and otherwise. I can tell the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Baker) that the fishermen in northern Newfoundland know how to bring television coverage to that area, but no one will listen to them.

I repeat that I have been raising this matter for eight years. In have tried to be reasonable. I can only come to the conclusion that, as usual, we in Newfoundland are low on the priority scale. I hope the parliamentary secretary will have an answer.

I have one other grievance. I warned the minister about ten days ago that I would be asking him this question. However, the only answer I received the other day was that he would get a detailed reply for me. I hope the parliamentary secretary will have that answer and be able to give me a date, not in 1978, but within the next few months. I hope the CBC engineers will get off their fannies and realize that those in northern Newfoundland are also Canadians and are entitled to television coverage.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, priorities in the implementation of the accelerated coverage plan are based on criteria which take into account population, isolation, geographic equalization across the country, engineering considerations, cost and operating factors.

As will be appreciated, the 600 engineering projects in the plan must be carried out on a tight logistical schedule, with the above priorities set on a national basis, using a formula considered to be as equitable as the CBC can make it. The CBC understands the wish of individual communities to receive service as quickly as possible, but the sheer size of the total project, and its attendant requirements for staff and the manufacture of the necessary equipment, must dictate the speed at which the plan can proceed.

As of June 16, 1976, the CBC had applied to the CRTC for 156 radio and television projects across this country. Of these, 103 have been approved and 40 are now on air.

With respect to the hon. member's constituency I would refer him, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the letters dated June 18 and March 29 which he presumably received from the Corporation and which indicated that the CBC expected to submit applications to the CRTC in late 1976 for those projects in his riding. It will be noted that this is a slight improvement over the time of application of early 1977 as was first indicated in a letter to the hon. member on November 20, 1975.

I should also like to say that I will bring the capabilities of the fishermen in the hon. member's constituency to the attention of the CBC. I am sure they will be interested.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—ALLEGED FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH PROVISIONS OF ACT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I regret two things. First, I regret I should find it necessary to be here tonight. This is the third time this session on which I have had occasion to speak of matters relating to inland fisheries and the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. I regret, too, that this is the third occasion on which the Minister of State for Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) has not been present in the House to articulate his stand with reference to the matters I raised during the question period. I am making no reflection on the parliamentary secretary but he is no substitute for the minister, who ought to be a fully-fledged minister to begin with. But in whatever state we find the minister of fisheries, he ought to be here. I hope the parliamentary secretary will take my words tonight and underline them and convey them to his minister tomorrow, because the next time I do battle in this Chamber I expect to do battle with the minister, not with his lieutenant, good as that lieutenant may be.

My question to the minister was this:

> Mr. Speaker, my question . . . has to do with the matter I have brought to his attention on several occasions in this House. It has to do with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, Part III, section 23(2). Could the minister now tell the House whether he has consulted the Solicitor General and whether the Solicitor General will proceed with charges because of the obvious violation of the law with reference to that section of the act?

This was the minister's non-answer:

> Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the file to see what point this matter has reached.

After months and months of evasion he is finally going to look into the file. He did that. He did not offer a satisfactory explanation though, because again I had to raise the question. On June 14, as reported in Hansard at page 14452, in answer to a similar question, the minister stated:

> Mr. Speaker, I have consulted the legal advisors of the Fisheries and Marine Service, and their answer leads me to believe that the hon. member is either misinformed or is trying to distort the function of the corporation.

In all my dealings in this House I have never attributed to the minister anything but the most honourable intention, yet here the Minister of State for Fisheries is accusing me of intending to distort the functions of the corporation.

I wish to state in this House that I have neither publicly nor in this Chamber ever intended to distort what are the functions of the corporation. I wish to point out to the parliamentary secretary, in the absence of the minister, that the original concept of the agreement that was signed on June 4, 1969, was that the purpose of the corporation was to establish a single desk marketing agency for the purpose of selling freshwater fish. That is all I have ever said was its function. Is that the distortion of the purposes of the corporation to which the minister refers?

I have on numerous occasions asked the minister to initiate a cost-price analysis by species per pound of the cost of processing by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. The parliamentary secretary has assured me privately that this will happen. There were to be great plans. He was going to call a special meeting of the fisheries committee of this House and direct the officials of the corporation to attend to answer any and all questions put to them by myself or the representatives of the Lake Winnipeg Fishermen's Association or any other association that wanted to be represented.

I got home that night elated, Mr. Speaker. I phoned the fishermen in Manitoba, and they said it was great news. It was great news because, let me emphasize, that the money of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is fishermen's money, not tax money. The corporation runs and functions as a co-operative. Any capital investment and interest on original capital investment are fishermen's money, not tax money, not government money. Surely the fishermen have a right to know what it costs to process fish. Is that the distortion to which the minister refers? I want the parliamentary secretary to stand in his place tonight and to tell me whether or not that promise of a special committee will be carried out, when, and what will be the terms of reference. I have not heard one peep from the minister yet in this regard.

Lastly, section 23(2) in Part III of the act passed by this House of Commons in 1969 clearly provides—and there is no difference of opinion among the legal advisers—that the price offered by the corporation to the fishermen must be decided on by the fishermen, in agreement with them. It is not to be decided dictatorially by the corporation; there has to be agreement with the fishermen as to price.

I ask this question of the minister: will he direct the corporation to follow the law? Is this what the minister means by saying I am distorting the purposes of the corporation or I am distorting the law? The law is clear. Will the minister or will he not direct the corporation to adhere to the laws of the land as passed by the House of Commons?

In conclusion, if I have inadvertently or otherwise attempted to distort either the function of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation or any of its activities, either collectively on the part of the corporation, or individually on the part of any officer thereof, I stand corrected and I apologize to all concerned, and I stand to learn. But if after close analysis it is found that I have not distorted the function, then I demand from the minister, or from his parliamentary secretary since the minister is not here tonight, that he answer the queries of the fishermen—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the minister finds the hon. member's questions by their nature difficult to understand. The hon. member seems to suggest that he should instruct the corporation on the prices that should be established for fish and that these prices should not necessarily take into account the eventual sale price that may be available in the market place. The minister is sure that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act did not contemplate that the FFMC should purchase fish at a price unrelated to the eventual price it can obtain in the market. To do as the hon. member proposes would surely be irresponsible management on the part of the corporation, its board of directors, and the advisory committee to that board.

The minister is advised that the FFMC prices are established by management as they relate to the market but are approved initially by the board who have four fishermen members out of ten, and they consult the advisory committee which has 13 fishermen on their committee out of 15 members. Everything possible is being done to ensure that the maximum return, consistent with the prices that can be obtained in the market place, is provided to fishermen.

I must repeat that these are guaranteed initial prices to fishermen before they commence fishing, unlike the system prior to the corporation when fishermen did not have any idea of the price they could expect for their fish. I might add that if returns are obtained in the market place higher than those originally set, the fisherman is also a direct beneficiary when final payments are made.

The minister has not consulted with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) but he has consulted the legal advisers of the Fisheries and Marine Service and is convinced after reviewing this matter that the corporation is indeed operating within the spirit and conditions of the act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

DOMINION DAY

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF CELEBRATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. While all Canadians understand the necessity of economic restraint, there should not be government restraint on patriotism. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has withdrawn funds from Festival Canada, and in view of the fact that the traditional fireworks display on the Hill and the national televised concert have also been cancelled, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

That the Secretary of State take immediate steps to restore celebrations on Parliament Hill that are consistent with and representative of the national pride and patriotism jealously guarded by all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED PROTEST OF EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES FISHING ZONES INTO CANADIAN TERRITORY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On June 20, 1976 the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation radio program, called "Maritime Magazine" reported that for purposes of effecting their 200-mile fishing zone the United States of America are claiming ownership of Seal Island, some 18 miles off the western coast of Nova Scotia. In view of the fact that the United States territorial claim comprises an area between New England and Nova Scotia, and includes important fishery grounds such as Georges Bank, and in view of the fact that the south shore fisheries of Nova Scotia could be severely affected, I move, seconded by the hon. member from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Canadian government make it clear to the United States government that they are treading on Canada's sovereign jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSAL TO BAN ADVERTISEMENTS THAT FISH FROM ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS ARE SAFE TO EAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek unanimous consent of the House to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I make reference to the disturbing fact that mercury poisoning is crippling many people who are eating fish from the English and Wabigoon River systems and that in one instance Minamata disease is highly suspected.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member from Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House request the Minister of Justice, in collaboration with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to seek whatever methods are necessary to bring about a cessation of advertising by some tourist operators that the fish are safe to eat until a thorough and comprehensive study has been completed so as to ascertain whether or not safety can be assured to those eating fish from water systems with high mercury pollution.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN DAIRY POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and is pursuant to the contents of a motion under Standing Order 43 which I had the pleasure of putting to the House last Wednesday, June 23. In view of the minister's remarks and the very orderly demonstration that is presently taking place on the hill, I want to ask when he intends to make an announcement regarding the changes in the 1976-77 dairy policy. There is an urgent and pressing need for the minister to take immediate action. Can he give the House, and particularly the dairy farmers of this country, some indication when such an announcement might be made—tomorrow, a month from tomorrow or not at all?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we met last Friday with the minister of agriculture for Quebec, the minister of agriculture for Ontario and the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission to discuss the proposals they had made to us. Today we have received further proposals from the National Farmers' Union and they have to be considered as well. These will be considered and I would hope that if we are going to make an announcement it would be made next week some time.

Mr. Wise: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister give consideration to the removal of at least a percentage of the $8.60 penalty and the return of at least a portion of the resultant holdback to producers in extremely difficult financial circumstances? I suggest this particular return could be based on the same relevant proportion by which production actually declined.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that last year we asked for curtailment of production several times through the Canadian Dairy Commission and the market supply and management committee and did not receive it. They made the decision that they should take the drastic action to curtail production and production seems to be coming into line at the present time. We have not got the figures from all the provinces. Before we make any change we have to notify and discuss this with every province concerned with the dairy issue. This takes time. We cannot make it just because of the two major provinces wanting us to make changes. If this had taken place last year when we asked for curtailment of production, we would be in the position where we would not have had to take the drastic action that we took this year.

I want to make it clear that even if we do lift the monthly quotas and change the $8.60 levy, that does not mean that there will not be some unfairness or inequities still existing because of the way that the provincial boards allocate their quotas. I am sure that the hon. member is aware of that.

POSSIBILITY OF SHORTAGES IF NO CHANGE MADE IN DAIRY POLICY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the minister. Does the minister not realize that if immediate changes are not made we run a high risk of being short of product by as early as September?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I read—I was going to say what the "wise member of parliament" has said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What did the dumb minister say?

Mr. Whelan: Our reports show that even with the dry conditions in Europe they will probably just meet their targets for production. The last four months show that in Europe they have increased their surplus of skim milk powder by 200,000 tons. We met with the Australian minister of agriculture last week and discussed the same problem that they have. I say it would be wrong to intimate to the people that there could be a shortage of dairy products. We certainly know that there will not be any shortage of dairy products in this nation. One of our people from the dairy commission has just returned last week from Europe where he made a personal survey and contacted people there, and he gives us the report that there is not going to be the scarcity of dairy products that some people think there will be. If we could forecast as accurately as the hon. member suggests, then we probably would not have to be as harsh with the quotas as we are, but we cannot take the risk of just piling it up and hoping that somebody will buy it.

[Translation]

REQUEST TO DELAY IMPLEMENTATION OF DAIRY POLICY TO ALLOW ADJUSTMENTS BY PRODUCERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture.

According to the statement he just made that if all industrial milk producers had reduced their production last year we would not have the difficulties we are now facing, the minister is fully aware that, in the present situation, many farmers will go bankrupt if the government does not approve a new dairy policy. Under such circumstances, and in view of the recommendations made to him, is the minister prepared to delay the implementation of this dairy policy for a while to give industrial milk producers time to adapt to the new guidelines?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this representation was made to us by the minister of agriculture for Quebec and the minister of agriculture for the province of Ontario, but I repeat that our doing that alone will not alleviate the horrible situation that exists as a result of the way they allocate quotas within the provinces. It will not eliminate some of the problems of individual producers. I am sure that the hon. member is aware that there are producers who have not established quotas who have been producing milk for two years on the advice of the provincial milk marketing board, which told them: "Don't worry about a quota, you will be granted one". They have allowed them to get in debt by doing these things and now they want me to bail them out. If the hon. member is suggesting that I am totally responsible for this, then I hope he is suggesting as well that I have total authority. This I do not have now because we are letting them run their own business.

INQUIRY IF GOVERNMENT PLANNING TO REDUCE PRODUCTION BY FORCING PRODUCERS INTO BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

As the minister is fully aware that the government's objective is to lower production and that it means that a number of producers will go bankrupt, would the minister tell the House whether this is really how the government intends to meet its goal?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has misconstrued the facts. I wish he would study how the Canadian Dairy Commission operates. It is the producers organizations themselves that make these decisions as to how quotas are to be distributed and they have not done all that good a job. That is why the farmers are complaining about inequities. We have dairy farmers who increased their production less than 5 per cent last year; we have others who increased their production as high as 80 per cent, and that is the unfairness of the situation. We asked for a 5 per cent increase in production and we got a 15 per cent increase in production, with no market or no home for it. We were spending millions of dollars on interest and storage charges because we had to pile it up. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that we continue to do that. If the hon. member wants authority vested in the Minister of Agriculture, let him say so and tell the provinces to vest that authority in the federal government.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR DAIRY PRODUCERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also supplementary and is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is in relation to his announcement next week. In view of the fact that many farmers are facing bankruptcy, and the Farmers' Union said this morning that farmers are now suffering a net loss of anywhere between 20 per cent and 100 per cent of their incomes, will the minister assure the House that in his announcement next week he will be outlining some steps that will in essence provide immediate financial assistance to the dairy farmers of this country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member means well in what he is stating. Again, I do not have the authority to get rid of all the inequities there are. He has eliminated part of it. The most important thing is if the dairy farmer is producing within a quota. They are doing what they were asked to do, and they are still the best paid industrial manufacturing milk producers in the whole world. We have a system of provincial allocation of quotas and how these quotas should be distributed, but we are faced with the fact that some provinces were encouraging production without any consultation, contrary to what we have been suggesting since last April. Those provinces have to bear some of the responsibility. It is not totally my responsibility, and any decision I might make would not alleviate that problem. If we completely eliminated the monthly quota system on which we are operating, and completely eliminated the $8.60, this would not mean there would still not be some in dire straits.

We have lent farm credit money to a total number, I believe, between 1,200 and 1,400, someplace in that area. This is in the minutes of the agricultural committee. We tabled this before the committee and it gives a list of the number of people to whom we have loaned these amounts of money. We have made the agreement that there will be no collections of these funds. I am sure if we all work together, the producer organizations, the provincial governments and the federal government we can solve this, but not in the way suggested, for instance, by the consumer critic of the official opposition, who said I paid the dairy farmers too much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: That is wrong and you know it. I never said that.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I heard that same speech outside a few minutes ago.

An hon. Member: Why don't you listen?

Mr. Nystrom: I have listened many times and have not had the answer to my question. In view of the fact the minister is to make an announcement next week, I should like to know whether he can assure the dairy farmers in this country that there will be some immediate financial assistance for them. In view of the fact that many of them have debts they have to meet, some in respect of farm credit and with other organizations in this country, will there be any immediate financial assistance?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have already made a statement about the debts in respect of the Farm Credit Corporation, and have said that if their income has been affected as a result of something that was not their own doing the Farm Credit Corporation will not even collect the payments and not collect the interest. There will actually be a moratorium in respect of those debts. If the lifting of the monthly quota program we have at the present time will alleviate any of the responsibility we have said we will consider it. We are considering that. The government has put $86 million more into this program this year than it did last year. We put in more money and that was contrary to what the dairy farmers of Canada had agreed to. They said they would get more in their returns from the market prices, and instead of that we are following a policy which is contrary. We increased the subsidy to dairy farmers and increased the total amount of money available for borrowing, thereby jeopardizing other agricultural programs in Canada, because we feel the dairy industry is that important.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should direct my find supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I would ask that right hon. gentleman, if I may, whether, as a result of the over-supply of milk in this country and the drop in consumption of some dairy products, his government would give serious consideration to the introduction in this country, in conjunction with the provinces, of a school milk program, and at the same time reinstitute the five-cent subsidy that was on fluid milk until about a year and a half ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any suggestion having to do with children of school age is worth considering. I just want to point out to the hon. member that this is essentially an area within provincial jurisdiction, and since it calls for an increase in spending I am not sure I would have the support of the provinces in advancing such a program. I will ask that it be considered.

PROPOSAL MINISTER CONSULT PROVINCES AND PRODUCER ORGANIZATION TO FIND SOLUTION TO PROBLEMS OF DAIRY PRODUCERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister does not get his feet wet by saying that the blame rests either with the producers or with the provinces, but he still is the one who advocated this dairy policy. Given the fact that he has partners for the application and implementation of that policy, which are provincial governments and federations of fluid milk as well as industrial milk, instead of looking for someone to blame, would the minister be prepared today to undertake positive discussions with his partners in the application of that policy, in order to find, as the hon. member for Joliette said, positive solutions, since several thousand producers will have to give up that production if they do not receive some assistance? The minister, Mr. Speaker, has recognized the problem by freezing certain mortgage payments on some farms.

Is the minister prepared to take positive steps, along with his partners, to find a solution as quickly as possible?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that we met with the provincial ministers of the two largest dairy provinces last week and discussed this problem in great detail at a lengthy meeting shows the concern we have for this problem. I am ready to accept that part of the problem which happens to be mine, but the suggestion that it should be 100 per cent the responsibility of the federal government and myself, as some people suggest, I do not accept. That is not a fact. We did not encourage all-out production when some of the provinces told the producers to produce all they can because they will have a quota next year. We never suggested that. We can prove what we told them to do last April when we announced the program.

The policy is a good one. It is one they agreed to, and if they had adhered to that kind of policy they would have no problem. We are going to try to solve it as I said in a fair and equitable manner between the producers and the provinces and ourselves. I do not blame producers solely for that, as the hon. member said, because I said the producer organizations certainly knew well we wanted 100 million hundredweight of milk and no more last year. We said we had no money for any more milk than that and that to produce any more would be a waste of product. They had excellent growing conditions. A cow is a biological entity and responds to all good things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: All these things compounded a situation that would be the envy of many of my colleagues in the cabinet if they could get the people they are responsible for to become so productive.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PROBLEM OF OVERPRODUCTION OF MILK

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Agriculture keeps on repeating that there is significant overproduction from which stems the disastrous policy that we must endure now. Is the minister in a position to order today or very shortly a very extensive and serious inquiry conducted by independent people into the real situation of that so-called surplus production in our warehouses? At the same time, could the minister determine the cost of warehousing the quantity in stock because, according to our sources of information, the government allegedly paid much more than needed for stocked surplusses, and is he prepared to let the House check on the facts that only the minister possesses?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I recently answered a question of an hon. member in this House in which I outlined the storage facilities for storing surplus dairy products in Canada and all dairy products in Canada. It is on the record. So far as I am concerned, when he refers to "so-called surplus production", I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that 103 million pounds of skim milk powder unsold is not a surplus production.

MINISTER'S POSITION ON FEDERAL CONTROL OF DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. May I ask the minister whether it is his personal belief—it may not be government policy at this stage—that the milk producers and milk consumers would be better served if the control, including quota allocation, were at the federal level whether it be producer-elective or government control. Is it the minister's view of the milk industry that those two groups, the producer and consumer would be better served by federal rather than provincial control of that industry.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I can only say that at the meeting I had last week with two provincial ministers I said if you want us to disband the Canadian dairy policy and the Canadian Dairy Commission say so. They said, "Mr. Minister, the reason we are here is that we believe in it; we believe it can work and we want to make it work". I repeat, if they want to blame me for all this, let them give me the authority to run it and I can run it a hell of a lot better than it is run now.

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: That is my question. May I ask the minister if he is presently of the opinion that federal government control of the dairy industry is in the best interest of producers and consumers alike, and did he advance that argument to the two ministers when he was having this discussion last Friday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With due respect, that is a repetition of an earlier question.

Some hon. Members: He did not answer it.

DELAY IN RECEIPT OF MILK SUBSIDY CHEQUES FOR MONTH OF APRIL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): I hope the minister will not say that this problem is partially provincial. The federal milk subsidy cheques for the month of April should have been received by the producers this month. According to producers in my area, they have not received them yet. Can the minister advise us when they can expect these cheques, because that would help the situation to some extent?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I talked to the chairman of the dairy commission. I understand that the cheques have been mailed. If they have not been, I will want to know why. Also, the supplemental cheques, the final payment for the dairy year 1975-76, have been mailed.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN PRICES AND PROFITS REGULATIONS IN VIEW OF OBJECTIONS FROM SOME SECTORS OF BUSINESS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the Minister of Finance and the Anti-Inflation Board have requested submissions from businessmen affected by the new draft regulations as foreshadowed in the May 25 budget, and considering that the substantially changed regulations, many of which are retroactive, could be unnecessarily disruptive to orderly business operations, would the minister tell the House to what extent he is prepared to modify the draft regulations in response to the objections of business? Specifically can he tell the House whether termination of the cost pass through method and the reduction of allowable margins to 85 per cent are policies on which the AIB and the administration are prepared to negotiate, at least with respect to certain sectors of the business community where there appears to be particular inequity if the new rules go into effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): In general terms we would like to have the regulations affecting everybody in the same way, so far as possible. We recognize that there are different types of businesses and different types of institutions as, for example, the financial institutions which must have necessary changes in regimes. Prima facie our preference is to do away with the cost pass through rule and to put all firms on the profit margin basis with 85 per cent as the percentage for the base year. I cannot be certain that in the finality there may not be a variant on that, but substantially that will be the principle to which we will adhere.

REQUEST FOR EXAMPLES OF INEQUITY THAT MIGHT HAVE CAUSED HARSHER PRICES AND PROFITS REGULATIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Noting that the minister in his budget speech indicated that the changes in the regulations were in response to perceived inequities in the control program, would the minister provide the House with an example of the sort of inequity which would have moved the administration and the AIB to impose a harsher regime on all firms?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Without mentioning specific firms, it was found that within the same competing parts of the industry there were some firms which, because of computer facilities or otherwise, were able to put their business on a cost pass through basis and therefore develop a profit margin that was much greater than the profit margin that the competing firm would have under the profit margin rule. That was the kind of inequity that was occurring, and it was to overcome that difference in treatment that we sought to move to a total profit margin rule.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF PRICES AND PROFITS REGULATIONS TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Since many sectors in the business community have expressed dissatisfaction with the revised draft AIB regulations, would the minister consider a reference of the regulations to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that the objections may be heard in an open forum?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I am not sure how valuable that kind of reference would be at this point, with the anticipation that the House will soon be completing its work for the summer.

An hon. Member: Oh, no; we are here for a while.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think the appropriate thing is to take account of the various representations that are made and to issue final regulations to meet the representations we have received from the business community. I would have to say ultimately of course that we should not be surprised to find that the system is more restrictive from the profit standpoint than perhaps the corporations would like. The point we would make is that they, as well as all other sectors of the community, must help to contribute to a reduction of inflation in Canada.

ALLEGED ADVANTAGE TO DISTRIBUTORS TO PURCHASE FROM FOREIGN SOURCES BECAUSE OF PRICES AND PROFITS REGULATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the new AIB regulations, particularly the abolition of cost pass through, make it financially advantageous for distributors to purchase from manufacturers located in other countries rather than from domestic manufacturers, is the minister not concerned that the regulations will have a detrimental effect on output and employment in the Canadian manufacturing sector? If he is concerned, as he should be, what definite steps does the government intend to take to avoid further deterioration within the manufacturing sector in terms of employment and productivity?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It is because we are concerned about the impact on the economy that we have gone to such trouble to consult with the business community before making the regulations definitive.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF POLICIES TO AID MANUFACTURERS AND SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him if the government intends to outline, perhaps in the forthcoming throne speech expected in the fall, definite long-range policies in respect of our nation's manufacturers and, may I add, to the often forgotten small business sector, as well as a policy that would replace the present harmful ad hoc attitude which has been in existence for some time in this regard. Would the government be prepared to back any such policy proposals with appropriate legislation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question has an implication concerning ad hockery with which I disagree. The hon. member is making a suggestion for the Speech from the Throne. To the extent that the Speech from the Throne will deal mainly with the session which is to begin, I cannot promise to insert in it what the hon. member calls long-range policies presumably over a period of several sessions. But with this reservation, of course we will want to have the Speech from the Throne deal with matters to improve the economic situation in our country.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE AGREEMENTS WITH RAILWAYS AND LAKE CARRIERS MEET ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Can he assure the House that the settlements or agreements in the rail dispute and the Lakehead carriers dispute fall within the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, I cannot, Mr. Speaker. However, I am very happy to see that the parties have come together in a settlement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I might say that the settlement was based by and large on the recommendations contained in the report of Mr. Justice Emmet Hall. His conclusions were that his recommendations were within the guidelines. We will have to await a ruling from the AIB on that matter.

While I am on my feet I would like to advise the House also that the lake carriers on the St. Lawrence seaway arrived at a tentative settlement last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO NATIVES WHO HAVE MERCURY POISONING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the Indians in northwestern Ontario are suffering from mercury poisoning because of the failure of federal and provincial governments to enforce proper environmental standards, is the federal government prepared to pay direct compensation to native people on reserves who have symptoms of mercury poisoning?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, of course, we pay social assistance to all Indian people on reserves who are unable to earn incomes. In addition, we are working with the two chiefs involved on Whitedog and Grassy Narrows to develop what has been termed a band work program based on the work development program to try to create work for all people who have been affected by lay-offs and loss of employment resulting from the closing down of the commercial fishery.

ASSISTANCE TO ENABLE NATIVES TO SUE POLLUTERS OF RIVERS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I was not asking about the general social welfare compensation payments but about direct payments because of the sickness that has resulted. However, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister prepared to assist Indian bands financially—I think a precedent can be seen in the James Bay case—so that they may hire legal counsel to sue polluters of the river system on which their livelihood depends?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL APPROVING AGREEMENT WITH CALPA AND CATCA

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Following the pressures exerted this morning by the members of his caucus, especially those from Quebec, and also by other people, does the Prime Minister intend to change the terms of the order in council ratifying the agreement between the Minister of Transport and the representatives of CATCA and CALPA, which agreement has been interpreted in Quebec as a complete surrender and a step backward to appease the extremists as concerns the bilingualism issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is not an order in council. The agreement between the minister and the officials of CALPA and CATCA has not been ratified by an order in council. In reality, the minister had the authority to negotiate settlement of the strike. It now remains for the union people to see if they will support this agreement in a vote which will take place in about 10 days. We shall then know if they are in agreement. For the moment, it is obvious that the minister has done his best to do a difficult and thankless task in a particularly difficult situation. The government is glad that the strike is over. The principle involved in the government's committment to promote bilingualism everywhere, and in the case of the airline, everywhere this can be done while ensuring safety, remains intact. I believe we have the support of members on the other side of the House in this issue. It now remains to see whether CATCA and CALPA will sign the agreement. This is the situation. I have no doubt that support from the other side of the House would help solve this difficulty. But I do not know in what sense the hon. member would want to speak on behalf of his party.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH CALPA AND CATCA TO PROTECT INDEPENDENCE OF JUDICIARY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In the light of this agreement concluded by the Minister of Transport, obviously in the name of the government, has the Prime Minister been informed of the recommendations of the Chief Justice of the Superior Court aiming at protecting the independence of the judiciary, and is the Prime Minister willing under the circumstances to amend the agreement concluded to better protect the independence of the judiciary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member must know that if we amended this agreement, the people with whom we have negotiated, that is to say the pilots and the controllers, would be justified in saying that there is no agreement, that it has been modified unilaterally, and what the hon. member is suggesting would risk causing a new strike. I do not know if the hon. member has thought about these consequences, and if this is really what he is suggesting.

As concerns the premise of the question, I have seen in the newspapers allegations concerning a letter from Chief Justice Deschênes. I have not seen this correspondence. If it exists, I am surprised that it has been published in the newspapers since this must be a matter between judges, and I would find it deplorable if such a letter from a Quebec Chief Justice to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court had been given to the newspapers, probably by indiscreet people.

BILINGUALISM

POSSIBILITY OF ELECTION ON THE ISSUE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary.

In view of the general reaction in Quebec and in view of the reaction of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court who wants to protect the independence of his judges, and in view of the pressing representations made by the Quebec caucus of Liberal members, does the right hon. Prime Minister, in view of all those extremely serious reactions, feel it would be advisable to carry out immediately his threat made a few days ago to call an election on the topics of bilingualism and national unity?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sorry that the hon. member has interpreted in such a way the interview I had recently when I was asked whether the situation was as serious as it appeared and whether the next election could again be held on this problem. I answered that unfortunately that could still be possible, but that it has never been contemplated to launch a general election on this topic.

As for the attitude in Quebec to which the hon. member is referring, surely there must be people who agree with the settlement. We do not know yet what the Progressive Conservative Party nor even the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe think about it. It might be interesting if, on behalf of his party, he were to suggest a solution to this dispute. And at the same time, I might remind the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe that when he tells us about Mr. Justice Deschênes and his judges, those are not his judges since no judge appointed to the commission comes under the jurisdiction of Chief Justice Deschênes.

ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF NEW FINANCIAL TERMS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the Associated Press report from Buenos Aires yesterday that Canada and Argentina have concluded "a satisfactory" agreement on inflationary adjustment for the supply of a Canadian nuclear reactor, the cost of which is now to be $500 million as against the original estimate of $160 million, will the minister table the new financial terms of this nuclear reactor sale so that we can see just what kind of commercial deal the government has negotiated in this regard?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to present the details of this new agreement to my cabinet colleagues very shortly. At some appropriate point in the future, perhaps before the standing committee or earlier, I will seek an opportunity to make as large a disclosure of the details as I can with respect to the mathematics of that particular transaction.

BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ALL CANADIANS WILL SEE CANADA CUP HOCKEY SERIES

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that CTV has the exclusive rights to telecast the Canada Cup series this fall, and in view of the fact that there are parts of this country which have only CBC, would the minister ensure that all Canadians, particularly those in northern Canada, will get a chance to see this important series?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have had several representations from the hon. member for Restigouche and others on this side of the House who are concerned about this matter. I am not certain what can be done about it, but I will certainly look into it.

DATE WHEN TELEVISION FACILITIES AVAILABLE IN NORTHERN CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. My question last week had to do with bringing any type of television to people in northern Canada and Newfoundland, and the minister had no details. Would he explain why some communities in northern Newfoundland will never have television unless the people responsible for the accelerated cost program in the CBC get off their fannies and do something?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was given an answer, although perhaps not to his full satisfaction, last night. I draw to his attention the fact that in the answer it was indicated to him that instead of 1977 being the date for television in his part of the world, the time has been moved forward to the fall of 1976. He should be grateful for at least that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR FAILURE TO LABEL POLYCHLORIDE PLASTIC AS HAZARDOUS PRODUCT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Some days ago in answer to a question I put in the House the Minister of Public Works informed the House of the strict regulations under which polychloride plastics could be used. I then put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the effect that if this serious fire hazard product was only used under strict regulations, as pointed out by the Minister of Public Works, why was it not labelled under the Hazardous Products Act. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said he would inform the House in a few days about this, and I wonder if he now has an answer.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy in contacting me on this subject some weeks ago.

Under our present regulations these flammable substances are not regulated, but as a result of the representations of the hon. gentleman and those of the Minister of Public Works we have been meeting with the plastics industry, and the polyurethene type of insulation will now come under a new set of regulations. In the meantime many manufacturers are voluntarily labelling their products accordingly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CANADIANS ON HIJACKED FRENCH AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has Canada taken any steps to contact big Idi Amin to see what he is doing about protecting the Canadians on the hijacked French airliner, or is the Prime Minister planning to make a statement today on this matter?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no to the second question. As to the first, I would have to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to report.

POST OFFICE

APPLICATION TO OLYMPIC STAMPS OF PROVISION TO WITHDRAW TWELVE MONTHS AFTER ISSUE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Can the Postmaster General inform the House if the agreement with Canadian philatelists providing for withdrawal of new stamp issues 12 months following the original issuance applies to Olympic stamps?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yes. The hon. gentleman has raised an important question. It is customary in Canada, after 12 months, to withdraw these types of commemorative stamps from circulation. After that they can be obtained through dealers and various private outlets.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Postmaster General's remarks, would he investigate why the Olympic statue stamp, which was originally issued on March 14, 1975, is still available at post office philatelic outlets?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I should have been more explicit. I meant, one year from the event. Olympic stamps, as we know, are designated by law for a specific purpose.The net revenue derived from those particular stamps is part of the financing of the Olympics themselves. That is one of our reasons for still selling them. But one year after the termination of the Olympic Games all Olympic stamps will be obtainable only through private outlets.

IMMIGRATION

MEDICAL CHECKS ON VISITORS FROM THE TROPICS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the galloping increase in the incidence of tropical diseases even among native born Canadians, proving that present controls are not controlling, may I ask what percentage of the 40 million people who visit Canada are from tropical countries and what small percentage of those remain for longer than the normal holiday? Also, may I ask if Canadians who have served their country for any length of time in tropical countries are checked medically when they return to Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will try to obtain for the hon. member the statistical information he has requested. I think he is aware of recent measures involving the medical examination of visitors to more carefully monitor the possibility of such diseases being brought into the country. As for the final part of his question to do with the return of Canadians, that is not in my jurisdiction.

STRIKE OF MINERS IN SOUTHEAST KOOTENAY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been in touch with his provincial counterpart with regard to the strike by miners which has continued for six weeks in the southeast Kootenay area of British Columbia contrary to the ruling of the Anti-Inflation Board?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, during the latter part of last week I met with the minister of labour for British Columbia. We reviewed all strike situations which were then troublesome in the province from the point of view as to how the federal department could co-operate and be of assistance to the provincial department in resolving these outstanding disputes.

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF APPEAL PROCEDURES AGAINST RULINGS OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because of the number of similar strikes concentrated in the mining industry, is the minister taking steps directly to review with representatives of the industry, both management and labour, appeal procedures provided against rulings of the Anti-Inflation Board, or is he awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the board itself?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since many of the labour disputes in question including questions of labour relations and resolution of labour disputes fall within provincial jurisdiction, we are co-operating with the province to ascertain both from unions and companies the best way to work out practices—I am speaking in terms of resolutions—so that we can be constructive with regard to resolution of disputes. We are doing that in an active manner at present.

Oral Questions

PARLIAMENT HILL

COST OF REPAIRING DAMAGE CAUSED BY ANCHORING BARRIERS ON DRIVEWAY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works, if somebody could wake him up. Having regard to the new security measures on the Hill, particularly the new method of anchoring barriers on the driveway in front of the House of Commons, I wonder if the Minister has an estimate of the costs to be incurred by the government to repair the many holes punched in the pavement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must rule that question as being beyond the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. It is the responsibility of the Speaker.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

JURISDICTION OF BOARD OVER PRICE OF MEALS IN MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that a Montreal daily reported this morning that the cost of meals will allegedly jump by 40 per cent, especially in the Montreal area as the result of the 1976 Olympic Games, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to ask the Anti-Inflation Board about those increases exceeding the allowable percentage and, if he has already done so, can he tell the House what control mechanisms will be developed in that connection?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that small businesses do not come under the Anti-Inflation Board or the anti-inflation legislation. Large businesses such as hotels of railway companies, are under the control of the board and the kinds of control are indicated in the regulations proceeding from the anti-inflation legislation.

ALLEGED WEAKNESS IN HOUSING AND CONSUMER SPENDING SECTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with the data provided by the Royal Bank's tredicator, which shows that the economy is growing more slowly than earlier estimated and showing the smallest quarter to quarter increase since the index resumed its upward trend in the first quarter of 1975. As the trendicator also shows that there is weakness in housing and consumer spending, may I ask the minister, in light of the disappointing indications in the economy, whether he has taken additional steps to increase construction of housing and consumer spending in Canada?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the trendicator would appear to be directly contradicted by the national accounts for the first quarter which showed a growth rate of 2.7 per cent in the quarter.

Mr. Stanfield: No, no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO ANGOLA TO COMMUTE DEATH PENALTY OF MERCENARIES

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister, please? Since it is apparently the will of the Canadian parliament that capital punishment in Canada is to be abolished, does the government intend to ask the government of Angola to commute the death sentences of the foreign nationals who were mercenaries there?

[Translation]

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take it upon myself to make remarks on the abolition of the death penalty in other countries. The fact is that, upon first reading newspaper reports on the condemnation to death of four mercenaries in Angola, some of us may find it revolting. We recognized the government of Angola and I shall convey the request of the hon. member and see if it might be possible to make representations, but I am not sure at all that we can.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED BACKLOG OF FIRST CLASS MAIL AT VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of reports coming from the Vancouver post office to the effect that there is a backlog of at least one month's first class mail, that there is no indication of when or if it will be delivered and even if it is finally delivered, it will be delivered on a random basis, I ask what steps the Postmaster General plans to take to clear up this backlog and when he expects to be able to announce normal delivery of mail in Vancouver?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we are reading different reports.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling routine proceedings, I might indicate that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham raised a point a moment ago by way of a question which I set aside because it was addressed to the Minister of Public Works. In fact, what the hon. member raised is the responsibility of the Speaker. I do not by any means want to indicate that the decision taken today with respect to preparations outside was taken lightly or that hon. members ought not to be encouraged to seek information about those preparations. The decision was based on previous experience. It is an experiment. The barricades will be removed as quickly as possible, as soon as it is seen they are not needed. I think that moment has arrived already. It is an experience which I hope we will be able to assess collectively, to see whether the same kinds of precautions are necessary in future, but it is not possible to put questions of the kind the hon. member raised here. I do want the hon. member to know, however, that his question was a very important one.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CANADIANS ON HIJACKED FRENCH AIRCRAFT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I directed a question to the Prime Minister. I had forgotten that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in the House. I understand she has an answer for me. This is a very important question about Canadians on the French airliner hijacked in Angola. As we will be recessing for a long weekend, I hope that she will be permitted to make some kind of statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a procedure requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Bégin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I thank the House and the hon. member. All I can add, Mr. Speaker, is that we are indeed very happy to be able to confirm that Mrs. Pearla Bitton was among the 47 hostages that were freed by the hijackers. I can also say that in addition to the four Canadian citizens being held, we believe there are five other persons who are connected with Canada, that is who are said to be landed immigrants or who have close relatives in Canada.

I believe the hon. member also wanted to know whether the right hon. Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been in touch with the president of Uganda. We have not operated that way to date. To protect the lives of all hostages still being held, the policy of the government has naturally been to say as little as possible about the transactions underway and for which the government of Uganda has assumed all responsibility.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Outside the House of Commons today and again inside the House, as he has done repeatedly, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated that I said that under his dairy policy the farmers were being paid too much. The minister seems to think there is a conflict of interest between consumer rights and producer rights. What I did say in the House of Commons some weeks ago was that the Minister of Agriculture had attained—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Up to this point the hon. member is expressing a difference of opinion with the Minister of Agriculture. It is significant, of course. However, the trouble I have is whether it constitutes a point of order. If the hon. member has a point of order, I would ask him to please state it.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I regret having to take the time of the House, but this is most serious. The Minister of Agriculture said that I said that under his program the farmers were being paid too much. I challenge the minister to find out within the next three or four days where I said that, inside the House or outside the House. At no time did I state that the farmers were being paid too much under his program. I challenge the minister to stop playing petty politics and produce that statement that was made inside or outside the House, because it was not made by me.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Certain expenses of the trip were. See reply to question 5,176, part 1. (a) Yes; (b) No.

CHILE—LOANS

Question No. 5,516—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. Have there been any export loans concluded with Chile since the $5,000,000 agreement of January 29, 1974 and, if so (a) on what date was the agreement entered into (b) who was (i) the borrower (ii) the Canadian exporter (c) what was the product being financed (d) what were the (i) repayment terms (ii) proposed amount of financing?

2. Are there any applications currently under consideration by the Export Loans Division for exports to Chile and, if so, what is the (a) date of the application (b) name of the (i) borrower (ii) Canadian exporter (c) product being financed (d) proposed amount of financing?

3. At what rate of interest have loans to Chile between 1970 and 1974 been arranged and under what terms for repayment?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. No. (a) Not applicable; (b) Not applicable; (c) Not applicable; (d) Not applicable.

2. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown Corporations have not been required by Parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operations. This is of particular importance to EDC because of the need to protect the competitive position of Canadian companies bidding in world markets. In certain instances an announcement may be made when an export sale supported by EDC has been finally consummated. Those transactions appear in EDC's Annual Report. Otherwise in the interest of trade EDC does not publish.

3. EDC made one loan to Chile in the first half of 1970 and one early in 1974. Repayment terms were 21 semi-annual instalments in the first case and 10 semi-annual instalments in the second; it has not published the rate of interest on loans. To do so would impair its negotiating position in subsequent transactions.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—CHILE

Question No. 5,517—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. What is the government's and/or Export Development Corporation's policy toward Foreign Investment Insurance Programmes for Canadian investments in Chile?

2. Have any Canadian investments been insured since 1970 and, if so, what (a) were the investments (b) is the name of the investor (c) was the project (d) was the total value of the investment?

3. Have any applications been made for Foreign Investment Insurance in Chile since 1970 and, if so, what (a) were they (b) is the name of the investor (c) was the project (d) was the total value of the investments?

4. Are there any applications currently being considered by the Foreign Insurance Division for Canadian investments in Chile and, if so (a) who are the possible recipients (b) what are the projects (c) what is the total value of the investments?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as EDC is concerned: 1. Its policy is established by the Board of Directors on the merits of particular cases as they arise, and upon the Board's assessment of the economic factors and risk at the time.

2. EDC does not publish the particulars of its foreign investment insurance because of the nature and the confidentiality of many of the projects; the aggregate amount and the geographic areas covered are published in each of its Annual Reports.

3. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown Corporations have not been required by Parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operations. When an export sale supported by EDC has been finally consummated an announcement may be made. Those transactions are described in EDC's Annual Reports. Otherwise in the interest of trade EDC does not publish.

4. Please see Part 3.

EXPORT CREDITS—CHILE

Question No. 5,518—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. Have there been any Export Development Corporation Export Credits Insurance Division credits granted for exports to Chile since 1970 and, if so (a) on what date was the credit granted (b) what was the name of the (i) borrower (ii) Canadian exporter (c) what was the product financed (d) what was the amount of the financing?

2. Are there any applications currently under consideration by the Export Credits Insurance Division for exports to Chile and, if so, what is the (a) date of application (b) name of the (i) borrower (ii) Canadian exporter (c) product to be financed (d) proposed amount of financing?

3. Have there been insurance claims submitted to the EDC for export credits to Chile since 1970 and, if so (a) on what date was it filed (b) what was the name of the (i) borrower (ii) Canadian exporter (c) what was the product financed and, if the claim was paid, the amount paid?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Export Development Corporation states: 1. The Export Development Corporation's Export Credits Insurance Division does not grant credits; it does insure for exporters risks of non-payment for credits granted by exporters. It has written such insurance for exports to Chile since 1970. (a) Information as to the credit extended by exporters relating to EDC's insurance is received by EDC from them as confidential information and may not be published without the consent of the exporters concerned; (b) As indicated in the foregoing there is no borrower in such transactions and EDC may not disclose without the consent of the exporters, the names of buyers to whom the exporters extended credit; (c) Please see Part 1 (b); (d) As indicated in the foregoing it is the exporter who provides financing in such cases and EDC's information thereon is received as confidential information. From 1970 to 1975 EDC insured exports to Chile on which EDC's contingent liability was an aggregate of $8.8 million.

2. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown Corporations have not been required by Parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operations. In certain instances an announcement may be made when an export sale supported by EDC has been finally consummated. Those transactions appear in EDC's Annual Report. Otherwise in the interest of trade EDC does not publish.

3. Yes, (a) Please see the answers to Part 1; (b) Please see the answers to Part 1; (c) Please see the answers to Part 1; EDC has paid in insurance claims arising from sales to Chile since 1970 an aggregate of $3.1 million.

TRIP TO MEXICO—MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 5,557—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Agriculture recently travel to Mexico and was he accompanied by his wife and, if so, on what date and by what means did the Minister's wife travel?

2. Did the public Treasury pay for her transportation and, if so (a) in what amount (b) did the Minister reimburse the public Treasury and, if so, by how much and on what date?

3. What is the total of all expenses, if any, paid by the taxpayer for the wife of the Minister of Agriculture other than transportation?

4. Will the Minister reimburse the public Treasury and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The Minister of Agriculture recently travelled to Cancun, Mexico to attend the First Annual Meeting of Consultation of the International Group for Agricultural Development in Latin America and the Caribbean accompanied by his wife. The duration of the trip was from May 12 to 16 inclusive. Mrs. Whelan travelled with the Minister via DND aircraft.

2. As the Minister of Agriculture travelled by DND aircraft, there was no additional charge for his wife to travel on the same aircraft.

3. Mrs. Whelan paid for her own additional expenses..

4. As there were no additional expenses, there is no need to reimburse the Treasury.

PURCHASE OF HISTORICAL HOUSES IN QUEBEC

Question No. 5,742—Mr. Matte:

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 29, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38 (Mr. Halliday).

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Your Honour indicated yesterday that you would be dealing with the grouping of the motions. I was wondering if Your Honour is prepared to do that at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I prepared a draft of groupings which I circulated to the House leaders. If hon. members have any comments on it, I would be prepared to receive them at this time. It may be, however, that since we are into one grouping which will no doubt take us through this afternoon and into Monday, possibly a discussion on the matter ought to take place at that time, unless there is some discussion on the first couple of groupings which would follow the one with which we are involved at the present time.

Mr. Blais: I would agree with that, Mr. Speaker. I would like to make some comments on the groupings, but the grouping of motions on which I will have comments to make are Motions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 45 and 46. I am sure we will not reach those before Monday. The reason I suggested that Your Honour's suggestion should be agreed upon is that I have to absent myself in about five minutes. I hope those in the other parties who might be addressing themselves to this particular matter will permit me to speak to the questions that are of concern to me on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. First of all I have already made a decision in respect of the motions that are before the House at the present time when debate will resume, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) having the floor.

I doubt there would be much disagreement that motion No. 7 should be considered separately—that would follow these considerations—and motions Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 13 might be the subject of comment at this time. That would take us through until Monday, I think, and give us an opportunity to reflect on the groupings and to comment upon them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to agree with your suggestion that this discussion be deferred until Monday. I simply want to say that there are two of the proposed amendments on which I should like to raise points of order. One is motion No. 35 to which the hon. member opposite already referred, and the other is motion No. 40, but as Your Honour pointed out all this can wait until Monday.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, not being represented by a party leader or whip I wonder if I could be privy to this grouping to which you have referred.

Mr. Speaker: In line with the suggestion raised I have the intention before leaving the chair this afternoon of calling on the Solicitor General to resume the debate, but I should perhaps read into the record the suggestions that are here in order that hon. members will be able to read them in Hansard.

Following the discussion on the grouping that is on the floor at the present time, which is motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38 it is suggested, subject to further discussion, that motion No. 7 should be debated and voted on separately; motions Nos. 10 and 11 could be grouped for purposes of debate, and a vote on motion No. 10 would probably dispose of a vote on motion No. 11; motions Nos. 12 and 13 would be grouped for debate but voted separately; motions Nos. 21 and 22 would be grouped for debate and would be voted together; motion No. 23 would be debated and voted separately; motions Nos. 24 and 25 would be grouped both for debate and for voting; motions Nos. 26 to 32 inclusive would be grouped for debate with only one vote being required; motions Nos. 33 and 34 would be grouped for debate and one vote; motion No. 35 would be debated and voted separately, again subject to discussion according to the caveat that has been put forward; motions Nos. 36 and 37 would be grouped for debate but a separate division would be required on each motion; motions Nos. 40 and 41 would be debated and voted separately subject to comment; motions Nos. 42, 43 and 44 would be grouped for debate and vote, and motions Nos. 43 and 44 might depend on the result of a vote on motion No. 42; motions Nos. 45 and 46 would be debated and voted separately.

Those are general suggestions and as we move along, after hon. members have had an opportunity to reflect and we might have an opportunity to engage in further discussion, the Chair would be more than happy to receive suggestions on any particular question. It would appear there is ample work for the House between now and Monday and this will give hon. members an opportunity to bring forward suggestions.

Order, please. The hon. Solicitor General.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have finished my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan).

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, last night in this House I had the honour to second the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). He is an abolitionist and I am a retentionist. Last night he spoke to these amendments on the basis of compassion. I should like to speak as a retentionist, and as one who, while he might not be so presumptuous as to lay claim to the virtue of compassion might say at least that he aspires to it. It is on the basis of compassion that I support these amendments and urge abolitionist and retentionist alike to join in supporting them.

These are very straightforward amendments, three of which will allow inmates in particular circumstances to elect for the sentence of death by himself choosing it. Of course it would have to be carried out by the state but there is this essential difference which allowed Mr. Speaker to rule these amendments in order. The fourth amendment is conditional upon the other three and has to do with the means of capital punishment.

It might be said that my support for these amendments goes back some time even though they were only introduced yesterday. It goes back to the summer of 1973 when I was a member of a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which was established to investigate the Canadian penitentiary system with particular reference to the matter of escapes and the need for security. Other members of the House who participated were Doctor Reg. Stackhouse, who was then the member for Scarborough East, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who was co-chairman with the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), and two other Liberals, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) and the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). I was privileged to serve on that committee along with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), and although a member of the Social Credit party was named I do not believe anyone actively participated.

We travelled from the Maritimes to British Columbia looking into the situation. The subcommittee was set up because my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), recognized a failure in the Canadian penitentiary system to provide adequately for the security of the Canadian population as was shown by the number of escapes which occurred. He moved a motion during the minority parliament to establish a subcommittee to investigate the Canadian penitentiary system, and the motion was accepted by all parties.

I have mentioned the people who served on the subcommittee, Mr. Speaker, and none of us had any professional experience within institutions. For all of us, therefore, the experience was an eye-opener, and I want to place on the record today some of the experiences we had so that I can put forward the case of compassion and of human decency in support of the argument of the hon. member for Oxford that his amendments to the bill should carry.

I should like to quote from a report of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes to the Solicitor General in which he stated:

> In spite of the fact that the subcommittee had begun its work with much energy and vitality, the subcommittee was not able—due to the magnitude of the task it was entrusted with—to complete its work within the period set by the House of Commons. Subsequently, the co-chairmen of the committee . . . have attempted to obtain an additional delay which would have enabled us to complete our work and submit a report to the House, as a committee. Unfortunately, the co-chairmen were not successful in obtaining this.

Along with the hon. member I regret that we were not allowed to report to this House because we had put together individually, and we had hoped collectively to give in a committee report, documentation of the serious situation which faced the Canadian people if measures were not taken to protect them adequately, and also the serious situation within the prisons. The prisons offered no hope for those inside, and very limited protection for the innocent Canadian population on the outside.

I think of the impressions of the beginner and I refer to the words here of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes which I think every member who saw the prisons would go along with. We visited the prisons without prior notice; we just knocked on the door and announced ourselves. He said that his very general observations were based on the first impressions of a beginner where visiting prisons is concerned. He went on to say this:

> If Lord Durham in his famous report came to the conclusion that in Canada there were "two nations warring in the bosom of one country", one has partly the feeling that in the Canadian penitentiary system there are not two but three factions whose relations, if they cannot be called bellicose, are far from being harmonious. Obviously, it involves the inmates, the guards and the administration.

What were some of the findings of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes? In the report that he prepared, which unfortunately was never tabled in the House, he said this:

The extent of idleness among the inmates is also striking. The work they are able to do is often repetitive and not very likely to inspire them. The almost complete lack of motivation for the work available in the institution is astonishing.

He was particularly upset by what he termed the "Chinatown" cells in a detention unit in the Kingston area.

Miss MacDonald: It was at Collins Bay.

Mr. O'Sullivan: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) reminds me that it was at Collins Bay. They are used at the discretion of the penitentiary administration in order to physically isolate from the main body of the prison population those individuals who cause particular disruption that brings about a threat either to the lives of themselves or of other inmates, or far too frequently, to the lives of the guards and the administration. The hon. member had this to say in his report:

—the isolation cells known under the name of "Chinatown" in a detention unit in the Kingston area are a shame upon the Canadian penitentiary system. This kind of cell would be more suitable in a war film like "The Bridge on the River Kwai" than in a Canadian prison.

He then recommended to the Solicitor General:

I would recommend that you investigate the matter, and the destruction of those units.

The hon. member went on to talk about the women's prison at Kingston, a visit that none of us who went there will ever be able to erase from our memories. The hon. member said this in his report:

Nobody can visit the women's prison in Kingston without leaving it with the feeling of being morally impoverished by the visit... One finds in this institution students arrested for drug trafficking, inmates guilty of acts of violence... in short, people with extremely different mentalities.

In view of this great disparity and the atmosphere of potential tension which exists, at the very least, life must be almost unbearable for many inmates of this institution.

Those words of the hon. member who accompanied us on this special study tour reflect, I think, the feeling of the majority, if perhaps not all, of the members of the special sub committee. During the study we came to appreciate the difficulty that the Solicitor General and his officials face, a difficulty that all of those in the Canadian penintentiary system face, namely that of trying to balance, on the one hand, the need for the protection of Canadian society and the right of the Canadian people to the maximum amount of personal security and, on the other hand, the goal of rehabilitation, realizing that some day those inmates may be returned to Canadian society. It is in society's interests as well as the interests of the inmates that they be returned to society in a frame of mind, and equipped with an outlook and with skills, that will make them citizens who play a very active and positive role and who will not return to a life of crime. That is the goal of rehabilitation, and it is an admirable aim.

The search so far has been in vain. We have had a policy of rehabilitation that has not worked. That, quite simply, Mr. Speaker, is what we found. But trying to balance one against the other, we had to come down foremost on the side of ensuring the protection of the Canadian population. If you can meet both those aims, then you have achieved perhaps one of the most difficult quests in any society.

We learned from prison officials, as well as from talking to their counterparts in other countries, that there are no magic solutions. You cannot at one time ensure the safety of Canadian society and at the same time ensure that everyone will be rehabilitated and returned to society in a manner that makes them productive citizens, citizens who will not return to a life of crime. The recidivism rate running at over 80 per cent is alone proof of that statement. That is why we came to the conclusion that the emphasis must be first and foremost on the protection of the innocent population, people who are not behind bars since they have not committed any crime. We are obligated to ensure their safety and protection, their lives, their liberty, and their right to go about their daily living, not breaking any law but with security under the law. If there is some means whereby at the same time we bring about the rehabilitation of prisoners, it is also in the interests of society that we seek that means.

As we travelled about the country we conducted discussions in camera at three different levels. We talked with the administration of the prison, with the guards of the prison, and for the vast majority of the time with the prisoners themselves, with no guards present in the room. I recall vividly one scene where we were faced by "lifers", prisoners serving a life sentence, obviously for a capital crime. We were in a room with 20 of them and there were no guards nearby; that was one of the conditions we ourselves set. We did not want anybody listening in. We wanted them to be as free and open with us as they could, and they were, Mr. Speaker, I assure you.

It became apparent to us in our discussions with people at the three different levels that there exists, whether we like to admit it or not, an element within the population that is simply unable—unwilling perhaps, but certainly unable—to come to grips with personal problems and to make a positive contribution to society, and more basically, unable to live within the constraints of the law that is set down by society. These people represent a dangerous and incorrigible element.

I am sure most of us were brought up on the notions espoused in such movies as "Boys Town" with Spencer Tracy—all accolades to the contrary. Nevertheless there do exist such people as incorrigibles, people who are somewhat demented. It is a sad realization to come to, but any chance that these people will be safely and healthily returned to society simply does not exist.

I wish time would permit me to quote from the findings of other members of the sub-committee, Mr. Speaker. I filed a report, and a particularly moving report was filed by one of the co-chairmen, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert. As all hon. members know, she is a remarkable woman and has served in this House with great distinction. She went into that sub-committee with all the enthusiasm, dedication and compassion which we know her to have in abundance. Hon. members should take the time to read her report. She went into this study with an open mind, having had no previous experience, as was the case with other members of the committee, and she reached the same conclusions we reached—that the present system does not work, that it does not allow for rehabilitation, that it does not provide the maximum amount of security for the Canadian people, and that all these goals must be pursued with more vigour.

Let me now turn from the sub-committee findings to the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Oxford. As he stressed last night, we are not talking here about a large number of people. We are talking about a very few cases of repeaters. We are talking about those convicted of high treason, or convicted of the stange crime in this day and age of piracy. These are people who obviously have shown they are not capable of living within society as we have set it up. We have established society and set up its rules, but these people have determined of their own will that they cannot or will not live within those constraints or those laws.

What we are saying to those who have been sentenced to life imprisonment is that if they so elect they may choose to be sentenced to death. Some may argue that technically you cannot sentence anyone to death, or a person cannot choose to be sentenced to death just after you have abolished capital punishment. There is another law still on the statute books which will not be affected by this bill, that comes under the jurisdiction of National Defence, which provides for the death penalty. It does not spell out in what way the death penalty will be carried out. It just says there shall be the death penalty. There are many bills passed by this House that do not spell out in chapter and verse how they will be carried out, but rather there follows the passage of a bill a set of regulations which allow for the interpretation of the bill and its being carried out.

Having visited prisons, I would argue that if a person chooses to be sentenced to death, perhaps having spent weeks and months living in horror, it may be a more compassionate thing to allow that person to make such a choice than to sentence him to a death that is surely more cruel and more inhumane, a sentence which would allow him to suffer the consequences of his actions by spending the rest of his life in prison. What I am saying is that if you have visited prisons, as we did, and you tell a man that he really is going to spend the rest of his days there, you will realize you are committing him to a sentence of death far more cruel and more outrageous than allowing him to decide to end his days on this earth. I would stress that I could only agree to this in terms that the sentence would be carried out in a way the governor in council would decide.

This brings me to the fourth amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Oxford, that the sentence to be pronounced against a person sentenced to death shall not be that he be hanged by the neck until he is dead, but in conformity with any humane method of execution the governor in council may establish or regulate.

Those of us who seek capital punishment propose that there are more humane methods than the admittedly outmoded method of hanging. All of us who propose the return of capital punishment, or at least its reinstitution, and we appeal to all hon. members for its reinstitution in these particular cases, suggest there are more humane methods, such as my colleague who is a doctor has put forward. We should not continue with this system of hanging which admittedly is outdated.

All of us who support capital punishment, at the same time see no inconsistency in saying that we hope it will never have to be used. That is the very basis for having it. It offers a deterrent which may prevent some people from taking innocent lives. That is the reason for it, not for revenge or for getting even, and not for the purpose of inflicting some barbaric—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity given me by the House to complete my remarks, and I will attempt to do so briefly. Let me say simply that we have reached that point in society where we have to reconsider whether there should be capital punishment. A little over a week ago this House voted in principle that it wanted to do away with hanging. The hon. member for Oxford, who is an abolitionist, proposes that the bill should carry, but in certain particular circumstances capital punishment should still be allowed. All those who share in his compassion, be they retentionists or abolitionists, should support these amendments.

These amendments will allow a choice to the person we are committing to prison for the rest of his life, a sentence, I repeat very briefly, to a death far more cruel, more unusual and more inhumane than the termination of his life quickly and, given modern methods, with dignity.

Those are the reasons put forward by the hon. member for Oxford as an abolitionist in proposing these amendments. As a retentionist I second these amendments, sharing as I do his belief that whatever the decision of this House we must foremost ensure the Canadian people that their basic right to life is being given the maximum protection and, secondly, that if we are to have capital punishment there are more modern and humane ways of carrying that out. Thirdly, when you sentence a man to life, that is, to spend the rest of his days in one of those institutions we call penitentiaries, and really there are no words to describe adequately the nightmare they are, you are imposing upon that individual a far worse punishment than by allowing him to elect to end his days on this earth.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask whether the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) would permit a question?

Mr. O'Sullivan: Yes.

Mr. Stanbury: Let me say first, Mr. Speaker, how moving the speech of the hon. member has been, and how impressed I am as one member with his sincerity and his humanity in supporting the motions of his colleagues, although they raise some rather difficult questions. It does seem to me that the amendments suggest death by choice or, as the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth might call it by analogy, suicide on demand. What I would really like to know in trying to assess this suggestion is whether the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, as a declared retentionist, would feel that he could support the bill now before the House if the amendments moved by his colleague were accepted?

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I might first say that the question posed by the hon. member is one that he might wish to have put to the mover, the hon. member for Oxford, who has said that as an abolitionist he could not support the bill if these amendments are not carried. I must say that I will want to know the outcome of the other amendments being put forward by other members of my party before looking at the over-all bill and making that decision. If only these amendments were to carry I would have to say the bill does not, in my estimation, go far enough to protect the innocent lives of our Canadian population. However, recognizing what happened here a week ago with the vote, and the potential outcome being the same, I would say to the hon. member that, recognizing I was in the minority then and may be in the minority again, I would feel so much better about the bill being passed with these amendments, even though I cannot support it. This is the way I think Canadian people would generally feel.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38 I should first of all like to draw the attention of the House to the actual clauses in Bill C-84 that are affected by these motions.

Motion No. 4 affects the clause in Bill C-84 dealing with treason. As I read my colleague's motion he in effect is saying that some person convicted of treason as now defined in Bill C-84 should have the option, instead of accepting imprisonment for life, of accepting the sentence of death. In the case of motion No. 9 my colleague suggests the same option in the case of someone convicted of piracy. In motion No. 18 it is suggested that the option be open to a person who is guilty of either first degree murder or second degree murder. This is something I wish to go into more fully. I see that my colleague is in the House and perhaps he might be prepared to accept an amendment with regard to motion No. 18.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, motion No. 38 deals with a subject about which I think all of us in the House are undoubtedly concerned, that is, assuming the death penalty should continue would it be wise to choose a different form of execution than hanging. I think I am fairly safe in saying that virtually all members of the House would be sympathetic to a more humane method of execution than hanging.

I mention this because I think that unfortunately when we deal with this very serious question of life and death, and whether or not capital punishment should continue, people become overly emotional about the form of execution. In a sense I think abolitionists often play up this emotion and make the noose virtually a symbol of capital punishment. That is why, if I may, I should like to say first of all that I support the position of my colleague in respect of motion No. 38 without any question.

I believe that if the death penalty is to continue in this country it would be wise to change the method of execution and, as my colleague suggests, let it be set by the governor in council through regulation. This is not a unique suggestion. My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan), indicated that under the National Defence Act the death penalty is prescribed in certain cases. I should like to direct the attention of the House to section 175 of the National Defence Act. It states:

> The execution of a punishment of death under this Act, whether the sentence was passed in Canada or elsewhere, shall be as prescribed by regulations made by the Governor in Council, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the regulations may make provision for . . .

Then the custody and treatment of the person under sentence in that case are specifically set out. In short, motion No. 38 suggests that in the Criminal Code we should have the same provisions with regard to the method of execution as now exist in the National Defence Act.

Perhaps I might go back and touch in order again the motions to which I have referred. The reason I have drawn the attention of the House to the clauses dealt with in these motions, particularly motion No. 4 and motion No. 9, is that I believe it is important that we honestly realize that the bill before us, Bill C-84, is not an abolitionist bill. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important to emphasize this because in effect I think there has been a misrepresentation in this regard to the House and certainly to the Canadian public.

I should like to draw attention to the speech given at second reading by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in support of Bill C-84. At page 13088 of Hansard for May 3, 1976, the Solicitor General said:

> . . . if we attack this question objectively, then we must, from a logical, ethical and public policy point of view, conclude that capital punishment must be abolished once and for all.

At the conclusion of the minister's speech as recorded at page 13091, he stated:

> When we examine the question objectively, and when we study the evidence closely, logically, and with an open mind, then the conclusion we must reach, if we are to discharge our responsibility to the Canadian people as legislators of sound and effective laws, is that capital punishment must be abolished in Canada now, and that this bill should be passed.

I suggest that many people who have voted on this bill that is before us took the minister's words literally, and voted believing they were voting for Canada to become an abolitionist state. They had every reason to believe that was the case. Did the minister point out that while he proposes abolition there are already in existence in the National Defence Act, so far as I can make out, 36 separate offences which call for the death penalty if someone is convicted? When we look at some of these offences I would say that we would become the laughing stock of the nation in that we pretend on the one hand that we are an abolitionist nation, that by passing this bill somehow capital punishment is rubbed out totally, when on the other hand there are 36 other offences for which the dealth penalty is still the prescribed punishment.

Let us look at some of the things one could be executed for in this country and that the Solicitor General is doing nothing about. I would refer hon. members to section 65(h) of the National Defence Act. It states:

Every person who

(h) when acting as sentry or lookout, leaves his post before he is regularly relieved or sleeps or is drunk; is guilty of an offence and on conviction, if he acted traitorously, shall suffer death . . .

Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, it is well that that provision does not apply to this House. Again subsection (g) states that every person who improperly occasions false alarms is guilty of an offence and on conviction, if he acted traitorously, shall suffer death. Subsection (f) states that every person who, without authority, alters or interferes with any identification or other signal is guilty of an offence and on conviction, if he acted traitorously, shall suffer death. I could go on to cite the other 33 offences that are covered by this section of the act relating to the death penalty, but I would only be substantiating the point I am making.

I believe that in asking that this bill be passed the minister misrepresented the facts in the way I have indicated in order to win support. I would ask members to reconsider their position. If they, in sincerity, were hoping that this nation would become totally abolitionist, that is not the result of this legislation.

I should like to return now to more specific comments in respect of the motions before us. As I have stated, motion No. 4 deals with treason. While I am generally sympathetic with my colleague's proposal I should like to ask him—and if he is in the House he might reply to my question—whether he has thought of the possibility, if in the case of treason we gave the option of imprisonment for life or a sentence of death, there would be the danger or the possibility, particularly if we were dealing with some type of terrorist, that that person would opt for death feeling that somehow he might become a hero if he died in the name of whatever cause he was trying to support? We should consider that possibility in respect of the suggestion the hon. member makes here.

I would also like to mention, with respect to both motions Nos. 4 and 9 as they read at present, that in my understanding the person would have this option after conviction. He will have gone through the judicial process and presumably the jury would have found him guilty. If I read these two suggested motions correctly, presumably the judge would turn to the convicted person and ask "Do you wish me to prescribe the sentence of imprisonment for life or death?" In that connection I would ask the hon. member if he thinks that is the proper time at which the option should be put to the person charged?

Would it not be better—and I am not saying it is—to have the charged man asked whether he wishes to have his eventual sentence be imprisonment for life or death at the time when the trial is initiated? At that point I think all concerned, the jury, the judge, and the courts of appeal, know that they have either a case which will result in imprisonment for life or in death. That would be the more significant time at which to give the option to the charged person rather than after his conviction. I say that because I would hate to see the House pass a measure which would inadvertently be like euthanasia.

It may well be that after a person is convicted he would ask for the death penalty because he is in a state of depression or despair, but then upon reflection he would ask for life imprisonment. On the other hand, I think the person charged could weigh the two alternatives more objectively, with the advantage of counsel, at the time of the initial trial rather than waiting until he is convicted.

If I may, I should like to comment on motion No. 18, and again put a question to my colleague. As I read it, the present wording would affect not only first degree murderers but also second degree murderers. I wonder if my colleague would consider a subamendment which would make it clear that only in the case of first degree murderers this option would be given, and that those who are guilty or convicted of second degree murder would have no opportunity to opt for the death penalty as opposed to imprisonment for life. I say that because if we read the full section—and a clear distinction is made between the two types of murder—we would find it rather inconsistent to have both first and second degree murder treated the same so far as the suggested option is concerned.

The wording that I had in mind would be at the beginning of subclause (b). We would insert the words, "in the case of first degree murder" so that it would read: "In the case of first degree murder for a second offence, be sentenced to imprisonment for life or, if the convicted person so chooses, be sentenced to death".

I believe the motions that have been put before us are particularly helpful. I hope that others will join in the debate on these motions because I was frankly disappointed at the rather preemptory treatment given the bill in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Those who were present at the committee meetings know that the first step of the government after expediting the bill to the committee was to say that we would hear no witnesses other than the minister himself, which I think is totally inconsistent with a bill that is so controversial and with measures to which I would say 80 per cent of the Canadian public object. First the government says it will refer the bill to committee for full study, and then right off the bat government members use their voting majority to require that no witnesses be asked to appear before the committee. I say this was most unfortunate.

Again that majority was used to terminate the deliberations of the committee, and that is why the committee reported on Monday of this week. I believe that that is one reason why those who are concerned about this measure and those who feel that the bill, not only in its intent but also in its specific provisions as these amendments would alter it, is inadequate, have no alternative but to speak now at the report stage in the House and make their anxiety felt. In that connection I think there is considerable questioning among the public as to why various members have voted in the House in the way they have. I hope that during the report stage, and certainly at the third reading stage of this bill, members who, for some reason or other, have confused their constituents as to their voting pattern would try to put on the record why they happened to vote in the way they did or, to put it mildly, have voted in such a way as to create great surprise among those who elected them in the last election to sit in the House.

I notice the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) is in the House today. I read an article in the Hamilton Spectator which referred to the hon. member and mentioned that the hon. member sent a letter to a constituent in which he stated:

I do believe that criminals convicted of the murder of policemen should receive the maximum penalty which is capital punishment.

The article implies that many people are now questioning why that hon. member happened to vote for abolition in support of the government bill. I believe that is an example—

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I am rather shocked that the hon. member, like the reporter, is reading my mail of one and a half years ago written at a time when I returned from the funeral of two policemen in Moncton and pointed out to my constituent that I supported the law as it existed. As the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) could tell you, I have lived that way since I was eight years old. I have always been a law abiding citizen and an abolitionist, but if the retentionists carry the vote and that becomes the law, I will certainly support the law. I resent that being brought up by the hon. member, who should be more intelligent.

Mr. Kaplan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stevens: At the conclusion of my remarks I will be very pleased to hear the hon. member's question and to answer it.

Mr. MacFarlane: The reporter withdrew; why don't you?

Mr. Stevens: I am pleased the hon. member has tried to clarify the article which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator. May I mention that the other quote appears in the same article. When the hon. member was questioned as to why he had taken the action he had, his answer was:

I had only been in parliament at that time (at the time of the letter) for six weeks. I was very new at the game.

Mr. MacFarlane: I think the hon. member should be extremely careful when quoting parts of a conversation which he did not hear himself. The reporter was not able to give me the name of the party whose letter he had, but since he had the date, I was able to go back in my files and discover that it was indeed January 22, 1975, we were talking about, and not January of this year.

● (1600)

In addition to that, the remark of the hon. member at the end referred to something I said about having written a letter when I had been in parliament only six weeks. It had nothing to do with my purposes, decisions, or anything else. I think the hon. member is complicating the matter further. I do not want to be as rude or as evasive as he is being by making accusations, but I think it is quite improper for a person who comes from a strange town a great distance away, after reading a strange newspaper, to make comments about a strange writer and a strange letter he has not seen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would like to say to the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) that his point is not a point of order or a question of privilege, but a personal disagreement, and I would suggest that we get back to the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stevens: I know that there are many who wish to speak this afternoon, and I will simply conclude my remarks—

An hon. Member: You have.

Mr. Stevens: —by stating that I would be pleased to hear from my colleague with regard to the three questions I raised concerning motions Nos. 4, 9 and 18, and perhaps if it is in order, after the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) puts his question to me, my colleague could be given the opportunity to answer the three questions I raised during the course of my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Due to the fact that the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) has already spoken in this debate, he needs unanimous consent to answer the questions. Does the hon. member for Oxford have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): He will follow the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Kaplan).

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggested that certain prisoners who have committed serious crimes ought to be given the choice of life imprisonment or capital punishment. I could hardly believe what I heard when he said that, and I want to ask him if he does not consider that a form of suicide and the kind of immorality which should not be condoned by the laws of Canada.

Mr. Stevens: I believe if the hon. member had heard my remarks in full he would know that that question was raised, and I said in reviewing the motions of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), which provide for this alternative option in the case of persons convicted of various offences such as treason, piracy, and first and second degree murder that the timing of the option is most important. If a person has that option at the initiation of his trial, I think that is much more removed from any suggestion of a suicidal type of state enforced approach than if the option is taken at the time of conviction when the person is in a state of depression or despair. Perhaps at that low point the prisoner might say that he would rather be put to death than be sentenced to life imprisonment. That was really the point I was making, and that is the basis of one of my questions to the mover of the motion. Just what is his attitude with regard to the timing of this option? Should the option be at the beginning of the trial, or should it be operative at the conclusion of the trial when the man is convicted?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the hon. member for Oxford going to answer the questions now?

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer them now if that is your pleasure.

I appreciate the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), brought these three questions before the House because they are indeed significant. In attempting to answer those three questions I should first state very succinctly what my two objectives are in moving this amendment. The first objective is to provide a form of protection for the public against second offenders, those who commit treason and those who commit piracy. The House might wish to add to those. My second reason for moving this amendment is to provide some form of punishment which is adequate for the protection of society and which at the same time is as humane as possible. It was with that in mind that I chose to offer as an alternative death by some means other than hanging, at the choice of the convicted person. That is my prelude in answer to the three questions.

The first question related to the matter of punishment for treason, and the hon. member for York-Simcoe raised the question as to whether a hero complex or a martyrdom complex might be produced. I accept the fact that this might happen, but I submit that if in fact the people of Canada, as appears to be the case, by a majority favour capital punishment, I cannot think that that same majority would look upon this as an endeavour on the part of a criminal to be a martyr because the people think that that should be the natural course of events anyway.

On the second point regarding the timing of the option a criminal has for deciding whether he wishes imprisonment for the balance of his natural life or death, I introduced this part of the amendment for the simple reason that I thought this was a humane option to offer. I recognize the fact that there are many ways this could be presented, and I welcome suggestions from hon. members as to how this might be put into action. I commend the hon. member for York-Simcoe for making this suggestion.

The hon. member suggested that possibly the prisoner could make his election before his trial. An alternative would be that he might make the election after the trial, and I think there should be provision to allow him to review the matter years later. I will leave that to hon. members to consider because each alternative has some merit, and none of them should be turned down out of hand.

The third question raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe related to—if I recall his question correctly, and perhaps he will correct me if I am wrong—the intent of motion No. 18, having to do with second offences. It was my intention in the wording of this, with the help I had from legal authorities, to have this apply to second offenders, whether they be second offenders for first degree murder or second degree murder. I hope that answers the questions of the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, those hon. members who we like to think grace and distinguish the fifth row on this side have a great spirit of camaraderie. Indeed there is some solidarity among us, but unlike some other sections of the House we do not allow our camaraderie or our closeness to overcome legitimate differences of opinion. I have great respect for the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) and his colleague on this occasion, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) and their views. I have considered the speeches both hon. members made in support of the thrust of this set of amendments, which I describe as death by choice. That would be the simple way I would refer to the basic intent of motion No. 4, which governs the thinking behind all the motions we are now considering.

Because I feel that a very important principle has entered into the debate, I feel that I would be remiss in doing my own duty not to make some comments with regard to death by choice. I thought the presentations both hon. members made reflected the deep sense of humanity and concern they bring to this issue. With respect to them, I feel at this point need to distinguish between the right of the state to take life and the right of the individual to take his own life, or to give instructions for his own life to be taken.

Let me put it this way. There is an important distinction to be made. I want my comments on these motions to be focused as sharply as possible so that the distinction between the right of the state to take life and the right of the individual to take his life should not be lost sight of or obscured by consideration of related issues.

Although the hon. member for Oxford did not spell it out in precise terms, I felt that his message, or rationale, was that the state did not have the right to take life, or that it should be of such restricted limitation as not to apply to the bill before the House. I suggest that the thrust of debate on Bill C-84, whether one is a retentionist or abolitionist, has been with respect to the usefulness of capital punishment as a deterrent. I understand that not many of us question the actual right of the state to take the life of a convicted criminal. Surely there cannot be any theological or moral argument to support the claim that the state has not the right to take that life. In this tortuous debate we are considering whether the state ought to exercise its right, and whether by so doing it would prevent crime or cure the escalation of crime about which members on all sides are concerned. I am dwelling on this point because I want to make it clear that I judge that the state possesses the right to take the life of a criminal convicted of capital murder.

I turn now to the right of the individual to take a life, including his own. The moral base underlying our thinking, thinking directed toward the common good of society, is that each individual has the right to life. That argument has been widely used in the abortion issue, but I will not go down that alley. I only say that the individual has the right to life, but an individual does not have the right to terminate his own life.

This leads us to the question of euthanasia, a question on which the hon. member for Oxford touched last night. Although the hon. member did not declare himself as a proponent of euthanasia, and I am sure he is not considering positive euthanasia, that is to say, steps taken to end a patient's life, he left the impression that because of his humanitarian concern for suffering it is his view that a person may wish to take his own life. I interpreted the hon. member as saying that a criminal who faces 25 years in jail for murder, or the remainder of his life in jail for a second murder, should be allowed to terminate his own life by transferring the right to his own life to the state or to the representative of the state who would actually carry out the deed. The state would then end the life of that individual.

No matter how you look at it, you are considering an individual's surrender of his right to life; or, putting it more explicity, you are considering allowing an individual to end his own life. No matter how humanitarian the motive for allowing this might be, I have great reservations about the wisdom of bringing such a provision into the Canadian law. If such a motion were adopted as part of the bill and written into law, that first step which would allow an individual to take his own life would no doubt be followed by other, similar steps. One hon. member referred to this process as a kind of legalized suicide. I am most concerned about such legalized suicide. I am most concerned about the euthanasia aspect of the motion.

If this motion were included in the law, it would not be long before other groups would come to this House claiming for humanitarian reasons that euthanasia is a logical step forward for our society. All of us know of people who endure great suffering during their terminal illness, and they or their families, with the best of motives, want to end it all. I have no doubt at all that no matter what we decide with respect to this motion, before long this House will be asked to decide whether enthanasia shall become part of our law. The publicity surrounding the Karen Quinlan case in the United States is one illustration of the intensity of people's feelings on this subject. Several legislative assemblies in the United States have provided for the enactment of what is called the living will. Under such provision, a person may say in his will that if he reaches a certain point in illness, he gives permission for his own life to be taken.

There is no doubt in my mind that many people in society think euthanasia would be a step forward. I will not indulge in any deeper consideration of euthanasia, because I think I have illustrated how accepting motion No. 4 could open the door to euthanasia.

I will close on this note. The moral base of human life is extremely complicated. It will become much more complicated because of the distinctions that have to be made between positive euthanasia and negative euthanasia. Surely we as legislators would not want to be in the position of holding physicians accountable for the maintenance of an artificial life support system merely to keep a person alive when there is a natural decline and where a person should be able to go with dignity through the physical motions leading to death.

I am sure the hon. member for Oxford and other members have encountered situations whereby the artificial prolongation of life under the guise of humanity has been harmful to the patient. Therefore a distinction has to be made between negative and positive euthanasia; negative euthanasia being not doing something that artificially prolongs a life, which in my judgment is permissible and ought to be within the domain of physicians to decide, positive euthanasia the taking of a deliberate step to end a person's life.

I am using the illustration of negative and positive euthanasia to show the complexity of the morality involved. Taking motion No. 4 and allowing death by choice to become part of our law would be a dangerous step. It would be dangerous in writing the law of this country to create that precedent whereby an individual would be given the legal right to end his life when in fact he does not have the moral right to do so.

That is the thrust of my argument in trying to make the distinction between the right of the state to take a life, a right that I maintain the state has, as against the right of an individual, and I maintain the individual does not have that right.

The other parts of these several motions deal with life imprisonment for a second offence, treason, piracy and other heinous crimes. In deciding the validity of that side of the hon. member's set of motions, that brings us back to our fundamental reason for voting the way we did on second reading. During the report stage as well as on third reading each of us will have to consider whether we believe that at this moment the right of the state to take the life of a convicted murderer ought to be maintained.

The more I have reflected on this question in the agonizing way that I and other members of this House have done, the more I have maintained my conclusion that the state ought to maintain that right. It ought to maintain it at this moment in our history because of the prematurity for total abolition.

It is to be regretted that such a serious subject such as this is being rushed through the House and the Committee in such a heavy handed fashion. The manner in which the subject of abolition is being dealt with does not do parliament credit. It cuts to the core of our feelings about life itself, safety in society, and the escalating crime rate. All of those things should have been recognized by the government as being far more important than rushing this through in order that it will not have to face up to the existing law. I will not continue on that line of argument. I advanced it on second reading. If circumstances arise, I will advance it again on third reading.

I conclude by saying that we are facing a most difficult situation as we go through many of these amendments. I appeal to all members to look beyond the immediacy of the motions before us and see how they truly enter into our own well considered interpretation of the validity of the bill and the wisdom of the government in maintaining the right of capital punishment at this moment in our history.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments in connection with the amendments proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). He is to be congratulated on the presentation that he made to this House on his motions yesterday. The motions were well thought out.

I realize that the hon. member is an abolitionist. It must have involved some considerable soul searching on his part to bring forth these amendments. However, Mr. Speaker, he is a concerned individual. He is concerned about the safety of citizens in this country as well as the safety of police and prison guards. I am not satisfied that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the government are concerned about the safety of this country.

I note with considerable interest some remarks that the Solicitor General is reported to have made to the John Howard Society in Ottawa on April 8 last. It is my understanding that he was asked whether the 25 year prison term was too harsh. Apparently his reply was to the effect that the object of the exercise was first to obtain the abolishment of capital punishment by providing the alternative of a life sentence, and the authorities would then work toward the reduction of that sentence once abolition had been achieved.

Mr. Allmand: That is not true.

Mr. Neil: I hope that after I have completed my remarks the Solicitor General will rise on a point of order or question of privilege to clarify his position.

Mr. Allmand: I will send you a copy of the speech.

Mr. Neil: I would welcome a copy of the speech.

● (1630)

I should also like to quote briefly from a report in the Hamilton Spectator of remarks made by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane). I assume it was after second reading of the bill that the hon. member was reported as saying:

> Now that we've passed this bill we can move on to produce a more effective law and order bill.

It seems that if those remarks that are attributed to both these individuals are correct, the Solicitor General and the government have been less than honest with the citizens of Canada. I think it is important that, if the Solicitor General has a plan to bring in amendments to the Criminal Code some time after this bill passes, he should make this information available to this House and the public.

I am a retentionist; I voted for retention in 1973, I voted for it again on second reading of this bill a short time ago, but I have no hesitation in supporting these amendments of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). From observing the vote that took place on second reading, while it was proclaimed to be a free vote, I realize it certainly was not a free vote on the other side of the House. There is no doubt in my mind that the same situation will exist when we reach third reading stage, and that the bill will probably pass. For that reason I think it is important that we make whatever improvements we can to this bill, and I see the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Oxford in that light. I shall vote for these amendments but, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the bill.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) and I should like to compliment him on his presentation. He had the opportunity of travelling to various penitentiaries in Canada with a committee which observed at first hand the conditions that exist in the institutions, and he tabled a report afterwards. Two other reports were also tabled, one by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), who unfortunately is not with us to participate in the debate on capital punishment, but I should like to quote briefly from her report which began:

> It has been said time and again in the past that it was very difficult to "experience" the true climate of a penitentiary and understand all the pressures that seem to exist there.

Later she said:

> During the 15 visits we made to the various penitentiaries across the nation, we could not help but notice the great lack of activity that exists in nearly all of these institutions.

And further:

> Yet evidence that has been collected points to the fact that this inactivity and idleness are a constant problem and lie at the root of all penitentiary discontent and dissatisfaction.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was also a member of the committee that toured the penitentiaries, and he had this to say:

> Though the committee travelled a great deal and discussed prison problems with a great many inmates, both staff and lay people, it is almost impossible to develop any kind of consensus about the obvious malaise in the system.

His report finished as follows:

> I would like to go on record as saying I am most unhappy with what we found generally. We continue to operate maximum security institutions that are a disgrace to any civilized country and the continuing excuses that we haven't got the land, we haven't got the money to replace these archaic dungeons such as Prince Albert and the B.C. Penitentiary, are just no longer acceptable.

What these reports point out, and what the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth was pointing out, is that penitentiaries are inhumane; that the individuals who are confined to them for a long period of time become vegetables, people who are almost impossible to deal with. Yet these people who are sent to prison for a long period of time are people who have committed the most heinous crime of murder and, in my opinion, are deserving of capital punishment, but to the mind of the hon. member for Oxford deserve life imprisonment with the option he proposes.

It has been suggested that to allow the individual who has been sentenced to life imprisonment the option of asking the state to take his life is in fact suicide. I disagree with that, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe that this option is in fact suicide. Suicide is the taking of one's own life. There is no question that the state has the right to take life under certain circumstances. Under these amendments the individual would not be taking his own life; he would be asking the state to take his life.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): A great distinction!

Mr. Neil: A life that he has forfeited by committing murder. Mr. Speaker, to me this is not suicide. I do not see either how such an amendment can lead to euthanasia.

Mr. Cafik: It is a subtle distinction not worth making.

Mr. Neil: Euthanasia is a different situation entirely; it involves taking the life of an innocent person. In the case of euthanasia I am certain there would be a long drawn out debate in this House, much longer than the debate that has taken place on capital punishment over the years. I do not agree with the argument of the previous speaker that by passing these particular motions we would be opening the door to euthanasia.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief comment on motion No. 38 which provides that the governor in council may by regulation establish a means other than hanging to effect or carry out the death penalty. It is unfortunate that during this debate and prior to the bill coming into the House the media used the symbol of the rope to try to encourage people to oppose the death penalty.

Retentionists, in the majority, are not asking that the death penalty be carried out by use of the rope. People are more humane than that. There are many, many ways that the death penalty could be effected in this day and age. It could be carried out by the administration of a drug or a rapid-acting poison in the food in some manner so that the individual would not know what had taken place. This is an amendment that all retentionists support, I think, and one that many abolitionists in the House should support, along with the other motions presented by the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Stanbury: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Neil: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanbury: I asked the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) this same question. In expressing support for the death by choice, or suicide on demand, option, is the hon. member who has just spoken indicating that he would support the bill if that amendment were accepted by the House?

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question in the course of my speech. I indicated that I was a retentionist and I was concerned about the fact that the vote on third reading might go a certain way. I would therefore support this motion for the specific purpose of improving this particular bill. But having supported the motion and voted for it when it comes before the House for decision, I will vote against the bill regardless.

Mr. Stanbury: Then would the hon. member explain to the House how this option or choice would be operative if his preference is carried out and the bill is defeated? How could a convicted murderer who has been executed have the choice that the hon. member wants to give him?

Mr. Neil: I do not quite follow the hon. member's question. Is it that the person who had been executed would have the choice?

Mr. Stanbury: If I understand the hon. member who has just spoken correctly, he expresses support for the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Oxford that provides that a person convicted of murder may have the choice of either hanging or not hanging, or being poisoned or not poisoned, or being put away quietly or not. I wonder how, if the bill is defeated and capital punishment is imposed, this option would be available to convicted murderers who, under those circumstances, would have been executed.

Mr. Neil: I would hope that if the bill is defeated the government would bring in an amendment to the Criminal Code to provide a more humane method of execution.

Mr. Stanbury: I asked about the exercise of the option that the hon. member seems to support.

Mr. Neil: I support the motion which gives the option to the individual which presumably, if the motion passes and the bill passes, will be effective. If the bill does not pass, of course we are back to the old situation where there is capital punishment in the case of murders of policemen, prison guards, and prison officials. As I say, I hope if we do go back to the old system the government will see fit to bring in an amendment to change the method of capital punishment.

Mr. Stanbury: Then I take it that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I find it difficult to allow an interrogation of a speaker. Hon. members have the chance of getting together and I am sure they can do so outside the House.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I will just take a few minutes of the House's time to say a few words on this particular set of amendments. First of all, I hope there is not one member of the House of Commons who does not admire the sincerity and conscientiousness of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), a medical doctor, in bringing forward this particular set of amendments. Certainly there should be no question or any nit-picking or quibbling with respect to the intention and the purpose behind the hon. member's amendments.

In case there is any member from Scarborough here today who may want to question me about my statements of support for the amendments, let me say quite bluntly that I had hoped that this whole bill would never be brought before the House. I had hoped we would not have to go through the exercise we are now going through, simply because I relied upon the undertaking and promise of the government made in 1973 that we would have another six year period of trial to see what effect the current law, had it been enforced, would have had in respect to criminal statistics in this country.

My purpose in speaking this afternoon is to indicate my support for these amendments. However, I have of course a qualification or condition in respect to my support. I hope that the bill is defeated, if not in its entirety certainly in some of the more critical and crucial clauses that are being dealt with on report stage. If that is not to be, then I wholeheartedly support the amendments put forward in such a sincere and conscientious manner by the hon. member for Oxford. I must admit that in saying this I think this is a second best approach, but nevertheless it is a better approach than anything I have yet heard from any member on the government side in regard to this question. This is why I am indicating my support for the amendments this afternoon. I do not intend to go through each one of them line by line; I think that has been properly done.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will not rule me out of order if I refer to one matter which was in order when the hon. member who moved these amendments spoke, and this is the question of compensation for the dependants of the victims of homicide. When the Solicitor General spoke, both in committee and in the House, he attempted to brush off this problem. First of all he said that the matter of compensation was not really a matter he had anything to do with because it more properly came under the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford); and in any event even the Minister of Justice did not have that much to do with it because it was a matter of provincial responsibility.

Unfortunately it is a matter of provincial responsibility. I think that if the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice, and for that matter the whole of the ministry, got off their apathy some changes could be made in this regard. I think that the whole question of compensation for the victims of crime, especially compensation for the dependants of those who are murdered in this country, is a subject that should be discussed here at the national level.

I give the federal government some commendation in this matter since a slight contribution has been made by the government in respect to various provincial criminal injury compensation plans that exist across the country. I must say to you though, Sir, that the federal government had to be forced into taking that position. It was the provincial government of Ontario which in 1967 first came along with a compensation plan for the victims of crime and showed the way. They pioneered this field in this country, and it was only later, when the then federal government saw the wisdom of such a compensation plan, that the government got into it and changed a number of the then provincial statutes in this country to try to bring about more uniformity—I am not arguing with it—across the country for compensation for criminal injuries.

I think we would all agree that the various compensation plans which exist, administered at the provincial level and mainly paid for out of provincial taxpayers' funds, are simply not sufficient. I think this should be tied in with this whole package of Bill C-83 and Bill C-84, peace and security and capital punishment. If there is to be a package point of view, an over-view or a global view by the government in respect of this matter, one of the things it should address its mind to is the whole question of compensation to the dependants of murder victims. This really should be a federal responsibility. It is a very onerous financial yoke on the shoulders of the various provincial governments across the country, and the whole matter should really be handled by the federal government.

Certainly in most of the provinces there is now compensation for the dependants of murder victims, but this is a pretty piddling effort on the part of governments, provincial and federal. Because we are here dealing with a capital punishment provision and amendments to the Criminal Code, I must merely say to this particular minister that with his jurisdiction in respect of the Criminal Code and law enforcement agencies I do not see how he can escape or evade his responsibilities by not getting into this field as well, and at least exerting some pressure on his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), so that this matter can be clarified and, hopefully, taken over by the federal government. At the very least the ratio of federal grants or contributions to the various provincial funds should be drastically increased.

I merely point out to hon. members that I have not been an advocate of capital punishment in this country based solely on economic grounds; by no means. I merely say this to you, that we are talking here about substituting life imprisonment, 25-year prison terms or 15-year prison terms, for capital punishment. I merely ask members of this House who are here this afternoon whether they have thought of the cost to the taxpayers that such prison terms entail? Are we really not crossing something somewhere along the line, and are we not being misguided in our efforts when we suggest the expending of huge amounts of taxpayers' funds looking after those who commit the crimes, when we contribute darn little to the dependants of the victims of those crimes?

I merely suggest that, if we want to get down to a dollars and cents approach, which I admit is not necessarily the right one, as hon. members vote in respect of these particular amendments and this bill in its entirety they should do just one thing—compare what it costs the taxpayers of this country to house and look after those who commit these crimes with what the government contributes in relation to compensation to the dependants of the victims of those very same crimes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to an order made yesterday, Tuesday, June 29, 1976, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. At the same time the divisions on motions Nos. 9, 18 and 38 stand deferred.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Those of us who have attempted to propose amendments at the report stage of this bill have been very appreciative of the hard work, the long hours, and the great efforts of the gentlemen at the Table as well as of the parliamentary counsel and other draftsmen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I must admit that motion No. 35, standing in my name, which I first submitted to the parliamentary draftsmen for submission to this House as an amendment at report stage, somehow or other got lost in the shuffle. At a very late hour yesterday morning, before the 12 noon deadline, I realized it had not been reprinted in the Order Paper. I therefore got after the parliamentary counsel who very hurriedly got to work and redrafted the matter, and it appears now as motion No. 35 standing in my name. On sober second thought the parliamentary draftsmen contacted me. As a result I find that the amendment is a bit long. There are parts of it which are quite redundant and unnecessary and should not be included, in the draftsmen's point of view. As well, there should be three small lines at the very beginning in relation to the heading. In no way does this change the operative words. With your permission, Sir, and with the unanimous consent of the House, I would seek to amend my motion No. 35 so that it would read:

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by (a) adding immediately after line 17 at page 8 the following new clause 21:

"21. The heading preceding section 669 and section 669 of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'Sentence of Death

669. The sentence to be pronounced against a person who is sentenced to death shall be that he shall be executed by drug or gas for euthanasia'."

As you will see, that deletes three paragraphs in respect of the matter and adds three inconsequential lines at the very beginning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). In looking at the suggested change it appears it is not a change in the substance of the amendment, but is merely putting things into order, and making the amendment much easier to fit into the bill. Is it agreed that the correction be made?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not object to the hon. member's request to reword his motion. After all, he did file it originally in time. However, I wonder if he does not mean "after line 18" instead of "after line 17"? But I rise mainly to re-assert the caveat I entered earlier today, namely that I should like to raise a point of order about Motion No. 35 as a whole. As for changing its wording in the Order Paper, I certainly give consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This means it would be after line 17 which comprises the words "in a probation order".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It should be after line 18.

Mr. Lawrence: It should be added immediately after line 18 on page 8. The hon. member is perfectly correct. I cannot count and the draftsman cannot count. That is the problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so agreed that the changes will be made accordingly.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Motion No. 7.

Mr. Sharp: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that some of the members who would want to participate in the debate on this item and any others that might be called today would like to leave this afternoon. I feel members of the House would be very happy to accommodate them. We hope this is an example of the co-operation we will have in the future. Therefore, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council that we should call it six o'clock with unanimous consent at this time. I do so call it six o'clock and wish everyone in this House a very long, restful, and enjoyable weekend on the occasion of our national holiday.

This House stands adjourned until next Monday at 2 p.m.

At 5.03 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTION CANADA ALLOW TAIWAN TO PARTICIPATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that on May 21, 1969 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a letter to the International Olympic Committee in support of Montreal's bid for the 1976 Summer Olympic Games, accepted on behalf of all Canadians, the responsibility of hosting the 1976 Summer Olympic Games in that city in accordance with IOC rules and regulations, supported by a further letter on November 28, 1969 from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the fact that Taiwan, as the republic of China, was and continues to be a full-fledged member of the IOC in good standing under its rules and regulations, and since this government, by interfering with normal and regular international Olympic procedures in attempting to break the precedents that have existed unhampered since Adolf Hitler's interference in 1936, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That this House instruct the minister of external affairs to abide by the official letters of support of May 21, 1969 and November 28, 1969 and leave the handling of the rules and regulations, including participation, in the hands of the International Olympic Committee where they rightfully belong.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be introduced in the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF DAIRY POLICY AND IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since a great many dairy cattle have been sent to slaughterhouses in the last few weeks and that dairy producers suffer considerable losses of income owing to the dairy policy now in force since April 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and the whole House, I hope:

That this House give permission to the Standing Committee on Agriculture to meet immediately to consider in depth the dairy policy as well as the import of dairy products.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION CANADA ABIDE BY RULES OF COMMITTEE DESIGNATING PARTICIPATING COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion similar to that proposed by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), and based on a feeling which exists throughout this country. I would move:

That the government of Canada abide by the original agreement made with the International Olympic Committee with respect to the designation by the IOC of countries participating in the Olympics and, in the case at issue, that participants from Taiwan, participate as representatives of the Republic of China National Olympic Committee, thus eliminating the charge by Lord Killanin that the image of the Olympics has been tarnished by Canadian government interference in the designation of who represents what, thus injecting politics into the Olympics.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

POSSIBLE RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT IN VIEW OF CONFLICTING VIEWS ON AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

In view of the comments made during the weekend by the Minister of Communications accusing the government, and I quote:

"of falling on its knees before a bunch of fanatics"

... for having signed an agreement with CALPA and CATCA and also owing to the surprise publicly expressed by the Prime Minister on his return from Puerto Rico about the clause of the agreement promising a free vote in Parliament on the basic issue of bilingualism in the air-ground communications in Quebec, which is a barely veiled denunciation of the conduct of the Minister of Transport, is it to maintain, as he said himself, the cohesion of power that the Prime Minister has asked or intends to ask for the resignation of both the Minister of Communications and the Minister of Transport?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

To follow up on his answer, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he will thus allow his ministers to denounce the decisions of the cabinet of which they are members? In addition, could he expose to the House his own idea of ministerial solidarity?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants me to give him a lecture on political theory one day, I am at his disposal.

POSSIBLE RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS IN VIEW OF CONFLICTING VIEWS ON AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary. I would not have thought the Prime Minister would have taken so easy a sidetrack.

I therefore put my question to the Minister of Communications and ask her whether, in the light of the well known principles of ministerial solidarity the Prime Minister choses to ignore today, she persists in accusing the government of having knelt before a bunch of fanatics? If so, does she intend to resign, thus imitating the courageous gesture of the hon. member for Langelier?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, several of us feel that the agreement is bad, but still the best possible we could conclude under the circumstances.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I said in my statement that we could not denounce collectively what one of our colleagues, in the normal exercise of his duties, had felt he should accept and that, consequently, we are of the opinion, with regard to that agreement, whatever we feel as far as solidarity with our colleague is concerned, that the agreement is not satisfactory in every way. We have to live with an agreement that is not perfect. We remain united behind our colleague who supported the agreement, but I still feel that, faced with a bunch of fanatics, we were forced to accept an agreement that will be difficult to live with, but which in no way calls in question again the policy of bilingualism within the federal government.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S LETTER TO QUEBEC AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an area where calm is required and less inflammation.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport because he, too, has injected an element of confusion into this. In his letter to Les Gens de l'Air he mentions it is only a matter for the commission to "explain why they should disregard" the arguments of CATCA and CALPA. Could the minister explain what he means by taking this anodyne approach especially when in the signed agreement with CATCA and CALPA it is a matter of "justifying beyond a reasonable doubt" why any contrary view expressed by those two organizations should not prevail? To most readers, the words "explain" and "justify beyond reasonable doubt" do not convey the same meaning.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the words used in my letter stand by themselves in terms of explaining how I view the contents of the agreement and, I think, how they are viewed by other participants. If one looks at the practical situation which will face the commission one can have a view of what in fact will be before them which allows those words to be understood. As a practical matter, the time the commission will be asked to judge as to the procedures and their safety is when, at the end of the difficult simulation work, a set of procedures has been devised and Transport Canada is prepared to certify those procedures as safe and ready for implementation. At that point the issue arises as to the judgment of the commission. The agreement deals with the potential argument which may exist then, and this is obviously hypothetical, by the two organizations which would disagree with the view being taken by Transport Canada. I think if members would look either at the letter or the agreement they will see that what is to be expected is a clear and forthright statement which impresses a reader of its import as to why the commission was able to certify safety notwithstanding different arguments. That could be put in one or two different ways. I have now put it in a third way, and I hope the hon. member will be able to understand it.

TIMETABLE FOR SIMULATOR STUDIES IN VIEW OF LACK OF INTEREST BY PARTIES CONCERNED

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In connection with this simulator study, I was wondering whether the minister has a revised timetable and how he can expect it will materialize when one of the interested parties has expressed an unwillingness to co-operate with him.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I have always remained optimistic that in the end we shall have the co-operation of the various parties concerned and I would invite all hon. members to join in that hope, too. The simulation exercise timetable has, without doubt, been affected somewhat by the preoccupation of a variety of people who might otherwise have been engaged in doing the work. This work will now go forward. We are seeking, and we expect, the co-operation of a whole variety of experts and knowledgeable people who can make this work a success as soon as possible.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEASURES TO ENABLE POOR PROVINCES TO MAINTAIN STANDARDS OF HEALTH CARE AND POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning his meeting tomorrow with the ministers of finance of the various provinces. Since the federal government is proposing to replace the existing cost-sharing formula with a new one which will involve cash grants and increased tax points, and since new tax points on their own do not help those provinces with a small tax base, can the hon. gentleman tell us what further measures the federal government intends to take to ensure that the poorer provinces are able to maintain high standards of health care and post-secondary education?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It was in recognition of the variation between the value of tax points in different provinces that we acknowledged that a continued cash payment would have to be made to a number of the provinces, those which, as the hon. member has indicated, do not have a broad tax base. The proposal is on a formula to be agreed upon that both cash and tax points would be made available to the provinces and that there would be an attempt by a transitional formula to bring them to an equal per capita level in the cash payment.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF REVENUE ACCRUING TO PROVINCES UNDER PROPOSAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in respect of any one of the alternative proposals the government has put forward for the provinces to consider, could the minister tell the House whether his department has prepared an estimate on the share of revenue which would have gone to the provinces during the past five years on the assumption that they had implemented one of the proposals that the government is now putting forward for consideration in the future.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some elaborate figures have been prepared which will be made available comparing the range of options from a total cash payment all the way through to a total transfer of tax points. This will be arranged over a period of years. As I say there is an elaborate preparation of figures which will be made available to the provinces.

REASON FOR RELATING PROPOSALS FOR HEALTH AND EDUCATION TO GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, since in all the proposals which are being considered, as I understand it, the federal government is basing its share particularly on financing of post-secondary education and health care on a relationship to the change in the gross national product, I should like to ask the minister, since there does not appear to me to be any connection at all between changing real needs in either education or health care, why the federal government has decided to pin both to changes in the GNP.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is founded first upon a recognition that these are established programs, the performance under which has now matured and is predictable. Examination of the payments, for example over the last five years, would indicate that the transfer to the provinces would average out at something less than the actual increase in the gross national product. The government of course is concerned that its obligations to pay, whether under this program or others, should be predictable and within the over-all cash resources of the government and in that sense, while the payments could reasonably be expected to increase as costs increase throughout the country, they should not by this agreement alone be escalated at an even greater rate. This does not rule out of course the possibility at a subsequent date of the government entering into subsequent negotiations with the provinces for example to add additional provisions in respect of health care which of course would then have to be added on to the arrangements presently being made for the established programs at the present time.

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON FOR RETREAT FROM APPLICATION OF BILINGUALISM TO AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that in the last few days the government had a particular opportunity to give evidence of its firm belief in the bilingualism policy it has been advocating, could the minister explain to the House the cause of that retreat in the application of bilingualism in such an important area as transport which is of interest to ever more Canadians across the country?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made it abundantly clear before, but I am glad to do so again, that we are in no way taking a step away from our plan of bilingualism in our total government services. We indeed remain committed to the view that there is a need to provide bilingual air traffic services in the province of Quebec. We have taken certain specific steps to do so in areas where that could be done. In areas where there is a more complicated situation we were prepared to produce the procedures, having faced the difficulties and complications, and introduce bilingual air traffic service there. It is well known that a good deal of opposition to that movement did exist in certain quarters. That opposition tended to focus on the question of safety.

At all times we stated our view that safety had to be taken into consideration and that indeed we would do so. All we have done now is to re-emphasize, in ways which put beyond any doubt even for the most skeptical, that that is what we will do. But I repeated before the week end, and I repeat again now, that it is our intention, given the development of procedures which we are confident we can develop, to implement air traffic services in both languages in the province of Quebec.

INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS AGAINST APPLICATION OF BILINGUALISM TO AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

Could the minister tell the House whether, in addition to the protests he received from Quebec pilots and air controllers as well as from the provincial government, he in fact received other reasonable and logical protests from various associations of Quebec against that position taken by the federal government?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to determine what communications I have received. Most of the comments I have seen to date have been ones I have observed in the press rather than ones I had directly in my own hand, but I will be looking at these later today.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING VIEWS ON AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with an interview which he gave when he was returning from Puerto Rico. I have to read from the newspaper article in order to base my question. The Prime Minister said:

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Agreements reached by air pilots, air traffic controllers and the government concerning the safety of bilingual air communication mark a victory for bilingualism in Canada.

While flying back, he went on to say that the agreements are: "as total a victory on paper as was needed". His next observation was:

I think the exaggeration and even hysteria which met the government's assertion at the outset had disappeared, otherwise the kind of settlement that we reached would not have been possible.

I ask the Prime Minister whether he changed his mind in view of the fact that apparently he has not been able to convince some of his ministers who have been outspoken. Is he still of the opinion that that agreement was one that achieved a level of bilingualism that caused him to become ecstatic in his statement that it was a victory for Canada? I would ask him to explain the difference between the viewpoint he expressed while unimpeded by divisions in the cabinet and the viewpoint he expressed subsequently and also in the letter of communication to the former minister of the environment.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman explained the context in which the interview was sought by the press on board the plane. He will have to remember that these were opinions which were given, as it were, on the "fly".

Some hon. Members: Fly or sly?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is flying around so much that one wonders whether his flying experience alters his viewpoint. I am simply asking: Is the observation that he made on June 29th that all was well and that these agreements were a great victory for bilingualism, still his view or has he changed this view since he came down to solid earth?

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is very simple. All sides of the House have approved the policy of bilingualism. They support it and they will make sure that the country accepts it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not an answer, that is simply a Machiavellian evasion. Has the Prime Minister of June 29 changed his mind since returning to solid earth in Ottawa, or is he still of the same impression that this was a great victory for bilingualism?

● (1430)

Mr. Trudeau: The House will recall that before the strike was settled, the country was rather unsettled. The opposition in particular was calling for an end to this strike. When the strike was ended, I would say that that was a victory for Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: "For bilingualism" is what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Trudeau: The victory for bilingualism is assured because it has the support of all parties in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman laughed at that statement. I hope he is not denying the fact that his party as well as ours supports the principle of bilingualism everywhere it can be applied.

Mr. Fraser: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Vancouver South has a supplementary. He is bellowing as loudly as he can. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that he will not catch your eye when it comes to the end of my answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The standing orders under which we operate in the question period clearly require that the Chair has to hear at least a preliminary explanation of a point of order before determining whether it must be taken now or at three o'clock. That is the practice the Chair has followed since the implementation of the standing orders.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The loud and raucous interruptions from the government side indicate that I have touched a nerve.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I raise this matter as one who has always been deferential to the Chair without any exception.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a strange coincidence, this is the fourth or fifth time when I have asked more than one supplementary question and that that was the end. Generally—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would be pleased to hear the right hon. gentleman at three o'clock. In fact, he asked two supplementaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OLYMPIC GAMES

REASON CANADA REFUSING ENTRY TO TEAM FROM TAIWAN

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the International Olympic Committee rules, and I quote:

> Free entry must be accorded to teams from all National Olympic Committees recognized by the International Olympic Committee.

The city of Montreal's bid document to the International Olympic Committee of May, 1970, which was accepted by the IOC, stated: "All necessary entry permits will be available to delegations from all the National Olympic Committees" recognized by the International Olympic Committee. This bid was supported by the Prime Minister of Canada, by the prime minister of Quebec and by the then secretary of state for external affairs. In view of these facts I would like to ask the minister if he could explain to this House his government's sudden, unprecedented political interference with regard to the International Olympic Committee, specifically regarding the Taiwanese Olympic team and the government's refusal to allow that team or any other team, for that matter, belonging to the IOC free entry to Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will deal with the first part of the question, namely, an alleged undertaking by the government of Canada to the International Olympic Committee to admit all participants to the games. I believe the basis for that allegation is a letter addressed by my predecessor to the IOC on November 28, 1969. The relevant portion of that brief letter reads as follows:

> I would like to assure you that all parties representing the National Olympic Committees and national sports federations recognized by the IOC will be free to enter Canada pursuant to the normal regulations. I should be pleased to provide any further information respecting these regulations should you desire it.

It is obvious from that literal quotation that the undertaking by the then secretary of state for external affairs was not an unqualified undertaking. At no point in giving such an undertaking did Canada undertake—

Mr. Fraser: That is utter fraud; that is not what the IOC believed.

Mr. MacEachen: —to relinquish its sovereignty to an international organization, no matter how respected that international organization may be.

Further, may I add that we had foreseen for some considerable time the difficulties which would be implied for the IOC and for the government of Canada in dealing with this particular question. We had hoped that the IOC would have taken steps itself to reconcile the difficulties it finds—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —in having as a member of the IOC the Republic of China when the People's Republic of China and all the sports organizations of the People's Republic of China claim that Taiwan is improperly occupying its seat on the IOC. Those difficulties were present. We drew them to the attention of Lord Killanin more than a year ago and have subsequently drawn them to the attention of the officials of the IOC. It was only when no action had been taken by the IOC that we made it clear in late May, through the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, that we would apply a formula for the admission of athletes to Canada which would respect Canada's China policy.

Let us bear in mind that it is possible for the Taiwanese athletes to come to Canada, to be admitted and to participate in the games in precisely the same way they participated in the Olympic Games in 1960 in Rome under conditions and regulations which were approved by the IOC. All we are asking is that they apply the same consideration to Canada which they applied to Italy in 1960.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: I thank the minister for his speech. No matter which way he tries to twist it around, the fact is that the government accepted the Montreal bid and is harming the Olympic idea more than any other organization in the world.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Jelinek: I would like to ask the minister if he does not find it hypocritical to allow Taiwan to compete under one name and not another. In other words, we do not have diplomatic relations with Taiwan; does it make any more sense to allow its athletes to participate as Taiwanese when we do not recognize Taiwan anyway?

Mr. MacEachen: We are attempting to formulate and we have proposed successfully, I believe, a formula which would permit the participation of Taiwanese athletes at the Olympic Games in Montreal. That formula would provide for that and at the same time would respect Canada's China policy. That is what we have put forward. I ask why it is not possible for the IOC to apply precisely the same understanding to Canada which it provided earlier in the case of Italy when Taiwan came to those games and participated as representatives of Taiwan and not as representatives of the Republic of China.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he could clarify the situation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Oh, no! Are you kidding?

An hon. Member: There goes your franchise.

Mr. Jelinek: The Prime Minister is the one who accepted the bid on behalf of all Canadians in this letter. I should like to ask whether he was aware at that time if not by precedents alone, that all decisions relating to the Olympic Games, including participation, is left in the hands of the International Olympic Committee and if he was aware of this fact why did the government not make its position and intentions known to the IOC at that time instead of waiting until the eleventh hour and harming not only Montreal but the whole Olympic ideal? Why the sudden flip-flop?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not have been listening. The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated quite clearly that there was no sudden flip-flop. This problem has been in discussion with the IOC for more than a year. They apparently have not seen fit in one way or another to solve this problem as of yet but they have indicated to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the very obvious answer. It is the one they themselves gave to Italy in 1960. I would be surprised if the other side of the House did not think that an acceptable answer for Italy, one which is known to all parties and which was known to Canada, could not reasonably have been presumed by Canada to be the answer that they would give to Canada. There was no problem as far as we were concerned because it had already been solved 16 years ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASYLUM BY CHILEAN REFUGEES IN ARGENTINA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the news report last night that 27 Chilean exiles who took refuge in the Canadian Embassy in Argentina—as a result of a threat on their lives by right wing terrorists—have asked for political asylum, can the minister advise the House what action, if any, his department is undertaking to grant them this asylum?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation referred to by the hon. member. At the present time Canadian officials are holding discussions with the authorities in Argentina with a view to resolving this particular difficulty. We hope we can produce some results but I am not in a position to go beyond that at the moment.

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY OF CHILEAN EXILES—SUGGESTION NO LEGAL BARRIER BE RAISED

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Will the provisions in Bill C-85, which is now the law, be used to prevent these Chilean exiles from immigrating to Canada even though they have not committed crimes as defined in Canadian law?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take that question as notice and explore the legal implications before giving an answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESCUE OF HOSTAGES BY ISRAEL—POSSIBILITY OF MESSAGE OF CONGRATULATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government sent a message to the government of Israel congratulating that country on the daring rescue of hostages yesterday morning, thereby demonstrating that initiative and courage can successfully defeat terrorism? If so, would the minister announce what the message was?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon.

member, may I say that I have not yet sent a message to the foreign minister of Israel. I did receive a letter from him which was given to me late this morning, and I hope to reply to him as soon as possible. I should like to say in reply to the hon. member that the action taken by Israel in securing the release of the hostages was certainly a remarkable feat, well executed and responded to the widespread concern felt by Canadians that the lives of the hostages be spared. It was the first serious setback of international terrorism and as such will be widely applauded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should add in completing the answer for the hon. member that I understand the matter will be before the Security Council of the United Nations, and it will be possible to study further the implications of these events under international law.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION INVESTIGATION OF ILLEGAL ENTRY INTO QUEBEC NEWSPAPER OFFICE CONDUCTED BY MEMBERS OF FORCE WHO PARTICIPATED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Solicitor General regarding the apparently illegal entry by the RCMP and other police into the premises of the Quebec newspaper L'Agence de presse libre du Québec a matter which concerns many members? Can the Solicitor General confirm reports that Messrs. Don Cobb and Francis (Frank) D'Entrement who have been investigating this apparently illegal break-in were at the relevant time when it occurred responsible, at least in part for its occurrence? If so, is this not a rather startling departure in investigative technique?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter is being investigated by the Quebec solicitor general and his officials, not by the RCMP.

Mr. Trudeau: It is no worse than your private detectives.

KNOWLEDGE OF HEADQUARTERS OF ILLEGAL ENTRY INTO QUEBEC NEWSPAPER OFFICE BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Solicitor General look into the matter again to make certain he is fully briefed, and report whether similar incidents have occurred and whether in fact in this case headquarters knew in advance before this operation occurred?

Mr. Trudeau: How do private detectives proceed?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They work better than yours.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have a report that headquarters was not advised in advance of that raid and I gave that information to the House before.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECEIPT BY CLERK OF PRIVY COUNCIL OF HOUSING SUBSIDY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Could he advise the House whether he has been in contact with the Ontario housing corporation to discuss whether the Clerk of the Privy Council acted in good faith with regard to his receipt of an OHC subsidy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I am satisfied there was good faith in that particular case.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs? Will the minister inform the House if he has sought the advice of the obviously experienced Clerk of the Privy Council with regard to the department's inquiries into land speculation?

An hon. Member: He was in the air, too.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR PEREMPTORY RETURN TO JAPAN OF MR. HAMADA

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises out of the story in Friday's Globe and Mail that brings back some haunting memories of wartime years and Canadian attitudes. Would the minister examine the peremptory treatment accorded to a Mr. Masaya Hamada who arrived in Toronto from Japan with a visitor's visa, a return ticket to Japan and $1,200 in cash but who was returned immediately without a hearing and without legal advice and under threat of deportation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Hamada is a citizen of Japan. He came to Canada from the United States on June 29 and, at an immigration examination, indicated to the interviewing officer that he was coming to join his fiancée to marry her and remain here permanently. It turned out that his fiancée was already married and had not been divorced, therefore that suggestion was impossible to fulfil. Further evidence indicated that he was not in fact a bona fide visitor and under the regulations he was requested to return to Japan.

Mr. Fraser: Why did you not give him legal aid?

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that Mr. Hamada travelled some 10,000 miles to reach Toronto and was returned at his own expense when his expected visit was so abruptly ended, could the office in Tokyo which issued the visa be instructed to warn potential visitors of the treatment that could be theirs on arrival in Canada, considering the extreme difficulties that arise in connection with language, and considering that Mr. Hamada had done nothing illegal and that his papers were in order?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will check and double check this, but I doubt very much if Mr. Hamada was in fact issued a visa in Japan. Had he been issued a visa in Japan he would have been entitled to appeal under the Immigration Appeal Board Act. I would take that as prima facie evidence that he did not in fact have a visa issued in Japan.

PENITENTIARIES

REASON MR. MARCOUX ALLOWED IN HALFWAY HOUSE WHEN AREA RESIDENTS TOLD NO SEX OFFENDERS ALLOWED

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General concerning a murder that took place in British Columbia on the weekend. I wonder if the Solicitor General can tell us why Mr. Marcoux, the man who has been charged with that murder, was allowed to stay in a halfway house when the people in that area had been guaranteed that there would be no people in that house with previous sexual offence records or rape records?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that individual had completed his sentence and was under mandatory supervision. He was not out on parole and therefore we had no control over him. The halfway house in question was a private halfway house.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. The Solicitor General told us that the man had completed his mandatory parole. I understand he does not complete it for a short while yet and that he was still under mandatory parole. Can the Solicitor General tell us whether that individual is under suspicion in two or three other murders that have taken place in the same area?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there was some misunderstanding. I said that he had completed his sentence in prison and was on mandatory supervision. He was not out on parole. I have no information that he is suspected of other offences.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TREATMENT OF ATHLETES FROM TAIWAN ATTENDING OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to tell the House if the athletes from the Republic of China coming to Canada to participate in the Olympics will be accorded exactly the same treatment as athletes coming from other countries in so far as their entry into Canada to participate in the games is concerned?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I missed the last few words of the hon. member's question.

● (1450)

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I asked if the athletes who come to Canada from the Republic of China to participate in the Olympic Games will be accorded exactly the same rights with regard to entry into Canada to participate in the games as athletes from other countries who will be participating in the games.

Mr. MacEachen: Provided they come as representatives of Taiwan, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

FINANCE

NEW MONEY GROWTH TARGETS—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the government has now been successful in restraining the growth in the money supply, that is M-1, to an annual increase of close to 10 per cent, about twice the increase to be found in the United States, and noting that the Governor of the Bank of Canada stated in Fredericton that lower targets will soon be appropriate, can the minister tell the House what these new money growth targets will be and when they will come into effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these would be announced by the Bank of Canada in carrying out its responsibilities for monetary policy. From a conversation with the Governor, I know he has it in contemplation at the moment, but I do not have a precise indication from him as to when he proposes to announce the change.

INFLATIONARY EFFECT OF GROWTH IN PRIVATELY-HELD DEPOSITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): While the government has finally held the growth of currency and demand deposits, M-1, to 10.4 per cent for the year ended May 1976, we note that other measures of money supply, such as currency and privately held deposits, M-2, are increasing at nearly double that rate, about 20 per cent. Can the minister tell the House whether he considers the continued rapid expansion of M-2 or M-3 to be inflationary, and whether he or the Governor propose to set growth targets for these measures of money as well?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Governor has often said that he considers M-1 as the best indicator of growth of the money supply.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN BOARD'S GUIDELINES AND NEGOTIATED SALARY AWARDS—EFFECT ON PERSONNEL OF SCHOOL BOARDS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the guidelines established by the Anti-Inflation Board which generally limit increases in higher incomes to $2,400 per year, applying for example to senior administrative personnel of school boards, and in view of the fact that this limitation does not apply to comparable incomes where increases of up to $5,000 have been negotiated through a collective agreement, such as for secondary school principals, and, further, since this in some cases reverses the historical pattern and differential which has existed between these senior employees of school boards, does the minister agree that this anomalous situation should be rectified?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, provision has been made in the guidelines for an increase above and beyond the arithmetic guidelines in certain cases where a historical relationship has been established. This applies to all parties negotiating under collective bargaining agreements. The hon. member knows, for example, that in the case of a number of Ontario school boards, the Anti-Inflation Board has, on the basis of historical relationship, permitted increases in excess of the guidelines. Under the circumstances, I would accept the judgment of the board which is exercising its authority in that regard.

Mr. Halliday: Since this conflict in the regulations severely disrupts the smooth administrative functioning of large organizations, such as school boards, where levels of position of authority and responsibility carry with them corresponding differentials in remuneration, would the minister agree that it would be appropriate that an application for appeal be made, and could he assure us that the appeal hearing would be granted?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for also giving me notice of the supplementary. The Anti-Inflation Act provides for an appeal procedure now. It would be possible for an interested party to make an application for an order to the administrator and subsequently to the appeals tribunal. In that sense, there would be no impediment to an interested party making such an appeal.

EFFECT OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX ON FARMERS CONSOLIDATING THEIR HOLDINGS BY SELLING CERTAIN PARCELS OF LAND

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister consider it fair and equitable that farmers who wish to sell a distant parcel of land in order to consolidate their farms with closer parcels, must first pay a capital gains tax on the distant sale? Will the minister give consideration to changing that aspect of the capital gains tax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his courtesy in discussing this with me. I, in turn, discussed it with my officials. There are some difficulties of comparison in this regard with respect to selling and repurchasing farm land as compared to selling and repurchasing other kinds of property. At the moment, I have not been able to find an effective means of dealing with this particular situation. However, by the hon. member's question, I have been alerted to the problem. I will attempt to seek a solution that will be equitable to all concerned.

NATIONAL GALLERY

ACQUISITION OF ROOM PAINTED WITH MURALS AT KARSDALE, NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST THAT IT REMAIN IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State who represents the constituency involved. I have given verbal notice to the hon. lady. Because of the public interest aroused in a lately recognized public treasure, the room painted with murals, some over one and a half centuries ago, in Karsdale, Nova Scotia, recently acquired by the National Gallery, may I ask that the National Gallery carry out its intention to restore same and then give a permanent home to the same in the federally owned Habitation at Annapolis Royal where it may be seen by more than 190,000 visitors a year? In other words, I am asking that the National Gallery decentralize a bit.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I appreciate this room is in my constituency. However, a lot of representations have been made to the Secretary of State by private individuals, non-government officials as well as myself. It is the intention of the National Gallery to restore the paintings and bring this display to Ottawa where it will have the proper temperature and humidity in a room devoted to a maritime display. However, the concerns of the local people, as the hon. member will know, have only arisen within the past month, since the National Gallery started to work on the painting. These concerns have been brought to the attention of the National Gallery.

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER OF ENVIRONMENT—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Considering the resignation of the Minister of the Environment and the underrepresentation within cabinet of members from eastern Quebec where the problem of the environment is a major concern, can the Prime Minister clarify the status of this position and tell us whether he is seriously considering the appointment of a member from eastern Canada, particularly from eastern Quebec, to hold this very important position in the Department of the Environment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member knows that under an order in council there is an acting deputy minister and an acting deputy minister to the acting deputy minister. Thus, the position is not vacant now.

FISHERIES

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE ON POLLUTION STANDARDS FOR LOWER FRASER RIVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fisheries). It concerns the lower Fraser River. It was reported last night that negotiations are underway between the federal government and the provincial government concerning pollution standards for the lower Fraser River. If these negotiations are taking place, will the minister advise at what level they are taking place? Are they now active?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, in my temporary responsibility for environment, I have not had a chance to look at the file. I know the minister of the environment for British Columbia and I had an exchange of views some weeks ago, in fact in May, on the question of pollution of the lower Fraser River because of its impact on fisheries. However, I will take the hon. member's question as notice and reply to him later.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the Canada Water Act, Section 16, the minister has authority to enter into an agreement with the provincial government to declare the lower Fraser as a water quality management area. Will the minister advise if the government is proposing that the lower Fraser become a water quality management area so that we can control pollution in co-operation with the provincial government?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the question is too important for me to answer without first checking the facts very carefully.

FINANCE

REASON FOR REFUSAL OF FIFTY AND ONE HUNDRED DOLLAR BILLS BY PARLIAMENTARY CASHIERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance; it concerns the use of $50 and $100 bills in Canada, and I believe it goes to the root of our system of currency. Last July I raised this matter with the then minister of finance when I discovered that certain cashiers on Parliament Hill, along with others in other places of business, were refusing to accept $50 and $100 bills. The minister explained that the design then current was too easy to counterfeit and stated that a new design was to be introduced. In view of the fact that the new bills have now been in circulation for some time, would the hon. gentleman tell us why they are being refused by cashiers on Parliament Hill unless they are accompanied by the signatures and addresses of whoever presents them? In short, I ask the minister to explain how the government expects our system of currency to operate when the House of Commons itself refuses to accept currency which is marked "legal tender"?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I should like to take that question under advisement and consider it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you caught the observation which was made by the Prime Minister following my endeavour to elucidate what he meant when he said certain things which are reported in the Canadian press. One of the great difficulties of being the Speaker is that there appears to be an iron-clad rule that only two supplementary questions can be permitted. A minister can simply evade a question and not answer; he is not required to answer. But, certainly, one of the first rules, and this is so in the mother of parliaments, is that when a minister finds himself in difficulty, that is not the proper time to say: No more questions.

I do not know whether you caught the observation of the Prime Minister when someone rose to ask a question—I do not know whether he was referring to me or to the one who rose to ask a further supplementary question. The Prime Minister said, in effect, Mr. Speaker, I hope you do not recognize him.

I hope you will look into the record, for I feel sure that any observation such as that—and there is no question that it was made—indicates an attitude to parliament and to Your Honour which is contrary to parliamentary practice and responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Order. My recollection of the phrase which was used was that there was another phrase added to it, in other words the hope was expressed that the Chair would not recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South until the Prime Minister had finished his answer. I believe that was the purport of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no need of explanation not in accordance with the facts which apparently the Prime Minister is now prepared to make, as is not an unusual thing for him to do.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, you could, of course, check the blues, but as far as I can quote myself at an hour's distance, the hon. member for Vancouver South was bellowing loudly at me and I suggested that you should not catch his eye, not that he should not catch yours.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 30, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Reynolds: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was just looking at the way in which the motions have been set out. Motion No.7, with which we are dealing today, has already been proposed by one member and the allocation of speaking time is quite clear under Standing Order 75(9). My point is this: where Your Honour has grouped two motions, or three or four motions together, could we get a ruling from you as to what the allocated time would be? For example, the next motions to come before us are, I believe, Nos. 10 and 11 in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and myself. Will we be allowed 40 minutes each to speak on those motions, since they are lumped together? The Standing Order says hon. members will be allowed 20 minutes on an amendment. Will they be allowed 40 minutes because two amendments are being taken together?

Mr. Speaker: The purpose of grouping these motions for discussion is that debate will not be duplicated. The intent of the rule, unless someone can persuade me to the contrary, would have no effect unless the Chair were able to combine similar motions for discussion and thereby limit speeches to one speech per grouping.

Mr. Reynolds: The point I am trying to clear up is this: on the next motions to come before the House, who gets the 40 minutes, the hon. member for Lotbinière, or myself?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We will cross that bridge when we come to it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The question is on motion No. 7, in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That Bill C-84 be amended by deleting clause 2.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, sections 46 and 47 of the Criminal Code presently read as follows:

"46. (1) Every one commits treason who, in Canada,

(a) kills or attempts to kill Her Majesty, or does her any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maims or wounds her, or imprisons or restrains her;

(b) levies war against Canada or does any act preparatory thereto;

(c) assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian Forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are;

(d) uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province;

(e) without lawful authority, communicates or makes available to an agent of a state other than Canada, military or scientific information or any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document of a military or scientific character that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada;

(f) conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d);

(g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d) and manifests that intention by an overt act; or

My right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) brought this aspect to the attention of the House a number of times during the question period before debate on this bill began. Certain incidents which have taken place over the past weekend, in particular the hostage-taking situation which caused the Israelis to go right into Uganda and free a planeload of hostages, strengthen the case that an important item of discussion in this House today should be the deletion of clause 2 of the measure before us. It is my opinion that if we delete this clause from the bill we would, in effect, kill the bill. The government has made it plain that it regards the bill as an abolition bill. If we delete clause 2 we would keep on the record capital punishment for persons who commit high treason.

I could spend many hours talking about the reasons I think we should retain capital punishment. No reason could be plainer than the events of last weekend to reinforce my statement that we in this country should retain capital punishment for high treason. Although I hope this will not be the case, with the Olympics coming up shortly in this country some hostage-taking could occur, as it did in the last Olympics. Hostages were also taken in the Uganda incident last weekend. What protection would we have in this country if hostages were taken at the Montreal Olympics?

I would like to put this very serious question to those members on the other side who are abolitionists and who voted for this bill: If 25 or 30 terrorists were to appear on the scene in Canada, would we want to put them in our jails for 25 years? I would hope not. This is why I think there should be a law on the statute books to put them to death. That is what should happen to anybody who tries to disrupt life in this country in any way.

To underline my argument against life imprisonment for 25 years, there is a man in the British Columbia penitentiary right now who has been well quoted in an article that appeared in the Vancouver Province of June 12 last, Mr. Larry Corbett. He talked about what it is like to be in jail for 25 years. This is what he said:

You know, normally speaking he'd never do that but now he's only going to get one chance. Like when you drop this 25 on a guy and he gets into a position where he can escape, he's not going to get another chance for years. They're going to swallow him up in one of these "penthouses" . . .

Should a prisoner be successful in escaping, he becomes desperate to stay on the loose and this puts the public generally in greater danger than before, Corbett says. If he has a heavy murder term to return to, there isn't much more than can be done to him.

Inside the prisons, Corbett says, there will be a considerable build-up of tensions resulting in more jail killings and suicides.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

"It takes a hell of a lot of self-discipline to walk away from a simple little thing now. But what about when you turn around and there's absolutely no hope of me getting out for 25 years. What good am I even to myself?

"Any initiative I might have is totally lost. So now rather than restraining myself I'll be more aggressive. This guy over here isn't going to restrain himself and he's going to stick it to me. So now the paranoia sets in and you figure well, okay, I've got to get him first."

Other prisoners were interviewed and they all said the same thing. With our penitentiaries filled with people who have been sentenced to 25 years in jail, they will be vicious places to be in. The guards will have a terrible time. I can think of nothing worse than having terrorists convicted of high treason sent to jail for 25 years, with no hope of parole. These are people who will have no allegiance at all to Canada, people who have tried to destroy it. They will be in jail with others who, although they are not sweet roses, are not in prison for treason. This is why I think members on all sides of the House should seriously consider changing their minds and deleting this clause from the bill.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert raised this issue in the House a number of weeks ago. An article appeared in the Toronto Star last Wednesday which I read as I was heading back to my riding. It is by Robert Nielsen and is headlined "Terrorism may yet revive the death penalty issue". I should like to quote a couple of paragraphs from this article:

John Diefenbaker is my kind of abolitionist because he would make an exception for terrorists. Here we are dealing not with unprovable deterrence but with an airtight case for the protection of society.

When captured terrorists are allowed to live, innocent people will surely die. Children in schools and buses, hapless tourists in aircraft and airports, will be pitilessly mowed down or blown up.

This has happened again and again already. Terrorists seize an airliner full of passengers or a school full of children—killing a few incidentally or to prove their sincerity—and then threaten to murder their hostages unless a gang of brothers-in-arms, previously imprisoned for a similar crime, are set free.

I should like to stress that point, Mr. Speaker. If this country holds in jail for 25 years terrorists who kill people, how long will it be before some other terrorists hijack an aircraft or take some hostages and demand that this country free some of their citizens who are held in our jails?

An hon. Member: They will probably run the operation from inside jail.

Mr. Reynolds: As one hon. member says, they will run the operation from inside jail—and that is true. We know that the drug syndicates run their operations from inside jail. That is all the more reason the House should delete this clause, to let the terrorists of the world know that they cannot come to this country and try and pull any crazy stunts during the Olympics. If I may just conclude the article by Robert Nielsen, he wrote:

If the government concerned does not yield, they carry out their threat. If it does yield, both sets of terrorists are released to kill again. The future murders are not conjectural; killing is the terrorists profession.

Don't say it can't happen here; it already has. Mrs. Pierre Laporte is a widow to prove it.

Only a fool would predict that Canada has seen the last of terrorism within its borders. And if terrorism does come back, the debate on capital punishment will revive, hotter than ever.

I shall leave that aspect for now, Mr. Speaker, but I hope that hon. members who are listening to this important debate, or are reading it in Hansard, will seriously consider deleting this clause from the bill. This would virtually kill the bill since the government has stated quite openly that this is an abolition bill. I understand there may be some agreement among the House leaders to have some of the votes on these motions later this week, and perhaps by Thursday of this week we can vote on the motions discussed to that stage. If we could delete this clause we would defeat the bill and get it out of the House of Commons.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak in support of the defeat of this particular clause in the bill, and there are a variety of reasons for my doing so. I mentioned the question of treason when I first spoke on second reading debate. In the meantime, my reasons for desiring to see this clause eliminated from the bill have been widened by some rather irresponsible and inflammatory statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his contribution to the debate. Speaking on June 15 last, the Prime Minister used expressions of high semantic value concerning the noose and the horrors of hanging a person. This, of course, is a tactic that is employed by the press; and I deplore in the strongest language I can think of the tactics used on television. Whenever they talk about this subject, their symbol for debate is a noose around the maple leaf. They do this in order to drive people away from this means of carrying out the death sentence upon those who are guilty of murder of one kind or another. We are not talking about this.

My views have no connection with hanging but, rather, with the death penalty. I even avoid use of the term "capital punishment" because that has a connotation as a result of the Latin derivation having to do with the head. I am not talking about that; I am talking about the imposition of death on a person who has taken the life of someone else. In this particular instance we are talking about treason and treachery as referred to in clause 2. The Prime Minister can make certain suggestions, if he wants, in order to get people's backs up and sort of convince some of those wishy-washy members on his side of the House that they should vote in support of this bill. Thank goodness they are not all wishy-washy.

The Prime Minister can suggest that the lives of those 11 people will be on the conscience of those who defeat the bill. This is not on my conscience now. What should be on the conscience of every Canadian is the life of those who have died and those who will die if this bill is not defeated.

I hesitate to bring forward this subject, but the Prime Minister did so when talking about treason: he delivered an inflammatory address in this connection. As the hon. member who preceded me said, Her Majesty will be here within two or three weeks, and the government is suggesting we remove from the statutes the death penalty for anyone who makes an attempt on the life of Her Majesty. What would be the case in respect of a president? Is the Prime Minister going to reinstate the death penalty when a president is involved? The Prime Minister is certainly not thinking in terms of Canada's connection with, and value for, the Crown. It is not only the Crown which is involved in the act of treason. We all know that treason is a matter affecting the institutions of our government, and anyone who mounts a revolt or tries to overthrow or take over institutions, federal or provincial, by force is guilty of treason. If that is not a crime deserving of the ultimate penalty, then I fail to know what more serious crime there is.

This is supposed to be an abolitionist bill. I have the feeling that the government and those who drafted the bill have failed to realize that the death penalty is still very much written into our laws. The schedule of the bill provides for the removal of certain clauses of the Criminal Code and of the Fugitive Offenders Act, but there are other areas where treason and treasonable acts remain on the statute books. I am not questioning this, because this is where they ought to remain as crimes for which the death penalty should be accorded after a person is convicted by a judge and jury. I refer to the National Defence Act, chapter N-4, of the Revised Statutes of Canada. This chapter does not talk only about persons in uniform, but about every person who is held guilty of committing any one of a number of offences. In general terms, it refers to every person who does, or omits to do anything, or aids such a person who commits an offence, or abets any person in the commission of an offence, or counsels or procures any person to commit an offence. Thus, any person would be guilty of an offence.

What sort of offences are involved? For example, on the matter of security—and this is section 65 of the National Defence Act—the death penalty is provided for a number of offences. It provides that every person shall suffer death who discloses the preparations for operations of any of Her Majesty's forces. That is one treasonable act which would undermine our country. It refers to every person who discloses, in any manner whatever, any information relating to the process, procedure, publication or document of any of Her Majesty's forces or of any forces co-operating therewith, or does or omits to do anything with intent to prejudice the security of any of Her Majesty's forces or any forces co-operating therewith. This does not refer only to persons in uniform.

Bill C-84 is a complete fraud that is being put upon the people as the abolition of capital punishment in this country. It is nothing of the sort. It is a limited abolition bill, and it is high time the real intent of the bill was made clear. Section 68 of the National Defence Act provides that every person who is a spy for an enemy is guilty of an offence, and upon conviction is liable to suffer death or a lesser punishment. Section 69 provides that every person who joins in a mutiny that is accompanied by violence is guilty of an offence and liable to death or a lesser punishment; and section 70 provides that every person who joins in a mutiny that is not accompanied by violence is guilty of an offence and is liable to imprisonment for life or a lesser punishment. It then refers to the ringleaders and suggests that, upon conviction, they are liable to suffer death or a lesser punishment.

This government is deluding the Canadian people, as it has made the practice of doing for the last four or five years. It is deluding those who are sincere abolitionists that there is to be an end to the death penalty in Canada. This is just not true. Here we have the government trying to make lighter the sentence for the crime of treason or a treasonable act in Canada, be it against Her Majesty or against our institutions. I mentioned this in my earlier intervention in this debate which happened to be on budget day, May 25. Nobody bothered to pay any attention because the budget was the all-important thing on that particular day; but it is there in the record for May 25, if anybody wants to read it.

I fail to see how this government can put forward such a notion, depriving Canadians of all their desire to uphold, with every power in their possession, the institutions they hold dear, even to the length of putting their lives on the line to defend them. There are many of us in this House—thank God—who have done that. There are some in this House, although not too many now, who have done this even twice. I am prepared to do it a third time. This measure is absolutely unacceptable to the Canadian people. It is certainly unacceptable to me. I think I speak for a great many people in my riding and a good many people across the whole of this country who just cannot understand the reasoning of this government in abolishing treason as an offence for which the death penalty ought to be given by a jury.

The acceptance of clause 2—and I hope we will have a vote on it shortly—would have a number of consequential effects which I have listed and which I think I will save for debate in respect of certain other clauses. If clause 2 should be defeated, one of the consequences would be that clause 7 of this bill would become either superfluous or debatable, and the original section of the Criminal Code being amended by clause 7, namely, section 534, would automatically be reinstateable. I have 16 examples which follow pretty much the same pattern.

If this particular clause relating to treason or treasonable acts, whether against Her Majesty—and God help us, may that not occur—or against institutions of this country, federal or provincial, by force of arms, should be defeated, a number of very interesting consequences would occur which I propose in the course of time to mention.

I think we should look at the schedule of the bill. We have to look at it in relation, unfortunately, to clause 2, because throughout this whole part of the Criminal Code there is a suggestion in the amendments that in respect of the words "high treason or" only life imprisonment would be involved. Life imprisonment, I think, is one of the most cruel and most inhumane sentences that could be imposed by any judge. The jury may find a person guilty of an act for which life imprisonment is the penalty, but I find it difficult to understand how any thinking soul could see a person condemned to life imprisonment. What has that man to lose? I will introduce some of the horrors on the other side of those introduced by the Prime Minister. I suggest that some abolitionists volunteer to act as guardians of some of these people who have been sentenced to life imprisonment.

An hon. Member: Why don't you volunteer?

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Why should I volunteer? I am in favour of retention.

Mr. Caccia: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am in the middle of my speech and I would prefer to wait until I have concluded it. I still think there might be a few abolitionists over there who are courageous souls who stood up against the desires of their constituents and voted for abolition who might volunteer because we will have a great deal of difficulty getting people to act as prison guards or even policemen. This will be a very serious problem in our country. I do not think the abolitionists over there have even thought of this.

A man condemned for life, whether for treason or any other act, even if his sentence should be shortened, is a man who has nothing to lose. He can kill. If he wishes to get out and kill, he will do so. That is the man's life who will be on my conscience, not the life of the man who, if we defeat this bill, will hang for his crime. Those who really concern me are the survivors of the victims of these crimes and the victims who are yet to come if this bill should pass.

I sincerely hope this bill will be defeated. I am working with everything I possess to ensure its defeat. One tiny aspect of the defeat of this bill would be the removal of clause 2 which touches on treason. The Canadian people cannot accept that treason should be set up as a crime for which life imprisonment alone is the sentence which may be given by the courts, We know, from past experience, how difficult it is to keep people in prison for two years. If people sentenced to life imprisonment want to get out, they will kill in order to get out.

There seems to be a thing about escapes in this country. I do not know quite how it happens. However, there have been a number of escapes over the last three or four years. I have lost count. Those people will be on the loose in Canada simply because we have become soft in respect of the criminal and have forgotten about the victim. Surely we are men of reason. Surely we want to protect our society. The millions of law-abiding citizens are my concern. They are on my conscience. It is not the few tens who have decided to take the law into their own hands who are on my conscience.

Many of those on the other side who are abolitionists have said that there is no deterrent value in the death penalty. I disagree. I have been told by a well known lawyer, who happens to be a member on this side and who has defended criminals, that some of them might have become murderers but for the fact that they were deterred when they became involved in a felony such as a bank robbery. They admitted to this lawyer that they refused to take a gun along with them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like at least to finish this sentence, and then I will sit down.

An hon. Member: There are others who should finish their sentences.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There are a good many. A particular criminal told this lawyer that he refused to take a gun with him for fear that he would use it and kill someone and go to prison or face the death penalty. That is a deterrent. Another deterrent value is that the criminal who has been executed does not commit the crime a second time.

● (1540)

Mr. Caccia: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, if it is relevant.

Mr. Caccia: Earlier in his speech the hon. member suggested that abolitionists should volunteer to supervise the inmates. I should like to ask the hon. member whether, along the same line of reasoning, retentionists including the hon. member, would volunteer as executioners.

An hon. Member: That is quite irrelevant.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I think here, again, we are encountering that abhorrent attitude adopted by abolitionists who insist on the noose. I am not talking about the noose, and hon. members know it. I am talking about the death penalty. These are many ways of disposing of people—and the noose is only one of them. There is gas, electricity, or a man could be given a handle with which to do it himself.

Mr. Caccia: The method of execution was not my question. My question has to do with whether the hon. member would agree to be the executioner, regardless of the method.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I can think of methods whereby a man could execute himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that we are getting into debate.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I think that of all aspects of Bill C-84, the one that should give abolitionists the greatest concern is clause 4 as it now stands. While the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and members of the cabinet say this is a free vote on a piece of legislation, it is a government measure on which some hon. members have been allowed to vote against their own party, but even when they have been allowed to vote against their party, they have been placed in a situation of duress—

Some hon. Members: Not true.

Mr. MacFarlane: It is only true of your side.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Garbage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has the floor, and I suggest we all listen.

Mr. Coates: I suggest to hon. members that if they do not agree with what I have to say, there is a very easy way of solving that problem, and that is to stand and make their own speeches. I have endeavoured to do my part, and I hope they will do theirs so that the people of this nation will know that a debate is going on and that no one is opposed to the other person's point of view so long as that person is willing to indicate what is that point of view. I watched particularly the vote on second reading and saw the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) take very careful note of all those who voted against the legislation before the House. I am sure that their progress in the days ahead will be minimal so far as this government is concerned.

I have listened to the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) quite often making contributions from his seat. I can understand that, because he is substantial in that area, and no doubt he has a great deal of difficulty in lifting it. But I think he can get up and explain to his constituents how he changed from the position that he once held.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to have to say this to every speaker in the opposition, but if he would look at the proper page in Hansard he would see that I have already answered the question very well. However, I think it is wrong for him to assume that I changed by mind in any way or form. As far back as the time when the hon. member was still a member from that area he would remember that I was an abolitionist, which was easily 15 years ago.

Mr. Lawrence: Well, that certainly shows inflexibility of mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that we are getting into argument.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I enjoy very much hearing from the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain either in the House or outside, and I hope he will make longer speeches before this debate is over and explain to his constituents again—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member should address the chair.

Mr. Coates: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I hope the hon. member will explain to his constituents how he can adopt a point of view that is so contrary to the point of view they wish him to have when expressing himself on this matter.

I should like to get back to the amendment before the House to delete clause 2. I started out by saying that of all the matters in the bill, this is the one that most concerns members of the House—some of them who are not basically retentionists, who are abolitionists but who feel, at the same time, that any individual who commits high treason against one's country deserves to pay the supreme sacrifice of his life for having committed treason; and I include in that group any individual or group of individuals who would perpetrate insurrection and revolution.

Indeed, if we go back a few years and think of what happened in the province of Quebec, I think most of us would agree that the Canadian people would have been outraged if the criminals had been captured and brought before the courts, rather than being allowed to escape from this country, and if the penalty of death had been pronounced by the courts, as it should have been. But the government commuted the sentences after they had, in fact, killed one outstanding Canadian and had come very close to killing a foreign diplomat in our country.

We witness more and more the development of terrorism in the world and while, fortunately for us and our people, most of the terrorism that has occurred has been outside our country and as a result we are onlookers of events of great traumatic significance to a great many people and nations, I find it difficult for us to try to wipe it from our minds. The sort of situation that occurred in Uganda, which could have resulted in the death of a great many people and which was brought about by people committed to open rebellion against society, could have happened in this country; and if it had, it could have resulted in these people being placed in our penal institutions.

The people who look after the operation of our penal institutions have a difficult enough time without being asked to guard international terrorists and people willing to commit high treason against their country and to stop them from killing either penitentiary employees or fellow inmates. We have not been able to maintain security in our penal institutions up to this point, and the number of kidnappings that have taken place in these institutions in recent months indicates how difficult it is for those who have accepted the responsibility of operating these institutions to carry out their duties. How much more difficult would their task be if we placed within these institutions even more dangerous people who are committed to destroying society as it now exists. We cannot expect those who operate our penal institutions properly to protect society against these people on top of the difficult task they already have.

Regardless of whether in the end we vote for abolition or retention, if there is one part which should come out of this bill, that is the part. For years, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) campaigned as a commitment to himself and to the public at large, for the abolition of capital punishment. It was very courageous of him to come into this House and vote against this bill.

This bill goes further than the United Kingdom has gone. A great many countries have eliminated capital punishment for high treason and for many other crimes, but the right hon. member came into this House and stated that he could not support a bill which would achieve the end against which he had worked throughout his lifetime. He came into this House and said he would not support this bill because the government should be convinced that that particular part of the bill should be eliminated, so that with the coming of the Olympics, with many international events taking place in this country, and with the volatile Middle East situation, the people of this nation should be protected from international terrorism or any form of insurrection taking place. Those who commit those dastardly deeds should pay with their lives.

Then we come to the last but, as far as I am concerned, the most important consideration, and that has to do with our monarch. We are saying to the people of the Commonwealth that while we are a Commonwealth country, we are not willing to give to the Queen of Canada the same degree of protection the United Kingdom is willing to give her. We are saying to anyone who might consider assassinating her that he will not have to forfeit his life for so doing. We are, in effect, saying to the Queen that there is a lesser degree of protection available to her in Canada than in any other Commonwealth country. As I understand it, of the six countries which have abolished capital punishment for high treason, none is a member of the Commonwealth. That is far too extreme a degree of abolition for the government to ask of the people of Canada, especially when the great majority of Canadians do not wish the government to abolish the death penalty, particularly as it applies to the murder of police officers or penitentiary employees.

There are many in this country who would be willing to extend, rather than limit, the number of crimes which should be punishable by death. There are many who believe that the death penalty should not only be carried out for the protection of police officers and penitentiary guards, but that it should extend to all first-degree murders when mercy is not recommended by the jury. The government is going beyond what the people ask and is extending abolition to the point where anyone who kills the Queen will only be imprisoned for 15 years before consideration is given to that person's securing parole—not necessarily receiving it, but consideration being given—and life imprisonment will be for a period of 25 years. A person 20 years of age can kill the Queen of Canada and be walking the streets again at the age of 45. One gets a terrible feeling that there is something wrong with the legislation before us and that we should do something to eliminate it.

I support the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) because it is realistic. It is the very least that those who believe in retention should expect from this government. I say to the abolitionists in this House that if this government is determined to place legislation on the statute books of this country which eliminates the protection which is now available to the monarch and to the Canadian public against terrorists, it should be defeated. The abolitionists in this House should be concerned because the government does not feel that the monarch or the public should be protected against terrorists, international gangsters, the mafia and people of that ilk. Those people know, when they consider committing crimes against individuals, that the worst penalty then can expect is 25 years in prison.

There must be something wrong with a government which believes that, regardless of what the people think, it knows better. That is an indication of a sickness in democracy which we can cure only by defeating the legislation of a government which takes this approach to politics. The best way to restore some respect for parliament and for the democratic institutions which all of us are supposed to love is to see that legislation which is contrary to the beliefs of the great majority of Canadians is defeated.

Surely, abolition carries with it some responsibility—and there is no responsibility on the part of a government which says to the Queen of Canada that we cannot afford to her the same protection which the parliament of the United Kingdom is willing to provide. That parliament has existed longer than any other democratic institution in the world.

It is not responsible or realistic for a Commonwealth country to say to its fellow members of the Commonwealth that it cannot give to the Queen the same degree of protection she will receive when she visits other Commonwealth countries. We cannot provide her with that protection because the government has decided that any individual who attempts to assassinate, or who assassinates her, will only go into one of our institutions, and while there he will probably carry out the same type of crime against other persons, whether they be officers in the institution or inmates.

● (1600)

When an individual commits any kind of crime against the state, he should be prepared to sacrifice his life—nothing more, and nothing less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: He should realize that will be the only penalty and there will be no other. No mercy will be shown any person who endeavours to murder the Queen or sell documents that would be of value to enemy nations. In these days I do not know if this government would designate some of the democratic countries as enemies and the communist countries as our friends. But I cannot envisage a situation where this government should be concerned about the lives of individuals who were endeavouring to destroy this country, our monarch, our prime minister or any specific individual who represents us in a very special way.

I say to you, sir, that I will support the amendment. I hope the abolitionists in this House will support it, as an indication that we have special feeling for the Queen and our country and that we will give the ultimate protection to our Queen and extract the supreme sacrifice from anyone who does damage to our nation or endeavours to assassinate the Queen.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, it is time this government shed the "Alice in Wonderland" mentality regarding the objects and objectives of some people in society at whom this legislation is directed. It seems to me a contradiction in terms to talk about peace and security legislation and at the same time to eliminate the consequences for treasonous activity. Therefore, I plan to support this amendment which would make treason punishable by death.

The government is charged with providing good order and security for our country and its people, as well as for those people, especially heads of state, who visit our country. This good order is based on the concept of civilization. But treason denies the right of any government even to try to maintain order. This bill becomes a vote of confidence for anarchy.

In the last generation there was a notion, that has become popular in society, based upon the worship of the non-hero. There was a time when the hero was an individual who acted courageously on behalf of his country and was commended by the citizens of the country and the government. As a matter of fact, one of our distinguished medals, the Victoria Cross, is a commendation for an act of valour on behalf of the country. But that kind of philosophy is under attack. Today we are faced with a popularization of the views of men like Marcuse who have made the non-hero popular. A man who either deserts his country or acts against his country is becoming the hero because that is seen as an act of courage. The man who goes over the hill is the hero.

Mr. MacFarlane: George Washington.

Mr. Friesen: More like Benedict Arnold. Today, these people would put up a shrine to Benedict Arnold, instead of George Washington.

There is a very popular philosophy around today which says that everything the establishment does is wrong, and therefore, since the establishment is wrong, it is all right to attack it, to tear it down and to destroy it. That becomes a perverted sense of morality: it is more just, more righteous; more sensible to attack and destroy the establishment than it is to work with the establishment and to honour it. We have had a very notable example of this kind of philosophy in the last few days, with the taking of over 200 hostages in an airplane and flying them to Uganda. In the minds of a lot of people in the world, those seven or so terrorists were heroes. Thousands of people think those men were the heroes in all that activity because they were attacking the establishment. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the commandoes who carried out the raid yesterday are the heroes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: They set the record straight.

Mr. MacFarlane: An act of war: that is how you would deal with treason, not the noose?

Mr. Friesen: There is a parallel philosophy which was developed in Russia and exported to China and southeast Asia which says the only way you can deal with a capitalist country is to destroy it, because capitalism is corrupt and on its last legs but it will try to fight for acceptance to its last breath, and that capitalism must be destroyed by a revolutionary act and overthrow of the government. That philosophy is still very popular in many countries. It is fine if those countries want to maintain that kind of government for themselves. Let them have it. But allied with that philosophy is the need to export the revolution. It is not good enough to have that kind of government within Russia, China, Viet Nam, Cuba or Cambodia: in order for that philosophy to thrive, the people who believe in it must carry it to other countries. There are a good many people in our country who think that our democratic institutions ought to be destroyed and are doing what they can to attack them.

Several months ago in this House, when we were dealing with the bill regarding citizenship, I spoke of the special parliamentary committee which had travelled the country to study immigration. We were confronted by these people in all the major cities and some of them were supported, would you believe, by the Department of the Secretary of State. These Maoists confronted us in every city across Canada. We were called fascist pigs because we were part of the establishment. Members of the government and members to my left were on the committee and were included as fascist pigs. We represented the establishment, and they kept calling for the downfall and destruction of the parliamentary system and the democratic way of life in Canada. These people really believe what they are saying, Mr. Speaker—and in the bill as it is before us today we are saying that we want to protect these people and destroy ourselves in so doing.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have to be out of our minds.

Mr. Friesen: It is rather like drinking hemlock, Mr. Speaker. Who would take a viper to his bosom?

Mr. MacFarlane: Socrates.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is one in our enlightened self-interest. If we cherish those institutions within our country which preserve democracy, which in fact provide freedom for dissenters to say what they say and what they could not do in the countries they espouse, which give us the kind of freedom that we enjoy, we cannot pass the legislation as it stands before us today. It is in our enlightened self-interest to pass the amendment before us, namely, that treasonable activity is punishable by death. Therefore, I plan to support this amendment and I shall vote in its favour.

I challenge the people who support the bill in general, who have not given sufficient thought to the implications of the bill in the case of treasonable activity, to rethink their position on this matter and to give some consideration to voting in favour of this amendment.

I began by saying that we have presented in this legislation an "Alice in Wonderland" mentality. I want to underscore that fact. The whole purport, underlying philosophy and groundwork of this bill rests upon the belief that man is indescribably perfectable, that in his most destructive state he has become that because society has treated him wrongly: either he has been deprived in his youth economically, or he has had a wrong upbringing. Somehow, all along the way we want to absolve man of the responsibility for his behaviour.

Mr. Skinner has done a lot to popularize the notion that we are no longer responsible; that we have been so conditioned by the forces of our society that we cannot make an independent decision any more. I reject that philosophy. I maintain that there are men and women in this and other countries who are deliberately villainous. They are determined and have chosen a path to do wrong. It is within the heart of every one of us to do that. None of us is immune from criminal activity; none of us is immune from inhuman behaviour. We are all victims of a depraved nature. Therefore, I cannot hold truck for that philosophy which says all we need to do is change the circumstances for criminals, give them a better environment and a little tender loving care and they will automatically become different people; give them plush carpets, nice lounges, better day-rooms and recreational areas, and they will be fine people. There are people who are determined to do wrong; people who have come to that place where they will entertain violent notions and violent activity against the Crown, the Queen, and are determined to do wrong.

I say, again, that it is in our enlightened self-interest to entertain this amendment which will preserve freedom in our country to live in peace and tranquility. I urge hon. members to again think about their position on abolition of the death penalty and to give consideration to this amendment which will preserve the death penalty for those who are guilty of treasonable activity.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in clause 2 of Bill C-84 the Solicitor General of Canada is proposing abolition of capital punishment for any act of treason against Her Majesty, against Canada or against a province. He is also proposing abolition of capital punishment for overthrowing or threatening to overthrow the regime or for collusion with the enemy when as a country we are in a state of war. In short, Mr. Speaker, this means that the philosophy underlying the propositions of the Solicitor General of Canada, the Solicitor of the day—we hope he will not so remain for a long time—this means that any act likely to endanger the country or part of it would not be punishable by death but rather by what the minister calls life imprisonment.

As for life imprisonment, Mr. Speaker, and this is the first point I want to make, I do not believe in it since I do not have faith in the goodwill of the Solicitor General when it comes to implementing the law. Mr. Speaker, how many instances could we cite to prove that parole was granted even though we had been assured there would not be such release on parole?

We must not lose sight, in this debate, of the context in which the Solicitor General has placed us. He started with the notion that any irreversible penalty such as the death penalty is bad in that sense that it would denote that our society is prone to violence. He is himself a great pacifist who believes in the good will of all humans, that is why he tells us: "We shall apply such punishment which is not final, such as jail terms." And to make sure that imprisonment is not abusive towards the criminal the minister applies this principle which is radically opposed to the punishment provided by the Criminal Code, namely release on parole. Thus clause 2 of the bill which is before us and which amends the Criminal Code as far as murders and other major offences are concerned, mentions treason to which I referred earlier.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) suggests then the abolition of capital punishment in cases of treason. He thinks it is a serious crime to attack Her Majesty the Queen, the government of Canada, a province or the system. It is a serious crime to conspire with the enemy in wartime but it is not serious to the extent that the criminal convicted of treason should be sentenced to death as provide by the Criminal Code.

However, Mr. Speaker, if tomorrow our country were at war with any of the countries in the world, that same government would ask Canadians and the young people to fight in the armed forces to kill people they do not know, risking their lives to ensure the security and the defence of Canada. That same minister would travel from coast to coast to ask the mothers of young Canadians to sacrifice their sons, as we can see it in the Memorial Chapel here in Parliament and where this government is proud to turn the pages to show the names of those great Canadians who fought for Canada in foreign countries where they lost their lives. Why? For the security of Canada, for the well being of Canada, to protect our ideology, our identity and our security. Thousands of Canadians risked their lives on those battlefields.

Mr. Speaker, all this is done for the security of the public. What is treason according to the Criminal Code? Treason is a threat made by one individual or group of individuals attempting to overthrow a government by force, through criminal means, threatening not only the stability of the state, but also the health and lives of citizens. This is an act of treason in general. An act of treason is also conspiration with the enemy in wartime, an act of treason is what we saw, for instance during the October crisis in Quebec, it is an act that endangers the lives of citizens and the political system as in Canada we are supposed to live in a democracy and that the most logical way to overthrow a government is democracy.

Mr. Speaker, this is the logic of the Solicitor General. We shall remember the epic fight of our ancestors against conscription, when they were told that they had to enroll to protect the country. And now, today, the Solicitor General claims that if any foreigner or any Canadian does the same thing, the death penalty will not apply.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder which side the Solicitor General is on and which aim he is trying to reach. I am trying to understand how he thinks and, Mr. Speaker, I cannot. I cannot understand why the minister supports clause 2 when Criminal Code sections 46 and 47 clearly state that everyone commits treason who, in Canada, attempts to kill Her Majesty, levies war against Canada or does any act preparatory thereto.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone did and act preparatory to levy war against Canada, the death penalty would not be applied. It means that anybody can come to Canada to levy war, and if he can be caught before destroying us, the death penalty will not be applied in his case even if he might have killed 25, 30, 50, 100 or 200 Canadians during his military operations. The minister proposes that the death penalty should not be applied for clause 2; he proposes, if somebody assists an enemy at war with Canada or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities, that the death penalty should not be applied. The minister proposes that we be docile, that we be kind, that we respect all that and that we lay the red carpet for anybody who might use force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province.

The minister proposes that in that particular case the death penalty will not apply in spite of conclusive and cogent evidence. Mr. Speaker, I was in the House with several of my colleagues at the time of what has been called the October crisis. I still remember this Prime Minister snivelling on television and asking everyone to show restraint in that very grave moment; I remember the tearful former Quebec Minister of Justice announcing the death of his colleague minister; I remember the trucks of the Canadian Armed Forces rolling down our streets, getting everyone edgy, controlling and watching all public buildings, members of parliament and ministers; everybody was on general alert, it was a very grave moment, Canada's security was at stake, particularly that of Quebec, that insubordinate province. Canada's security was so in danger that this government introduced a war emergency measures to stop that little outburst of revolt limited to one place in Quebec.

The army was even sent in small communities to watch alleged accused who could have been in collusion with people of the FLQ. We were in a state of general alert, and I remember that our party was holding a convention at Thetford-Mines at that time, a provincial convention for the federal party, and during the last night with beat of drum we were told about the death of minister Pierre Laporte. People were getting nervous and it was very grave. The army was on the look-out and everyone was calling for action.

What happened since then? The October crisis still remains to be explained. A lot of things are still unexplained in that file both to the public and members. A lot of things not only remain to be explained but once again I wonder how it was possible to bring in the army if today the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) suggests that this type of action is not serious. If that kind of situation is not serious, let us immediately abolish—and it is urgent—that emergency measures act. Let us put order not only in the Criminal Code but, to be consistent, in any other legislation.

Some will say, such events could still reoccur. Let us be logical. We are now having in Quebec the Olympic Games which are going to cost a lot of tax money paid by Canadian taxpayers. What is the cost of the military operations to ensure the security of athletes, visitors and prominent people? What will be the amounts paid and the role played by the federal government? Will it be to the extent of forbidding any traffic? This is quite a situation! I have been told that the federal contribution to ensure security will be about $100 million. But let us suppose a moment that such an act of treason does occur, in accordance with sections 46 and 47 of the Criminal Code, which the Solicitor General would like to abolish. On one hand, the federal government is investing $100 million for the security of athletes, very important people and visitors as well as for the general security at the Olympic Games to protect the reputation of the country. It is nice to see soldiers parading!

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that an attempt is made against Her Majesty who will open the games, or against the officials of other countries or one of our public men. What will happen? A general alert, and after giving a good show to demonstrate that Canadians are safe, the criminals will be caught. Then they will be told: "We are sorry, we have to release you because Canada is an understanding country. You are released." The minister will put these people in prison. He will call a press conference. I can see him with his glasses, smiling and telling us that he has made some order in this area. What we shall learn is that a few years later, these same criminals or alleged criminals will be free once again.

With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to questions in the order paper which were asked recently in June about the number of convicts who are now free in Canada and who have not been recaptured yet, and this for each penitentiary in Canada. You can find this in Hansard. Mr. Speaker, how can we believe that the minister will ensure safety in Canada if he is content with putting convicts comfortably in prison and giving them a parole or temporary freedom, since the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) believes in rehabilitation.

Mr. Speaker, I am among those who believe that our society must be protected. I am among those who believe that our society, an organized society, must have the means to protect itself against external or internal enemies. Consequently, to protect ourselves, if someone wants to cause trouble of some kind in Canada, act in collusion with the enemy, make threats of revolt or of takeover of a provincial system or of the Canadian government, we must show the whole world that we have laws, we respect our citizens and we want to protect them.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). This is why I shall oppose the minister who is asking us to pass clause 2 according to which any act of treason against the Crown in general would not be subject to capital punishment. In my opinion, not only is the philosophy which the Solicitor General wants us to adopt dangerous, but it also constitutes an invitation to throw over our government system, no longer democratically, but by force. Mr. Speaker, God knows that more and more Canadians think that this is the only solution.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion to delete clause 2 of this bill which is an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences. We are considering one particular aspect of violent crime, and that is treason. I rise at this time simply to voice my support for this amendment.

I do not propose to go into the arguments that have already been placed on the record. Suffice it to say that I agree with what has been said and the reasons given in support of this motion. It is difficult to comprehend the government's determination at this time to pass this legislation, Bill C-84. At a time when the government has announced that it is launching an attack on violent crime, we have before us a bill, the provisions of which, I suggest, constitute an invitation to commit violent crime in this country.

If everything in this country was what we wished it to be, if there was a greater awareness on the part of people of their responsibility to their fellow man, a greater appreciation of the sanctity of life and a recognition of the rights of others, then I think we could understand why the government has taken the position it has. But when we see a growing disregard for human life, with little respect for the rights of others, for the government to bring in a measure of this kind is completely beyond reason.

I have just returned from my constituency, Mr. Speaker, and if the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) would like to get the feel of the country, I suggest he goes to Fraser Valley East where just the other day a little girl's body was found tied to a tree. This was one of a number of serious crimes committed just recently, and as I mingled with the people and talked to them this was foremost in their thinking.

Reference has also been made to the events of this past week in connection with hostage-taking. Terrorism is flourishing today, and even in this country the very foundations of our civilized society are being threatened. Yet we are being urged to pass legislation which I believe is simply an invitation to certain people to commit crimes in this country.

People are being forced to the conclusion that they cannot expect justice from this government. I am not questioning the sincerity of the Solicitor General, but I just do not know what kind of dream world he is living in. Although it appears to be futile to try to achieve any change in this legislation, I feel I have to stand today and challenge the Solicitor General to take another look at reality in this country. People are looking for some evidence that crime does not pay. Under the present administration of justice in this country, it looks as though crime does pay. Although I am not questioning, as I say, the sincerity of the Solicitor General, I am questioning his judgment in a very fundamental fashion.

The motion before us seeks to reduce the punishment for treason. As has already been pointed out, Her Majesty the Queen of Canada is once more coming to this country, yet we are removing this safeguard for her protection. Surely to goodness, if we are to be faced with a provision like this, it could have been brought in a little later in the session instead of just prior to Her Majesty's visit to Canada. I just cannot see any logic behind this legislation. I cannot understand why we are being called upon to support legislation removing this safeguard.

That is all I am going to say, Mr. Speaker; I said I did not intend to make a long speech. I just want to ask whether there is some logic for our being presented with legislation which removes the penalty of capital punishment for the most serious crimes that can be committed and which some people are committing. I support the motion before the House.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. At the outset let me say that I will lend my full support to this motion, which basically reinstates the penalty of capital punishment for the crime of treason. Treason is a most heinous crime. It is a crime much worse than murder because it is an out-and-out attempt not only to kill the head of state but to destroy the governmental system under which we live. It is, also, an act of supplying evidence or information to an enemy, allowing that enemy to destroy our country. It is a crime that strikes at the very heart of our country.

I understand the concern of the abolitionists when it comes to the crime of murder, but I cannot understand how an abolitionist could not support capital punishment in respect of a crime of the nature which would destroy our country. Murder is carried out by an individual who has no respect for the life of another individual. Treason is carried out by a person who has no respect for his country. Does such an individual deserve to live? Should he not suffer death or capital punishment for such a crime? I, personally, believe he should and I believe the majority of Canadians feel the same way.

An hon. Member: And one weekend at home will tell you that.

Mr. Neil: If you talk with those Canadians who spent some time in the armed forces during the last war and were prepared to give their lives for their country, you will know there is no question about where they stand. Yet this government says it really cannot execute those people who commit treason, because to execute is a cruel and inhumane type of punishment. The government suggests we should send them to jail for a short period of time and rehabilate them. You cannot rehabilitate the type of person who would kill Her Majesty, destroy this country or supply secret information to another country. Such people are beyond rehabilitation.

Mr. Benjamin: How do you know that?

An hon. Member: Because they don't want to be.

Mr. Benjamin: And how do you know that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) has the floor.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has some comments to make, I am sure the floor will be available to him as soon as I have completed my remarks. I would be interested to listen to any remarks he might have to make.

Mr. Reynolds: We would like to have them on record.

Mr. Neil: Yes, I should like to see them on record. The people of Canada are concerned about law and order. They want a country in which they can live in peace and security. They want a country in which there is discipline. They want a country of which they can be proud, and they want a country in which they know we will have stable government, rather than a country that gives a licence to radical individuals to kill the head of state or overthrow the government, for which they receive a light slap on the wrist.

Let me say, in conclusion, that I shall be very disappointed if all hon. members in this House do not unanimously support this motion.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: What does "Regina" mean, Les?

Mr. Benjamin: My city is named after Victoria—"Regina." Kings and queens come and go, and kings and queens and—

An hon. Member: And so do MPs.

Mr. Benjamin: —members of parliament and people in public office know that they run a risk. They live with a hazard, whether it be from a drunk in a beer parlour or a mental case who is out to kill. These people live with that hazard every day of their lives when they are in this occupation, whether you are a king, a queen, the prime minister, the solicitor general, a member of parliament, or the mayor of a city. When you accept public responsibility you are faced with the hazard and risk of the sick mind. It may be in the person of your next-door neighbour or your brother.

The hon. member who has moved this amendment asks each of us to become paranoid, like the amendment. He asks each of us to look under his bed each night. He asks each of us to suspect anyone and everyone who comes in contact with Her Majesty or anyone else in public office. I look at this amendment as a resolution to place the crime of treason in such a category that it will apply to every person, making everyone suspect.

I would ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) how he, as a Conservative, in his ideology, would have fared in a country that considered treason the espousal of right-wing philosophy. We have just celebrated with and complimented the United States on its two-hundredth anniversary of a revolution. Many people died fighting on both sides of that question. The king of England at the time said that was treason. I should like to ask the mover of this amendment, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw, whether they still consider the United States of America and every citizen in that country as traitors. I am sure there were a number of people in the United States in 1776, and four or five years before that, who would have been happy with the opportunity to assassinate George III. Indeed, some of them tried to seize the opportunity. George III had a fair number of what were called Tories and Whigs in jail in those days, some of whom we have never heard from since. They were there for the crime of treason because they wanted to speak out and were condemned for having to resort to violence.

An hon. Member: Are you defending treason?

Mr. Benjamin: I am not defending treason, I am trying to suggest to hon. members who support this kind of amendment that they are asking all of society to join them in their paranoia. Society, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and members of this House will do everything they can to protect both the person and the institution of Her Majesty and her loyal subjects.

An hon. Member: Including putting up your life?

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member asks me something about my life. Life lasts for so long, but for the life of me I fail to understand how responsible members of parliament representing Canadians in every part of our country could ask us to resort to this mindless hysteria that reaches back into the Middle Ages. I do not understand what motivates them.

● (1650)

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) said he does not question the motives of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). Wasn't that big of him? He repeated that three or four times. I am not a friend of the Liberal party. Even my friends to the right will acknowledge that.

I have been a bitter enemy of that philosophy and that degenerate political party for as long as I can remember.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that the hon. member return to the subject.

Mr. Benjamin: When hon. members are opposed to an amendment regarding treason and capital punishment, and then someone says that he does not question the motives of the Solicitor General and I take that as a direct reflection on all other members of this House. That, it seems to me, is beneath the intelligence and the integrity of the mover of the amendment and those who have spoken in favour of it. I remember, when I was a kid, that people were said to be guilty of treason.

Mr. Reynolds: If he can remember when he was a kid, he has a pretty good memory.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), who was only in diapers then, should ask the people who know. The hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) know better. It was said in those days that people who were found guilty of treason should be shot. There were pamphlets and newspaper advertisements to this effect. Some hon. friends to my right might agree with those headlines and scurrilous pamphlets to the effect that the death penalty should apply to treason in the case of fellows like M. J. Coldwell and W. S. Woodsworth who were called treasonous. There was a member of Parliament who was found guilty of treason. He was convicted, sentenced and later departed. If he is still alive, he would be living his declining days in Poland. I refer to one Fred Rose. He was not executed.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Benjamin: If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to read Hansard for the years 1945, 1946 and 1947, he would find the reason. There were even some members of his own party who did not advocate that kind of penalty.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am advocating it now.

Mr. Benjamin: That is one instance. The hon. member might like to cloud the issue. There were people in the progressive party and in the co-operative movement, as well as the farmers and the livestock growers who took the CPR to court, who were called treasonous. Where do my hon. friends wish to draw the line concerning what is and what is not treason? The first socialist member who was elected in 1896 was accused of being guilty of treason. It was said that rather than being seated in the legislature, he should be hanged.

Mr. Speaker, for some reason or other some of my hon. friends seem to conclude that if one fails to support an amendment which calls for the death penalty for treason, somehow everybody else is, by definition, treasonous. The hon. member for Moose Jaw was as subtle as a baseball bat with a nail in it. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East was just about as subtle. These are the kinds of laws that people such as Idi Amin, Joe Stalin, Adolph Hitler and Mussolini like. They like those kinds of laws about treason. They not only like them, but they implement them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They did not even bother charging the people; they just shot them.

Mr. Benjamin: You bet they did. Adolph Hitler, Mussolini and Joe Stalin did not bother with the formality of trying someone for treason: the right to dissent went down the drain. Let us assume the worst. Let us assume that some megalomaniac, some nut, assassinated the Queen, the king, the prime minister, the leader of the opposition, or the Solicitor General. That is a hazard which confronts everyone in public life. There have been many incidents. There was a case of an irate taxpayer trying to kill the local mayor. I guess that would be called some kind of treason.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, neither the Queen nor the Crown have asked for this. The royal prerogative has not asked the death penalty if there should be a crime involving the killing of a royal person. This has not been asked for, yet the royal succession and parliamentary democracy continue. This type of thing can happen to any of us. I will make one exception. I would except that in time of war, if our country were attacked and had declared war, if one of the articles of war included execution for treason during a state of war I would, however reluctantly, accept that our society as a whole had been attacked, including the Liberals, the Tories, the Socialists and everyone else; in fact even those of us whom the public thinks of as no-good Micks. If it involved all of us, then there might be some legitimate argument for the crime of treason being a specific offence, rather than a peacetime thing as a general rule.

I should like the members who support this kind of amendment to provide some additional reason for it. The hon. member for Moose Jaw says that the Canadian people question the old adage that crime does not pay.

Mr. Neil: I did not say that.

Mr. Benjamin: Then the hon. member for Fraser Valley East said it. You are all the same breed of cat. If there is any one thing in which people historically believe, it is that crime has paid, and has paid very well, thank you. Hon. members wonder why the slob who grew up in a slum knocks off a couple of service stations, serves a couple of jail terms and finally ends up shooting a policeman or prison guard. Naturally, the hue and cry is that he be hanged. I do not hear anyone say that the mine owners or the contractors—who are just as guilty, in my book—should be hanged. You want people to have respect for the law. Our law is for the rich.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: Hon. friends to my right would find it interesting, if they took the trouble, to learn who has been hanged in this country and who has not been hanged. Invariably, those who had the resources—particularly financial, social, business, and so forth—could resort to appeals and could go through all the procedures of our legal process. Do not tell me that the poor, convicted murderer gets the same deal as the rich convicted murderer. He does not get the same deal. If hon. friends to my right, and those who agree with them, could show me how our law could be changed so that the poor, convicted murderer, whether it be for treason or for any other reason, could be treated in the same way as the rich, convicted murderer whose appeal is automatically launched by an appointee of the court, I would be satisfied. The poor man has no choice, but the rich man can get the top brains, the top lawyers and the best research.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Benjamin: If my fine friend wants to live on cloud nine, he is welcome to it. If he did a little research into who has been convicted of murder and who has, or who has not, been hanged he will find that the law is for the rich—particularly the implementation of the criminal law.

As a member of parliament I do not want to be party to what I consider to be bad enforcement of the law by the Solicitor General and by the government—the unequal enforcement of the law. There is no equality of opportunity before our law, both in fact and in practice. I wonder if hon. friends to my right would also explain to me, when they are discussing an amendment which has to do with treason, their definition of "treason." Is their definition narrowed down to the assassination of the monarch? If so, I wish they would say so. I still would not support the amendment. In fact, the monarch, especially the one we have now, would be the last one to ask for or to expect that kind of law. Since the British have not done it for years, I find it passing strange that all of a sudden, from under a bunch of rocks or out of the woodwork, comes an amendment to the law that has not even been suggested in the British House of Commons.

Mr. Stevens: It is their law now. Why are you voting with the government?

Mr. Benjamin: In that case, I am learning about all these people who will use any type of subterfuge, excuse or reason, however weak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: I will continue for one minute only, Mr. Speaker. They will justify or use any subterfuge, reason or excuse to go back to what they really want, which is the death penalty. If they cannot have it holus-bolus, they will look for some other way in which they can satisfy their own feelings and the feelings of a large portion of the public.

An hon. Member: Yes, 80 per cent of the public.

Mr. Benjamin: Perhaps the hon. member has that kind of constituency. My mail runs the other way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I want to tell my hon. friend that my mail did not run 80 per cent as against 20 per cent; it ran 55 per cent as against 45 per cent. If he would like to come up, go through all my files and read all my letters from my constituents—in fact, I put it all down in a newsletter—he is welcome. I am not relying on numbers, and I am not relying on the 80 per cent. If there were 80 per cent in my constituency in favour of abolition, I would feel that way before they ever said it, and I do not rely on numbers. But I would like to remind my hon. friend that if he or any of his colleagues want to talk to me about numbers, they do not really mean anything when you get right down to the crunch.

An hon. Member: They help in elections.

Mr. Benjamin: If he wants to be some kind of a blob, if he wants to run with the wind, I would like to hear if the so-called overwhelming majority of his constituents felt the same way four years running. If he wants to be like a stallion sniffing the wind when he enters the gate to the pasture, that is the way he would run. If he wants to be some kind of a blob of a member of parliament, so that whatever his constituents think or whatever his newspapers say, or whatever a dozen or ten dozen letters tell him the majority of his constituents think, then frankly we do not need such members of parliament. People can always put their social security number into a computer. They would not need a member of parliament.

If the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) wants to talk about what is good for the next election, or good in terms of politics—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I did not say that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention, but I am sure the hon. member and I were trying to be helpful to one another.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member is making a speech. I suggest he get back to the facts.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you. I seldom rise to speak in the House, and I do not speak very much.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I am a kind of a half-decent fellow, but I was invited to put my views on the record and that is exactly what I am doing. I would like a definition of "treason" from hon. members who support the amendment. What constitutes treason? I am sure the late supporters and sympathizers of Louis Riel are having second thoughts about treason. In fact, it would not be difficult to get a unanimous vote of the House to pardon Louis Riel. It is a little late, but better late than never!

I put on the record what I feel about these matters. I could be wrong, but unless the argument is put forward by hon. friends to my right in a more lucid, logical and reasoned way, I am afraid I will have to be stubborn—and I am not usually stubborn. I will have to stick to my conviction, to the principle, to the matter of conscience on what I think is civilized behaviour and intelligence.

The one exception I would make is in the case of a declaration of war when the nation as a whole is united to defend itself. That is the only exception I would make; and even in that situation, not only in Canada but in countless countries, most of the people who were found guilty of treason were not executed. If my hon. friend would care to check the Archives and the Department of National Defence, in the Boer War, the First World War, the Second World War, and even the Korean War there were some cases of treason—and I would like somebody to tell me about anybody, particularly in the last 30, 40 or 50 years, who was executed when found guilty. Even when they admitted guilt, they were not executed. Even the red-necked dinosaurs of those days did not advocate it, and if they did they got short shrift.

I hope the lengthy statements which have been made by hon. members in support of these amendments will not be repeated. I want to say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East that the kind of statements he makes do nothing more than incite and encourage those nuts who can be encouraged to consider committing treason or murder.

I hope the amendment will be defeated. I hope the bill goes through as is. There may be some minor amendments, but surely there must be something more than we have seen so far. I hope we get something more. If we do not, I invite hon. friends to my right, some across the way and those to my left, to decide that their arguments have all been made. Then we can vote on all the amendments and third reading of the bill in the next couple of days.

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, we just finished listening to philosophy, ridicule and a bunch of nonsense from the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: In all my 18 years in the House of Commons, I have never listened to so much nonsense as I just have. The hon. member rarely makes a speech when he does not go overtime. He rarely makes a good speech unless he is heckled, and I do not blame the hecklers in this particular case. He made a very poor speech and was only heckled a little. He should have been heckled a lot more.

The amendment before the House suggests the deletion of clause 2 of the bill which refers to the penalty for those who commit treason. The hon. member did not know what treason was. As far as the bill is concerned, treason is committed by anyone who kills or attempts to kill Her Majesty or does her any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, who levies war against Canada or does any act preparatory thereto, or who assists an enemy at war with Canada. Those are the three broad definitions of treason. The clause goes on to say that everyone commits treason who, in Canada, uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada. One could go on and read the whole clause, but I suggest that I have read enough to provoke thought, and I hope enough for the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre to read the remaining portions of clause 2(2).

Let us consider for a moment the part of the clause which states, "uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada". This bill is part of the peace and security legislation program of the government. In October of 1972, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—the great abolitionist, he would like us to believe—this cabinet minister and this government brought in the War Measures Act saying that there was an armed insurrection against Canada and against the government and that there was an attempt to overthrow the government.

We had to fly the army into Montreal. Cabinet ministers, the Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition and all other official people in Ottawa had to be protected by army officers. Those officers were armed with particularly fast guns with hair-triggers. Was this government trying to tell us that it was against treason and that it did not believe in capital punishment when there was only the slightest tremor? This House has heard no evidence to suggest it was anything more that the slightest tremor. The Rose brothers and a couple of others looked all over the United States for a couple of guns, and kidnapped two important people in Montreal. There was a so-called armed insurrection against the government—that is what we were told in this House, and we have heard nothing since.

An abolitionist cabinet immediately conned the rest of the House of Commons into believing that we were faced with an armed insurrection and that officers had to be armed and flown in from all over Canada to protect officials wherever they might be in Ottawa or Montreal. Was that not an expression of a deliberate preparedness to use capital punishment as a deterrent to the continuance of that so-called insurrection against Canada and the government? To me it was. Surely the government of the day must have thought that people were prepared to commit treason as defined in this clause. That is what we were told people in the FLQ were prepared to do. The FLQ was banned, and that is still the case. That is the only time in Canada's peacetime that an organization has been banned.

Many people over the past 30 or so years have often talked about banning the Communist party, but that has never come about. The Communist party exists, holds meetings and fields candidates in general elections, but because of this supposed threat the FLQ was banned. I point this out to suggest that this government in the past was prepared to use the death penalty when it felt that treason was being committed. I am not suggesting that in cases such as that nearly everyone caught—the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) shakes his head in a negative manner: If I am misinterpreting—

Mr. Allmand: You are.

Mr. Horner: The minister suggests that I am. He is permitted to get up after I have finished and straighten me out. I will listen to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: However, his government has yet to put the facts on the table and to prove that there was an armed insurrection. Were those army officers, who were armed with guns, prepared to use them? Yes, they were. The record of this House is that they were issued with special guns and were specially trained soldiers. The guns were equipped with hair-triggers. I know what a hair-trigger is and that those guns were so equipped, because at that time an officer shot himself getting out of a truck outside my apartment. I know very well how they were armed and the type of hair-trigger on those guns. The government was prepared to use the death penalty for what it thought was treason, without giving people a fair trial. Over 400 people were arrested, all of whom were released and very few, if any, were charged. Why am I raising this matter, Mr. Speaker? It is merely to point out that this government acknowledges that when they feel threatened themselves, they will resort to the worst kind of use of capital punishment.

● (1720)

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) spoke about the recent terrorist incident in Uganda and the build-up of terrorism throughout the world. We can be fairly proud of our country as we have been relatively free of acts of international terrorism since 1972. But surely we must not be so complacent as to rest on our laurels and do away with the one measure which is a forceful deterrent. Some hon. members hide behind the belief that it has not been proven that it is a deterrent. It is a deterrent, Mr. Speaker. A deterrent is in the eyes of the person attempting to commit a crime. If 80 per cent of the people of the country believe it is a deterrent, then it is.

There is no question that the kidnappers of James Cross believed they might be shot if an exchange of gunfire took place between them and the police. A great deal of caution was taken in what might even be considered the preliminary negotiations when anonymous notes were dropped off at a radio station, and so on. They went to a great deal of trouble to keep the negotiations at more than arm's length because they were fearful for their lives. That suggests to me that those who kidnapped James Cross believed that the death penalty was a deterrent The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre suggested that Her Majesty has not requested it. Certainly, I believe that in many instances Her Majesty would extend clemency to those whose who made an attempt on her life.

Another thing should be mentioned in regard to treason, Mr. Speaker. Murder is committed by those who deliberately attempt to take the life of another. Treason is committed by a person or persons deliberately acting against the wish of the government or, in this case, the wish of Her Majesty or against the country. It is quite often the case that such persons are zealous believers in a cause. I suppose if their cause has a strong following in the country, that would be taken into consideration in deciding whether their sentences should be commuted.

I am saying that clause 2 should be left in this bill, and sections 46 and 47 should be left in the Criminal Code. They may be used only rarely, but they would serve a purpose, namely, to promote peace and security. That is what this whole legislative package is about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Sections 83 and 84 are to promote peace and security. We find ourselves in an era where international terrorism is widespread. It does not seem to be on the wane, although there has been some success in recovering hostages. We are entering a period of particular importance to Canada. I think everyone in this House and in Canada would like to see the Olympics come off in grand style.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: This is the first time Canada has been host to the Olympics. The Olympics are being held in the city which in 1972 gave rise to some fear in the minds of the government of the day that there was a force there capable of some kind of armed insurrection.

Mrs. Sauvé: You said it was nothing.

Mr. Horner: I said it had not been proven, and this House has not learned the facts about whether it was any more than nothing.

Mrs. Sauvé: Now you are invoking it as something important.

Mr. Horner: I am saying to the hon. lady, who is now a member of the cabinet which convinced this House at that time, that it was in fact an armed insurrection, that they owe it to the Canadian people to come forth with the evidence so that we can judge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: If that evidence were laid before this House of Commons today, many members on the hon. lady's back benches, and maybe even within the cabinet, would support this amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). They would see if the government's action was as great as she is convinced it was. That is the case I am trying to make. Lay the evidence on the table and then we will be able to judge. Do not ask us to judge—

Mrs. Sauvé: That's right.

Mr. Horner: —on the actions of this Prime Minister who one day blows hot and on other days blows cold.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: You voted with him.

Mr. Horner: I want to say one more thing about the law, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre suggested that the law is good for the rich and bad for the poor. I like to look upon it as good for those who have hope, and not so good, I suppose, for those who are hopeless. One does not have to be rich to have hope; one does not have to be poor to be hopeless. But the law should be fair and equal to all, and the death penalty for treason should be applicable to all, whether they be rich or poor. It is the duty of the courts to administer it fairly and apply it equally. It is the duty of the legislators to make the law and to amend the law, and it is the duty of the courts to apply it equally. Certainly, those with hope will use every avenue available to them before their hope is exhausted. Those without hope, I suppose, will resign themselves to what they consider the inevitable, in any case.

I sincerely urge this House, at this time in Canada's history, when it is faced with an overwhelming desire of the Canadian people to see retention of capital punishment, an overwhelming desire of the Canadian people to see a successful and harmonious execution of the Olympic games, and an overwhelming desire of the Canadian people to see that justice not only appear to be done but is in fact done, to delete clause 2 from the bill. If it is deleted and the bill carries, then capital punishment will apply to those people who have been proven to have either killed or attempted to kill Her Majesty, who have levied war against Canada or have used force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada.

I am simplifying the three major clauses, Mr. Speaker. This law would only be applied if it were proven that a person committed such an act or was a party to committing such an act. That is of the utmost importance, because I am certain that anybody involved in the least way in threatening the life or security of a cabinet minister during the October crisis would not have had a fair trial under this government. He probably would not even have had a chance to go to court. In fact, he probably would have been shot. There is the irony of this same government now coming forward with a bill to delete a fair trial for an act of treason.

However, if somewhere down the road members of the government desire to call in the armed forces again at the flick of a television camera by saying that an armed insurrection is arising and they must call in the troops to deal with those attemping to overthrow the government, they are permitted to do that. The passage of this bill will not prohibit the government from doing that without first proving to parliament and the country that there are forces attempting to overthrow the government. That is the sham of this abolitionist cabinet. Its members want to do away with justice and take the law into their own hands.

This cabinet says we do not need the death penalty for treason, just leave it to them. If they think someone is trying to overthrow the government, they will not bother with a trial. They will call in the army. That is the injustice of clause 2 of this legislation.

There is supposed to be a free vote on this legislation. I therefore urge all members of parliament, including those on the government side, to think seriously about this. By supporting this amendment they will not defeat the bill. In fact it will probably result in the Olympics running a little smoother. The bill would then allow Canada to be governed a little more smoothly. It might even make the cabinet a little less eager to hoodwink parliament and the Canadian people by bringing in the War Measures Act when they believe there might be some kind of insurrection.

I therefore ask this parliament to support this amendment. I repeat that it will not defeat the bill. It will help our system of justice. It will help Canadians, whether they come from Regina-Lake Centre or not. Every Canadian would be assured of a fair trial.

Mrs. Sauvé: A judicial system that would be civilized.

Mr. Horner: Yes, that is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I could have completed my remarks at that point. What I was saying before I was interrupted by the hon. lady is that it would be better to keep this provision in the legislation. If that were the case, those hopeless people who would attempt to overthrow the government would be at the mercy of this cabinet which jumps at its own shadow and brings in the War Measures Act.

Mrs. Sauvé: We would shoot them?

Mr. Horner: I do not believe the hon. lady would shoot them. However, a police officer attempting to do his duty, possibly protecting the hon. lady, might accidentally shoot and kill someone. I therefore urge this House to support the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. It is a good amendment. It is a timely amendment at this point in Canada's history when the world is fraught with the dangers of international terrorism.

There is a deep concern about the Olympics. The primary purpose of the Olympics used to be a sporting contest. However, today there is political manoeuvering creeping in. Even the forthcoming Olympics have not been free of that. Surely it would be far better to keep Sections 46 and 47 in the Criminal Code. I therefore urge all members of all parties to support this amendment.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I too rise in support of my colleague's amendment which proposes that clause 2 of Bill C-84 be deleted, the net effect being to preserve the treason provisions that now exist in our Criminal Code.

Frankly I am quit surprised to hear people who have taken part in this debate state this afternoon that they do not understand what treason is. They ask for the definition of treason.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) seemed to be confused about what the government is doing through Bill C-84, namely, attempting to make us not just an abolitionist state by law for ordinary crimes, but attempting to make us an abolitionist state in total. I say that because it has become a kind of Liberal misrepresentation that the world is gravitating toward abolition, that somehow or other Canada is out of step with the rest of the world by not being an abolitionist nation along with what they fancy is desirable. As we stated in the House and in committee, that is absolutely wrong. It is a falsehood.

At the present time, the vast majority of the nations of the world are retentionist nations. In fact if we pass Bill C-84 in its present form we will become part of 1 per cent of the world's population that lives in a state that is in effect totally abolitionist. Surely it is us who will be out of step with the world, not the reverse which the government is indicating. I mention this because in committee the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) made a point of stating that democracies in the western world are taking to abolition as opposed to the retentionist traditions. I pointed this out to the committee. Even if one takes into account nations such as the United Kingdom, which have limited the use of the death penalty, one finds they did not limit the death penalty with regard to treason. This is one of the reasons for which I believe the amendment by my hon. friend is well worthy of consideration.

I should like to give briefly a little of the background to show where this concept of treason as an offence originated. This was an offence in Roman times, and is one of the most fundamental concepts of criminal law in existence. I would refer hon. members to the 1973 edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica where it is stated that treason is the crime of betraying the nation or its sovereign by acts considered dangerous to their security. The article states that among most nations from very early times the punishment for treason has been severe. Death has been the mandatory sentence in England, and that provision was not affected by the limitation on the application of the death penalty effected by that country a few years ago.

That is the first point I wish to make. We have been told repeatedly by the government that we were somehow introducing into our own penal system laws which already existed in countries such as the United Kingdom. That is not true if we include the treason provisions contemplated in Bill C-84. The Encyclopedia goes on to say:

> The law of England regarding treason corresponds to a considerable extent to Roman law . . . The offence of high treason was not precisely defined by the common law until the passing of the Treason Act in 1351.

So the section of the Criminal Code we are today proposing to do away with—irresponsibly, I suggest—is one which has been in our criminal law as far as Britain is concerned since 1351. And in the eyes of the British courts the statute of 1351, so far as it defines the offence of high treason, is still law.

I refer to Britain because, of course, most of our common law and criminal law come from that country. But take the practice in the United States. The crime of treason was written right into the constitution by its framers back in 1776.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): 1789.

Mr. Stevens: In section 3(3) treason is defined in the United States constitution, and in section 3(2) it is stated that Congress shall have the power to determine the punishment for treason. It is interesting to note that U.S. criminal law states that whoever, owing allegiance to the United States, levies war against them or adheres to their enemies . . . is guilty of treason and shall suffer death. There are other alternative sentences provided. So that is the practice in the two countries to which we traditionally look—the United States, our neighbour, and Great Britain from which we derive the bulk of our criminal and common law.

Speaking of the United States, I am sure no one in this House will have failed to note the judgment which came down from the U.S. Supreme Court making it clear—there has been some doubt—that the death penalty is not to be held as contrary to the constitution of that country. I am curious to know whether the Solicitor General took time this week end to read the judgment which was handed down in Washington because it is timely as far as Canada is concerned. I hope every hon. member who retains the wishy-washy impression that somehow or other the Americans are tending to favour an abolitionist state will read that judgment and note what some of the judges of the U.S. Supreme Court say about the use of the death penalty in the system of criminal law.

What is happening in the United States? The fact is that the death penalty there has been extended, not lessened, contrary to misleading statements sometimes made by government members in support of this bill. I should like to refer to some of the statements which were made in the course of that judgment by the U.S. Supreme Court. The court made it clear that the death penalty was a constitutional penalty and should not be considered otherwise, and further that its imposition could be left in the hands of judges or jurors.

Perhaps I should comment that this ruling was the first on the death penalty since June 29, 1972, when it ruled by five to four that the law then on the books gave too much discretion to judges and juries. That decision invalidated death penalty laws of 36 states, the District of Columbia and of the federal government. In the aftermath of the 1972 decision, 35 states re-enacted the death penalty, but in one of them, Illinois, the law was struck down by the state's Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court, in its judgment, said the enactment of capital punishment by state legislatures was "a marked indication of society's endorsement of the death penalty for murder."

When this question came up in committee I was surprised to find the Solicitor General unaware that while there were 13 abolitionist states at the time he introduced his last abolitionist or partial abolitionist legislation in this House, there are only ten today. He had to correct himself. He was not aware of this until he was so advised by his officials. Opinion in the United States has been reversing itself in the two or three years during which the minister has been attempting to make Canada an abolitionist nation.

It might be helpful, in considering whether the death penalty for treason should remain, to consider the differences in outlook between our Solicitor General and that of the solicitor general of the United States. The Solicitor General of Canada and the solicitor general of the United States are charged with a similar duty, that of upholding the law, yet both have such divergent views. For example, the solicitor general of the United States had this to say:

> The United States believes that imposition of the death penalty may sometimes be a necessary and appropriate measure to achieve the traditional goals of criminal justice . . .

He points out that, following the 1972 decision I have referred to, Congress enacted a statute providing the death penalty for aircraft piracy that results in death. Again the solicitor general of the United States, in sharp contrast to the weak-kneed approach of our Solicitor General, at page 5 of his brief said that the death penalty is a traditional sanction for those offences society considers the most dangerous. He went on in his very extensive brief to express the view that capital punishment serves other purposes as well. He said:

> The death penalty serves a vital function as society's expression of moral outrage, and marks off some crimes as so repulsive that they are to be avoided by those individuals with even a trace of social responsibility. Some crimes, too, are so vicious, so offensive to society's standards of decency, that they call out for an ultimate sanction in order to reinforce the social feeling of revulsion to acts of that character. This response—retribution perhaps, although without vindictiveness—has been endorsed by respected commentators and seems an essential ingredient of a healthy society.

I am quoting directly from the brief of the United States solicitor general submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States, which court in turn held substantially in favour of his representation. The U.S. solicitor general continued:

> Finally, capital punishment incapacitates some individuals who, if allowed to remain alive, would be so immune to normal forms of social control that they would continue to commit murders even if sentenced to life imprisonment without possibility of parole. The federal prison system now confines at least one man who, since his incarceration for murder, has committed and been convicted of murders within prison on three separate occasions.

How often has it been pointed out in this House, Mr. Speaker, that if a man is sentenced to prison for life for committing murder, what is to prevent him from murdering a second or third time? The U.S. solicitor general makes that very point. He says that there is at least one person in the United States who, on three separate occasions, has committed murder after being sentenced to life imprisonment. He continued:

> This man, and others like him, will find opportunities to kill again, regardless of the care taken to guard them . . .
> Although there may be legitimate differences of opinion regarding capital punishment's acceptance by modern society, its value as a deterrent, and society's need for it to reinforce social values and incapacitate dangerous offenders, those differences of opinion are to be resolved by the legislature; and the legislative judgment on these matters should be accepted by the judicial arm.

I could quote many similar portions of the U.S. solicitor general's submission, but I wish only to highlight the sharp contrast between the present trend in the United States in terms of retaining and even extending the death penalty and Bill C-84, if it should finally pass this House—heaven forbid. The reason I raise these points is to preserve the fundamental view that a crime such as treason, which I have defined for the House, is at least one crime for which any person found guilty should expect to pay with his life.

I suggest that we were right today to indicate our approval for the effective and speedy action taken by the government of Israel in rescuing refugees from the terrorists who held them in Uganda.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: As I say, Mr. Speaker, I believe we were right in making that response. Bearing in mind that those who were involved in treason were "eliminated", to use the terminology of the government of Israel, surely we are being inconsistent, having congratulated earlier today one government for taking such speedy action, to propose a little later on the same day the removal from the Criminal Code of the death penalty for this same crime of treason. That, Mr. Speaker, is just plain inconsistent, and even if in spirit hon. members are in favour of abolition generally, I call upon them to call a halt to this nation becoming totally abolitionist even when the crime of treason is committed.

In his submission to the U.S. Supreme Court, the United States solicitor general highlighted why he felt capital punishment does in fact deter crime. Further on in his brief he said this:

> In enacting death penalty statutes, the legislatures throughout the country have not acted irrationally. Capital punishment serves several important social purposes, among which are deterring crimes and expressing society's moral outrage in a manner that shapes and reinforces the community's standards.
> There is an inherent logic to the belief that the death penalty deters at least some people from committing crimes.

In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, how can we be so sure that our Solicitor General, who is a babe in the woods so far as criminal offenders are concerned, is right in proposing that we become—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

He may continue with unanimous consent. Has he unanimous consent to continue?

An hon. Member: No.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being six o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock later this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I should like to inform the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that he did not receive the unanimous consent of the House, therefore his speech has ended.

Mr. Stevens: Who said that?

An hon. Member: We agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): There was a nay from the right hand side of the House, therefore you may not continue with your speech.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that my colleague would be allowed the privilege of speaking following the dinner recess. However, I am pleased to make a few comments on this amendment which would retain the punishment of death to be administered in some form for high treason. It has been mentioned by previous speakers that at this time there are only nine countries in the entire world which have total abolition, that is, no death penalty for any crime whatever. It would seem that the present government intends to do its best to see that ours becomes the tenth country. Certainly this is a very small percentage of the total number of countries in the world. I believe my colleague mentioned that it was less than 1 per cent.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: This is a so-called free vote. At least it is a free vote in this party, and that is more than can be said for that party over there. A lot of you sanctimonious ones over there deep down in your hearts are retentionists.

It may interest my colleagues from the government side to learn that on Friday evening I appeared on a television open line show broadcast out of North Bay, which is not even in my riding. Most of my colleagues are aware that there are certain issues of vital importance to the people of Canada other than capital punishment. But on that open line show which lasted for 35 minutes there was not one question in respect of any of the other issues, including air control and the pilots' strike. There was not one question on an issue other than capital punishment, and that is absolutely true. Of all the people who telephoned in there was one in favour of abolition and the rest were for the retention of capital punishment.

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Darling: This just gives you an idea of how important this legislation is in the minds of everyone. Certainly in my view, and in the view of the great majority of my colleagues on this side, there should not be capital punishment just for high treason but for many types of murder as well. After spending the week end in my riding I am sure what the feeling is. I was also outside my riding in Sudbury and North Bay, and this is something that came through loud and clear.

I represent a riding which could be classed, as we say, in the near north Ontario, namely, Parry Sound-Muskoka, that great vacation riding. Of all the northern Ontario members I am the only one in favour of the retention of capital punishment. All the rest are abolitionists. The people in northern Ontario are certainly pioneers, and I am sure of their views. The majority of them would feel the same as I do.

Another thing I pointed out to the listeners was the fact that a lot of my colleagues who were abolitionists in their vote, whether they are abolitionists at heart, are going to have a pretty hot summer when they return to their ridings, and I am not talking only about the weather.

An hon. Member: What about their principles?

Mr. Darling: They will have to defend their principles. Let me also tell some of the hon. members who voted with the government, and not necessarily because of their own principles, they may have a pretty tough time returning here in 1978.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would address the Chair. I would suggest to other members that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has the floor and we should allow him to speak.

● (2010)

Mr. Darling: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind being heckled by my colleagues over there. So far as I am concerned certainly every member of parliament who wants to do a job should be re-elected. I do not want to sell my principles down the river on the basis of being elected, but in this instance I know I have the backing of the great majority of the people in my riding and, I am quite sure, the backing of most of the people in the ridings of the members facing me, believe it or not. So shake your heads, my illustrious colleagues; I bet that if you spend any time in your ridings this summer you will find out what your constituents say about the stand you are taking if you speak or vote in favour of this bill.

When we consider high treason, the crime of attempted murder of a sovereign, or an attempted overthrow of a government, I must say there might be extenuating circumstances which would prompt one to try to overthrow the present government, whether or not it be a capital crime for which death would be the ultimate penalty. In my view, regardless of the present government, the Government of Canada supposedly represents the opinions and the wishes of the people of Canada. However, this is not the case in this instance because the government knows it is flying in the face of public opinion.

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Darling: This is one thing I do not have to prove. It is a fact in no uncertain terms. I might return to the matter of the television show I was on on Friday night. Because of unemployment and inflation and the fact that these are very important matters in the eyes of the people of Canada today, I had thought there would have been questions along these lines but there were not. This indicates how emotional the people are about this particular bill, C-84. I am hoping that some of my colleagues, and I include those on all sides of the House, will have second thoughts to that when the bill comes up for third reading they will vote on that basis that although it is fine to vote with one's party on certain things, even the best party member who votes on that basis will not accomplish a hell of a lot of good if he is defeated in 1978.

Some members over there shake their heads. I think the important thing in this business is to be re-elected, because if one wants to be in a position to present his views he cannot do so sitting back in the riding, which will be the case when he flies in the face of public opinion in his riding. When this vote comes up—and as I say I am not sure when that will be—and the votes on the amendments that have been presented by some of my colleagues, and especially this one in respect of high treason, surely even the most sanctimonious members will agree that the ultimate penalty of death should be available and should be mandatory.

Mr. Caccia: How about your own leader?

Mr. Darling: Fine. I do not agree with my leader in all things. To my illustrious colleague from Davenport I say: how about your leader? There is a hell of a lot about him which you do not agree with, but you do not have the guts to say so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. member please address the Chair.

Mr. Darling: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I wish to state in no uncertain terms that I feel on this particular amendment the entire House should vote in favour of the retention of capital punishment for high treason, attempting to overthrow the government, and so on.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak to the amendment to clause 2 dealing with treason and high treason. I think for the record it would be interesting to members, particularly those opposite, to have an indication of what countries have abolished capital punishment in its entirety and what countries have abolished capital punishment by law for only the ordinary crime of murder.

I should like to indicate that Austria, Columbia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Equador, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Sweden, Uruguay, and Venezuela are all countries which have abolished the death penalty. The remaining countries provide the death penalty for treason. I think it is also interesting to note that with the exception of three of four of these countries the majority are in the southern hemisphere, South America, Latin America or Central America. I shall not embarrass the countries by naming them specifically, but surely the diplomats, the consuls and the ambassadors know to which countries I allude. These countries have their own forms of capital punishment which, to the people of the democratic or free world, are repugnant. Whether capital punishment be carried out by black boots or brown boots according to the philosophy of the country, nevertheless it is still enforced.

I believe that unquestionably throughout the world we have entered into a period of change in the thinking of nations which at times, in my view, borders on madness, perhaps brought about by extreme degrees of frustration and, in some instances, suppression. Nevertheless we have seen the advent of a new time, a new era, throughout the world when countries are divided, with despots seeking the platform on some popular public issue and carrying a country on a wave of independence, only subsequently to rule that country with an iron fist. This bears on one thing. It bears on the absence of tradition.

I suppose any nation has a tradition, but the true, deep-seated, ingrained definition of tradition, that lies in the hearts particularly of Canadians and people associated with Great Britain or her dominions, is not easily dispelled. I know that today in Canada there are those who speak with scorn about Her Majesty, and yet there are thousands upon thousands of Canadians who fought for Her Majesty and who refer to her with admiration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: That was my schooling, and I am proud of it, totally proud of it. I ask you to reflect back to those grim days when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country had, at least for a time, the support of the nation. I think you could hear a pin drop throughout Canada as the Prime Minister went on television and told us of the terrible things that were happening in Quebec and why he would have to implement the War Measures Act. Those were serious times, times that challenged the very thread of Canadian morale, but not the thread of Canadian morality.

I ask every member of the House to ponder on what kind of a television appearance the Prime Minister would make if he were to announce that at the Olympics some mad dog of an assassin attempted or succeeded in killing the Queen. What would that type of horrible tragedy do to this nation? Would it tear us apart? It would certainly tear us apart as far as our hearts are concerned.

You may say, you are just thinking in terms of revenge if you are going to hang the individual concerned, if the crowd did not tear him asunder first. We have to go back to the very root of treason, born on tradition, carried through ever since by nation after nation, and I refer you to the Encyclopedia Britannica which says the following about treason:

> Most nations have from early times provided for the punishment of treason. Punishment has characterically been severe . . . death is still the mandatory sentence—and let hon. members on the opposite side ponder this.

—in England, and that position was not affected by the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act, 1965.

An hon. Member: What about Joe's position?

Mr. Brisco: I am concerned with my view and those supporting it. If hon. members opposite have something to say that they think is constructive, I think it befits them to join the debate. Either put up or shut up.

The subject of treason has been one that has been brought forward at the United Nations, because it is a separate and distinct entity. How did the U.N. agonize over the issue? In a review by the United Nations on the current situation the following was stated:

In academic circles it has sometimes become unfashionable to support capital punishment: civilization is tolerance and severity in punishment a sign of backwardness and regression, and so liberal thinking and the abolition of the death penalty are expected to coincide. Therefore the writing available on the death penalty leaves the impression that there is a certain inevitability about the movement to more "civilized standards" and fewer executions. A reader could be excused for concluding that throughout the world there is in fact an irresistible and ineluctable trend towards the abolition of capital punishment or that even where death is still a last legal resort, the penal codes have fewer offences leading to capital punishment or that methods of execution are becoming more humane or that the persons liable to the extreme penalty will usually have the benefit of the best legal safeguards.

The world at present provides no such assurances. Moreover it seems clear that in many cases governments satisfy public opinion by using the sentence, but no so in Canada. There is evidence that even the countries totally abolishing capital punishment have sometimes, if not always, acted contrary to the majority view of the population. However, that is nothing new for this government, and I do not care whether those on the opposite side would like to say that they have the opportunity to vote freely. I shall never forget that date when I watched the Prime Minister sit there as he has never sat there before through any vote, and swivel his head back and forth like a tortoise or an owl. He looked at every member who dared vote against the Prime Minister and Prime Minister's views.

Mr. Allmand: Nonsense!

Mr. Brisco: Let me say that the names of those members are firmly imprinted on the mind of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brisco: If you cannot stand the heat, get away from the stove. If the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) has something to contribute, it would be for the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member please get back to the terms of the bill, and would he address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Brisco: I will have great pleasure in getting back to the terms of the bill were it not for the rude interruptions by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and those of his associates. If they had something valuable to contribute, I would not mind.

An hon. Member: They are his accomplices, not his associates.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, my interruptions were not intended for the hon. member at all; they were intended for the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member is not raising a point of order but rather a point of debate.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, thank you for advising the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that he did not have a valid point of order. I certainly agree with you that this is nothing unusual for that member.

Let me continue my remarks with regard to the position taken by the U.S. government. The United States believes that the imposition of the death penalty may sometimes be a necessity and an appropriate measure to achieve the traditonal goals of criminal justice. Congress enacted a statute providing the death penalty for aircraft piracy that results in death. How many hon. members recall the incident over Canada's air space when those murderers who kill for profit caused an aircraft to blow up, taking many lives with it? What happened to them? I clearly remember without any regret that they paid the supreme penalty.

The government would have us believe that those who are prepared to destroy the lives of 100, 200 or 300 people in one fell swoop by blowing up an aircraft, can be rehabilitated, and I ask: rehabilitated to what, to kill again? The statistics are there; the minister has his own statistics, and I have read them. The facts are there, that certainly murderers who have been released have murdered again. Why should that be allowed to happen? Particularly with regard to crimes against the state and crimes against the sovereign, this should not be allowed to happen. Does the government condone the action of some mad dog who would commit treason?

Let me warn hon. members that I am aware of the fine line between sedition and treason. I am aware of the definition, and I am aware of the difference between espionage and treason, but these things do exist, and on the basis of present day technology they are highly possible. Hon. members tell me that 25 years, 10 years or 7 years will rehabilitate the mad dog who, with full foreknowledge of his action and with every degree of premeditation he can summon, sets out to murder Canadians through an act of treason, or sets out to murder the sovereign. Do hon. members think that the penalty should be a few years in jail and that he would then be rehabilitated?

Speaking of tradition, I must say thank God the tradition in Canada, at least thus far, has not been to shoot presidents or prime ministers. Tradition in the United States would certainly seem to be the contrary, and from an examination of those who have committed this horrible act, the majority of them have paid the supreme penalty. It is only in the more enlightened days of the immediate past that we have seen attacks on presidential candidates not lead eventually to that supreme penalty.

On behalf of all those Canadians who have risen with one voice, either through the medium of the press, through the medium of writing to their MLA's and their members of parliament, through the medium of hotlines or whatever medium, I say that by a vast majority they have indicated that they have been treacherously dealt with by the government, and that they consider that members of parliament who represent them here and who do not carry out the wishes of their constituents are demonstrating a failure to respond to the demands and views of Canadians.

I have no difficulty with my conscience on this issue at all. Not only do I support the wishes of my constituents, but it should be clearly elucidated and pretty well a matter of fact, and there should be no doubt in the minds of those here tonight, that my position fully supports the fact that the amendment with reference to treason should stand, that the supreme penalty should be paid as far as treason is concerned, and that this clause should be removed from the bill and dealt with as a separate entity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, motions Nos. 7 and 10 highlight two clauses of Bill C-84 which caused me the other day to make an observation, that is on June 29 when Mr. Speaker was considering whether there was a central principle to Bill C-84, it being the abolition of capital punishment. At that time I suggested that that was not the case, and further reading of the bill has convinced me that I was right at that time. There has been a failure to appreciate one single fact with regard to Bill C-84. It is an amending bill, and all an amending bill does is amend a number of sections in existing law which themselves each embody a principle. Then there is the central theme in a total bill—new legislation. That aspect of Bill C-84 has been lost sight of. It is a bill to amend the Criminal Code. That is its principle.

When one considers clause 2 of the bill, there is created there a totally new offence, high treason. What has that got to do with the so-called central theme of the abolition of capital punishment in this bill? All the clauses which follow with regard to parole following life sentences are already dealt with under the Criminal Code, but the terms of parole thereunder are being changed. Is the central theme the abolition of capital punishment? Hardly. Therefore I am glad to participate in this debate, but I underline those arguments.

I accept Mr. Speaker's ruling. I listened to it, I must conform to it, but that does not mean I must agree with it, and I respectfully draw to the attention of the Chair this particular aspect of my remarks.

Let us look at sections 46 and 47 of the Criminal Code. Treason is dealt with in section 46, and there are eight paragraphs enumerated there which constitute treason and have constituted treason in the history of Canada much longer than you, Mr. Speaker, and I have been around. But now, for some fanciful reason, three types of treason are to be elevated to high treason, and one of the forms under section 46(1) is being totally eliminated. I wonder why? I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) why it is that conspiracy to kill Her Majesty should not be high treason if the killing, the attempting to kill or doing bodily harms is to be high treason? It was formerly part of treason. It was dealt with in section 46(1)(d). However, that has disappeared in the shuffle of setting up high treason and, I suppose, second class treason. We now have this treason affecting the life and the person of the reigning monarch.

Then there is the second question of levying war against Canada or doing any act preparatory thereto, but why would not conspiracy to do that be part of it? Is the only one who actually is levying the war the one who will be guilty of high treason? Are his partners—and I say "his" in the general sense—to escape entirely? That is not a crime under the new bill.

The third category is assisting an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are. High treason? Well, the wording is the same as the first three paragraphs of what it was for treason, so what is new? It has been made high treason. That is the principle of the amending clause. It has nothing to do with capital punishment.

Then we deal with every one who commits treason, and we have the paragraphs broken down. In section 46.(1)(f) of the Criminal Code it provides that everyone commits treason who:

conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d);

We had a whole series of forms of treason where there was also conspiracy which in itself was treason, but it is no longer there. At worst it is treason to conspire with a person to commit high treason. I find it extraordinary that to conspire with a person to commit high treason is simply treason. The Solicitor General has a great deal to answer for a regard to setting up this section and the wording of it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He does not understand it, I am sure.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In one form or another they tried to arrive at what was contained in section 46 in the definition of treason. I wish the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) had done his reading instead of that awful drivel he put on the record this afternoon about what he imagined that some other people imagine, what other people quite ungrammatically and incorrectly call treason or treasonable. We were paraded through a long speech on that point.

Let us look at what the penalty is. High treason calls for life imprisonment. That is a minimum punishment according to the terms of the bill. It means 25 years without the possibility of parole.

When I was a student whether in high school or at university one of the things that was emphasized to us was confinement to the Bastille by lettre de cachet. In other words it was possible to be banished for life into the confines of the Bastille. These provisions, Mr. Speaker, are the equivalent of lettre de cachet, although I suppose the physical conditions have changed. There will be better food and better accommodation than in the Bastille there is no doubt, but there is not guarantee that another prisoner or prisoners will not murder within the prison. Perhaps the state wants it that way, as I speculated the other day.

There was another type of punishment that was always emphasized to us as the most heinous that man could inflict upon his fellowman. That was a life sentence to Devil's Island. That was at least 25 years. As I said the other day on second reading, we have devised our own sadistic torture of our fellowman. Has anyone here contemplated what 25 years in prison can do?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is worse than hanging them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In many instances, Mr. Speaker, it is calculated exposure to the wolves of the prison system. Is that what we are going to do? All those high moralists in this Chamber and outside who insist that capital punishment is immoral are people whose own morality now—

Mr. Caccia: What about your own leader? What did he say?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is a beautiful one to talk about the leader. In this bill and in this amendment it is every man for himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member demonstrates a craven subservience to the views of leadership—the present views of his leader on this particular subject. The other day it was apparent in the debate, and it is apparent today.

We have this sentence of 25 years for high treason, ten years certain for treason, and the judge may impose an additional period. I think there are inconsistencies here. Why should there be any difference between an attempt to kill the reigning monarch and a violent attempt to overthrow the lawful authority of the state? Why would there be any difference between assisting an enemy during a time of war—that is someone performing that act outside the country—and someone inside carrying on a guerilla command?

One is guilty of high treason if, sitting on the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, one were to discharge long range firearms at the coast of Newfoundland, but if within the province of Newfoundland one were to discharge those self-same guns in order to upset the government of Newfoundland or the power of the Government of Canada, that would simply be treason. Can anyone in their right senses explain the difference? Who shall be the more guilty—he who stands on the shore of St. Pierre and Miquelon and fires at the coast of Newfoundland, or he who stands within a few miles of St. John's and fires the same gun at St. John's? This is treason and high treason—an act of war. I shall let my colleagues figure that one out a little later.

I am more than satisfied that my colleagues who put forward these amendments are correct—the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). I think they highlight a most important and a very substantial amendment to the Criminal Code. Incidentally, it drags in by the tail the question of capital punishment. It is only consequential on the division of the crimes. Therefore I am more than happy to support both motions, Nos. 7 and 10. I think it is an illogical mishmash in so far as all those treasonable acts that have existed in the past are concerned and which are now supposedly being redefined in some sort of modern context which exists in the mind of the draftsman alone. His logic and that of the sponsors escapes most people. Therefore I would ask all members of this House to delete clause 2.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, before speaking on the amendment this evening I wish to congratulate our American friends on their decision just a few days ago in which their Supreme Court upheld the death penalty. I have an article here headed "Supreme Court Decision on Death Penalty Hailed". I quote:

> The Supreme Court is thinking like the American people are thinking," said a state senator from Maine.

It is unfortunate that this House is not thinking like the Canadian people are thinking.

> And there was little doubt the court ruling upholding the concept of capital punishment for murders brings the court a lot closer to the thinking of most Americans.

I wish I were reading that it was bringing our courts closer to the thinking of most Canadians. However, that will not happen with this government.

Unfortunately many members of the opposition, especially NDP members who are supposed to be the champions of the people, are totally opposed to what the majority of Canadians want. I find this very strange.

I will read to hon. members the law as it is now so that there will be no mistake about it. This law has been on the statute book for years. I quote the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who saw the weaknesses in this bill probably better than any other member. He is to be commended for the research he has done into this piece of legislation. I quote:

> The Canadian Civil Liberties Organization has not asked that the law regarding treason be repealed. Again I challenge the government to name one organization or anyone of responsibility across Canada who has asked for this. The sections in question should be placed on the record. Sections 46 and 47 at present read as follows:
> (a) kills or attempts to kill Her Majesty, or does her any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maims or wounds her, or imprisons or restrains her;
> (b) levies war against Canada or does any act preparatory thereto;
> (c) assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities . . .
> (d) uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province;
> (e) without lawful authority, communicates or makes available to an agent of a state other than Canada, military or scientific information or any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document of a military or scientific character that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada . . .
> 47(1) Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable
> (a) To be sentenced to death if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph 46(1)(a), (b) or (c)—
> That is the killing or the attempted killing of the Queen of Canada, to levy war against Canada or to assist an enemy at war with Canada. Why has this been changed at this time? Nobody has answered that. Again I repeat: there is something gratuitous about the government's action in this regard. Then so far as penalties are concerned, if all one does is to use force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province, they may be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life.

There is something behind this, and that is what we have not found out. What has activated the government of Canada to bring before the House legislation which will make Canada an open place for assassination and treason subject only to a jail sentence in a world in which terrorism marches and assassinations and kidnappings with assassination take place all over the world? Just at this time the Government of Canada decides that it must be kind to terrorists, international murders and those who raise rebellion.

The only government member who has entered into the debate in the past few days has talked in defence of a number of charges contained in letters to Hamilton newspapers. It is unfortunate that he has not expounded on capital punishment because of the two different stands he has taken on it. It would be a great contribution if he would expound on this issue. I see he has left the Chamber. Possibly later this evening the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) will expand on the two different stands he has taken with regard to capital punishment.

As I stated earlier, they have brought back capital punishment in the United States. A number of states have passed laws bringing back capital punishment. I wish to go into a bit of the history and the reasons why the United States has brought it back.

In 1965 New York abolished capital punishment except for someone convicted of killing a peace officer acting in the line of duty, and for a life convict who murders a guard or inmate in prison or while attempting to escape. The same year Vermont abandoned the death penalty except for treason, kidnapping for ransom, and for those who have been convicted of murder in the first degree and commit a second "unrelated" murder and for those convicts who murder any employee of the state prison or house of correction or a person known by the offender to be a law-enforcement officer performing the duties of his office.

I presume all hon. members received today the latest communication from the Public Service Alliance of Canada. It is addressed to "Honourable Members of the House of Commons". It points out the concern of our prison guards. These guards could soon be looking after prisoners convicted of treason. With the Olympics coming up, we can expect just about anything. Enclosed with the letter is a full statement on their concerns for their lives and the lack of protection in our prisons today. They state, and I quote:

Please find attached a copy of a paper presented to the Solicitor General of Canada, Honourable Warren Allmand, in his office on June 29, 1976.

In our closing paragraph to the Solicitor General of Canada we have requested that this bill be tabled until he is able to provide a special institution to ensure the security and safety of all penitentiary personnel working in institutions.

Of course the answer we will receive from the government with regard to dealing with murderers is that it will build smaller, more comfortable jails. That is not the answer.

We humbly urge you on behalf of all penitentiary personnel and their families to defeat Bill C-84, otherwise you will have to bear the responsibility that will ensue from the chaotic situation that will result from your negative vote on the security of all law abiding citizens of Canada.

This is the second document I have received from prison guards in the last ten days. They go into explicit detail concerning the problems they are experiencing. This brings me back to my original speech on capital punishment in which I suggested that the abolitionists might change places with the guards and take responsibility for looking after Mad Dog Kelly and other ruthless killers of his type, men you cannot turn your back on for one second. If hon. members want to learn in detail what it is like to look after individuals of his sort I suggest they contact some jail guards.

In the United States there are certain crimes against government and there are two crimes in particular which fall into this category, treason and perjury. Our concern today arises from the proposal to drop the penalty of capital punishment with respect to treason. Treason is the act of levying war against the government of a jurisdiction or of giving aid and comfort to its enemies. Twenty jurisdictions punish treason with death. Twelve of them demand death on conviction—there is no alternative sentence. This places treason third in the rank order of offences punishable by death and first in the rank order of mandatory sentences.

Also there are crimes against property which can become capital. They include train wrecking, arson and burglary. I should like to add another crime—that of hijacking. I am reminded of a case in San Francisco a couple of years ago. A retired couple were on a United States jet aircraft which was taken over by hijackers. There was an exchange of gunfire within the aircraft and the husband was killed before the eyes of the wife. He was down in the States looking for a place for retirement. I find it very strange that abolitionists would want to deal so leniently with hijackers. Fortunately, in this case, the two hijackers were killed by FBI agents when they left the aircraft. But our Canadian retired railway worker lay in the aircraft in a pool of blood.

Train wrecking is generally any act such as tampering with switches or signals or burning trestles with intent to derail a train. In most jurisdictions the offence becomes capital only if someone dies as a result of such wrecking. Eighteen jurisdictions provide the death penalty for train wrecking; three of them make death mandatory.

Arson is the wilful and malicious burning of the building of another. Georgia, for example, has six arson statutes all making arson a capital crime. Four of them make arson imputed murder if death occurs as a result. Arson is ninth in the rank order of offences with nine jurisdictions punishing it. There are no mandatory jurisdiction. The death penalty in relation to all these crimes is being removed and those who commit them will simply receive a nice life sentence in a comfortable jail in return for these very serious offences.

With regard to the relation between the law, crime, and executions, let me say that anyone who hopes to understand the place of capital punishment in contemporary American society must have a grasp of the latest information on at least four aspects of this subject. First, he needs to know what crimes in each American jurisdiction are at present punishable by death. Next, he needs to know how many of each of these crimes actually occur. Third, he must understand the scope of liability for a death sentence, especially as juveniles are affected. Lastly, he should have some idea of the ultimate fate of a typical group of persons originally sentenced to death by reference to a record of those who have been executed.

It is probable that few Americans have any idea how many crimes still carry a death penalty—anywhere from 33 to 67 crimes depending on how they are classified. They range from familiar ones such as murder, kidnapping, rape, and treason, to such crimes as desecrating a grave (Georgia), attempting to set fire to a prison (Arkansas), and sexually assaulting a girl under 18—so-called "statutory rape" (Nevada and Texas). Just in the past week there has been another violent rape and murder of a nine-year-old girl in British Columbia. The answer to this is apparently to build smaller and more comfortable jails in which to look after these criminals. I know the Canadian people will not accept this.

What do Americans think of the death penalty today? Their attitudes obviously govern the likelihood of retaining, extending or abolishing it in that country in our time. In 1964 Governor George E. Chamberlain, in his inaugural address to the legislature, recommended that all executions should take place within the walls of a penitentiary. In the same year a law was passed requiring that all executions take place at the state penitentiary at Salem, and two years later Governor Chamberlain said he was sure this law would be most beneficial in its results.

Just before closing, I should like to make a brief comment. A 25-year-old youth from Winnipeg, the city from which I come, was found dead in the streets of New Orleans as last week. He had been knifed to death by a mugger. Murder on the streets is becoming almost a daily event, and the majority of Canadians are demanding that we return to capital punishment. We should bow to their wishes. I have conducted two polls in my riding which show that 80 per cent want the retention of capital punishment. And one poll carried out this year shows that 90 per cent want capital punishment retained.

I hear an intervention by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain to whom I referred earlier in my speech. I hope he will explain to us tonight why he has taken two different stands on this question of capital punishment. I believe he owes us some explanation, not just a brief interjection such as he made last Wednesday. I think it might prove to be an excellent contribution, one which would help us understand the two different stances he has taken.

Mr. MacFarlane: On a point of order, the hon. member seems to be seeking an answer to a question. He may be thinking I will give an explanation for something he has misread, misquoted, and misrepresented. The explanation I gave him on Wednesday was very detailed, it was very clear, and I think it will suffice for him if he will read it.

Mr. McKenzie: I made no specific reference to those contradictory newspaper articles. I simply asked the hon. member to stand up and give an explanation of his two different stands. I am asking him to make contribution to the debate. We are not hearing from anyone on the government side other than by way of brief interjections. Let the hon. member stand up and make a ten or 20 minute speech on his position. I am not particularly interested in a little controversy about a short newspaper article.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, come on! We do not want to be here all summer. That is a filibuster going on over there. I am a retentionist but I would not lower myself to that.

Mr. Nystrom: Hear, hear!

● (2110)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are filibustering. As I say, I am a retentionist but I would not lower myself to do what you are doing.

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) will be getting another reward for being the most abrasive MP in the House.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Yes, and I am proud of it. I don't waste the time of the House by saying nothing.

Mr. Forrestall: You can do better than that, Joe.

Mr. McKenzie: No, he is getting weaker and weaker.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am still going to vote against the bill but I won't talk all night and say nothing.

Mr. McKenzie: I am not going to be talking much longer so I hope the hon. member for St. Boniface will be making a contribution.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): If I do, I won't have to read what I say.

Mr. McKenzie: We would welcome the opportunity, whether you read it or not, to have you make a contribution. Get up on your feet. You are the government whip and you can get the deputy whip as well to make a real contribution, instead of sitting there, bellowing night after night.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. Boniface rising on a point of order?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, whether I am chief government whip or not has no bearing on the vote. I am a retentionist and I feel that my position in this House has no bearing whatever on the vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Boniface will have the chance, if he so chooses, to express that point of view. In the meantime I would bring to the attention of the House that the time of the hon. member has just expired, but in view of the interruptions I will give him a few minutes extra to compensate.

Mr. McKenzie: I am just concluding, Mr. Speaker. May I point out that I agree with Your Honour entirely. I think that the whip and deputy whip should get up on their feet and make a contribution, instead of engaging in these ridiculous interjections.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will make my contribution when I vote against the bill.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak very briefly on the motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), I should like to take a minute or two to address myself to the allegation that has been made by a couple of members on the other side that we in the official opposition are conducting some kind of filibuster. That is not only untrue but is an unworthy allegation. In a matter as serious as this, one literally involving life and death, there is no great advantage in seeking haste to make a decision.

I would point out to hon. members, through you Mr. Speaker, that on this very day a spokesman for the official opposition put forward a proposal to speed up this process in an orderly fashion so that we might hold votes on Wednesday or Thursday of this week. Yet we are still waiting for an answer from the government, which seems to be unable to get together with the spokesman for the NDP. This suggestion would bring about a vote this week, not delay the vote, as has been suggested. I think that should be put in its proper perspective. We are not party to delay. But we are party to the belief that good government demands careful consideration of legislation, especially legislation as important as this, at a time, I might add, when the people of Canada are with too much just cause losing faith in their parliament.

The motion put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is one that members, be they retentionists or abolitionists, can support and remain consistent. One of the favourite arguments of the abolitionists was to quote the example of other countries, the so-called abolitionist countries, in which the death penalty had generally been done away with. Up until this past week we frequently heard about the judgment of the United States Supreme Court, once removed, and its attitude to capital punishment. This argument is no longer quoted by the abolitionists because, in light of experience in intervening years, the U.S. Supreme Court has come down with a new ruling.

Hon. members have also looked to the mother of parliaments, the United Kingdom, where moves to bring back capital punishment had been turned back. It was said they were ahead of us in the abolition of capital punishment. Yet in both the United States and the United Kingdom capital punishment remains in effect for the crime of treason. As a matter of fact the United Kingdom act providing for the abolition of the death penalty contains the provision that the sentence of death can only be imposed in cases of high treason and piracy with violence. It goes on to provide that when a person is convicted of treason, sentence of death must be pronounced. That is the law in an abolitionist country, Mr. Speaker, an example so frequently quoted by abolitionists in this House. The parliament of Great Britain considers itself abolitionist, yet it retains the death sentence for treason.

There is a very logical reason for that. A nation is no more and no less than the group of individuals that comprise it. When we discuss laws to protect individual rights under the law, we always start from the premise that every individual's natural instinct is to survive. Therefore if he has to take measures to protect his own life, up to and including the taking of another person's life, then he is not guilty of any crime. He is not acting out of revenge, he is not an aggressor. If an aggressor seeks to take his life, and he then responds with equal force, he is seeking his own protection and preservation. He is seeking to ensure his own safety for future life. So it is with a nation, with a collection of individuals. Any nation must have the right, the privilege under the law, the ability, to ensure its own self-preservation. No individual would give up his right to self-preservation, and no nation—no collection of individuals—should do that either.

The subject of treason has been dealt with in detail by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). Treason might generally be described as an attack which attempts to undermine the life and future of a nation. When society responds to such an attack it is justified in taking a life to ensure its own life, its own self-preservation.

Like it or not, Mr. Speaker, we live in times of danger and uncertainty. However much we would prefer not to resort to measures such as this, they are necessary and vital to the self-preservation of this nation. By its own action the government has made us aware of the fact that there are groups in this land that seek to undermine the country, that seek to snuff out that dream that we call Confederation, that actively plot to undermine the government and the society that we call Canada. Following the October crisis there was set up the police security planning and analysis group, a special pet of the former solicitor general. It was set up to respond to the activities of highly trained, organized thugs who are trying to damage this country and are ready to commit treason.

All of us are looking forward to the Olympics in the hope that they will be a great success for the nation. But every one of us also looks forward to the Olympics in fear and with trepidation. I am sure no member of parliament would deny that concerns are being expressed in every constituency as to what might happen during the Olympics. The government reinforces this sense of fear by spending, as has been stated in the House, up to $50 million on security measures. That is not saying that nothing might happen or that it does not have to take action, or that the most horrendous crimes might not be committed. The government is saying that they may be committed, and in fact it is taking measures to ensure that they are not. The government, in its undue haste to get this bill through, is undermining all of those efforts.

The government is taking away its most important weapon, that is, in saying to those terrorists, who in their own devious ways are preparing even as we debate this issue to create havoc here and in other lands, that if they so plot to take the lives of others and to undermine the life of this nation, they shall forfeit their own lives. If we can save one innocent life through such deterrence, that alone would justify retention of capital punishment, and that alone would justify maintaining in this bill, in whatever form it may pass, the provision that treason is an offence for which a person will have to pay the ultimate penalty.

In recent weeks we have uncovered or discovered in this nation, or perhaps just opened our eyes to something that we wish we did not have to face, the situation of growing concern, unrest, and animosity among our own people.

This has been manifested in a strange and unpredictable way, through this issue that is known as bilingualism in the air. It in itself belies a far more serious problem. It tells us that what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said some weeks ago regarding those who would cause Canada to end as a nation is simply wishful thinking, is not true.

There do exist organized forces in this land prepared and ready to do our country in, to end Canada. We know now that we cannot hide from that awful fact any longer. We must be prepared to face the dire consequences that may be caused by the actions of those individuals and groups. The lesson of terrorism has been brought home to us this very day in the wake of the situation in the Middle East. There we saw an example of why the penalty for terrorism, treason and acts of piracy, which will be dealt with in another amendment similar to this, should be and, indeed, must be kept in the law.

I would ask you why those guerrillas hijacked the plane and held those innocent people captive? It was for the purpose of freeing other people who had committed political crimes, crimes of terrorism and crimes of air piracy, yet because they had not paid the penalty for these heinous crimes they were still alive in jail providing sufficient motivation to these people to commit this terrible act. They played with those people's lives so they could spring from prison their associates and accomplices in international crime.

I submit to you that the same type of devious mentality is open to committing the crime of treason. If we just lock up so-called political prisoners after they have tried to take the life of the nation, we make heroes of them to that small sect in society. What do we offer these people and their accomplices who are still on the outside and have not yet been arrested? We offer them a reason and an opportunity to commit more crime by holding other people hostage and by performing other acts of terrorism only to push forward this demented cause.

As never before, the future of this country is on the minds and in the hearts of hon. members and all Canadians. I came to Ottawa, to Parliament Hill, in 1972 prior to the general election of that year as executive assistant to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I did not know at that time, nor in the years I was at school and knew him through correspondence and occasional visits, that we would ever have the opportunity of sitting together in parliament. To me that seemed an unreachable goal and a dream that just could not be realized. Following the election of October 1972 an unusual set of circumstances allowed me to come into this House and sit as a colleague of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert and that was an honour given me by the people of Hamilton-Wentworth that no words can adequately express.

The right hon. gentleman and I have been associated for many years. As I said, prior to coming into this House I worked on his staff. We have not always agreed, and he has never asked me to always agree with him. He has often told me that his outlook in this House and in a lifetime of politics is that strong men have strong opinions, that they are bound to disagree, but that should not interfere with the maintenance and growth of their friendship. That is how it has been with us. His record here, before the courts, and in all his public life has been that of an unswerving abolitionist. He has said so in this House. His contribution to this country is unmatched in our lifetime. He now places before us the value of his experience. It is something to all hon. members, be they retentionists such as myself, or abolitionists by nature, such as the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and, worth bearing in mind.

He has told us that on the basis of his experience as Prime Minister of this country and as a private member that, while he still favours abolition, he would not and could not support a bill that would contribute to the demise of this country by doing away with the right of the state to impose capital punishment for the commission of the crime of treason.

Let me conclude my remarks with a non-partisan appeal to all members, be they abolitionists or retentionists, to support the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, and be consistent. There is no difficulty in doing that. I say to all of them, through you, Sir, that we would all like to live in a kind of world of which we dream, and the kind of world we came here to work for, but we dare not confuse that kind of world with a dream world, a world that still eludes us and is not here and will not be here if we capitulate to the forces of international terrorism. That world will continue to elude us if we open up this country to the heinous crimes that can be committed, indeed, it is sad to say, would be encouraged by leaving out this right of society. That kind of world will elude us as long as those forces are at work. They are at work today, and it is about time we got to work to make sure that the people of Canada are protected and that the future of Canada is ensured, by supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 7 in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred pursuant to order made Tuesday, June 29, 1976.

Capital Punishment

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Motion No. 10 in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and Motion No. 11 in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 3.

[English]

Mr. Reynolds moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 3.

The hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I move this motion for the purpose of deleting clause 3 of Bill C-84. I should like now to explain this motion and the reasons which warrant it.

Section 75(2) of the Criminal Code, notwithstanding the provisions of Bill C-84, states:

(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life, but . . .

And it is this part of the quotation which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has struck out:

. . . but if while committing or attempting to commit piracy he murders or attemps to murder another person or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person he shall be sentenced to death."

Such was the section of the Criminal Code in effect in Canada. The Solicitor General proposes in Bill C-84 that the clause that I have just quoted be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that the Solicitor General by including a clause on piracy in his bill recognized that it is a kind of crime and therefore recognized its existence. In committee, before the end of the proceedings, the minister said that there had been no crime of piracy in Canada since 1900 and that consequently it was not necessary to include it in our bill.

Mr. Speaker, what seems to motivate the Solicitor General is that it is a crime. It was in the Criminal Code. It might look bad to abolish it completely. There has been no such crime in Canada since 1900. It is not that serious and we are going to include it to appease the conscience of Canadians. Then, piracy is still a crime but we will eliminate the penalty provided for attempted murder or premeditated murder.

Mr. Speaker, for this minister, piracy is not a crime punishable by death. I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues on that. What is an act of piracy? Is it the kind of pirate stories we had in the Middle Ages? Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, that it is not that. Modern piracy is when an individual or a group of individuals decide to take hold of a private or public transportation means. It might be an airplane, a train, a boat or a bus. A group of criminals takes over that transportation means in a systematic, premeditated, organized way and while doing it, they endanger the lives of passengers.

Mr. Speaker, it is then a serious situation. It is a mordern phenomenon. The minister said before the committee that it has not happened since 1900 and consequently, it was not really serious. Is it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to have it happen just once and that fifty people be treatened, held hostages on any transportation means in Canada and that there be many victims for the minister to open his eyes and recognize that it is a modern act?

The minister suggested in committee that it was an outdated crime that was no longer committed in our modern times. Well, as everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, there are hijackings, piracy acts in which citizens are held hostages, acts such as what took place in Montreal, some time ago, where a criminal seized a school bus and held children—not adults but children—hostages and threatened them, because he wanted something in return and therefore, he resorted to blackmail, using children's lives, and it happened in the city of Montreal in 1976.

This is therefore a serious and modern act which must be treated seriously and positively. This kind of situation will not be solved by simply glossing over them. I suggest that clause 3 of the Solicitor general's Bill C-84 should be completely removed and that we should come back to the old Criminal Code wich provided for capital punishment in all cases of murder or attempted murder and during piracy acts.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a protection and a positive step we must take. This afternoon, I was listening to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) who said that capital punishment was something abominable and totally regressive, that it is regressive to speak about capital punishment, that we are being as violent as criminals. The minister has controlled information since the very beginning of this debate by referring chiefly to Professor Fattah's studies. He published a number of booklets that were sent to hon. members. Did the people who had the opportunity, the experts who were in favour of capital punishment get the same financial resources from the Department of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to express themselves? No, only those who shared the Solicitor General's view.

Let us use his literature. In the booklet entitled "The fear of punishment", issued by the Law Reform Commission of Canada, it is said in page 73, and I would emphasize that this is a plea that the Solicitor General is using all the time in an attempt to convince members of the House of the value of and need for abolishing capital punishment, in the same kind of argument as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. The argument put forward by Professor Fattah, which the Solicitor General repeated many times like a real parrot, is that first, capital punishment is not an effective deterrent; second, it does not solve the problem and third, we should improve our deterrent methods.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring forward the following argument by beginning with a quotation. On page 72 of the booklet entitled "Fear of punishment" one can read, and I quote:

According to Ball (1955), "there is ample evidence that the complete cessation of police operations is quickly followed by a surge of crime and a chaotic social situation".

Andenaes (1965) . . .

Other examples follow. In Denmark, among other places, in Copenhagen, things have happened. I shall spare the House these quotations. I shall relate an incident that occured in Montreal on October 7, 1969, which is related in the booklet ordered by the Solicitor General, and I quote:

On October 7, 1969, the Montreal police went on strike; nearly 1600 officers and 600 policemen out of a complement of 3833 stopped working. The strikers were claiming wage parity with their Toronto colleagues. The work stoppage lasted 16 hours. During that time, there were nine bank robberies by armed people and seventeen qualified robberies in commercial establishments. A number of stores on St. Catherine Street were pillaged, in centre town. Crimes against property were four times higher than usual in this area. In others, the increase varied between 20 and 300 per cent. On the other hand, they went down in certain areas where people had reinforced surveillance of their stores and houses, certain establishments having moreover closed earlier than usual.

And more figures are used to show that as soon as there is a relaxation in police activity, there is an increase in the number and the seriousnous of crimes. This proves, Mr. Speaker, that the police constitutes a certain deterrent. Everyone recognizes this without a doubt. This is generally preventive force. I refer to the incident in Montreal where a ganster held a group of students hostage in a school bus. At that time, the Montreal Urban Community police intervened. There were called in. They tried to discuss with the criminal, but to no avail. The police forces were armed, the bandit was armed. Mr. Speaker, this was therefore an act of piracy where on the one hand a criminal committed an act of piracy by taking over a public transport vehicle, and this in a manner that was well organized, well thought-out, what we call premeditated.

On the other hand, there are the police forces, those that we pay with our taxes. These police forces are armed, prepared, trained, paid to protect private property, public property, and especially the lives of our fellow citizens. What choice is left to the policeman called in to the scene of this act of piracy by bandits in Montreal, where the criminal had taken over a bus full of children, and I repeat that they were school children? Shoot to kill? Not shoot and hope that the bandit will come to his senses, or else take roundabout ways to try to solve the conflict?

Mr. Speaker, if the bill is passed with clause 3 in its present form, the minister would like us to abolish the death penalty in the case of the bandit who is guilty of an act of piracy, who hijacks a school bus or a plane or a train, who threatens to run it off the tracks or to blow it up, who kidnaps Canadian school children. He is asking us to trust that the criminal will save the lives of those children. That is the first point. Here is the second point: he asks us to trust the police forces to try and solve that very serious problem of threat by armed criminals, but once again without risk, and therefore, I conclude that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) would ask, in a case of piracy, would ask the police force to simply watch the crime without interfering, without using their weapons, to just stand there to show that we have a police force.

I say to the Solicitor General, in conclusion, that it would be ridiculous for the police to put their lives in danger to catch somebody who threatens the lives of thirty children, when they know very well that because of this bill and clause 3 even if they risk their lives and the lives of the children during the shooting, the criminal himself is in no danger. He is protected by the Solicitor General, in clause 3. He says that it is an old-fashioned crime that has not happened since 1900. Apparently he has not been in his constituency of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for a long time, Mr. Speaker. I say that to carry out its duty the police force needs the legal, if not the moral support of the government.

In the accompanying documents, the minister refers to several cases where police action must be reinforced, and there is proof how ridiculous the minister's argumentation can be. What appears even more shocking to me is that in the case referred to in Montreal, among others, we will all remember the press reports and the general outcry raised among the very ones who want the most probity, the most broadness of mind possible with respect to criminals. So there was a great many people, including journalists, observers, the League for Human Rights, the Solicitor General and such other people to blame police agents for having taken action too fast and, thus, having threatened the existence or life of anyone of the children who were in the bus. This, Mr. Speaker, is the height of absurdity! There are even people to blame police forces for having taken action not fast enough, or too fast, thus risking the bandit's life.

Mr. Speaker, that beats all! I understand the point of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Center. As far as he is concerned, we should be very understanding, we should be more trusting. He told us this afternoon that we had not reached the point where we should mistrust our neighbours and look under the bed before going to sleep at night. I understand him, Mr. Speaker, but I would like him to explain the logic in his argument. He claims the death penalty must be abolished in all cases. Oh, come on!

In this case, that, of the school bus, we are dealing with an act of piracy. Or of attempted murder, if not murder, because the police have to put a stop to it. Will the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre carry his argument to its logical end and disarm the police? I ask the question in all seriousness. Why let the police keep their arms when they run the risk of wounding children in the cross-fire when they try to capture the criminal? Why not simply stand there to prove that the criminal is doing wrong?

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre will tell me that it is a deliberate act and that, in any case, the criminal would have committed it. So, let us twiddle our thumbs and let him do whatever he pleases. Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre to see one of his children in such a bus. I would like him to tell me and to explain to me why policemen are armed in such a situation?

Mr. Speaker, this is my point. On the one hand, in the publicity it makes, the government tells us that we must strengthen the police measures and, on the other hand, he speaks about a deterrent. It says that an act of piracy makes no sense and, consequently, that its perpetrator must simply be liable of life imprisonment. Consequently, if there is a murder or a murder attempt, the death penalty will be abolished. Mr. Speaker, I claim that it is not an old crime, it is not something out of fashion, but it is an act that is committed almost every week now throughout the world. The perpetrator of a such act committed in Canada should be recognized as being liable to the death penalty, as was provided for in the old Criminal Code. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the House to study this question very carefully.

As a conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I was saying at the outset, must a single act be committed, must dozens of people die or be killed following an act of piracy for the minister to recognize that it is a modern crime, a crime which could be committed tomorrow morning.

To finish my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like hon. members to understand that my amendment proposes that we simply revert to the application of the old Criminal Code. If, as the Solicitor General told the committee, it is true it is a crime which does not exist, which has not been committed in Canada since 1900, so why does he change the Criminal Code? It does not bother him, he might as well leave it as it is and the problem will be solved.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) said earlier, we are accused of demagogy or, as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre said, we are accused of getting angry because we present amendments or arguments.

But as far as I know, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of every hon. member in this House to analyze each line of this bill since it is life and death issue, not only for criminals but also for innocents. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time for hon. members who analyze this bill only on the basis of criminals to analyze it on the basis of the protection of society and of punitive legislation, to the extent that people are punished according to the intensity or the gravity of the crime they committed.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should clarify one point. The hon. member has called it ten o'clock. Is it agreed that the hon. member will retain his right to speak first tomorrow on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that there is a House order under which the House leaders would meet to discuss the taking of votes either at the report stage or at third reading. The House leaders have met and have decided to recommend that there be votes on Thursday evening of this week at 9.30 p.m. on all the amendments upon which votes have been deferred up to that particular time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the recitation which has been made by the government House leader is a proper one, and I think we should underscore that this means that the vote on the first set of amendments—I forget the numbers, but hon. members know the ones I mean—under the House order would normally have been held on Wednesday but are also now deferred to Thursday, so that the House order which was made has been amended to that extent to accommodate those votes. I want the House to understand that completely. I must say that I am a party to that agreement, and I concur.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what has been said represents our understanding. In other words, on Thursday night at 9.30 there will be votes on motions Nos. 4, 9, 18, 38, and 7, and on any other amendments the debates on which have ended and concerning which votes have been requested up until 9.30 Thursday evening. This is what we understand to be the agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, the government House leader (Mr. Sharp) consulted us on this subject, and we gave our consent on the votes which will have to be held on Thursday on the motions which will be discussed, once the discussion is over. And I specify that we are always dealing with the amendments at the report stage. We are not dealing with third reading. So we agree on this proposal.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because of the fact that it is my interpretation that the previous order was to have the vote within one week of any deferred division, I hope this will be done by unanimous consent. That would exclude any possibility of a question on Wednesday about taking a vote. Is it unanimously agreed that any deferred division at the report stage—

. . . at the report stage as stated by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) concerning this bill . . .

[English]

—with regard to Bill C-84 will be deferred to Thursday, July 8, 1976, at 9.30 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

An hon. Member: He is not here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because of the fact that we called it ten o'clock earlier than ten o'clock, perhaps we can proceed with the calling of another question. Three hon. members have put questions for the adjournment debate: the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. Benjamin: Where have all the Tories gone?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We did in fact finish early.

Mr. Benjamin: No, you didn't; it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It may be that there is some difficulty in terms of the time.

Mr. Benjamin: It was your man who called it ten o'clock. What are you complaining about?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No matter what, it does not make much difference, does it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The only contribution I can make to the discussion is to indicate that I met the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) in the hall a few minutes ago, and he said he cancelled his debate for tonight.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Say goodnight, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Here's Walter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will call upon the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

POST OFFICE—APPLICATION TO OLYMPIC STAMPS OF PROVISION TO WITHDRAW TWELVE MONTHS AFTER ISSUE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I seem to be late but I understood I was No. 2 on the list tonight. Now that I have the priority position I want to raise the question that I brought up in the House last Wednesday with respect to the proliferation of commemorative stamps being issued by the Post Office Department. There has been a growing concern and restlessness in the philatelic community because, as is well known in those circles, it is quite easy to kill the goose that lays the golden egg in the desire—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that not treason?

Mr. Dinsdale: Not in this respect, I might tell the hon. member. In the desire to make as much profit as possible there is a tendency to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Whether the department is trying to reduce the soaring deficit in the Post Office Department, which I think is currently about $675 million, or to make a dent in the soaring Olympic debt which is close to $1 billion, I do not know. Certainly the practice is not enhancing Canada's reputation in the international philatelic community.

In the question on Wednesday I dealt specifically with the issue of the Olympic statue stamp which came on the market on March 14, 1975, and according to a quite specific arrangement should have been withdrawn 12 months later. In his reply the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) indicated that this interpretation was accurate—that there was an understanding with the association to which Canadian stamp collectors belong that new issues would be withdrawn following a 12-month period. When I drew attention to the fact that this $1 and $2 Olympic statue stamp was still available over post office counters, he revised the answer by saying it does not apply to Olympic stamps; indeed, they will not be withdrawn until one year following completion of the Olympic events.

As I have indicated, rather than enhancing the coffers of the Olympics, an over issue and over exposure of stamps means that the total return will be reduced. The market cannot possibly absorb the number of stamps being issued.

This matter came to a head in 1973. Dealers were called into a special meeting at the headquarters of the Post Office on December 5, 1973. The meeting was chaired by Mr. Bill Eyre, who is the manager of the philatelic retail products and market development section. The deputy postmaster general made an appearance to reinforce the significance of the meeting. Out of the meeting came a communiqué which purported to cover the matters that were raised. As set out on page 3, paragraph (e) of the memorandum the meeting reached the conclusion that the new public sales policy of the Canada Post Office to be explained in detail at a meeting on February 1, 1974, would mark the implementation of some significant changes. All stamps would be sold in a package format and would be available for 12 months only from the date of issue. That was the reply the Postmaster General gave to me last Wednesday before he issued the revised version. I have confirmed by discussion since last Wednesday with people who are knowledgeable in the field across the country that this is a restatement of policy upon which there has been no consultation.

The Canadian Stamp Dealers Association assure me that their understanding of the results of that meeting in 1973 are precisely the same as the conclusion I read indicated, namely, that there is a definite agreement with the trade that all stamps will be removed after 12 months exposure on the open market. It even goes further than that. The promise was made that any remaining stocks will be destroyed. Usually popular issues of stamps are sold out within a few months. Because of the over-issue tendency, the market has been adulterated.

I think whoever replies for the Postmaster General tonight, and I presume it will be the parliamentary secretary, will agree that it would be a much more profitable venture if the number of issues were kept on a marketable basis and if the promise that was made to the trade were kept, as has been requested.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I always welcome questions and the chance to debate with the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) because he is very knowledgeable about the Post Office.

There may be some confusion here. Perhaps we can clear it up this evening. Postage stamps are divided into two categories. There are the philatelic quality commemorative stamps sold to all collectors, and the regular stamps used to prepay postage.

Philatelic quality commemorative stamps are sold from philatelic outlets and the headquarters mail order service for a period of one year, in the various forms such as full panes, corner blocks, and so forth. In addition semi-annual pre-packs containing a single stamp of each issue are made up and sold for a period of 12 months. These also are sold only from philatelic outlets and the mail order service.

Regular quality commemorative stamps are usually sold out at post offices within a few weeks. However, a special situation has arisen with the Olympic $1 and $2 commemorative postage stamps (sculptures) which were printed in sufficient quantities to be on sale in post offices for a longer period in order to give full publicity to the holding of the Olympics in Canada. These stamps were on sale in post offices after the first anniversary of the date of issue. While they are no longer being supplied by our distribution depots, some post offices may be selling the residue until the supply is exhausted.

If philatelic quality stamps were being sold from philatelic outlets, other than the special packages, after March 14, this was in error. We are inquiring into this now, and if we find an error has been made it will be corrected immediately. I would appreciate any information the hon. member can give us to support an investigation of this kind.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—ALLEGATION MR. BISSONNETTE IS LINKED WITH COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I refer to the question I asked on June 21 with regard to the activities of Mr. A. L. Bissonnette, a member of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. My question arose as a result of inquiries made in this House by my colleagues, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. McKay) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), relating to the activities of the chairman of the tribunal, Mr. Gauthier.

I realize that the next day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) made a statement with respect to the activities of the chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal and with respect to Mr. Bissonnette, a member of that tribunal. Unfortunately I was not able to be present at the time of the statement and the questioning of the minister and it occurred to me there were some questions with respect to this whole situation which the minister might not have answered at that time.

We shall have to draw attention to the whole question of conflict of interest with respect to the order in council activity of the government, with respect to the activities, in this case, of the chairman and members of the board which might infringe the guidelines covering conflict of interest in relation to public servants. The minister was at great pains to explain that the conflict of interest guidelines did not apply to this particular area of quasi-judicial appointments.

What bothered me about the answers the minister gave at that time was that under the act members of the board are required to devote their full time and attention to the activities of the anti-dumping tribunal. In such a situation I find it difficult to come to terms with the minister's explanations with regard to the members of the board holding directorships in various corporations, as this reflects upon their responsibilities to the appointments they hold. In the case of Mr. Bissonnette, the minister stated he had been asked to divest himself of his seat on various boards of directors, but it seems to me the government ought to give serious consideration to establishing a particular administrative procedure to deal with situations of this kind.

In cases of this sort, where appointments are made by order in council, particularly when there is a statutory requirement that those appointed should devote their whole time and attention to their duties, such persons might be required to make a declaration periodically that they had in fact refrained from carrying on activities other than those they were required to carry out under the legislation, in this instance as members of the anti-dumping tribunal. When the act is as specific as it is in this instance, it seems to me it raises an issue quite apart from that of conflict of interest.

We could discuss ad infinitum the question of the propriety of members appointed to any tribunal involved in export and import activities acting as directors of other corporations engaged, perhaps, in similar activities. We may question that, but it seems to me that in this particular case the point was missed by the minister that there was an explicit and specific prohibition against any of these members acting in any other capacity.

The point of my grievance with respect to the answer of the minister when he undertook, in response to my question, to give a full and detailed explanation of the requirements that the government felt were incumbent upon Mr. Bissonnette, is that there is only a request by the minister that he divest himself, subsequent to the disclosure of his activities, of his directorships of corporations. There is no coming to terms with government policy regarding whether or not there should be some administrative procedure by the government respecting order in council appointments, that such people in fact make a declaration, not necessarily of their holdings but whether they are contravening the statutory provision that they shall devote their full time and attention to their particular responsibility.

This question is very important to us since we find ourselves questioning people who have been appointed by order in council using government facilities and expertise for private purposes and interests. Notwithstanding the question of conflict of interest, it seems to me that this matter—I see you are rising in your place, Mr. Speaker—is one in which this whole question of devoting full time and attention to a position should be answered by the government.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it is true that the hon. member was not present when the minister made a statement the day after the question was raised in the House. The minister assured him that he would be making a statement in the House. The question was raised prior to that, on June 15, by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who participated in the debate the following day when the minister made his statement. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) also participated in the debate in regard to the procedure followed by the minister when he made the statement.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised some very interesting points, but had he been in the House following the questions raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe he would have heard the same apprehensions suggested to the minister. I feel from reading the record of that debate that these apprehensions have been answered. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar says that they were not, and indeed goes beyond that. I think he is referring to section 21, subsection (7), and to the question of whether the minister made a statement that is in accordance with what the hon. member was expecting; I think that is the point at issue at this time.

The second point I should like to devote some attention to is that we should have an annual review of the investments or directorships that the various members of the board may have. It would be of some interest to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to spend some time reading the comments made in the other place on the subject of conflict of interest. Possibly there are some areas that are not clear, but I think the two officers the hon. member mentioned did comply with the conflict of interest guidelines. They have taken notice of them, know what they are, and have answered all the clauses contained in the conflict of interest guidelines. This may not be satisfactory, and in the way he has raised the question there may be another procedure, but this has not been determined. It can certainly be considered when this is reviewed. As I say, it would be of some interest to the hon. member and to ourselves to look at the report which has been tabled and act on it, perhaps including some of the recommendations made this evening.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Monday, July 5, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motions No. 10 (Mr. Fortin), No. 11 (Mr. Reynolds).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta raised a point of order about the allocation of time to speakers on report stage motions, it being within the Standing Orders that the mover of a motion is entitled to 40 minutes. Since there are groupings of motions which in fact reduced the possibility of speeches on separate motions, the difficulty which remains is this: should the mover of a motion which has been filed in time be deprived of his right to make a 40 minute speech within the standing orders just because it has been grouped with other motions?

I would be pleased to listen to contrary views but I must say I cannot see how the Chair can deprive the mover of a motion of his right to make a 40 minute speech simply because motions have been grouped for the purposes of discussions and voting. I think it would be an unfair extension of the rule to say that the mover should be deprived of his 40 minutes because his motion has been grouped in that way. Further, it would be extremely difficult for the Chair to decide which motion had been moved first, or which mover should, so to speak, have priority.

Thus it would seem fair to say that any mover of a motion, whether it be debated alone or in common with others, ought to be entitled to all that is coming to him, at least in terms of time allocation under the Standing Order, although I am sure it is not the hope of all that maximum advantage will be taken of that opportunity by every speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to agree wholeheartedly with what you have just said. I might mention one further point. Under Standing Order 75, the Chair is given a great deal of latitude when it comes to grouping motions which are to be considered. I would not want this discretion to be impaired by the feeling that certain groupings should, perhaps, not be made in order to preserve the rights of individual movers to their 40 minutes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the statement you have made is fair. I do not see there is any problem having heard your ruling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker since what we are discussing involves the use of time I shall avoid using too much of it at this point. Furthermore, since there seems to be agreement with the position the Chair has taken, I find I am a voice crying in the wilderness. Nevertheless I should like to express unhappiness at the way things are going.

Let me put it this way, Mr. Speaker. There are 16 members of this party. Supposing we have an issue on which we feel very strongly and all 16 of us put down the same amendment. Would all 16 of us have the right to speak for 40 minutes? It seems to me that concomitant with the right of the chair to group motions for debate in order to save time should be the right of the chair to say that only one mover will have 40 minutes. However, I have stated my opposition. I realize that opinion seems to be the other way, but I just wanted to enter my view.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): On behalf of our party, the Social Credit Party of Canada, we are quite pleased with your ruling that each mover is entitled to use, in accordance with Standing Order 75, 40 minutes to make a speech. In reply to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said that he is somewhat frustrated in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I must say that in other cases, when his party is carrying on the fight, he surely speaks in a different way.

However, I would like to remind him that there is a difference at the present time. If all the NDP members wanted to introduce the same motion, it would certainly be new tactics or a collusion among the members of that party. I will humbly point out, Mr. Speaker, that there is no collusion between the Progressive Conservative Party and the Social Credit Party of Canada. It is merely coincidence if some motions are repeated and consequently I feel that the Progressive Conservative and Social Credit members enjoy the same privilege. This is why I am very pleased with your very wise ruling.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In respect of the point of view raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think a brief comment is warranted. The ruling of the Chair last week with respect to motions to delete was, of course, different in a very fundamental way from the ruling with respect to motions to amend. Motions to amend were held to a strict line and ruled out of order on the basis of their contravention of the principle of the bill. There was an argument that the Chair could and should have done the same thing with motions to delete, but a result of doing the same thing in respect of motions to delete would, in my opinion, be to deprive a private member of this House of a very important right to a counterbalancing power from that which takes place in standing committee. I do not think it was ever intended that the only time the House can be put to a count on the clause of a bill is when clause by clause analysis of the bill takes place in standing committee. A private member has the right to do this here by way of a motion to delete. I think that is a separate, independent and very important right, and it is the basis of the differentiation between the two.

With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the quickest way to persuade the Chair that that right ought to be interfered with would be for 16 members of the same caucus to put down the same motion. Indeed, if report stage motions to delete or any report stage motions do become at any future time the subject of abuse in that sense, it may not be within the power of the Chair to take that right away, but certainly the attitude of the Chair would have to change, and likely the attitude of the procedure committee as well.

In any case, so long as we are now dealing with what appears to be a conscientious use of report stage motions, in respect of the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I would think the situation that he has described would be somewhat different. In the present context it seems to me impossible to expect the Chair to choose between two movers of the same motion acting independently and deprive one of them of the right to an extra 20 minutes. Again, I hope all hon. members will be conscientious in the advantage that they take of that rule.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, now that you have ruled that I can take 40 minutes I do not intend to take that time. However, I must say that I am a little shocked at the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that we might be trying to delay the House. As the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) has said, there is no collusion between our parties or between him and me in regard to these two motions. We just happened to agree and placed them on the order paper. I am rather shocked that such an hon. member would do anything to inhibit the free speech of the members of the House, or even suggest such. If you refer to Hansard you will find that in the past had not members of his party, such as Frank Howard, delayed this House with the divorce legislation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the hon. member return to a discussion of the terms of this bill.

Mr. Reynolds: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that we should get back to the bill, but hon. members took 20 minutes of the House's time talking on a point of order. I think that one of the points in this bill that should be brought out relates to comparing clause 3 of the present legislation with clause 3 of the proposed legislation which we are now debating. Subsection 75(2) of the act at present reads as follows:

> Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life, but if while committing or attempting to commit piracy he murders or attempts to murder another person or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person he shall be sentenced to death.

Clause 3 of this bill provides as follows:

> Subsection 75(2) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life."

What concerns me about these provisions is that now the penalty is going to be the same for someone who hijacks an aeroplane, whether he or she attempts to murder or does murder. There is no deterrent at all for anybody—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The Solicitor General is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I should make clear that the section under discussion does not relate to hijacking but to piracy. Piracy relates to the piracy of ships. Subsection 75(2)—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Allmand: Read the Code. Section 76 is the hijacking of aircraft section and we are not dealing with that in this bill at all. The section being amended by the hon. member relates to the piracy of ships, and that is all that is under discussion, not the hijacking of aircraft.

Mr. Reynolds: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister is using legal terms in talking about the difference between piracy and hijacking. The point I am making is that if somebody took a ship by means of piracy, it is the same sort of thing as hijacking. Under the present law, if the person who takes the ship by piracy kills somebody or attempts to kill somebody, he is going to pay the supreme penalty. Under the law that the Solicitor General is putting forward, if he kills everybody on the ship he is going to pay the same penalty as if he is caught and just walks off the ship. I think that kind of law is dangerous and it is why I think this section should be changed.

We have been talking about deterrence, and many times during the committee hearings the Solicitor General tried to show that Professor Isaac Ehrlich's studies on economics were not relevant. He quoted other people in committee who had said that everything that Professor Ehrlich had said was not relevant. I came across an article written by Michael T. Malloy headline "Punishment is a deterrent to crime; so say economists whose data seemingly refute reform the criminal theories".

What I think we should be arguing here is whether this provision of the bill constitutes a deterrent. It is a very important part of the bill. I should like to put some of this article on record because it contradicts some of the points made by the Solicitor General in committee. Mr. Malloy also refers to some very well known economists who support Dr. Ehrlich's theories. Mr. Malloy says:

One of the reasons we stoppped hanging, gassing, and electrocuting murderers in the United States was that the experts said it did no good. In study after study, they found no connection between a state's use of capital punishment and the rate at which its citizens were murdererd. The death penalty had already fallen into disuse when the Supreme Court struck down most capital punishment laws as unconstitutional in 1972.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, this decision was reversed a short while ago. He continues:

Even though the deterrent effect of the death penalty was not a major issue in that ruling, at least five of the nine justices took note of the scholarly evidence in their written opinions. The best studies, wrote Justice Thurgood Marshall, "demonstrate that there is no correlation between the murder rate and the presence or absence of the capital sanction."

Now a new breed of experts has come along with studies that challenge this and other beliefs about crime and punishment. If their findings become accepted by judges, politicians, and voters, they could shift the emphasis of our legal system from trying to reform criminals to deliberately punishing them.

Prof. Isaac Ehrlich of the University of Chicago has challenged the conventional wisdom about capital punishment. Using the economists' arcane techniques of econometrics, he seems to have demonstrated that the death penalty does work: His analysis suggests that seven or eight innocent lives are saved with every execution.

Ehrlich's analysis could affect the fates of hundreds of death-row prisoners, because the Supreme Court is expected to rule this year on whether all capital-punishment laws are unconstitutional.

As I mentioned earlier, the Supreme Court has made that ruling and has held that they are constitutional under certain conditions.

The article continues:

His study was so striking that even before it was published last year, the Justice Department submitted a typescript copy to the Court along with its brief in favour of the death penalty.

That is the point I think we should talk about. The United States Justice Department is in favour of capital punishment because the studies have shown there is a deterrent effect. I think in this clause especially we should be talking about deterrence.

To continue:

Erhlich's work on the death penalty may be ignored by the Court or discredited by other scholars. But other yound economists are bringing their computers and equations to the study of robbery, burglary, and crime in general. Poaching in a field that was long dominated by psychologists and sociologists, they approach it from a substantially different point of view.

"The standard criminologist has been living in a dream world for at least 150 years," says Prof. Gordon Tullock of Virginia Polytechnic Institute. "They've thought that the cause of crime is not the economic return sought by some people, but an illness or some sort of disease. Eighty per cent of the people who seriously think about crime think about punishment as a deterrent—except for the sociologists, and they wrote all the books."

Some of the books state flatly that punishment does not deter crime. More say there is no evidence that it does. This belief has changed the official mission of the criminal-justice system. Parole, probation, and the wideshpread use of indeterminate sentences (0 to 20 years for the same kind of crime) are largely based on the goal of reform rather than punishment. Even prisons are officially defined as "correctional" institutions and "reformatories."

"Economists tend to believe that crime, far from being the result of sickness or mental disorder, in most cases is simply a business-oriented economic activity which is undertaken for much the same reasons as other types of economic activity," Tullock and David Meiselman wrote in the preface to The Economics of Crime and Punishment.

"To reduce the frequency of crime, economists generally recommend we raise the costs of crime. It would be difficult to find a more revolutionary departure from the conventional wisdom."

"We postulate that people only decide to enter crime if they expect it to pay," says Prof. Gary S. Becker of the University of Chicago, who helped pioneer the application of econometrics to crime in the late '60s. "Whether, in fact, it does pay is more difficult to get numbers on; there have been studies indicating it does pay.

"Much of my work has been on the question of deterrence. I think we have reasonably strong evidence that people are deterred from crime (by the prospect of punishment). It is not committed only by sick persons who can't help it. The assertion has been made until now that criminals are not deterred. What evidence there is goes the other way."

"When imprisonment is more certain and more severe, those states that have more punishment tend to have less crime," says Alfred Blumstein of Carnegie-Mellon University, who heads a National Academy of Sciences panel that is examining all the evidence on deterrence. "That's what the statistics show. That's what everyone finds."

Blumstein is not convinced, however, that the connection that economists find between crime and punishment proves that punishment deters crime. He says the same figures could just as well show that crime deters punishment because out-of-hand crime rates overwhelm police and courts and prisons, making criminals less likely to be caught, convicted, or jailed.

There's a more obvious reason to challenge the economists. Remember that they start by assuming that people don't commit crimes unless the benefits outweigh the costs, and that therefore punishment should deter crime. Isn't it questionable when their econometric answers confirm their assumptions?

No, they reply, that's the way econometrics works. The practitioner starts with a set of assumptions, turns them into equations, and assembles the equations into a mathematical model. If his model works when it is fed known data from the past, then it is probably a fair approximation of the real world. If it doesn't, he goes back to the drawing board. Erhlich's model was fed murder and execution data from 1933 through 1967, and it seemed to work best when its equations were consistent with an estimate that one death sentence deterred seven or eight murders.

Mr. Erhlich's work has been backed up by some very strong professionals in this field. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has presented arguments before the committee which I do not think have convinced many of us, yet the people who back up Dr. Erhlich's work are well respected in the fields of both economics and crime.

I suggest that in respect of this clause of the bill dealing with piracy we must think about deterring. I think there can be a deterrent in this area when you are thinking of a man who has pirated a ship and is holding hostages. If the penalty is the same as if he had murdered a few people this leaves those hostages in very great difficulty. Perhaps the individual might think that if he gets rid of all the evidence he would have a much better chance of getting away. I hope those listening to this debate will think about this very seriously. This clause is another very much like clause 2 which members of this House, even abolitionists, should consider very seriously supporting in order to protect those people who may be caught in this very serious situation.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to say a few words on motions Nos. 10 and 11 that have been grouped because they are dealing with the same clause, since it is the only opportunity available to us to show our opposition to Bill C-84 to abolish completely capital punishment. I also congratulate my hon. colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who moved motion No. 10 on June 28, 1976, which reads as follows:

That Bill C-84, an Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 3.

And I quote section 3 in the former act which reads as follows:

● (1130)

"(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life, but if while committing or attempting to commit piracy he murders or attempts to murder another person or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person he shall be sentenced to death."

And here is what is provided in clause 3 as proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand):

"(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life."

Mr. Speaker, we can see the trick used by the minister probably to minimize the impact of his amendment. He completely puts aside what was essential in the previous bill, namely the condition that someone kills while attempting to commit piracy. The minister uses only the first part of the present bill, with which we all agree, to remove the part that is now controversial. It reminds me of the second reading vote which he regarded as an acceptance of his bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is a limit to talking nonsense. Everyone knows full well that the vote was merely intended to refer Bill C-84 to the standing committee of the House for detailed study, and mainly to call in witnesses. Indeed, it often happens that hon. members vote for a bill on second reading to refer it to committee and, when they are not satisfied with that study, those same hon. members vote against the bill on third reading.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are simply disgusted with the government's refusal to call in witnesses before the committee. We had intended to call in many witnesses but the minister simply refused to have it that way. He told us we had no need of that. That is why we brought in 14 amendments which you accepted, Mr. Speaker. All those amendments are intended to allow us to do in this House what we were unable to do in committee, because of the dictatorship of this government.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this must open the eyes of the population. Indeed the people are very much awake, and we now know that 90 per cent of them are against the action of the minister, are in fact in favour of keeping the death penalty.

Needless to say, I support the amendment on piracy.

A while ago I heard the Solicitor General call one of my colleagues back to order again with regard to the subject of piracy, saying that he was merely referring to the pirates of old, the old sea pirates. I think it might be wise to ask ourselves what piracy is today. Today, we are no longer living as people did 2,000 ago. In days of yore, a pirate was defined as an adventurer who combed the seas in search of brigandage. But with the years, we have come to call a pirate any man who grows rich through plunder. That is the modern definition of a pirate. Today, he may be a banker and nowadays in our sophisticated and mechanised society the most dangerous pirates do not operate either on the sea or on land but in the air. They are what we normally and logically call air pirates and I was about to include among them all public transportation pirates who use the powerful weapon of human hostages to reach their goals. The reasons for all that piracy are many but I shall mention only the main ones. First of all the lust for money which involves sacrificing even human lives to get millions. Second, the release of some prisoners who are friends of the pirates, third piracy for national and ideological issues. Piracy may also be used to upset governments. To try to upset the government to protest against the establishment is also a kind of piracy which endangers human life and may even require murder.

Right now, we are going through a period of high crime rate and over the last 15 years we have witnessed all possible crimes in modern piracy. Scarcely one week elapses without the newspapers reporting a plane hold up by well armed and well trained terrorists, hostages taking a high official being kidnapped to fulfill political ends, and so forth. And what about kidnappings as they happened in the last few years, even in our small regions where sordid murders took place, following seclusions to get a few thousands dollars? I still remember the sad autumn in Quebec when minister Laporte was executed by a gang of terrorists, after being kidnapped and secluded for a long time. Even buses filled with schoolboys were used as hostages by bandits to get to their ends.

We see so many kidnappings and crimes increasing at the same pace as the law is flouted because responsible people became irresponsible, wishing to abolish the only punishment that might clean up our society from all these crooks, who are multiplying every time they win a battle over law and order forces. As far as I am concerned, I say that pirates are winners when they manage to get everything they want from some country's authorities and even having themselves flown into a country of their own choice at public expense after disturbing peace and often committing the worst assassinations.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder when the government, instead of acting hypocritically as it does today, will wake up and come to support police forces and all prison guards who are clamouring for government action, for more rigid legislation, first to be protected and then to protect the entire population. Far from doing this, we are letting everything go. One of these days we are going to wake up in the most complete anarchy. The present minister will probably not be here any more. He will have run away, but the people will face the consequences of his action today. In the face of all this, the minister has nothing better to do than proposing life imprisonment for misfits in clause 3 of his bill C-84. But what does life imprisonment mean to the minister? This is a question we have to ask ourselves now because we cannot trust what he says. We judge man according to his actions because he must indeed be judged so. Past actions stand as evidence of things to come and the past is not good at all. Here is the evidence for this. Over the years, although he had promised to impose capital punishment on all those who would kill police officers and prison guards, what has he done? Nothing at all, Mr. Speaker. Since then, many police officers have been killed by the bandits they were trying to arrest, and never did the present minister have the courage to live up to the promise he had made here in the House. Are we doing to trust him again when he suggests life imprisonment for acts of piracy? In my opinion, when the minister says "life imprisonment", he may mean, depending on his whim, 25 years, or 10 years, or even 5 years.

The Solicitor General should cease making meaningless promises which he never keeps. For, if this clause is not eliminated, air pirates—and God knows we hear of many of them every day, people who take over airplanes and keep hundreds of passengers as hostages—will continue to multiply, because they will know they can count on the laws of this country to protect them. Society is so insecure today that a great many people dare not travel by plane, for fear of meeting a new group of bandits. And yet, everybody rejoice when military authorities carry out some daring action, such as the successful one by the Israeli forces, even at the possible cost of innocent lives. Let us suppose for a moment that these pirates had succeeded in their blackmail attempt, the main purpose of which was to obtain the liberation of their partners held behind bars; there would now be eight more heroes among these air pirates. And the fear among the public would be eight times greater, and so would be the fear within the country. After all this killing, these acts of piracy, the minister cannot help crying over the fate of the killers, but what has he done and what is he doing for the victims of these hired killers? Nothing, less than nothing.

They do not even mention their names. Whereas those victims will be handicapped for the rest of their lives, our noble murderers will have an easy time in other countries or comfortably accommodated in our detention centres at the expense of all Canadian workers. Some will wait for parole which the minister, as ever, will grant them generously, while others will watch for an escape opportunity to get out and commit other heinous crimes or even murders since they do not have anything to fear any more in this respect.

I have always held the principle that the most efficient way to clear out weeds is to get rid of them. It is the same for society, Mr. Speaker. I am not wondering whether capital punishment is a means or the best deterrent to prevent other crimes. I say that the best way to prevent other crimes is to do away with criminals. Contrary to life imprisonment, capital punishment prevents any escape and all law abiding citizens can live peacefully.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the two motions now before us which deal with the matter of piracy which is now found in sections 75 and 76 of the Criminal Code. First, I should like to challenge the comment of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that somehow or other skyjacking is not piracy under the existing law. I find that very surprising and I think it is another example of the Solicitor General perhaps not even understanding the Criminal Code which he has been called upon to administer.

The motion that we have before us proposes that clause 3 of Bill C-84 be deleted. Clause 3 simply refers to subsection (2) of section 75 of the Criminal Code. To make this debate relevant I think it is necessary, first of all, to look at subsection (1) of section 75. Subsection (1) states: "Everyone commits piracy who does any act that by the laws of nations is piracy". In short, what we must do to define piracy—whether or not the Solicitor General likes it—is to find out what the law of the nation says is piracy.

If I may, I should like to go through the history of piracy to show what happened in the Harvard draft which, was when first introduced, proposed sanctions for various forms of piracy as defined in the Harvard draft, the Geneva convention and right down to the Montreal convention. Then, I would like to refer hon. members to the treaty signed between the United States and the Republic of Cuba dealing specifically with skyjacking.

Before I speak on that, however, I should like to draw hon. members' attention and, particularly the attention of the Solicitor General, to other sections in the Criminal Code. We are now dealing with subsection (2) of section 75. Section 76 of the Criminal Code sets out various piratical acts, as they are called. Skyjacking in 1972 was referred to specifically, not in a separate section under the Criminal Code, but in subsections under section 76 dealing with piracy. I am referring to section 76.1, 76.2, and 76.3. I suggest that that was a very natural section for the government to amend when it wanted to have more severe penalties with regard to skyjacking because they knew that under the laws of nations skyjacking is an integral part of piracy. So where else would you amend the Criminal Code but simply under the piracy sections?

The reason I raise this point is that I think we must then read section 75 and all of 76, including the skyjacking provisions, to see their impact if the Solicitor General and the government get their wish in the amendment they are now proposing to Bill C-84. In short, they will put Canada in the position of being the most hospitable nation for skyjackers in this area of the world. In 1974, the United States Congress passed a law dealing specifically with piracy in the air, as it was called, and specifically providing for the death penalty in cases where any plane from the United States is involved. As I have said, Cuba has a treaty with the United States dealing with the question of air piracy, and as we know, Cuba is a retentionist nation. Russia, Japan, Ireland, St. Pierre and Miquelon are all retentionist. In fact, every nation around Canada is a retentionist nation, and if the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) make piracy an offence punishable only by imprisonment for life, that will mean we are the most hospitable nation in this part of the world for those who would seize planes for whatever purpose.

In support of what I am saying I refer hon. members first to the Harvard Draft, which was prepared in the early 1950's. It was a draft prepared in anticipation of the Geneva Convention, and again I emphasize that I am trying to look for exactly what the law of nations is as referred to in section 75(1) with regard to piracy. In the Harvard draft under the title "Piracy"—and I emphasize that; there was no equivocation—various definitions which were used in their proposed convention were set out. Item 5 states:

> The term "ship" means any water craft or air-craft of whatever size.

It goes on to mention, for example, that a ship may retain its national character although it has become a pirate ship, and that the retention or loss of national character is determined by the law of the state from which it was derived. In short, it is only a draft. I simply draw hon. members' attention to the fact that in the initial draft before the Geneva Convention there was no question that piracy was something which involved not only ships on the high seas but also aircraft in the skies.

I have here the Convention of the High Seas signed in April, 1958—by Canada, incidentally—known as the Geneva Convention. It states:

> All states shall cooperate to the fullest possible extent in the repression of piracy on the high seas or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any state.

Article 15 states:

> Piracy consists of any of the following acts: (a) any illegal acts of violence, detention or any act . . . committed for private ends by the crew or the passengers of a private ship or private aircraft, and directed (a) On the high seas, against another ship or aircraft, or against persons or property on board such ship or aircraft; (b) Against a ship, aircraft persons or property in a place outside the jurisdiction of any State;

It goes on to mention the various things which were to be included in that Geneva Convention. I re-emphasize that Canada signed that.

A refinement of the Geneva Convention was the Tokyo Convention in 1969, again signed by Canada. Incidentally, when I say that these conventions were signed, I think it is very interesting because these conventions have been signed by Canada right up to recent times, and who signs right beside us? The Republic of China. We saw fit to sign conventions dealing with piracy along with the Republic of China, but for some odd reason we are now told that in terms of Olympic sport the same Republic of China has no business using that name in Montreal. I mention that because surely that is another example of the inconsistency of this government.

Let me again go through the various conventions. On December 12, 1969 the United Nations General Assembly dealt with this question and set out that there should be severe penalties for such things as skyjacking, which comes under the general definition of piracy. The Hague Convention of 1970 was signed in December of that year and states:

> Each Contracting State undertakes to make the offence punishable by severe penalties.

In that case they were referring to the offence of piracy of aircraft, or skyjacking, whichever term hon. members prefer.

The Montreal Convention was, I suppose, the last main convention signed by various states of the world touching on this subject. That convention was signed in September, 1971 and came into force in January, 1973. It specifically set out that there should be severe penalties for the kind of thing to which we are now referring, and I re-emphasize that it simply highlighted the fact that the whole question of skyjacking is simply part of an over-all international approach to attempt to halt piracy.

With that background I would now like to discuss the response of the United States. The United States as well as Canada signed the Montreal, the Hague, Tokyo and Geneva Conventions. What have the Americans decided to do with regard to air piracy? I refer hon. members to the anti-hijacking act of 1974 which provides under the heading "Aircraft Piracy Outside Special Aircraft Jurisdiction of the United States" the following:

> Whoever aboard an aircraft in flight outside the special aircraft jurisdiction of the United States commits 'an offense' as defined in the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft . . .

That is the longer name for the Montreal Convention.

> . . . and is afterward found in the United States shall be punished—
> (A) by imprisonment for not less than 20 years; or
> (B) if the death of another person results from the commission or attempted commission of the offense, by death or by imprisonment for life.

That was passed in 1974 by the Congress of the United States, and I suggest that it is comparable to the section the government now proposed to delete from the Criminal Code of Canada. The following is the government's wording as it now stands in the Criminal Code:

> Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life, but if while committing or attempting to commit piracy he murders or attempts to murder another person or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person he shall be sentenced to death.

If the Criminal Code is left intact with regard to aircraft piracy or piracy on the high seas, then a law exists which is comparable to the law passed in 1974 by the Congress of the United States, I suggest in answer to the conventions the Americans signed along with Canada at Montreal, the Hague, Tokyo and Geneva.

Is it not strange that our biggest neighbour passed a law as recently as 1974 to put teeth into what they call their aircraft piracy law in the form of the death penalty while we in Canada have that provision in our Criminal Code and choose, if we follow the pattern set by the government, to delete that provision? Even if all hon. members in this House were abolitionists, surely they would not be acting responsibly if they expected Canada to become the only totally abolitionist nation in this part of the world with respect to aircraft piracy. Let us think of what will happen if this section is deleted, as the government proposes. It will mean that a person who has taken over an aircraft might deliberately direct that aircraft to be flown to Canada because he will know that there is no death penalty here.

If this section is deleted, he could execute everyone on that aircraft, and the law of the land will say that the worst penalty he will have to pay will be imprisonment for life. Is that really what even abolitionists are willing to live with? I can see some argument that if the United States, Russia, Ireland or any other country was abolitionist as far as air piracy is concerned, there would not be that kind of pressure put on Canada where we might end up with an air piracy that has nothing to do with us except that the pirates know this is a safe haven; that even if people die as a result of it, the maximum penalty the government could enforce is life imprisonment. I think that is the crux of the two motions now before us. Do we, as members, want to go that far, bearing in mind that, like it or not, this is a retentionist world, and the nations around us have chosen to say that air piracy is an offence and if death occurs as a result, the death penalty may be prescribed?

I could read various other sections of the act passed by the United States Congress which deal with this question. Section 104 states:

(1) Whoever commits or attempts to commit aircraft piracy, as herein defined, shall be punished—

"(A) by imprisonment for not less than 20 years; or

"(B) if the death of another person results from the commission or attempted commission of the offence, by death or by imprisonment for life."

Again, under the heading "Procedure in respect of penalty for aircraft piracy", it reads:

(c) (1) A person shall be subjected to the penalty of death for any offence prohibited by section 902(i) or 902(n) of this act only if a hearing is held in accordance with this subsection.

It goes on to express many jury provisions, and that type of thing, which would apply in the case of someone who was being tried on charge of aircraft piracy. I raise this point because I think it is important to refute what I would suggest was the misrepresentation of the Solicitor General that somehow skyjacking is not piracy. Our own law is clear, Mr. Speaker. Subsection 1 of section 75 of the Criminal Code is not going to be changed. It makes it very clear. It reads:

Every one commits piracy who does any act that, by the law of nations, is piracy—

Note that, Mr. Speaker, "by the law of nations". I believe the Solicitor General owes it to this House to explain what he understands to be the law of nations as far as piracy is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I have cited the various conventions where this question has been dealt with. I have shown the history in some 20 years of how the various nations have interpreted and defined piracy. I think it is now up to the Solicitor General to tell this House why he believes piracy does not include skyjacking. Certainly, there is no definition in the Criminal Code that he can rely upon that would automatically say that in respect of the law of nations, piracy somehow means something different in Canada from what it means in the other nations of the world. Bearing this in mind, Mr. Speaker, I think those who have already expressed, much more ably than I have, the terror of aircraft piracy have a good point. Surely, in our rush to amend, to become an abolitionist nation, we should hesitate and look at what is happening in some other nations.

I believe, and I think I am correct, that somehow this government has become obsessed with waiting to be one of the first nations in the world to become totally abolitionist. The world is not ready for that, Mr. Speaker. The people of Canada are not ready for that. I think even the government agrees that about 80 per cent of the Canadian people believe we should retain the death penalty for at least some crimes. I think if you were to ask the people of Canada—and I would challenge the government to have a plebiscite on this—if they think the death penalty should be retained with respect to air piracy, or piracy generally, well over 80 per cent of the people would say yes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: That is why I ask that all members of the House, regardless of their personal feelings, accept the world as it is. It is a retentionist world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for allowing me a few additional minutes. I will sum up by saying that I can understand abolitionist members in this House stating that they believe, in conscience, that we should do away with the death penalty. I ask them also to consider whether it is wise to do away with the death penalty with respect to an offence such as piracy, bearing in mind that piracy is not something that will occur only within the boundaries of Canada but has an international relationship. Piracy occurs on the high seas or in the air, under no direct sovereign control. Is it right that we should allow Canadians, through our Criminal Code amendments, to get out of step with the rest of the world so that Canada may become a haven for those who commit air piracy? I believe the majority of Canadians—80 per cent or more—would say no. I think those in this House who would support the government with regard to abolition for all, in the sense of ordinary crime, would stop at the crime of air piracy.

That is what is before us today, Mr. Speaker. I sincerely hope that those who up to this point have rather generally supported the government will say, on the question of air piracy, "I call a halt. I think the death penalty should be retained."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) have argued that section 75 of the Criminal Code, which deals with piracy, also covers air hijacking or air piracy. I have said it does not, because in 1972 this House passed legislation dealing specifically with aircraft hijacking. Section 76.1 of the Criminal Code deals with the hijacking of aircraft, section 76.2 deals with endangering the safety of aircraft in flight and rendering aircraft incapable of flying, and section 76.3 deals with carrying offensive weapons or explosive substances on aircraft or putting them on aircraft. Section 75 does not deal with air piracy, because we have that very specific and particular section following it which deals with the very subject. This amendment was passed in 1972 by this House in response to the air piracy and air hijacking question at that time, following international discussion.

I have consulted the Department of Justice and am told that because we have specific sections dealing with air hijacking, these prevail over the general sections and that is the general interpretation of the law. When we passed these sections in 1972 we provided that the penalty for aircraft hijacking, endangering aircraft or pirating aircraft would be life imprisonment. I can understand some hon. members who believe in capital punishment wishing to change the penalty to death. But they would have to propose amendments to sections 76.1, 76.2 and 76.3 of the Criminal Code. This cannot be done simply by moving a motion to strike out clause 3 of Bill C-84.

● (1210)

A charge was last laid under section 75 of the Criminal Code, the section we are now discussing, in 1872, in Victoria, British Columbia. Four individuals charged under that section were sentenced to death, but their sentences were commuted. That was the last time a charge under section 75, which deals with piracy involving ships, was laid in Canada.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Some countries have changed all this.

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member suggests that some countries are applying the law relating to piracy at sea to air piracy. This would have been the case in Canada if we had not passed in 1972 specific amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with aircraft hijacking and if we had signed the convention referred to. If it were not for these provisions, the old sections on piracy would apply to air piracy as well. I am informed by the Department of Justice that we have specific provisions dealing with air hijacking, or air piracy, which are not in section 75. I am referring to section 76, the heading above which is "Offences relating to aircraft." Offences relating to aircraft are covered under the provisions of that section and not by section 75. As I say, I can appreciate some hon. members wishing to make death the penalty for air hijacking. But to achieve their purpose they would have to move amendments to section 76 and following sections of the Criminal Code.

In this bill we are merely removing the death penalty with respect to piracy involving ships, in order to be consistent with other things we are doing. Some hon. members may disagree with this, and I respect their position. I merely say that one cannot deal with the question of capital punishment for air piracy or air hijacking by amending section 75 of the Criminal Code. One would have to amend section 76 and sections following. As I have said, the last time anyone was charged under section 75 was in 1872.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The allotted time of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has expired. He may ask a question only with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand)? Bearing in mind that Section 75(1) of the Criminal Code reads, "Every one commits piracy who does any act that, by the law of nations, is piracy," will the Solicitor General indicate why he does not believe that one can include, under the law of nations, aircraft piracy under the heading of piracy, bearing in mind the terms of the Geneva convention to which we are party and the various other conventions emanating from that convention?

[Mr. Allmand.]

As I understand it, skyjacking at present is an offence included under the general heading of piracy. I should think a strong argument could be made, if the section is left the way it is, for a skyjacker to be charged under section 75 or under the broad heading of piracy. I say that since the law of nations has made it clear that piracy includes aircraft piracy as well as piracy involving ships on the high seas. Does the Solicitor General feel that the law of nations does not include, under piracy, aircraft piracy?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am advised—and I sought legal advice on the point—that if we had not in 1972 introduced specific provisions with respect to aircraft hijacking and offences with respect to aircraft, the hon. member's contention would prevail. We would look to the usage definition, to international custom, and so on, or we might even examine treaties to see how piracy, under section 75, might be defined. However, in Canada parliament makes the laws of the country and the laws of parliament prevail over any treaty or international usage. In this case, the particular sections which parliament has passed prevail. If we had not introduced those sections, piracy could have been interpreted, according to the legal opinion I have been given, in the way the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct one last question to the Solicitor General? Section 75 of the Criminal Code covers the occurrence of death during piracy. Is it not reasonable to say that when that happens, the ultimate offence has been committed? If you commit the offence of aircraft piracy and death occurs, you may be punished with death. On the other hand, subsections dealing with skyjacking do not refer to the situation in which death occurs. They simply say that if you make off with an aircraft, you can be sent to prison for life. Surely there is a sharp distinction to be drawn between the situation contemplated under section 75, where provision is made for the death penalty if death occurs, and the situation contemplated in section 76, where there is no suggestion of what the penalty shall be if death occurs.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's question, I am advised that anyone who causes the death of an individual on an aircraft, either deliberately or otherwise, through negligence or some act which endangers the aircraft, can be charged with murder or any substantive offence related to murder. We have checked with the Department of Justice and have learned that eight charges have been laid in Canada for aircraft hijacking since the introduction of the relevant sections in 1972.

In addition, we also amended the Aeronautics Act in 1972. I do not have those provisions before me at present. Those provisions were passed as a result of the international conferences referred to by the hon. member. Nations which signed those agreements were obligated or responsible for doing something serious about aircraft hijacking and terrorism involving aircraft. Some countries, like the United States, introduced provisions providing for the death penalty. In Canada we introduced provisions which provide for life imprisonment.

To be fair to the hon. members although I mentioned a legal opinion concerning section 75, I must confess that I do not think it has been tested in the courts, mainly because so few charges have been laid under section 75. In other words, I do not think anyone has laid a charge under section 75, with respect to aircraft piracy, which has been challenged and tested in the courts. But the opinion is that because we have such specific sections in Canada, they cover that specific issue.

Mr. Horner: The minister has defeated his own argument.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate on clauses 10 and 11 of the bill. Last night I spoke on the treason clause; this morning I wish to speak on the piracy aspect of the bill. I was most interested to hear the exchange between two competent lawyers. I hope that the Department of the Solicitor General will enlighten us about the matter which has been raised in argument. I should like the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to bring forward necessary amendments to the Criminal Code and reintroduce the death penalty for skyjacking. That move would simplify matters.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: May I put on record some figures relating to skyjacking attempts since January, 1975. Altogether there were 277 successful attempts and a total of 452 attempts. These figures show that we face a serious problem with regard to skyjacking and that such piracy is still taking place. We all know of incidents which took place in the last two weeks. One attempt was made last night. To remind hon. members, especially abolitionists, what happens when a plane is skyjacked I shall read part of a news report headlined, "Two killed, 10 hurt in Iraqi hijacking." The report says:

> The pilot of an Iraqi Airlines domestic flight felt a hard object on his temple and heard a click.
> "I'll blow your brains out if you don't immediately fly out of Iraq," said a man who had suddenly appeared in the cockpit.

Just imagine if that had happened to the Solicitor General's brother or to some other relative of his. How would he have liked it? How would he feel if any of his relatives were in such a position?

We should be given complete protection against these individuals and there should be swift justice in dealing with the characters who are putting guns to pilots' heads, instead of finding ways to pamper them. The intruder, wielding a pistol, was one of a trio of anti-Iraqi Kurdish hijackers aboard a Boeing 737 carrying 85 passengers and seven crew members on a flight from Baghdad to the northern town of Mosul. The pilot flew immediately to Tehran airport, ignored a refusal to land, skimmed over fire engines blocking runways, and almost flipped the plane as he brought it down on uneven, muddy ground beyond a landing strip. The first thing the hijackers did was to order $5 million ransom and the release of 85 Kurdish prisoners held in Iraq. They threatened to blow up the plane, with all aboard, if these demands were refused.

● (1220)

This is how the drama ended. Soon after, a shoot-out between the gunmen and Iraqi security officers on the aircraft resulted in the death of a female passenger and one of the hijackers. Ten other persons were injured. As bullets whizzed, passengers tumbled out of the plane through an emergency exit. The two remaining hijackers jumped out of another door to surrender to Iranian authorities when they ran out of ammunition. How fortunate that they had run out of ammunition! Many people find it hard to get over incidents such as this. A lot of them are affected for the rest of their lives. This is an aspect which should be given consideration, rather than the fate of the hijackers. If it were known that swift justice would face these people, if they had realized they would be sent before a firing squad or to a gas chamber, I am sure many of them would have had second thoughts.

There was another case recently which was reported in the press under the headline, "Hijacked jet takes to air after guerrillas kill 36". The news agency reported the affair as follows:

> Arab terrorists who killed at least 36 people at Rome and Athens airports began a search for a haven in the Middle East today in their hijacked West German jet liner.
> After a night of terror at the Athens airport during which they are reported to have murdered four hostages, the gunmen took off with 12 hostages in the Boeing 737.
> The Lebanese government refused to let them land in Beirut and they put down in Damascus, the Syrian capital.
> Twenty-four hours earlier at Rome's Leonardo da Vinci airport the guerrillas had killed 30 people in a fire-bomb and machine-gun attack, the bloodiest Arab commando strike yet.

This is what is happening. This is why I hope the Solicitor General will bring in necessary amendments to the Criminal Code to enable the supreme penalty to be imposed on hijackers. In some cases these people are being treated far too leniently. Some of them have even been getting day passes. One man who hijacked a Pacific Western Airlines' plane and demanded $2 million for its safety has been placed on a pre-release program from Riverview Hospital by a provincial cabinet. I hope we are not releasing any of the other skyjackers, if there are any in custody. They should be kept behind locked doors at all times, not given weekend passes.

Here is a further instance of the danger we are encountering almost daily. I have before me a news agency story headed, "Ransom demand for jet hostages—free 53 prisioners". This is what we read:

> Kampala, Uganda—Palestinian extremists have demanded the release of 53 "freedom fighters" imprisoned in Israel and four other countries in exchange for 256 hostages and a hijacked French airliner. They said severe penalties would follow if demands were not met.
> France immediately said it would not give in to the guerrillas who commandeered an Air France airbus Sunday over Greece during a flight from Tel Aviv to Paris. Israel, with 40 prisoners on the list and an estimated 100 citizens being held hostage, said it has to consult. Top officials in Israel, which since 1968 has steadfastly refused to yield to terrorist demands, said they hold France responsible for the passengers.

Here is another case in which 36 people were murdered by terrorists in a hijacking. Such things happen regularly and the situation presents a growing menace. The cost of additional security measures in astronomical. For instance, the United States has had to spend more than $5 billion on extra security at airports, including the searching of passengers to ascertain whether they are carrying guns or knives.

The hon. for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) mentioned earlier the position taken by Cuba. Castro is giving every indication of being fed up to the teeth with criminal types who arrive in that country aboard commandeered U.S. aircraft. On November 15 he offered to negotiate a broad agreement which would halt the hijacking of U.S. planes to Cuba. The U.S. accepted and said talks would soon begin. The White House and Congress, after sparring over the details of a tough, new anti-hijacking law, now appear to be close to agreement. This measure would create a new federal police force to keep potential hijackers off U.S. airliners.

I understand that a strong anti-hijacking law narrowly missed passage as Congress hurried to adjourn last October. At that time most differences between Congress and the White House had been ironed out. It is now predicted that approval could come soon. Hon. members will have noted the creation of a new federal police force to deal with hijackers. This is an indication of the extreme steps which have become necessary for the protection of passengers. The cost, as I say, is astronomical. It is another important reason why we should impose the supreme penalty on skyjackers, to let them know we mean businesss. It is true that many of these incidents have taken place in other parts of the world, but we should not forget that there are often Canadian passengers aboard these planes. In the recent case where the Israeli commando troops released the hostages, there were five Canadians among the passengers.

When President Nixon was in office, after the U.S. Supreme Court had ruled against the death penalty for many crimes he said he hoped the ruling did not apply to skyjacking. That ruling has, of course, been changed and the supreme penalty is applicable to skyjackers in most states. As part of the measures which have been taken to deal with hijackers, Canada and the United States have entered into certain informal agreements. Officials responsible for aircraft safety in both countries realize, as never before, that the two countries share one piece of airspace and that it is time to set up a procedure for handling transborder airplane piracy. It is too bad there is not in Canada the same penalty for hijackers as there is in the United States.

In closing, may I express the hope that the Solicitor General will reconsider his position and consult the Department of Justice in order to bring in necessary amendments to the Criminal Code to impose the supreme penalty on hijackers.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I will of course yield the floor to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and I will resume right after.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on the motion, and I appreciate the co-operation of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) in allowing me to speak at this time. I am not going into the discussion whether the proposed amendment dealing specifically with piracy also involves the more critical crime of hijacking in the air which, as several members have outlined, is one of the great problems facing our civilized community at this time.

I think it can be argued, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) did argue, that the crime of piracy does embrace hijacking. But rather than get into the legal aspects of that problem, I would just re-emphasize that any attempt to remove capital punishment from crimes of piracy, acts of treason or, to put it in a separate category, the crime of hijacking, is contributing to the breakdown of law and order in the civilized world. I listened to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) explaining a moment ago that this subject really is not very important since the last trial for piracy—

Mr. Allmand: The last conviction.

Mr. Dinsdale: —the last conviction for piracy was in 1876, I believe was the date. So that for those who have their minds set against capital punishment there is not much danger of our carrying out the ultimate penalty for the specific crime of piracy.

What I want to debate this afternoon is the principle involved in the government's attempt to delete, as it has in a rather subtle way, the death penalty as punishment for a very serious and heinous crime. It is interesting to note that as the government of Canada, and the governments of some other countries as well, have lessened the impact of the death penalty on what we used to call capital crimes, the process of the breakdown of law and order has proceeded apace. In this country, statistics before us show that in 1967, when the subject was first debated in the House of Commons in a free vote, the vote for abolition was 105 and the vote for retention was 70. When the next vote came in 1973, the abolitionist vote was 119, to 106. The two groups were coming closer together.

In the most recent vote in the House just a couple of weeks ago, the verdict expressed by hon. members was 133 for abolition and 125 for retention. There will be two more retentionist votes, at least, when the third reading vote comes along. I will be voting for retention on the basis I put forward when I first entered this debate some weeks ago, namely, that there is an urgent need for dividing the crime of murder into the two categories of first-degree murder and second-degree murder.

I suggest that the statistical trend demonstrated by the changing vote moving more and more toward a retentionist position, is the result of an increasing wave of permissiveness in Canada, North America and Europe during the last decade or so. There has been an increasing breakdown of law and order. Statistics for murder have doubled.

Furthermore, as the debate for abolition has gone forward, Mr. Speaker, statistics for attempted murder have not only doubled but quadrupled and a wave of violent crime, such as rape and similar acts of violence, has gone on apace, so much so that today it is one of the urgent concerns of social scientists, as expressed in some of the books heading the lists of popular publications dealing with the crime of rape. It is obvious that when the state takes a permissive attitude toward horrendous crimes of that kind, it is aiding and abetting the ultimate breakdown of law and order.

I feel sure that there would be a much larger retentionist vote but for the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet. They had to remove themselves from the principle of the free vote, which is supposed to be at the basis of this debate, and use absolute cabinet solidarity and extreme coercion to hold some of their concerned backbenchers in line. Otherwise, I am sure the vote that took place some two weeks ago would have been quite different.

I congratulate those who are carrying on this debate, even though it means sitting extra time into the summer months, because I am sure that as members opposite and some members on this side contemplate what is involved here in terms of fundamental law and order issues they, too, will change their vote when we come to the final vote on third reading.

The government itself has now become concerned at the trend toward permissiveness. It is now engaging in a trade-off operation with its Bill C-83. It is attempting to substitute for the death penalty for deliberate, premeditated, horrendous kinds of homicide such as would be perpetrated by an act of piracy or hijacking, a mandatory life sentence for those offenders found guilty of such crimes. But as I pointed out when I spoke for the first time in this debate, this is a snare and a delusion because the government is trying to have the best of all possible worlds. The government is trying to face in two directions at once. It is emphasizing a rehabilitative and reformative posture in our penal institutions, and at the same time trading off the death penalty for a mandatory life sentence, which would make it impossible for our penal institutions to have any element of reform or rehabilitation.

This is also working against the recommendations of the law reform committee which this government appointed to consider and recommend reforms to our penal system. That committee suggests that penal institutions—largely based on statistics of increasing repetition and recidivism—have failed utterly in becoming institutions of reform and rehabilitation. The committee's recommendation to the government is that sentences for criminal activity of all kinds be reduced, rather than expanded. Notwithstanding this recommendation which is already before the government, the government is proposing a mandatory life sentence which would be a living death much harsher than the death penalty itself.

To anyone who has been abroad in recent weeks it is interesting to hear the reaction of people in other countries regarding the debate taking place on peace, order and good government, that is, Bill C-83, and this bill, C-84. With tongue in cheek they ask Canadians why Canada is beginning to sound more and more like a banana republic regarding law and order measures. If we remove the absolute penalty for the crime of treason, the ultimate crime against the state, and if we remove the death penalty for the crime of piracy or hijacking as the government is proposing to do, we are leaving ourselves wide open to all the terror and violence that is proliferating in the world today. No wonder Canadians travelling abroad are being asked why we are moving away from the reputation as the true north, strong and free, to a Canada which acts more like a banana republic.

Capital Punishment

In view of the crime which took place in the past week and its spectacular dénouement at the airport in Uganda over the weekend, if the government persists in this doctrinaire approach—and it is doctrinaire because it is an approach not related to any facts or statistics or anything that might be based on reality—and in removing the power of the state to deal decisively with violent crime on an international scale, then instead of being known as the banana republic of North America we will become known as the Uganda of North America. We will be leaving ourselves wide open to the rising incidence of crime that is causing so much concern around the world today.

I would urge hon. members, as they contemplate this amendment, to consider that it provides them, particularly backbenchers on the government side who are of two minds, to express their concerns. They are concerned over the breakdown in law and order and the increasing trend toward immorality. This amendment does provide them with that opportunity, and I trust they will have the courage of their convictions and support it.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I rise on the issue of capital punishment, for it has been on the order paper quite a few times since I have had the honour to represent the residents of Bellechasse in the House.

However, in previous debates I wanted to express my views objectively on this serious issue and I must say that until now I found no valid reason to change my mind on the matter. This being said, I must sincerely admit that the whole Canadian nation is watching with much interest and attention the debates being held in the House on Bill C-84, which proposes many amendments to the Criminal Code. All members will certainly agree with me that the House is under pressure as all Canadians are, for this is a very serious topic and we must take all the possible steps and use all the possible means to avoid any mistake which would be detrimental to an individual who, by mistake or by profession, would have committed the serious crime of taking the life of another person.

Mr. Speaker, while the news media seem less interested in this matter at this time, the fact remains that public attention is still focused on the proceedings at the report stage and in the proposed amendments to Bill C-84. Everyone is concerned about the real meaning to be considered when it comes to evaluating the responsibilities of an individual within Canadian society.

What are the responsibilities of an individual towards another? What must invite him to respect the rights of another, specifically his right to live as an individual? At the family level, what are the responsibilities of the head of the family? On what grounds can an individual take the life of the head of a family—man or woman—who bears responsibilities for the children both parents wanted to have and who had met their responsibilities and done their duties during the normal course of their life?

At the municipal level, what are our responsibilities? As many members in this House, I had the opportunity once in my life to play a role at the municipal level and all those who have worked in municipal politics did so because they were dedicated to society and although they were sometime criticized and even threatened they still accepted to take their responsibilities and the same applies at the provincial level. All hon. members, all ministers, all provincial officials have responsibilities which they must fulfill but, as far as we are specifically concerned today, it is our duty as members of the Canadian Parliament to represent the population in the highest authority that exists in our country, I mean the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) proposed an amendment to Bill C-84, which I have the honour of supporting. I want to defend it objectively, to explain why we were prompted to move this amendment and I want to ask my colleagues of the House to adopt it so that, in the future, the Canadian population can say to me: Here is a Parliament which has fulfilled its responsibilities. The members have adopted a bill providing for penalties against those who do not want to respect the lives of their fellow beings and who do not want to abide by the true code of liberty and of respect for the lives of their fellow beings.

Mr. Speaker, clause 3 of Bill C-84 says:

"(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life."

It does not say that the court must condemn this person to life imprisonment but rather:

. . . is liable to imprisonment for life."

Consequently, before the court, if that person has been guilty of an act of piracy, if the court decides to condemn him to life imprisonment, if, of course, he is found guilty, he must serve his sentence.

● (1250)

We must maintain the current law which the legislators before us passed after considerable thought, in other words maintain the status quo as concerns subsection 75(2) of the existing legislation which reads as follows:

Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life—

And it goes on because we know that the legislators at that time surely knew that some other acts were added to that which is studied in the subsection. And so it goes:

—but if while committing or attempting to commit piracy he murders or attempts to murder another person or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person—

. . . and the law says . . .

. . . he shall be sentenced to death.

I suppose that the legislators who sat in this House and enacted the law I just quoted were intelligent and responsible people. If at that time those persons seriously assumed their responsibilities and if they included that provision in the Criminal Code it was to ensure the greatest security of the Canadian people against criminals whose vocation is to deny the rights of other citizens, particularly their right to life.

Mr. Speaker, this is why my colleague the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and I decided to ask the House to maintain the status quo and I urge the Solicitor General to give a second thought to the wording of Bill C-84 relating precisely to that question of piracy.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

In the Larousse dictionary to which I referred this morning, I checked the meaning of the word "piracy". I understand that the Larousse dictionary is not published every year. I understand that the people responsible for defining the words in the French language thought that the idea of piracy applied particularly to sea transportation because at that time, the other means of transport had not yet been invented. Those responsible for defining the words dealt only with navigation. We can read the following:

Pirate: Adventurer who practices brigandage on the high seas.

Any man who gets rich through pillage or robbery.

These days, we know that there are thousands of such pirates who get rich through legal or illegal pillage, and who get rich through legal or illegal robbery. I have often had the opportunity in the House to denounce the legalized pillage allowed by our statutes through which certain organizations can rob individuals, society, the whole population of Canada, by the means which are placed at their disposal. Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that it is one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

DAIRY POLICY—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF PENALTY FOR OVERPRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a very important question.

Considering the refusal of the government to reassess the whole dairy policy announced in April last which creates insuperable difficulties for dairy producers throughout the country; considering the unavoidable disappearance of a substantial number of those producers who have let it known that they intend to get rid of their herds for the above-mentioned reasons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That this House unanimously recommend to the minister responsible the immediate removal of the penalty of $8.60 on overproduction and a reduction of $1 a hundredweight on the amount now withheld from producers for the export of powdered milk.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDERS CONCERNING CERTAIN HOLIDAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to put forward a motion about a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since under Standing Order 2(3) June 24 and July 1 are days when the House shall not meet, and that when those days fall on a Thursday the members have to be present in the House on the following Friday, the day after these public holidays, which prevent them from being in their constituency for the celebration of those holidays, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras):

That the House agree to amend Standing Order 2(3) by adding the following:

When the holidays of June 24 and July 1 fall on a Thursday, the House shall not meet on June 25 and July 2.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the unanimous consent of the House is required to put the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Since the House is giving unanimous consent, I will put the motion. Seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras), the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) moves that:

When the holidays of June 24 and July 1 fall on a Thursday, the House shall not meet on June 25 and July 2.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTION CANADA FOLLOW CONDITIONS SET OUT IN ORIGINAL BID FOR GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the May, 1970 city of Montreal bid to host the 1976 summer Olympic Games was presented to and accepted by the International Olympic Committee and endorsed by all levels of government including the government of Canada, and that this bid assured the IOC and thereby the international sporting community that, and I quote from the bid itself: "All necessary entry permits will be available to delegations from all the national Olympic committees," and whereby the same government now has made it abundantly clear that it is not prepared to respect that agreement, it has therefore become evident that in retrospect the government has in fact double-crossed the city of Montreal—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a motion to propose pursuant to Standing Order 43, he could perhaps put it forward.

Mr. Jelinek: —so that further embarrassment will not be caused—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion to propose perhaps he would do so.

Mr. Jelinek: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to convey his apologies on behalf of the Liberal administration to the city of Montreal, to the province of Quebec, and at the same time for the sake of not only the Olympic ideal but more importantly for Canada's pride, follow the conditions as outlined in the original Olympic bid as presented by the city of Montreal.

An hon. Member: Would it be in both official languages?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF DELAYS IN DELIVERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to ask for the unanimous consent of the House pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the importance of mail delivery in a country as vast as Canada, and since western Canadian companies have been disallowed bids by the Department of Supply and Services because it takes longer than seven days for air mail from Vancouver to arrive in Ottawa, and because mail from Great Britain marked "special handling" with postage paid in the Canadian equivalent of $1.50 is held up in Montreal and now takes up to 14 days to arrive in Vancouver where it used to take two to three days, and because first class mail paid in the orient is now held up and handled as fourth class mail upon arrival in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That this House order an immediate investigation of mail delays and order that any person employed in the Post Office who obstructs efficent delivery of mail be fired.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There was some difficulty earlier about the functioning of the translation equipment and it is being looked into at the moment. I do not know whether hon. members would want to begin the question period while it is being looked into or whether it would be better to wait until it is functioning.

Some hon. Members: Wait.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HAIDA EAGLE DANCERS

Mr. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting I should like to draw hon. members' attention to the presence in the gallery of the Haida Eagle Dancers of the Queen Charlotte Islands in British Columbia who will be Canada's representatives at Bad Segeberg, Germany, at the Aboriginal Cultural Festival to be held there next week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I can indicate to the House that there will be a delay of only a moment before the commencement of the question period. We have found the cause of the difficulty and we hope it will be cured in a moment or two. The question period would have begun at ten minutes past two, and I will take that into account when we start the question period.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DATE GOVERNMENT INFORMED OLYMPIC COMMITTEE CANADA DID NOT RECOGNIZE TAIWAN AS REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it is about the government's conduct with regard to the International Olympic Committee which, I wish to add, does not raise questions about Canada's policy towards China, but about our integrity as the host for the 1976 Olympics. When the government recognized the People's Republic of China in 1971, did the government immediately and formally advise the IOC that according to Canada's normal regulations Taiwanese atheletes could not attend the Montreal Olympics as representatives of the Republic of China and that the then existing position of the IOC would have to be changed?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question as to whether we communicated immediately with the International Olympic Committee as to the status that would occur when Canada had decided to recognize the People's Republic of China. What I did say yesterday, and what I repeat today, is that we had recognized well over a year ago that a problem existed and we communicated with the IOC more than a year ago. We are continuing, and are ready to continue, discussions with Lord Killanin and his officers in order to resolve this difficulty so that the games can go forward and Taiwanese athletes can compete in the games.

Mr. Jelinek: It is very difficult to comprehend why it has taken the government even the five or six years that it has taken before making their application to the Olympics. Since Lord Killanin told the Department of External Affairs in April of last year that as far as he could see there would not be a change in the China situation, I should like to ask the minister why the government at that time did not tell him that it would consider the extraordinary step of refusing entry to Taiwanese athletes if the AIC policy was not changed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have, as I indicated yesterday, been awaiting action from the International Olympic Committee, the body in which the problem basically resides, to resolve this difficulty. However, when that was not forthcoming we took our own responsibilities and indicated to the International Olympic Committee that we were not prepared to admit athletes to Canada who would present themselves as representatives of the Republic of China, because we recognize the People's Republic of China and we are not under this guise proposing to import into our foreign policy a two-China policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OLYMPIC GAMES

REASON FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR GAMES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I direct my final supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? Since it can now be taken for granted that the government has reneged on the original Olympic bid by the city of Montreal which would have allowed free entry into Canada to all or any delegations belonging to the IOC, in short, because it is evident that the government does not support this bid in accordance with its undertakings and assurances—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Since, after all, the hon. member is asking his final supplementary question, perhaps he will put it and keep it short?

Mr. Jelinek: —Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister to explain to this House why the government consequently presented this parliament with legislation supporting the Games while allowing parliament to believe it supported the Montreal bid all along?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I deny the premise of the question. The government has never reneged on any undertakings on this score.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Oh, yes you have. You reneged on the fundamental undertaking to allow athletes in as recognized by the IOC.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER AUTHORITIES REFUSED ADMISSION TO ACCREDITED TAIWANESE ATHLETES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

According to our information, accreditation cards were issued in the name of Taiwanese athletes by COJO. These cards had been approved by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and indicated that these athletes were known as the Republic of China's representatives. In such circumstances, how can the minister refuse today Canadian entry to these men; further, was he aware of the fact that the Department of Manpower and Immigration had accepted such cards enabling these athletes to represent the Republic of China to the Olympic Games of 1976?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will not refuse the admission of those athletes to Canada if they come forward as representatives of Taiwan. We are quite prepared to follow the precedent—and have so proposed—set in 1960 in the case of Italy when, at the request of the International Olympic Committee, athletes from Taiwan competed in those games as representatives of Taiwan. In those circumstances we would be quite happy to admit those athletes to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering the problems and concern this whole situation represents for organizers both at the international level and at the Montreal level, can the minister tell us whether he will be able to take a final decision on this matter to avoid aggravation of the problem? On account of all concerned it is important to settle this matter and ensure the orderly progress of the Olympic Games in Montreal.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is no question about any lack of decision. The Canadian government has made a decision on this question.

An hon. Member: It was the wrong decision.

[Translation]

POSSIBLE RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION TO EXCLUDE TAIWANESE FROM OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary. If I understand the minister's answer correctly, it seems clear that the government does not intend to change its mind. In view of Mr. Killanin's statements according to which the representatives of some countries have expressed the desire to refrain from attending the games, which might prevent these Olympiads from taking place, it seems clear that some countries wish to support Taiwan. In the circumstances, is the minister prepared to state that he will not change his mind, even if this meant the cancellation of the games?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the solution lies in the extreme course the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Fraser: Answer the question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REASON FOR LACK OF NATIVE PARTICIPATION IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON MERCURY POLLUTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare but I notice he has just stepped out of the chamber; I will direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On July 9, three federal cabinet ministers and five Ontario cabinet ministers are meeting to discuss the mercury pollution on the White Dog and Grassy Narrows Indian reserves. Can the minister explain why no Indian representatives have been invited to this conference although major decisions may be made there affecting the lives of native people?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Chief George Manuel has obviously been in touch with the hon. member as he has been with a number of my colleagues. We have been considering this matter. I might say, though, that I have been up to Grassy Narrows and met with the chiefs, and that at some point the governments concerned have to get together to make decisions. Consultation up to a certain point is good, but the right to make decisions must rest with the governments.

Mr. Symes: Having regard to the seriousness of the situation at Grassy Narrows, many of the Indians having lost their livelihood and some of them having shown symptoms of Minamata disease, will the minister assure us that representatives from the bands in Northwestern Ontario and from the National Indian Brotherhood will be invited to the meetings as full participants?

Mr. Buchanan: I have indicated to the hon. member that we will consider that matter.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): This question is now under study, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

In view of the seriousness of the situation and the concern expressed by police organizations as well as the association of prison guards, could the minister give the House the assurance that the study now being made on the matter will be done as quickly as possible to further reassure the people in charge of supervising those categories of prisoners?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I hope to give a reply to their suggestions before third reading of the bill.

ENERGY

ALLEGED LOSS AS RESULT OF SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF SELLING ANOTHER REACTOR TO ARGENTINA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and arises from a statement by Dr. Carlos Castro Madero, head of the Argentine National Atomic Energy Commission that the new contract for the Candu Cordoba reactor will still entail the loss of a substantial sum of money by Canada. Will the minister confirm or deny Dr. Madero's figures which show that the Canadian Crown corporation, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, stands to lose $24.5 million on this deal?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not in a position to confirm or deny those figures. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands last week I indicated that renegotiation of the contract was virtually complete and that the documents had been prepared for signature. I can tell the hon. member there has been a great deal of very hard bargaining and that the arrangements under the original contract, which did not provide sufficiently for the effects of inflation in the two countries, have been very substantially improved.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind that either the minister's own or AECL's commercial ineptitude has resulted in a situation where the Canadian people will have to pay out $25 million on a reactor deal that is highly questionable on moral grounds, will the hon. gentleman indicate whether Dr. Madero has been told, as reported, by Canadian officials that once the economic situation in Argentina stabilizes, Argentina will have no trouble obtaining from us yet another reactor?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, without in any way accepting the preamble to the hon. member's question, let me say that there have been no undertakings on the part of the Canadian government or officers of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to offer a second reactor to the Argentinians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE SPENT FUEL FROM NUCLEAR REACTOR IN ARGENTINA NOT REPROCESSED INTO PLUTONIUM

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, may I put my final supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the statement by Dr. Castro Madero of the Argentine national atomic energy commission that Argentina is studying the possible acquisition of a fuel reprocessing plant, a technology unnecessary for the operation of CANDU reactors, will the minister say whether he has made or intends to make representations to the Argentine government to ensure that spent fuel from the CANDU reactor is not reprocessed into pure plutonium?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the present safeguards agreement with Argentina would preclude that possibility.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND ON PRICE DIFFERENTIAL ON BEEF AND CHANGE IN QUOTAS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it relates to the critical situation facing the beef producers of Ontario, particularly in southwestern Ontario. May I ask the minister whether agreement has been reached between Canada, Australia and New Zealand to remove the price differential which has destroyed the beef producers' competitive position and in many instances forced them out of business; and if there has been agreement reached, would the minister table the contents of that agreement in the House?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been no formal agreement at this time, but I think it would be presumptuous of us to suggest that the kind of beef coming from Australia and New Zealand, which is being used for processing and for hamburger meat, competes with the high quality beef that is produced in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Holmes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding that inadequate answer, would the minister indicate whether he will be announcing in the immediate future a new mechanism regarding import quotas which will ensure the future stability of the cattle industry? Is the minister prepared to do that rather than let the industry die, as he did with the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will also recognize that there has been a change of heart on the part of some of the beef producers, even those in southwestern Ontario, regarding government intervention and how much we should intervene in the beef industry. I am prepared to move so long as I am sure I have the backing of the entire beef industry of Canada. There are still some reservations on the part of the official organization for the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the western stock producers and Saskatchewan stock producers associations. I am going to meet a group of western Ontario beef producers in my constituency office in Windsor this Saturday.

With regard to the Australia-New Zealand meat problem, I think we are about to find a solution to it. Again, this is a world problem with which we are confronted. Australia and New Zealand are trading partners of ours. I have some reservations about whether they have lived up to what they said they would do last February; I think a lot of people are concerned about what they are doing. For instance, they are selling meat in Canada much cheaper than they are in the United States and we are not happy about that. If the hon. member, or the official spokesman for his party, have some suggestion regarding what we should do with the Australians and New Zealanders, I should like to hear it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID COMOROS ISLANDS

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Can the minister tell the House what the government intends to do to help the people of Comoros Islands in view of the urgent situation in which they find themselves since their independence, and also because of the interest several of my colleagues have expressed in this serious matter?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I missed the earlier part of the question but I am advised that the hon. member has asked about possible assistance to the Comoros. Representations have been made by a number of hon. members of the House to provide assistance to the Comoros particularly in the field of medical assistance. I wish to advise my hon. friends that I have approved a grant which will be distributed through appropriate non-governmental organizations that will provide much needed medical health assistance to these islands.

INFORMATION PROVIDED OLYMPIC COMMITTEE CONCERNING REGULATIONS GOVERNING ADMISSION OF ATHLETES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the minister quoted a letter of November 28, 1969, as proof that Canada placed conditions on its Olympic bid, and I quote:

> I would like to assure you that all parties representing the National Olympic Committees and national sports federations recognized by the IOC will be free to enter Canada pursuant to the normal regulations. I should be pleased to provide any further information respecting these regulations should you desire it.

Did the IOC request any further information regarding these regulations and, if so, were these regulations provided to the IOC before the games were awarded, or at anytime?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the record to see whether a request was made by the IOC for an analysis or interpretation of the normal regulations. Certainly, at an appropriate point Canada did volunteer to the International Olympic Committee its understanding of what conditions would determine the admission of athletes from Taiwan to the games. Just at the end of May, that interpretation was made very explicit.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a further question as he seems to be mixing regulations with conditions, and I do not think that goes unnoticed. Since Mainland China was not recognized by Canada until October, 1970, after the games were awarded to us in May 1970, how could those regulations referred to in that letter have indicated to the IOC that Canada would take the position it is now taking regarding athletes from Taiwan? How can the minister use that letter and its mention of "normal regulations" as an excuse for a complete breach of undertakings given by both the winter bid and the summer bid?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there has been no breach of understanding or breach of commitment. I think that has been made clear by the Acting Prime Minister. I presume it ought to be clear to any of us that, notwithstanding any undertaking to a private organization, no matter how respectful, such as the International Olympic Committee, no state would relinquish its sovereign rights to determine those who enter its boundaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Obviously in any circumstances any sovereign country retains that authority, and obviously the words "normal regulations" would apply to that rather obvious conclusion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROPERLY ACCREDITED ATHLETES WILL BE ADMITTED FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think it is pretty clear we are not debating the right of the government to try to change the position of the IOC, but whether it is moral and appropriate in the circumstances for the government to use its leverage as host to accomplish that end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In light of the government's lack of candor on this matter, which can only be interpreted as blackmail and eleventh hour bad faith, will the government consider now restoring our good name and the country's good name by assuring the House that it will not use its visa powers to prevent any athletes coming to the games who are duly accredited and meet the personal, if not political, regulations of the government? Can he give that assurance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the good name of Canada is being affected in this incident this will arise from irresponsible comments made—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The record speaks for itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It is the irresponsible record of the government.

Mr. MacEachen: What I have said, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, is that Canada is quite prepared to admit the athletes from Taiwan. Canada is quite prepared to follow the formula that was formerly approved by the International Olympic Committee when it insisted that athletes participating in Italy enter that country as representatives of Taiwan. I would ask the House why that formula, which was used in the past with the approval of the International Olympic Committee, is not appropriate as a solution to this problem?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the problem with this government arises because it wants to speak out of both sides of its mouth at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think we hit a responsive cord.

REASON ADMISSION OF TAIWANESE ATHLETES WILL AFFECT FOREIGN POLICY BUT NOT ADMISSION OF PLO OBSERVERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Since the government has claimed that the admission of the PLO observers to the Habitat conference by ministerial permit has in no way changed the government's fundamental position that the PLO should not have been recognized by the United Nations, because we were hosting a UN conference according to its rules and not our foreign policy, will the Prime Minister explain why the government now feels Canada's foreign policy would be jeopardized unless the IOC changes its rules? The government cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. gentleman, I fail to see any similarity between the situation we confront and the admission of the PLO as observers to Habitat, a group that we have not in any circumstances accorded, and another group from whom we have withdrawn, official recognition. That is quite a separate matter from the present situation in which are involved the policies of the government to extend recognition to the People's Republic of China as the sole and legal government of China. We do not propose in these particular circumstances to adopt solutions that would compromise the well established practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSAL TO AID DROUGHT STRICKEN LIVESTOCK PRODUCERS OF NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of one auto producing area to another, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question about the drought circumstances faced by the recently established dairy and livestock industry of northwestern Ontario. Could the minister tell the House whether he has been approached by the Government of Ontario with regard to a cost-sharing agreement in which the Government of Ontario would put up $25 per ton if the federal government would put up $25 a ton as a subsidy to bring in hay from Manitoba to help out these hard-pressed farmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met with the Minister of Agriculture from the Province of Ontario last week. We discussed this and no decision has been made at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since the situation is a very pressing one indeed for many people who are on the margin of existence in the industry there now, which as the minister well knows has just been established in the last few years, could he tell us when a decision will be reached on this, hopefully it will be a positive one, and what in addition does the federal government plan to do to help these hard-pressed farmers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of Manpower and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister in charge of the Post Office have made this representation to me on behalf of the producers and the farmers in that area, as have some of the farm organizations. In the past, as always, we have responded to realistic requests and we are considering this request on its merit at this time.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED UNFAIR APPLICATION OF FREIGHT RATES ON RAPESEED TO UNITED OIL SEED PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport having to do with the application of freight rates to various rapeseed processing plants in western Canada and specifically one of Canada's newest rapeseed crushing plants, United Oil Seed Products in Lloydminster which has been placed in a highly uncompetitive position relative to other processors which the officials suggest will jeopardize their company to the extent of $3 million as a result of the application of the freight rates and the withdrawal by the railway companies of the CTC interim decision on freight rates that was applied in June of 1973. I wonder if the minister could advise the House what action he is taking on this very important matter, if any. Has he met with the CTC, has he discussed the matter with the railways, and can he advise the House whether any action is being taken to seek redress for this particular company?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member somewhat misstated the situation. The railways quoted freight rates, as I understand it, for the plant to which he referred on the basis of their ordinary price setting which were the way they have applied rates to other plants prior to 1970 when the first appeal was heard against those rates. By 1976, this resulted in a far higher rate than was in effect for the plants with frozen rates. The order which was eventually passed by the Governor in Council and which directed the CTC not to allow a rate higher than the compensatory rates is to be applied to the new plant as well according to my understanding by communication from the railway. Therefore at such time as the new rates are ascertained by the CTC, there should be a similar basis for the rate setting on the existing plants, previously existing plants, and on any new plants.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since the new rate that was provided for by the Order in Council to which the minister referred will not take effect until after the Snavely Commission has completed its study, and in view of the fact that United Oil Seed Products has made a specific request to the Canadian Transport Commission to be joined to the interim decision of June 1973, could I ask the minister if he is aware of this action and what specific steps he will take personally to intervene in this question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not share the hon. member's view that those rates will not take effect until after the Snavely Commission has reported except in a very technical sense. I understand from the last information I had from the CTC that they may have the rates ready for promulgation by the end of July. I have not had a recent report from the CTC to change that date in the past several weeks but I will check with them again as to whether that date still holds.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PERMIT LOW INCOME GROUP TO PARTICIPATE IN CO-OPERATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. In light of the fact that tremendous changes have been made in the AHOP program of 1976 as compared to the AHOP program of 1975, with particular reference to co-operative building thus creating a hardship for those on low incomes who would like to build under the co-operative housing program pioneered by the extension department of St. Francis Xavier University, would the minister check into the situation immediately and ascertain if corrective action can be taken to bring it back to what it was so that the people on low incomes can participate.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, they serve somewhat different purposes. I am pleased to advise my hon. friend that my parliamentary secretary and one of my staff are in Cape Breton at this moment looking at this very problem because we want to continue to serve the people in Cape Breton as we do the rest of the country to the best of our ability.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his reply. He must have a mystic sense of power. In view of the fact that in 1976 there were 1,100 families in Nova Scotia who submitted their names for co-operative self-help housing to the Nova Scotia Housing Commission and when the new regulations were explained to them 90 per cent of those interested were unable to participate, would the minister make his postponed trip to Cape Breton as soon as possible to discuss this serious problem further with officials of the extension department and others interested in housing for low income families. That is the question. Now, when he gets a report will he do his utmost to correct the situation whereby now one must be making $12,000 a year before he can get into the program.

Mr. Danson: Well, Mr. Speaker, naturally my parliamentary secretary and my staff, the people who are there together with the CMHC people, are looking into this with a view to serving the client's needs; it might not be for that specific program, but certainly to see that the low-income people who are our highest priority have access to proper housing and co-operative housing which I happen to favour.

PROGRAM FOR VETERANS SUBMITTED BY NEWFOUNDLAND COMMAND OF CANADIAN LEGION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is another segment of veterans in the province of Newfoundland who have been trying to help veterans obtain approval for veterans housing because of their low income, I wonder if the minister would indicate if any progress has been made with regard to the program the provincial command of the Canadian Legion has submitted, and when they will receive a reply concerning the funding of that program.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have looked at this study done by the Newfoundland-Labrador Command of the Canadian Legion with great interest. It has extreme potential for all veterans in all parts of Canada, but especially Newfoundland. It is one of those things which, in terms of priorities and spending limitations, we look at with a view to the over-all requirements in respect of the housing budget for lower income people generally. I would like to repeat that the proposals are interesting and are being studied. I would not want to build false expectations because of budget limitations at this time, but it is the sort of program that I would hope to move on when funds are available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARRANGEMENTS WITH SOVIET UNION FOR FAMILY REUNION AND VISITS BY RELATIVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister consider approaching the USSR authorities under the Protocol on Consultations to try to iron out the practical problems faced by Canadians in arranging visits from relatives in the USSR and in the matter of family reunions?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I would be happy to follow up that question. As the hon. member may recall, when the Prime Minister met with Mr. Brezhnev a procedure was put into place by which there would be consultations between the two governments, particularly with regard to reunification of families. I will obviously take the hon. member's representations to heart and see what can be done under the protocol to accelerate these cases.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED STUDY BY MR. PITFIELD OF LOCKHEED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister confirm that an in-depth study of the government's fiasco in the Lockheed dealings was made by Mr. Pitfield from the Prime Minister's office, and will the Prime Minister say that the study concluded regarding the expenditure of $16 million for which there was no value received. Perhaps he would be good enough at the same time to state whether it absolved Mr. Stopforth of responsibility, and is he going to table this report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are several areas of the question which appear to confuse the facts. Mr. Pitfield is in the Privy Council Office, not the Prime Minister's office. The study in depth which the hon. member terms a fiasco has not been made by the Secretary to the cabinet. It is a subject which has been examined by the cabinet itself and of course by the ministers more directly involved. On the issue of Mr. Stopforth, I understand he has taken legal action outside this House and it is not appropriate for me to comment on that.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is asking for a legal opinion.

Mr. Goyer: The answer will come at the proper time in the normal fashion.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): My question is for the Solicitor General. Could he elaborate on the possible charges of fraud involving the Bank of Montreal and its dealings with Arvee Cedar Mills of Salmo, B.C., and has the RCMP who are currently investigating this case given the minister an indication that there may be other cases involving the Bank of Montreal and its relationship to small business in British Columbia?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): The RCMP is involved in this investigation but only in an assisting role. The principal investigating police force is the Nelson B.C. police force. I requested further information about the investigation, and that is yet to be received.

Mr. Brisco: My supplementary question to the minister is to inquire whether he has had the opportunity to consult the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and be informed by the department that it is examining another case if not of illegal then at least of improper, scandalous, or unscrupulous behaviour by the Bank of Montreal in its dealings with small businesses, particularly with reference to the case in the Windermere Valley of Fairmont, B.C.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR REVISION OF POLICY ON IMPORTATION OF WINTER CLOTHING FROM ASIA

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question, directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, arises from a statement by M. D. Friedman, a member of the Canadian Textile Importers Association and President of Transcontinental Sales Inc. a firm engaged in imports, who expressed concern regarding imported winter clothing from Asian countries as a result of the government's import policy. Will the minister tell the House if he intends to review this policy regarding imported Asian winter clothing and if so, what step does he intend to announce in the House in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the comments to which the hon. member refers. I can tell him that a number of sectors are now being examined, as indeed is the case on a continuing basis. I announced some changes in import quotas recently and I expect I will be making a statement with regard to polyester yarn, for example, within a matter of a few days. But I will look at the statement and perhaps may be able to give a more detailed response at that time.

PENSIONS FOR TEXTILE WORKERS WITH MORE THAN TWENTY-FIVE YEARS SERVICE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Considering that the House already passed legislation which enables people with more than 25 years of employment in the textile industry to receive retirement benefits, and that this legislation does not seem to be implemented most of the time because of employers, is the minister prepared to tell the House whether he intends to review this legislation to enable those who earned their living in the textile industry to benefit from a retirement plan or from relocation in the labour force?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, that particular program is still in effect. I gather from what the hon. member has said that he would like to see some changes in it. I have not heard any representations along those lines. I do not know that applications are still being received for people under this transitional program, but if he has some specific ideas, I would be glad to look at them with a view to making changes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO EXPEDITE ADMISSION OF CHILEAN REFUGEES IN ARGENTINA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the minister acknowledged that 27 refugees of Chilean origin have sought refuge in the Canadian embassy in Argentina and are being considered for admission to Canada. In this connection a news statement was published a few days ago which attributed to spokesmen of the Department of External Affairs the view that it might take up to six months to service these applications. My question is whether it would be possible to do something to expedite this process as the people in question are in fear of their lives. Also, I should like to ask the minister if he would not collaborate with his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and consider sending a special team to check on these cases and to expedite their applications.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Intensive discussions are presently taking place between my officials and the officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration with a view to reaching some solution in this matter. As the hon. member knows from my answer yesterday, we have been in contact with the government of Argentina and we have been assured of their co-operation in reaching some solution, so the matter is being looked into.

Mr. Blackburn: One part of my question was not answered. I was wondering if the Secretary of State was considering, along with his colleague, sending a special team to Buenos Aires to expedite this as quickly as possible. If these are genuine refugees, there is no reason why they should be forced to stay there for six to eight months and go through the normal processes.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not foresee under any circumstances that the processing period would require six to eight months, but the matter of establishing entry requirements and deciding whether these persons are refugees is a matter exclusively for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED PROHIBITION OF REMISSION OF SENTENCE FOR DANGEROUS SEXUAL OFFENDERS—MEANING OF MANDATORY SUPERVISION

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the tragic death last week of little Jeanne Doove in Mission, British Columbia, and in view of the fact that the man charged with her death, Gary Francis Marcoux, had been sentenced for rape in 1971 but was released because of the provisions of statutory remission, would the minister consider amending Bill C-83 so as to prohibit any remission earned or otherwise, in the case of dangerous sexual offenders?

[Mr. Blackburn.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the present law does not provide any remission for dangerous sexual offenders. The individual in question was not classified as a dangerous sexual offender but had received a sentence for rape.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that all?

Mr. Allmand: Hon. members do not seem to know the distinction between provisions of the law dealing with dangerous sexual offenders and other provisions in the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Under rape provisions in the Criminal Code, a man can be sent to prison for life but a dangerous sexual offender can get an indeterminate sentence with no day parole or temporary absence or remission. With respect to the question, Bill C-83 does provide for the abolition of statutory remission.

Mr. Patterson: If Mr. Marcoux was under mandatory supervision, how was he able to perpetrate this dastardly murder? In other words, what does mandatory supervision in such case really mean?

Mr. Allmand: Supervision means that he must report on a periodic basis to a parole officer or probation officer and that he is subject to certain conditions. In the peace and security program we have proposed that the supervision time be doubled, and if the House would facilitate the passage of that bill we could correct some of these things.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER—ALLEGED FINDING OF DYNAMITE AND ESCAPE PLOT FOR PRISONERS HUTCHISON AND AMBROSE

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Could the minister please inform the House whether some weeks ago at Dorchester penitentiary some seven sticks of dynamite and a small cache of arms were found which were relatable to the prisoners Hutchison and Ambrose, who were convicted of the killing of two police officers in Moncton?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will have to consult with the penitentiary authorities on that question. There was an incident a few weeks ago, but I cannot recall the exact details.

Mr. Dick: Is the Solicitor General aware of, or can he find out and report to the House, the details of the escape plot uncovered by officials which was being planned for the escape of the prisoners Hutchison and Ambrose?

Mr. Allmand: There was evidence that some inmates at that institution were planning an escape for Hutchison and Ambrose, but the plot was found out and quashed.

MILLHAVEN—DATE OF TABLING HANSEN REPORT ON GASSINGS AND BEATINGS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. On June 15 the minister told the House that he would have the Hansen report on the Millhaven gassings and beatings ready for tabling before July 1. In view of the fact that it is now July 6, would the minister let us know if he is now in a position to table this report or when the next promised date will be?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe the report is ready for tabling and could be tabled before the end of this week.

AGRICULTURE

REASON FOR DELAY IN CHANGING DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister tell the House when he will be announcing changes in the federal dairy policy to provide some relief for farmers who are seriously affected by it, and can he confirm that members of his staff told Ontario government officials that the cause of the delay in making an announcement is the result of the fact that the President of the Treasury Board vetoed such changes and the Minister of Agriculture is now appealing that decision to the full cabinet?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member got his information, but I made an announcement after the NFU appeared last week and made new submissions to me as the Minister of Agriculture. These submissions would take some time to be considered. We are discussing them. This is a very important decision, and I have always said that if the provinces want me to run the whole dairy policy, they should vest in me that authority, and I will run it for them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: If they were to accept their responsibility and shoulder the responsibility for the terrible and inadequate way the quotas are being run within the provinces, we would not have the problem we have.

Mr. Beatty: When the minister is successful in getting these changes accepted by the cabinet, will he give the assurance that any changes to be announced will be announced in the House of Commons and not delayed until after the House is in recess, which appears to be the present policy?

Mr. Whelan: I can no more give the hon. member that assurance than he can tell me when the vote on capital punishment will be taken.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of Mrs. Tsanga, Minister of Social Affairs of Cameroons, on official duty in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On June 30, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said that I had been making statements about a statement which he is supposed to have made about my being guilty of paying the farmers too much money for milk, and that this was the problem I was facing. I refer to Hansard of April 14, page 12807—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the information the minister has for the House would be most interesting and would provoke a great exchange between the two hon. members; but, while all are anxious to hear it, it does not constitute the substance of a point of order. This would have to be done during debate on some other occasion or in some other way.

Mr. Whelan: Then I rise on a question of privilege, because what the hon. member stated, whether he intended it or not, has damaged in some manner or form—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has received no notice of any intention to raise a question of privilege. Any matter between the two hon. members is a subject of disagreement which all, I am sure, hope will surface at a very early date.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the debate between 11 o'clock and 12 o'clock this morning there was a lengthy exchange between the Solicitor General and the hon. member for York-Simcoe with respect to the amendment dealing with the question of piracy and air piracy. At that time the minister was referring to a legal opinion he received from the Department of Justice. It is obvious that there is some question on this matter, and I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to file or to table that opinion, because he indicated it was not completely clear in his mind in the event that the matter had not been tried. I wonder if he might consider doing that.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the opinion which I received was received by telephone and not in writing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which has to do with the return filed in answer to a written question which appears in yesterday's Hansard. The question is number—

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 5,200—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Have postal clerks in approximately five post offices in Montreal recently refused to speak English on certain occasions to English-speaking customers and, if so (a) has or will the Post Office Department conduct an investigation of any of the incidents and will the results be made public (b) what are the designations and addresses of the post offices involved (c) have there been incidents where specific clerks speak English one day and claim the next day to have no knowledge of the language?

2. What specific action has or will the government take to enforce the Official Languages Act so that English-speaking persons in Montreal will be served by all post offices in their own language?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. The Department is aware that English speaking customers have occasionally been denied service in English at a number of Post Offices in the area of Metropolitan Montreal. (a) The department has conducted, and will conduct, investigations whenever a complaint is received concerning inadequate public service. Results of such investigations are made known to the complainant and, as appropriate, to agencies such as the Commissioner of Official Languages. (b) Complaints have been received concerning inadequate service in English at the following Montreal Post Offices: Postal Station B, 1250 University; Postal Station H, 1970 St. Catherine West; Place d'Armes, 155 St. James West; St. Laurent, 1495 De l'Eglise, St. Laurent; Victoria, 4895 Sherbrooke Street West. (c) Members of the public have stated that the same employee(s) have spoken English on occasion and have not on others.

2. The Department ensures that employees who will serve the public are trained prior to assuming wicket duties. Part of this training emphasizes the employees' duties and responsibilities vis-a-vis the official languages. Where appropriate, language training is given. The great majority of postal clerks understand and honour their obligations for providing service to the public. When infractions occur, personal letters are sent to the individual(s) concerned reminding them of their responsibilities. If further infractions occur after an employee has received such a letter, the Department would consider taking all administrative measures necessary to ensure the application of the Official Languages Act.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 5,201—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware of a statement attributed to Mr. Marcel Perreault, President of the Montreal Local of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, that Montreal postal workers are determined to support the principle that French be the working language of Quebec's post offices?

2. What immediate steps has or will the government take to guarantee the rights of Quebec English-speaking persons to be served in their own language at all post offices designated bilingual within the Province?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. Yes, the Department is aware of a statement attributed to Mr. Marcel Perreault that postal workers are determined to support the principle that French be the working language of Quebec's Post Offices. As a matter of fact, French has always been, and remains, the working language within most Post Offices in Quebec. Bilingual skills are required primarily for positions where public contact may occur in accordance with Section 4(A) of the Parliamentary Resolutions of June 29, 1973.

2. A Post Office is not designated bilingual. Some, or all, of the public contact positions within a Post Office may be designated bilingual depending upon the clientele served as determined empirically. The duties and responsibilities of employees who are bilingual to serve the public either in English or in French are made clear prior to assuming wicket duties. See also reply to Question 5,200, Part 2.

2. In what location is the Regiment stationed, and what plans, if any, have been formulated for its future strength and location?

Some of these options could involve changes to the Canadian Airborne Regiment.

CENSUS—"HEAD OF HOUSE"

Question No. 5,692—Mr. Beatty:

1. What is the purpose of requiring one person in each household to be designated "head of house" for the 1976 Census?

2. What criteria were used in determining who was to be designated as the "head of house" in a household?

3. Does Statistics Canada intend to abolish this procedure on the grounds that it is archaic and unnecessary?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports the following: 1. The purpose of requiring one person in each household to be designated as "head of household" in the 1976 Census, is to provide a statistical reference point to enable compilation of information on families and their constituents. Without such a reference point the production of census statistics on the composition of Canadian families would be impossible.

2. Following an analysis of the 1971 census information, Statistics Canada changed the head of household concept from a male head only to a male or female head of household. Who is to be designated head in 1976 is a matter of choice to be decided by the members of each household.

3. Statistics Canada does not consider the term head of household to be archaic and unnecessary. In accordance with the usual practices of the bureau, the results of the current census will be analysed before determining the format of questions in future censuses.

NORTH BAY AIRPORT

Question No. 5,733—Mr. Blais:

For the years (a) 1973 (b) 1974 (c) 1975, by quarter, what were the total number of take-offs and landings for (i) scheduled aircraft (ii) non-scheduled aircraft at North Bay Airport?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The following table contains statistics on scheduled, non-scheduled, and other commercial aircraft movements at North Bay Airport. These data are presented on a quarterly basis for the years 1973, 1974, and 1975. The tabulated data represents the numbers of take-offs plus landings. On a quarterly basis, there is a negligible difference between the number of take-offs and landings. Therefore, the numbers presented can be divided by two to obtain either take-offs or landings. Please note that non-scheduled refers to charter operations by aircraft having a gross take-off weight of 18,000 pounds or more. Charter operations by aircraft having a gross take-off weight less than 18,000 pounds are in the other commercial category.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 5,709 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is not the appropriate time to raise this point of order, but I want to refer to the reply given by the Solicitor General to questions of mine, Nos. 4,255 to 4,355 inclusive. The answer given by the Solicitor General is that apparently he does not have sufficient staff and it would take considerable time to answer the questions I raised. I think this is a castigation of the way his department is operating. If they do not have the information I requested, which is not complicated—it dealt with mutilations, attempted escapes and attempted suicides, matters which the Department of the Solicitor General and the Penitentiary Service ought to have readily available—I suggest to Your Honour that the questions should remain on the order paper as at least a testament of the incompetence of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Allmand: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, in answering that question yesterday, at page 15013 of Hansard I pointed out that while that information may be available, it is not in our computer system. To get the information for the hon. member we would have to look through 30,000 files, some active and some dormant. This would take several months' work by a large group of officers. We felt that in this instance we do not have the staff or the funds available to provide answers to such questions.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring your attention to a question I asked at page 3625 of Hansard for February 25, 1975, when Your Honour replied regarding the answering of starred questions in a given length of time. Your Honour indicated that the question could be left unanswered ad infinitum, at the discretion of the minister.

The purpose of starred questions, as I understand it and as the system has developed by custom over the years, is to inhibit lengthy questions with a preamble, to put them on the order paper and star them. Another purpose is to give the minister time to prepare a more complete answer than he could on the spur of the moment and, hopefully, improve the answer. This was my understanding and my reason, over the months that have elapsed since February 25, 1975, for writing to the President of the Privy Council and speaking to him on three occasions. I also felt it would give protection to the Speaker since he stated, quite correctly, that he has no authority over starred questions as to when, if ever, they should be answered.

I also want to add that when I was ruled out of order on an oral question in a previous parliament, a former Speaker told me that my question was too long, that he was trying to contain the length of questions and answers so as to get to as many members as possible, and therefore my question should be starred and put on the order paper and it would be answered within a few days. This is, and has been, my understanding of the status of starred questions.

In the mother of parliaments a starred question is answered within two full days. In Canada it appears we are a bit unorthodox. Originally, as I understand it, only written questions were admissible by the Standing Orders and had to appear on the order paper. Then the asking of oral questions became customary on the basis of extreme urgency, and this has now become firmly established. As a matter of fact, Sir Herbert Williams probably asked about 4,000 questions during his parliamentary career, and described questions asked in the House as perhaps one of the most powerful instruments of democracy.

Nothing could more weaken the control of parliament over the executive than the abolition or curtailment of the right of a member of parliament to ask a question in the House of Commons. It is my contention that starred questions, by custom, should be given their useful place between oral questions and written questions.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the indulgence in listening to my plea to retain a useful tool in the armament of democracy and to strengthen the hand of every member of parliament by placing starred questions in the place in which custom has already placed them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reinforce what has been said so well by my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North. In the past it has been recognized and accepted by all sides that starred questions had a high degree of urgency. I notice that some on the order paper are simple ones that have been there since April. They are not particularly embarrassing. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal has one which asks what the regulations are concerning spouses accompanying officers to functions in an officers' mess. This question was asked early in May, and it is still outstanding.

I do not think any question that goes on the order paper with a star should take more than a week or ten days to answer. Certainly, with today's communications, there is no excuse for delay. Any question with a star, which has a privileged position and asks that the parliamentary secretary or the minister concerned should read the answer aloud, should be, by courtesy, answered within a working week. If it appears on Monday, it should be read aloud by the following Monday.

I would hope the Chair would assist the House in seeing that the regulation is enforced, not by order, but there is not inconsiderable moral suasion available to the Chair—a matter about which I know something.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, questions are starred simply in order to obtain an oral reply. There is no indication in the star itself that the matter ought to be answered with any greater urgency than any other question on the order paper. Your Honour has always held, as have your predecessors, that questions ought to be placed on the order paper if they are not of such an urgent nature as to be asked during the oral question period at the beginning of each day's sitting.

If my hon. friends have some precedents that they want to communicate to me, I would be glad to hear them. I listened with interest to the intervention of the hon. member for Edmonton West. I am not aware of any precedent of Your Honour or your predecessors to the effect that starred questions ought to be answered with more celerity than questions on the order paper that are not starred. I am ready, as my hon. friend has indicated, to be instructed by members with more experience, and I would welcome any assistance he can offer. Of course, I did not hear that assistance in his intervention before Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The matter raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North has been raised before, as he indicated, and he had the conversations alluded to in his remarks today with the hon. President of the Privy Council concerning this matter. I think it is clear that in the past there has certainly been that impression among some hon. members, even if it was never enshrined, and it certainly has never been enshrined in the customs of the House, which are equally as important as our Standing Orders. If that has not been the custom or practice of the House, it certainly has been the impression in the minds of a good many members that it was so.

A cursory examination of the precedents verifies there is no regulatory force behind the notion that there should be a time limit with respect to answering starred questions. However, since we have the oral question period in which we attempt to accommodate questions which are sufficiently urgent to warrant exposure during that time, since ordinary questions on the order paper can be answered within a greater period of time, and since we have starred questions which demand an oral answer, there is support for the idea that the urgency of the starred question which must be answered orally lies between that of oral questions and questions on the order paper. But there is no indication in the precedents or practices of this House that that has ever been formalized.

It is hoped that some understanding can be reached with respect to starred questions. It might be urged that the procedure committee should examine this question in the course of its re-examination of the procedures of the House. Members who have participated in such discussions on previous occasions are distinguished members of that committee. It would be helpful if the committee could examine this matter specifically to see whether some recommendation could be made to allow a clearer understanding to be reached about the degree of urgency which might be attached to starred questions.

I have asked a study to be undertaken in my office to determine with greater clarity the exact experience of the House in the recent past. When the study is complete, perhaps I can supply copies of it to members of the procedure committee and others who are interested, to see whether it might form the basis of suggestions to be made by that committee.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think what has been said effectively closes the matter. I suggest to the President of the Privy Council that it would be helpful if he would consider the position of the government with respect to starred questions before the committee deals with the matter. Perhaps on an experimental basis we could institute a temporary, voluntary system with respect to how starred questions are to be dealt with in future.

I was rising on another point of order to do with a practice which has developed concerning the recognition by members of this House, other than yourself, of distinguished visitors to Canada who may be in one of the galleries of the House. I am not suggesting that distinguished visitors to our country who are in our galleries ought not to be recognized, but I say to you, sir, that we do those visitors a great disservice and discourtesy if, as was the case with the group from the European parliament today, they are recognized by someone other than yourself during a controversial portion of the question period. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs thought it would be appropriate to recognize our distinguished visitors during the question period.

To the extent that this occurred during the parliamentary struggle known as the question period when some matters hit close to the bone, I am prepared to accept it, but I suggest it was bad manners. It is bad manners for parliament and improper on the part of all of us to allow this situation to continue. Sir, if official visitors to this House are to be recognized, you, and only you, as the first commoner of this House, ought to call the attention of members and to the public generally, through the press, to the presence in the gallery of distinguished visitors to our country.

I think it is extremely important that recognition on such occasions should not be regarded as legitimate government recognition, or legitimate opposition recognition, but as parliamentary recognition. If the visitors are so distinguished that they ought to be recognized, then you, and only you, sir, ought to do the recognizing. That course, I suggest, would be more conducive to order and decorum in this House and to the proper operation of the question period. I repeat, if the visitors are so distinguished, if the delegation is so prestigious as to warrant recognition by this House, you, sir, as the first commoner, ought to recognize our visitors on behalf of all members of the House of Commons. I ask Your Honour to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into the discussion as to who should be the appropriate member of this House to recognize distinguished visitors. I ought to point out that my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, introduced our distinguished visitors from the European economic mission and council today as he did, because for some reason the minister and Sir Christopher Soames were placed in the diplomatic gallery and he was unable to recognize them from that place. Only after they went to the gallery facing him was he able to introduce them. I know it is not like him to want to introduce distinguished visitors on a note of controversy, but he did it in what seemed to him the only time available.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you. The minister has reinforced my point.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are several dimensions to the problem raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. In fairness, I ought to say that I have attempted to follow a rigid guideline with respect to people recognized by the Chair. There have been requests on what seem to become more frequent occasions for recognition by counterparts of ministers. Some visitors have counterparts in our cabinet and for that reason there seems to be a temptation for their counterparts in the Canadian ministry to recognize them.

This raises two problems alluded to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton: first, that some visitors are recognized by members of the House other than the Chair; second, that a minister's recognition of someone in the gallery could be interpreted as recognition conferred by the government, as opposed to recognition conferred by parliament.

I would appreciate the collaboration of House leaders in order to clarify this matter. I would be prepared to take it upon myself to do whatever recognizing is to be done, if it is understood, within flexible limits, how that matter should be handled. Perhaps that could well be left for future discussion. The point was most interesting and well taken.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened with great interest to the exchange which just took place, and I felt the explanation you gave the House was most worthy. What concerns me is that your call just now for the cooperation of House leaders apparently went unnoticed by the government House leader, who was busily occupied discussing another matter with another member during the entire time Your Honour was speaking. I suggest that the government House leader should read today's Hansard tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Sick!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported

(with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, just before the lunch recess, I was presenting arguments explaining why I support the motion of my colleague the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

Before, if I may do so, I would like to thank the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) for supporting the motion which I presented at the opening of this sitting and I would also like to thank all hon. members of the House who supported it unanimously, in order to clarify once for all the days of sitting of Parliament when it comes to St. John the Baptist Day or Dominion Day. I thank you all very much.

Mr. Speaker, as amendment No. 10 deals with clause 3 of Bill C-84 and as it concerns piracy, I have been a little bit surprised when I heard the Solicitor General who, apparently, wants to have us understand that, in the spirit of the bill, the word "piracy" applies especially to air piracy. However, it is not referred to at all as the bill simply says "piracy". As my colleague from Lotbinière explained very clearly yesterday when he took part in the debate, there are other acts of piracy just as criminal as air piracy and which, to my mind, should have the same consequences for those who commit them.

When we read the history of our country or the history of the world, we remember those novels about piracy on the seas, when people would join the crew of a ship to seize it, to sail it away from its destination and to take hold of its cargo to make a fortune. Nowadays, there is a new form of piracy. During these last few years, we have experienced many aircraft hijackings which claimed many victims. All nations in the world concerned about the protection of air passengers were shocked by hostage takings and sometimes by killings of innocent victims. Mr. Speaker, I remember and I think all hon. members also remember this kind of piracy which was the subject of international conference discussions on air piracy to find ways to stem this epidemic of crimes.

Everyone will recall that parliamentarians of various countries advocated very severe penalties for criminals who hijacked planes away from their destination and kept a number of passengers as hostages to gain personal benefits.

Mr. Speaker, this kind of hijacking is still going on. Although we in Canada never had the misfortune of being in such a situation, it does not mean that in the coming months or years such a situation will not occur. Therefore, if we really want to cooperate with the other countries of the world to prevent this kind of hijacking, severe penalties must be provided to prevent criminals from hijacking airplanes and committing such reprehensible acts as we witnessed in the past, either through newspapers, television or radio, where many victims were held during hours and even days under the threat of armed criminals who thought they could really come out of it with a sentence of only a few years.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge my colleagues to retain in the statutes this section 75(a) of the Criminal Code, in order that criminals contemplating such acts be prevented or at least deterred from going ahead for fear of the death penalty.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call upon all hon. members to express themselves freely on this amendment. We hear about a free vote. I happen to believe in free votes, Mr. Speaker, because ever since I came to this House I have been voting freely, and I would like all hon. members to do so. However, I am a little surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the fact that the ministers are not free as well to vote as they choose. Yet, if I understand well the constitution of Canada and our parliamentary procedures, I believe—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He cannot carry on without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and all my colleagues as well. I will just complete my thought on this matter. Before being a minister, a member of this House is above all a member of parliament, and it is as such that we are called upon to vote for or against a bill.

That is why I am surprised that cabinet members seem to be obliged to vote specifically for the bill and in proof of this, I shall quote from an article in La Presse dated February 12, 1976. And if the thinking reported here is not that of the Solicitor General, I would like him to clarify the matter so that the public will not be under the impression that a free vote in the House implies some hypocrisy but something quite concrete. This was reported in La Presse:

> According to the principle of cabinet solidarity, cabinet members are bound to support the government bill designed to do away with capital punishment at the time of the free vote on the matter.
> In answer to questions put to him outside the House, the Solicitor General of Canada, Mr. Allmand, explained that because the bill he will table in the House on February 24 is a government bill, the ministers will not be free to vote for or against its passage.
> If they are against, Mr. Allmand went on to say, they will have to leave the cabinet . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am quite willing to cooperate with the hon. member who has requested the unanimous consent of the House to conclude his speech, but I must point out to him that we are now on motions Nos. 10 and 11 which deal specifically with clause 3 of the bill before us and concern piracy more particularly. I realize that the hon. member deal with the subject in general terms and that his remarks might apply to the amendment as well as to the bill itself. I trust that he will at least refer once in a while to the amendment before the House so as not to misuse the time unanimously allotted to him by other members.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, your very kind remarks on a point of order lead me to think this: I have a feeling I was not going far enough in trying to explain my thoughts. I believe I am respecting the spirit of the Standing Orders of the House because clause 3 of the bill is precisely designed to amend a section of the Criminal Code which stipulates in fact that whoever is guilty of piracy must be condemned to death. As we are discussing the death penalty and as in addition we have been told we would vote freely, I am wondering why hon. members of the House are not allowed the privilege of expressing themselves freely. To my mind, whether one is Solicitor General, Prime Minister or minister, one is first of all an hon. member. I would like this point to be explained to me because, if we do not proceed in that fashion, the rules of the game are changed, and the tenth amendment to Bill C-84, as moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), specifically concerns the death penalty. Since the vote is to be free on the death penalty, I would like that vote to be free for all hon. members. Otherwise, I shall never believe again in "a free vote in the House of Commons".

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my intervention at this time will not be as lengthy as some in the past. I find in clause 3 an amending section dealing with the subject of piracy and a distinction is drawn in section 75(2) of the Criminal Code. Not only does that section speak of committing an act of piracy within or without Canada, but it goes further and provides that if an individual or individuals, while committing piracy or attempting to commit piracy, murders or attempts to murder or does any act likely to endanger the life of another person, then the wrongdoer shall be sentenced to death. In the present bill provision is only made for a person who commits piracy while in or without Canada; there is nothing about attempted piracy.

I suppose the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) might answer, "Oh well, we would lay a charge, in the ordinary course of events, either of murder or attempted murder". But what are we to do in this day and age about the modern version of an act of piracy of the kind we saw last week and two announced even this morning? I suppose Canadians will say that these things happen in other lands. One might almost expect those high moralists who talk of the abolition of capital punishment to say that such acts are committed in barbaric or less civilized lands. I say nonsense, Mr. Speaker. It is just as conceivable to have an aircraft hijacked in Greece, Israel, France or Germany. The United States had a rash of hijackings and we have had a couple, and I think we may yet see further attempts at hijacking or actual hijacking of aircraft into or out of Canada take place.

When hijackings occur, people do get murdered. These people are not only security agents but passengers. I would want a much more valid explanation than the one I have been able to cull from these amendments in Bill C-84 or from the testimony of the Solicitor General's officials before the justice and legal affairs committee. Simply to say that piracy will merit a life sentence does not satisfy me. Clause 5 of the bill repeals section 218 of the Criminal Code and substitutes the following:

(2) For the purposes of Part XX, the sentence of imprisonment for life prescribed by this section is a minimum punishment.

I gather from the popular impression that this minimum punishment is 25 years. It is hard to determine whether there will be an application for parole permitted at the end of 25 years or whether it will be at the end of 18 years; I rather suspect it will be the latter. I think, as I said last night, that in this modern day it is far crueller to consign a man or woman to the Bastille, as they were in the eighteenth century in France, to be put away, forgotten, pigeonholed as just another file that the Solicitor General's department will occasionally examine in a raw of other files.

One has to undergo incarceration or restriction of liberty to know what it is like. I hate to be subjective about this, because somehow I feel that subjectivity may not be the best attitude to take in arriving at a judgment in such matters as these. However, one is conditioned by one's circumstances, and I can assure hon. members that nearly three years of very severe restriction of my freedom during World War II, knowing of those who had to suffer solitary confinement for real or imagined wrongs against the captive power, did much to the morale of prisoners of war.

If there is no hope, and release from prison is 25 years down the road, then, notwithstanding the relative comforts of the modern-day prison compared to the Bastille, this is an invitation by society to the individual to remove or do away with himself. Certainly, there will be no hope of rehabilitation because that person will in the normal course of events reach middle or old age, if he should survive the sentence of 25 years at all. As I say, why not park them all in a mausoleum right away because they will become as the living dead.

There are a few people who are sentenced now to terms of 25 years hard labour, although very rarely, who have the propect, if they behave, of being up for parole at the end of one-third of their sentence. A man of 25 years of age sentenced to 25 years may expect, if he meets the other conditions—and they are stringent—to get out on parole in eight or nine years. What a difference between eight or nine years and what is proposed! This provides a goal to work toward, which is not inherent in 25-year or perhaps an 18-year sentence. These people will become, if this should be Canada's law, the living dead. I do not know whether society is any further ahead when it says to a man or woman in the courts that he or she is sentenced to a living death, or is sentenced to suffer death by hanging. One is quicker and very sure, whereas the other takes much longer but is equally sure.

For these reasons, I do not see what improvement there is in the amendment contained in Bill C-84. My colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), has moved that clause 3 be deleted and, in effect, that section 75(2) of the Criminal Code be maintained. I am in full support of his amendment and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for a few moments in support of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). We are dealing with a situation much more serious than perhaps the minister and his colleagues realize. After listening to the exchange that took place this morning between the minister and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), it would seem there is an element of doubt as to whether this legislation deals with hijackers or if they are adequately dealt with in sections 76

(1), (2) and (3) of the Criminal Code. I am sure you are very much aware, Mr. Speaker, as I am, that in a great many cases guilty people are not subjected to the laws of the land because of technicalities. I can certainly envisage circumstances in which a smart lawyer could get a guilty person off on a technicality such as would exist in the criminal law if this legislation were passed.

The minister stated today that he did not have written advice that hijacking was included in piracy but that this was advice he had received through a phone call. It seems to me we should not be dealing with legislation by conversation and we should not be acting on conversation. This is far too important a matter for us to be dealing with it just by guesswork. The minister is not playing fair with the Canadian people by subjecting them to this type of legislation. It seems that we will end up with nothing short of a bird's nest and the only people who will get any comfort from that nest will be the criminals. Canada will become a haven for criminal activity. The day has long passed when we could say it cannot happen here, because it can. We are only separated by a few hours, by aircraft, from the most distant parts of the world.

The minister says that piracy does not relate to hijacking. He is differentiating between water and air travel. I suggest it is very difficult to differentiate between them. It would behoove the minister to clarify the Criminal Code in this area so everyone will know what can be expected. All the members of this House and, I am sure, the Canadian public are concerned about this matter. That is why there has been a great deal of interest shown in the legislation. The minister would do a great service to Canadians by holding back third reading of this bill.

An hon. Member: So the public can react.

Mr. Towers: Yes, in order that the public can react. Perhaps it could be dealt with during a certain period of time in the fall. I am sure my colleagues would agree to a three, four or five-day debate in the fall, allowing the Canadian people the summer in which to have some input into this important matter.

If hijacking is related to piracy, this means that every time a person gets on an aircraft he is up for ransom. Let me bring to the attention of the House a point made last night by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). I read from page 15043 of Hansard for July 5:

> I would ask you why those guerrillas hijacked the plane and held those innocent people captive? It was for the purpose of freeing other people who had committed political crimes, crimes of terrorism and crimes of air piracy, yet because they had not paid the penalty for these heinous crimes they were still alive in jail providing sufficient motivation to these people to commit this terrible act. They played with those people's lives so they could spring from prison their associates and accomplices in international crime.

Mr. Speaker, this should not go unnoticed. As I mentioned a moment ago, whenever Canadians board a plane their lives are at stake if someone should decide to hijack the plane and take hostages. We cannot any longer say this cannot happen in Canada. If this bill should pass, persons who are prepared to perpetrate this kind of crime will be protected in this land; there will be an inducement for them to come here. We must think about that before we decide to pass this legislation.

Another point I wish to make is that it is very difficult to differentiate between piracy by sea, hijacking, piracy by air, or activities during war. I am sure there are few Canadians who would not agree that as a nation we have the right to protect our freedoms and our way of life in time of war. It is difficult for me to understand why people who agree that they should have the right to go to war to protect their rights and privileges would not have in place a form of capital punishment for acts that are closely associated thereto.

These are points which I think the minister would be well advised to take into consideration and give further thought to so that Canada will be able to have the best law possible for the protection of its people, a law that will meet with approval by the majority of Canadians. This is a fundamental principle and one we cannot pass over lightly. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to present my thoughts on this matter at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to comment on an issue about which I had several opportunities to rise in the House since 1962. I am also pleased to speak to the amendment moved by my colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) concerning the amendments brought to the bill. We hope that the minister will finally understand the merits of our allegations and our remarks which are not based on feelings but on the views of those who have already studied the matter on several occasions during the past years and especially when piracy acts were committed in Canada and elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, I have here the magazine Science criminelle et droit pénal comparé, volume No. 28 of 1973 where the various countries of world are asked to legislate more clearly and adequately on air piracy. On page 306, it is recorded that:

> The world strike of air line pilots was launched on June 19, 1972 by the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations (IFALPA) to protest against inadequate measures taken to prevent and curb offences against aviation. IFALPA President Olof Fosberg met United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim on June 15, 1972 to ask him to submit to the Security Council for approval adequate measures to prevent air piracy.
> The struggle for safety in the air is one of the crucial problems of modern penal law, its efficiency, its social function in today's world.

Experts in the field of aviation seek protection for the millions of dollars invested in aircraft by various people, for the human lives which they are responsible for as well as for pilots.

Today the minister wants to give wider scope to the statutes by saying that pirates may be penalized, not must be penalized.

By changing just a few words, we are opening the door wide to pirates, the gangsters of our country and those of other lands who can come here on various occasions and do what they will in Canada, as they already have in many countries of the world in the last 25 years. Later on, I shall give figures which constitute the balance-sheet of international piracy in the last 25 years.

The president of the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations had this to say about the matter:

First of all, plane hijacking has now become an international problem because the course of flights is being altered beyond state boundaries. International flights are often involved and frequently domestic flights are forced to fly out of their countries thus changing abruptly their original itineraries. That is why hijacking has become an international problem —and national.

Now, this is what we hear when the notion of piracy is being defined: What is piracy? According to the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations, piracy is this:

1. The behaviour of individuals who disturb air traffic is currently known as "air piracy". The comparison with sea piracy at sea is easy to make. For centuries, pirates disrupted the peaceful navigation on the high seas, whose routes knew neither masters nor obstacles. The seas were and remain free of any state jurisdiction and ships flying the flags of all nations meet there freely. All civilized nations respected those free stateless waterways. Pirates who disrupted peaceful traffic on the high seas were considered as hostes generis humani. Arrested, they were immediately executed (hung from the yards) by those who had caught them. The state which got hold of them did justice. It is even asserted that the international penal code began with the struggle against piracy.

Section 15 of the Geneva Convention states:

The acts hereinafter enumerated constitute piracy:

(1) any illegitimate act of violence, detention, or any depredation committed for personal purposes by the crew or the passengers of a private ship or private aircraft and directed: (a) on the high seas, against another ship or aircraft, or against persons or goods aboard, (b) against a ship or aircraft, persons or goods in a place not under the jurisdiction of any state.

Mr. Speaker, I could still go on for a long time quoting international texts on conferences in the field of international piracy.

It is strange to see that in Canada we seem to be very compassionate towards those who commit criminal actions, as evidenced in one of the trials described in the book entitled Air Pirates by Mr. James A. Arey which can be found in the Parliament library, and where we are told about the deeds of one of the most wanted criminals in Italy, by the name of Raffaele, who committed the longest and most terrifying aircraft hijacking ever known, kidnapped a policeman; when he was arrested, he declared with innocence: Why do you arrest me, my friend?

In November 1970, he was tried in Rome under eight charges for kidnapping twice—first the crew of the aircraft then the Italian policeman; for having used coercion twice, by threatening with a gun first the crew, then the policeman; the three other charges dealt with the import, the keeping and the illegal possession of military weapons.

Minichiello was sentenced to seven years and six months imprisonment and to a $580 fine. While the most responsible editorialists in the United States wrote: "Hijackers are not heros!", in Italy, the public prosecutor . . . described Minichiello as a "good boy" . . .

—a little like we apparently wish to define them in Canada as a result of this bill—

. . . a "good boy, a timid boy" who just wanted to go back to his native land to see his father again and find peace there.

The counsel for the defence said, and I quote: "You have in front of you a rustic Don Quixote, without any education, deprived of Sancho Panza and of Dulcinea who, instead of mounting Rossinante flew in the skies to follow his dream and to achieve his purpose." Upsetting, isn't it? How is it possible not to be moved, particularly if we hear that, in addition, Minichiello is a pathetic and romantic young man who simply wants "to escape the injustices of vast America."

—And we were among those, among "the injustices of vast America".

"He is a romantic person: his anguish, his hopes, his nostalgia launched him in that incredible adventure, like an ancient crusader".

This is more or less the description Italians were making of the greatest hijacker Italy ever knew. And that is why in Canada we seem to be about to open our doors and soften our legislation to encourage these honourable individuals.

Minichiello . . . was . . . really crazy about the sky, endlessly cleaning his weapon while the old aircraft was crossing the ocean with its load of nice hostages . . . who, on several occasions, almost came to their death at the hand of a sympathetic gangster.

On November 10, 1969, young David L. Booth, aged 14, threatened with a butcher's knife a young lady he had taken hostage. He wanted to hijack a Delta Air Lines DC-9 from Cincinnati to Sweden or any other destination. David was finally persuaded to give up his plan and was held under guard until the plane had left the ground. This may have nothing to do with Minichiello's brilliant achievement but the child's mother, Mrs. Anne Booth, suggested herself that her son may have been influenced by a young marine's spectacular flight to Rome on the previous week. "He eagerly followed all news pertaining to the hijack in the newspapers and on television", she said.

When hijacking is reported in the media hijackers are depicted as heroes, and thus air piracy is encouraged over morality, much against our children's interests. During the few minutes which are left, Mr. Speaker, using reports on hijacking in various countries which were published in this book following interesting research in this matter, I would like to list the hijackings which occurred from 1930 to 1974.

If we read this chronological list, we see that in at least 80 per cent of the cases hijacking was carried out by revolutionaries of the entire world who, for the sake of piracy, try to alleviate our laws in order to do what they want with our planes.

It would be too long to give the whole list. I quote:

This list was made from data provided by the US Department of Transport; the US Federal Administration of Aeronautics; the American Air Transport Association; the International Air Transport Association; the International Civil Aviation Organization; and also from thousands of newspaper articles and the author's personal archives.

I only want to indicate that on November 1, 1958, five Cuban revolutionaries boarded Viscount and headed for Miami-Varadero and then crashed on the ground, causing the death of 17 passengers. There were only three survivors.

On July 5, 1960, two Cuban revolutionaries boarded the Madrid-Havana air line and landed at Miami. On July 18, 1960, a Cuban revolutionary on board Viscount going from Havana to Miami landed in Jamaica. On July 28, 1960, three Cuban revolutionaries on a domestic Cuban flight landed at Miami. On October 29, 1960, 9 Cuban revolutionaries on board a DC-3 Havana-Isle of Pines landed in Key West. It is funny, Mr. Speaker, to see how revolutionaries use air piracy to go to Cuba, their country where they wish so much to go, and a few years later, we see those same revolutionaries, having tried this socialist regime, using the same air piracy—of which we have the records—to get out of those countries and fly toward other skies.

On October 29, 1960, 9 Cuban revolutionaries on board a DC-3 Havana-Isle of Pines—I just mentioned that. On July 3, 1961, 14 Cuban revolutionaries, flying Havana-Veradero, landed in Miami. On July 9, 1961, a group of Havana businessmen took a DC-3: there were three dead and six wounded. On March 27, 1966, three revolutionaries named Angel, Bétancourt and Cueto were on board an IL-18 Santiago-Havana Flight: there were two dead after the pilot used trickery to land in Cuba.

Mr. Speaker, I have in front of me a list of approximately 560 air piracies where it is seen that revolutionaries of the world are those who did the greater number of hijacking to date.

Well, Mr. Speaker, when we want to relax our laws by saying that a pirate may be liable to death we are automatically encouraging revolutionaries across the world to commit a larger number of criminal acts than has been witnessed in history. As my hon. colleagues, and those tho preceeded me, I would like the passage of this bill to be postponed so we can have the reaction of the public and I would also like to keep the old bill as it was drafted so we can use it for a longer period than what is being proposed at this time to allow Canada to live at least the next six months because with the events that we witnessed all across the world during various Olympic Games, with the tensions that exist between certain states that will be coming to Canada I am concerned that we should want to relax our statutes so as to bring about at home events that we would not like to have particularly in our province and in this country.

I do not understand the eagerness of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to open the doors, facilitate air or other kinds of piracy, and nearly give medals to those who are unfortunately preparing to commit acts in Canada as were witnessed elsewhere in other parts of the world. I dare hope that the minister will be able to consider not only the advice of those officials but particularly the people and what they want, because they are asking for protection. The public elected members to this House to give protection to non-criminals and punish criminals. I do not understand that the cabinet, and the Solicitor General in particular, should want to have understanding, latitude, to open doors, nearly give medals, and not give any protection to those who live not outside the law but within the law, abiding by the law. We are in this House to make laws and ask the law-abiding population to respect the laws we pass in this House. On the other hand, we now see the policemen of Canada, even prison guards who are really concerned to see the spirit the Solicitor General wants to give to our laws by offering protection to those who have always lived outside the law.

In concluding, I would like very much the Solicitor General to postpone at least for a few months the passage of this bill to allow reflection and allow the people of this country to make their opinions known on a bill which is extremely important to the future of this country and also to maintain good relations with other countries which will be called upon within the next few days to send representatives to this country to participate in the 1976 Olympic Games. We must ensure maximum protection to the citizens of this country and those who have faith in Canada because this country has always had a good reputation across the world and because we had stringent laws, discipline, because we were showing leadership and we were able up until this day to punish the guilty and have those who respect our law respected.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that there might be some hon. members who at first glance at this amendment to delete clause 3 might think it has some validity because you can talk about piracy in connection with a navy if you have a navy, but if your navy is non-existent, you can no longer talk about that form of piracy. The bill would become redundant in that sense. Considering the condition of our navy, it may be that the bill would be redundant in that regard. Therefore, I cannot understand why this morning the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) argued that the bill would have an effect only in the matter of piracy on the high seas. When we look at the two or three ships which are left in our navy, I do not know why any pirate would want to take any of them. The object of piracy is to get to port, and if a pirate were to seize one of our ships on the high seas the question is whether he would be caught long before he got to port.

At first glance, there might be some hon. members who think there is some validity in the government's bill and that we should eliminate the death penalty for piracy. However, it has always been contended that piracy should be deemed an invasion of the country whose flag a ship is flying, and throughout history an act of piracy has been considered an invasion of the integrity of the country to which the ship in question belonged. In addition to that, there is the vulnerable position of the people on board ship who are not in easy contact with their government and are isolated from the help of their compatriots and their government's constabulary forces. Piracy has been considered throughout history as the ultimate act of vandalism and a fraudulent affront to the integrity of governments.

Whenever we board an Air Canada jet, we walk past our country's coat of arms emblazoned on the fuselage of the aircraft. To me, that is a pretty clear indication that our government is fundamentally involved in the airlines of our country. That is our indication that unlawful intrusion of that aircraft is piracy.

In any act of war, the most heinous by-product is the anguish suffered by innocent bystanders. We can look back at the record of the suffering and anguish, especially on the part of women and children, in the Second World War during the Battle of Britain, the air raids over Germany and the bombing of Hiroshima. It is the suffering by innocent bystanders that is the most heinous aspect of war. How much worse is it when there is nowhere to hide? There have been cases in wartime when mass evacuation has taken place. We remember well that during the Battle of Britain thousands of women and children were taken out of London to the countryside, and many of them were brought to Canada.

However, what do innocent bystanders do if they are in mid-air on an aircraft flying at 35,000 feet? They are locked into the cabin of that aircraft. When a government authorizes or licenses a ship or a plane to carry the general public, it owes the public the protection it deserves. In its present form, this bill proposes to make pirates or skyjackers nothing more than we would consider prisoners of war to be. They can declare war on this country and all we will do is imprison them; and in its present form imprisonment in this country is fairly comfortable. As the present prison system operates, that would be about as effective as "Stalag 13" where the prisoners go in and out at will. I am not implying that the administrators of our penitentiaries are the counterparts of Colonel Klink, but I am saying that the kind of support being provided by the Solicitor General makes it appear that way.

I must refer again to what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) alluded to a few minutes ago. One of the reasons there is a rash of skyjacking in the world is that there are other terrorists in prisons and they become the reward for skyjackers. They are always the reason another skyjacking takes place. Just a few minutes ago the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) referred to the perverted sense of morality of skyjackers which involves the matter of identity and simple self-expression. It is suggested that all these people are trying to do is express themselves. There is some truth in that. In their perverted morality, these people have borrowed from the philosophy of Karl Marx, Sartre and Camus and said they are trying to express their authentic selves, and anyone trying to prevent their doing so is committing another act of immorality. They claim they are entitled to express themselves. There is no such thing, in this kind of perverted morality, as an absolute right or wrong; therefore the skyjacking of a plane is no different to these people than helping the poor.

In this country we are faced with the eventuality of having pirates or skyjackers in our prisons. The time will come when one of our planes will be skyjacked and the people in our prisons will be the reason for that skyjacking. Under the system that operates presently in this country, the next skyjackers will be rewarded for their terrorism. These people are ideologically committed to violence and have total disregard for human life. When we encourage skyjacking and air piracy by maintaining a terrorist population in our prison system, we are doing violence to the peace and security of the people of our country.

Mr. Speaker, we must pass this amendment that would alter the direction of the bill, in the interests of peace and security, if that is what the government is after. For innocent bystanders and innocent passengers on aircraft we must pass this amendment and take away the reward for skyjacking in Canada. I therefore urge hon. members to rethink and to re-evaluate their position on this bill, and to realize once and for all that we cannot afford to reward people who have this kind of twisted mentality and morality.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) aimed at eliminating clause 3 from this bill. At first I thought I would be speaking about piracy in terms of air piracy. However, that matter was so well covered this morning by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that I feel he has given the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) cause to reconsider the definition of piracy. I share the view of piracy in this context and particularly the manner in which it is described in the Criminal Code which in section 75.1 reads:

> Every one commits piracy who does any act that, by the law of nations, is piracy.

It is true, as the Solicitor General said, that the last conviction for piracy in this country was in 1867. During the past century there have been many developments in technology and in attitudes toward the law. I am satisfied in my own mind that should an incident of piracy affecting an aircraft take place, a judge could easily interpret this as meaning aircraft.

I have had other thoughts on this particular section, however, and I should like to draw to the attention of the House some anomalous situations which have developed as a result of the government's decision to include clause 3 in Bill C-84. I am convinced that as they were drawing up the bill and overflowing with this notion that they were going to eliminate the death penalty from Canadian law, they put their staff to work to find those sections of the Criminal Code where the death penalty occurred. In section 75.2 there is the possibility of someone being sentenced to death for having committed, or attempted to commit piracy although, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out earlier, any reference to a murder being committed in the course of committing that piracy was left out. No one will ever know why this occurred. In my opinion, it is another instance of extremely bad drafting.

Does piracy refer only to piracy on the high seas? I find it difficult to understand that the theft of a Canadian ship is the only act which can be considered a piratical act, when there are so few Canadian ships—unless we are talking about our neighbour's canoe up at the lake, or his sloop. Is that a Canadian ship? Is it piracy, or is it theft, to take charge of our neighbour's ship during the summertime? I think we have to be careful here.

In the course of eliminating the death penalty there is a most outrageous anomaly that has come to light in my study of the various related legislation on the statute books and that which is being proposed. Paragraph 76 defines piratical acts. I draw special attention to subsection (c), as follows:

> 76. Every one who, while in or out of Canada . . .
> (c) does or attempts to do a mutinous act on a Canadian ship . . .
> is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 14 years.

So a mutinous act is one of those acts which under the Criminal Code provides for imprisonment for life. In section 53 of the Criminal Code, inciting mutiny is dealt with. That is another act which, if committed, would make a person liable to imprisonment for 14 years. But mutiny itself is another matter and is referred to in sections 69 and 70 of the National Defence Act. This is where the government is carrying out a great con game. It has presented this bill as measure to eliminate capital punishment in Canada. Either it is deliberately conning the Canadian public, or its staff's work has been faulty. Section 69 of the National Defence Act reads:

> Every person—

This deals with every person, not a military person.

—who joins in a mutiny that is accompanied by violence is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to suffer death or less punishment.

Section 70 reads:

Every person who joins in a mutiny—

It explains that he suffers something unless he is the ringleader of the mutiny, and then he shall suffer death. My purpose is to warn the abolitionists in this House that if they think by voting for this bill, including the retention of this particular amendment, they are going to see the elimination of the death penalty in Canada, they have been had—completely and utterly had. I warn them: the death penalty remains on the statute books of this country. If they go away believing that by voting for this bill they will see the end of it, they delude themselves. The government either acquiesces in perpetrating this delusion or has been extremely inept in allowing it to happen. That is all I want to say. I shall leave it to the judgment of parliament.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code regarding piracy. I will speak particularly about air piracy and kidnapping and murder associated with such acts.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Although I have no formal notes to which I may refer, I feel strongly on the subject and think I have some capacity for speaking on it. I refer to a letter sent by the Reverend Sorley, of Stouffville, Ontario. In it he raises six points. His sixth point reads in part as follows:

Let us extend the death penalty.

We should include all those who are guilty of kidnapping, terrorism, hijacking, bombing and treason. If we do, it will have a discouraging effect on any lawbreakers and bring about a reduction in every form of crime. We have, in practice, abolished the death penalty for the last thirteen years and we have an increase in crime such as never has been known in the history of Canada.

What the clergyman said in his letter cannot but make one reflect on the enormous costs which have been inflicted on Canadian taxpayers and those of other nations for implementing methods which help to prevent acts of terrorism in the air. Canadians employed in security duties at airports and near aircraft could be better and more constructively employed elsewhere, at considerably less expense to the travelling public. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), in his wisdom, has developed the "user pay" concept and applied it to Canadian airports. The "user pay" policy applies not only to those operating light aircraft; it applies as well to commercial airlines, the travelling public and the long-suffering Canadian taxpayer.

I wonder what life in Canada or in any western country would be like without the embarrassment and harassment of airport security. I am thinking of what happens when an impatient air traveller is confronted by an equally impatient security officer. But it seems that most Canadians accept this new way of life, this new way of travelling, this new type of harassment, this further infringement upon civil liberties, as necessary. They look on security measures as measures to protect life and limb.

Perhaps members of parliament are more equipped than others to comment on the air piracy aspects of the bill. Many of us return frequently to our ridings at the Canadian taxpayers' expense. It takes me five or six hours of flying time to return to my western Canadian constituency. During my travels I have the opportunity to visit and observe Canadians of all walks of life. In the aircraft I see mothers with babies, aged parents and grandparents travelling to weddings, perhaps to funerals, or on holiday and I think about what can happen in the air if an act of terrorism takes place. I shudder at the consequences of air piracy.

Consider what happened recently in Uganda. All the free world lauded and applauded the actions of the Israelis in rescuring the victims of terrorism. What a frightening experience that must have been. Surely it has burned itself into the minds of all those hostages. They were held, I might add, with the apparently tacit approval of Uganda. I recall reading the reported remarks of one hostage who said, "When we heard the guns firing and the explosions, we thought it was all over for us, that our time had come."

In modern-day flying there are no second chances in the air when acts of piracy occur. Because of the ignorance, the madness of those who are involved in such acts, it takes only one mishap, one wrong move to send an aircraft plummeting to the ground. I recall an aircraft which was blown up some years ago over northern British Columbia. The identity of the perpetrator of the act was suspected; he could not be name for lack of proof. Mr. Speaker, there was an explosion in the air; the people in the tail section were blown out of the aircraft. Actually, the entire tail section separated from the fuselage, and in a dramatic effort to save the lives of his passengers, the pilot, with enormous skill given to him by God, flew the aircraft in a flat spin right down to the ground. When the wreckage was examined, it was found that the seats had dented the floor of the aircraft only by a quarter of an inch. That shows the lightness of the impact. The pilot brought the aircraft down without the tail, without any rudders to control it, using the throttles to operate the engines on the port and starboard side. He was able to bring the aircraft relatively safely to the ground. Unfortunately, on impact the gasoline tanks exploded and all on board were incinerated.

This sort of thing has happened in Canada and is going on in the world. We hear these things almost daily. It is the new trend. Terrorists kidnap and hijack for political or financial reasons. Without doubt, such acts are premeditated. No one boards an aircraft with the idea of flying from Ottawa to Vancouver and, on arrival at Calgary, thinks it might be a good idea to hijack the aircraft. These people know what they are doing. I say that those who are prepared to inflict their criminality, their murderous intent upon Canadians deserve only one penalty, that is, the supreme penalty. This is why I support the amendment.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some comments on this motion, one which would in effect delete clause 3 from the bill and retain the death penalty as a deterrent to acts of piracy. In today's world we do not often hear about piracy on the high seas. We hear a lot about piracy of trucks and aircraft. Piracy on the high seas has pretty well come to an end, at least on a large scale; but piracy of aircraft is something else again.

I had an experience several years ago when I was travelling on business from Madrid to London. It was a BEA flight. We were on board, and shortly before the aircraft was ready to leave the terminal, airport officials boarded high government officials from Spanish Morocco. I was sitting in the first-class section and I was shuffled out into the economy section. Incidentally, I never did get back the difference in fare, but that is beside the point. The aircraft began to taxi out to the main runway for take-off. But just before we got to the main strip, the aircraft was halted, the engines were shut down and all the passengers were taken off. The aircraft was surrounded by security people.

Airport officials brought up a vehicle, which we found out later to be a bomb disposal vehicle. All luggage was unloaded and all passengers were required to identify their luggage from behind a steel plate, after which their luggage was examined and placed in another location. When this process had been completed there were three pieces of luggage left, and we found later that those three pieces of luggage contained explosives. It was evidently the intention of somebody to blow up the aircraft. We could only surmise that it was due to the presence of the Spanish Moroccan government officials who were on board. It certainly was not because I was on board, because I was only a lowly Canadian businessman travelling abroad, trying to sell something and make a few dollars.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it was a frightening experience. We did not realize what was happening until it was all over. The aircraft was taken back to the terminal and checked again, after which those of us who wished to go on to London were allowed to board. I had some urgent appointments and consequently decided to proceed. Halfway into the flight all of us were suffering from a case of jitters, wondering whether they had really got all the explosives out. This illustrates the type of risk which travellers increasingly face today and which prompt one to ask whether we ought not to retain the supreme penalty for such crimes.

In the United States, acts of piracy on board aircraft with the object of securing money seem to have diminished sharply in number. It is true that some small aircraft are hijacked, but commercial aircraft have not been endangered recently in this way. In the last few years, though, we have seen a new threat: aircraft are being hijacked not for money but for political reasons. One group of individuals differs from another on political or religious grounds and is prepared to seize an aircraft and threaten people on board, most of whom they do not know, placing their lives in jeopardy in addition to the lives of the crew, not to mention an extremely expensive piece of machinery.

I notice that our airport surveillance arrangements are manned more extensively. At the Toronto international airport there are as many as five people who take passengers through the security gates. I do not know how much this costs Canada, but I estimate it amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars a year, all paid for by the travelling public. The cost worldwide must be in the billions of dollars and all we seem to be doing is putting our trust in an electronic device.

Only a few cases involving air piracy have been tried in Canada. There was one here in Ontario, I believe, and two in British Columbia. The person who tried to hijack an Air Canada plane in Ontario was given a relatively short prison sentence, one of those tried on the west coast was given a suspended sentence, and the other was fined $100. I do not believe we can continue to accept the taking of hostages, placing in jeopardy the lives of innocent people, without specifying that this is a crime which warrants the most serious penalty which can be prescribed. I certainly do not believe that 25 years in prison, with provision for review of sentence after 15 years, is adequate.

For these reasons I shall support the motion when it comes to a vote, which I understand will be on Thursday at 9.30 p.m. or thereabouts, in the hope that the House will make it clear that piracy on aircraft in flight is a most serious matter and we must take the most severe action we can to deter it. I recall some years ago checking with Lloyds of London respecting losses in connection with aircraft they had insured throughout the world. This loss came to hundreds of millions of dollars. Insurance rates for aircraft have increased, adding to the operating cost of airlines. Of course this cost is ultimately passed on to the user of that mode of transportation.

I ask members to contemplate this motion very carefully, not just carelessly to wave it aside, saying that it is proposing the retention of capital punishment in some form for certain crimes and they cannot support it. It would be a good thing if those members who oppose the motion were able to talk to some of the hostages in the recent incident in Uganda, to listen to their experiences and discover their feelings. I suggest they would realize that we should not lightly pass this matter off but should retain the most severe penalty that we have for the act of piracy of an aircraft.

That is about the extent of the remarks I wish to make. I will be speaking to other amendments that come forward but I thought it worth while to put on record the personal experience I had on an aircraft that was going to be blown up in the air. It was an experience I should not like to have again and which I would not wish on anybody else. I urge hon. members when considering this motion to think it out carefully and to support the deletion of clause 3 from Bill C-84.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to go on record as urging all hon. members to consider favourably the motion now before the House to delete clause 3 of the bill. Clause 3 clearly states that everyone who commits piracy is liable to imprisonment for life. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) made a very good speech on this subject before lunch, and I was slightly amazed during the question period to hear the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) say that the legal opinion that he had received was over the telephone. Not being a lawyer but as one who has been around here for a while, I thought legal opinions were written documents that clearly spelt out in every detail the arguments for or against a given position. Yet the minister suggests that piracy applies only to ships, I assume because somebody in the justice department advised him over the telephone that that was his interpretation of section 75(1) of the Criminal Code.

Section 75(1) clearly states that everyone commits piracy who does any act that by the law of nations constitutes piracy. The Geneva conference stated that air piracy exists and is considered as such. What we are dealing with in this bill is piracy, whether it be of ships or aircraft. Piracy is the taking of a vehicle, vessel or aircraft, and endangering the lives of the people thereon.

I think there is hardly anyone in Canada, except for the scattered few in the cabinet who are obeying the dictates of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who does not believe that we should retain the death penalty for hijackers. This is what the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) is seeking. A hijacking took place some years ago in Calgary by a person who is now serving a jail sentence. He has clearly stated that had he known that the death penalty would be invoked if someone had come to harm, he believes it would have deterred him from hijacking an aircraft, having it flown to Montana and back again to Canada. However, in that case no one lost their life and all were very fortunate.

The very essence of hijacking is that it endangers lives. Section 75(2) of the Criminal Code provides that anyone who commits or attempts to commit piracy, and who murders or attempts to murder in the course thereof, shall be sentenced to death. That is the section that Bill C-84 seeks to delete from the Criminal Code and in its place substitute life imprisonment for the death penalty.

Someone pointed out earlier today that imprisonment for life does not mean that. A person can get out of jail on guarded leave, which only means that he has to report in every so many hours while out on a week end pass. That really is not good enough. A hijacking could take place even in that short space of time. I urge all hon. members to take their obligations as members of parliament and representatives of their constituencies very seriously. This is not a complicated matter but one that is simple and straightforward. The question is: should one who causes bodily injury to another while committing an act of piracy face the supreme sentence of death?

I believe we have to make a concerted effort to cut down aircraft hijackings. The recent incident in Uganda which resulted in the freeing of 100 passengers by an amazingly successful raid by Israel will have a tendency to deter any further attempts at hijacking aircraft or any attempts at blackmailing Israel to release prisoners serving jail sentences in that country. From now on these terrorists will know that their own lives will be threatened, not that of any hostages they may take.

If this country now attempts to create a situation where we have the least severe penalty of most western nations for hijackings, then the very opposite will be true. Rather than flying aircraft to Uganda, hijackers will have them flown to Canada, particularly if their country does not have an extradition agreement with Canada. The worst penalty they can get in Canada will be life imprisonment. Their lives will not be in jeopardy. We are taking what must be considered in the eyes of the world a very backward step in attempting to control the hijacking of aircraft. This is a modern problem that has only come into being in the last five or six years. We should wrestle with it, and we should enforce the law as it now stands. We should not try to amend it as the Solicitor General is attempting to do through this bill.

I wholeheartedly support the two amendments moved by hon. members, the one before me being the amendment by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. It demands the attention of the House, and now has the attention of the whole country. The entire country is in complete support of the amendment put forward today. Members of parliament on all sides of the House would be doing the country a service in voting for the amendment whenever it comes to a vote, on Thursday night or at some other time.

It would not detract very much from the beliefs of abolitionists to vote in favour of retaining the death sentence for those who are convicted of the crime of hijacking where bodily harm occurs during the commission thereof. Surely that would not be asking too much of those who believe in abolition. This is an horrendous crime which is very difficult to stop. Many innocent people's lives are endangered through no fault of their own. Surely the minister, if he had the good of the country at heart, would accept this motion moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

There is one other thing that comes to my mind when dealing with this subject matter. This bill left the House and went to committee where the committee refused to hear any witnesses except the minister. Had we been able to call witnesses of the CP or Air Canada Airlines to give evidence before the committee, and perhaps officials of some U.S. airlines who have experienced hijacking a number of times, we might have heard evidence from those people who are responsible for the operation of aircraft, and for that matter ships, who firmly believe that the death penalty should be retained in respect of any such act of piracy.

The government in haste, or in an attempt to cover the facts and keep the public ignorant of the true state, rammed this bill through committee in a shameful fashion. The subject matter of this measure has been around Canada for a very long time. The government should have been prepared to have its legislation stand the scrutiny a good committee would have given it, and I know that committee would have given it that scrutiny had it been able to call witnesses and hear evidence. This is one of those things I will never be able to understand.

The minister knows he is moving against the will of the people. One might have thought that by having witnesses appear before the committee the minister in essence might have educated the people into believing that he is actually ahead of rather than behind them. However, in this way I think he is taking a retrograde step. I urge hon. members on all sides of the House to support the amendment which would retain the death penalty for the crime of piracy involving bodily harm.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Before putting the question, it is my understanding that motions Nos. 10 and 11 were to be grouped for the purpose of debate but that the question should only be put on motion No. 10 as this would also dispose of motion No. 11. Is that right?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 10 in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to order made Tuesday, June 29, 1976, the recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred.

The House will now move to the consideration of motions Nos. 12 and 13. It is my understanding they are to be grouped for the purpose of debate, but voted on separately. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lawrence moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 27 at page 4 the following new subsection:

"(6) Murder is first degree murder in respect of a person when the death is caused by that person and that person has been previously convicted of either first degree murder or second degree murder."

and by renumbering the present subsection (6) as subsection (7).

Mr. Reynolds moved:

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I shall not take too much of the time of the House this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to outline, if I may, the sense of the first amendment. First of all may I say that the new Section 214 deals with that type of homocide which we now have in the Criminal Code as murder. Basically murder, under the amendment submitted by the minister, will be broken down into two new classifications, first degree murder, and second degree murder. Right off the bat, in the reclassification of this type of homocide, anything that is not first degree murder will be classified as second degree murder.

In the new amendments there are a total, if my arithmetic serves me right, of seven broad, general classifications of homicide that can be classified as first degree murder. First, homicide is first degree murder when it is planned and deliberate. Second, homicide is first degree murder when the murder takes place by hiring an assassin, and that cuts through the verbiage of subsection (3). Third, homicide is first degree murder when the victim is a police officer or constable acting in the course of his duties. When a warden, prison guard or some custodial officer of that type is murdered during the course of his duties, that is the fourth broad classification of first degree murder. The fifth classification relates to a killing which takes place during an offence which we call the hijacking of an aircraft. In other words where there is a hijacking of an aircraft and murder or attempted murder takes place, then that is also first degree murder. The sixth classification is where a murder or attempted murder takes place during the offence of kidnapping or forcible confinement. Finally, classification number seven under the amendments submitted by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is where a murder takes place during the commission of a sexual offence such as rape.

Those are the seven classifications of first degree murder under the new reclassification submitted to the House by the Solicitor General, for which I congratulate him. The sense, the meaning, or the object of my amendment is to add an eighth classification for first degree murder. The eighth classification is in respect of any person who commits murder who previously has been convicted of either first or second degree murder.

I must admit that I have been doing a fair amount of pressuring and lobbying during the last few days about this. I feel that if an honest and fair vote takes place on this amendment, which hon. members will note does not deal with capital punishment but deals solely and strictly with a murderer who commits murder a second time, there are enough members who have indicated to me, regardless of how they voted on second reading that they will vote for this amendment. I suggest to hon. members that this is one instance in which we should not get emotional. It has nothing to do with the capital punishment issue.

I must admit that when I originally submitted the amendment my purpose was to make sure that all first degree murderers would be liable to the penalty of capital punishment. However, the Chair ruled that amendment out of order. But we still have this classification number eight for first degree murder. I submit it for the attention of members of the House because I think it certainly is worthy of consideration. The purpose is to make sure that the person who has been convicted of murder and who murders a second time is subject to the full punishment relating to first degree murder.

One might say that this is a pretty petty thing, and ask how often it happens. One might ask how many murderers are there who have been convicted a second time. I agree there are not too many, but there are enough. So far as I have been able to ascertain there are at least six convicted murderers in Canada now, and there is at least one person charged with an offence who has not come to trial, who have been convicted of murder a second time in the period between 1961 and 1974.

One thing I appeal to members of this House to consider, no matter what their philosophy and belief in respect of capital punishment, is the present law of the jungle that exists in our federal institutions. I merely point out that of the six people who have been convicted of murder a second time four have been convicted of murdering a second time in prison. I suggest to members of the House in general that this is something to think about. Under our present law a person in prison who has had a reduced charge of murder, which under the new classification would be second degree murder, does not have too much to worry about if he murders or attempts to murder a guard in the prison, or even a policeman on duty during an escape attempt.

I suggest to hon. members that my amendment could very well prevent the killing of other prisoners or the killing of a prison guard. It has nothing to do with capital punishment. It has everything to do with the deterrent effect in prison on some of those hard-core prisoners who simply are unrehabilitatable at the present time. I suggest that this is a sensible, fair and equitable amendment. At the present time there simply is no deterrent in the new amendments brought forward by the Solicitor General that would deter anyone from killing a second time. Under this amendment at least there would be a deterrent if the person has previously been convicted of second degree murder, because it means in effect that instead of having a 15-year sentence he will have added to that at least a further 25 year sentence.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have given serious consideration to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). It is my opinion that we should accept the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: After examining it in detail I think the member makes a good point when he says that more properly this is the type of crime which fits in with first degree murder. I must say I have had other representations supporting his amendment. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) and the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) have supported this type of amendment.

I have met with the leaders of the Solicitor General's component of the PSAC, that is, the guards' union, and they feel that the penalty for a second murder should be a tougher penalty. They would have preferred capital punishment, but they would support something that goes in that direction.

So far as I am concerned this is a free vote situation and I am ready to recommend that we support this amendment to make second murders, whether they be first or second degree murders, considered as first degree murders and subject to tougher penalties under these provisions. I urge that we accept this amendment. I do not know whether we can accept it right now or not, but if we can I would be willing to do so.

Mr. Reynolds: On a point of order, I just want to make sure that we are only talking about motion No. 12, not motion No. 13.

Mr. Allmand: I was simply talking about motion No. 12 dealing with second murders. Even though motion No. 12 is joined with motion No. 13, I am not proposing we accept motion No. 13, because it would delete clause 4 altogether. I am prepared to accept the amendment but not the deletion.

Mr. Blais: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) intends to debate motion No. 13, because in effect he would be seeking to defeat the amendment which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) finds acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that motions Nos. 12 and 13 are grouped for debate but will be voted on separately, and everyone is agreed on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, the only thing I was trying to point out is that if motion No. 13 seeks to delete clause 4, by deleting clause 4 in effect we are defeating the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) and thus we are at cross-purposes. We see two members of the same party at cross-purposes.

Mr. Reynolds: This is a free vote in the House, and there are also members on the other side who are at cross-purposes in this debate. The vote on motion No. 12 would come before the vote on motion No. 13. If the Solicitor General wants to approve motion No. 12, that is fine with me, but I would still go ahead with motion No. 13. My point of order was only to ask whether we would dispose of the vote on motion No. 12 right now because we have agreement. If the Solicitor General is willing, we would not put up speakers and we could pass it right now by unanimous consent and proceed to motion No. 13.

Mr. Lawrence: I wonder if I could speak on the same point of order and indicate to the House why I desire a vote to be held in spite of what the Solicitor General says on motion No. 12. We are dealing with a free vote, or what is supposed to be a free vote. I suggest that in any event we have a vote on my motion. Simply because the Solicitor General accepts it does not mean that it would be accepted by all members of the House. We have indicated that the votes would take place at another time and therefore I, and I hope other members, intend to stand when the question is put. May I suggest, Sir, to assist the debate, that you put the question on motion No. 12 now, which would help in cutting down the debating time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the same point of order may I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you put the question now and that you call for the yeas and nays. If there are any nays then a vote would seem to be in order, but if it is unanimous, perhaps the hon. member would not press for an additional vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, June 29, 1976, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You cannot vote against your own amendment.

Mr. O'Sullivan: The Solicitor General cannot speak for the whole party.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can and I will.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, although we were supposed to debate these two motions together, to see the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) agree to the amendment of my colleague, and I suggest that we only asked for a recorded vote because it is a free vote in the House and we want to ensure that every member's name is on the record. As the parliamentary secretary said, it may seem that we are at cross-purposes in debating the deletion of clause 4 at this point, but I do not think we are in fact. My colleague's amendment is somewhat of a victory in that if we had not put up a fight in the House over the bill, this amendment would not have been possible. We would have done what the government wanted from the start. We would have rushed the votes through the House and the bill would have gone through not in its best form.

My reason for putting forward this amendment to delete clause 4 is that I feel the whole clause should be deleted. Although my colleague would vote for his motion at the start, he will vote for mine when it comes up to delete the whole clause because we think it would be better than the first motion to which the Solicitor General agreed.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I might change my mind like you did.

Mr. Reynolds: As a retentionist I do not see how he can do otherwise but support the amendment I am proposing because it deletes clause 4. As it stands, section 214 of the Code reads as follows:

(1) murder is punishable by death or is punishable by imprisonment for life.

(2) murder is punishable by death in respect of any person, where such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of

(a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, goaler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.

(3) All murder other than murder punishable by death is punishable by imprisonment for life.

I suggest to any of the retentionists on the other side that clause 4 in the new bill totally eliminates this protection for police officers or prison guards. Although I stress that I am in favour of retention of capital punishment for all people guilty of first degree murder, I agree with the proposal that people guilty of second murders be considered guilty of first degree murder.

We have to deal with this bill part by part because it is a free vote in the House and each member has to vote according to his conscience. There may be some members of the House who do not want capital punishment for all first degree murders, but I know that there are some abolitionists who are prepared to support this amendment because they agree we should have capital punishment for anybody who kills prison guards or policemen while in the course of their duties. I hope I will receive the support of the abolitionists who do not believe we should have total abolition.

The Solicitor General has had numerous letters and briefs from various groups across the country, from police forces and from penitentiary officials who are concerned that their lives will be in greater danger if this bill is passed. I have had letters from people who ask why we have capital punishment only for murderers of policemen and prison guards. I agree it should be for everybody convicted of first degree murder. This is a law which has not been carried out and, as a result, we have put some policemen and prison guards in great danger.

The government chose to ignore the statistics put out by the Department of the Solicitor General covering the period between 1961 and 1974, which is a period in which we have virtually had abolition, although the government has twice passed bills which called for capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. I think anyone involved in crime knows that this has been an abolitionist country for a long time, and that is one of the reasons we have such a serious crime problem today.

Between 1961 and 1974 the statistics show that there were six convicted murderers charged with murder after their first conviction. All six were initially convicted of non capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. In four of these cases the offenders were charged with a second murder which was committed in prison. That in itself points out one of the problems we will have if we end up with people spending 25 years in jail. Granted, they would have a chance of getting out after 15 years, but many of them will not because of the types of crimes they will have committed.

I cannot see the gentlemen who killed the policemen in Moncton, the two gentlemen who viciously murdered the RCMP officer in Surrey, British Columbia, the man who killed the policeman in Delta in my riding—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): And in St. Boniface.

Mr. Reynolds: —or, as the whip for the Liberal party says, the man in St. Boniface, getting an opportunity of getting out after 15 years. There are many vicious types of murder, and the amendment put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was a good one. I supported it, members of my party and members of the Liberal party supported it. That amendment proposed that after 15 years serious offenders should go before a judge and jury, rather than just the Parole Board, to decide when they can get out. I find it hard to believe that a jury would allow these people out of jail. Juries would make sure that most of these people stay there. That means a real problem for the people who have to work in the penitentiaries because these offenders will have to be controlled.

If hon. members have been to a penitentiary like the B.C. penitentiary and talked to people like Bruce and Lucas, or even watched what they do—I do not think one needs to meet them to know what kind of people they are—they will realize the problem we will have in this country if we abolish capital punishment and do not protect our prison guards especially. I think they should be protected even more than policemen because they are stuck inside institutions with people who will have no other recourse but, if they get a chance to escape, to take it, and when they get outside the institutions, they will take hostages, and we will have situations like the one in Calgary. In that case an escapee took his own life, and I do not feel very sorry about that at all. He had a choice to make. He knew he could either kill some people there and probably still not get away with it because he was surrounded, or he could take his own life. He asked for drugs and took his own life so he would not have to go back to jail. That is the type of situation we will have, but not everyone will have the conscience of the fellow in Calgary who took his own life. Some of them may take a few people with them, and if this clause of the bill were deleted we would be much better off.

I do not like to read things in this debate, but there have been a number of briefs sent to the Solicitor General by various police associations across the country. I think some of them were better prepared than others, but I would like to put on the record the brief sent in by the Calgary Police Association because the Calgary police have had some direct experience with some of these people. This brief is a good cross section of all the briefs which were sent in by other police associations. The Calgary Police Association brief starts by saying:

> We appreciate the complexity of dealing with the problem of increased violent crime, and we sincerely empathize with the government's attempts to come to grips with satisfactory solutions. We would, nevertheless, like to raise several questions with the proposed legislative changes as contained in the bill. Our view of the issue "capital punishment", as we are certain it is of the government spokesmen and people in general, is couched with concern for providing community security, while at the same time, doing so without posing serious or unjust punishment on those who behave criminally irresponsible.

Their next heading is "Is the Death Penalty a Deterrent?" The brief goes on:

> The death penalty, say its opponents, is no deterrent.
> How can this be?
> It is not being used. In Canada, since December 11, 1962, there has been no death sentence carried out, and yet there have been hundreds of innocent lives taken by the hands of violent criminals. Each murder was followed by a fair and open trial and due consideration for the rights of the accused person. If the Salk vaccine were given the same kind of test, there surely would be no cure for the dread scourge of polio today. One thing for certain—the death penalty is a deterrent to the criminal who is executed. He will not murder again and since in excess of 70 percent of serious crimes are committed by repeaters, a second offender may possibly have been deterred.

Then they discuss the public debate on capital punishment as follows:

> Once again the matter of the death penalty is a matter of national concern. There are many different opinions and views being bandied about on this important subject. The question confronting people everywhere is this—Is it ever morally right for the government to take the life of a human being for his flagrant disobedience to the law, ie.—for a crime involving him in a capital offense?
> Let it be said at once that the reason that we have so many varied and diverse opinions, such an endless number of opposing views, so many arguments for and against capital punishment, so many pros and cons of debate—the reason, we say is there is little or no leadership being shown over the past twenty years in the punishment and treatment of the violent criminal.
> In both Canada and the United States there are several forms of perverted thinking. One of these is in regard to sex and another is in regard to the punishment and treatment of criminal offenders. There seems to be a mass mania to be lenient and loose in both these directions. Laws and judges and juries take sides with the criminal and continually disregard the criminal's victim.

In preparing this submission, we came upon the most illuminating paragraph from the American Bar Association, an association of lawyers speaking on behalf of all American judges at a meeting some fifty years ago. Here is that echo from former and better days: "When, for the gratification of their appetites, or the promotion of their interests, lawyers, bankers, politicians, social leaders, both men and women, disobey and scoff at all law, they are siding with the cause of anarchy and promoting mob violence, robbery and murder; they are sowing dragon's teeth; and they need not be surprised when they find no judicial or police authority can save our country or humanity from reaping the harvest."

Contrast this quotation from the American Bar Association with the amazing statements made by the former Attorney General, Ramsey Clark, U.S.A., when appearing before Congress in July, 1968—Mr. Clark urged Congress to repeal the death sentence for federal crimes. Mr. Clark assured Congress that crime would go away or greatly reduce when all men learned to love one another. Mr. Clark mentioned "love" several times during his discourse, but could not predict when this happy state would arrive, however, one step toward hastening it would be to abolish capital punishment he suggested.

But to eliminate capital punishment, strict, just, effective and quick punishment for those humans who show they want no part of love and understanding—is to lay helpless, the meek, the kind, the decent and the law abiding, to the brutal twisted acts of the criminal.

Let us for a moment, travel to the promised land, California, U.S.A., and the eve of the defeat of Governor Edmund "Pat" Brown at the hands of Ronald Reagan, December, 1966. Governor Brown carried out his last major act—he commuted the death sentence of 9 men to "life without parole". Their records would fill these pages.

Later, in the same day, he again changed their new status to "life with possibility of parole".

Should this proposed bill pass and become law, the same thing will happen in Canada in 1976 through virtue of Section 25(1) (2) (3) (4). Page 12 and 13 of Bill C-84.

There are presently a number of people who are awaiting the outcome of this discussion to know what their future holds. They were all tried in an open court with all of their rights protected and have been found guilty of murder punishable by death.

What then is their fate? Will cabinet again flaunt the spirit and intent of a law of Parliament, or will they engineer one large "coup" and make all elected members part of their conspiracy?

The Association then asks, "what kind of homicide should be punishable by death?" and goes on:

What then is the kind of homicide that should be punished by death? Someone has put it this way; murder is the direct result of the unlawful plan leading to the death of another innocent person; or when another person dies as the result of another attempting to fulfill his desires, such as stealing, rape and other sex crimes.

Under the heading "Capital Punishment as a Deterrent" the brief continues:

Let no one confuse or use a pile of unreliable statistics or insufficient figures and factors when attempts are made to prove that the punishment of crime has no deterring effect. Chief Justice Taft, former President of the United States, said:

"I think the abolition of capital punishment is a mistake. It is a deterrent for crimes of bloody violence. I have on hand more testimonials from criminals who said—I would not risk the rope".

The next heading is "How Do we View the Proposed Bill?" and the brief states:

(a) We are opposed to the abolition of capital punishment.

(b) The taking of any innocent life should be punishable by death.

(c) We endorse the description of first or second degree murder as outlined in Section 214(1) (2) (3) (4) (5), Pages 3 and 4 of the proposed bill.

(d) We endorse the intention of improved staff training and increased safeguards for maximum security institutions.

(e) We believe the proposed bill will place prison guards and other prisoners in danger, by allowing the offender to remain alive.

● (1750)

The brief concludes:

In searching for a suitable method of concluding this submission what better authority could be found than the Honourable Ernest C. Manning, former Premier of Alberta and now a member of the Senate:

"In this respect it is evident in society today, a strange and indefensible inconsistency. Many of those who are the most vocal in demanding the abolition of the death penalty because they hold it is morally wrong to put a murderer to death, are frequently the same people who are the champions of abortion on demand. In other words, they argue that it is morally right to destroy the life of an unborn innocent child, but it is morally wrong to exact the death penalty in the case of a murderer who has deliberately taken the life of another human being".

Let's put the blame where it belongs—on the lawbreaker.

Respectfully submitted,
Calgary Police Association

I must still comment about the fact that we did not hear witnesses at committee. This type of brief, which is one of hundreds that members of parliament have received comes from people who should have been before the committee to put their views forward so that the media and the people of the country would be aware of them. Briefs like this never reach the pages of the newspapers to show what the feelings of the people are who are in the front line.

Sometimes I think that the bureaucracy, the people who get involved in making the laws, do not know what is happening in the field. I do not think the Solicitor General has gone out and listened to the people under his control. Certainly the RCMP, people in the penitentiaries, and people in the security field, have a totally opposite view to his on this issue.

I should like to repeat a quotation I used in the debate on second reading. In a book he wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated:

I found it unacceptable that others should claim to know better than I what was good for me.

If he thought that at one time in his life, now that a majority of the country is totally opposed to what he is trying to do, can he expect the country to believe in him? Now he is asking the Canadian people to accept what he thinks is right for the country and I do not think they will.

The tremendous amount of mail which has arrived in the last few days shows that people are disgusted that parliament would pass a bill to which the majority of Canadians are totally opposed. The government can take a stand on an issue where the country is split down the middle, but in a situation like this the government is opposing the views of the majority who want some form of capital punishment.

I am prepared to compromise, Mr. Speaker. In the last two or three votes taken in this House on this issue we brought in compromise law. People knew there was no way an abolition bill would pass the House so they compromised. I wonder why, when there is close to two years left in the life of the present law, the government saw fit to bring in this bill. Why did it not carry out the law it voted for which ensured the protection of prison guards and policemen? That law has been in effect ever since the Prime Minister has been leader of this country and certainly since the Solicitor General has held that post, yet they have not upheld the law. A number of executions have been stayed for a long time. Instead of trying to rush this bill through the House now why not delay third reading of the bill until the fall and stay those executions to the end of the year? It bothers me that the government wants to rush this through. The fact that it accepted the amendment of my colleague today is an indication that it should not be rushed through the House.

Those of us who decided we would stay here and fight some of the clauses of this bill to try to bring members of the House closer to the ideas and feelings of the people of this nation, were right. The people of Canada are going to remember, even if we should lose, that some changes have been made to improve the bill a little bit. Perhaps we are optimistic in thinking we might get some other clauses of the bill changed and that there would be some form of capital punishment for crimes committed in this country.

The Solicitor General circulated a letter from the family of a policeman who had been killed which said that they did not believe in capital punishment. Some of the letters of this type that we received are pretty strongly worded. I have a letter here from a Barbara Irwin whose husband was murdered in 1972 in metropolitan Toronto. It is worth putting this letter on the record so that people who read Hansard will see it. Not too many people have an opportunity of seeing what the wives and families of policemen who were killed have to say about the situation. The letter, addressed to the Solicitor General of Canada, reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Allmand:

I would like to voice my opinion on capital punishment, being the widow of the late Detective Michael Irwin who was with Metro Toronto police department. My husband was slain in the line of duty with Detective Doug Sinclair on February 27, 1972.

I have discussed this subject with my family and can speak on behalf of myself and my family. We all feel capital punishment should be brought back—not only for policemen.

I would like to refresh people's memories on our traumatic experience. When my husband was slain, the man who took his life was also slain, so I feel our opinion as a family is not revengeful.

My late husband and myself raised our children to respect humanity and what belongs to them. If they do harm to someone or something then they should expect to be harmed in the same way.

I am sure if your wife or children were raped or murdered you would not question bringing back capital punishment.

The cost to the taxpayer to keep this man in jail is far more than they pay the murdered victim's family.

We have one of the finest police forces, but I feel we won't have this reputation if capital punishment is abolished.

Why should these men put their lives on the line, to have their family's taxes keep the murderers in jail for 15 or 25 years?

I do not understand how parliament can say it is not a deterrent.

I have raised my children to be good citizens and respect the law by setting a good example.

The government should set a good example by showing they have some gumption, by making the murderers pay the price with their lives. One rotten apple is destroyed before it destroys the whole bushel. It should be the same in society.

I trust my opinion will be as valued as Pauline Maitland's. I am also a widow of a slain policeman and my family and I reside in Canada.

Sincerely,
Barbara Irwin

It is signed also by three of her children.

Mr. Speaker, I am not quite finished so may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I had used most of my allotted time before the supper break. I wish to say one or two more things in support of my reasons for wanting to delete clause 4 of the bill. Before supper I quoted a letter written by Mrs. Barbara Irwin whose husband was killed in Toronto in 1972. May I at this time put on record a letter which Kathy Flannery, daughter of the late detective Michael Irwin, sent to Syd Brown, president of the Metro Police Association. She said:

Dear Mr. Brown:

I for one am very much in favour of capital punishment. Being the mother of a new baby, I feel I have more worries now than ever. I would like a little reassurance that when my child grows up, she will not have to put up with such a permissive society.

My daughter will be raised to the best of my ability to honour and respect the law and if she should do anything to break the law, she will have to pay severely for it.

I would not like to think that by the time my child is old enough to go out alone, that people such as Kevin Willden are back on the streets.

Perhaps if Mr. Warren Allmand or Mr. Pierre Trudeau saw the decomposed body of little Lisa Kowalski and put themselves in the shoes of her family, they would change their minds. Why take the risk that this could happen again?

I think that letter reflects the feelings of many in Canada. The feelings of such letter writers, of people whose relatives or friends are actively involved in the police force or work as prison guards, might be somewhat stronger than those of average Canadians, although I doubt it. Judging from the mail which members of parliament get, and the result of the Gallup poll—a poll which some people like to ignore in election times but which always comes within a few percentage points of showing the actual feelings of Canadians—the majority of Canadians want some form of capital punishment retained in this country. I think the majority feel that prison guards especially, and policemen, deserve special treatment.

Surveys I have conducted in my riding show that most people are in favour of capital punishment. The great preponderance of people want capital punishment retained at least for the offence known in this bill as first degree murder. I hope some abolitionists in this House will agree with us, show their support by the way they vote on this motion and thereby retain capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. I should like to see the penalty retained for all who commit first degree murder but am prepared to accept a compromise if the majority of the members of this House feel it is necessary.

I shall close by quoting what a United States judge said some years ago about deterrence:

The death penalty is a warning, just like a lighthouse throwing its beams out to sea. We hear about shipwrecks, but we do not hear about the ships that the lighthouse guides safely on their way. We do not have proof of the number of ships it saves, but we do not tear the lighthouse down.

Those words are appropriate to this bill. I hope we shall not tear our system down by abolishing capital punishment for the offences mentioned.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of amendment No. 13 to Bill C-84. This amendment modifies Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code, by eliminating clause 4, and I believe it is one of the most important amendments to be discussed today. Four amendments have already been passed by the House. We are now discussing the fifth of 29. This is encouraging, and in my opinion the House will be able to adjourn in a month.

I believe that motion No. 13 is the most important of the amendments since it concerns the safety of policemen and prison guards. I have already talked about this during the other debates that we have had on capital punishment, but today I have realized, Mr. Speaker, that there is a considerable difference between section 4 in its present form and what the minister wants us to adopt.

The amendment reads as follows:

214. (1) Murder is punishable by death or is punishable by imprisonment for life.

(2) Murder is punishable by death, in respect of any person, where such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of

(a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.

(3) All murder other than murder punishable by death is punishable by imprisonment for life.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendment which had been suggested during the last discussion had been accepted by the then minister who was the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I wonder why, since Parliament had agreed to this amendment, today, without consulting anyone, since the government has refused completely to have witnesses appear before the standing committee of the House, we are presented with a new bill that I consider completely ridiculous.

● (2010)

First, they start by categorizing murders. So we would now have first and second degree murders, probably ending up with third, fourth and fifth degree murders. So murders are going to be classified.

I now read the proposal before us:

214. (1) Murder is first degree murder or second degree murder.

(2) Murder is first degree murder when it is planned and deliberate.

(3) Without limiting the generality of subsection (2), murder is planned and deliberate when it is committed pursuant to an arrangement under which money or anything of value passes or is intended to pass from one person to another, or is promised by one person to another, as consideration for that other's causing or assisting in causing the death of anyone or counselling or procuring another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing that death.

And further down, under subclause 4, the existing statute is somewhat altered as follows:

(4) Irrespective of whether a murder is planned and deliberate on the part of any person, murder is first degree murder when the victim is

(a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties;

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or a permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties; or

(c) a person working in a prison with the permission of the prison authorities and acting in the course of his work therein.

And finally, in subclause 5, the minister deals with the matter of aircraft hijacking that should have been included of course in the first amendments to the statute, that is amendments introduced this afternoon concerning piracy. However, this subclause deals with hijacking, kidnapping and sexual offences. Mr. Speaker, I would like to limit myself this evening to the matter of subclause 4 dealing with the murder of peace officers, sheriffs and prison guards.

As always the minister was very careful to put aside any conclusion contained in the previous act, that is to say that he ends up with life imprisonment as punishment.

This afternoon, while we were discussing motion No. 12, we heard a speaker introduce the motion, which would add a clause saying that if a prisoner who committed murder escapes or commits another murder, he can be given more severe punishment. The Solicitor General jumped to his feet, of course, to support that proposal. I wonder what more severe punishment he has in mind, when he says in his bill that first degree murderers will be sentenced to life imprisonment. It seems to me that the punishment that is more severe than life imprisonment is the death penalty. But he does not go beyond that. Yet, this afternoon, he said to us: we will give him a more severe sentence; but what punishment is that? What does he mean by more severe? Now, the amendment is ridiculous, stark ridiculous! When someone has really been condemned, I take the words to the letter, when they say after all that the maximum penalty will be life imprisonment and he tries to have us believe that there will be a penalty more severe than that, but what kind of a penalty is it? Another life imprisonment? And if the criminal commits a third murder, it will probably be a third life imprisonment? It gets so funny Mr. Speaker, that it is ridiculous.

I simply declare that the whole population cannot admit such a bill in the present circumstances. I think the minister, as all the others, has certainly received reports from police officers and prison guards. He received letters of opposition as we have received reports in which we are given the same percentage of the number of police officers who are opposed to Bill C-84.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand at all how the minister can interpret his bill. He declares he is here to adopt laws which will protect the public and he is going to let the murderers absolutely free after a few years, and as I said this morning, I do not believe in these 25-year and 10-year sentences, as I did not believe him when he assured the House, during the last few years, that he was going to execute those who would kill police officers or prison guards. Dozens of police officers or prison guards have been killed, but what about the executions? How many executions during the last 10 years? Is this minister sincere? And we do keep this minister. He promised that he would submit his resignation if the bill was defeated and I heartily hope that the bill will be defeated so that he can disappear forever.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Solicitor General is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Allmand: I do not want to intervene prematurely but I should like to ask Your Honour to enforce the rule of relevancy. We are now discussing motion No. 13, which is a motion to strike clause 4. Clause 4 deals merely with the classification of murder. This afternoon we disposed of motion No. 12, the amendment respecting first and second degree murder.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to differ with the opinion of the Solicitor General but he has just come into the House. I have been listening to the hon. member's contribution, and 99 per cent of his remarks up until now have been directly related to the clause the motion seeks to delete. Perhaps he did go off the subject for a second or two, but he should be given enough time to return to the subject matter of the bill which he has treated so well up until now.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, I always thought that you had a sense of justice and I am satisfied that you realized, as we did, that the minister does not know much about order, he brings disorder, how can he know whether he is consistent with the Standing Orders or if another member acts similarly?

Now, I come back to my subject. I was earlier speaking about clause 4, which deals with police officers and prison guards. If he has not read all the reports, I am going to read to him a few paragraphs of the report of the Police Chiefs Association of Canada. This will probably refresh his memory or he might learn something if he has not read this report.

I have the feeling he does not read any of those. He is one-track minded and goes straight in the direction in which he looks and I even wonder if he looks where he goes. So I quote:

The Police Chiefs Association of Canada studies with great interest the debate concerning capital punishment and we want to assure everyone that we have the same respect for the views of both abolitionists and retentionists . . .

Do you realize their impartiality? There is no racism in all this.

In the briefs we already presented on that subject, we have clearly stated our position in favour of capital punishment . . .

Hear, hear!

. . . and at this time a discussion of the pros and cons would only bore you.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

However, we wish to mention that so far one speech mentions our recommendation to create a committee of people representing the executive, the legislative and the judiciary to study in depth the permanent banishing of an offender and some alternatives.

Mr. Speaker, when we refer to permanent banishment, I am not sure if the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) knows that it means. Permanent banishment means capital punishment, to use the right words.

The current alternative advocated in Bill C-84 is not the result of considerable thought and is nothing but a deceptive palliative aimed at making us accept the abolition of capital punishment. This statement is mostly based on the comments made by the hon. Warrent Allmand . . .

—this has to be the Solicitor General—

. . . in an April 8 address before the John Howard Society when that question was put to him. He said that a 25-year imprisonment sentence was too harsh but that we should first eliminate capital punishment and then direct our efforts toward reducing that imprisonment term.

It has been his idea, his obsession for ten years. It is not something new, this has been his target for ten years ever since I have known him in the House.

Such a philosophy greatly worries us because even if the full period of imprisonment in Bill C-84 did apply, it implies a much more serious threat for our society and particularly for the guards of our institutions. In view of this philosophy . . .

Some people call this a "whim".

. . . we submit that the minimum sentence of 25 years as proposed in Bill C-84 is a blatant misrepresentation, considering that for all practical purposes an individual would have the right to make an application for a reduction once he has served the first 15 years.

An hon. Member: Fifteen years should be enough.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Yes, it should be enough. He is going to serve only five years and sometimes only three.

We also think that a minimum sentence of 10 years in some cases where life is taken is much too severe comparatively to the odious individual who only thinks of killing for money.

This is what we call hired assassins. It is for them and not for those who kill by accident that the law applies, of course. I wonder whether the minister is not now protecting these hired assassins.

Even if we retain capital punishment, the traditional commutation would have the same effect.

Considering that as spokesmen for the police forces in Canada, we have a knowledge of criminals which is available to very few people outside our profession, we regard it as our duty to express our deepest concern to you, our M.P.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to interrupt me. I believe my 20 minutes have come to an end but all the same I shall finish reading my letter another time. I shall have other opportunities to talk about those problems, for I have indeed five or six major issues to put forward to the House. During the forthcoming days which will be very enlightening for the people, I want the public to know what is going on, what the Solicitor General thinks of capital punishment and what he is trying to force down on them.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly in this debate on behalf of policemen and prison guards in the context of this bill. I believe they deserve special consideration because of the special kind of work that they perform.

• (2030)

If capital punishment does not exist for the killing of a policeman or prison guard, the prisoner serving a life sentence who attempts to escape has no deterrent to restrain him from killing a policeman or a guard in the course of that escape. He knows the only penalty he will receive is a continuation of that life sentence. This is obviously no penalty at all. I believe the penalty for killing a policeman or a prison guard should be capital punishment because that is the only deterrent to committing murder during an attempted escape from prison. Therefore I intend to support this amendment.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I spoke on previous amendments, once yesterday and once today, and I make no secret of the fact that I am really not prepared to speak on this amendment in the way I would like, though I must take issue with the government's position in this bill as it affects the security of police officers, prison guards, and people who are in danger of falling victim to contract killing.

Just over a year ago, 13 months, there were 15 people held hostage in the penitentiary at New Westminster. I know that at least one of those hostages was a constituent of mine. He was held as a hostage, together with others, for several days by men who have no convictions and no compunction in respect of human life. Last February there was another hostage taken at this same penitentiary by two of the same prisoners. Another constituent of mine was held at knife point by the same people. I met that constituent just a few weeks ago and found he was still not working after having been released on sick leave since February.

It seems to me we owe something to the men and women across Canada who are willing to place their lives in jeopardy for the security of others. We owe them at least protection from those who have no sense of value for human life.

Not too far from where I live there was a contract killing a few years ago. The price of that contract was $200. That is the price some of these people place on human life. If that is the kind of society we are willing to protect through this legislation, we have become bankrupt. We must re-evaluate our position on this matter.

The people in this House who are protecting those who have absolutely no sense of value for human life will be guilty when prison guards and police officers become the victims of future murderers. I am in complete agreement with those officers who are sending letters to those who voted for the abolition of the death penalty. I am in complete agreement with their position, that those people who voted for the abolition of the death penalty for the killing of police officers and prison guards should be held responsible for the deaths of future policemen and prison guards who are murdered.

An hon. Member: You tell them, Benno.

Mr. Friesen: I am, if you will only listen. If you will not listen to me, please listen to your constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Some 80 per cent of the people in Canada agree with what I am saying today.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Friesen: That hon. member will hide behind the cloak of self-righteousness and say he is voting on the basis of his conscience. I would ask that hon. member whether the 80 per cent of the voters in his constituency do not have consciences. He chooses to ignore that 80 per cent. I suggest it is nothing short of a dictatorship when a minority rules the majority. That hon. member will have to account to his constituents the next time they get a chance to make a decision in respect of their representation in this House.

An hon. Member: That's a joke.

Mr. Friesen: That is no joke, and anybody who can be flippant on this subject deserves to be re-examined by his constituents. We need some sober second thought about this clause. I intend to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), and I would hope that other members, as we just heard from the previous speaker, will also re-evaluate their positions and realize what they are doing to the peace officers of this country. I hope they will vote in support of this amendment in order to protect those police officers and prison guards who are working to protect us.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on the amendment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). Let me bring to the attention of the government some of the problems it will have to face if this amendment is not accepted.

Prison guards and policemen in this country are very disappointed over what parliament did a few days ago. They are now reviewing their positions in terms of the kind of work they are doing. Contrary to the Anti-Inflation Board policies, there will be only one way in which these people will remain in their jobs, and that is if the government is to come up with enough money to keep them. Certainly money is not everything, but some of these people may remain at their jobs if they are sufficiently well paid. Perhaps even then some police departments across the country will be able to recruit new staff. If I were a young man graduating from school at this time in 1976 the last job I would want to look at, no matter what it paid, would be the job of a policeman or prison guard.

The law as it existed before the vote did in fact provide a deterrent. Notwithstanding that the government did not live up to its own law, many of those who might have committed murder thought they might be hanged. They thought "the government did not hang the last fellow but they might hang me."

If I were convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to prison for 25 years with little hope of parole, and if I happened to be somewhere around 20 years of age that would mean I would be 45 or 50 when I got out, the uppermost thing in my mind would be how to get away for six or seven days of freedom. Circumstances might arise during my incarceration in which I would only have to deal viciously with one or two prison guards. Perhaps I could overcome them and obtain seven or eight days' freedom before I was caught again and returned to prison to continue serving the 25 years, or another 25 years for having committed another murder. That would only worsen the situation, because the minute I went back to that prison I would start thinking again of how to get out for another eight or ten days.

Let me say in all seriousness that I think it is terrible and disgraceful that the minister, who is so adamant and so vehement in his position that hanging must be abolished for all kinds of crime in this country, is not in this House to listen to some of the speakers on this side who have very serious and legitimate concerns. If we are really responsible parliamentarians I think it is our job to do all we can to ensure that the government at least sees a little sense in what it is doing.

We have the question, with regard to law in Canada, of whether or not we should be going as far as we are. Should we be as lenient as we are in terms of what is happening all around the world? I remember the day when the use of the lash was abolished. What is wrong with the lash in the view of any citizen who lives in accordance with the law? All I am saying is that we should use it for sexual offenders, for people who continually commit crimes against society. It is a deterrent as much as hanging is a deterrent in respect of the commission of a crime against a policeman or prison guard. I say in all seriousness the government once again should take a look at this before this matter comes to a vote.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, throughout the debate on capital punishment I have felt constrained to make a contribution on each motion, not for the sake of getting my name in Hansard—any member can do that at any time—but with a very deep seated concern over the direction of this country and the direction or the path our government is taking in the face of overwhelming public opinion. My concerns are no less, indeed perhaps no greater, for the safety of police, prison guards, and all those associated with that particular group that helps maintain law and order in our society. I have no wish to give them a special category, but the criminal element has elected to give the police and prison guards a special category.

I recall recently after the result of the vote on second reading the response of two murderers in Oakalla prison in New Westminster who said, "Great stuff, a guard a day". That, Sir, is the attitude of the hardened criminal. That is the attitude of those individuals who have no hope for redemption, absolutely none; who have absolutely no concern for law and order and who place no value on human life except their own.

We had the example some 18 months ago on the lower mainland of those two murderers who said that their kick that night, their pleasure, distorted as it may be, was to go out and get a cop. Mr. Speaker, let it be on the record, for the continuing respect of the RCMP and the control they demonstrated at the time of the capture of these two murderers within a matter of an hour or two, that they did not shoot them on the spot having witnessed the murder of a brother officer. What fear have these men; what fear do these murderers have? Are they concerned about a sentence of 25 years in prison? Many of them have spent almost that much time in prison on a variety of other charges involving crimes against society.

The public cries out in frustration over the attitude of the government on the subject of abolition. I can readily accept the concerns of those who voted for abolition and the manner in which they have had to agonize over this issue, as well as the pressures to which they have been subjected by their constituents. I recognize and respect these concerns, but I cannot respect anyone in this House who would vote for abolition for the sake of appeasing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I shall not point the finger, but if there be a member in this House—

An hon. Member: Who told you that?

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, the honourable noise from the opposite side will have his opportunity to contribute to the debate when he has something sensible to say. Let me continue.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, would you like to interject and quieten down the rabble on the government side of the House so that I can continue to contribute something sensible to this debate? I wish it clearly understood that I am not about to point the finger at any one member. I say hopefully that over there sitting in this House tonight there is not a member who, because he had his eye on the post of a parliamentary secretary or a cabinet ministership, changed his vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I know of the agonies that have existed in the minds of the abolitionists who have made a substantial contribution in this House in so many other ways and yet whose constituents feel they have been let down. I believe that is unfortunate. I can think at the moment of one of my goods friends, a member of this House of many years standing. I must say with respect that I have forgotten the name of the member's riding. It is a Halifax riding. This member has contributed for more than a decade to the decision-making process in Parliament. I believe it is decidely unfair that a member such as this should be vilified by his constituents, be they one, a dozen or 100. Nevertheless I would hope that members of this particular persuasion would consider the impact of this particular amendment, and of one or two other amendments that have been presented in respect of Bill C-84 concerning capital punishment. I hope they will consider the impact this will have on the Canadian community. They should at least realize, or a least give credence to the fact that when we declare open season on the police and prison guards it is a sad day for Canada.

● (2050)

Let the Canadian people know, let my constituents know from the record that I heartily support the proposed amendment that clause 4 be withdrawn and that capital punishment apply to those who have set out to murder the very men who protect our lives in this House and on the streets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on these amendments—

An hon. Member: Then don't, sit down.

Mr. MacFarlane: —the main reason being that I had done the anguishing that the hon. member mentioned at the time of voting on the bill in principle and I did not think that any amendments would do anything else but cause me the same anguish and cause me to come up with the same conclusion. Now on this particular amendment I find it necessary to say something because of my personal experiences and also because of the references of at least six members of the opposition concerning the situation.

I thought I had indicated in my earlier speeches my absolute respect for people holding the retentionist view and my honest presumption that they hold the retentionist view because they think it would improve the situation. I hold the abolitionist view for the same reason, and I would normally expect the same kind of respect. I will not indulge in any remarks that I feel offended sometimes—and this is only a human foible—when innuendoes are made, but I will get down to the point and let those hon. members who wish make the innuendoes do so. Let me get down to the point at hand.

Since this was part of the previous law, I had to deal with the fact that unexpectedly I would have to take a plane to Moncton and attend the funeral of the two policemen whom I knew so well. The two gentlemen had worked so hard with youth and were so well known in minor football circles that the police force itself each year purchased for them a ticket to the $100 a plate dinner where all the funds were raised for amateur sports in that area. I happened to have been the guest speaker at each one of those dinners and so was vitally involved in this work in the city of Moncton. I stood in the cathedral and heard the archbishop say to us "God help us not to do what it would be normal for us to want to do, but help us to do what you would have us do, and so save our souls". It was not easy when you knew the young boy who had been kidnapped. It was not easy when you knew his father, his mother, and the children of the policemen. It was not unusual for someone to send you the photograph of the little boy crying over the coffin and accuse you of not caring.

So this was a calculated decision. At the risk of not ever holding another seat in this House in my life I decided that those whom I consider my brothers—and being a Presbyterian I think I might see them again—would understand me. This is my reason for voting in this fashion.

It may be old fashioned to be religious, but being a bachelor who does not have the comforts that some of you have in your homes—

Some hon. Members: What comforts?

Mr. MacFarlane: I still pray to my mother and father who are dead and are in heaven. Believe it or not, but you might as well hear the truth now. There are others who have other reasons, and I respect them. There are others with great legal minds who can make decisions that I could not attempt to make. There are others who know the law backward and forward and can argue it. I am just a simple soul who comes from an ordinary world who says: I must stand now and be counted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: When I received a letter from a constituent who was particularly peturbed by the murder of those two policemen—and at that time we had not seen the bill on abolition—I replied to him in all honesty in writing that indeed if these two are convicted and if the law at that time is that they should be put to death, I will support that law.

Mr. Woolliams: Why did you not do it then?

Mr. MacFarlane: Because it did not occur in that order. I then had the opportunity to think on it, just as many juries do. Do not think for a second that a person like myself who has administered corporal punishment in the schools when it was considered important did not do it with a will, but sometimes when you reflect and think back, you discover that in the first year of your teaching when you used the strap in school 42 times when it was encouraged, and discovered what a poor teacher and disciplinarian you were, you never used it again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: You discovered that respect came from the students not because you were good at anything in particular but because you respected them as individuals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: When I came to parliament, I did not think I would be in this situation. I am not ashamed to say that there was a moment when I saw those policemen when I wondered whether capital punishment should be invoked. That is not an embarrassment, that is the truth. If I saw a child being molested, do you not think I would kill the other person on the spot? Do you not think I would feel that way? But six months later, sitting in a court room and thinking carefully about whether the taking of another life would serve any useful purpose, I had to think differently. That is what I am doing here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: By the same token, it is not fair to make the division between the abolitionists, the retentionists, the parties or anything else. In one situation when a reporter telephoned me and discussed this, he made a very good story out of it which was attractive enough because six other members mentioned it. The man who wrote the story, and who thought up the tremendous idea that there might be a contradiction, was an abolitionist. First of all he was a press man, the story was important. Imagine if by any chance I was really waffling and moving back in the other direction, he would really have a great story. We do face that. Some people make as much as they can out of a situation in their own interest rather than recognizing that we are making a value decision here in parliament just like a jury.

Beyond reasonable doubt you must vote in the way you believe would be the best for all concerned, and it is not necessarily a conscience vote. My vote is the best for all concerned, not just for my conscience. I really believe I vote for my constituency. I feel that if this is successful and abolition is indeed accepted, I will be able to attack more strongly any of the weaknesses which I see exist in the law which might make it more dangerous or less safe for my constituents, for the people on the streets. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is well aware of the fact there is no one side in the government on that because I will be at him like thunder that I want that kind of protection, just like thunder, and no kidding about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: That is the reason I felt I should put myself on record on this matter.

I have not gone into other member's constituencies, as some people have, in order to badger them.

● (2100)

I have not gone on open lines and used their names at any time, although they have used mine. In my speech I did not refer to them or to one article or editorial I have read about them, as they have done about me—and I do not condemn them for that; they can do anything they want—but remember that I and many of my colleagues, who are retentionists or abolitionists, are here at this moment not just supporting the government but in a free vote saying, "This we believe we must do, and now."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to follow the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), but I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) for moving the hon. member to speak.

It has been obvious that hon. members on the government side have not been very interested in this particular stage in the legislative process.

An hon. Member: Where is Joe?

Mr. Sharp: Where are all your members?

An hon. Member: Where is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)?

An hon. Member: Joe who?

Mr. Schumacher: I think the record will show that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is the first member on the other side of the House to participate at this stage of the bill. I understand that one hon. member from the New Democratic Party was more or less goaded into participating yesterday.

Mr. Gilbert: Persuaded.

Mr. Schumacher: Or persuaded. I know there are some retentionists on the Liberal side, and they are to be congratulated for their political fortitude because I sincerely believe they have been under a great deal of pressure. I think it is a commentary on this so-called free vote, which I think is a snare and a delusion, that there has been so little participation by Liberal members at the report stage.

This amendment brings the bill into focus with the existing law because capital punishment for the murder of police officers and prison guards is the only form of capital punishment we have at the moment. This amendment deals with that matter.

I think it is worth while to remind hon. members at this stage that the study in committee of this legislation was really not very worth while or illuminating to hon. members who participated in that committee. I spent some time one evening in that committee, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said that he really did not know what would happen in our penal institutions if Bill C-84 passed. There was some talk of building new and special facilities to deal with criminals of the incorrigible type who are dangerous, but he could not satisfy the committee or hon. members of this House that the approach of the government is the right one.

The minister just said we would have to wait and see. Of course he believes that his approach is the right one, but this is too serious a matter to be running a laboratory type of experiment, and it distresses me greatly that the government, which less than three years ago said that it wanted another five year period of experimentation with a limited type of capital punishment, now feels that it is very important that all stages of this major piece of legislation must be dealt with before we adjourn for the summer. In my view that in itself is an interference with the free deliberation and conclusion to be arrived at by this Chamber on this legislation.

There happens to be a penal institution in my constituency at Drumheller which has been referred to on many occasions as Eldon's house, but it has also been referred to as the crown jewel of the penitentiary system of this country. I think the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) should be congratulated for forcing the government to build that institution against all the expert advice the government was receiving as to why it would not work. With this piece of legislation the government is acting on the same type of expert advice, and we will rue the day we listened to those elitists who think they know better than the majority of Canadians.

I have heard hon. members questioning the hon. member for Kootenay West about whether 80 per cent of Canadians want the retention of capital punishment. I suppose there is no absolute way of determining the matter, but several of us have conducted surveys over the last number of years, and the figures vary from in excess of 70 per cent to in excess of 80 per cent. I believe the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion has shown that the figure is well in excess of 70 per cent. But I do not think anyone can seriously argue that the overwhelming view of Canadians is that there should be some type of capital punishment.

We hear the Burke philosophy expressed, and abolitionists can agonize all they want and bleed all over the Chamber because they are using their judgment rather than that of their constituents. I do not accept that particular philosophy of Edmund Burke. I am sympathetic to a great deal of his thinking, but that sympathy applies to other areas. I think the people who send us here to do several things on their behalf, and when we are discussing matters such as freight rates, banking legislation or economic questions, things ordinary citizens do not have the chance to become acquainted with, they will look to us for leadership and for our judgment. After all, members of parliament have more resources at their command to help them to come to the right conclusion. However, the question of capital punishment is in no way similar to those types of questions.

When I made my speech at second reading I said that surely this is the type of question which is most suitable for a referendum. The government says there will not be a referendum because it knows its view would be rejected by Canadians at large. That is the only reason the government will not hold a referendum. It knows it would not have its way, but it is so elitist in its approach and so convinced that it knows best that it will use all the tricks at its command to make sure its will prevails in this matter.

Mr. Sharp: We have the support of your leader.

Mr. Schumacher: That doesn't make it right at all.

Mr. Sharp: Does it make him wrong?

• (2110)

Mr. Schumacher: It certainly does not make him wrong. That does not mean that the people of Canada are wrong, just because the leaders of all the parties except the Social Credit party, happen to be in cahoots in this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schumacher: Look what happens on the procedural questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that the hon. member get back to the subject of the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He was only answering the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane).

Mr. Schumacher: No, I was answering the hon. House leader who dragged in that red herring. That is another little trick he is using. He is just full of tricks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is Joe Clark a red herring?

Mr. Schumacher: The only thing red about Joe Clark is his hair.

Mr. Gilbert: Joe is a red Tory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: And you have a red face.

Mr. Schumacher: I would not know about that. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), sitting where he does, may have a better perspective of where people fit into the political spectrum than I do. I guess we could not be much more apart, and he has a better view.

Mr. Gilbert: But we are still friends.

Mr. Schumacher: Certainly. As I was saying the Drumheller institution is in my constituency. It has operated very well in its ten year history, but the staff of the institution is very upset. The Solicitor General has not reassured them about what the situation will be in those institutions when this bill is passed.

On the subject of policemen, Mr. Speaker, I would just repeat what I said on second reading—we should be careful that we do not find ourselves in a situation in this country where the police feel compelled to shoot first and ask questions later. That is the road I am afraid we are heading if we go along with Bill C-84. That is why I support the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) in his amendments, so that those in whom we place the most confidence to protect us and our families and all those dependent upon us in society, may feel safe. I would ask hon. members to give their support and ensure that this amendment passes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) designed to delete clause 4 of Bill C-84 is, in my opinion, extremely important.

Section 214 of the Criminal Code which was in effect in Canada since the last review of the Criminal Code provided for different kinds of murders, and at the time the House of Commons abolished the death penalty for the murder of any citizen but clearly retained it for the murder of prison guards, policemen, sheriffs or sheriff's officers.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, Parliament then suggested it was essential to support the police forces in Canada at the legal and governmental levels through a legislation stipulating that the murder of a prison guard or a policeman would be punishable by death. That is from section 214(1), (2) and (3) of the Criminal Code went.

The Solicitor General now proposes to abolish capital punishment altogether and just sets two categories of murders: premeditated murder and unpremeditated murder. In any case, the penalty remains the same—life imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in favour of a police society. I do not believe either in a society where some kind of parallel power is given either to the armed forces or the police or the military. I believe in democratic power but I dream of a society where the rights of everyone will be respected and everyone will recognize his obligations. We know as professors, family heads, mayors or members of a provincial or a federal legislature that we can pass all the statutes we want but there will always be people who either will not know them or not understand them or who will voluntarily defy them. That is why any organized society sets for itself means, limits, structures within which it must develop. That is how a system was invented for street and road traffic—traffic lights. You stop on red, you go on green, you use caution and stop on yellow. That is an essential law. It is stupid in itself but essential to the security of the public driving down the many roads of Canada and across the world. Laws of this kind for an organized society are found everywhere. As I said, Mr. Speaker, we had Criminal Code provisions calling for the death penalty for the murder of people paid with our taxes to enforce those laws whose only purpose is the protection of society. Under the old Criminal Code which imposed the death penalty to those convicted of the murder of a policeman or a prison guard, 11 persons were convicted pursuant to section 214 of the Criminal Code, and therefore, liable to the death penalty, because they deliberately attacked and killed police officers or policemen or prison guards.

These people thus deliberately broke the law, and I am not the one to say so, but the courts, the judiciary which says that they broke a law passed by Parliament. We all know that these 11 persons were shown mercy by the federal cabinet under the influence, I suppose, of the Solicitor General, this man who is so soft with criminals. And that is how, Mr. Speaker, these 11 persons are now sent to prison for life, but with the possibility of parole. I would like to say outright that what colours this debate on capital punishment is the existence of the Parole Board.

We pass a law, then the court states that a convicted person will serve for a given time, but inevitably the National Parole Board intervenes in favour of the criminal concerned and releases him, and thus the law of Parliament is twisted and so is the will of the court.

Mr. Speaker, during the second reading debate, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) argued about clause 4 of the bill. In turn I would like to do just that. He said that those who will vote for retention of capital punishment should think twice since they would have on their conscience the death of eleven people. I cannot do that. This is not a literal quotation but roughly the portent of what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Béchard: You should quote literally.

Mr. Fortin: If the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) is so well informed, he should have the courage to speak like a man, to stand up, rather than remain seated; otherwise, he should be so kind as to listen to me.

Mr. Béchard: When one refers to someone, the reference should be made properly.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said then that those who would vote for the retention of capital punishment would have the death of these 11 criminals on their conscience.

Mr. Béchard: He did not say that. Quote him properly.

An hon. Member: But this is what he meant.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like very much the Prime Minister to tell me who has the death of at least 11 victims, the victims of these criminals, on his conscience.

Mr. Béchard: Those who killed.

Mr. Fortin: It is funny, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about criminals here but we forget the innocents who are the victims of these criminals. Who is going to compensate these families? Who is going to protect these families, Mr. Speaker? It is not important. They do not talk about it but say that the lives of criminals must be protected, and the Prime Minister said: "I wash my hands of it, I cannot do this action, I cannot act as a hangman, let those who want to act as hangmen do this."

Mr. Speaker, since when can a government pass the buck to Parliament, when a legislation providing for the application of capital punishment for the murder of policemen, prison guards or law enforcement officers had been passed with a majority of votes? Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious situation. We pay for the maintenance of police forces with our tax money at the municipal, provincial and federal levels.

Let us suppose that tomorrow morning somebody commits armed robbery in some shop and that the police are called. Their first duty, that for which they are paid, is to go to the scene of the crime as rapidly as possible, armed, because our money is used to provide weapons for policemen to protect either the lives or the public and private property of individuals. That is the reason for the existence of police forces. It is so true that the federal government is now investing over $100 million in the Olympic Games to ensure security in case of danger or threats. On the one hand, enormous amounts of money are spent, the army is called, all the sophisticated techniques available are used, and on the other hand, when the supposed criminals are caught, they are simply released or told: You are liable to life imprisonment, which means a 25-year imprisonment with possibility of parole after 15 years.

Mr. Speaker, why would a policemen, if we adopt clause 4 as proposed by the minister, why would he go out and risk his own life to defend property which is not his own, a life that is not his and buildings which do not belong to him? Why should the law enforcement agencies intervene in a violent demonstration when the statutes of our country do not defend or support police action in Canada? Why should we, as Canadians, finance municipal, provincial or federal law enforcement agencies to protect our lives and our property if our own laws do not support them? This is why I say that the motion of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) is valuable in the sense that it aims at ensuring that the most important democratic institution of our country, Parliament, which is supposed to reflect Canadian opinion, can protect the police.

We do not want a police society, we do not want a violent society, we do not want a society where people take an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. We want a society where the rules of the game are known, a society where we try to educate people as much as possible about their rights and their duties, but where we respect the laws that we pass. We have come to a point in our country where the legislation of the labour world is defied, where injunctions are defied, where the police forces are defied; we are facing a situation of virtual anarchy.

People are worried. I have asked the following questions in my constituency: Do you approve the fact that the cabinet is changing the death sentence to life imprisonment when the Canadian judicial system has condemned the criminal to the death penalty as provided by Criminal Code section 214? This is what my own constituents, those who have shown confidence in me and who have elected me to the House, have replied: yes, 409; no, 1,885; undecided, 9; no answer, 138. This is significant. These 1,885 citizens of Lotbinière are not violent people, they are not people who demand violence for violence. They are people who are worried about their safety. They are people who want to live in peace in their own country. They are people who want the policemen that they pay with their taxes to be able to do their work with the respect and support of the governments.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked my fellow citizens: In the case of premeditated first degree murder, would you approve the death penalty? Here is the answer: yes, 2,058; no, 274; undecided, 14; no answer, 95. I would like to note that more than 37 per cent of my fellow citizens who have received this questionnaire have answered it when a 10 per cent reaction is generally considered excellent. I have therefore received more than 39 per cent of answers, which shows how the Canadian people are worried about this situation. What we deplore is the fact that the cabinet does not respect the legislation passed by Parliament.

When we adopted Criminal Code section 214, the minister—and I remember that debate, I was sitting in the gallery—said that we would apply the death penalty in the case of murders of police officers or prison guards. Let us go back to that context. The death penalty was never applied. The cabinet found a way to bypass the wishes of the members as expressed in the House.

The minister says today that those guilty of first degree murder will be sentenced to 25 years imprisonment, which he calls "life imprisonment," and that after a 15-year period they will be eligible for parole. Mr. Speaker, I don't believe him. I claim that the criminals will be set free before the end of the 15-year period. Why? For good behaviour. I have no reason to believe the word or the good will of the Solicitor General because, Mr. Speaker if I rely on past experience, I have been deluded. I cannot believe him. If somebody could assure me that the laws voted by Parliament and dealing with the application of justice in Canada would be respected, my judgement on the application of the death penalty would probably be different. But I have no choice. This is my sole resource as a member of Parliament as I showed you by expressing the opinion of my constituents. This is my sole resource to try, with others, to ensure a minimum of security in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, no one can laugh at people forever, no one can exploit their good faith and their ignorance forever. The Olympic Games will cost more than one billion and a few million dollars of our taxes. For the Olympic Games, we are going to invest in excess of $100 million of our taxes to ensure the protection of personalities, politicians and athletes. Why do we spend $100 million to ensure the protection if, in any case, whatever crime might be committed on these premises, either piracy, high treason or deliberate murder, we will not move to condemn the criminals? Mr. Speaker, there is a limit, if we really want order in society. The government uses the police forces and the armed forces of our country to escort athletes along the Trans-Canada Highway. In Quebec for example, they are being installed in Granby and a number of other places around Bromont. This excites people and creates an illusion that this government truly wants to ensure protection. But in fact, what are we going to do with criminals we catch, if there are any, which is not to be hoped.

An hon. Member: Give them an olympic medal!

Mr. Fortin: They probably will get an olympic medal, if the logic of the Solicitor General is to be followed. That is totally ridiculous. Our police forces need encouragement and if clause 4 of the bill is not amended, I fear that if this government refuses to implement it, police forces will do so in the field. That probably is what will happen. Police officers called on the scene of a hold-up or violent crime will implement capital punishment to save their own lives, knowing full well that this government does not take its responsibilities. Police forces will take their own responsibilities.

Somebody told me recently that police force regulations provide that one shot shall be fired in the air as a warning before a shot can be fired at the criminal. From now on, after the Solicitor General's bill has passed, it will be one shot at the criminal and then one shot in the air, to warn him he has been fired at. That is utterly ridiculous. Either we want an organized society or we don't.

It is time we come back to earth and face facts. Mr. Speaker, the other night before the House I was talking about the taking of hostages in a Montreal schoolbus. There were then some gun shots, you will remember, and at that time, Mr. Speaker, the police stepped in. What could we read in the newspapers following that? Some public servants castigated the police for stepping in too quickly.

Mr. Speaker, that shows us how far anarchy has progressed in this country. And I repeat what I was saying earlier: I do not want to live in a police society, but I just want to live in a society where people respect one another, but in a society which punishes, governs or arrests those who do not want to obey traffic regulations. Mr. Speaker, when driving down the streets we stop on red lights and go ahead on green ones—

● (2130)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interruppt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I shall not abuse the kindness of my colleagues who give me a few minutes more. Mr. Speaker, there is a limit. Some minimum standards have to be respected in a society and as I said before I was interrupted, for a long time I have been wishing to run a red light and stop on green. But society demands that we stop on a red light and go on a green light. I have always considered that it was faster with greens but however—

Mr. Speaker, that is the highway code in our society. Then, what do we do when an hon. member, a minister, a citizen fails to comply with the rule of the road? What happens? We say that everyone is equal before the law and we levy a penalty against him. Let us look at the case of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) who recently was allegedly treated in an offhand manner by the Ontario Provincial Police for a mere summons for a parking offence. Mr. Speaker, is it not a ridiculous situation? We are extremely strict with a representative of the people for a mere parking ticket when in the case of criminals, who kill the father or the mother of young children, we just put them in jail.

Recently in Granby we had the case of someone who was convicted of murder and sentenced, if I am correct, to six months imprisonment considering his social status, the fact that it was a first offence and so on. What example do we give to society? I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that we should be strict but I say that we should be fair.

If, as citizens and MPs, we can accept that an hon. member be treated offhandedly by a police force for a petty offence, should we not, Mr. Speaker, insist upon adequate measures, corresponding to the seriousness of the crime, in the case of murders where innocents loses their lives? Mr. Speaker, only then will our society be really treated equitably. That is important and I want to close on that, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe in the law of retaliation, nor do I believe in an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth, but I would like to see a society in which there are minimum standards to respect, in which everyone knows the rules of the game.

We have reached the point where we want to control the use of firearms by innocent people through Bill C-83, but this bill does not control that of the criminals covered by Bill C-84. In other words, we attack honest people to give freedom to criminals. There is a limit to laughing at people! If we are serious about investing so much of the taxpayers money in the Olympic Games or about protecting public safety against the FLQ during the October crisis, let us now apply penal sanctions against those who break the law; otherwise, we are wasting our time.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it has been and continues to be my position that crimes of premeditated murder and certain other acts of premeditated terrorism in some instances merit the death penalty. The amendment before us, though it does not go as far as some of us would like, does restore the status quo as it existed before this issue was brought back to the House of Commons. Why was it brought back? It was brought back because the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the government did not see fit to honour the existing law which was passed in this Chamber by a free vote. Had that law been honestly applied it would probably have made it unnecessary to raise this touchy issue at the present time.

As I say, this particular amendment would restore the former situation by deleting clause 4 and restoring section 214 of the Criminal Code. As my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings has stated, prison guards and others in a like position do deserve special consideration. When one looks at the situation which prevails across the country today, the violence in our prisons and the crime which is being committed outside those prisons, it becomes obvious that society has not reached the stage at which the death sentence can be abolished no matter how much one might wish it had. For one thing, we still do not have in this country an adequate system of rehabilitation or a workable system of parole.

One particular situation that troubles me very much concerns a person who, for example, commits murder, is sent to prison and murders again. This time it is a guard whose life is taken. What does society do with this sort of individual? Does one put this person in chains or allow that individual, who may be a psychopath or just a plain, vicious killer, to remain in an institution menacing the lives of guards and other inmates? What do you do with a person who has demonstrated the capacity to kill repeatedly? That is the question to which we should address ourselves this evening.

One thing that has been lost sight of in this debate is that under the present law very few people who commit murder even face the possibility of being executed. The vast majority of the people who take the life of another do so in some extenuating circumstances. However, for the person who deliberately commits some kind of crime which most people regard as particularly abhorrent or unspeakable, there is no adequate way to deal with him at the present time until a way is devised to provide proper rehabilitation or other remedial assistance.

Anyone who heard the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) this evening would do nothing less than applaud his sincerity. Unlike many speeches made with a great deal of emotion, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain did not get carried away with exaggeration, make unfair comments, or cast reflections upon anybody else, and he deserves a great deal of credit for his excellent speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: In putting the case forward for myself as well as perhaps for others who feel with a great deal of sincerity that there are cases where the death penalty is merited, in doing away with the kind of violence, admittedly abhorrent, that is administered by the state, with the consent of the citizenry and under the sanction of the law, we may be trading one system for another which will bring about a vigilante type of violence, even a type of violence that is administered by police and prison guards for self-protection. It seems to me that at least an equal amount of violence will replace that which the minister and the government are trying to prevent. Until our system of justice, including rehabilitation and parole, becomes more refined and realistic, I cannot justify in my mind the total abolition of capital punishment.

It is fair to say, without being unduly sarcastic, that the Solicitor General in the administration of his portfolio, and the government in the administration of the country's affairs, have not demonstrated that they have matters under the kind of control that would justify the vast majority of the people of Canada having confidence that their rights will be preserved and their protection improved by removing the death penalty. On the contrary, I think a vast number of people in this country feel a sense of betrayal on the part of the government in failing to provide protection for them in general, and for policemen and prison guards in particular.

I agree with all those who say that members of parliament must reflect their own consciences. Nevertheless I think it is incumbent on the government to recognize that perhaps as high a percentage of Canadians as 80 per cent feel very uneasy about the removal of the death penalty. In taking this extraordinary step surely the government should be able to point to some sort of improvement in prison conditions and in the administration of justice that will replace the security that many people feel the death penalty represents. Otherwise this would not be such an issue and you would not have eight out of 10 Canadians writing in to protest the death penalty being taken away.

If hon. members support this motion they will surely be coming to grips with the basic proposition that, in allowing police and prison guards to risk their lives to protect the rights and properties of Canadians, police and prison guards ought to have, as I maintain all Canadians ought to have, some sort of specialized protection. Otherwise, as a previous speaker this evening pointed out, it will become increasingly difficult to find people of sufficient calibre and initiative to make a career out of a very important and demanding occupation.

I hope the Solicitor General and the government will take into account the fact that up to this point in time they have not been able to improve or refine the administration of justice, parole services, facilities to reform criminals, or indeed do anything except to put in place of the death penalty a system which in many ways is more repressive and which makes the cause of prisoners more hopeless than it is today. Not only is the government giving people who are prone to violence and have nothing to lose an opportunity to vent their frustration by committing further murders, but many people convicted of murder will be sent to prison for a long time in situations where, if they were judged under the present law, they would be provided with some hope of rehabilitating themselves and re-entering society. Altogether, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a very good amendment that will basically improve a very bad piece of legislation.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to say a few words on these amendments at report stage, and I rise to support this amendment. During the committee hearings we asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) about the changes being made by Bill C-84. The bill divides murder into first degree murder and second degree murder, and the penalty for murder in the first degree is 25 years' imprisonment. The bill refers to planned and premeditated murder, the killing of peace officers, police constables, correctional officers, wardens, deputy wardens, instructors and so on, and uses the term "without prejudice to the foregoing generalities".

The point has been made that guards, wardens, and correctional officers are responsible for guarding convicted murderers for 15 or 25 years. During the committee stage we asked the Solicitor General whether these people will be permitted to be released into society under any circumstances. The Solicitor General replied that on humanitarian grounds even these prisoners will be released, but with an escort. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if any person, regardless of his age, who has been found guilty of first degree murder under the terms and conditions of this bill and has been given 25 years' imprisonment is released on humanitarian grounds or for some reason or other with an escort, what value is he going to place on the life of that escort? That is why this amendment is so important, particularly if these people are to be released with escorts on humanitarian grounds.

Let me give you a little history, and I am not digressing. It was only a few years ago that humanitarian grounds under Section 26 of the Penitentiaries Act meant very special grounds. For a number of years it was necessary to get an order of a judge of the high court, and the attorney general's consent in the province where a person was incarcerated, before that person could be released on humanitarian grounds to attend the funeral of a member of his family, for example. Now this decision is made by an administrator, perhaps an individual without any knowledge of jurisprudence or of the law. Perhaps he interprets Section 26 of the Penitentiaries Act to mean any kind of grounds, because certainly people are being released now for any reason. Apparently many things are humanitarian. Some of the grounds are, of course, very unusual.

Let me review with you for a few minutes that intamous Geoffroy case. This was a person who was found guilty of the planned, premeditated murder of his wife. After he had killed her he burned the bed in the bedroom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Some hon. members may think this is funny, but this is what happened, and this is what we are talking about tonight. I am not in any sense attempting to be humorous. This person was found guilty by the court, then by the court of appeal of the province of Quebec, and then by the Supreme Court of Canada by the due process of law. Then how do we find humanitarian grounds being interpreted by the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), who was then the Solicitor General? This is so tragic that if it were written up it would almost be a comedy.

The reason the accused wanted out was that the children had no mother. Who had got rid of the mother? It was this man himself. The then solicitor general, who is now the Minister of Supply and Services, said he should be released. The accused took part in a ceremony of marriage with his mistress who was involved in the crime. The accused had had a long time liaison with her, whatever that means.

An hon. Member: And that is the fact.

Mr. Woolliams: And that is the fact, and I raised it in the House. In any event the necessary people gathered together to hold this ceremony, with all the candles, all the trimmings and all the things that go with it, because his children needed a new mother. When the time came for the accused, Mr. Geoffroy, who had enjoyed a long time liaison with Miss Peron, to return, they had disappeared. I asked the then solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services, to make a statement about this on motions. He said they had disappeared, but it wasn't very long before they found them. Where do you think they found them?

An hon. Member: In Spain.

Mr. Woolliams: You are right. They were found in Spain on the sand at the beach. The children had been left with the parents of one side or the other. Apparently their needs were not being neglected. If that is the way humanitarian grounds are to be interpreted by the Solicitor General's administrators, then let us not leave those people who are tonight waiting on death-row under difficult circumstances. If this bill goes through, no matter what kind of heinous crime they have committed, there will be a 25-year term of imprisonment substituted for the death penalty, and they will have the right to get out of an institution on humanitarian grounds. If that is to be the stare decisis, or the precedent to be followed, then we have a very sticky wicket. That is the first point I wanted to make.

Just two and a half years ago the present Solicitor General and our same Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), of course with different parliamentary secretaries, stood in this House, after having been at caucus, saying that if we would abolish capital punishment except in respect of murderers of police officers, wardens and correctional officers—if we would go along with that bill they would give it a trial for five years—some trial, some promise, and some commitment to the public!

I cannot call those people who made this commitment and this promise, including the government House leader, what I am thinking. I would not dare say that those people are hypocrites because of their failure to keep this promise and this commitment, but I can say in this House that this is the very basis for the definition of hypocrisy. That commitment and that promise were not only made to the people of Canada but to those people who have a lot of courage and guts in the Liberal party who will stand and vote against this Prime Minister, this House leader, and this cabinet.

Mr. Sharp: What about Joe Clark?

Mr. Woolliams: He happens to be our leader, but he has made no commitment to any other leader. He stands by his own conscience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: But he is your leader.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me answer that little man from the civil service who got fired by the Tories and stands here and speaks so smoothly out of both sides of his mouth, and sometimes even with the front of his lips, asking us where our leader stands. I will tell him where our leader stands.

An hon. Member: Let's hear all about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about Joe? Tell us about Joe.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: Let me say to the hon. member that at least this party has the right and freedom to—

An hon. Member: Show respect.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it those hon. members are the essence of respect, perhaps I should call it ten o'clock, because that is symbolic of the end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL GALLERY—ACQUISITION OF ROOM PAINTED WITH MURALS AT KARSDALE, NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST THAT IT REMAIN IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the all-inspiring reason we are gathered together in such large numbers this late at night began about 130 years ago in a place called Karsdale on the shores of the Annapolis Basin in Nova Scotia. There, as legend or modern history would have it, a British sailor deserted his fleet and sought refuge in the home of a wealthy merchant. While being given haven he passed away the winter by painting a room with murals. This room, which exists today and is the subject matter of this question tonight, is 15 feet by 12 feet by 6 feet 11 inches high. It has two doorways, a fireplace, and three windows, two of which look out on the Annapolis Basin. I am just trying to have people feel as if they were sitting there in that particular room.

The paintings have now become the subject of some controversy in the province of Nova Scotia. Miss Gretchen Pierce, who is one of the journalists employed by the Halifax Chronicle Herald, has described it in part as follows:

● (2200)

He covered it with a gigantic mural with many different scenes depicting life in Great Britain and the rural life of the Indians, scenes from the Croscup's own life, . . .

That is a reference to the person who owned the home.

. . . their marriage, Croscup's wife and their firstborn . . . The walls of the room portray ship launchings, a group of MicMac Indians in the woods, a hunting scene, Queen Victoria with the Royal Family, and both St. Paul's Cathedral and Somerset House in London.

It shows Trafalgar Square, but in the days before the Nelson monument was placed there. The artist whoever he was—and again it is only legend which says that it was a British sailor who deserted who apparently has not left his name on anything in that room—did his work by pencil and then applied oil paint afterward. A few years back I understand there were several such painted rooms found in Nova Scotia and other parts of eastern Canada, but now apparently the nearest one may be that in Wilmington, Delaware, where a home contains several painted rooms.

The National Gallery has acquired this room from its present owners and proposes to restore and remove the same to Ottawa so that the nation may join in this particular heritage. I do not quarrel with or fault the intention of the National Gallery, and indeed as a Nova Scotian I have to be a little shame-faced in saying that the problem really did not become recognized until after the sale had gone through.

Now, can this be moved? I have spoken to one of the most respected artists in the province of Nova Scotia, Dr. Donald Cameron MacKay, formerly the principal of the Nova Scotia College of Art, who says yes. Technology makes it possible to take a room, even a plastered room such as that one, cut it up in segments and move it many thousands of miles so that it can be reassembled in some other place. So obviously the issue is not only of whether this rather unique artistic heritage would suffer if it were moved. Perhaps the point is that Nova Scotia would be losing something that, even late in the day when we come to this conclusion, we think we should try to keep there. I will suggest a solution in a moment, as I did the other day when I asked the hon. lady the question which brings us here this evening.

There is something called the Atlantic Conservation Institute. It is funded by the National Museums. It works in my part of the world out of Moncton. It could carry out the work of restoration. It was not asked to do so in this particular case. I understand the work is being carried out by the arts faculty of Queen's University. I wish them well in seeing that the work is restored to its original splendor. Tomorrow Mr. Jean Trudel, the curator of early Canadian art of the National Gallery of Ottawa, will be in Annapolis Royal and he will be meeting with the Friends of the Painted Room, which is the name of the society that is trying to retain this for Nova Scotia. I wish them all well in dealing with what perhaps has become a rather difficult problem.

May I finally present my own suggestion. I do not like to see a deal cancelled. It was entered into a good faith by the National Gallery of Canada and the people who own the house. The provincial government could have been involved in this early but decided not to do so for reasons of its own. So I am not asking that the deal be cancelled. Rather I would suggest to the hon. lady and the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) that the National Gallery perhaps use a little imagination and try to make the best of what I think is a pretty good bargain.

I suggest that it not move the thing too far. There is the Champlain Habitation at Annapolis Royal, a few miles away, and I am sure there is a room which could be found there in which this unique painted room could be reassembled after restoration. The Annapolis Royal Habitation which exists in the constituency of my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Miss Campbell), receives up to 190,000 visitors a year. This would not be part of the Champlain tradition, but it would be part of a tradition—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was correct when he stated that this Painted Room is of concern to me. I would not like to see this artifact lost, and until the National Gallery stepped in that is exactly what was happening, as had happened to other similar rooms in the province. At present the Friends of the Painted Room are attempting to find solutions to this and to see how it can be kept in Nova Scotia and, more particularly, in the locale where it was found. But anyone who has visited the room will see that there is a big job of restoration to be done.

However, let me give some of the history of this. The board of trustees of the National Museums of Canada approved the purchase of the Painted Room in December of 1975. This decision was based on the board's judgment that the preservation of the room could best be assured through its acquisition by the National Gallery and brought to Ottawa where it could be restored and kept up under the proper conditions needed to keep such an artifact.

Before its purchase the director of the National Gallery advised the Nova Scotia government of the gallery's interest. In particular, the National Gallery wished to determine that the provincial government would not regard an offer to the room's owners, and its subsequent removal, as a loss to the provincial heritage. The reply to the director of the National Gallery was that the government of Nova Scotia was of course concerned about the departure from Nova Scotia of this art as a result of the purchase. However, it was felt that unless the province supported the gallery's initiative, the art might be totally lost. They recognized that the removal of the paintings was a delicate and costly task which the province was not able to undertake.

The removal to Ottawa of the paintings has been the subject of representations to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) from private persons and non-governmental organizations in Nova Scotia. As far as the National Museums Corporation was able to determine before the purchase by the National Gallery, no local initiatives had been taken or were contemplated at the provincial or any other level to purchase, restore, and preserve the room for the public.

It is the intention of the National Gallery to instal the paintings in a part of the gallery devoted to the arts of the Maritime provinces.

The Painted Room will contribute to the national collection, the development of which is a major responsibility of the National Gallery. This involves acquiring works of art and artifacts from the various regions of Canada and bringing them to the national capital. If this were not the case, the national collection would cease to represent the Canadian cultural heritage in its totality. Perhaps these paintings may be able to be displayed when they have been restored in the local regions. Perhaps other arrangements could be looked at, but at this time the cost of saving these paintings and restoring them has to be undertaken, and the National Gallery has become responsible for this.

In carrying out this responsibility, the National Museums are sensitive to local concerns and are doing their utmost to ensure that these concerns are given fair consideration in all such purchases.

IMMIGRATION—MEDICAL CHECKS ON VISITORS FROM THE TROPICS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to speak about immigration and the spread of tropical diseases. I know that a great deal has been done in these areas, but I still feel that what has been done is not adequate to deal with the problem. I have stated the necessity for more drastic action to control the problem. I have stated that it is estimated that 10,000 people or more in the city of Toronto live underground and share corners with others. They are frightened, they receive no services, and they pay no taxes.

Apparently the federal government does not realize that Toronto is a multicultural city. The other night I talked to a girl from the city of Montreal who is now working in Toronto representing a firm there. She told me that on the subway one night she heard five different languages spoken, and that 52 per cent of the children going into primary school cannot speak English.

The field of children's health care is also becoming more and more overloaded, and a wide range of subtropical diseases is appearing. These diseases are being brought to Canada not just by immigrants. Many of them passed the requirements of a health department months before their immigration, and I would like to ask the minister if our standard has been met or the standard of the country from which these immigrants come.

I think it is basically unfair to allow an immigrant to come to this country and months or years afterwards to find that he is suffering from a parasitic disease. That puts a stigma on him and his family which is unfair. Since he may have unknowingly spread the disease to his family or others, that has made the health care system very costly.

I hope I will be forgiven for bringing to the attention of the Department of National Health and Welfare that many of these cases are missed for months or years because the medical profession does not have the opportunity of diagnosing subtropical or tropical diseases. To illustrate my point, I had a professional patient who suffered ill health for months. He had been in the east, and finally, after going around the circle, I diagnosed his problem because one of my associate doctors picked up the same disease while in Asia.

The point I am making is that we must be as careful as possible in diagnosing any disease which may be a subtropical or tropical disease. Let me add that parasitical diseases are accepted far more as a national occurrence in some countries than we can tolerate here.

I also want to say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras)—and I am grateful to see him here in his seat tonight to answer me—that the risk increases with the length of time a person remains in Canada. However, the minister so far has been unable to state—and I can readily understand that—how many of those immigrants there are and how many of them stay longer than the average tourist. Surely here is a case in point. The minister says a year or more. How about three months or longer, with the net result of the spread of infection mounting with the passage of time?

The minister states he has very little to do with Canadians who have stayed in those countries for a long time. Some work there for industrial firms or otherwise, or perhaps even for the governments. Is there any good reason why a thorough medical examination, particularly with regard to tropical diseases, should not be required when they return to this country?

My final inquiry has to do with foreign students from tropical or subtropical countries. Are they or are they not covered by insurance prepaid at universities? I am advised that many of them become sick and are afraid to go to the hospital or to see a doctor because they think they are not covered. Are they examined for these diseases when they come to our universities? Are they covered by health care insurance?

I want to tell the ministers involved that I have dealt only with the Toronto area, but there is also Vancouver, Montreal, and Cambridge, which has more than 10,000 Portuguese among its population. These cases present an aspect of medicine which is new to this country, and preventive medicine should be practised to stop and control these infections. The minister must now assure us that preventive measures will be taken and adequate care will be provided.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). The other day he asked me for some statistical information, particularly relating to immigrants and Canadians returning from tropical countries. I am not trying to dodge that. I want to tell him that we do not maintain statistics on the number of visitors precisely by classification of tropical or subtropical countries. That information is available, though, and the hon. member could actually collate it himself.

International travel statistics are obtained from Statistics Canada. We certainly use this information. If the hon. member were to identify those countries that he considers to be tropical, by reference to the latest publication called "Travel Between Canada and Other Countries" he would be able to find the statistics he seeks.

The second part of the question he posed the other day and asked again tonight was regarding visitors who stay in Canada longer than on an ordinary visit. I could give him that information if he would provide me with a list of the countries in which he is particularly interested. My parliamentary secretary outlined the procedures and the change in procedures quite clearly in May this year. The information is all in Hansard so I shall not repeat it.

In regard to Canadians returning to this country, the Department of National Health and Welfare has primary responsibility and screens all persons subject to immigration jurisdiction who are referred to that department by us at the primary inspection area or wherever we come in contact with them. The health screening procedure includes stool testing for the detection of parasitic diseases and it is carried out on people coming from countries where parasitic diseases are prevalent. If the hon. member wants more specific information I would refer him to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

I do not consider this matter lightly, Mr. Speaker. I am alerted not only from other sources of information but by the hon. member's repeated expressions of concern. I intend to dig a little more into this area than we have done so far although I think he should recognize that we have taken very specific action in the last several months, particularly with visitors who stay more than 90 days and people who may be employed in food handling, and also foreign students. We recognize the potential danger in these areas.

I will check Hansard for the more specific questions that the hon. member posed tonight and will get him complete answers at the earliest opportunity.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN ALLOWABLE EARNINGS OF RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am rising tonight to address myself to the difficulty that veterans are having in attempting to live a decent life on the income they are receiving. While it is recognized that increases have been forthcoming under the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, there is an immediate need to review the amount of casual earnings and to increase it beyond the $1,000 for the single veteran and the $1,500 for the married recipient.

I realize that there have been periodic increases in the amount of casual earnings allowed but I am sure the minister recognizes that there is justification for a suitable increase immediately to allow veterans to cope with rising costs.

The government has recognized and has provided quarterly indexing to veteran recipients of the allowance, and if recognition exists in this regard it should follow that there should be a coincidental increase in casual earnings. However, since the need is immediate a simple order would put the increase into effect. May I suggest to the minister through the parliamentary secretary—and I know the minister always listens to my suggestions—that the increase be in the order of 50 per cent which would increase the earnings to $1,500 for the single recipient and $2,250 for the married recipient.

If I may refer to the act itself, it was implemented to recognize pre-aging of the veteran as a result of war service, and also because of need. The veteran recipient and his wife are now in their twilight years and in most cases the children of the family have gone on their own, having been brought up under difficulty because of the veteran parent being on a fixed income. I am sure it should be recognized that the veteran in this situation, or his wife who now might want to supplement their income, should be able to enjoy a bit of extra comfort, and the amounts presently existing restrict their ability to offer themselves for employment with any permanency. They often run into the embarrassing situation where overpayments are created because they might have innocently earned a little more than the allowable amount.

One of the most important needs that I see with respect to increasing the casual earnings of WVA recipients is that many live in their own homes which need repairs or improvements. Because of their fixed income they cannot afford to maintain them at a reasonable level; neither can they afford a home improvement loan under the National Housing Act or the costly material required, and until we can convince the government to expand the veterans' housing program to include a home rehabilitation item for veterans, an increase in the casual earnings would help the veterans to prevent the deterioration of their homes.

I think that the minister should also give consideration to treating as casual earnings the meagre amounts that a veteran might be receiving under workmen's compensation and the Canada Pension Plan, particularly for those who cannot work.

Under the War Veterans Allowance Act a single recipient receives at present, on an unmarried basis, the amount of $221.98, while the married receipient receives $378.48. For those who can earn, this would mean that the single veteran would receive $350 and the married veteran about $550, which he could earn with pride and dignity.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary, who is most sympathetic to the veterans' cause, will pass on to the minister my remarks so that I can receive confirmation with a positive reply as to the action the minister has taken, whether or not he has made an approach to cabinet and on what date we can expect an announcement for increasing casual earnings which are so direly needed by veterans under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy discussing these matters with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) because we are both interested in seeing what we can obtain for war veterans receiving the WVA. The hon. member ought to realize that we, in our caucus, are interested in this problem and we have received recommendations similar to his from various members.

The hon. member pointed out that what was allowed to veterans receiving WVA in 1973 is now inadequate, and if we could increase from $1,000 to $1,500 the casual earnings allowable to a single veteran, and from $1,500 to $2,000 those to the married veteran, it would be a great help. On the other hand those might or might not be the correct amounts. Who knows; they might not be enough? That will need to be worked out. Such earnings are provided for under the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

I always have to remind hon. members that, from the point of view of financial assistance, we have probably the best war veterans legislation in the world. There have been major changes recently in the legislation covering veterans. These include additional allowances for children and quarterly escalation of ceilings of WVA recipients. However, as the hon. member says, we have done nothing since 1973 to increase the allowable ceiling on casual earnings. I think the minister did say recently he was in the process of addressing himself to this question. I know this to be the case.

Studies are going on, though they are not completed, and we expect that changes in the regulations will be made in the near future. That might not be an altogether satisfactory answer, but I do not mean that an announcement will be made in a year or two; I mean in the next few months. I believe the increases will permit levels which more accurately reflect wage levels at the present time. We as a department are anxious to take action which will ensure that Canada does honour those who served us so bravely in war.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired.

PROPOSED PENSIONS FOR HOUSEWIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which some of us feel should be brought urgently to the attention of the government. I therefore move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to bring in legislation that will establish pension rights for homemaker spouses equivalent to the rights of those employed outside the home, and that the government commit itself to the inclusion of this legislation in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the next session of this parliament.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE VOTE ON AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

In view of the gravity of the consequences of the conflict generated by the air controllers and pilots of Canada, except for the Gens de l'air du Québec, as the protocol of agreement signed by CALPA, CATCA and the Minister of Transport constitutes one of the worst affronts ever inflicted upon the government in the history of this country, as the decision of the Minister of Transport is stamped with chauvinism and racism which are contrary to the most elementary rights of the francophone citizens in Canada, and taking into account the fact that all the right-minded hon. members of this Parliament cannot associate themselves with so revolting an act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House demand immediately that a recorded vote be taken so that all Canadians might know who, in this House, disapprove or approve of the attitude of the Minister of Transport in the conflict that opposes him to the air controllers and pilots in Canada, a positive vote leading necessarily to the resignation of the minister concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED CONTROL OF INFLATED PRICES ASKED BY TRAVEL AGENCIES FOR TRIPS TO GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move an urgent motion.

Travel agencies throughout the world are now selling package-deal trips to allow people to come to the Olympics, at terms more profitable than the best organized hold-ups. For example, a roundtrip airplane ticket between Miami and Montreal for three days, with two-night accommodation and tickets for one Olympic activity can be bought for the reasonable sum of $1400 per person. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs make representations to the Canadian embassies abroad to ask them to keep a close eye on the abusive practices of those travel agencies, which will cause enormous damage to the good commercial name Canada enjoys abroad.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Olympic Games should not be used to make politics and politicking in favour or at the expense of various countries and considering that the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which aims at forcing the People's Republic of China not to use their recognized name is a serious intrusion in the affairs of another country and a serious breach of the Olympic ethics,

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFER OF TAX POINTS TO COMPENSATE PROVINCES FOR LOST REVENUE AND RECONSIDERATION OF REVENUE GUARANTEE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and relates to the meetings he held yesterday with the provincial ministers of finance. In light of the substantial loss of revenue which the provinces will suffer as a result of the government's announced intention to terminate the revenue guarantee payments, will the minister tell the House whether the government is considering the transfer of tax points to compensate the provinces for these losses, and further, given that the federal government has unilaterally changed the formula for the revenue guarantee payments owing for fiscal years already completed thus breaking an existing agreement with the provinces, will the government reconsider this decision so as to restore an atmosphere of basic trust to the current negotiations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. lady—

Some hon. Members: Hon. member.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —that the arrangements for the revenue guarantee were with regard to a five year period which would enable the provinces to adjust their own taxation systems to the changes brought about by the tax reform. The program was specifically for the purpose of making that adjustment, and the understanding at the time at which it was entered into was that the provinces should amend their tax systems accordingly. We have made it clear to the provinces that we do not intend to continue beyond 1976 the sweeping revenue guarantee that has existed in the past, and of course it was understood that the provinces over the intervening five years would have to adjust their own taxation systems to take care of the change in revenue that would be brought about.

The hon. lady refers to our claim back for the years that are now closed, 1972 and 1973. It is true that there was a federal over-payment by about $300 million in respect of those two fiscal years. We have made it clear, both in the House and to the provinces, that we are not seeking to claim back that amount for those years.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FEDERAL PROPOSALS AND SCHEDULE FOR FUTURE FINANCE AND FIRST MINISTERS' MEETINGS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): The minister did not answer my question with regard to the fiscal years 1974, 1975 and 1976 in which the provinces will be losing $700 million, I should like some reply as to whether or not the government will compensate the provinces for that loss which they will suffer under an existing agreement. In view of the fact that all of these matters must be dealt with by members of the House and because we had been denied information until now, will the minister today table the federal government's proposals and documents, including the briefing books that were given to the provinces at yesterday's meeting, and will he also give the House the schedule for the future finance and first ministers' meetings and tell us when he expects these negotiations to be completed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): With regard to the first part of the hon. lady's statement—

Some hon. Members: Hon. member's statement.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —I should point out that in fact the obligation to pay in relation to 1974 will not arise until later this year. If the question arises as to what the provinces were expecting for the years 1974 and 1975, and indeed for the current year, presumably one should look at the estimates of revenues which they have made in their own budgetary statements to their own provincial legislatures, from which it is clear they were not expecting the much more substantial payments to which they have now laid claim.

With regard to the documents arising out of the federal-provincial conference, a copy of which I have here, I have asked my department officials to take steps to have this rather voluminous information translated, and as soon as we have it available in both official languages I will be quite happy to table it in the House.

With regard to the timetable of meetings, the next meeting will be held by the consulting committee at which officials will be meeting during the course of the summer. I anticipate that there will be at least one if not two meetings of the finance ministers between now and November, and I think the first ministers are considering the possibility of a first ministers' meeting in November for the purpose also of dealing with this among other issues.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROVINCES WILL NOT LOSE UNDER PROPOSALS FOR SHARED-COST PROGRAMS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the question that I would like to put to the Minister of Finance has to do with assurances to the provinces, assurances which were broken under the revenue guarantee payment. Given the Prime Minister's assurance following the first ministers' meeting in June that the have-not provinces would not suffer under any new proposals for shared-cost programs, will the minister today undertake to give the same kind of assurance to the House that no province which now qualifies, and will continue to qualify, for equalization payments will receive less money under any new equalization formula than it receives at present?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): With regard to the federal government's assurance on entering into the revenue guarantee, it was to indemnify the provinces for the revenue that they would lose if in fact the new tax system did not yield as much as the old one. In fact, from the calculations made now it is quite clear that the government has been indemnifying them for that. Indeed, the federal government unilaterally went one step further and has also undertaken and has paid them indemnification for changes which occurred in the provincial tax system as a result of subsequent changes made in the taxation system in this parliament to relieve the weight of taxation upon Canadian taxpayers generally.

With regard to the equalization payments, I made it clear to the provinces that the examples used for the purpose of calculation of equalization on one or other of the three formulas did not indicate an intention to drop the absolute amount, that we would certainly make certain that the new formula would not reduce the absolute amount and that these calculations are for demonstrative purposes only. Of course, with respect to any particular province, it depends on the formula adopted and the structure of that province's own taxation system. I think one can say, with regard to the transfer payment system generally to the have-not provinces, that that will not yield less to them in the future in general terms than it is paying to them now.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF TAX REDUCTION IN VIEW OF EXCESS REVENUES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. As federal revenues since tax reform have exceeded expectations, and as the minister has made this point quite clear in giving reasons why the provincial revenue guarantees should be terminated retroactively, does the minister propose, now that revenue guarantee payments will likely no longer take place, the reduction of federal tax rates so that the excess revenue referred to by the minister and others may lessen and so that the Canadian taxpayer will not be double taxed as a result of the federal action? Let us remember that there is only one taxpayer for all levels of government.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Exactly, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I point out to the hon. gentleman, as I pointed out to the provinces, that there was no excess revenue coming to the government of Canada, but if, as the provinces insisted, the full amount of the revenue guarantee, as calculated by the econometric formula, be paid to the provinces, then there would have to be an increase in federal taxation against federal taxpayers for the purpose of paying that greater amount. We feel that the provinces have been indemnified for what they have expected, as indicated in their own budgetary statements, and that they should not be claiming something greater than indemnity.

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF ALCOHOL AND TOBACCO TAXES TO PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): As the minister advocates the transfer of tobacco and alcohol taxing power, a low growth revenue source, to the provinces to assist the provinces in the financing of such programs as medicare and hospital insurance, is the minister concerned that the provinces will be left with no option but to try to accelerate the consumption of tobacco and alcohol in order to stimulate revenue growth, which in turn might create further health problems and thus be counterproductive?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As is well known, the provinces gain the most from the sale of alcoholic beverages throughout Canada through the profits of the provincial liquor commissions and through the existing provincial sales taxes. I should correct the hon. gentleman and say that the excise taxes on alcohol and tobacco were one of the options we put before the provincial governments. We put several before them for the purpose of their choosing in this respect. I would have to say that with respect to taxation on tobacco and alcohol, this would have provided something of a rationalization of the taxing of these two commodities since so much of it is already done at the provincial level. This would have put the full responsibility for taxation on the provincial governments and therefore would have simplified the system. We are not insisting on it, however. They have other options to choose.

EFFECT ON PROVINCIAL REVENUES OF TRANSFER OF TAX POINTS TO REPLACE COST-SHARING PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question with regard to the cost-sharing proposals of the federal government. By giving the provinces, as a substitute for the present 50-50 cost-sharing on health and post-secondary education, a new package which is substantially dependent on tax points, I would like to ask the minister whether he agrees that this leaves the provinces much more vulnerable in these precise areas in the sense that provincial taxes for almost all provinces are levied as a percentage of the federal tax, and therefore if the federal government changes its tax policy, the provinces could well get less revenue than they had planned for, as happened when the government introduced indexing.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should correct the hon. gentleman. The proposal is not principally on tax points. On the several options mentioned, one provides for a 66⅔ per cent payment in cash, another for 50 per cent in cash, with the balance for transmittal in terms of tax points. The basic proposition the hon. gentleman puts with respect to the impact on the provincial tax base on personal income tax is quite correct. I would remind him, however, that at least from some of the provinces—and there was evidence of this again at the meeting yesterday—there has been insistence on the transfer of tax points because they know that in the long run these taxes will return them a far greater yield than would cash payments.

Mr. Broadbent: To be perfectly clear then, the minister is conceding that by shifting away from a 50-50 cost-sharing formula in relation to health care and post-secondary education costs to a system which weighs heavily—I shall not put it more strongly than that—on the tax point system, leaves the provinces in a much more vulnerable position in terms of ability to forecast their own revenue expectations to cover the fields I have mentioned.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There is no doubt that changing the tax base under a uniform tax collection system could have the effect of reducing provincial revenues. This, presumably, was well known to those provinces which sought not only half the transfer but the whole of the transfer of tax points. So, now it looks like it depends very much on where you sit in this country. With regard to the less well-favoured provinces, the cash payment has more effect than the transfer of tax points.

AMOUNT OF REVENUE PROVINCES LOSE AS RESULT OF ABANDONMENT OF REVENUE GUARANTEE FORMULA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I welcome the minister's candor. That, of course, is precisely why a number of provinces are opposed to what he is proposing. Would the minister confirm the estimate made by the government of Saskatchewan that the provinces would lose collectively over the next ten years $18 billion as a result of the government's unilateral decision to abandon the existing revenue guarantee formula?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I can confirm that that is not accurate. In the first place, the premise put forward by the hon. gentleman is not accurate. We have not abandoned the revenue guarantee formula. We have undertaken to pay an indemnity and we are paying it. We have also made it clear that the formula was valid for a period of five years. What the province of Saskatchewan was really saying was this: if there had been a promise to continue it beyond five years, that would have been the figure. Perhaps it would and perhaps it would not, but that is a hypothetical question which does not relate either to the existing arrangement or to the facts.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED RESIGNATION OF MINISTER IN VIEW OF AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the sharp protests coming from everywhere following the decision by the minister about the agreement signed with CALPA and CATCA, and in view of the very serious effects resulting from that mistake he made, which is recognized by some cabinet members and even by the right hon. Prime Minister, could the minister tell the House when he intends to resign from the cabinet?

FINANCE

MEASURES TO MAKE INVESTMENT IN CANADA MORE ATTRACTIVE TO CANADIANS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. As investment by Canadian businessmen in foreign countries during the past five years has tripled—in 1975 it exceeded foreign investment in Canada by $200 million—is the minister considering plans to make investment in Canada at least as attractive as investment abroad with consequence advantages to Canadian production and employment? If that is the case, would the minister announce what these plans are at the first opportunity on motions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I am not proposing at this point to make any statement on further fiscal changes of the kind set out by my predecessor to stimulate manufacturing and processing investment in Canada. In my view, the principal concern investors might have felt with respect to Canada was the rate of inflation in this country, together with the rate of increase in cost due to high wage settlements. As the hon. member knows, we have set ourselves, under the anti-inflation policy, the goal of reducing the rate of inflation and, as a consequence, reducing the increase in industrial costs, perhaps the most important single factor in reaching investment decisions.

Mr. Hees: Considering the government's obvious lack of intent to make investment in this country more attractive for Canadian businessmen, is it any wonder Canadian businessmen are forced to make large investments abroad, as they are presently doing?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would have to say to the hon. member, and to those in the business community who share his thinking, that the primary goal in Canada for all Canadians should be the overcoming of inflation in this country.

Mr. Hees: What about overcoming unemployment?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is always a critical factor. I point out to the hon. gentleman that if we fail to overcome inflation the rate of unemployment will be very much greater in Canada. As for those people who state they would not enter into investments for plant and equipment which would have a useful life of between 20 and 25 years because of the interim nature of the anti-inflation program, I suggest to them that they should do their thinking again. We believe that Canada is and will be a good investment area for Canadian and foreign business, and that they have as much to gain as any of us by supporting the anti-inflation program; and the attitudes of some members of the business community which negate the anti-inflation program really are negating their own interests as well.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF ALLEGED CHANGE IN LOCKHEED PROPOSAL FOR LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It has been reported that Lockheed has reduced the cost of its new proposal for the LRPA by dropping some of the more sophisticated electronic gear. Since we have been told many times that this sophisticated equipment is necessary if we are to do the job adequately with 18 aircraft, are we now to assume that less sophisticated equipment means that we shall do the job less than adequately, or will we need to acquire more aircraft?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Look who is beside you.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the co-operation between the Minister of Supply and Services and myself has always been very close; now, we are even closer.

Mr. Hees: You are a great stand-up comedian.

Mr. Paproski: Now, we know who is writing your French lines.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson: I know the Minister of Supply and Services would join me in telling our hon. friend that the subject he has raised is before cabinet and, when the decision has been reached, I am certain that question and all others will be satisfactorily answered.

Mr. Hees: That was a fine, stock answer.

REASON FOR PLACING LOCKHEED PROPOSAL BEFORE CABINET RATHER THAN BOEING

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, that answer is similar to the one we heard before the last fiasco, before that "Odd Couple" were put down at the end of the treasury bench. Bearing in mind the minister said that if anyone misled anyone, it was Lockheed, can the Minister of National Defence tell us what it was about Lockheed's performance over the past year that led him to place that company's new proposal before cabinet in a position preferential to that of Boeing?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there was a contract definition phase in which the Government of Canada funded not only Lockheed but Boeing as well for several months. As a result of that long study the Lockheed company, as I am certain the hon. member will remember, was selected for a variety of reasons which were all explained at that time.

HARBOURS

EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF PORT MANAGER AT CHURCHILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I ask whether he has had representations made by the Hudson Bay Route Association concerning the situation created at Port Churchill through the removal of the manager and the reduction of that port from a national port to just one of the other ordinary ports. What has been his reaction thereto?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course there was reaction at the time of the change of the port management. I am satisfied that the new port manager will settle all concerns in that regard. The right hon. gentleman is wrong, of course, in suggesting any diminution of the voice of the port of Churchill. Indeed, I have made clear that my strong, personal feeling is that Churchill was and would continue to be recognized as a national port.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was reading from the representation made in connection with the reduction in the status of that port. There is a great deal of uncertainty and feeling in western Canada that western Canadian farmers and the people in general are being sold out again in this connection.

An hon. Member: They are being sold a port.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister whether he will stand up for the western provinces in this regard and see to it that Churchill port is used to a greater extent than ever before, instead of reducing its potentiality?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that I have arranged a meeting with the Hudson Bay Route Association, to keep myself fully in touch with the situation. The right hon. gentleman seems to have missed the fact that we expect a record shipment of grain through the port of Churchill this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I wish he would avoid his usual habit of trying to spread uncertainty by repeating a false statement and suggesting that there is any diminution of the role of the port.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister always resorts to cheap condemnation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him, what is the purpose for the meeting with the Hudson Bay Route Association if it is not a fact that they know he is joining in selling out the west?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I constantly have meetings with people such as the Hudson Bay Route Association. I do not ask the right hon. gentlemans permission to meet with people of all types all across this country. I simply ask him to respect some longstanding traditions of this place, if of nowhere else, and to accept what I said to him in terms of there being no diminution. That is the fact.

CHURCHILL—REPLACEMENT OF INTERIM PORT MANAGER—ESTABLISHMENT OF LOCAL PORT AUTHORITY

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. Although this year, hopefully, is to be a record year for the port, I think the minister has done everything in his power to scuttle that record year. I ask the minister what arrangements are being made to replace the present port manager who is serving on an interim basis and who will leave on November 1? What is being done to promote a local port authority, and who will be selecting the port manager who is to serve full time from November 1?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say to the hon. member that the appointment of Mr. Lauzon to the port has been very well received, I believe. He is a competent person. I am happy to hear no question of that. I barely detected any note of appreciation for the record year we are enjoying in Churchill. Mr. Speaker, I barely detected any appreciation of that. The management will, of course, be in permanent place in due course. The question of the port authority awaits legislation in this place, and I do not suggest that it will be in this session.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister and also the chairman of the National Harbours Board made a statement to the effect that a local port authority would be in place by April, 1977. I understood it did not have to await legislation. Will the minister now guarantee that there will be a local port commission in Churchill and that they will be involved, along with members of the local port commission from the prairies, in the selection of a permanent port manager?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member is somewhat confused.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: There is a new chairman to be appointed to the current authority. The references to April were references by the chairman of the National Harbours Board to his optimism that the new legislation creating the new port authority would be available by that time and that we would have the new port authority in place under that legislation. At present we are looking for a replacement in the case of a vacancy.

AIRPORTS

DATE OF CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITY AT ST. LEONARD, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's previous statements in this House in answer to some of my questions regarding the construction of an airport facility in northwest New Brunswick, at St. Léonard, I wonder if the minister is now in a position to say if the ministry will go ahead with the project; if so, when; if not, why not; and if it is delayed, how long will we have to wait?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a decision has not yet been taken but discussions are going on; they include discussions with the provincial government. We are seeking the support of the province in the development of the kind of airport that would, in the opinion of the area, be the ideal and which may be beyond that which would ordinarily be there as a result of Ministry of Transport policies. We have not yet had full concurrence from the province and their willingness to share.

ENERGY

AMOUNT OF LOSS ON SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—SAFEGUARDS AGAINST MANUFACTURING PLUTONIUM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the renegotiated agreement with Argentina regarding the sale of a CANDU reactor. In view of the fact the chairman of the AECL stated before the standing committee on national resources that on this deal Canada stood to lose at least $96 million and since press reports indicated that the price has been raised by $70.5 million, leaving a loss of at least $25.5 million, can the minister tell the House the estimated total loss on this contract, including not only the reactor but also the sales of uranium supplies, electro-magnetic parts and heavy water? Will he also tell the House why the people of Canada should not only sell the reactor to Argentina but pay over $25 million for the privilege?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I answered a question from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on precisely the same point. I told her at that time that the renegotiation had been virtually completed. It remains to come forward to ministers in both countries for their final approval. I have not yet submitted this renegotiated commercial contract and terms to my colleagues for their approval. Therefore, I am not in a position at the present time to discuss the precise numbers with the hon. member. I can tell him that as a result of the renegotiation there has been a very substantial saving in the cost—

An hon. Member: The loss.

Mr. Gillespie: —in the loss.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I do not make any secret of the fact that we entered into this renegotiation because we were faced with a loss. The reason we were faced with a loss was that the contract was negotiated at a time when inflation rates in Canada and the Argentine were very much lower than they are now. If we had the benefit of the hindsight, of course we would never have entered into that agreement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I can say that we have been able to work out very much better terms, which should be a substantial gain for Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Despite the fact the matter has not been to cabinet, surely the House has a right to know what is the estimated loss under this new renegotiated agreement. The chairman of AECL admitted at least $96 million. Some of us worked out figures closer to $160 million. The figures printed in the press upgrade the original price by $70.5 million. That still leaves a $90 million loss, not $25 million. Surely the people of Canada have a right to know. If the minister is not prepared to tell us now, is he prepared to table in the House all the figures as to the original agreement covering not only the reactor, but the uranium, the parts and the heavy water so that this House will know what is being done with the taxpayers' money with respect to a poorly formulated deal which the government not only goofed in the beginning, but has bungled in the renegotiating?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that when I am in a position to provide the facts to the House, I will do so. I will do that as promptly as I can. However, the hon. member and the House must recognize that until we have an agreement that meets the approval of cabinet, I am not in a position to give any figures.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, can the minister or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs give any information in view of the fact that Argentina has not signed the non-proliferation treaty and has been building an experimental separation plant for the separation of plutonium? With regard to this renegotiated agreement, has Canada asked Argentina to sign and ratify the non-proliferation treaty, and undertaken to dismantle any separation plant it has and guaranteed that it will not purchase a separation plant?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered a question like that earlier this week or last week when he indicated that the bilaternal arrangements which Canada had negotiated with the Argentine were the strictest safeguards in the world and would fully comprehend the kind of point made by the hon. member.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Regardless of whether the minister and the cabinet as a whole have considered the options for alternatives available in respect of the agreement, which I understand has already been initialed by the head of AECL, the head of AECL has supplied the minister with the estimated figures. They are on the minister's desk now. Regardless of whether cabinet has approved of them or not, will the minister kindly give the House now the estimated figures from the head of AECL?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have already given, I am not in a position to do so at this time.

COURT DECISION GIVING BRITISH COLUMBIA JURISDICTION OVER SEABED RESOURCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. What action, if any, does the government propose to take in response to the judicial opinion issued late last week in the British Columbia Supreme Court assigning to the province jurisdiction over the resources of the seabed and the subsoil under the waters separating the mainland from Vancouver Island and also the Queen Charlottes?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are considering the judgment of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia on that reference. No decision as to whether to appeal will be taken until that has been completed.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT DISCOVERED AT SABLE ISLAND—REASON FOR DELAY IN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the controversy surrounding the ownership of offshore mineral rights, especially in the 200 mile jurisdictional zone, and the statement recently by the government leader in the Senate that three discovery wells off Nova Scotia are sufficiently promising to warrant step-out drilling, can the minister inform the House whether he has any knowledge of the quantity of oil and gas discovered in the Sable Island area? If so, in view of the announced energy shortage, just when can we expect further development of these resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to provide any finite figures. I have received information which indicates that the prospects are promising. Indeed, I hope to go to the Nova Scotia shelf myself this weekend and talk with some of the operators in the area, discuss the conduct of the particular drilling operations undertaken by Shell Canada with the assistance of PetroCanada and to discuss with the premier of Nova Scotia some of the reserves and resources which may be off Sable Island, as well as the whole process of trying to come together quickly with an agreement between the maritime provinces and the federal government governing the administration and the sharing of the potential resources on the Scotian shelf and eastern offshore.

Mr. Crouse: Since the technique of drilling for oil and gas in offshore areas is well established in the Gulf of Mexico, the Arabian Gulf and other areas, will the minister inform the House the reasons for the delay in developing the Sable Island wells, one of which is estimated could produce something like 15,000 barrels of condensate daily, including 2,000 barrels of high quality oil?

Mr. Gillespie: These decisions, of course, have been made in the past by private sector companies for their own reasons. Undoubtedly some of them have been inhibited by the fact that agreement has not been reached between the maritime provinces and the federal government. It has been one of my priorities to urge a settlement and I hope we will be able to proceed very quickly to reach a settlement respecting the administration and sharing of resources on the east coast. That is my priority.

PROPOSAL BY NOVA SCOTIA CONCERNING AID IN REDUCING COST OF ELECTRICITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who some months ago, I think, received a secret and confidential proposal from the government of the province of Nova Scotia regarding assistance for power rates. Has the government of Canada reached a decision with respect to that proposal, is the decision favourable or unfavourable, and if a decision has not been made, when will one be made?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made at the present time, but I can tell the hon. member that the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate to the House whether there are any discussions planned between the government of Nova Scotia or the governments of the maritime provinces and the minister's department on the minister's proposal regarding possible ways of reducing the cost of electric power in the maritime provinces? If so, when will the discussions be held?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be familiar with the prososal I made to the maritime premiers orally. I have followed that up with a letter inviting the participation of the maritime premiers with the federal government in a study, financed if necessary 100 per cent by the federal government. I will be meeting this weekend, I expect, with at least two of the premiers of maritime Canada and I hope we will be able to advance significantly the terms of such a study.

PROVINCIAL PROPOSAL RELATING PAYMENTS FOR HEALTH AND EDUCATION TO GROWTH OF FEDERAL REVENUES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, and it is a follow-up of questions asked earlier this afternoon with respect to the meeting yesterday of the provincial finance ministers and the Minister of Finance. My question relates to the federal government's proposal to tie its cash payments to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education to increases in the gross national product. In view of the criticism of this proposal on the ground that it poses a threat to the maintenance of existing national standards, something that was of great importance originally to the federal government, is the federal government giving consideration to the suggestion by Ontario and other provinces that such payments relate instead to the growth rate of federal government revenues?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should say that the hon. gentleman inadvertently stated the position of a number of other governments, including Saskatchewan, which is related to the expenditure level. The basic principles that we would apply in this regard are that these are established programs, that the cost elements are now well known, and experience over the last several years has shown that on average they have stayed within the rate of growth of the gross national product.

There is this more fundamental question, that is to say whether, if federal expenditures are to be limited, as the government has stated is its intention, there should be a reduction in other expenditures so that expenditures on these particular programs should go up really irrespective of the actual cost experience. We think it is reasonable to expect that costs in this regard will be related to the gross national product, as they will be in other areas, and in that sense that is the basis of the total proposal that we have put forward.

CUSTOMS

LACK OF FACILITIES AT SAINTE-FOY AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Could he tell the House why his department recently issued new administrative guidelines under which for all practical purposes it will henceforth be impossible to ensure the customs clearance for flights with over 100 passengers at the Sainte-Foy airport in Quebec City, and could he tell whether anyone has looked into the impact of these guidelines on the economy of the Quebec City region whose most important industry is tourism, and whether his department plans to reexamine that matter?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, because of the representations of the hon. member for Montmorency, there is now a study under way on the facilities at the Quebec City airport. Unfortunately, the dimension of the current facilities limits us to a maximum capacity of 100 persons. You will understand that it is difficult to use the airport when we have 350 passengers.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES ON ISSUANCE OF TECHNICAL BULLETINS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as Minister of State for Science and Technology. The public is really aware of the radical surgery that has been performed on research grants in this country. The National Research Council is now sending out technical bulletins in only one of the official languages. Is this the result of the cutbacks in research? Is this the way they are affecting the National Research Council?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this and I will be glad to make inquiries.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGING BAN ON PUBLICATION OF EVIDENCE GIVEN AT PRELIMINARY HEARINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It relates to a statement he made with reference to the ban on publication of evidence given at preliminary hearings, with which I agree. If I may just refer to a comment of the minister, he said he was concerned about the way the publication ban at preliminary hearings can backfire, wounding innocent third parties. Does the minister intend to change the law in this regard, since the publication of evidence given at preliminary hearings does directly affect third parties. As one distinguished parliamentarian said, people in public life swim in the nude.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to determine what change in the law should be made in that the law is quite explicit that there should be no publication. We are examining proposals resulting from my work with the Law Reform Commission and the provincial attorneys general for some amendments regarding pretrial procedures. The rule against publication and how it should be enforced could be re-examined along with them, but as I have already said the law is quite explicit. There should be no publication and it is rather difficult to know how to express it more forcefully than it is already expressed.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice says that the law is quite clear. Will he make it quite clear whether it is his intention to tighten the law in this regard or to bring in certain penalties in cases where there is disclosure which should not be made, or is the minister going to do away with the ban altogether.

Mr. Basford: Penalties are already provided, Mr. Speaker, and there is also a prohibition against publication when so ordered by a judge. Therefore, as I say, it is rather difficult to know what further steps to take. I will be happy to review the matter in terms of clarifying either the law's intent and purpose or the penalties associated with a breach of the law. If the hon. member has any suggestions to make in this regard I would welcome them.

MULTICULTURALISM

INQUIRY IF VALUE TO TAXPAYER PARAMOUNT CONSIDERATION IN ADMINISTERING PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State; I gave his office notice last evening of the nature of the question. It arises out of a great deal of unfavourable publicity given to the administration of multicultural grants in London which for some reason the Secretary of State administers rather than the Department of Labour. An employee in the minister's department, one Carol Aziz, in referring to grant recipients who had not completed the program for which funding had been received, is quoted as saying that "people have a tendency to bite off more than they can chew" and that "their expectations are often too high". She is then reported to have said that it is not important whether taxpayers have gotten their money's worth. My question to the minister is whether it is his department's value to the taxpayer is the paramount consideration in the administration of this program and, if so, has this policy been communicated clearly to those in his department who administer the program?

[Mr. Friesen.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a grant under the multicultural program which was assessed by officers of the department, who recommended its approval. I think the information in the article—I believe we are referring to the same one—is erroneous. There was no time frame involved. It was an assessment in the crafts area in multicultural communities for internal purposes, in terms of the future allocations of grants in this area. It has been helpful and we have utilized the findings of the people who worked on the survey in London.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Mrs. Aziz is also reported to have said that although she hands out public moneys, her first responsibility is not to the public but to the organizations which receive grants. I would ask the minister whether Mrs. Aziz was stating departmental policy accurately and, if not, would the minister like to take this opportunity to correct that statement if in fact it was correctly reported in the press?

● (1500)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member may be overly critical of this particular civil servant. Of course, it is the policy that our officers and civil servants generally are responsible to the government which they serve and which, in turn, is responsible to the people. In addition to which, she is obviously supposed to respond to and monitor the dealings of the groups for which she is responsible. I do not believe it is entirely necessary to put it on the basis of first and second priorities. She can serve both purposes without contradicting one by the other.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED STUDY TO MAKE MONCTON OR TORONTO RESPONSIBLE FOR INSTRUMENT FLIGHTS AT DORVAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Would the minister be prepared to tell the House whether he himself or one of his departmental staff has ordered a quick study on technical means to make Toronto or Moncton responsible for the air communications for instrument flights now landing at Dorval?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there were some standby steps taken to consider what would happen if for a variety of reasons there was a strong feeling within Dorval that there was a need to control traffic from other points. I should like to stress that any reference to that was totally in respect of dealing with an emergency situation. There is no intention of removing the basic control position from the Montreal towers.

DRUGS

SUGGESTION SALE OF GLUE BE CONTROLLED AND ADOPTION OF INFORMATION PROGRAM OF EFFECTS OF INHALING GLUE VAPOUR

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to whom I gave advance notice.

In view of the increasingly generalized habit among young people to inhale glue vapours as a substitute for stronger drugs, does the minister intend to launch an education campaign directed at the young to protect them against this habit which is extremely dangerous for their health, or does he intend to amend the Food and Drugs Act to ensure stricter control on the sale of glue and similar substances, particularly to teenagers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there already exists a substantial public education campaign concerning drugs as a whole, be it alcohol, tobacco and other substances recognized as specific drugs, or even drug substitutes, such as glue vapours, gasoline fumes and the like.

Our studies seem to indicate that it would not be wise to concentrate a very substantial program on a specific substance, particularly substitutes in this case, because this problem seems to surface only occasionally in limited areas, and further there is a risk of creating an even greater interest in the substance concerned.

Finally, with regard to controls, all aspects have been studied in considerable depth, and because of the very large number of substitutes, whether it is glue, gasoline, paint or other substances, it appears to be practically impossible to impose restrictive controls on all those substances.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had hoped to be recognized during the question period, but I understand the difficulty and I do not say that in any way except to indicate why I am rising now. This involves a question that has arisen before involving parliamentary secretaries to ministers.

Your Honour will recall that I raised a question about the propriety of the number of parliamentary secretaries being paid out of the public purse at the time of the resignation of the hon. member for Papineau as the minister of consumer and corporate affairs and his portfolio responsibilities being transferred to the Postmaster General. If the Minister of Justice will check back on the record, he will see that I dealt with the statutory provisions specifically at that time. At that time there was one parliamentary secretary too many for the ministry. Now, the hon. member for Langelier, the former minister of the environment, has resigned that portfolio and is a private member of this House. His portfolio responsibilities, in an acting way, have gone to the Minister of State (Fisheries).

Under the statute as it stands in relation to the number of parliamentary secretaries, which relates to the number of ministers and not ministries, there are now two too many parliamentary secretaries drawing upon the public purse.

An hon. Member: Twenty-six too many.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In response to the comment from beside me—someone says there are perhaps many more too many—perhaps legally speaking there are two too many. I raised the matter seriously before. At that time I was thanked by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council for bringing the matter to the attention of the ministry. It was compounded in the first case by the delay in relation to the parliamentary secretary to the now hon. member for Papineau. It has now been compounded because of the situation arising twice. Quite frankly, I do not know how these gentlemen are being paid or how they are being paid properly.

Quite frankly, I have refrained from bringing the matter to the attention of the Auditor General of Canada, but I intend to do so if there is not some undertaking from the ministry that an investigation will be made shortly, with a report to the House in respect of this matter.

I am glad the Minister of Justice is in his place, as this matter involves the interpretation of a statute. There is a difficulty here in that somehow moneys are being paid improperly, if I am right. I do not know whether there has been an investigation, but moneys will have to be paid back.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I should think the parliamentary secretaries themselves ought to be pressing the government for some answer to this conundrum in which they have been placed by the neglect of the government, in this case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On the previous occasion when this subject matter was raised I gave a preliminary indication that it was my opinion this was a legal matter as opposed to a procedural one. My opinion has not changed and, quite frankly, I do not think the opinion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has changed, either. I think he is making allusions to what we clearly understand embraces a legal problem, nonetheless an important one. I will hear briefly from the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I recall very well having dealt with this matter at the time, but in dealing with it there was one point I forgot to mention which I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members at this time. It is at the time when there is no minister and no acting minister that the necessity for a parliamentary secretary is felt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Hon. members in all parties are, I am sure, ready to agree that in fact the behaviour of parliamentary secretaries since the beginning of this particular session has been exemplary in the way they have handled questions on behalf of their ministers, which, indeed, justifies twice the salary they are presently drawing.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the response by the Minister of Finance when I asked if he was prepared to table the documents that were made available at the meeting yesterday of federal-provincial ministers of finance. He did, indeed, reply that this sizeable document would in fact be tabled when it had been translated. I must express my concern—indeed, my amazement, sir—that documents as important as this in respect of a federal-provincial conference of finance ministers should have been available in only one of our two official language. I think the minister should be given a chance to explain.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked for the floor on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). To a question that I put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on July 5 regarding his intention to appoint a member from eastern Quebec to replace the Minister of Environment, he replied the following which is reported on page 15010 of Hansard and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member knows that under an order in council there is an acting deputy minister and an acting deputy minister to the acting deputy minister. Thus, the position is not vacant now.

Mr. Speaker, I am rising on the same point of order as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), concerning parliamentary secretaries and their usefulness. If the Prime Minister had deemed the parliamentary secretary was necessary or useful, he would have answered me differently. I think that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is valid since the Prime Minister has himself recently given more power to civil servants than to the people's elected representatives to the House, namely parliamentary secretaries. Consequently I am led to believe, like the member for Grenville-Carleton, that taxpayers' money is being squandered in view of the fact that when it comes to administering their departments deputy ministers and acting deputy ministers wield more power than the ministers themselves. This is why the Prime Minister is not replacing the former Minister of Environment.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PRAIRIE FARM ADMINISTRATION RELATING TO PERSONALLY OWNED VEHICLES

Motion No. 102—Mr. Towers:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, travelling expense accounts, wage claim reports, fieldmen's work reports and mileage diaries for personally-owned vehicles between Prairies Farm Administration employees in the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Prairie Farm Administration offices in the Financial Building at 13th and Scarth Streets, Regina, Saskatchewan, for the period May 8 to July 8, 1974.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this motion is acceptable, with reservations, being that documents pertaining to charges laid against an employee will not be produced as the charges have resulted in a stay of proceedings entered by the Crown on December 2, 1975.

The activities of the Prairie Farm Administration have been phased out and all essential records were transferred to the Public Archives. Material such as expense accounts, wage claims, work reports and mileage diaries are available, but internal correspondence was destroyed in the process of closing out the office.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, July 6, 1976, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motion No. 13 (Mr. Reynolds).

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, at the close of our sitting last evening I was speaking on this amendment which calls for the deletion of section 214 of the Criminal Code dealing particularly with the substitution of life imprisonment for first-degree murder, which would mean a period of 25 years in the case of a person convicted of the murder of a police officer, a prison guard or a correctional officer. As I said, I support the amendment because if this clause were deleted we would go back to the law as it was.

I pointed out last evening that an undertaking was given by the government 2½ years ago. It was a promise, a commitment to the House, to parliament and to the country that if parliament would buy the government's part retention and part abolition bill, that would be the policy. Notwithstanding the commitment that was made, that commitment and promise has not been kept and here we are, 2½ years later, again arguing the same question.

Because I support this amendment I have a few statistics I should like to place on the record. The number of prison guards killed since 1961 totals six. The number of persons who were convicted and sentenced for a first murder, subsequently jailed and who committed a second murder in Canada in the last 10 or 15 years, is five. The number of policemen killed on duty since 1961 is 57. The number of custodial officers murdered since 1961 is six. Yet we have heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) at the committee level and in this House on occasion deny that there are any records of second murders.

What protection do the guards and the correctional officers have when, as I pointed out last night and the Solicitor General admitted at the committee level, these people, given a sentence of 25 years, may, with an escort, be released from prison at any time? What is to stop the guard and the escort being knocked off? We had a case of a person being escorted from one jail to another who asked to go to the bathroom, where he obtained a gun and then killed the police officer when he was being escorted from one institution to another. I support this amendment because I think it is very important.

The last thought I would leave is that I am shocked to think of the situation in which we are placing police officers, guards and correctional officers. I pointed out the number who have lost their lives, without adequate compensation for their families who suffer because of either the first or second murder these people commit. I ask the Solicitor General, if this bill should pass on third reading, to conduct an honest and responsible review in an effort to see that the families of the police officers, guards and correctional officers, who are victims, are compensated for the death of the provider.

Surely it is not too much to ask that greater attention be paid to victims rather than to the accused, contrary to what those liberals, with a small "l", wish, which is to change the law and always favour the accused rather than the victim. I have only spoken once in this debate and once on the amendments, and I leave that thought, through you, Mr. Speaker, with the Solicitor General. I am not talking about compensation amounting only to peanuts. I am talking about compensation which would really compensate the family of the victim whose life was lost violently at the hands of people released from prison who commit murder for the second time under the law as it exists now and as it may exist if this bill is given third reading and passed.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief interjection on amendment

No. 13 moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), and I might say it is a privilege to follow my illustrious colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who is a very learned lawyer and certainly knows what he is talking about when he speaks on behalf of the great majority of English Canada.

Certainly, a great many of us are well aware of the serious position in which law officers, policemen and prison guards will find themselves if Bill C-84 becomes law, because they know that their lives will be in greater danger than at present even though there is now a form of abolition until, I believe, December, 1977.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North stated most forcefully, policemen and prison guards are wondering what the Parliament of Canada will do to protect them. We have all received a great many letters, and if most of them are similar to those I have been receiving from my riding, the overwhelming majority is in favour of capital punishment, or retention of it in some form. This morning, on the "Canada A.M." television program, I saw the hangman's rope depicted and I wondered why we were not shown something to portray the other side of the coin, the victim's point of view. Let me say, forcefully, that this hanging bill, as it has been called, should be called the capital punishment bill.

An hon. Member: That would be inaccurate.

Mr. Darling: Does the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) wish to ask a question?

Mr. Caccia: Not yet.

Mr. Darling: All right. I had the privilege of speaking on an amendment last Monday regarding high treason, and I was subjected to heckling by the hon. member. If he wishes to speak, let him come forward and I will do my best to answer his questions. What I was trying to state is that instead of concentrating on the idea of hanging, the bill should concentrate on the death penalty, because a great many of us who are retentionists are violently opposed to the archaic and gruesome form of capital punishment adopted in this country, namely, hanging. We believe that a criminal who has been found guilty of first-degree murder, without any extenuating circumstances which would lead the judge or jury to advocate mercy, should be removed from society as painlessly and as quickly as possible. I have stated categorically that a drug could be administered, a needle could be given, and that would be the end of it. But no, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) down we keep hearing about hanging, hanging and hanging. I received a copy of a sermon—

Mr. Blaker: What about your own party leader?

Mr. Darling: I have answered that question before.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has the floor and I suggest he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Darling: Our own party leader, you ask? This happens to be a free vote on this side of the House at least, and you cannot say the same of your side. Are you going to tell me that 29 cabinet ministers—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. member please address the chair?

Mr. Darling: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. They certainly cannot sell me that bill of goods, that the entire cabinet, deep down in their conscience, every damn one of them, is an abolitionist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Nor can they sell me the idea that all the parliamentary assistants are also abolitionists. So far as our leader is concerned, let me say, in answer to my illustrious colleague's interjection, that certainly our leader is not voting the way the great majority of us are, and I am well aware of that; but at least he is doing it on his own and with a low profile. He has made his position known, but he has not been using the big stick, as the Prime Minister has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Because he hasn't got one.

Mr. Blaker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. member who is speaking would permit me to ask him a question on a point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Darling: It is a point of order, not a question, he says.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is a point of order first, then a question. Would the hon. member permit it?

Mr. Blaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: He already has.

Mr. Blaker: Apparently there is some misunderstanding as to whether we are under any constraint to vote one way or another. I should like to point this out to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling)—and I will pose a question to him so that he can answer it in due course—with regard to whether or not some force is applied on this side of the House to vote one way or another. Because his leader has chosen to have the guts and the courage to go against the wish of the population as demonstrated in the polls on the subject of the death penalty, I would like to know whether the hon. member is prepared to indicate if there is some kind of force on individual hon. members in the House to vote one way or another, because I do not believe there is.

An hon. Member: Sure there are.

Mr. Epp: Ask your whip.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure you would state categorically that that is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No, it is a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): As I pointed out, the hon. member was asking a question, not making a point of order.

Mr. Darling: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In answer to my colleague's question I should like to state that he could not possibly state that in their case there is no constraint. After all, there are a good many members on the government side—I believe 37, if my memory serves me right—who voted against the government's bill.

Mr. Blaker: There is no constraint on this side.

Mr. Darling: Just a minute. There are different types of constraint. You can beat someone up and have him covered with marks, and all the rest of it; or you can do it in a gentle way with a rubber hose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we are getting into debate.

Mr. Darling: That is what I am trying to do. What I am suggesting, of course, is that certainly it is a free vote in parliament; there is no question about it. We saw a so-called free vote here the other day. When the Prime Minister stood up, he stood up alone, and all at once he raised his hands—

● (1530)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Yes. He just raised his hands, and they rose as one. So that was the free vote!

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understand that the rules of this House do not permit hon. members anywhere in this assembly to seek out the motives of hon. members for the way they vote. If I am correct in that understanding, and if the rules of the House do not permit any hon. member on any side or of any rank to attack the motives of hon. members who vote, then I suggest that the hon. member for "something" Davenport is completely out of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: No, it is Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Blaker: I suggest that when I vote, I do so with the freedom of my own conscience, and I do not want any hon. member of this House, on the hon. member's side or on my side, telling me that I have been forced to vote a certain way. I have not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would like to quote Standing Order 35 which reads as follows:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now, if I could get back to my brief remarks—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest that the hon. member should withdraw those last remarks.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, on that basis I will certainly withdraw my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What a "darling."

Mr. Darling: However, let me qualify that. Some hon. members opposite, who are looking with a very hungry eye at the front benches, might have second thoughts, if you know what I mean. If the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) will keep quiet for a few moments and let me finish my remarks, I want to go, along with 17 of my hon. colleagues on this side, to view the Olympic site and see where much of our money is going. We will be leaving at four o'clock. Is that all right?

If I could go back to what I was going to say, Reverend C. W. Sorley of Stouffville, Ontario, pointed out in a sermon:

> The Prime Minister says, "if we retain hanging somebody will get hung." Why is he so concerned about murderers and seemingly little concerned about decent citizens?

The Reverend Sorley is certainly a man of compassion, but he has more compassion for victims than for criminals. To point out how concerned our policemen are, I have here a brief from the National Police Committee for the Protection of the Citizens which says:

> If the Solicitor General truly believes that neither the state nor any agency nor anyone has the right to take a life, then we must assume that he will shortly propose that all law enforcement officers in Canada be disarmed for fear that they may take a life while in the lawful execution of their sworn duties.

Hon. members are shaking their heads, but who knows what the next directive from the Solicitor General's office will be? This brief continues:

> What preparations have been made by the minister to house the increased numbers of murderers who will be sentenced to long prison terms if Bill C-84 is passed in its present form? We are told that our present prisons are overcrowded, archaic and nothing more than institutions of enforced idleness. How will these institutions and prison authorities possibly cope with the influx of more prisoners serving longer terms?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is a very important one because, if I understood the hon. gentleman properly a moment ago, in answer to the hon. member on this side he said that it was very important that he finish his speech right now because he and 17 others are going to visit Montreal. There are only four or five hon. members opposite holding the House here because of a bunch of amendments upon which a vote could have already been taken. Either we are for or against capital punishment. Hon. members opposite are taking a holiday and only a few remain to keep the House going. I believe that is most unfair. The hon. member is the one who said it, nobody else. It is costing the taxpayers a heck of a lot of money to keep this House going.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): That is a matter of debate and not a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is a point of order, because they are going on holidays.

Mr. Darling: What do you mean, going on holidays?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You said yourself that you are going to visit the Olympics.

Mr. Darling: As a member of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, which approved the Olympics in the first place, or at least the coins, stamps and the lottery—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is a farce that you should say that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. We are debating motion No. 13 and I suggest that the hon. member get back to the motion.

Mr. Epp: That was one of your better interventions, Joe.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Darling: I wish the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore would let me finish.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, with the very kind permission of the hon. member I rise on a point of order. I referred to him as the hon. member for Davenport, and I was quite wrong. I know now that I should be referring to him as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). I would be glad if the record would reflect that, and I thank the hon. member for permitting my intervention.

Mr. Darling: The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) sits immediately in front of the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore. I thought the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore would at least know that he has represented Davenport and, I must say, represented it very well for a number of years. We will be going through the riding of the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore at around six o'clock this evening.

If I may repeat what I said before with respect to this very important amendment, the policemen of this country wonder where the government will find enough jails. The Solicitor General probably has in his mind, and probably in his estimates, beautiful, palatial, long-term residences for hardened criminals so that they will have a very enjoyable incarceration—and the taxpayers will be paying for that. Deterrence is a reasonably important thing which must be emphasized, especially with regard to killers of policemen and prison guards. An executed murderer cannot murder a second time.

About six weeks ago I said that former governor Ronald Reagan was an abolitionist and during his term of office as governor he commuted the sentences of 12 murderers. They were let out into society, and those 12 murderers committed another 22 murders. If that is not proof that capital punishment would have saved a great many innocent lives, I do not know what is. Some hon. members say that it is terrible to exact the ultimate penalty. Let me tell them that if we are to protect our policemen, prison guards and those in authority looking after prisoners, certainly this amendment should pass. I hope that when this parliament votes, whether it be on Thursday night or at a later date, it will give serious consideration to this amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words to support the motion before us. Recently I had the opportunity to meet a convict who was on parole. Of course the capital punishment issue was raised and I wish to tell you the essence of what this man told me: He said: I favour the amendment to the Criminal Code. I think it amounts to abolishing capital punishment. Bill C-84 proposes to abolish capital punishment and replace it by a period of imprisonment for 25 years. If I am given the choice between capital punishment and 25 years in jail, I shall choose jail in the hope of escaping. Then he told me that his trade was theft, armed robbery and that over a few years he had committed several thefts in different areas of the country and made more than $1 million. He added: I enjoy a certain legal immunity following a court judgment exonerating me of all blame for my involvement in those crimes. You will readily understand, he said, that I am for the abolition of capital punishment and for firearms control as family men and other businessmen will no longer be allowed to have firearms. They will not be able to defend themselves against us who will continue to use firearms. Of course the legislation will not say explicitly that murderers can keep their weapons notwithstanding the regulations, but it is implied as our trade requires the uncontrolled possession of firearms.

This is why syndicates of professional killers exert pressure on hon. members for the abolition of capital punishment. You will also understand, he added, that the people in our trade must be free to operate without the threat of capital punishment.

And we must of necessity have firearms, and also some kind of protection, assurances against those who would not let us take their property or their lives. Contract killers have a right to earn a living without hindrance, don't they, Mr. Solicitor General? I see he is absent for the moment.

Killers and thieves are supported by revolutionaries and outlaws, who also require guns. Once firearms have been controlled and capital punishment abolished by Parliament, killers and thieves of all kinds finally will be able to breathe. In countries where firearms are controlled and capital punishment abolished, professional criminals are quite prosperous. They enjoy complete safety. That is why professional criminals spare neither efforts nor money to ensure speedy passing of firearms control and abolition.

Firearms control and abolition go hand in hand. Through abolition, routine perpetration of theft and murder will become easier. That is what the government can expect if this legislation goes through. Mr. Speaker, certainly it is only human that people get emotional during a murder trial. The majority of people tend to react violently when a criminal gets a sentence out of keeping with what the community expects. Recently the Solicitor General, the Hon. Warren Allmand, went on record to state he would not want at any price to be associated in any way with a hanging. This was a debasing act, he said, which did not solve in any way the problem of crime in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, while agreeing that the reinstatement of capital punishment will not solve every crime problem in Canada, the question we must address ourselves is this: Will reinstatement in effect solve the problem for some? Indeed, Mr. Speaker, some time ago in Oshawa, a young man shot his parents and then gave himself up to the police, but he was still holding his loaded gun and was ready to fire at the slightest movement of the policeman who arrested him. During the interrogation he was asked: Why did you not shoot the policeman? He answered quite frankly that he simply did not want to be hanged.

Personally, I am satisfied that on various occasions several police officers or prison guards were saved because, in principle, the death penalty is applied for the murder of a police officer or a prison guard; I think that is the reason. If we could better plan the operations of our rehabilitation institutions and of our penitentiaries, perhaps we could improve and correct several imperfections or problems. Of course, Mr. Speaker, when the Solicitor General of Canada, the hon. Warren Allmand, presented this bill, he was not the only one to support that opinion, quite the contrary.

He feels supported by the whole cabinet and by a good majority of the Liberal caucus. He is more strongly supported by his colleagues than by the Canadian population. As a member of the Canadian Parliament, in all justice, I think that it is undeniable that the present government should take into account that 81 per cent of the Canadian population is in favour of maintaining the death penalty.

The Solicitor General of Canada says that the death penalty will not act as a deterrent for potential murderers. This may be true to a certain extent. But long prison terms will have very little deterring effect, and this logic were carried to extremes, one would have to conclude that criminals should be rewarded.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that many crimes are not premeditated and that those responsible are not hanged for such offences. We, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, want the death penalty to be applied only in cases where premeditation is clearly established. Moreover, the Solicitor General claims that the death penalty does not reduce at all the number of murders in Canada. In this regard, let me point out that since 1962, when the last hanging took place in Canada, murders have increased by 42 per cent, or 1.7 per cent per 100,000 inhabitants and 2.4 per cent for the total population.

In my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, by voting for Bill C-84, the members and ministers of this illustrious assembly are giving future murderers who are condemned to life imprisonment a free hand to kill all those who stand between them and freedom. Under this bill, someone facing life imprisonment, either for armed robbery or for any other crime liable to this sentence, would actually benefit from killing the incriminating witness or witnesses or the policeman. This action would have the advantage of enabling him to escape without any risk of increasing the sentence he must serve. The myth that a murderer rarely repeats his crime may be true when the murder is committed on the spur of the moment, but it is something else when a murder is committed by a professional killer.

If the death penalty were maintained, those would be the ones to be punished and they would deserve it. Moreover, the Solicitor General claims that murderers should not suffer the death penalty. But what alternative solution does he propose? That policemen and prison guards be better trained? Is the Solicitor General of Canada suggesting that all the policemen or prison guards who died on duty were not well trained? To this, I would reply that in most large cities such as Detroit and Montreal policemen are very well trained and armed, but violence is on the increase in these cities.

Moreover an effective gun control system, such as that proposed in Bill C-83, does not give more protection. On the contrary, its sole effect is to restrict the freedom and the rights of honest people. I really believe that the present legislation should be applied more severely to criminals and outlaws. Gun control might reduce certain types of violence, but in my humble opinion, it will have no effect on cold-blooded killers. Our social and economic security programs no longer truly meet present needs. A proof of this is that in the last few years, crime has been increasing. I believe we should review our way of life and take action to ensure that authority at all levels is respected, and to that end, we should start by applying the death penalty in Canada to people convicted of premeditated murder.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, this issue demands our calm reflection. First, let it be said that when the people of a nation make their position on any issue known, there is some kind of emotional underpinning to their position. When it is said that 80 per cent of Canadians favour capital punishment, I think it can be said, equally validly, that most people are not asking for the imposition of capital punishment per se but are saying that they have lost faith in the law and order system of this country.

Consequently, since Canadians across this country have lost faith in our ability to maintain law and order and ask for capital punishment, we are brought face to face with the fact that the government has done nothing to make people feel that if capital punishment is removed from the statute books, they will be secure.

What do the people of this country face? On the one hand they face the prospect of the abolition of the death penalty; on the other hand there is no indication of any identifiable concern with regard to the increasing incidence of violent crime in this country.

The government introduced Bill C-84 as a companion bill to Bill C-83 which was to extend protection to Canadians. It is well known that Canadians do not think Bill C-83 will ensure a greater measure of public security and safety. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) would reinstitute that which the government reneged on during two five-year experimental periods, namely, capital punishment for the murderers of police officers and those engaged in security and guarding roles.

If we consider the situation which faces the people of this country, we must recognize that even if this bill passes there will still be a continuance in this country of a form of capital punishment. Therefore, the fundamental question we face is whether there is to be a trial before the imposition of capital punishment. This question becomes obvious when one considers the unfortunate position in which we may place our police officers. As it is, the government has done little to improve our security and decrease violent crime in this country. It has done nothing to lessen the psychology of crime heightened by television and the movies. It has done nothing with regard to child-abuse laws, and has done little to negate impressions created by the press in sensationalizing crime. Because of lack of government action, if the capital punishment sanction is removed from the statute books we shall live in a law and order vacuum, as I shall soon demonstrate.

Consider how police officers will act. Because they will not be protected, we can expect that policemen, faced with people of intemperate or violent temper, will shoot first and ask questions afterwards. Therefore, even under the new regime of Bill C-84 we shall have a continuation of capital punishment but it will be capital punishment without trial. If we look at the question calmly, we will realize that we are not debating whether or not there is to be capital punishment in this country: we are debating whether or not there is to be a trial, whether we are to continue to extend to people the right to a fair hearing before sentence is imposed. If you weaken the protection afforded to the police forces of this country, it goes without saying that when policemen act under duress, people will be killed. Policemen will obviously want to feel secure and, not having the protection of the law, will shoot first and ask questions afterwards.

The real question at issue is not whether we are to be an abolitionist or retentionist state. The real issue is whether the government has taken the necessary measures to protect us all by way of law and order, has taken those measures which are the prerequisite of abolition of capital punishment. How can you remove the sanction of capital punishment unless you have first removed the threat of violent crime in this country? But the fact is that violent crime in the last ten years has increased over 300 per cent—and violent crimes are reported daily in the press and on radio and television.

I do not argue that Canada should never be an abolitionist state, but I do say that the government could explore at least 50 different avenues for making the social environment of the citizens of this country safer and reducing the incidence of violent crime. Only after crime has been reduced can we become an abolitionist state. If we now remove the death penalty we shall threaten the safety of policemen and cause them to use their weapons more readily in order to protect their own lives. That brings us back to the fundamental question I first raised: Even if this bill passes, we shall continue to have capital punishment, but this time without trial.

The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta does not ask whether we have capital punishment; it asks whether we have due process of law. That is something very fundamental that we should be exercising and talking about at this time. If the government wants to take the position of being an abolitionist state, it must first demonstrate clearly to Canadians that they come first and that law and order against violent crime is intact. What is important is not the question of whether we are abolitionist or retentionist, but whether the people of Canada are being protected. According to statistics, about 80 per cent of Canadians are in favour of retention. That is a reflection of the mood of Canadians about law and order, more than a reflection of their mood about hanging or the death penalty.

According to a survey which I conducted in my constituency, 86.6 per cent are in favour of capital punishment. What is really symbolic is that these Canadians have lost faith in the fact that they are secure in this country. It does not necessarily imply that they want people to be hung or executed in some other form, but that before we disband capital punishment, whatever needs to be done ought to be done. The government must earn the right to be an abolitionist state. They must have a valid reason for taking away the death penalty.

The government has twice brought forward an experiment in five years with capital punishment only for those people who have killed a police officer or a security guard. However, that is a period that has never been honoured. Something which disturbs Canadians very much is that they are being asked to accept a change in law with regard to capital punishment when they note very clearly that for a period of nearly a decade the government has not obeyed its own law. If we are to believe in law, if it is to be a fundamental cornerstone of our democratic society, then surely the government must obey and practice the laws that it puts on the statute books. The fact that the government has ignored its own laws and regulations certainly enhances the distrust of Canadians.

I do not believe in the concept of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." That does not underscore any purpose. We would have a whole nation that is blind and toothless. Those who believe in the notion of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth are really saying, "Do not get angry; get even." We must have a feeling that has some purpose. At the present time there is an eroding of the feeling of security and law and order. Without the protection of the death sentence for those who will kill for the second time in order to escape from an institution, once having been incarcerated for a crime of murder, police and prison guards are in the vulnerable position of having to protect themselves in the psychology of "shoot first and ask questions later." We must underscore the fact that the government needs to earn the right to implement an abolitionist state. We must also recognize the fear that our police officers and prison guards will have.

If this amendment is not passed, capital punishment will not be done away with. It will be simply a case of the due course of law not being followed. Police officers and prison guards in this country will, in more rapid succession, be using their weapons in self-defence. The result will be capital punishment without trial.

The government has an obligation to ensure that we retain intact the symbol of peace and security. In my second reading speech I listed in some detail a number of different aspects that would assist our achieving a situation of peace and security. It is extremely important that we begin to move toward a psychological environment that does away with the threat of violent crime in this country and brings us to a position where police officers and guards can feel a sense of security and will not use their weapons for capital punishment without the due course of law.

I think we can underscore something that has been established over and over again. A negative kind of input or feed into society reflects itself with negative reactions. This has been done with children. It has been demonstrated psychologically that when people are fed negative kinds of information, the relationship of people one to another is usually that of a more violent negative society. It does not take a person with any academic understanding to quickly recognize that Canadian society today is compacted with negative input. The press hunts for the negative. We do not read the news in the papers, hear it over the radio or see it over television: all we get is a portion of the news, that which is negative.

Until there is a concerted effort in this country to emphasize some of the positive activities and relationships within our society, those who are of weakened psychological balance will always try to achieve public attention and recognition from others. Many actions of people are an attempt to gain recognition from their fellow man. If they cannot gain recognition in a positive sense, the struggle to be recognized is so great that they will gain it in a negative sense.

The obligation of government is not to do away with the position that has been long-standing within this country, but to create the kind of society that gives us a sense of peace and security. If they cannot do that, they have no right to bring forward a piece of legislation that attempts to enhance peace and security but undermines and erodes the opinions of Canadians generally that something is being done to offer a real feeling of security in this country.

It is of the utmost importance, I think, that members of parliament recognize that police officers and security guards are placed in a most vulnerable position should the bill pass unamended. We are placing what is the cornerstone of peace and security in this country, namely, our police forces who are in charge of enforcing the law, in extreme jeopardy. Those who write the law are putting those who enforce the law in an uncompromising position. What we owe these people is some symbol to show we support them. But we must do our work first by bringing about a greater degree of security in this country.

We can ruminate on this subject for some time, but as mentioned before in the House there has been much focus upon the architectural designs of our cities. For example, we can demonstrate statistically that if a city of 100,000 people expands to one of one million people, we should expand our police force sixtyfold, not tenfold. As we increase the size of our cities, so the rate of crime increases.

Studies of animals other than the human species have shown that crowding together produces a change in normal behavioural patterns. The Lithwick report on urbanization in Canada discloses that in its founding year of 1867 about 80 per cent of the country was rural, whereas now is it something like 85 per cent urban. The report predicts that 95 per cent of all Canadians will be living in five cities by the year 2000.

Although we recognize the danger of concentrating masses of people within a small area, government policies fail to take account of this. I suggest that the transportation and communication policies of this country are winning out over social policies in terms of social welfare, law and order and simply the happiness of human living. We are bartering away what we call efficiency in communications and transportation so as to save money in one particular pocket, without recognizing that sooner or later we will have to pay the cost in another social sense. The fact of the matter is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Malone: I simply want to add, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the size of cities that increases the crime rate in this country; it is also the architectural design of our cities. Some interesting studies have been made showing that apartment dwellers, especially those in certain designs of apartments, are a stimulus to the crime rate in this country. The very nature of housing and of housing policies in this country reflects the amount of crime that is committed, and as legislators I suggest we should have something more important to do than simply talk about whether we are retentionists or abolitionists.

This bill is removing from society one of the symbols of law and order. It will create a vacuum. I believe that all Canadians would quite willingly accept an abolitionist stance, but only after the government has demonstrated clearly that peace and security is the right of all Canadians, and that the government has put in place the right psychological environment from coast to coast, and from the forty-ninth to the pole, the kind of society in which violence is deterred.

This may sound in some ways as if we are being over optimistic about the role of government and the behaviour of people, but studies made in numerous countries of the world demonstrate that different societies do, in fact, have different rates of crime. Anyone observing the psychology of human behaviour soon recognizes that crime rates do not differ from one country to another simply because the respective populations live in two different countries but rather because the cultures are different. I suggest that Canadian society has got itself on the wrong track. In Canada violence has become entertainment, not only on television, in our movies and in the press, but even in sport and other activities. We enjoy violence.

In summary, what the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is seeking is not a return to capital punishment per se, but is asking the Canadian people, through their members of parliament, whether or not the due process of law should be carried out. If we take away part of our present system of justice and leave a vacuum in its place, one obvious result of this will be that the prison guards in this country will be more trigger-happy. They will have no other choice, since they will have been placed in a position of greater fear. This is why the legislation must be amended. Until we have earned the right to be truly an abolitionist state, this parliament has no right to take away what appears to be, to the policemen of this country, a sense of security. We must first assure our policemen—indeed, all Canadians—that it is safe to live in Canada.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I spoke on second reading of this bill and was not planning to speak on this motion. However, since my position is the complete opposite of that taken by the previous speaker I felt I should make a few comments.

I believe that the murder of a policeman or a prison guard is no more, or no less, important than the killing of a child, a fisherman or any other member of our society. I felt our present legislation was discriminatory in that it provided that only two classes in our society were of importance, in that only if a policeman or prison guard was murdered would capital punishment be carried out. I still feel that this is a discriminatory provision, and the sooner we get rid of the idea that some groups in society are more important than others, the better off we will be.

I believe in the retention of capital punishment, for a variety of reasons, but this is in relation to our whole Canadian society and not just one small part of it. The argument that a job is dangerous could be applied to any so-called dangerous job, such as that of a fireman, a pilot and of various other people in our society; but when they get into those jobs, they get into them with the realization that there are dangers involved. Having accepted those dangers, I do not think there should be further consideration given such as we have had under the legislation I consider to be improper, discriminatory and which in fact makes second-class citizens of those people who are not policemen or prison guards but who have been murdered over the years in Canada and in respect of which capital punishment was not applied. Many of us in this House have felt this way.

What are we now attempting to do? We have a motion before us that would attempt to bring back the same discriminatory practice that has existed and which many of us have decried for very good reason. I believe, in all honesty, that if we look at our society, not only in Canada but throughout the world, we will find that in the last 10, 12 or 14 years there has been a tremendous change and the change has occurred in respect of criminal activity. I think when you and I were growing up, Mr. Speaker, it would have required a very deep search to find a case of hijacking of an aircraft, of kidnapping or of terrorist activity. In order to be pragmatic, one would have to realize that our society has changed in the last 10 or 15 years. It is the duty of parliament to reflect these changes and to ensure that the law-abiding part of our society not only feels secure, but in fact is secure.

The argument in favour of capital punishment for premeditated murder is a very strong one. Anyone who becomes involved with premeditated murder for gain or profit or as a result of organized crime should be dealt with quickly. I am afraid the milk of human kindness in my body runs very low for those people who go out on contract to kill another individual. Again, regardless of who that individual is, whether he be a policeman, a prison guard or just an ordinary citizen, I feel that person should be dealt with most severely. Such individuals must know that if they become involved in that sort of situation, the results will be dramatic, sudden and positive.

As I said earlier, I cannot vote for this particular motion and I trust that my colleagues who are retentionists cannot vote for it because it is discriminatory. It is a motion that would make second-class citizens of a great part of our population. Surely, this parliament must take actions which are non-discriminatory and should not allow a phrase or a principle like "second-class citizen" to occur in legislation. We are all equal in Canada, and the law should apply to all Canadians equally. I do not think we have an elite in society, and for that reason I will vote against this motion.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the amendment of my colleague, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), would strike clause 4 from the bill in that it would introduce into our Criminal Code and our criminal law what is known popularly on television and elsewhere as "murder one" and "murder two". I thought we had escaped that horrible classification. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) seems to take umbrage with the phrase "second-degree murder" in that it makes people second-class citizens. In any event, I could not catch the trend of his argument.

The result of my colleague's amendment would have the effect of maintaining in force section 214 of the Criminal Code. That was the section brought in at the time of the restricted interpretation of capital punishment, in 1967 I think it was. Prior to that, section 214, or its predecessor number, had regard to categories of capital murder and non-capital murder. There was a much wider application under section 214 because at that time it dealt with murder for gain, a killing committed as a result of another violent act such as armed robbery, rape, kidnapping and others, and in addition deliberate poisoning. Poisoning was capital murder for which the penalty was death. We are now back to define defining, again, categories of murder, but not capital murder. No, that would be treasonous, but treasonous in the linguistic sense.

An hon. Member: Treason is out.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, the word "treason" is out because it has an entirely different meaning within the context of this bill. Apparently it would be quite wrong to use "capital" and "non-capital" murder. Heaven preserve us from falling that low! I have been looking with considerable care through the evidence at the committee hearings and, with the greatest respect, there is very little discussion on this subject. Most of it seems to have involved parole. Let us look at some of the problems the courts will have to wrestle with in the future. We must remember that it is not what is said in this chamber, at the committee or by the minister, that will determine for the judges what shall be the interpretation of the statute. Let us read what it says in clause 4. The new section of the Criminal Code will read as follows:

214. (1) Murder is first degree murder or second degree murder.

The new subsection (2) will read:

Murder is first degree murder when it is planned and deliberate.

I suggest to hon. members that the interpretation of the word "planned" will give the courts a good deal of exercise over the years. It is true that new subsection (3) gives one illustration of planned and deliberate murder, and that is the contract murder of one either in the underworld or by the hiring of a killer. That is the deliberate, planned killing of a person. But there still remain a great number of murders that are planned and deliberate. There is the individual who himself hunts and stalks another individual, regardless of the reason, and kills that person. The hunting is planned and the killing is deliberate whether it is accomplished with a gun, a knife, bare hands or a club. How long must the planning take place? I can plan something and do it deliberately within five minutes. That is not done on the spur of the moment; the spur of the moment is the instant reaction.

● (1630)

I recall a case in common law in Britain which caused trouble to the courts because of the definition that exists in respect of the charge of murder where there is no uncontrollable reaction in the individual. There is the example of the husband who discovered he was being cuckold and found another man in his wife's bed, and in a towering rage killed one or both of them. That has been classified as a legitimate defence to a charge of murder and the courts have so held up to the Court of Appeal. On the other hand we have the case of a husband who, being cuckold, lies in wait to spy on his wife and her paramour. They, having come to the home, he sits on a ladder up on the second storey window, looks in, sees the couple in bed, goes down the ladder, goes into the woodshed, gets an axe and then proceeds up the stairs to the room and kills one or both of the parties. This is an actual case, but I do not remember whether one or two persons were killed. That was deemed not to be justifiable homicide because it was not instantaneous. This man had planned to spy and in the event he discovered there was misconduct on the part of his wife and her paramour.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about the offence relating to a Peeping Tom?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It would hardly be in that category. The court held that was not a justifiable homicide. I suggest the courts would have just as difficult a time determining what is planned and deliberate. I expected the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to participate in this debate. I invite the Solicitor General, or the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford), to explain to the House what they mean by the words "planned and deliberate".

There is an example given in subsection 3 of section 214 of the contract murder. That is point number one. Now I shall look at first-degree murder, preserving, in effect, what now is contained in section 214 concerning a police officer, a police constable, and so on. I have always wondered about this, now that we are using private security firms for the maintenance of public peace.

I would want the Solicitor General to say that this includes personnel hired on a temporary basis by a security firm to keep the peace and public order, say at a football or hockey game or at a sale at a department store where security personnel are employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, and are killed. Is it first-degree murder if an employee of a firm hired by the government of Canada to act as a night watchman in a government building is killed in the course of his duty? Those are questions which the law officers of the Crown must explain. It is not satisfactory that they sit, as I would say in French, muets comme une carpe, and expect anyone in the House to approve this legislation without explanation. I ask for that explanation as a lawyer who may be asked to interpret this section for the benefit of the public.

What is the intention of the government in this legislation? Are we to be treated, as we often are treated in the House, with deathless silence? I assure hon. members that I intend to put all these sections through an examination in order to see just what they mean.

In line 6 on page 4, subparagraph (b), we find the second category of individuals the killing of whom is deemed to be first-degree murder. This deals primarily with officials or security officers in a prison or jail. Why is there the designation of "permanent employee"? The person involved might be a temporary employee. He might be a university student who, in a temporary or casual capacity, is carrying out the duties of a security officer in a jail or prison. Such person is not a permanent employee. Is the killing of such a person to fall under subparagraph (c) which refers to a person working in a prison with the permission of the prison authorities and acting in the course of his work therein, or is subparagraph (c) merely to cover social workers and other persons?

● (1640)

Take the case of the hostage incident in New Westminster, for instance, where social workers going into the prison were with the prisoners, were taken hostage and one of them was killed. I would say that such a person, if employed by someone outside such as, say, the correctional service of the government of Canada or of any province, would be covered under subparagraph (c), but I am wondering about the "temporary" employee. I am being careful with the language. I trust we will have the word of the Solicitor General that he will participate in the debate on this clause. I ask for an explanation.

An hon. Member: He is not listening.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know he is not listening. Next—and this was a point which was fully covered in debate yesterday—is the matter of piracy. The Solicitor General did not intervene in the debate to tell hon. members to refer to subclause 5(a) which reads:

Irrespective of whether a murder is planned and deliberate on the part of any person, murder is first degree murder in respect of a person when the death is caused by that person

(a) while committing or attempting to commit an offence under section 76.1 (hijacking aircraft)—

This is the answer to many of the questions that were put yesterday. It is first-degree murder if committed in the attempt of a hijacking and the killing does not have to be planned or deliberate, or in respect of a person when death is caused by that person—again, the consequential death of a plane hijacking or even kidnapping. Then we have first-degree murder, such as in the case in British Columbia where a man who was a convicted rapist has been charged with the murder of a young girl. I will go no further. He has not been tried and he has not admitted the offence. This is all I can say. But he would be charged with murder in the first degree. All murder that is not first-degree is second-degree. That, again, is what I would call legalistic jargon. We already have the provisions for hijacking of aircraft and the penalty therefor, kidnapping, rape, and so forth.

As I have said many times, I do not like section 214(1) as it stands in the Criminal Code. I much prefer the definition that existed prior to the 1967 amendments defining capital and non-capital murder. I do not like the amendment in clause 4 because it does away, by repealing section 214 of the Criminal Code, with the death penalty for murder, either first-degree or any other murder.

Therefore, I ask the House to accept the amendment of my colleague and to reject what I suggest is a very loosely-worded definition of murder in the first-degree when it is planned and deliberate, which is fraught with all sorts of danger in interpretation. I know that if it does become law it will cause difficulties in the courts.

I hold no brief for the particular advantage held by policemen, prison guards or security officers acting in the course of their duty. While their job is much harder, I do not think their lives are any more valuable than those of citizens walking on the streets. To that extent I am not in favour of the continuation of the principle of discrimination in favour of these individuals. In so saying, I do not want to detract in any way from the difficult job they are doing, the danger to which they are exposed and the far greater danger to which they will be exposed when, and if, Bill C-84 should come into force, because from then on it will cost a man nothing to slip a knife into the ribs of a security officer, to shoot a guard or to kill another prisoner, if he is in prison already.

You cannot get a life sentence on top of a life sentence. I suppose that if the individual was in prison for second-degree murder and was serving a short sentence, he could then be charged and convicted of first-degree murder. But then he could go merrily on his way. In my view, clause 4 of Bill C-84 compounds the difficulty. I do not like the present section, 214, but to me it would cause less difficulty than the proposed law. Therefore, I support the amendment of my colleague.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on these very important amendments. I had the opportunity like many others on second reading, to express the wish that Parliament defeat this piece of legislation and at the same time meet the wishes of a large number of Canadians. While respecting the opposing views expressed in this House, I urge all members to consider the importance of our duty towards public opinion. I understand that many members listen to their own conscience, but I also wonder whether we should not take due consideration of the wishes of the majority of Canadians.

These amendments deal particularly with a second capital murder and ask that such a murder be considered as a first degree murder. This should not cause any problem to most members, and the amendment recommending that Parliament retain capital punishment for the murder of police officers and prison guards is a very serious and very important amendment. If we really want to protect society, we must consider this amendment very carefully, and I hope that some amendments for which I should like to commend the movers will be passed. It is unthinkable from the outset that all these amendments be rejected at one fell swoop.

The government introduced a piece of legislation; it has passed second reading and was finally reported from the committee. Some amendments are considered by the House, and their objective is to improve the legislation and to meet a need: public security. Given the circumstances, I dare believe that freedom of expression will make it possible to have some amendments passed.

As so many other hon. members, I should like very much to see the reaction of the government members to these amendments. To consolidate my argument on both amendments, I should like to quote from a letter. Perhaps it has been quoted in the House, but still I want to include it in my comments to remind the Solicitor General of the dangers inherent in going on supporting the bill he is advocating. The members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada sent us a letter. It was addressed to the Solicitor General, and at the same time to hon. members of the House, for their information, and I quote:

> Before the final vote on Bill C-83, we want to ask you to consider, in your soul and conscience, the remarks made on June 15, 1976 by the Prime Minister of Canada in his speech in the House of Commons, as reported on page 14499 of Hansard: "I want to make it very clear that, if a majority of hon. members vote against abolition, some people are going to be hanged. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by this House on this bill.
> As for us, we appeal to your conscience and we take the opposite view of that expressed by Mr. Trudeau by saying that abolitionist would be responsible for all future murders of penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers, and we swear that each time one of these murders is committed, we shall impute them to all those who have supported the abolition of capital punishment.
> Here are a few facts that you should consider in our opinion:
> 1—The irresponsible attitude of penitentiary commissioners and directors before the pressure groups who visit the institutions;
> 2—The lack of proper management by the authorities of most penal institutions in the country;
> 3—The shocking convict classification system which endangers the life of penitentiary employees as well as the life of most convicts who only want to obey the rules they must follow during their prison term;
> 4—The present lack of facilities likely to guarantee the protection and safety of the staff of the penal institutions and of the prisoners against these criminals who have nothing to lose because of the 25 years of imprisonment they would have to serve under Bill C-83.
> For these reasons, the Hon. Warren Allmand, Solicitor General of Canada, who did not have the courage to reveal these facts to the members of the House of Commons, should, in all conscience, resign his ministerial responsibilities since he has lost the confidence of all penitentiary employees and all law enforcement officers in Canada.

It is still Mr. Caouette, the Secretary Treasurer of the Association who is speaking:

We urge you, in your heart of hearts, to consider the safety of your family and that of penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers while reflecting on these words: "We want everyone to clearly understand that if most members of Parliament vote against the retention of the death penalty, people will be murdered. The death of these people would then be a direct result of the negative decision made by the House of Commons on this bill."

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this letter is extremely important. That is an appeal made by those who are responsible for maintaining authority in our institutions. And I feel that those remarks should give us cause for serious reflection and prompt us into supporting the amendment we are advocating today.

I would believe that most members will understand the position in which those who are responsible for security in our institutions and in our country generally find themselves, and one only has to consider what has been going on those last few years to understand. As recently as a week ago, I think, a Montreal newspaper reported that a young Montreal police officer checking on an apartment in Montreal had been shot in the chest quite unhesitatingly. That is the kind of protection we get from this government.

They have introduced a piece of legislation which, far from giving us additional security, is of enormous concern to the population. Is there need to recall also, Mr. Speaker, that they do not dare hold a referendum to know what is the public opinion since they already know that Canadians would favour retention of capital punishment, bearing in mind the circumstances we are all aware of.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I know that it is a question that has to be resolved deep in one's conscience and I respect everybody's position. I would like to be sure that the government members did not take that position merely to save the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister. I suggest that we have reasons to wonder, after all the comments and discussions we have had with various members of this House.

Once again, I am not assuming that anyone is dishonest. I believe the issue is important enough that no hon. member should take a decision concerning this legislation for the sole purpose of saving the Solicitor General's neck or defending government policy. I think I am right in asking that this issue be considered in the light of much more solid reasons than those I have just mentioned.

We are also often reminded of the following commandment: Thou shalt not kill. I have on hand some comments, some information given to me by a priest who is not reluctant to give his opinion and information to the members of this House, who were very happy to receive it. He says clearly:

While I am writing this, our members in the House of Commons are discussing the advisability of retaining or abolishing capital punishment . . . What will be the situation when this article will be published?

I would like to submit a few comments in favour of the retention of capital punishment.

I know different views were expressed from all sides. I think it is my responsibility to bring forward certain arguments presented by someone who is, after all, a parish priest in Lévis county. I quote:

(a) I point out that by "retention of capital punishment", I do not mean retention of hanging, but this: Anyone who criminally and voluntarily kills another person is liable to expiate his crime through the sacrifice of his own life if he is recognized as actually and legally responsible for this crime unless it has been committed by accident (manslaughter) or in case of self-defence.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that those remarks are perfectly related, at least to the group of people we wish to protect through the amendment before us. I continue:

(c) The retention of capital punishment is not a matter of revenge, but it is legal reparation of the most serious crime and is also aimed at protecting the life of the people in the interest of public weal and order.

Those are the reasons given by this parish priest for the retention of capital punishment:

1—The inestimable price of life and its protection require the retention of capital punishment.

2—The Holy Bible says in Genesis 9,6: "Who so sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" and, in Exodus 21,23: "And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life".

3—The Christian theology always recognized to the state the right to inflict capital punishment for instance in case of murder and this because of the invaluable price of life and for its protection and the protection of the whole society, this fair reparation is in the spirit of God and the Holy Bible.

4—The Council of Trent says that the legitimate authority that condemns a murderer to death not only is not guilty of murder, but eminently obeys the fifth commandment that forbids murder.

5—The Old Testament says in Exodus 21, 12: "He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death".

I continue, Mr. Speaker, because I think that those comments should make us think. They might also relieve some consciences.

The Catholic Church always taught that the state has the right to apply capital punishment for a serious crime, like murder, and this to protect peace and security.

Christ himself said so to Pilate who told him: Do you not know that I have the authority to release you or crucify you? And Christ answered: You would have no authority over me if it was not given to you from above, that is to say by God. The state has the right to inflict capital punishment.

It was not a mere nobody who said this, Mr. Speaker.

6—St. Tomas Aquinas teaches not only that is it permissible but that it is necessary to punish some criminals with death to protect society and for the good of all.

And the fear of a possible error concerning the real criminal is no reason to ignore thoses principles, no more so that an accidental error in an operation would justify the scrapping of that operation which might already have been very helpful . . . and would be later on.

In any event, one is condemned to death only when there are real proofs that he is in fact responsible for voluntary homocide.

I remember that the Solicitor General expressed his concern about the possibility of hanging an innocent, saying that the most destitute may not have the tools or the money required to defend themselves on an equal footing with the more wealthy. He recognized that often the poor do not have the same advantages or tools to defend themselves, and that the government had the responsibility of providing them with a perfect defence and all the tools required to face the better off. And I continue with the quotation:

How many times in the past have I heard someone say: "If it were not for the death penalty, I would do away with him".

Nowadays, we often hear: "I would not be afraid to kill because going to jail is not so bad, you get free food, free board; you only have to keep quiet and eventually you are released, sometimes much sooner than expected—there is always the hope to get out . . . or to escape.

And if we look at what has happened over the last few years, we see that many indeed have managed to get out.

Therefore, a 25 years sentence or even life-imprisonment is not commensurate with the crime of murder.

I am thinking of those old people cowardly murdered because of their alleged savings.

I am thinking of those children who were tortured and savagely killed by this second offender. The mother of one of those children is still in hospital and probably will be all her life, as she became mentally ill because of her insurmontable grief . . .

I have in mind the settling of scores between members of the underworld even they have a right to live.

Human lives are being taken away as easily as dog's . . . and then we feel pity for the criminal and we forget the innocent victim and the flight of his family as well as the protection of the public.

And I think it is a good thing to remind all those who point out regularly that we must respect life that we also have the basic duty of respecting the lives of innocent persons. I continue my quotation:

I now raise a specific point: what about the eternal destiny of the victim who, without expecting it, is thrown into eternity? . . . Was this person morally ready to appear before God? What will be the consequences?

In this view, the criminal condemned to death punishment will benefit, for he will at least have time to regret his sin and to get his soul ready for the judgment after paying with his life: this will be his last hope.

After all those considerations and being aware of how priceless life and its protection are . . . for the sake of peace and social security . . . knowing that murderers do commit second crimes . . . considering mainly the lack of proportion between the taking of a human life and the few years spent in prison in payment for such a crime, we can say that mercy and pardon are irrelevant and do not correspond to the importance of the situation.

And if we deny the courts any possibility of applying capital punishment when appropriate, we take a serious risk that people might do justice themselves. Consequences that might arise are already predictable.

Retaining capital punishment will not deter the state from trying to improve social conditions and our judicial system in order to prevent violent crime.

And there again, there is much to say and I think the state has a great deal to do in that direction.

. . . thus the state will consider this unexplainable tolerance which allows the mass media to spread violence, murders and immorality and condone crimes of passion where the killing of a man or a woman is seen an ordinary fact of life . . . Living conditions in prisons will also be changed to have prisoners work and improve on their behaviour instead of letting them get worse through idleness . . . and as society improves, murders will be prevented and capital punishment will no longer need to be applied while being maintained.

Canadians hope that their representatives will really take a position in terms of justice and of the well-being of the whole of our society.

I think it is most important that our courts should always be able to apply the death penalty when needed.

Besides, we should know that the individual that respects the lives of others will never have to fear or undergo capital punishment, even though it is maintained in the books.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make these few comments which, in my opinion, will make us ponder over that issue seriously, regardless of the opinions expressed so far by members of this House.

As a matter of fact, the amendment now under consideration is quite important and the law enforcement officers have already stated their views and their concern about it. I hope that the members of this House will consider the amendment as absolutely essential, if we wish to attain the objective we call public security.

We do not hesitate to suggest to day that the bill now under consideration is inconsistent with the objective which the government is aiming at. The Solicitor General may say whatever he likes, his arguments have been knocked out by experts and people much more qualified than I am. I have personally observed certain facts in my own constituency.

They should shocked to learn that on second reading we endorsed that legislation by a small majority, hoping that the amendments would allow light to enter our conscience and we hope at least that the amendments will correct that legislation.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, this amendment is particularly important. I hope that all members, no matter how they have approached this measure in the past, will give their support to the proposition before the House. We ask the law enforcement officers and the employees in our federal penitentiaries to accept a very special responsibility, one which weighs heavily upon them, and which should weigh heavily upon us as legislators because we know what they face in a society which has become increasingly violent. Somehow, we have to find a formula which will stamp out the escalation of violence which we see about us nationally and internationally.

● (1710)

I do not like quoting statistics to show what has happened to this country's murder rate, but undeniably it is going up. No one can convince me that the elimination of the death penalty will not result in the further increase of the number of people who in days ahead will die violently in this country.

When you stop to think of it, all members of this House, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of my party (Mr. Clark), or anyone else believes in capital punishment. I say that for this reason: if any one of us faced the situation in which someone was either going to take our life or we had to kill to defend ourselves, there is no question in my mind what each and every one of us would decide. That being the case, each and every one of us believes in the ultimate punishment for an individual who has a determination to kill. Therefore, I cannot understand why some members would wish to oppose the strong demand of the public for parliament to mirror the public's feeling with regard to capital punishment.

The public has told us, in no uncertain terms, that it wants parliament to enact legislation which will make the death penalty the ultimate punishment for the ultimate crime. The amendment we are discussing does not go that far. It suggests that we should impose the ultimate punishment only on those who commit the ultimate crime against those charged with the special responsibilities of policing our nation and protecting us from the inmates incarcerated in our penal institutions. It says that only if the life of one of these persons is taken shall the criminal pay the supreme penalty.

I suggest, sir, that the general public which thinks parliament should be a mirror of public opinion and that parliamentarians ought not always to vote according to their personal convictions want the death penalty to be mandatory for a greater number of crimes than contemplated by this amendment. I am sure the general public supports the amendment we are discussing. Therefore, I suggest that if we adopt the amendment we shall let criminals know they face the supreme penalty if they kill certain individuals in our society. There should be no alteration of the present law. When such crimes take place, the criminals should pay the supreme penalty.

One hears many arguments about why we have capital punishment and why we should or should not have it. I hold in my hand a copy of a letter, which I gather was sent to all members of parliament, from Pastor Ernest Kennedy of the Forward Baptist Church, Cambridge, Ontario. The original letter was addressed to the pastor's member of parliament, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). It outlines why, in the pastor's view, capital punishment should be retained. I shall put on record some of the views expressed in the letter by the pastor of the Forward Baptist Church, because I am impressed by the sincerity of the man and by his interpretation of what the Bible says on capital punishment. The pastor's letter reads in part:

> In all my reading concerning capital punishment, I have yet to find what I believe to be the basic reason for capital punishment. In the Book of Genesis, long before Abraham, Moses or the nation of Israel was in existence, God laid down a simple covenant with man, in Genesis 8:22 to 9:16. This convenant was to last "while the earth remaineth, for perpetual generations, and everlasting covenant." This covenant included:
> 1 Gen. 9:2-3: Man's dominion over the animals. Man is to kill animals for food and protection. Man is unique and given dominion over the animals.
> 2 Gen. 9:4: A commandment against cannibalism. Man is allowed to eat all kinds of vegetables and meats, but not human flesh which contains the life and living soul.
> 3 Gen. 9:5-6: Murder of another human being is forbidden, and capital punishment is to be enacted.

I note that the pastor used the authority of the Old Testament. Most of us realize that Christ used the Old Testament to assist in guiding his disciples during his lifetime, just as he has guided Christians ever since his crucifixion. Pastor Kennedy went on to say:

> It is interesting here to notice the one and only reason given for capital punishment. Genesis 9:6, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The reasons for capital punishment is not vengeance, not to get even with the man, not an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, not as a deterrent to others, not for the well-being of man or the protection of society, although some of these things in themselves may be true and involved. The reason God demands capital punishment is just the opposite reason the behavioural scientists want it stopped. God says man is not an animal, but is a created being, made in the image of God and the man who is murdered bears in some way, the image of God, his creator. Murder at its roots is rebellion against God who created and gave dignity to the man murdered.
> Consider the following ways that man is the recipient of God's divine image and is, therefore, more than an animal.
> 1 Mentally—man has an intelligence, capacity to reason, to evaluate and criticize himself.

[Mr. Coates.]

> 2 Morally—man has a conscience, a capacity to recognize moral values and make moral choices.
> 3 Socially—man has a society, a capacity to love and to be in personal, social relationships.
> 4 Creatively—man has dominion, a capacity to exercise his lordship over creation, to subdue the earth and to be creative.
> 5 Spiritually—man has a soul, a capacity to worship, to pray and to live in communion with God.
>
> The man who puts a gun in his pocket and deliberately drives to the bank and shoots the teller is playing God. He is deciding that another human being should die and has chosen to destroy the image of God as created in the dignity of that man.
> When a man is solemnly put to death by the government for deliberately and premeditately taking another man's life, it is in serious recognition to the nation that murder is not just another crime, but is the taking into one's hands the life of a human being who is created in the image of God.

The pastor concludes by saying:

> Mr. Saltsman, in the light of what I have written, I trust that you will give serious consideration for the sake of our country, the responsibility of our government to God, and the dignity of human life to reverse your vote when the bill comes to third and final reading.

● (1720)

I believe that Mr. Kennedy has touched on the most significant aspect of this whole debate. It is not only to deter others from committing murder that we want capital punishment. We believe that when an individual commits a premeditated murder he is, in effect, playing God: he takes things into his own hands and destroys that life. By doing that, that individual sacrifices any hope of mercy by his fellow men. When he destroyed that individual, he destroyed a part of God. God himself said when that was done that individual sacrificed any right to live. That is the way it should be.

There is a penitentiary in my constituency, at Dorchester. There are a great many employees in my area who live and work in that maximum security institution. I have conversation on an almost constant basis with those employees. The kind of experimentation that has been imposed upon employees of penal institutions makes one shudder. There is a degree of permissiveness in our penal system today that gives little protection to the employees. It is no wonder that soon after the vote on second reading, when the bill was given approval in principle, a great many penitentiary employees in the province of Quebec resigned from their employment. If this government has no respect for their lives, they do. They knew that to continue their employment in those penitentiaries, without capital punishment on the statute books, was inviting the possibility of dying in their employment.

There must be a degree of protection for society in general and employees of penal institutions in particular. They must have a fair assurance that if they continue in their employment they will return home in the evening to their wives and families. However, that kind of assurance does not exist today. Therefore, I believe that capital punishment should be retained on the statute books. In fact, I believe it should be enforced in cases where individuals have been found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death.

It is not a case of whether we are putting the noose around someone's neck, or someone else is: it is the law of the land. The courts of this land make a judgment with regard to the penalty an individual should pay for a crime. Almost consistently since 1962 they have said that criminals who commit capital murder should die, especially in cases where the jury has not made a recommendation for mercy. However, that has not been the case.

At this time we have in our penitentiaries the most dangerous types of individuals, individuals who would not think twice of killing again. I think of Ambrose and Hutchison who were in Dorchester penitentiary. They showed no mercy. Indeed, they showed the most grotesque inhumanity in the murder of two police officers in Moncton. There is a great danger to every employee because of the inmates who are there. I think of the terrible penalty that inmates in penal institutions must pay so that the government can work out a public relations campaign to convince members of parliament to support abolition. The government says that inmates should remain in those institutions for a longer period of time. The government is trying to sell the public a hard line as far as individuals who have committed capital crimes are concerned.

I do not believe we are going down the right road as far as far as rehabilitation and reform of inmates in our penal institutions are concerned by taking a hard line and having longer sentences in order to eliminate the possibility of having to carry out the death penalty against a very small coterie of inmates who have committed capital murder—in other words, those who have killed a police officer or a penitentiary employee. I firmly believe that the citizens of this country would be quite willing to sacrifice the lives of the few who have been convicted and sentenced to death in order to develop a more realistic rehabilitation program within our penitentiary system.

I assume my time is running out. I will conclude by saying that I support this amendment, as I hope most hon. members will. If that is done, we will then be able to convince the Canadian public that we have acceptable protection for at least one segment of our society, those involved in law enforcement and the protection of society.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) for his intervention. He spoke of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. It was said that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had claimed that those who were retentionists would be, in their soul and conscience, responsible for the death of the 11 criminals who are now waiting only for our decision to know whether they will live or hang.

I believe the individual who is about to commit a crime knows very well that, when he goes out to rob with a loaded firearm, if he shoots at a policeman he will obviously hit him and possibly kill him.

So all told there are now 11 criminals waiting to know if they will continue to live or not. Mr. Speaker, I try to be human with everybody; we know very well that the cabinet can commute these death penalties into life imprisonment penalties. On the other hand, if the House could retain capital punishment, particularly in the case of the murder of policemen and prison guards who are here to guarantee the security of society, then the would-be murderers would know that if they commit crimes, there will be no mercy. Of course, we could argue that there are judicial errors, but today we know very well that people are not sentenced to death by hanging when there is the slightest doubt.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to be allowed to speak not only about the retention of capital punishment in the case of policemen and prison guards but also to say—and I wanted to take the floor again because I maintain my position—that if we want to reduce all this, we will be able to do it but only in the long term. And I quote from a document from the Public Service Alliance of Canada which all hon. members received and which is dated June 30, 1976. In the last paragraph of this brief, they say this: We asked the Solicitor General that his bill be tabled as long as he will not have provided for the establishment of a special institution responsible for the security, namely the safety and the security of all the employees of the Canadian penitentiary service who work in the institutions. We humbly ask you to do this on behalf of all the employees of penitentiaries and their families and so on.

Mr. Speaker, to prove to the House to just what extent the government puts forward a bill designed to abolish capital punishment, what is offered in return to society, what is offered to Canadian people to protect them? Nothing. As evidence, last October I asked the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand) whether there was in his department anything planned to provide some grants to associations across the country, which would be used to curb juvenile delinquency and help reduce the crime rate.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I want to explain to the House quite briefly, of course, why this bill is not justified, because they precisely forget to offer alternatives. The media can say that with or without capital punishment, nothing will change. Any one who wants to kill will kill anyway. I respect the opinion of my colleagues who feel that way. As far as I am concerned, I think that to provide the public with a minimum of protection, we must have maximum security in our penitentiary institutions, especially for those who guard the inmates. I am not saying you should give them all powers or extraordinary powers, no, but we must ensure the security of those convicts and maintain the death penalty for the murder of policemen who are there to protect us.

But can we afford, as legislators, to let this go, only to see people in our penal institutions strike or resign? A dozen or so have already done so. Can we afford it? In my view, no. Right now, I would like to go back to the prevention of juvenile delinquency and general crime, since, if we mean to prevent, we have to start somewhere. In my view we should start with youngsters aged 13 to 15. There was a patent discrepancy between the Solicitor General of Canada and his officials regarding programs to reduce the crime rate, starting from the basics.

Mr. Speaker, when some groups are interested in preventing crime in our society at the adult or youth level, I think the government ought to consider this solution while preserving the death penalty. And why maintain it? Simply because, as time marches on, within 5, 10 or 15 years, this prevention will be established and a new outlook will pervade our society. Instead of a violence prone society, we shall develop a new one which will encourage people to produce for their country and to respect the rights of others.

● (1740)

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, in today's society, we may have lost the sense of values, and this is why a host of young people hang around on street corners, sniff glue or what have you. We ask the government: What are you going to do to protect society against this kind of thing? How are you going to deal with the situation? They say: It is only a few. Of course, it may be so. They want to protect a minority.

An hon. Member: How true!

Mr. Lavoie: But what do we do as legislators as regards capital punishment? Actually, Mr. Speaker, in my heart of hearts, I am not the kind of man who would hang a criminal, but I believe that as a legislator, and after consulting my constituents, I must protect the majority of Canadians. This is my first concern.

Regardless of their views, be they abolitionists or retentionists, all members must act according to their own conscience. If abolitionists wish to vote according to their conscience, without consulting their constituents, they have the right to do so, and I respect it. I, for one, did the opposite and I will stick to my position in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, I said I would be brief. In conclusion, I wish to repeat what I said about prevention. Therefore, I will quote an extract of a booklet sent to us by the Solicitor General now and then and called "Liaison", a monthly publication on criminal justice, Volume I, issue 9, October 1975. The article is entitled "People and sentencing", and I quote.

I also have the feeling, like these school officials, that a wider use should be made of community services, open residential centres and other types of rehabilitation centres of a non-prison nature in which the young child, the juvenile delinquent and certainly the first-time offender would be looked after.

Mr. Speaker, all this comes down to say that today, when an individual is caught, even for the first time, he may have committed a crime using a gun or otherwise. Because even if he has committed a crime, this does not mean he is an habitual criminal. This one can be saved, I believe that, but when we make an habitual criminal of him, when we mix him with hardened criminals, at that point Parliament should have the opportunity to reexamine the whole penal system to ensure maximum security for prison guards and police officers and also to protect the population and some inmates who can be rehabilitated. We can give a chance to the criminals. That does not mean they should all be hanged.

Again last week, in Montreal, a man shot a policeman and fortunately the policeman was not killed. I am very glad for him but if the bullet had been deflected, maybe by a few inches, he would have been killed. Mr. Speaker, these people could not care less whether they kill a police officer or a prison guard. A man will be sent to prison for 25 or 35 years. What does he have to lose? He has nothing left to lose. For him, one crime more, one crime less, he is almost for life behind bars so he does not give a hoot, but we should think of protecting those who try to protect society. That is why I support the motion. I agree, and I hope that the others, whatever their opinion, I respect it, may have the opportunity of reconsidering this motion and then, together, we can decide.

All I wish is that we finally provide this minimum of security to those whose duty is to protect us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) seems to be rising to speak. According to the notes I have here, he has already had the floor.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the floor yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the amendment we have before us is in my opinion, very important. When we are discussing the protection of innocent citizens, when we are dealing with the importance of preventing criminals from continuing to play havoc with society, we are in fact speaking about the means to prevent criminals from going on killing innocent victims. When a criminal is sent to prison, no matter for how long, he is put into the hands of guards whose duties is to keep criminals away from society. In our opinion, this is, Mr. Speaker, protecting society.

Prison guards and police agents risk their lives protecting citizens against criminals. So honest citizens will not have to face hardened criminals those prison guards must live every day with people for whom human life has no value. Because of the bill which was introduced in the House they feel that the very same human life has no value in the eyes of the Solicitor General of Canada. Those policemen and prison guards risk their lives every day. At any moment they can see hardened criminals attack them to defend themselves since capital punishment will no longer exist for them.

They also risk everything they have to lose, those few years behind bars, everything they have, to allow other citizens to be protected against the actions of criminals. How does this government thank those valiant prison guards who risk their lives? Well, the only thank the Solicitor General gives them is the abolition of capital punishment, so that murderers sentenced to life have nothing to lose in escaping.

Mr. Speaker, when somebody has already been sentenced to life imprisonment what does he have to lose? We feel that he has absolutely nothing to lose by trying to escape if the maximum sentence he can get is life imprisonment, and we feel that sentence now exists. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, prison guards are at the mercy of the first inmate who decides to escape. Even if he were to kill a prison guard or two what is that going to change in his case? He is already sentenced to life imprisonment. At worst, he may be recaptured and sentenced once again to life imprisonment. Mr. Speaker, it is a bit like someone who has the mumps or the measles. Once you have had them, you cannot get them again. So, Mr. Speaker, the obvious consequence is that prison guards are no longer protected at all.

With the bill proposed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the lifer will be able to kill as many guards as he wishes as he will not get more than a life term. He has nothing to lose and everything to win by killing a guard in an escape attempt. If the Solicitor General himself was a prison guard and had to face those criminals every day, he would probably understand how important capital punishment is for those who must face criminals day in and day out.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, from his comfortable seat in the House of Commons it is easy for him to say that capital punishment is not useful and does not protect policemen and guards. If the Solicitor General had to cope with killers and criminals every day, as do policemen and guards, he would have a different view. He would not brag so much and would probably better understand the people responsible for maintaining peace and order who ask for the retention of capital punishment to have minimum protection against killers and criminals.

If the Solicitor General listens to policemen and prison guards, he will realize that they do not accept the attitude of the government and the personal attitude of the minister concerning that issue. I have here, Mr. Speaker, an article from the newspaper La Presse showing very clearly the intention of prison guards and policemen to join forces to fight the government bill. This is what the article says as it reflects the attitude of prison guards concerning the abolition of capital punishment.

Prison guards intend to join forces with policemen before going into action.

A new common front is about to appear. This time, it will be prison guards asking for the support of various Canadian police corps to give more weight to their demands.

That response came on the heels of the vote on second reading of the bill to abolish capital punishment. The security staff of the federal prisons in Quebec, gathered in a general meeting a few days ago, gave their union executives a mandate to rally all forces before using pressure tactics.

Many people in the audience were in favour of unlimited strike action. However, they accepted the idea of a common front so that the measures to be taken will have a real impact. Prison guards of several other Canadian cities also held meetings, a few days ago to protest against the government decision. Some prison guards said they would accept the abolition of capital punishment if super-maximum security jails are built, something that does not exist in Canada at this time.

"Criminals saved from the execution by the new legislation are a constant threat to our security" declared the guards at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul. "We cannot forget what happened to our colleague Paul Gosselin, killed last year by a prisoner".

Another guard who was held hostage a few weeks ago believes that he owes his life to the existence of the death penalty. "When I told my aggressor who was pointing a knife at me, if you kill me, you are liable to be hanged" . . .

And this guard sincerely believes that his aggressor thought twice and decided to leave him alive.

The executive of the prison guards union and top officials of the Public Service Alliance of Canada discussed a possible mutual agreement with policemen and obtained a clear mandate: we must strongly protest against abolition of the death penalty and negotiate once and for all for our security.

Mr. Speaker, I continue the quotation:

Mr. Jean-Guy Chalut, Vice-President of the Alliance for Quebec said he welcomes such a clear mandate and has assured guards that there would be new developments . . .

—in the coming weeks.

According to Mr. Chalut, even the prisoners are against the abolition of the death penalty because they also fear for their life.

Mr. Speaker, when we read such comments, we wonder how a minister could come here to withdraw the only protection provided to those people, to assure some protection to every Canadian.

It is clear that prison guards fear for their life. Unlike the Solicitor General, they do not have the advantage of being constantly protected by the RCMP. They must live daily with people for whom human lives are worthless. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

An hon. Member: It is not yet six o'clock, there three minutes left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree with the hon. member that it is six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent, so the hon. member may go on with his remarks.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: We can go on until seven o'clock!

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the same thing goes as far as police officers are concerned. They also have to face criminals during bank hold-ups, takings of hostages and murders. When the criminal knows he is risking life imprisonment for his action—

An hon. Member: You are repeating yourself!

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): I may repeat myself, but the hon. member certainly knows he does not have the courage to get up on his feet.

Mr. Guay (Saint-Boniface): I said there was no courage in that!

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): The murderer has nothing to lose by killing one, two, or three police officers to avoid being arrested. If he is arrested, what is he going to get on top of that? Life imprisonment. If he kills a policeman to avoid being arrested, what sentence will he get?

How is it possible, Mr. Speaker, that gangsters hesitate before shooting policemen in such circumstances? It is worth stressing that no fewer than 51 police officers have been murdered since 1964. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that no fewer than 51 peace officers have been coldly murdered by hoodlums since capital punishment ceased to be implemented.

Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless the hon. member wishes to conclude his remarks, and providing the House grants him five more minutes by unanimous consent, he could then go on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): It is six o'clock. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Liberal members who did not stop interjecting should get ready tomorrow and find the courage to get up on their feet.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made on Monday, June 7, 1976, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, July 8, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Wednesday, July 7, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and Motion No. 13 (Mr. Reynolds).

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Before concluding my speech, I would like to mention by the way, as recorded in Hansard of July 7, 1976, that many government members have been pointing out that we are repeating ourselves. Mr. Speaker, of course we have been repeating ourselves. Why? Merely to make some members understand their irresponsibility in introducing such a measure as Bill C-84 which does away with the security protecting on duty policemen in a country where criminality is constantly increasing. So if we repeat ourselves, as I have just said, it is only to make an individual as irresponsible as the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand) understand that policemen and prison guards can be heard in this Parliament.

It is almost impossible for them to be heard because some members of the opposition and even some government members stubbornly reject clause 4 of the bill before us. I hope that in view of the opposition the government, and the minister in particular, will withdraw clause 4 of the bill. Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General ought to be sensible enough to realize the uneasiness which exists among police officers and prison guards, since those people must risk their lives every day. This is not a time for philosophy or for hot air, like the Solicitor General seems to think.

Mr. Speaker, one cannot deny that most criminal actions are committed by a small number of individuals whose only purpose it to flout the laws passed by this House. On reading the Journal de Montréal, we see that it is always the same people who commit crimes and who threaten peace and security in Canada.

I quote that paper:

80 per cent of all prisoners are habitual criminals.

On reading things like that, how can we understand that the minister should introduce such a bill? We are told that about 80 per cent of those who are behind bars in Canada—10,200 in the provincial institutions of the country and 8,200 in federal penitentiaries—all hardened offenders? Now, to go back to the quotation:

That high percentage is not surprising to anyone who is aware of the traditional weakness of our prisons in the field of rehabilitation, as well as of the obvious hostility of society towards prisoners or former prisoners.

Mr. Speaker, much more could be said about the bill now before the House, and particularly about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). He, at least, understands the opposition of the prison guards and policemen who want to ensure security to the Canadian people in the exercise of their duties.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I shall support this amendment gladly. If the Solicitor General lacks the judgment and common sense to understand the situation, I trust that at least hon. members, even those of the opposition, who are against the amendment, will show enough good will to recognize that prison guards and police agents have good reasons to demand that the death penalty be maintained. Consequently, I intend, on my own behalf and that of my party, for the ridings we represent in Canada, to support this amendment: it is designed to protect the valorous guardians of the peace and public security that police and prison guards are.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for British Columbia—Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson).

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to say that there are other representatives from British Columbia here as well. It is a wonderful, large province inhabitated by great people, and it takes a considerable number of members of parliament to represent the people of British Columbia in the way in which they deserve. However, I am honoured to be one of the group from British Columbia.

We are currently discussing amendments to Bill C-84 in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences. The motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), proposes to delete clause 4, and I take the opportunity to indicate my support for the motion. It would retain for policemen and prison guards a measure of safety which presently exists under our ineffective and sloppy administration of justice.

I listened with interest and amazement to the comments made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) yesterday when he stated that while he was in favour of retention of capital punishment, he was going to vote against this motion because it would retain protection for a certain group of people which was denied to other groups. The hon. member knows very well that this motion is not a discriminatory action on the part of the members who support this motion but is an endeavour to salvage something from the wreckage of a very bad bill proposed by the present government.

It is hardly necessary to remind ourselves of the history of the provision that is being discussed today. It was included in a bill to abolish capital punishment for one reason, that was, I believe, to get the measure through the House of Commons and have it become law. The proposal was that capital punishment be retained for the murder of policemen or prison guards but, as every member of the House is aware this morning, that was just a farce because the government had no such intention at that time, nor has it since that time allowed an execution to be carried out under the provisions of the present legislation. There was a measure of public protest that arose over the inclusion of the exception at that time and many communications came to the desks of all members of parliament, not to object to the protection granted to policemen and prison guards, but to the fact that the same protection was not granted to all the citizens of Canada.

As we look at the facts, we discover that the policemen themselves took exception to the fact that the same protection was not granted to the other citizens of Canada. In a brief, which I am sure every member received, from the Metropolitan Toronto Police Association, we find several brief paragraphs in this connection which I should like to read. On page 15 of the brief we find the following statement:

> We must make our position clear with respect to the current law dealing with capital punishment.' It is our contention, clearly and emphatically, that we never proposed, requested nor supported the law as it now stands. In other words, we were not the ones to suggest, request or propose that capital punishment be retained for the killing of police officers, as we are sure neither did the prison officials request capital punishment be retained for the killing of prison officials.

Farther on it says:

> We must criticize the current law as being discriminatory in the sense that it places a greater value on the lives of policemen and prison guards than it does on the lives of children, housewives, shopkeepers, businessmen, cab drivers, etc.
> Not only do we wish the present law to be retained but we wish it to be expanded to cover the murder of any citizen during the commission of a crime.

I think that is very clear in the presentation of the views of the policemen of this country. So, I wanted to put that on the record to make it clear that this was not a special request made by the policemen or the prison guards of this country. In spite of the fact that protests were raised by citizens, I do not believe that they wanted this clause to be removed. They wanted it to be expanded to include the protection of all Canadians.

Those of us who are speaking on this motion believe that all citizens should be guaranteed the maximum degree of security—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: —that this penalty affords. But if the government is determined to remove this degree of security from society in general and succeeds in doing so, it should be known that we are endeavouring to retain it at least for those who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring the apprehension and incarceration of criminals in this country.

The policies advocated and put in place by this government have underlined the preoccupation of the government with the so-called rights of the criminal element, to the neglect of the rights of society in general. It seems to me that this motion should carry, so protection could be retained at least for prison guards and policemen. What do we find today? We find that our prison guards are shorn of authority to maintain discipline, and this has been done by government direction. The prison guards have been hassled and insulted by the inmates. They have been deprived of the maximum safety measures. These public servants are working under the severest of handicaps in their efforts to contain the lawbreakers in this nation.

I would like to call attention to a document which has been forwarded to all members of parliament by the Public Service Alliance of Canada. On page 3 there is a reference to a telegram which was forwarded by Mr. J. K. Wylie, executive vice president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, to Mr. A. Therrien, commissioner of penitentiaries, concerning the measures to protect custodial officers. I would like to quote just one statement made in the reply to that telegram. It was sent by Mr. Therrien, the commissioner. He states, and I quote:

> In closing, I wish to assure you most emphatically that the Penitentiary Service considers it of the utmost importance that custodial staff should enjoy secure, peaceful working conditions in which they are able to go about their duties unharrassed and unmolested. The measures I have outlined above are intended to create and maintain a safe environment for personnel, and I am confident that with the co-operation of all concerned, they can be effective in doing so.

I will not take the time to place on the record the statement outlining what has been done, but I do want to point out that I question very much the statements which are made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the commissioner of penitentiaries, and others who are trying to insinuate that adequate measures are in place or will be in place to guarantee the safety of the personnel in these institutions. I do not believe that they are sufficient or adequate, and I question very much whether there will be any really effective administration to ensure that the regulations which are now in place will be actually carried out to the fullest extent.

The question then comes to us: what is in store for our penitentiary personnel if and when the legislation is passed and becomes law? Reference has been made to 25 year sentences, but here again there is a catch, and it is quite possible that the exception will become the rule. The clause providing for consideration for parole after 15 years under certain circumstances could become the regular procedure. The precedent that has been set by the government by its actions, including the retention of the death penalty for the murder of certain classes of citizens and then refusing to allow sentences to be carried out, is an indication of what we can expect in the future administration of the law.

I would like to call attention to a portion of the presentation made by the Toronto Policemen's Association in this regard. Page 22 reads, in part:

News reports of the new law have left Canadians to believe that if capital punishment is abolished it shall be replaced with a mandatory twenty-five year prison term. Very little, if any, mention is ever drawn to the attention of the public that there is provision for a review of that twenty-five year prison term after fifteen years have been served. Our concern based on past experience is that if capital punishment is abolished in return for longer prison terms, then shortly after the abolishment of capital punishment we will see a lessening of the mandatory jail term and a lessening of the time for a review.

Apparently I am not the only one who questions the credibility of the statements made by the Solicitor General, or even those included in the law, because those who are charged with the responsibility of apprehending criminals—and I believe this feeling is shared by those who are charged with the responsibility of maintaining their incarceration—have very serious questions with regard to the effectiveness of this particular provision.

As I return to the motion which is presently before us to delete from the bill the clause which would remove capital punishment, even as far as the murderers of policemen and prison guards are concerned, I believe this motion warrants the support of the entire House. It certainly should warrant the support of hon. members such as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni because it seems to me that the arguments he used were rather superficial. If he is in favour of the retention of capital punishment for all murderers in the category of first degree murder, or however it may be classified, then he should not withhold that protection from some categories, even if his government insists on removing it for the murder of Canadians in general. So I trust that when this motion is brought before the House for a final decision, it will receive the unanimous support of all hon. members of this House and that capital punishment, at least for the murderers of prison guards and policemen, will be retained in our legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to make a few remarks on that extremely important clause of the bill, because if there is a subject which should spur the conscience of all hon. members of the House, it is indeed this bill, and particularly clause 4.

Mr. Speaker, when we think about the role policemen have to play in Canada, we realize the full significance of the legislation before us. We know to what extent our municipal officials and our Canadian police associations at various levels rightly insist on the dedication, the competence and the respectability of our policemen. We even require a very high level of education for an applicant to be accepted in any police force. Courses are given every year in all provinces to our different police forces to ensure public protection, because the policeman, for any normal Canadian, should ensure public protection. That is why he is highly paid. This is why we now see policemen earning $15,000, $18,000 and even $20,000 a year. We are spending staggering amounts for our police salaries so that people may receive the best possible protection.

But while we are asking the police to ensure public safety we, in return, do not want to ensure police safety. We want our policemen to protect us but Parliament does not want to protect them. I cannot imagine more stupid, more inane legislation than the one which is before us. We are paying security forces to protect us, our children, our society, the taxpayers and their properties. We are asking the police to fulfill its role, namely to ensure the security of society; that is what we are paying for. On the other hand, the House of Commons refuses to grant those policemen the very protection they are expected to give the public. It is outrageous that this government has reached such a stage. In the final analysis, it means the present government is trying to bring this country to the brink or anarchy. From the moment we do not want to give any protection to the individuals who receive large amounts of money to protect us, this means, Mr. Speaker, that we are ready to live in anarchy in Canada as of tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker, we also expect policemen to be well educated and to drive good cars, we ask them to have good systems to fight fire, we also require our prison guards to be well equipped; nevertheless, the first facility we must give policemen is the opportunity to protect themselves, to protect their own lives. We must put ourselves today in the situation of the policemen who have to respond to a telephone call saying that a hold-up is in progress in a bank on the corner of a given street and that someone has already been shot by the bandits who broke into the bank. In the city of Acton Vale, we saw a notorious bandit, who had been swearing for years he would get rid of the police chief, take advantage of a fight in a hotel one evening to shoot this police chief in front of witnesses standing by, something like 200 people. The police chief of Acton Vale was the father of nine children.

How do policemen feel while they are waiting in the police station for distress calls from the public? How do they feel when they must take over after their chief has been shot by a bandit, when they are asked to protect them while they themselves are not even armed and protected, in the sense that it will not matter if the same bandit, who just shot the chief, guns down his assistant or other policemen because there is no punishment, because he is on the same social footing and enjoys the same credibility as the chief of police who had to submit references and a clean record. The bandit who just shot the chief of police, and who already committed many murders is put before society on the same footing as this policeman.

Mr. Speaker, I am shocked to hear such an argument from a member who asks for the protection of policemen, and who refuses today to give them such protection. I have here the summary of the brief submitted by the national police committee. We must consider it because those concerned today are the policemen. We should have consideration for those who are bound to fight criminals rather than take the advice of political scientists, sociologists or demagogues who hide behind the Solicitor General, who have probably never seen a gangster in their life but who are good at counselling or advising the minister. The minister should choose policemen and nobody else as advisers because they are the ones who are concerned with clause 4. But as long as the government is going to sit and listen to public servants who have no responsibility in running the country, we are likely to be faced once again with bills as stupid and childish as the one before us today.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the position of our policemen. Why are they so disgusted today to see that parliamentarians refuse them the same protection they have always granted us? I know dozens of police forces in Canada and more particularly those in my riding. They have a conscientious approach to their work in providing public protection. They protect our children, our students and our properties which they defend with eagerness in spite of the risks. We call them to lend assistance to threatened people and to some organizations. They are called in case of fire, for instance, the same way the fire fighters are called, but they are policemen whose services are used to help the people when fire breaks out.

And today we have before us a bill which tends to deprive policemen of protection. I find that disgusting and I find that those who are going to remove the protection for policemen are without conscience. They want to deprive policemen of protection and at the same time they demand police protection. I can only feel revolted by this legislation which should never have been put before the House. And here is what policemen say about the Solicitor General:

We disagree with the minister when he says that it is up to retentionists to show why the legislation should not be changed. According to us . . .

They are policemen, they are not all fools, not all civil servants sitting in an office who never had to face criminality . . .

the minister is the one who should prove . . .

They are not listened to, the representations made in Canada by police forces are not taken into account, some of us would rather listen to representations made by criminals and those who have to do with crime.

According to us, the minister is the one who should prove that the legislation must be changed . . .

That is good logic. The minister is the one who should prove that the legislation must be changed, that is what policemen say.

● (1140)

We object to the public statement by the highest judiciary authority in Canada that he would resign if capital punishment were to be carried out.

Mr. Speaker, how can someone make such a childish public statement? A real child! If he does not get a toy, if he does not get a candy, he is going to go into tantrum. The minister has said that he would resign if anyone should hang. And this statement emanates from the highest judiciary authority in the country! He is the one responsible for the implementation of the law. And he would resign if his bill were not accepted. The brief goes on:

What if all law officers in Canada had this attitude regarding the laws they do not like to enforce?

If law officers were to have this attitude, Mr. Speaker, there would be a general strike overnight by all police forces in Canada because police officers now have to enforce laws they do not like, and yet they do not voice such irresponsible and stupid remarks as those expressed by the minister who said recently that he will resign if his bill is defeated.

We are worried by the public statements of the Solicitor General reflecting his intention to propose a reduced term after which murderers would be eligible for parole following the abolition of capital punishment.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

If the Solicitor General really believes that neither the state nor any individual or institution has the right to take a life, we can then expect that he will soon propose that Canadian policemen be unarmed lest they might kill someone in the course of their duties.

What action did the minister take to accommodate the large number of murderers . . .

It sounds good to say that those people will be sent to jail, but our current pentitentiary system in Canada prevents us from putting those people behind bars because we do not have enough jails, enough facilities and the minister knows it. No plans have been made yet to implement what is suggested in this bill: send murderers to jail for 25 years. Jails are already filled to capacity.

What plans did the minister make to accommodate the large number of murderers who will be sentenced to 25 years if the bill is passed in its present form? We are told that jails are already overcrowded, obsolete and are nothing but rest homes. How will these institutions and their authorities be able to face the flow of convicts sentenced to long terms?

Mr. Speaker, what do the policemen think of the deterrent effect?

The executed murderer cannot commit a second crime.

The fact that violent riots in prisons have caused the death of inmates and injuries to guards shows positively the deterrent effect of the capital punishment threat.

Mr. Speaker, about 500 feet from my home, two prison guards have witnessed last year the murder of their colleagues in the Cowansville jail. Presently, those people are on leave without pay because they suffer from a nervous breakdown after they realized what happens inside jails because of the lack of protection given to prison guards. Those people are still on welfare. They received a salary for some time and, today, their doctor gave them a medical certificate: nervous breakdown. It is not the minister, the Solicitor General who risks his life in prisons, without any tools, without any means of protection.

We recommend to the members of the justice committee to consider the findings of a study conducted by Ehrlich and Yunker of the United States, as well as the verbatim report that the American Attorney General filed with the Supreme Court of that country dealing with capital punishment and the constitution of the USA. It is interesting to note that out of the 50 states, 37 have now passed legislation on capital punishment. We are convinced that if we want to compare our jurisdiction with others, it would be more helpful to compare it with that of the USA, because it is more relevant to Canadian jurisdiction than any other in this world.

We take pleasure in this House in wanting to copy the legislation of countries that live under socialist governments, but we should be more inclined to imitate our next door neighbour whose methods we copy every day in the field of trade and in every other activity, except that of justice.

We think that the punishment should be proportional to the crime committed. To us that is justice, not revenge, nor retribution—justice.

Justice is not set by administrators, policemen or legislators. Justice is set by the acceptance by Canadians of the degrees of punishment and their relation to the seriousness of the crime committed.

The results of countless surveys indicate that the majority of Canadians demand justice for murder. The justice they demand is that capital punishment be maintained and that it be applied to premeditated murders, or murders committed during the perpetration of a crime.

That is signed by the Canadian Police Association, by the president, the vice-president and the past president.

I could also read what was done in England:

Return to hanging for murder or genuine life imprisonment.

While all Great Britain police departments are going through the country with a fine toothcomb looking for dangerous murderers, the widow of a recently slain chief of police launched a massive campaign in favour of the reinstatement of hanging in England.

"If the country were at war nobody would be offended that death would be the fate of the enemy and I think we are at war with criminals," said pretty Maureen Richardson, a 35 year old brunette.

Her husband, Superintendent Gerald Richardson was gunned down with several shots as he was attempting to arrest two bandits who were trying to flee after stealing jewelry estimated at over $120,000 in Blackpool.

The police identified Richardson's assassin as being Frederick Joseph Sewell, age 34 or 36; this would be his second murder.

Forbes had escaped last Monday from the Peterhead prison in Scotland. He would be the first individual in the judicial annals of Scotland to be guilty of a second murder after being paroled on a sentence of life imprisonment.

That is what the Solicitor General's policy will lead us to with paroles and 25-year terms. Because after a few months, we have seen that individuals commit one, two, three or four murders.

It goes on to state:

Commenting on her campaign, Mrs. Richardson indicated: "I urge reinstatement of hanging for premeditated murders, and I stress that anybody who puts a loaded revolver in his pocket is premeditating something".

Also, as my hon. colleague from Moncton (Mr. Jones) suggested, and I quote:

The Maritimes police officers urge for a return to capital punishment.

This is what Senator Robichaud indicated, and things become serious when a senator suggests he is going to make his own justice.

Senator Louis Robichaud, former premier of New Brunswick, suggested he was opposed to violence under any form but could not accept the way the parole boards and the judicial system let murderers go unpunished in a number of instances. "If someone rapes and kills my daughter, and if adequate punishment is not inflicted by the judiciary, I will personally make it my duty to apply punishment". Such were his words.

Mr. Speaker, when we hear a senator going on record to say he will protect himself, what can we expect from police forces in Canada when they find they have no protection anymore? They will be considered just as criminals are. They will be afforded the same kind of respect given gangsters who perpetrated three, four or even five murders. We will see criminals put on the same social footing as a chief of police with credibility and an impeccable record. Police chiefs are men of talent and character, they often have very important responsibilities outside their official function, as some I have known in my own constituency. At this point in his conscience, the Solicitor General is placing the gangster and the chief of police on an equal footing before the law.

The Quebec Association of Police Directors is fed up with the way the parole board behaves; they blame it for being too generous toward recidivists.

Recidivists are awarded medals! I wonder why, in his bill, the minister did not ask that bandits and criminals be given credit cards and Cadillac cars to better rehabilitate those poor souls into our society.

The Quebec Retail and Services Federation said the following:

The Quebec Retail and Services Federation covers seven professional associations of retailers in various sectors of the retail trade . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member, to inform him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on motion No. 13 brought forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). The amendment calls for the deletion of clause 4 of Bill C-84, the clause which would repeal the present provisions of section 214 of the Criminal Code and substitute the penalty of life imprisonment for first degree murder. In effect this would mean a penalty of 25 years in the case of a first conviction for the murder of a police officer, prison guard or correctional officer. I support the amendment because if this clause were deleted we would go back to the law as it was.

I wish to refer to an excellent article by Michael Marley in today's Montreal Gazette in which he comments on the convoluted thinking of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the death penalty. I quote:

It is because I have an enduring confidence in mankind (the law-abiding sort) and confidence in society's ability to protect itself (if it is given the chance) that I favor retention of capital punishment.

This is certainly a volatile enough issue for a general referendum. The government should either give us one or resign and allow us to choose leaders who will be less autocratic and more responsive to the desires of the population.

I agree with Mr. Marley that the government should resign. However, I do not think there is any need for a referendum. There have been many polls taken in Canada as well as questionnaires and letters to members of parliament. We already know the views of the Canadian people.

On April 30, 1975, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) presented a petition. At that time he said, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on capital punishment on behalf of over 200,000 concerned people across Canada—a very small percentage of the overall majority who are in favour of capital punishment. May I say the petitions forms were made available in both official languages across Canada.

I understand the end result was that this petition finally had about one million signatures. That in itself should give this government something to think about. It is another reason for them to consider supporting motion No. 3.

There was another article which appeared earlier this year headed "Gospel church poll is 90 per cent in favour of death penalty". I quote:

A Hamilton minister wrote to Canada's Solicitor-General yesterday calling for the retention of the death penalty, based on a survey of the membership of the Associated Gospel Churches of Canada.

It will be found that many opinion polls reached 90 per cent in favour of the death penalty although the overall average for Canada is 75 per cent.

On February 2, 1976, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) issued a news release containing the results of a questionnaire sent to his constituents. It stated that no fewer than 73 per cent of the citizens of Ottawa West favoured retention of capital punishment. Because of his actions there, in all probably the hon. member for Ottawa West will return to this House after the next election.

We cannot ignore the presentations we received from police associations and prison guards. I wish to read into the record a letter that was sent to the Prime Minister, copies of which were sent to all members of parliament. I quote:

The Canadian Police Association, which represents 40,000 municipal and provincial police officers in Canada, met in Toronto in February 1975 to discuss the issue of capital punishment. The Association is deeply concerned over the fact that there is now no penalty of consequence imposed on persons who commit murder in our country. Persons convicted of murder who are given a "life" sentence can be eligible for parole in seven to ten years after conviction. It is the view of the policemen of this country, as represented by the association, that this is not a suitable penalty and does not serve to protect society.

There have been some changes with regard to the length of sentence, but that is not what the Canadian people want.

In July 1972 the Association informed the Honourable John Turner, then Minister of Justice, of our position with respect to capital punishment; a copy of the submission setting out our position was forwarded to you as well. Our recommendations were ignored by your government.

The government is not only ignoring the police association and the guard's association, but between 80 and 90 per cent of the Canadian people.

In July 1973 the association wrote to the Honourable James Jerome, Chairman of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the House of Commons, advising him and his committee of our views on the issue of capital punishment. Once again our recommendations were ignored.

It is our belief that our position, as outlined to the government in 1972 and reiterated in 1973, is even more applicable in 1975 since crimes of violence continue to plague this country at an alarming rate and since the penalties imposed by present legislation are no deterrent.

We recognize that it is the responsibility of police officers to enforce the law and that it is the responsibility of government and parliament to make the laws which police officers must enforce. However, the law must serve to protect the citizen and it is the view of the Canadian Police Association that the present laws with respect to punishment for murder are inadequate and fail to provide for the proper protection of Canadian citizens.

It is our belief that unless substantial steps are taken to provide meaningful penalties for the murder of our citizens the rate of these violent crimes will continue to escalate.

The Canadian Police Association is again advancing to members of parliament the position they take with respect to capital punishment and are advising the Canadian people of this position so that citizens can be aware of the concern felt by their police officers in every province in Canada.

The Canadian Police Association strongly recommends that the government of Canada immediately review the present laws pertaining to punishment for murder, in line with the following resolution:

"Capital punishment must be extended beyond the present limitations so as to include all crimes in which acts of violence result in the death of any person.

Persons who take the life of another while committing such crimes as child molestation, rape, air piracy, political assassination, treason, and robbery must be charged with capital murder and, if convicted, should face the death penalty.

In cases where persons are found guilty of capital murder, after all levels of judicial appeal have been exhausted, and no recommendation for mercy is forthcoming from the judicial process, the federal cabinet shall be prohibited from interfering with that sentence and subsequent punishment.

In cases where a recommendation for mercy is forthcoming from the judicial process the federal cabinet should be permitted to commute the death sentence. However the alternative to the death sentence should be limited to natural or true life imprisonment."

We, the police officers who have sworn to serve and protect the citizens of Canada, firmly believe that all law abiding citizens have a right to expect, and indeed to demand, to be able to live in peace and safety, free from fear of criminal acts being perpetrated against them or against member of their families. The continued eroding of this feeling of security by elected representatives, through their failure adequately to maintain legislation guaranteeing every reasonable protection to all law abiding citizens, is of the greatest danger to our free society; if allowed to continue, this erosion will ultimately destroy our accepted way of life.

The letter is signed by S. R. Scarr, the president of the association. I might point out that the police association has the support of the majority of Canadians. I find it strange that this government continually ignores these types of requests, as well as representations received from constituents across Canada.

Members of parliament received a letter from the Public Service Alliance of Canada dated June 24, 1976, which reads as follows:

Before you cast your final ballot on Bill C-84, we would like to bring to your attention the following facts so that in conscience, as you were reminded by the Prime Minister of Canada in his address to the House on June 15, 1976, appearing in the Commons Debates, page 14499, and I quote "I want to make it very clear that, if a majority of honourable members vote against abolition, some people are going to be hanged. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by this House on this bill."

Mr. McKinley: What about the victims?

Mr. McKenzie: It is to them we should be giving consideration, but this government is not too concerned about the victims.

On our part, we would also like to appeal to your conscience and revert the statement of the Prime Minister on all abolitionists that they would be held responsible for all future killings of penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers across this land, and we make the pledge that every time one of those killings takes place, we will remind all those who will have voted for the abolition of the capital punishment.

● (1200)

The facts that we would like you to take into consideration are as follows:

1. the irresponsible attitude adopted by the Commissioner and the directors of institutions in regard to the pressure groups entering the institutions;

2. the lack of proper management now in charge of the majority of institutions across the land;

3. the horrible states in which the inmates are being classified, endangering the life of both penitentiary employees and the majority of inmates who would be ready to accept the rules that they have to conform with for the length of their sentences;

4. the lack of facilities to guarantee the protection and security of both penitentiary employees and inmates against murderous types who will have nothing to lose by the proposed sentence of 25 years as being considered under Bill C-84.

I would remind the House once again of the recent escapade of Donald Kelly who obtained a toy gun and attempted to escape from an Ontario prison. Imagine what would have happened had it been a real gun: we would probably have had six dead guards on our hands. To continue:

For those reasons, the Hon. Warren Allmand, Solicitor General of Canada, who did not have the courage to disclose those facts to the hon. members of the House of Commons, should in conscience resign from his cabinet position since he has lost the faith of all penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers across this land.

Please consider very carefully in all conscience, keeping in mind the security of your own family along with the penitentiary personnel and law enforcement officers of this country, the following: "We want to make it very clear that if a majority of hon. members vote against retention, some people are going to be murdered. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by your House on this bill".

In conscience,

Paul Caouette,
Executive Secretary-Treasurer,
Public Service Alliance of Canada

These are some of the reasons for which I am supporting this motion, and I hope every member of the House will give serious consideration to supporting it.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a further opportunity to speak on this important subject because I believe we are dealing with a critical aspect of our whole system of law and order when we address ourselves to this motion. We have an opportunity before us now to uphold that system at least to a degree by affording to police and prison officers the protection which many Canadians are demanding.

Prison guards and policemen are, by the very nature of their work, in contact most of the time with lawbreakers and the criminal element of our society. In other words, their chances of being attacked or murdered are very much greater than those of the average citizen. This being the case, they deserve special protection. We owe it to policemen and prison guards to provide them with every reasonable protection we can offer. In recent times we have seen an alarming increase in the taking of hostages both inside and outside prisons, an exercise often designed to make possible the escape or release of inmates held in prison. Such incidents will probably have serious consequences for us in the future and will, undoubtedly, result in the murder of prison guards.

Those who take on jobs as police officers and prison guards are fathers and husbands just like anyone else. When they undertake to make a career as policemen or in prison work they recognize there are certain risks attached to their decision. The question here is how high this risk ought to be. Surely, men and women who embark on a career in this type of work should be able to enjoy a normal life expectancy. We are increasing substantially the risks run by these public servants if we fail to pass the amendment before us.

One of the immediate concerns affecting police forces across the country is whether they will be able in future to recruit sufficient men of high calibre, such as we are privileged to have in our police forces at the present time, to meet the needs of our law enforcement requirements. At the present time, for example, I am advised that the Calgary police force is experiencing great difficulty in meeting its recruitment needs in spite of the fact that pay for policemen in Calgary is No. 4 in Canada and that fringe benefits are equal to the best. The pressure is already beginning to be felt. The removal of capital punishment to the extent indicated in this motion is likely to have serious effects in terms of police reaction and morale.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that last winter, following the killing of policemen in the province of Quebec, there was a strong likelihood of the entire Quebec provincial police force going out on strike in protest. A few years ago, in Montreal, when the police decided to walk out the result was chaos. If we remove this important protection from the law we are inviting a reaction from our police forces every time there is a brutal slaying of a policeman in this country. We have all witnessed the paralysing effect of a walk-out by airline pilots. I ask hon. members to consider the effect of a police walk-out, whether in a city or in a province, or of a walk-out by prison guards.

The government, either on purpose or by bad management, seems to have pitted almost every conceivable group in our society against another ever since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power. They have set labour against business, rich against poor, French against English, and in this case law-abiding citizens against the government. If there were to be a widespread walk-out by police or prison guards, or a tide of resignations, the result could be the imposition of martial law in this country.

Why is the removal of the death penalty for any and every possible offence necessary or desirable? The government across the way is directly responsible for the deterioration of law and order in Canada. Its permissive actions and the changes it has made in the law have brought about a much worse society than we had hoped for or deserved. Under this administration, the man who obeys the law, the man who works for his living, is taking a back seat to the law breaker, to those who will not work and to those who are encouraged to live off the system. The removal of protection for our police forces as prescribed in the bill before us is another step backward, a step toward anarchy.

I wish the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) would tell us more about the trial period in connection with abolition which began in 1967 and which was extended in 1973. What trial was conducted? What scientific evidence was gathered? Why did the minister ask the House to extend the trial period a short 32 months ago? What further evidence does the government require? What further evidence did they get? Mr. Speaker, the so-called trial period was not a trial period at all. The whole exercise was a farce. Since the law of Canada was never carried out, no one was ever hanged for the killing of a policeman or a prison guard. There was no deterrent, no experiment. We have, in effect, been living with the complete abolition of capital punishment since the Prime Minister took office.

This example of lawbreaking and disregard for the wishes and feelings of the people is a matter of national concern. The government seems to believe that laws are to be passed with no regard whatsoever for the wishes of the people. It will learn that as a result of this arrogance and disregard it will be thrown out of office. Governments and members of this House, no matter what anyone says, are here to speak for their constituents, and when they do not the voters find representatives who will speak for them. I know that members opposite are under tremendous pressure from their constituents. I understand this is particularly the case with members from the province of Quebec. It is interesting that their leader has so much influence on those opposite that they listen to him and not to their constituents.

● (1210)

Capital punishment in the United States is an example which cannot be overlooked. The Supreme Court ruled very recently that the death penalty is not a cruel or unusual punishment. Thus, the death penalty can and will be imposed by many more states. Some 37 states have returned to the death penalty and it is expected now that many more, in fact most states in the United States will.

If we do not uphold capital punishment in respect of the killing of prison guards and policemen, I would ask you to consider what are the consequences for our Canadian police forces which are considered to be basically conservative groups of men. If we remove this important protection from the law in respect of our police officers, and they are faced every day and night with investigations, checking out people in automobiles and strange, dark places, they are going to step out with their guns drawn. I can assure you that they are going to shoot first and shoot to kill if there is any question about their own security or their own lives. There will be no trial and no jury. The action will be all over. In addition to that, it is clear today, although it may not have been a few years ago, that in such instances these police officers who kill in the carrying out of their duty will have the full support of the Canadian people.

I think it is important to put on record the fact that since this experiment of partial abolition, which truly has been complete abolition, there have been 37 policemen and three prison guards killed in our country. If we consider the statements made by the Solicitor General even in the last few weeks, we see that he has made it very clear in his speeches around the country that he intends to alter the commitment he is apparently making that the 25-year imprisonment provision will be enforced in respect of those convicted for first-degree murder. It is very clear from the history of this government and the statements of the minister that they will very soon start to whittle and chip away at this proposed punishment so that it will be just a matter of time until it is reduced to 20 years, 15 years or perhaps even 10 years.

The Solicitor General has a very important place in this whole matter of law enforcement in our country. He answers to parliament for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for the prisons and penitentiaries of our country. When it is clear that the prison personnel and, certainly privately, members of the RCMP do not agree and take a very strong reaction against the bill, specifically the removal of this clause to protect prison guards and policemen as referred to in the amendment we are now discussing, then it becomes clear he has lost the confidence of those to whom he is supposed to show leadership. If this clause of the bill is defeated, then I think the Solicitor General has no alternative but to resign his position as Solicitor General.

In closing, I wish once more to refer to this question of capital punishment and whether it is a deterrent. This has constantly been the question raised by hon. members opposite and by the Prime Minister. A constituent of mine, Mr. R. G. Campbell, has stated, as have so many, that the question of capital punishment is one in respect of which each person's opinion is just as valid as the next. The claim of some privileged, or some special knowledge or understanding which is made by hon. members opposite that apparently is not available to Canadians at large is the basis of an absolutely foolish and ridiculous argument.

[Mr. Bawden.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about your own members?

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, we are hearing a lot of noise from members opposite who undoubtedly feel terribly sensitive about this. They should feel sensitive, because it is clear we do not have a free vote as this is a government bill.

An hon. Member: It is a free vote.

Mr. Bawden: It is a government bill and there is no free vote on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bawden: If there had been a truly free vote on the government side, the bill would have been defeated on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: I think it is clear to the Canadian people that by calling this a free vote, yet maintaining cabinet solidarity and putting heavy pressure on members opposite in the Liberal party, the government is truly deceiving the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bawden: I am not surprised that we hear from so many sensitive members opposite at this point in time. In closing, I would simply say that I hope when members vote on this amendment they will listen to the people of Canada rather than to their leader, the Prime Minister. I hope that after listening to their constituents they will support this amendment which provides for the retention of capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. I hope, too, hon. members will reconsider their position on third reading, because if the current trend is not altered and this bill is passed, it will profoundly and adversely affect the future of all Canadians.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in support of the amendment to Bill C-84 in relation to capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards, presented by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). I was not going to enter this debate until I heard the speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). He claims to be a retentionist, but during his speech he said he would not support this amendment because it would make second-class citizens of many Canadians. I really do not understand the logic or the rationalization of that hon. member, if in fact he is a retentionist.

I heard this argument used during the last debate we had in respect of a further five-year experiment to abolish capital punishment with the exception of cases involving the murder of policemen and prison guards. The people who put this argument forward were, of course, in favour of the retention of capital punishment for everyone, but they certainly agreed most emphatically that there should be capital punishment for anyone who murders a policeman or prison guard.

Now we are speaking about the total abolition of capital punishment and we have already had one vote in which those people who are in favour of abolition won by a very slim margin. A retentionist argues now that he will not support this motion, which is the very motion we should favour, that there be capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. How can anyone rationalize his position and say he will not support the motion because it will make second-class citizens of people who are not policemen or prison guards? How can this position be rationalized thus?

The motion put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta is essential for the maintenance of law and order in Canada. The government came forth with what they call a peace and security package in Bill C-83 and Bill C-84 which they said would bring better law and order to this country. When we were able to analyze these two pieces of legislation, together with the people of Canada, we found we could not buy this package which, as the government said, would bring better law and order. Bill C-83 deals mostly with gun control. It will not do much to control guns in the hands of criminals; it could even make criminals out of people who have guns. The people of Canada quickly saw through this and the majority of them continue to favour retention of capital punishment. In my view, there are more people in favour of capital punishment since this package was presented than there were before. Before these two bills were put forward, well over 50 per cent were in favour of capital punishment, whereas now nearly 80 per cent favour it.

There was a five-year experiment in retaining capital punishment for the murder of policemen and prison guards only. A bill was presented a second time, which received less acceptance in the House, extending the experiment for a further two years. We know that during that time 37 policemen were murdered in Canada and three prison guards. These are the kinds of results that the people of Canada are looking at. Canadians want law and order in Canada, which they do not have under the present government.

The work of our policemen and prison guards should be made easier, and this is what the amendment before us attempts to achieve. Those of us who are retentionists, as well as those who are abolitionists, should look closely at this amendment and be ready to vote in favour of it. By taking away the last line of protection that policemen and prison guards have, we are making their jobs that much harder. People who are looking for jobs in Canada, the very people whom the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) wants to put to work, will not be interested in obtaining that kind of employment which affords them no protection, where they have to put their lives on the line at all times. The government will have a hard time recruiting people for these jobs.

We know that many prison guards who have been working at their jobs for a long time and who know much more about that work than we as parliamentarians do, are saying they will not be happy in their jobs if this bill passes unamended, and in fact they will be ready to retire early or find some other work. To replace them we will have to find another group of people; but they, also, will find these jobs hazardous, especially when they hear people who do not respect law and order saying, "Let's go out and get a policeman tonight". Policemen are very aware of this situation and aware of the hazards of their jobs.

I say we should make our policemen and prison guards proud of their profession and proud of the opportunity to carry out law and order. We should provide protection for them so that they do not have to be worried about their lives. I say to every member of the House—and especially to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—that they should look at this amendment which would provide better protection for policemen and prison guards. It is a good amendment to Bill C-84. I am certainly in support of it and I hope the amendment will be accepted.

● (1230)

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate in support of the motion which is before us and which proposes that clause 4 of Bill C-84 be deleted. If I may, first of all I would like to outline why I am most anxious that hon. members consider allowing the death penalty to remain with respect to the killing of jail guards and policemen. If we read Bill C-84, it is very disturbing to find that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) proposes that a man may be convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment and can literally be out on the streets—granted, with an escort—within a day for various lengths of time. I draw the attention of hon. members to clause 21 of the bill, which appears at page 12. It proposes an amendment to section 674 of the Criminal Code, and I refer specifically to section 674(2) which provides:

> Notwithstanding the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act, in the case of any person sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole for a specified number of years pursuant to this act, no absence without escort may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act—

It specifies that this will be the case until there are only three years to run of the full sentence. In short, what the Solicitor General is suggesting is that even where a person is convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment, under certain circumstances he may be permitted to leave jail provided he has an escort.

Let us consider those circumstances, because this is what I find most disturbing. We find that absence with an escort is dealt with in another bill which is before is, Bill C-83. In that bill it is clearly set out that if someone is incarcerated, he may be temporarily absent with an escort under two different circumstances. The first is that the Commissioner of Penitentiaries, for an unlimited period of time for medical reasons and for a period not exceeding 15 days for humanitarian reasons or to assist in the rehabilitation of the inmate, may grant leave with an escort to anyone in jail. Second, and this is what I find most disturbing, any officer in charge of a jail, for a period not exceeding 15 days for medical reasons and for a period not exceeding five days for humanitarian reasons, or to assist in the rehabilitation of the inmate, may allow an inmate to be absent from jail provided he has an escort.

I have mentioned that the person in charge of a jail may permit an inmate to leave for five days. I point out that under the existing act it is only three days. However, the Solicitor General is proposing in Bill C-83, that such a person be given two extra days leave or the right to be absent, provided he has an escort.

I think the misrepresentation which has taken place with respect to the so-called life sentence which the government is proposing is most unfair to the Canadian public. The Solicitor General should have made it abundantly clear that there is no life sentence in the context in which that term is usually used. Abolitionists have said to me, in referring to life sentences, that they generally think of a Devil's Island type of situation where a man is convicted and for 25 years, come what may, he stays shut off from society and there is no way he can get back into society. In effect, the key is thrown away.

Let us be clear; that is not what the government is proposing in the bill before us. It is suggesting that even where a person is convicted of murder he will be sentenced to a term of life, or 25 years, which is open to review in 15 years, but let us bear in mind that during that period even for the first 12 years he can be absent from prison as long as he has an escort. Who is the escort to be? The escort is to be a policeman or some other peace officer as defined in the act. I think that is an extremely dangerous provision.

As hon. members know, I am proposing that the Solicitor General's amendment to the Criminal Code contained in Bill C-84 be amended, because I believe that under no circumstances should a person be permitted to leave jail, even with an escort, without further review or confirmation that there is a minimum of danger. My amendment suggests that absence with an escort should not be granted unless there is a judge's order. I have discussed this with the minister. He points out that the wording may be ambiguous. With that I agree, and subsequently a colleague of mine will be moving a further amendment to my amendment to make clear exactly what we are trying to achieve. We are saying that there should be no absence without an escort, under any circumstances, but that absence with an escort must only be with the approval of a judge or, as has been suggested, perhaps with the approval of the National Parole Board. That will be the tenor of our amendment to be introduced subsequently.

I was a little startled when the hon. member who spoke before me referred to the remarks which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) made yesterday. Speaking on the amendment which is before us, namely, the retention of the death penalty for murderers of prison guards and policemen, the hon. member stated that, while he is a retentionist, he felt it unfair to have the death penalty for what he though was a select group of society. He wonders why policemen are different from others. He stated, as reported at page 15133 of Hansard:

> I believe that the murder of a policeman or a prison guard is no more, or no less, important than the killing of a child, a fisherman or any other member of our society . . . I still feel that this is a discriminatory provision, and the sooner we get rid of the idea that some groups in society are more important than others, the better off we will be.

I am not saying that the death penalty should not be extended to many more classes of murder than simply the killing of a jail guard or a policeman, but I do say that the hon. member is quite wrong in saying that policemen should not have the added protection which the death penalty provides. I say that because we must accept that policemen, contrary to what the hon. member says, unlike firemen and unlike most people in society, are charged with the preservation of our whole system of law and order. They are the front-line troops, so to speak, and I think this parliament must do everything in its power to ensure that they are respected when they are on duty.

Perhaps one of the main reasons I feel so strongly about the retention of the death penalty is that when I was a reporter for the Toronto Daily Star, many times I had the opportunity to be with the police when they brought in people who were involved in crime. I remember very vividly that day in March, 1952, when two detectives were shot down in the city of Toronto by Steven Suchan and Leonard Jackson. I think if any member of the House had witnessed what transpired before that shooting, what transpired after the shooting and what happened afterwards as far as the police were concerned in rounding up the two convicts, they would be a lot less sure that they should vote for abolition.

Perhaps many hon. members do recall that shooting. Sergeant detective Edmund Ton died 17 days later, and his assistant detective sergeant Roy Perry was wounded and recovered but could take no part in active police work and occupied a desk job for the rest of his days on the force. He is now dead. I mention this because I remember the night they finally cornered Leonard Jackson in Toronto. I remember the apprehension of the police as they left police headquarters to try to arrest Leonard Jackson. I remember Jackson's statement, hollered from the house he was in, that the police would have to come and get him. They did, Mr. Speaker. I remember the account of what happened in Montreal when Steven Suchan was cornered in his apartment. The police had to go in with guns drawn. He was shot as he tried to shoot the police who went into the apartment.

I believe for members of the House to suggest that policeman should not be given the added protection of making it clear to a criminal that if he dare shoot a policeman or a prison guard he, in turn, will lose his life is to let down our police force and prison guards. In fact, I think the government must carry a heavy weight through insisting that this legislation be passed.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), perhaps feeling that there was not sufficient support for this bill, stated in this House that members should keep in mind that if they voted against this bill and it did not pass, some people in this country would hang. I say, let the Prime Minister remember that to the degree he insist and his cabinet colleagues insist that this bill be passed, every future murder in this country is on their hands to the degree that it could have been deterred. While the government weighs the fate of the 11 people who are now sentenced to die, while they hesitate to commute, hoping that this legislation will be passed and then they will not have to take that position, I say to hon. members that since the death penalty was abolished, to all intents and purposes, 65 people in this country have been sentenced to die. Of that number, 54 death sentences have been commuted and 11 are awaiting the decision of the government and the passage of this bill.

As we weigh the possibility of whether these people should be legally executed or not, let us not forget that in the same period over 4,000 Canadians were illegally executed. They were the victims of this type of crime. I think it would have served the Prime Minister better to have pointed out that retention of the death penalty, at least in a limited sense and certainly for prison guards and policemen, may help to deter future murderers, and if in any way we can lower the death rate from murder in this country, we should. I think the government is not acting responsibly and I call upon hon. members to support this amendment on that point alone.

The government likes to raise the question of how some of our members have voted. Have hon. members on the government side noticed that in the second reading vote on this matter, 80 per cent of the Conservative caucus voted for retention?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I would suggest this means that 80 per cent of the Conservative caucus is right in step with 80 per cent of the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I would find it interesting if government members could explain why approximately 17 per cent of their number voted for retention and something over 80 per cent voted for abolition, bearing in mind that the cabinet bloc—27 in number—voted solidly for abolition.

An hon. Member: Like your front bench.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, 80 per cent of our caucus voted for retention, and a little over 80 per cent on the government side voted for abolition. Let us not confuse the question of who is voting how. The other point I would make—and obviously government members are confused about it—is that this is represented by the government as a free vote. Where is the freedom on their side to reflect the 80 per cent of public opinion in Canada that says retention should continue? The free vote is on this side of the House and we, to the extent of 80 per cent, voted for retention. I think it is a credit to our caucus that we were allowed that freedom of vote.

I have touched briefly on why I believe this amendment should be supported and why we should allow the death penalty to continue with regard to the killing of prison guards and policemen. I should like to back this up with some statistics. It is often stated—I notice the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said that somehow what I was saying was totally different from what the Prime Minister was saying—that it is a deterrent to have the death penalty.

On January 26, 1973, at page 688 of Hansard, speaking on Bill C-2—which was the old version of Bill C-84—the Solicitor General stated that he would like to have three six-year periods to compare with respect to three approaches to capital punishment, and at the end of that time he could decide whether the death penalty should be eliminated permanently. The minister said, in 1973:

> We are just receiving the statistics for 1971. It seems to me that we must see the process, commenced in 1967, through to its logical conclusion. That further necessitates making no substantial change in the law until such time as we are in a position to fully understand the impact of the partial abolition. Bill C-2 will allow us to complete this evaluation. If the House agrees to the provisions of Bill C-2 we will be able to compare three periods of approximately six years when three distinct and different laws concerning the death penalty prevailed. If we are properly to acquit ourselves of our responsibilities to the public, Mr. Speaker, we must be prepared to grant the time necessary to study the effects of the three laws so that decisions can be made on sound ground.

I agree with that, Mr. Speaker. I believe it was an interesting approach to suggest that we look at these three six-year periods, but I would point out that the minister has very cleverly avoided comparing the three six-year periods either in this House or anywhere else. I should like to give the basic statistics of what has occurred in those three six-year periods. For example, the first period ran from 1956—

● (1250)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may only put those facts on record if he has the unanimous consent of the House, because his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members. The first period was between 1956 and 1962. I am referring to Statistics Canada figures regarding murders. The average number of murders per 100,000 of population during the first six-year period, when the death penalty not only was on the statute books but criminals were executed was 1.1 in Canada. I have referred to Jackson and Suchan in Toronto who were executed in December of the year they committed the crime. In the next six years, while in theory the death penalty was still in force in this country, in practice every sentence was commuted and there was no death penalty. In that period the murder rate rose to 1.5 per 100,000 population. Now let us look at the last six years. As the minister said when speaking on second reading, last year the murder rate in Canada had risen to 2.4 per 100,000 population, a rate more than double that applying to the 1956 to 1962 period.

An hon. Member: And what about other serious crimes?

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member asks, what about other serious crimes? That is a strange twist. The hon. member should realize that our crime rate is rising because the government is taking a more lenient attitude to those who commit crime.

Mr. Horner: It is too permissive.

Mr. Stevens: Those guilty of the most serious of all crimes, murder, should be punished with death; only then will people realize that this government means business. I emphasize that I am not making an emotional argument. Statistics show clearly the rising murder rate in this country and elsewhere. Faced with such a rise in the murder rate, the government should propose the continuation of the death penalty, not its elimination. In short, it is evident that the government's attitude to the death penalty in the three six-year periods to which I have referred has allowed the murder rate to rise. Ordinarily, you would think that a minister would say, "I have looked at the figures and think for the time being the death penalty should continue." But for reasons which I do not understand, the minister says exactly the opposite.

I have referred to the attitude of the solicitor general of the United States who made known his views on the death penalty in a brief submitted to the supreme court of the United States. As you know, the United States supreme court has held that the death penalty, in certain circumstances, is constitutional and may be imposed. Many attorneys general of states of the United States hold similar views. They think the death penalty is a deterrent, are fighting to have it instituted in cases where it is not on the statute books and to have it retained in cases where it is.

The attorney general of California, E. J. Younger, submitted two briefs to the United States supreme court. I invite hon. members to read those briefs. In them he set out clearly why it is thought in California that the death penalty is a deterrent. For example, in one brief he says that the Los Angeles police department conducted a survey between December 21, 1970, and February 4, 1971. It interviewed 316 arrestees. Unarmed suspects were asked why they did not arm themselves, and armed suspects who did not use their weapons were asked why they did not. Of the 316 persons interviewed, 217 denied their crime or refused to make a statement, primarily out of a desire not to jeopardize their case. The positive statements made by the remaining 99 are classified as follows:

1. Deterred by fear of death penalty from carrying weapon or operating weapon, 50 (50.5 per cent).

2. Unaffected by death penalty because it was no longer being enforced, 7 (7.07 per cent).

3. Undeterred by death penalty, would kill whether it was enforced or not, 10 (10.1 per cent).

4. Unaffected by death penalty because they would not carry weapon in any event, primarily out of fear of being injured themselves or of injuring someone else, 32 (32.3 per cent).

Clearly, the majority of those who made statements agreed that they did not carry a weapon because they were frightened of the death penalty. I suggest that even if only one person is deterred from carrying a weapon and committing murder, the death penalty should be retained as a worth-while measure. The attorney general of California stated in his brief:

The conclusions drawn from the study are as follows:

The adoption of an effectively enforced death penalty system is a deterrent in the prevention of homicides.

The report also notes:

If this study contained only one and not the 50 documented cases supporting the fact that the death penalty is a deterrent, there should be no question of its retention and enforcement—

Appendix C to the brief quotes the actual statements made by people who had been arrested. The reasons given for using or not using a weapon are most interesting. For example, one suspect said:

Since in reality there is no death penalty in California, I would kill to obtain what I want.

[Mr. Stevens.]

That was the statement of an unarmed robber. A suspect charged with armed robbery said:

I used a pellet gun because I didn't want to kill anyone and be put to death in the gas chamber.

An unarmed burglar who was charged said:

I don't carry a gun. I don't want to be shot at by police and am afraid of the death penalty.

Another man interviewed who had been charged with armed robbery said:

I used an unloaded gun in the robbery of a market so I would not hurt anyone and because I am afraid of the death penalty.

May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But the hon. member is already on overtime.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

SMITHS FALLS

CONGRATULATIONS ON ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 fully realizing that unanimous consent is a rare thing in this House. The motion which I will read is of a strictly non-political nature, the substance has been communicated to the appropriate persons in all parties, and I understand that general agreement has been achieved on the matter. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the elected representatives of the people of Canada assembled in the House of Commons on July 8, 1976, extend congratulations and best wishes to the mayor, the members of the municipal council and to all the people of the municipality of Smiths Falls in the province of Ontario on the occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of this leading community in eastern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED FUNDING TO PERMIT CONTINUANCE OF PATROL OF SALMON RIVERS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Lack of funding to provide for the protection of salmon rivers in Newfoundland necessitates the lay-off of river guardians one and two months before the close of the season. The situation is made worse because of low river levels and both these circumstances provide a paradise for poachers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

That this House order the matter to be deemed an emergency and that funding be provided to allow continuance of patrol activity on rivers affected.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented for debate by the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION AMOUNT OF LOAN FOR WHICH STUDENTS ELIGIBLE BE BASED ON ACTUAL EARNINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that all signs indicate that unemployment among students this summer will be even higher than last year's level, which was 14.4 per cent; in view of the fact that the government is directly responsible for much of this unemployment because of its withdrawal of the Opportunities for Youth program, the lack of which departmental studies indicate could have raised student unemployment by two or three per cent last year, and in view of the fact that present Canada student loan plan regulations do not use the amount a student earns during the summer to gauge how much he should be eligible to borrow but instead examine only the number of weeks during which the student was available for work, a procedure which, if followed this fall, will force students unable to find work this summer to discontinue their post-secondary education, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government of Canada follow the example of the Province of Nova Scotia in dealing with students by basing eligibility for loans on their actual income as defined by the Income Tax Act rather than on the number of weeks they are available for work but are possibly unable to find it.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY OF ALCOHOL ABUSE PROGRAM TO NATIVES IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the National Native Alcoholic Abuse Program has not been effectively implemented in the Province of Quebec—indeed, no moneys have been allocated for the program in Quebec to date—and in view of the fact that Indian people have been denied the right to become involved in their own health programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately consult with the responsible native groups in the Province of Quebec to resolve this critical issue.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED EARLY SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE WITH AIR INSPECTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on an urgent and pressing matter. In the light of the fact that the Ministry of Transport has been unable to resolve its differences with air inspectors, and since this dispute is causing considerable hardship to aircraft owners and pilots, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to give his attention to a rapid settlement of this dispute along lines acceptable to both parties.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

RESPONSIBILITY FOR DESTRUCTION OF INTERNAL CORRESPONDENCE OF PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ORGANIZATION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture but, because of the serious nature of it, perhaps I should direct it to the minister responsible for his department in his absence. In view of the fact that the operational head of the PFAA has been committed to trial on charges of criminal fraud and that the House leader has postponed the legislation to repeal PFAA until the trial is over, did the Minister of Agriculture approve the burning of the internal correspondence of PFAA as reported in the House yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will be in the House in a couple of seconds.

An hon. Member: Let's have the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps that question could be deferred until the arrival of the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PURCHASE OF "ORION" AIRCRAFT FROM LOCKHEED—ALLEGED UNITED STATES PRESSURE TO DEAL WITH LOCKHEED

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. Has the question of the purchase of the Orion aircraft from Lockheed been determined by the Cabinet and, if so, will an announcement be made by the appropriate minister to this House with a full statement of the reasons for the decision so that this House, being concerned as it is with a billion dollar deal, with the controversy that surrounds the matter, the doubt about the strategy involved and the stability of the aircraft concerned, will have an opportunity to hear about it and an opportunity to comment on it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, it will be our intention to report to the House when the cabinet has come to the consideration of this matter in a final way. We did not discuss the substantive item this morning in Cabinet. We expect to do so probably next week. Whether we can make this report to the House or whether we will make it to the country will, of course, depend on whether the House is still sitting. It would be our intention to make it to the House if it is still sitting at that time, and I hope it won't.

Mr. Brewin: Again, Mr. Speaker, this is a question that would be much more appropriately addressed to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence—

An hon. Member: Here he is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Defence has recovered his breath I should like to ask him this question. There is a story published by the Financial Post under the byline of Clyde Baxter which says that the minister recently took a rather quite, unannounced trip to Washington, and suggests he was there advised, or perhaps pressured, that the United States authorities would prefer Canada to purchase Orions rather than consider Boeings or some other possibilities. Is that correct?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, parts of the statement are correct and parts are not correct.

An hon. Member: Which are which?

Mr. Richardson: The part that is correct is that I did go to Washington, and I did have discussions with senior officials of the government and the United States navy. My main purpose in going was to find out what they are going to do over the next 20 or 25 years, not to have them tell us what we should do. They did not offer the kind of gratuitous advice that is suggested in that report. They did, however, confirm that they intend to use Lockheed P3-C's well into the 1990's.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister advise the House whether any of these very important discussions going on between the government of Canada and Lockheed aircraft are being committed to paper, or is the whole thing to be conducted on the basis of a gentleman's agreement similar to the type that the Prime Minister a few weeks ago told me very definitely in this House he preferred for important matters of this kind?

An hon. Member: Between friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. gentleman is not remembering what I told him. I said that every day hundreds of millions of dollars of transactions go on through gentlemen's agreement and he, as a gentleman, should remember that. He should also remember that having been, I think, president of a stock exchange, where a large part of these transactions take place.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister, of course, as he usually does, did not make any attempt to answer my very pertinent question and it was this. Would he advise the House whether the discussions that are being carried on are being committed to paper, so that each side knows where the other side stands and we do not have this musical comedy fiasco type of thing that we had a few weeks ago when the whole Lockheed deal with Canada fell apart right before our eyes.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would perhaps reassure the hon. member by telling him that we are being cautious this time, but I would not like to have to say whether we are putting it on paper or on tapes.

HARBOURS

MAINTENANCE OF WHARVES ALONG ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

A few weeks ago, I asked the Minister of Transport in the House whether there were discussions between the officials of his department and those of the government of the province of Quebec concerning the wharves along the St. Lawrence River, which constitute the link between the islands and the mainland. He had assured the House that the discussions were continuing. Is the minister in a position today to tell us whether these discussions had favourable results?

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASED SEAWAY TOLLS WHILE HOUSE IN RECESS

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that the increased tolls on the St. Lawrence which are estimated at an additional $15,000 for every load of grain that goes down the river will not be announced while the House is in recess?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a purely speculative story. This whole question has not yet been considered by the government. I do not know at what particular point in time it will come before the government; therefore I cannot tell him whether the House will be here or not.

AGRICULTURE

RESPONSIBILITY FOR DESTRUCTION OF INTERNAL CORRESPONDENCE OF PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ORGANIZATION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I telephoned the minister's office a couple of hours ago about this question, so that he knows of it. In view of the fact that the operational head of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been committed to trial on charges of criminal fraud, and in view of the fact that the House Leader has postponed the legislation to repeal the PFAA until the trial is over, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he approved the burning of the internal correspondence of the PFAA administration, as reported to the House yesterday by the parliamentary secretary?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is well aware of the fact that the RCMP had access to all the material, went through all the files for the court case, and so on. As far as I am concerned, the officer in charge was within his rights and juridiction because they were closing the offices of PFAA. I am sure the hon. member is also aware that all the other documents, books, etcetera, are in the archives at the present time and therefore anyone can check, excepting the material—

Mr. Fairweather: Excepting the evidence.

Mr. Whelan: The material that was destroyed was destroyed by the officer in charge under normal circumstances, I am told.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is very obvious that someone must have authorized the burning of this internal correspondence. Does the minister know who it was, and specifically, does he or anyone in his office know whether the advice came from the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board or any of his staff?

● (1420)

Mr. Whelan: The information that was given to me was that no instructions were given to the person in charge who decided that all insignificant documents should be destroyed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: As I said earlier, the RCMP went through all the files and kept all the documents they thought of any importance, and those are still before the courts.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In view of the minister's answer that the person in charge of the office on his own authority destroyed these documents, is the minister fully aware of the fact that the person in charge of the office is up on a charge of criminal fraud laid by the RCMP?

Mr. Whelan: I am sure the hon. member knows that that is not correct. I am sure he knows also that the RCMP said there was insufficient evidence of any wrong-doing to proceed any further with the case, and it is up to the attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan to do anything further if he so desires.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member at three o'clock. The hon. member for Red Deer.

INQUIRY WHETHER PFAA PAPERS DESTROYED INCLUDED DOCUMENTS RELATED TO FIRING OF STAFF

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. In view of the fact the Minister of Agriculture has been warned and that he was questioned in the House as early as December, 1974 concerning improprieties within the PFAA administration, can he inform the House whether or not the statement by his parliamentary secretary yesterday that internal correspondence has been destroyed included papers related to the firing of long term PFAA staff?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The statement in the House is clear. It states clearly what was done. I have nothing further to add to it.

INADEQUACY OF REPLY TO MOTION AS RESULT OF DESTRUCTION OF PFAA PAPERS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): In view of the fact that the PFAA fund amounts to approximately $9 million plus compound interest, will the minister be accountable, and with what accuracy can relevant questions be answered when documents have been destroyed? The papers delivered to my office in response to motion 102 are inadequate.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member has the right to his opinion but the motion clearly asks that material such as travelling expense accounts, wage claim reports, fieldmen's work reports and mileage diaries be made available, but internal correspondence was destroyed in the process of closing down the office, and that is what is usually done when an office is being closed down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: But it was done just before the cops got there!

PROPOSED SUBSIDIES FOR RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. A few days ago the Consumers' Association of Canada in a brief to Ottawa stated:

> The federal government should negotiate contracts with the railways for specific passenger rail services in Canada with subsidies increasing with the number of passengers carried.

In view of the fact that incentives of this kind are very likely necessary in order to encourage the railways to put more into passenger services, will the federal government give serious consideration to these representations by the Consumers' Association of Canada, and can we expect action pretty soon?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In view of the fact that when the policy was announced in January we indicated that it would be our policy to move to a 100 per cent subsidy basis in that we will be looking for a system that gave incentives to the railways to run the business as well as possible. The proposal from the Consumers' Association of Canada is fully in accordance with government policy. Indeed, I have asked my office to indicate to them that I appreciate their specific suggestion. We will be looking at this and other alternatives to accomplish that result.

TRADE

MEAT AGREEMENT WITH AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND— REASON FOR LOW PRICE

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it relates to yesterday's agricultural news release covering Canada's new meat agreement with Australia and New Zealand which effectively establishes a discount price on all Oceania beef imported into Canada of 6 cents a pound below the same meats entering the United States. Will the minister explain why Canada's trade representatives agreed to any price discount at all? Why should a pound of imported offshore beef be worth any less in Canada than in the United States? I ask this question in view of the very serious market depressing effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Let's hear the answer to that one.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice in order to prepare the mathematical calculations. I will be very glad to find out the basis of the conclusion which was drawn and make it available to the hon. member. I understand that it constitutes certain differentials in cost with regard to shipments to Canada and to the United States, but I will get the figures for the hon. member.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCING MEAT IMPORT LAW— MINISTER'S VIEW OF PRICE ESTABLISHED IN AGREEMENT WITH AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious consequences of these offshore imports, which have now increased 51 per cent in 1976 over 1975—and during last week alone some 6.4 million pounds of these imports came into Canada—will the minister indicate if his department will now give serious consideration to a Canadian meat import law, as suggested by cattlemen's representatives yesterday in Ottawa in discussions with officials from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and from the Department of Agriculture, and does the minister personally support the 6 cent discount price which was agreed to yesterday?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that I am glad to see that, along with the Canadian cattlemen, it appears that the hon. member also wants more intervention in the beef marketing system we have in our country.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Whelan: He seems to realize that there is something more than the North American market affecting beef marketing in our country.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Whelan: I am sure the hon. member knows that the 6 cent differential per pound, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said, shows that this can be a realistic figure because of the tariff and freight rates which are involved in this type of program. I am certainly not happy about what is happening, and I have asked my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to investigate whether chain restaurants or the consuming public who are going to be buying processed meat, hamburger, etc. are going to be ripped off.

However, I also want to point out that our figures show nothing as outlandish as the hon. member has indicated with regard to the increased importation of Australian and New Zealand meat into this country. Our figures show it would be more like 25 per cent.

Mr. Hargrave: I can assure the minister that those figures are entirely up to date. I would like to ask him if he is aware that at least another 16 million pounds of offshore imports can legally come into this country, exclusive of the 6 cent discount price, that is, at discounts of up to 25 cents.

Mr. Whelan: I apologize for not answering part of the question the hon. member asked before about the import law. We are studying the ramifications of having such a law, but I want to make it plain and clear that the Americans, who have been pointing out that they are the great free traders of the world, have such an import law, and we think it is darned restrictive. If the hon. member and his party are asking us to interfere with that free market, we are willing to consider that if they are willing to back it.

CITIZENSHIP

REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF CASE OF DR. GERALD WIVIOTT

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in the absence of the Secretary of State, and I hope he will relay the question to him or attempt to answer it.

Now that Bill C-20 has passed through the Senate without amendment, making the residence requirement three years rather than five years, is there any method to deal with such urgent cases as Dr. Gerald Wiviott, an eminent psychiatrist and Olympic fencer who has held landed immigrant status for your years and eight months but cannot compete for Canada without clarification of his Canadian citizenship status, in view of the fact that the IOC must settle these matters before 12 o'clock tomorrow night?

● (1430)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Citizenship Act is under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Secretary of State, but I believe the fact of its passage should be made known to the Olympic Committee so that they can make the decision which is theirs to make, recognizing that this is now only a technical matter involving the timing of proclamation which would permit the gentleman to become a full Canadian citizen and therefore eligible to compete.

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION OF TAIWAN AS REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns participation in the Olympic Games of the representatives of the Republic of China under their flag. In view of the degree to which Canadian public opinion has been aroused, and considering the views of Canadians of Chinese origin who have overwhelmingly condemned the attitude of the Canadian government in this regard and coupled with the condemnation in the press of Canada and the international press—yesterday the New York Times and the Washington Post—and the condemnation today by the representative of the Canadian Olympic Committee, would the Prime Minister consider permitting the representatives from the Republic of China and their flag to be shown and to participate in the Olympics?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has quoted some authorities to support his two-China policy but I am sure there are many Canadians—I would say the overwhelming majority—who have accepted and support this government's position that there is only one China and that there may—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —so I am not overly impressed by what the right hon. gentleman describes as "an overwhelming majority". I am somewhat disturbed that on an issue like this, where the government of Canada has an obvious case, where the IOC has been given more than a year's warning about this difficulty and where it has let it ride, I am a little disturbed that as a matter of course so many Canadians follow the example of the right hon. gentleman and assume the government is wrong. The government is right on this particular issue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it certainly would be an abnormality if this government were right in anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Prime Minister if he has forgotten the contribution made by the Republic of China whose government through the years stood with us for freedom against the surrender to communism. Are they now to be thrown overboard—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Back in 1962?

Mr. Fraser: You fools thought you could win a nuclear war!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot hear the supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the Prime Minister forgotten that, and will he not take action on it because this is giving Canada a black eye everywhere in the world? I ask him to give reconsideration to it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I disagree with that assertion. This gives Canada a black eye with those people who still believe there are two Chinas or alternatively—

Mr. Fraser: We still believe in undertakings.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps it is a mistake to talk of the two-China policy. I think the right hon. gentleman believes there is only a one-China policy but he still thinks Taiwan is the government of China. The world has moved on since the right hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

RENT INCREASES IN LIMITED DIVIDEND PROJECT ON JEAN BRILLON STREET, VILLE LA SALLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move on to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the dispute between the tenants and the landlord at a CMHC financed limited dividend project of four buildings on Jean Brillon Street in Ville La Salle, Montreal, concerning proposed increases in rent and breaches of the landlord-tenant agreement, would the minister contact the parties concerning the dispute and determine if the proposed rent increases of 19.4 per cent are in violation of Quebec rent law and if the breaches of the landlord and tenant agreement are contrary to landlord-tenant law in Quebec?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not keep track of every individual project across the country but on this one I happen to know that my officials have been in touch with the tenants. There has not been an increase in rent since 1972. The total increase was 19 per cent and the tenants have been informed. It was in keeping with the undertaking we have with the owner of the building so that it reflected actual costs. In so far as whether it is in line with Quebec legislation, I shall check that out and advise the hon. member.

PARTICIPATION OF TENANTS OF LIMITED DIVIDEND PROJECTS IN NEGOTIATIONS FOR RENT INCREASES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister going to give the tenants of limited dividend projects and public housing units the right to participate in the negotiations concerning rent increases with regard to the maintenance of standards and also in providing a grievance procedure? When will tenants have the opportunity to negotiate on these very important matters in view of the fact that the minister has promised it many times over the past year?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the rental agreement was an agreement between the lender and the landlord under specific conditions. As the hon. member will understand, this is an even more tenuous relationship than when the private lenders are the principal lenders, as in this case. We are working out procedures with some of the tenants groups that are organized. We are trying to be as responsive as possible and to make sure that rules are followed and standards maintained. Under the arrangements that we are working toward to which the hon. member is referring in Toronto, these were superseded by the rent control regulations in Ontario. We are trying to be as responsive and sensitive to the needs as possible but there are contractual difficulties.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ALLEGED ABANDONMENT OF SERVOCENTER AT BRANDON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister aware of the threatened closure of the CNR Servocentre in Brandon notwithstanding the promise that was made when local railway stations were closed a few years ago that service to customers in western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan would be upgraded by establishing a centrally located Servocentre? Would the minister undertake to end this continuous downgrading of transportation services in western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the report to that effect until the hon. member very kindly gave me notice of his question at a couple of minutes before two o'clock. I shall look into the matter and see where it stands.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for the delay in sending the message—it must have gone through the mail. In view of the CNR statement that the move would mean a saving of only $7,000 a year, would the minister in his reply square this with the large sums of money that have been spent by DREE in regional development in that area—development that will be placed in jeopardy by this constant downgrading of transportation services, including the discontinuance of air service begun some three years ago?

● (1440)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously, the impact is one of those things which will have to be looked at. I think of greater importance is the first allegation, namely, that an obligation would be neglected. I think the hon. member may want to look into his own postal services. I am informed that the message arrived by personal messenger at two minutes to two. There may be some problem between our offices.

HARBOURS

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR AID FOR EXPANDED CONTAINER FACILITY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Probably it should be supplementary to the question which may be asked by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. I will put mine first. In view of the necessity to treat equitably all developments in our major ports and inasmuch as Beaufort Flats received the sum of approximately $20 million with respect to land fill for the development of that container facility would the minister be prepared to give equitable consideration to the port of Halifax with respect to its expanded container facility?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, naturally we attempt to give equitable treatment to all our ports. Indeed, we are adopting a policy for better reflecting costs in various structures, which will do just that. I think the hon. member will support that program. This specific action with regard to Beaufort Flats arose partly because of dredging needs; therefore the fill is for developing the future use of the property, but it is without any immediate use.

HALIFAX—ROLE OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT IN EXPANDING CONTAINER FACILITIES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a two-part supplementary question to the Minister of Transport? First, would the hon. gentleman not agree that the initiative for the expansion of container facilities in Halifax-Dartmouth by general, that is, dominion-provincial, agreements are being left with the provincial government; second, that so far as the government of Nova Scotia is concerned, it has not made its representation to the federal government as to the site, or as to cost sharing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we will not close any doors absolutely, although what has been done so far has been done essentially at provincial initiative.

FINANCE

LOAN BY IMPERIAL BANK OF COMMERCE TO BRITISH FIRM FOR USE IN RHODESIA—ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister ask the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to explain allegations that it participated in a loan to a British company to exploit its mining interests in Rhodesia which, if true, is clearly contrary to the United Nations sanctions and contrary to Canadian foreign policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had the same reaction when I read the story this morning. I will be gald to pursue the matter.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECLASSIFICATION OF ECONOMISTS, SOCIOLOGISTS AND STATISTICIANS—CONSULTATION WITH GROUPS CONCERNED—APPOINTMENT OF CONCILIATOR

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question to the President of the Treasury Board relates to Treasury Board's unilateral decision to reclassify the positions of economists, sociologists and statisticians. Can the minister assure the House that the association will be allowed adequate consultation in setting up the new classification structure, particularly since they were not consulted in the decision to dismantle the existing one? Would the minister also advise the House what length of time he expects this procedure to take?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have proceeded as usual when it was necessary to do some reclassifications. I do not know how long it will take, but I think it could take two or three months. The growth in that sector has been quite extensive during the past six years. It was obvious that the number of classifications was inadequate, this is why we were compelled to proceed in such a way.

I think that my officials are prepared to consult. However, the decision rests with Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House why Treasury Board refuses to bargain with the association on all cost items until the new system is set up and why Treasury Board has so vigorously opposed the appointment of a conciliator; and can he assure the House that Treasury Board will abide by the report of the conciliator in this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have just said that reclassification is the responsibility of the employer and we expect to exercise our rights to that effect. However, if we can consult, we will do so, but we cannot submit ourselves to arbitration in such circumstances.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RESPONSIBILITY FOR REQUESTING STAY OF PROCEEDINGS IN CASE OF ERNEST BUCHAN

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice, of which I gave him notice earlier this day and which is supplementary to questions asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Red Deer? Did the Minister of Justice issue instructions to the attorney general for the province of Saskatchewan to ask for a stay of proceedings in the case of the Queen v. Ernest Buchan who was charged with fraud pursuant to section 338(1) of the Criminal Code in relation to his duties with the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The answer to it is, no. He referred to a prosecution under the Criminal Code; therefore it is within the responsibility of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. Whether my officials have had communication with him I do not know, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would look into the matter and determine to his satisfaction whether the stay of proceedings was justified.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the stay of execution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: We can see what is on the minister's mind.

Mr. Basford: Any stay could have been undertaken by the Crown officers of the attorney general's department in Saskatchewan. It would not be proper for me to determine whether they were justified, but I will be happy to inquire about the reasons.

MULTICULTURALISM

GRANT TO MR. STRUZIK—REASON FOR SECOND GRANT BEFORE FIRST PROJECT COMPLETED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and is supplementary to the question with respect to multiculturalism grants given in London asked yesterday by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. I wish to make it clear that I am referring to the grant to Mr. Ed Struzik, in London. In light of the fact that the individual who was awarded a controversial grant to study immigration patterns in London and Windsor this year also received a grant from the multiculturalism branch last year which, although scheduled for completion last September 1, is still not finished, may I ask the minister whether he feels it is an acceptable practice for his department to award a second grant to someone who did not complete his first project and what steps, if any, he proposes to take to ensure that people who are given taxpayers' money to complete a project do, in fact, complete it?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. I thought yesterday the hon. member who raised this question was referring to another grant on which I based my reply. Certainly, in view of what the hon. member is now alleging I will be happy to look into the matter and report at the earliest opportunity.

REQUEST MINISTER MEET REPRESENTATIVES OF ETHNIC GROUPS DURING VISIT TO LONDON, ONTARIO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State? Since the Secretary of State is to go to London this week end, to meet with the publisher of the London Free Press and, as well, with the writer of a series of articles exposing the practices of the minister's office in London, can the minister indicate what the nature of his London visit will be and if he is willing to meet with representatives of the various ethnic communities in London who are asking to meet with him at that time?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yes. I was not aware that certain groups are interested in meeting with me. I will be pleased to meet with them. I will be going down tomorrow morning; I will be in London most of the morning and will be delighted to meet these groups. Perhaps the hon. member could give me the names of the groups.

CURRENCY

PROPOSAL TO PRINT NOTES WITH DISTINGUISHING BUMPS FOR BLIND PEOPLE

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: That's you, Pierre.

Mr. Landers: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Landers: Mr. Speaker, since blind people handling paper money have been cheated in the past and since Switzerland apparently has printed its paper money with raised bumps on the lower left hand corner of notes, to enable blind people to determine by the number of bumps the denomination of the bill, would the government of Canada consider printing Canadian paper money with similar sorts of bumps?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised this question with me some time ago and has given me the opportunity to inquire into the matter. I must say this is a good and generous idea. On inquiry, I found that, according to the knowledge we were able to gather, the amount of people being deceived because they were blind by the absence of such identification marks is infinitesimal. It is not certain whether the use of this device would be of any help, even to that very small number who are deceived, because the possibility of counterfeit would still exist. I repeat, the idea seems to be a very good Liberal one, and we will continue to look into it. If the idea seems worthwhile, we will consider its application.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT AMOUNT OF LOAN FOR WHICH STUDENT ELIGIBLE BE BASED ON ACTUAL EARNINGS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Considering the fact that the government has not taken steps which will effectively counter very high levels of unemployment among students, and in view of the fact that the Canada Student Loan Plan now bases the amount of loans available to students not on actual earnings but on the length of time they are available for work, and in view of the fact this will mean many students will not only be unable to find work but will have great difficulty even borrowing enough money to return to school, will the minister tell this House if he is now going to take steps to have the basis of the Canada Student Loan Plan changed to actual earnings as defined by the Income Tax Act in order to be fair to the thousands of students unable to find work this summer?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the best thing is to check the accurancy of the hon. member's assertions first.

ENERGY

DATE OF DECISION ON RADIOACTIVE WASTE DUMP

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that the Atomic Energy Control Board has at long last ruled that the Port Granby area is not suitable for a radioactive waste dump, will the minister tell the House when a decision will be made on the site of another dump so that again at long last the cleanup at Port Hope can start?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this work is continuing. There are discussions between two levels of government. There is a good deal of discussion with the citizens' groups in the area. The hon. member referred to the Port Granby site. He was referring to the permanent disposal site of the existing refinery. That particular refinery has two other problems. One is the cleanup of Port Hope and the other is a permanent disposal site for that low grade radioactivity. The agency is looking at a number of places in Ontario. It has not been able to come to a conclusion on that. However, I can assure the hon. member that work is progressing at a very rapid rate. The other question is the permanent disposal for the wastes of the refinery. The Eldorado Nuclear Corporation presently has this under consideration.

Mr. Lawrence: Since the lifespan of this radioactive waste is only 22,000 years, I wonder if the minister could hurry it along.

PROPOSED SALE OF URANIUM TO JAPAN BY SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns a recent announcement by the premier of Saskatchewan that he had negotiated with the government of Japan an assured supply of uranium from the province of Saskatchewan. As the federal government has control over the export of this very important commodity, will the minister inform the House whether any negotiations are now being carried on or whether consent has been given to the government of Saskatchewan with regard to this assured supply to Japan?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received any official statement or report on the conversations by the premier of Saskatchewan in Japan. I know that he is aware of the federal power in this area.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister prepared to table the agreement between Canada and Cuba on the DC-8's today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No I am not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I have asked this question two or three times in the House. I would like to know what the Prime Minister is trying to hide. Are these planes being used for military purposes or some other purpose?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question before in some detail. I did not realize the hon. member wanted a written report. If he has a precise question, he should place it on the order paper as I am answering dozens of these questions all the time. Perhaps he could screw up his mind and write something down on paper so that we will know exactly what it is he wants.

ALLOCATION OF DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR COAST GUARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate to the House whether cabinet has come to a successful conclusion regarding the allocation of departmental responsibility of the Coast Guard, and if so, when will an announcement be made?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any such announcement will be made when a decision has been made.

Mr. Reynolds: Will the minister indicate what the policy is with respect to the funding of the Coast Guard Auxiliary since in Delta, volunteers have already undergone training, but are impeded by lack of formulation of policy and fund finances?

Mr. Speaker: The question period is surely not the place to outline a general policy of that nature.

STATISTICS CANADA

REASON FOR CHANGE IN REPORTING OF LABOUR FORCE STATISTICS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I have given him rather brief notice of the question and I have talked to his officials. He is the Minister of Trade and Commerce and sometimes he is industrious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister advise or find out from his officials why there has been a change in the reporting of statistics of the labour force from absolute figures to seasonally adjusted figures for the preceding months or years so that these figures will have some relevant use?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for notifying me and also having asked my officials about this. There is quite a lengthy explanation which I am sure Mr. Speaker would not permit me to give in detail. However, I can say that it was in the interest of making for a shorter document that the monthly form was provided as it is now. There is a background document available, a report issued at the time of the change. By referring to it, you can get comparable data. Also, if you look at this month's publication and that of the previous month, you can get the comparisons. I hope the hon. member will permit me to send the detailed explanation.

AIR TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO ENSURE PROCESSING OF PILOTS' LICENCE RENEWALS IN VIEW OF AIR INSPECTORS STRIKE

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the current strike by civil aviation inspectors is causing great inconvenience to private pilots whose licences must be renewed, in some cases in order to keep jobs, will the minister consider taking action to ensure that the backlog of licence renewals is dealt with expeditiously?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that would certainly be our objective as soon as the available staff is there to do the job. However, as long as strikes persist, we are obviously not capable of keeping up let alone catching up. The matter is receiving urgent attention. The AIB process is being pursued. It has been our hope that these individuals involved in the strike would be at work while the process ran its course, but that has not turned out to be the case.

COMMUNICATIONS

THREATENED STRIKE AFFECTING BROADCASTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Union have voted to take strike action against Teleglobe Canada, and in view of the fact that the strike can commence legally at any time with the result that no overseas broadcasting of the Olympic Games can occur, can the minister tell the House what plan is in place to guarantee the broadcast of the games to the home countries of the participants?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there is no way we can guarantee the broadcasting of television and radio programs as we had hoped to do. However, if there is a strike at Teleglobe, steps have been taken to assure at least essential services. But the efforts of the management are now concentrated on the resumption of negotiations and I am hopeful, as the Teleglobe management is, that the two parties involved will reach an agreement to ensure service during the Olympic Games of 1976.

2. Are the family or friends of a veteran allowed to contribute toward the burial cost of a veteran in order to pay for expenses in excess of the amount paid by the Last Post Fund?

3. When was the maximum amount, which the Fund will pay, raised to its present level?

4. What criteria are used by the Department of Veterans Affairs in determining the maximum amount which the Fund will pay for the burial of a veteran?

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motion No. 13 (Mr. Reynolds).

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was about to conclude my remarks in support of motion No. 13, and outlining my reasons for hoping that this will be the view taken by the House generally. I was pointing out that there was considerable evidence that the retention of the death penalty would be a deterrent to murder, and to that end I was reading certain relevant parts of a submission made by the attorney general of California to the supreme court of the United States.

In Los Angeles, the police department interviewed various people who had been arrested for certain offences and asked them, for example, why they did not carry a gun or, if they did, why they did not use the gun, and so on. It is interesting to note the number of occasions on which those who had been arrested said they did not carry a gun or resort to the use of a gun because they were afraid of the death penalty. I drew attention to the words of a man charged with armed robbery who said:

I was afraid to use a gun because of a possible death sentence.

Another stated:

I did not use a gun because I am afraid of the death penalty.

Another told the police:

I never owned a gun because I am afraid of the death penalty.

I could go on and call attention to some 25 such comments. When the Solicitor General suggests it has never been proven either way whether the death penalty is a deterrent or not, he is bound to admit that though this may be so, there is strong evidence to show that it is a deterrent. I believe it can be shown that it is a deterrent to murder, particularly of a prison guard or a policeman, and that it would be in the interest of all Canadians if the death penalty for such an offence was retained.

While we torment ourselves over the question of execution, it should not be forgotten that although 11 persons are now in so-called death row—65 people were convicted of murder in the 12 years ending 1974—over 4,000 people have been illegally executed in this country in the course of the crime referred to as murder. Surely this is an equation we have to weigh. More than 4,000 people were illegally executed, or murdered, yet we hesitate to execute legally even the small number to whom I have referred—the 65 persons in the last 12 years who have been charged with murder and sentenced to death.

It is particularly important that we give this protection of a deterrent to those who are upholding our laws, that is to say, our prison guards and policemen. They, after all, are in the front line. They are the people who must deal with convicts and bring offenders to justice. We owe these men an assurance that if any one of them is murdered, his assailant will in turn pay with his life. If we fail to do this, we have let down our policemen and prison guards. That is why I urge hon. members seriously to consider the merits of motion No. 13.

I would point out, also, that if under the present proposal a man who has been convicted of murdering a prison guard or policeman is sentenced to life imprisonment, it does not mean he will spend 25 years in prison. From the day he is put in jail he becomes eligible to get what is called leave of absence, with an escort, at any time. He is able to get that privilege by permission of the jailer or of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. I believe this provision is unduly lax. I believe it is irresponsible for the government to be suggesting that a hardened criminal, a man convicted of murdering a prison guard or a policeman, should be allowed leave of absence from time to time, with an escort, bearing in mind that it would be easy for one of these hardened criminals to jump his guard and commit another murder.

● (1510)

That is the basis for my belief that hon. members should support motion 13. It is not enough for members on the government side to cite certain people who happen to be abolitionists or retentionists. I think they belie the free vote their Prime Minister claims is in existence every time they make these statements. We in the Conservative caucus believe this is in truth a free vote and that people should decide for themselves how we should dispose of each of these amendments and the bill itself. Every time a government member calls into ridicule, if you like, one of our members who has chosen to vote one way or the other, he is belying the free vote the Prime Minister claims to be in existence.

When speaking of the free vote I would point out that it is time members of this House reflected, in the free vote, the free opinion of Canadians. Canadians wish the death penalty to be retained. I think the time has come when we in this, hopefully, democratic institution should cease to frustrate the free will of Canadians, at least in the case of prison guards and policemen, by allowing the death penalty to be retained.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have read very carefully the speeches delivered during the past few days, including of course those of my colleagues of the Social Credit Party, on the proposed amendments to Bill C-84. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has asked hon. members to vote conscientiously, according to the wishes of their constituents. I am greatly pleased to be the representative of my electors in Parliament. Since the introduction of Bill C-84, we have received hundreds even thousands of letters from all parts of Canada in which people state their views on the abolition of the death penalty.

I think I can truthfully say that at least 90 per cent of the population across Canada, out west, in the east, the Maritimes or the centre, 90 per cent of the people want to retain capital punishment. Now, Motion No. 13 before us advocates the retention of capital punishment for the murder of policemen and prison guards. Mr. Speaker, I believe that policemen and prison guards have made representations to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) as well as to the Prime Minister, the cabinet and all federal representatives.

On June 22 last, we voted on second reading on Bill C-84 which was defeated. The vote upheld Bill C-84 by 133 votes against 125. What happened to me may have happened to other members or other political parties. On June 22, the vote was taken at noon. At two o'clock in the afternoon, I was returning home to Rouyn by car, and in the evening, around 7 or 7:30, at my Hull residence, a carpenter was doing some repair work. A blue car stopped at my place and the driver, a chap of 25 or 26, called the carpenter to his car and asked him: Where is Caouette, the guy in favour of hanging; I want to kill him! As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this chap had a revolver next to him on the front seat of the car, and was ready to kill a member who had voted for capital punishment for murderers. But then, the protection we would need, no member has it presently. I know full well that those individuals, either in Montreal, here in Ottawa or in Hull, as it happened at my place, have set for themselves or have been assigned the task of trying to influence the members or to frighten them by threatening them with death if they vote for the retention of capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, when in a system or a country like ours we have reached the point where we have to put up with or tolerate that sort of people, I think the members should think twice before deciding: For all practical purposes, we are going to abolish capital punishment in Canada, even for murderers of policemen, prison guards, my wife, my children, the wives and children of everyone, even members of parliament, the Prime Minister and the other ministers. We should have protection against those people! Of course not, there is an attempt to frighten people, and that is when I wonder how true is the free vote on capital punishment in this House.

I said before June 22 that I was in favour of capital punishment for qualified gangsters, and I say it again today: capital punishment must be urgently restored in Canada, not as a revenge against anyone, but so justice will prevail for all the public, for Canadians, for our families, for government leaders, authorities, everybody.

Mr. Speaker, when we reach a point where we have contract killers, people paid to go and kill someone, we are going to arrest those people, we are going to locate them, we are going to sentence them to 25 years in prison and they are going to cost us maybe $20,000 or $25,000 a year for subsistance, and we are going to keep those individuals under the pretext that we can rehabilitate them. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to see the Solicitor General try and rehabilitate just one of those notorious gangsters who have only one reason to live, to commit murders and kill their fellow men.

Mr. Speaker, recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who supports the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) on capital punishment, said that in the name of humanity, we have no right to kill a criminal, even if he has killed a guard, a policeman or anybody else, we have no right to send him off to the guillotine or to the noose because it does not bring back the victim to life nor does it rehabilitate the criminal. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that, we did not need a prime minister or a solicitor general to tell us that. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not here, but I hope he will read my comments. Recently, the Prime Minister took a little trip to Cuba, he told us how beautiful it was, how Mr. Castro runs the country well, that Mr. Castro was a very humane man. But, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister of Canada to send terrorists to Cuba, well-known criminals, to do there what they do in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa or Hull. How long would Mr. Castro tolerate them in Cuba? Precisely in the name of humanitarianism and humanity, in the name of the right to life, how long would those people live in the country known as Cuba, under the regime of Mr. Castro, a close friend of the Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows the answer to that question. A bandit would not live two hours. Why? Because we know that what used to be past practise in that country is no longer tolerated. When Mr. Castro was a revolutionary, a terrorist, he was tolerated by the authorities of the day. The moment he took power in Cuba, he got rid of officials, lowly civil servants, people by the thousands. Pits were dug by bulldozers with special blades and people were lined up along the pits. Then, they were fired upon so that they would fall, dead, into the holes, on Mr. Castro's orders.

The Prime Minister did not tell us that when he came back from Cuba. He does not speak of that when he introduces or has the Solicitor General of Canada introduce Bill C-84. What group in our Canadian society asked that this bill to be introduced in the House? What part of Canada asked the Solicitor General or the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada or the Liberal government to introduce Bill C-84 to abolish capital punishment in Canada?

An hon. Member: The Catholic Church?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Not so either. True, a few bishops did ask us to be more humane. That's fine. But none has said that the death penalty should be abolished at all costs. I am referring to the meeting of the Association of the Catholic Bishops of Canada, which took place in the province of Quebec. And even so, one or two bishops may favour abolition, that does not mean the whole Catholic Church is involved. It may be only one man's point of view, but we can—

An hon. Member: The Bishops' Conference—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The Quebec conference was precisely about that.

Mr. Speaker, we did not ask anybody anything, all we asked for was our constituents' opinion on this very important issue. We are talking about a free vote tonight on motion No. 13, as on all the other motions which will be put this evening. A while ago, the hon. member who spoke before me expressed doubts regarding a free vote. I have doubts as well. There are little intrigues going on behind the scenes. One can overhear somebody say: "Well, in your constituency, you may be reelected even though you vote against retention and for abolition.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Mr. Speaker, I know that some hon. members are now under extreme pressure in their constituencies that they are being harassed from all sides by their electors who are against abolishing capital punishment. But no, they come here and they say that perhaps they will be able to restore their popularity before the next election. They vote against and we say: we vote according to our conscience.

Mr. Speaker, why do 90 per cent of the population pay for 10 per cent? Even the 10 per cent do not speak as loudly as all that, but the 90 per cent do not mince their words when talking about punishments which bandits and hardened criminals deserve; we do not clamour for hanging as we knew it 25 or 30 years ago, but it is as clear as crystal that in the case of premeditated murder, someone wanted to kill someone.

Then, let us try to rehabilitate such a bandit or murderer; I challenge the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to rehabilitate only one across Canada and in the province of Quebec. In his own riding, the Solicitor General has a vast majority of retentionists. He could not care less and goes even as far as to tell them to their face: before allowing any execution, I would rather resign. He lacks only one thing: it is the courage to resign, to walk out of cabinet and allow the population to respect him.

An hon. Member: He is not beaten yet.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): He is not what?

An hon. Member: Beaten!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Then, I hope the hon. member will help me to beat him once and for all this evening.

The same applies to the right hon. Prime Minister. I mentioned earlier all those countries, I talked about Cuba, but there are other countries in the world. Let us talk about murderers in the U.S.S.R. for instance. Recently, a Russian businessman was conducting financial transactions with Swiss financiers. The Soviet government found him out. They did not charge him with murder; he was told that he has worked against the state and he was shot the next morning. Would terrorists be tolerated in Russia? Those who were in power in 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919 were terrorists. With Lenin and Marx first, and then with Stalin. Does the Prime Minister stand to protest against massive executions that are taking place in the U.S.S.R., in Czechoslovakia, in Poland, in the whole communist block? The same is happening there. In other areas of the world which are not cummunist, in Africa, in Morocco, one day not too long ago 17 individuals were shot because of their revolting against a government bill.

In these countries, which are said to be as civilized as we are capital punishment exists for murders far less sordid than those that have happened in Montreal for too many years now. Recently, an aircraft was hijacked by pirates who flew to Uganda. We saw how this one ended not too long ago: about thirty dead. These people would be alive if there had not been any pirates, but there were and they were prepared to kill 106 hostages in an aircraft which did not belong to them. These pirates are dead now. But if they had not been shot and had come to Canada, we would have sued them and said: Gentlemen, there might be a way to rehabilitate you. We will send you to prison for 20 or 25 years for life, but maybe you will stay only 15 or 10 years depending on the application, on the way the judge feels. Then you might be released in 10, 12 or 15 years.

Then, they had the right to shoot down the leaders of the hijackers. As for the policemen, the prison guards, since they expect some security, will we allow them greater latitude in return, will we let them defend themselves effectively and efficiently through Bill C-84? No, we still want to control their actions, to expose them to the bandits, the prisoners, the convicts in isolation who are ready to do anything in order to escape and commit the same odious crime.

Mr. Speaker, why are our policemen and our prison guards so shocked and so much against Bill C-84? Their security is at stake. When a policeman of about 24 or 25 arrests a bandit, charges him and proves that he is a bandit, this young policeman sees the bandit or the murderer condemned to 15 or 20 years in prison. Do you know that 15 years from now this criminal who is only 25 years old will be only 40, no more than that. At that time, he will be freed. Do you not think he will rather resent his 10 or 15 years in prison? At that time, he will be incited to settle with the policeman who arrested him when he was 25.

Mr. Speaker, I find absolutely illogical that supposedly reasonable people ask us and advocate across the board abolition of the death penalty in Canada. As I said earlier, we receive hundreds of letters from people protesting against the abolition of the death penalty and not only from people in the province of Quebec. One of these letters has been sent to me by a Mr. Lessard who lives on Henri-Bourassa West in Montreal. He simply sent me a few words to tell me:

I hope that, in Parliament, you are going to help us so that the death penalty will not be abolished.

Raynald Lessard, Montreal.

Some people ask that the death penalty be maintained, not for revenge but in a spirit of justice. As I said the last time I spoke in the House on this subject: There are traffic laws. I consider the death penalty as a warning to everyone: Do not kill your fellow being, or it will be dangerous for you. A red light at the corner of the street. What does that mean? Stop! Mr. Speaker, you are free not to stop but, if you do not stop, you might create a serious accident which could claim several lives. Mr. Speaker, at that moment, a man is free but the signal says: Stop. The law asks him to stop. I see the penalty in exactly the same way, it is a stop signal: Stop, do not kill your fellow being because if you do kill him you will bear the consequences of your act. That is what murderers should be told throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker, those people know it. If we say to them: Listen, the noose is there. I do not want to hang anybody but neither do I want anybody to kill his fellow being. In this case, he will not risk hanging. I am not afraid to be hanged because I know that I have not killed anyone and I do not intend to kill anyone either. But when you see that there are people who steal, people who are contract killers and who are paid to kill, let us not imagine that I am going to believe that these people are fully repentant and have decided never to do it again when they are paid so much a head, so much per murder. Mr. Speaker, I do not trust these people and besides they do not frighten me. I am not afraid to tell them to their face what I think of those who are killers, these human monsters of our so-called civilized society. Mr. Speaker, I have other letters and this one from Toronto says this:

● (1530)

[English]

It was like a breath of fresh air to read that you and all members of your party solidly voted for the retention of capital punishment and it proved to all Canadians across Canada that you and your party was the only political party that was listening to the voice of the public to retain capital punishment.

[Translation]

All our members of the Social Credit Party.

I have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that some members of the Liberal Party voted for retention of capital punishment, according to the views of thier constituents. I have noticed also that many Progressive Conservatives voted for retention of capital punishment. And I have noticed that among the members of the New Democratic Party—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all hon. members for the opportunity they have given me to continue for a few more minutes. I will not abuse of their kindness.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a letter from Toronto said:

An hon. Member: It was in French.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is right, my hon. friend points out that it was in French, but I think he got the translation, since we have simultaneous translation here, Mr. Speaker, I also noticed that our neighbours from the NPD voted massively for the abolition of capital punishment. I can never understand their attitude on that very serious and very sensitive issue. On the one hand, they all vote and clamour for abortion on demand, free abortion. They suggest leaving it to the discretion of the doctor or the patient. I think that matters of conscience are personal, that there is no global conscience. Abortion is a right, you can kill innocents, people who never committed murders of crimes. Let us kill them! On the other hand, when it is time to kill a bandit, a criminal, in the name of humanity, in the name of humanism, in the name of decency, we must save his life. You do not have the right to take it. The young innocent can be killed readily, even before birth. Yet, the young innocent did not ask to be born.

Of course, the big innocent did not ask it either, but he was born and we had at least the courage, the decency to respect his right to life. And in return, we ask him to respect the right to the life of others. But they say no. A criminal can be rehabilitated. Then we must be civilized when all socialist countries in the world are in favour of capital punishment. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to understand in the New Democratic Party of Canada, and I think they will not get three votes in the province of Quebec at the next election. And I hope they will lose all the votes they now get throughout Canada.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are too kind and decent.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, I know.

[Translation]

The letter from Toronto which I am quoting goes on as follows:

[English]

In view of the fact that the leaders of the other parties, such as Trudeau, Clark and Broadbent and the majority of their MPs ignored the desire of the voters to retain capital punishment, their actions on this critical issue will certainly cost them a loss of voters and MPs will suffer with the loss of their seats at the next election—

The letter was written by P. Bennett, of Toronto, on June 30, 1976.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is a Mr. Bennett, B-e-n-n-e-t-t, from Toronto, June 30. I did not request anything from him. I suggested some months ago to the Prime Minister that this stand on capital punishment was flying in the face of people in Montreal, Quebec, Vancouver and Toronto. That might be the issue that would cause the defeat of this Liberal government at the next election, either in one or two years. I am still of that opinion. The Canadian people has seen enough of a government that goes against their will, against their wishes, against their stated desires.

Here is another letter, from Ottawa:

[English]

What else can I say? Congratulations, but a poor result, 133 to 125. I am very pleased to see that your party MPs voted for hanging and it may pay off in the next federal election.

[Translation]

I am not counting on that, but I feel that all my colleagues in the Social Credit and myself voted according to the wishes not only of Quebecers, but of Canadians as a whole. Some Progressive Conservative and Liberal members know that. The New Democrats are insensitive, they are unaware of it.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter received from Résidence Dorchester, in Montreal, 1650 W. Dorchester Blvd. Mr. Lucien Roussel writes:

The abolition of capital punishment by our federal government is not fair.

Following that decision, I would agree if at the next federal election we were asked on every ballot: Are you in favour of capital punishment or not?

This is a man who suggests that a referendum be held. We talked about the referendum. I already suggested it to the Solicitor General, the right hon. Prime Minister, this government, this House. They are afraid to let the people speak up, and all those who held some kind of referendum in their respective ridings received similar answers. From 85 to 90 per cent answered this: Retain capital punishment for capital murders, premeditated murders, not only for murderers of policemen and prison guards but for all murderers. That is what those people are suggesting—a referendum. The Prime Minister tells us, no, no, no referendum.

The Solicitor General also tells us, no, no, no referendum. That is because he knows he would be beaten. That is why I keep asking who else has asked this government to bring Bill C-84 before the House? Who? What part of Canada? What member? What association? Would the murderers themselves have asked this government, please spare us the noose, we will be good little boys, so keep on protecting us. That is exactly what Bill C-84 does. It protects bandits against society instead of protecting society against bandits and criminals.

Mr. Speaker, I have here another letter from Montreal, from Mr. Bernard Molloy who says:

● (1540)

[English]

Congratulations on the stand you and your party took with regard to capital punishment. You are to be admired for having the courage of your convictions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is the type of letters I get, but I did not receive a single one in favour of abolition. Is it because abolitionist are afraid to write to me? Not a single one! I got some against abolition from all parts of Canada, even the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Social Credit Party is not the only one who receives letters; others do too. My colleagues receive a lot of them and there is a general outcry for the retention of capital punishment, and I repeat, it is not in a spirit of vengence but in a spirit of justice. Let justice be done, rendered and obtained. Instead of thinking of the rehabilition of such bandits, let us think about their victims and their families. When a manager of a Caisse populaire with his child in his arms is killed in cold blood and shot point-blank, when that chap entered the house to rob with a loaded revolver, well, he did not go in with his rosary to do the stations of the Cross.

He went in there firmly decided to shoot if things turned out bad. Mr. Speaker, this is precisely what happened. The father, the wife, a mother of a family, were killed. Recently in Montreal, we have witnessed I think the fifty-second qualified murder in the City of Montreal alone, in the MUC. And the same thing happens in the Quebec City region and in the region of Trois-Rivières. The same holds true for Toronto as well as Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker, I think that motion No. 13 which aims at protecting policemen and prison guards must be agreed to by the House. I have noticed some hon. members who rose and were not afraid to vote on second reading. I congratulate them for that. As for those who were prompted by fear, who voted to avoid that this government be defeated, their case is a bit more doubtful and I say to them: You will have it out with your constituents. Meanwhile, let us think about the people of Canada who deserve to be protected, who deserve an assurance from a government that their life is being protected against gangsters, criminals, murderers, genuine and hardened criminals, those who cannot be rehabilitated.

If we secured the protection of policemen and prison guards, we would at least make a move in a direction where we might reach if not perfection at least a better safety than we now enjoy. For that purpose, I am still in favour of capital punishment, not against occasional criminals but for hardened criminals, those who have revengeful and hateful feelings for their fellow citizens or society as a whole.

Let us improve living conditions within society. I agree, if this means preventing some people from going wrong; however, I think it would cost less than maintaining criminals in our jails. If we gave them more respectable, more affordable living conditions finally to prevent those who have still some good in them from committing murder. Let us prepare ourselves before it is too late, but if society, government and the law are to be abused then let the murderer pay for his crime.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing two amendments today. They have been joined together because they both refer to clause 4 of this bill. I was delighted to hear that in the last two or three days the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) indicated that he is prepared to accept the amendment proposed by my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

I will not address myself to that particular amendment because my concern is mainly with a statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) which appears in yesterday's Hansard. In that statement there was an unusual development of thought which I find difficult to understand. I thought I would use my intervention this afternoon to describe what an unusual position the hon. member has got himself into by using the logic he did. The anomalous situation into which he has talked himself is manifest in two clearly distinguishable respects. I cannot understand how he arrived at his conclusion. There may be some explanation and we may go into that afterwards. But we must remember that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a self-declared retentionist, and I am glad of that. I am a retentionist myself. Also, on second reading the hon. member voted with the retentionists.

The hon. member declared, in a statement which appears at page 15133 of Hansard, that he believes in the retention of capital punishment. That is fine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I remind the hon. member that there is a Standing Order which says that hon. members are not supposed to reflect on the way other hon. members vote.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I accept that admonition, Mr. Speaker. I was just pointing out that the hon. member voted the same way I did. I accept the admonition of the Chair and I will not come back to the voting pattern. However, in doing what he did, the hon. member obviously intended to show his opposition to the proposals put before him by his government. In other words, by his opposition and by his vote he wanted reinstatement of the law as it now stands, namely, the death penalty for murderers of policemen and prison guards and certain other classes of persons in dangerous positions like that. In other words, he wanted return to the law as it now stands, because he is a retentionist. However, the hon. member is opposed to the present amendment which would reinstate the death penalty.

Mr. Epp: And the law as it is.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And the law as it is, although, granted, only to this extent. Why is he opposed to this amendment? He says it is because it introduces discrimination. The existing law is discriminatory, but the hon. member cannot go beyond that because backbenchers on this side or on the side opposite cannot extend the intent of the law as it now stands. That is the prerogative of the government. The extent to which the present law is discriminatory seems to have been what the hon. member voted for in the first instance. The second reason he has placed himself in this untenable position by his unusual stand is that he seems completely unaware of the fact that he could accomplish his purpose as a retentionist by supporting this amendment. It is as simple as that.

In my cogitations, if this amendment is carried it stands to reason the government will have to withdraw the bill. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) is approved in the vote tonight, the bill will be completely demolished and it will have to be withdrawn or rewritten. It would have to be presented again—and I have no doubt that it would be—but that is the situation and the purpose of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be accomplished for the time being, anyway. Is he a bellwether just giving an indication to the rest of the retentionists in this chamber that this is the way the backbenchers on the government side are going to vote? I am not sure of that, although it may be a possibility. I hope he will reconsider his position, and having reconsidered it will alter the way he intends to vote when the time comes tonight. I will not point the finger and say, "You have changed your mind"; no, sir. That hon. member can change his mind because he will see that he will be accomplishing his purpose if he votes tonight in favour of this amendment.

There are other aspects of the amendment on which I feel I must comment. Last weekend I was at a July 1 ceremony in a small community in my riding and I heard a story which upset me very deeply. This came to me from someone who had been talking to the RCMP, which is the police force responsible for enforcing the law in that community of 5,000 or 6,000 people. I was told that in that apparently law-abiding community where there is a detachment of three, four or five policemen, at least once a month, when in pursuit of their duty and on patrol, they stare down the operative end of a gun barrel. That is a frightening thought, in a community which I have the honour to represent, that once a month these men are faced with a weapon that could go off.

Let us not forget that police, prison guards, penitentiary workers and those listed in section 214 of the Criminal Code, such as sherriff's officers and prison employees engaged in the preservation and maintenance of public institutions, and so on, are all public servants. They are the only civilian public servants whose lives we have been prepared to place at great risk, Mr. Speaker. I have just mentioned one of the risks these public servants have to face.

I would ask the government what plans it has to protect these public servants if this bill should pass. Most of them are married and have families. If the breadwinner happens to be a victim in the commission of a crime, what provision does the government make, over and above the ordinary provision that is now made by the public service, for this particular class of public servant? If there is a pension or superannuation plan, is the government going to demand extra premiums from them so that they can pay for taking these extra risks, or is the government going to provide the extra premium and the benefits that would be required by these public servants? These are matters that obviously have not been thought of, so far as I can make out.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the federal government could do this, but what about the provinces and the municipalities who also have public servants who are at great risk, some of whom might lose their lives? The risk is going to be greater if this bill should pass. Many more of these public servants, let us be frank, will pay with their lives. What about their survivors? What means does the government have to offer in order to entice, to induce or to recruit properly qualified persons to fill these risk positions? I do not think they have any particular plans in mind. These public servants are our protectors. They stand between us and the criminals in our society who have decided that they can disregard the law.

I do not think the government has looked ahead to see what the response of some of our policemen is likely to be when dealing with serious crimes. With the threat of the death penalty eliminated by the successful passage of this bill, when they are dealing with crimes involving the killing of policemen, who amongst us, would blame a guardian of the law who decided to use his sidearm first in the apprehension of a dangerous criminal? Who would be to blame if we were to find that the death penalty was carried out not infrequently before trial? Is this what we want?

Mr. Horner: Sidewalk justice.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This is not just a remote possibility, Mr. Speaker. In raising the matter I do not question the integrity, self-control and discipline of our police forces. Wherever I have met them they have given me cause to be proud. But self-defence would be a justifiable defence in most of the circumstances that one can envisage. Is that what the government wants—execution without trial, to avoid execution upon conviction? That is what it looks like.

I therefore propose, even in this limited context, to support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta which will give policemen and others who work for our protection, at least some protection rather than have them face the dreadful decision of having to shoot first and ask questions afterwards.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a few of my thoughts before the House and say at the outset that I support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). In the days since the vote was taken on second reading of this bill a number of members who voted for abolition in the almost cocoon-like security of this place have possibly been faced with the stark reality of what their constituents were saying when they went back to their ridings. Some who thought that the figure of 80 per cent of Canadians endorsing the retention of capital punishment for premeditated murder was an exaggeration possibly found that 80 per cent was on the low side when they returned to their ridings.

I have to go back to 1972, Mr. Speaker. To all intents and purposes the amendment before us restores the law to the position it is in at the moment. Capital punishment would be the penalty for the murder of police officers or prison guards. I recall that in 1972 the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), an avowed abolitionist, said in an interview that he would have liked to go for complete abolition but this was the best he could get at the time. There was a minority government in 1972-73, and to my mind he had no intention of enforcing the bill that he proposed to this House. He was convinced that in every case to come before him he would try to convince the cabinet to commute the death penalty called for in the law which he sponsored.

● (1600)

The facts cannot be gainsaid. I submit that the death penalty should be maintained for the murderers of police officers and prison guards. Right now some prison guards are opting for early retirement. Many of them are veterans who took up their duties with the prison service at the end of World War II. Many have served 25 years. They need 30 years' service for a full pension, and quite a number are opting for early retirement. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? They seriously question the policies of the Solicitor General, the minister responsible for our prison service. They wonder if he has listened to their pleas. They are concerned not only about capital punishment; they are concerned about the whole question of security in prisons and say, "We do not have the support of the Solicitor General. Has he even listened to us?" Therefore, some of them are opting for early retirement. The situation in provincial jail systems is similar. Even now the Manitoba government is embarking on a plan whereby it will recruit officers to serve in Manitoba jails in future.

I know that last weekend many members did as I did; I visited the various parts of my riding and spoke to many people about capital punishment. Actually, it is more accurate to say that they spoke to me about capital punishment. There was no way to avoid them. They wanted to speak about it. I had the chance to speak with some RCMP personnel in my riding. I can best describe their attitude by saying they are angry, frustrated and, above all, cynical. They have become cynical about the government. You can tell them that the vote on the bill is free, but they know it is a government-supported bill, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General, avowed abolitionists, wanted to bring this before the House for passage before the end of the last five-year experiemental period.

It is known that this bill has been brought before the House despite the objections of the vast majority of Canadians who hold retentionist views with regard to premeditated murder. RCMP officers legitimately ask, as do prison guards, how they are to act. Obviously, there is a communications gap between the RCMP and the Solicitor General, the minister who is supposedly responsible for the force and who does not listen. He does not do what the RCMP recommends. A police organization in Calgary says it cannot place any trust in the Solicitor General, a position also adopted by some members of the RCMP.

It was put this way to me, and I emphasize that I am not alluding to a contrived or unrealistic situation, because what I am about to mention could happen, "How is an RCMP officer to act, once this bill passes, if he faces a gunman with a loaded gun?" Let us say the gunman has already killed an innocent victim who is not a police officer or prison guard. The RCMP are called in to apprehend that person; they arrive at the scene and find themselves looking down the barrel of a high-powered rifle. What are they to do? In that situation you do not use polite language and say, "Please put down your gun and come with me." Gunmen do not understand such language. Therefore, because a policeman must act in self-defence it is possible that the gunman will be shot and killed. Will the RCMP be accused by abolitionists, including the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General, of taking the law into their own hands, of setting up a kangaroo court, acting as judge and jury and, instead of arresting him, shooting the gunman down?

Some may say that argument is strained, that the situation is contrived. I submit they are wrong. The RCMP do not think that situation is far-fetched. Right now they could face similar situations almost every day of the week. They ask, if they are forced to act in the manner described, who will defend them? Will it be the Solicitor General in whom they have no faith? They have received no answer to that question. I submit that the Solicitor General is obliged to answer. Be that as it may, our policemen will face gunmen and the situation I have described is not contrived. Therefore, fundamental questions remain to be answered.

Today our police forces are cynical. Society is cynical. It feels that parliament defied the will of the majority of Canadians by voting for abolition. I suppose all members of parliament wonder how best to ascertain the opinion of those they represent. I do not know how other members operate, but speaking for myself I often phone the same people to learn their opinions. Unfortunately, this procedure is not always satisfactory. To ascertain more accurately the views of people in the riding with respect to the retention of capital punishment for premeditated murder, I found it necessary to conduct a poll. The poll showed that the majority of my constituents are in favour of retention. I suggest that in no constituency is the majority of constituents in favour of abolition. If that were the case we would have heard about it a long time ago. One would have heard abolitionist members saying, "The majority of constituents in my riding favour abolition." They have not said that; on that point they have been remarkably silent. One can only conclude that such sentiment does not exist.

When I spoke on second reading I made my position as a retentionist well known and told the House that I had conducted a poll with respect to Bill C-84. Mr. Speaker, 90 per cent of the respondents in my riding opted for the retention of capital punishment for premeditated murder. I am not a professional pollster and my poll may not have been conducted scientifically. But even if you reduce the percentage in favour by 10 per cent, from 90 per cent to 80 per cent, you still wind up with an overwhelming majority, with a virtual consensus. That is how the people of my riding feel. I suggest that the poll results pertaining to my riding are not unique but hold true to a lesser or greater degree in every riding across Canada.

It is not only police and prison officials who are cynical and frustrated. Canadians are frustrated as well. They are questioning whether the representations they have made have been listened to. We have in this motion the retention of capital punishment for the killing of police officers or prison guards. Police associations and policemen's wives associations have indicated their position to us. They live under constant fear because of the risks inherent in their jobs. They have indicated that their fear is intensified because there is no longer the ultimate deterrent. Even though death sentences have been commuted since 1962, there has always been the possibility that a person convicted of murder would in fact pay the supreme penalty.

An example of the deterrent value was clearly brought out in the Israeli raid. I know that treason and hijacking were discussed earlier. However, one of my constituents pointed out that if capital punishment had been in force, and enforced in the countries where the terrorists were incarcerated, they could not have been used as ransom for the lives of those hijackers held on the Air France plane.

Whether we like to admit it or not, police officers and prison guards are being asked to put their lives on the line, with even less protection. Abolitionists are willing to accept those additional risks. They are willing to accept the death of these people because it is inherent in their jobs. I can interpret the view of the abolitionists in no other way. They are quite willing to extend those risks to the point where police officers and prison guards will have to sacrifice their lives, rather than retain the death penalty as at least a measure of protection for a person who is innocent. Innocent people are being asked to put their lives on the line in order to protect those who have already taken a life. That is not in any way compatible with justice.

The major question still facing me on the whole capital punishment issue is that some people say that if we invoke capital punishment, rehabilitation is impossible. From what I have seen, I do not believe that rehabilitation through the prison system works. I know we have had experts of all types in there, including psychiatrists, psychologists, and so on. I do not say this because I am a pessimist. I would love to see rehabilitation take effect. However, the state, by its very nature, does not have the ability to rehabilitate people. The state is impersonal, it depersonalizes everything. We have seen this happen in prisons. The state has no heart.

The only rehabilitation that will take place is in cases where organizations and individuals are willing to work with prisoners in a slow, ongoing process. A person might then be rehabilitated to the degree where he or she accepts the laws of the country, obeys those laws, and recognizes that by breaking a law the very basis of democracy is threatened because democracy can only survive if he or she respects the rights of others. However, killers take away the basic right of individuals, and that is life.

There are idealists in this House who say that if we do not have capital punishment for premeditated killers, we can work on rehabilitation. The Solicitor General will have to be the first to admit that rehabilitation in our prisons has been a disaster.

Mr. Allmand: I won't admit that.

Mr. Epp: Rather than fewer people being incarcerated, there are larger numbers being incarcerated. The recidivism rate continues at a phenomenal level. Rehabilitation is simply not in place. The Solicitor General would have done a service to Canada if long before this bill, to which I am totally opposed, came into this House he had put in very specific terms the type of rehabilitation he would like to see take place in prisons. Along with that rehabilitation program he should have confirmed to prison officers and policemen across this country that he stands behind them, supports them in their work and will be their advocate in this House and in cabinet. He is not that at the present time. He is not representing their views at all. In fact, they almost look upon him as enemy number one.

Mr. Horner: He is enemy number one.

Mr. Epp: I wonder how the Solicitor General views his role. He said he would resign or seek another portfolio if the bill is defeated. I hope he will have to do that quickly, possibly after tonight. The real question is how he can sit in cabinet and speak on behalf of members of the RCMP and officers in the prison system when they have no confidence in him. They have said so in resolution after resolution. He speaks entirely opposite to what they recommend. He does not listen.

Mr. Paproski: He does not care.

Mr. Horner: He hears a different drummer.

Mr. Epp: He probably has the concept that everybody is out of step but Johnny, and that is him. How does the Solicitor General justify continuing in that portfolio while completely rejecting the ideas, concepts and recommendations of people directly within his charge?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It won't be for long.

Mr. Epp: The Solicitor General has a responsibility to stand in this House during the course of this debate and state how he sees his role as being responsible for the prison system and for police officers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues for this courtesy. I will not take up too much time of the House; however, I do want to put before the Solicitor General this serious question. Does he really feel that as Solicitor General he is fulfilling his mandate and his responsibility to the men and women who are officers and report to him?

Mr. Horner: He knows he is letting them down.

Mr. Epp: The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) says that the Solicitor General knows he is letting them down. I know one thing; the RCMP officers in my riding say he has let them down. They are saying they can have no confidence in the Solicitor General or in the Prime Minister who, I am sure, is the guru to whom he listens.

● (1620)

An hon. Member: Who do you listen to?

Mr. Epp: I listen to my constituents, and I suggest the hon. member should do the same.

An hon. Member: You should try to listen to your leader occasionally.

Mr. Epp: I do that, too.

Mr. Allmand: You should listen to your conscience, also.

Mr. Epp: That is an interesting comment from the Solicitor General. As a matter of fact, my conscience and my constituents are in harmony. I should like to dispel once and for all the idea that a person who votes for retention is listening only to his constituents and does not have a conscience of his own. The Solicitor General is responsible to the House, but he is also responsible for the men and women in his charge. How will he answer them and their families when they are victimized? It is the guards who have to look after a person who has been convicted of murder and who will kill again in order to get out of prison. That is the question the Solicitor General has not answered, and it is one he must answer for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 13 which we are now studying is, to my mind, one of the most important motions that have been presented and which is on the order paper of the House in respect of Bill C-84. Indeed, this amendment, motion No. 13, proposes to maintain present Criminal Code section 214 or to delete clause 4 of the bill.

It is not without reason, I think, that many people, organizations and policemen throughout Canada are opposed to the deletion of section 214.

I am satisfied that each member studies carefully this question at the moment. We are studying together what we should do to give society, individuals and families the protection they are entitled to. We want to reach that aim by different means but, nevertheless, I think we must take into account the representations which are made to us and also the fact that policemen are friends of society.

In the past, policemen were often considered as persons to fear, persons that we should not get in touch with. They were not considered as friends. They were considered as people who had the authority to punish. It was in some ways the mentality that prevailed among the population. Fortunately, that mentality has changed. More and more the youth consider policemen as persons that should be respected because they wield authority. They have the authority, they have been given a mandate to make people respect the laws adopted by parliaments. Therefore, policemen do not simply have the mission to punish; they also have the mission to enforce the law and protect the life and the property of individuals. The greatest proof of that is that when our rights are threatened by bandits, we call on policemen. When we are threatened by people who do not respect the rights and the property of others, we once again call on the police for protection.

If we ask for their protection, we parliamentarians have the obligation to ensure the protection of policemen as well, to place in their hands the weapons to accomplish their mission, and I am not talking about a gun or a revolver because we all know that this is necessary, but I want to say that policemen should be ensured by society that if they lose their life in the course of their duties against those who do not want to obey the law, an example would be made for the benefit of others who would be tempted to do the same. Murderers must be punished. This is what Criminal Code section 214 provides. And this is why I have no hesitation in supporting motion No. 13 because it aims at maintaining in our statutes some protection for our policemen, prison guards, all those employees who work in prisons, who are responsible for guarding and controlling prisoners, so that they may have the required protection, just like we now require on building sites that contractors take all the necessary precautions to prevent accidents to their workers. For instance, wearing a hard hat, using a cable when a roof is too steep, wearing a safety belt, all of which aim at protecting the life of workers. Therefore, the employees who work in prison or the policemen who work on the road are entitled to the same protection.

However, I believe that the question we must consider during the study of this bill is why are we now living in a violent society and why are many individuals now thinking that they must make their own justice. We hear this often nowadays. We say it, we hear it, but there is no order anymore. We are living in a violent society. We are never sure when we go out to the grocery store if we shall come back alive. Therefore, people think of making their own justice.

This is not a healthy society: indeed, the society is ill: it is a society in which there is violence. What are the causes? I think that television, movies and theatres are the main causes of violence. Violence does not exist only in Canada, it exists also elsewhere. But it is also where there is television, movies and theatres where so many things incite to violence.

It is deplorable to find that in Canada, our children are being shown violent films for hours at a time, and that happens every day. They are taught violence, the use of firearms, how to attack people, how to make a hold up, all kinds of violent ways. And our young people are looking at these for hours, and then, in their mind projects develop, so that at a given moment, faced with an economic situation rather difficult in the family, some young people will consider using these means, these weapons, they will take violent action to get a few dollars to do what they please. That is called teaching crime. People were shocked in old times when the Romans made a show of death in the eyes of the public. People were shocked by that and we are also shocked when we read about it. That was done in the arena, just like cock-fighting today. In the end, one of them dies.

Today, it is not done on the stage, it is not done in the same fashion, but through images. Our children are given to see on television all kinds of films inviting to violence and after that we are suprised and wonder what is happening. Young people no longer want to abide by the law, their ideas are different from those of adults and they often cause serious problems in society. If we were in their place, we would perhaps do worse than them, because I think if we had to live in the same atmosphere and had been shown the same things in our young age, we would be even worse. They are not to be blamed; instead we should blame the adults who are responsible for seeing to it that the films shown on television and in cinemas really encourage respect for life, respect for human beings. Those children could still be entertained and shown excellent material, and they would be only too happy to get an education that instills respect for life, for other people's property, and teaches them to use their energy in wholesome entertainment while respecting peace and order.

Mr. Speaker, the League of Human Rights, which puts out a bulletin from which I have an excerpt here that I would like to quote you, is entirely of that opinion. I should like to quote you paragraph 3, on page 6, which says:

> The information given by the press with regard to crime, especially as exploited by some groups . . . is dealt with in such a way as to spread a collective psychosis of dangerous crime and give the wrong impression.

To my mind, there is truly food for thought in that paragraph. To go back to the quotation:

> Contrary to what is being done in other fields, the press is quite content to focus the attention of the public on the most negative aspects, without analyzing them as they often should, while overlooking the positive information related, among other things, to the methods of rehabilitation.

So the negative aspects are exploited with great delight because that is profitable and sensational. But we fail to show the positive side. I continue to quote:

> We think the press could help the population give criminality its proper dimensions if certain efforts were made in this direction.

Parliament and parliamentarians are responsible for passing legislation so that news media are forced to show the good side of things, to give positive information. We should stop going from one sensational piece of information to another to increase sales or the interest which can induce people to go and see things they own in order to get rich with these businesses.

On clause 4—The rate of violence in the programs of our television and cinema networks is obviously the reflection of a society which consumes violence excessively, without measuring the impact of this consumption on the making of criminality.

We really get down to rock bottom when expressing ourselves this way. One wonders about the following question:

Should not we directly face that matter?

So they suggest:

Governments, in cooperation with all competent and concerned associations, should establish school and adult education programs which would make people ponder over the crime phenomenon and which would be basically oriented towards prevention, information and education.

We especially appeal to teachers and parents for their commitment to fight against the initiation to violence which dominates our society, in all kinds of areas and forms, from the most evident to the slyest.

We believe, among other things, that one of the best means to fight destructive violence is the initiation to positive forms of respect for life, which can be found massively and constantly in the various functions inherent in education.

Whatever measures are taken to fight murder and the most dangerous forms of crime directly, they may prove useless if there is not in Quebec and across Canada a systematic and general effort by the public to substitute patterns of human development for the countless violent patterns generated by our society. There again, we think that the most powerful weapons will come from our investing into social values, to really ensure respect for life and the emphasis of what is positive and beautiful in the development of human beings. What good is it to develop all those communication and information techniques if we cannot use them primarily to propagate life?

This was published by the Human Rights Association which sent us this announcement out of which I have quoted a few passages which I heartily support because I think this association is working for human rights and that it was duty bound to make its position known on such an important bill.

I said earlier that the economic causes must also be eliminated. I am not the only one to think so, for I believe that those who really think about it are convinced that certain economic causes also lead to violence, crime, and sometimes to revenge or to the temptation to take the lives of those who stand in our way. One can see the turn of mind of such people.

The Chief Justice of the Ontario Supreme Court stated, and I quote:

Canada will begin to control crime only by eliminating the economic needs which, in my opinion, prompt thousands of Canadians to break the law.

Therefore, I think that being a judge, he was able to size all the accused who appeared before him, in order to keep an open mind and to determine why such or such accused appeared before the court. And as a judge, he had to hear the evidence to be able to make a sound judgement.

● (1640)

Then, Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that policemen have been murdered recently in the province of New Brunswick, that they were inflicted atrocious pains before being slain. Everybody was shocked by such atrocities and following these unfortunate events, policemen from everywhere in Canada got together to ask once more for the retention of capital punishment. All those people cannot be wrong at the same time.

There must certainly be good reasons prompting them to ask parliamentarians to retain capital punishment. That does not necessarily mean hanging. We could use hanging of course but we can take any kind of capital punishment, the most humane so as to respect the concept of the importance of human life and whenever an execution is to be carried out, it should be done as humanely as possible.

I think it must be considered. We shall also recall that last spring, in the Quebec City area, a policeman was killed in cold blood in the course of his duties and here I wish to quote from an article in the newspaper La Presse of Montreal, of March 3, 1976 entitled:

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND THE PRINCIPLE OF LIFE

I wish to quote this article, Mr. Speaker, as I think it is time that as parliamentarians we take into consideration representations made by those who are responsible for protecting the life and property of Canada. I quote:

Some 2,000 policemen gathered in Quebec City after the funeral of one of their colleagues were unanimous. When one of their leaders, the director of the Quebec City section of the provincial policemen association said: "The abolition of capital punishment, never.", the policemen rose to applaud. And we can easily understand them.

They had come from several areas of the country to express their sorrow after the death of constable Michel Bédard. He died because of his faithfulness to his duties. A criminal, miserable as every criminal, killed him in his escape. This act is so disgusting that it creates revolt and passion. First the policemen offered their sympathy to the close relatives of the deceased at a touching ceremony. Then they got together. And briefly they enounced the principle that should protect them against the madness of killers: "Abolition of capital punishment, never!" We can understand, but are they right?

Mr. Speaker, I will not read this very interesting article in its totality, but once again parliamentarians are asked to do their duty to ensure those people full protection. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as I realize that the clock runs very fast, I wish to quote two extracts from a booklet published by the Solicitor General of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. To do so, the hon. member will need unanimous consent as his allotted time is now expired. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to complete his comments?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank my English and French-speaking colleagues of the Parliament of Canada for their kindness. As I said, I wish to quote from a booklet published by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand), in which he says the following in paragraph 6:

6. THE POOR AND MINORITY GROUPS. When capital punishment was in force, it was mostly applied to the poor, non-educated people, minority groups and immigrants. The rich who could afford the best lawyers and were influent had strong chances of being acquitted or getting a reduced sentence.

I know the Solicitor General has much more experience than I do in this area. But when I read that statement, I had doubts about our courts. I often heard people say: There are two justices—one for the rich and one for the poor. But I did not believe that a Crown minister could state it so clearly. Then, in that case, it is again our duty as parliamentarians to see that our laws are the best possible, that they are applied in the fairest way and above all, that judges who are appointed are really qualified, and not selected on the basis of some political patronage but following the recommendation of the Bar because of their knowledge, their occupation, which is really that of protectors of the law and not because of political services rendered.

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to give the impression of accusing judges in any part of Canada or of the province of Quebec, but I wish to take this opportunity to emphasize that if it is true that the poor have fewer chances than the rich to gain justice before the courts, this demonstrates that society is sicker than I thought, and I wish we did our best to take as many steps as possible to put it back in shape at all levels; not only as regards the poor but as regards the rich as well. And if it is true that justice can be influenced to that extent, it becomes outrageous and this is why it is called a society of violence.

We must really ensure that any segment of society, no matter its financial position, when it is faced to courts, be confident before those courts to obtain justice, whether they can or not pay the high price. Again, I hope we will seriously consider this point and that sooner or later the Solicitor General of Canada will be able to introduce amendments to ensure the best protection possible to all citizens as regards law enforcement, when this law must be adhered to by the courts, when someone has been convicted before society.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I again as for the help of all my colleagues in Parliament: For God's sake, tonight will see again the end of a memorable day. An extremely serious vote will take place. I, for one, do not take things lightly because tomorrow and in the days and years to come, everything will depend upon the action we will take tonight. I have no judgment to make about any of my colleagues, be they in favour of or against capital punishment. It is a personal matter, but I think, as the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) said a moment ago, that not only we have the right to vote according to our own conscience but it is our duty to vote according to the people's will.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you I will be brief, but I should like to put on the record a few thoughts about this amendment. I, like the hon. member for Comox Alberni (Mr. Anderson), do not particularly like this amendment. I am in favour of the retention of capital punishment for premeditated murder and I believe policemen and prison guards need protection. However, I also believe that housewives, children and everyone else in our society need the protection afforded by capital punishment. Having said that I do not like the amendment, I want to assure the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) that I am going to support it since it is perhaps better than complete abolition. It is better to retain the death penalty for the murderers of policemen and prison guards than abolish it.

I also commend the 38 members of the government party who supported retention on second reading of the bill. I urge those 38 once again to give some thought to supporting this amendment. Even though it is not a good amendment, it is better than complete abolition. It reinstates the situation in which we are today, the five-year trial period. It will be up in December of 1977, at which time we can again make a decision when we have studied the results of the trial periods which existed from 1967 to 1972 and from 1972 to 1976.

Many members have said that this is a vote according to conscience and therefore it should be a free vote. As I said a minute ago, I admire the 38 members on the government side who voted against this bill on second reading. I think it was a free vote for them, but surely the cabinet's and the parliamentary secretaries' votes do not suggest that they were allowed the same freedom given to the backbenchers in that party. Many members have quoted Burke in saying that they have the right to lead their constituents. In 1794 Burke, in a speech made in Bristol, England, said:

● (1650)

Your representative does not use his industry only but his judgment and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

It has not generally been realized that Burke lost the election in 1794. I should like to point out that many hon. members may well lose the next election if they do not pay attention to the wishes of their constituents.

Mr. Railton: That would not stop us. I would hate to think that you are taking that position so that you can be re-elected.

Mr. Horner: No, but I sincerely believe I am in step with my constituents and that a member of parliament must represent his constituents. There may be times when one does not agree with one's constituents, but one has to represent them. I believe that in supporting this amendment we will help make Canada a better place in which to live. That is really why I ran for office, and I hope the hon. member ran for office for the same reason, in an attempt to make this country a better place in which to live. He suggests to me that he is working at it, but he is not doing so when he votes in the manner in which he did on this piece of legislation. The hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) made a few interjections in the debate this afternoon. He is in trouble in this riding because his riding is mostly retentionist.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Horner: I have many friends in Mississauga.

Mr. Whelan: The Ontario attorney general is in that riding, Mr. McMurtry, and he is a Conservative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to intervene, but I think the hon. member has been concentrating, since the beginning of his remarks, on passing judgment or reflecting on hon. members, which is not permissible under Standing Order 35. Besides that, I must say that his remarks have not been relevant to the subject matter before us at this time. He should address himself to the amendment or to the bill.

Mr. Horner: I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for coming to my defence. These members were heckling, interrupting and distracting me from the convincing argument that I intend to put forward.

Many hon. members have suggested throughout the debate that capital punishment is not a deterrent. Surely, if 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the people in a country believe that it is a deterrent, then in fact it is a deterrent for those people. To say that it has not been proven conclusively that it is a deterrent is nonsense, because it cannot be proven conclusively either way. Some hon. members have suggested this afternoon that policemen and prison guards, because of fear for their lives, might shoot first and ask questions later. It would be wrong, in my opinion, to create a society which encourages that thought. I urge all

hon. members who sincerely believe in abolition to think about the society they may well be creating.

When asked a question in committee about what will happen if prison guards do not approve what he is doing, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said that they can quit, he will hire new ones. That is not a very responsible attitude for the minister to take. He is forcing his wishes on people who serve him and in my view that is not a responsible attitude to take. Policemen's associations have spoken out quite clearly in favour of retention of capital punishment for their protection. They believe it is a deterrent. Now we hear of policemen's wives associations being organized. They urge the government to retain capital punishment for the protection of their husbands. They also believe that capital punishment is a deterrent. Surely this minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) cannot turn a deaf ear to public opinion.

This summer many hon. members will be going back to their constituents, I hope very soon.

Mr. Whelan: So do I.

Mr. Horner: They will be listening to their constituents who believe that capital punishment is a deterrent. Their constituents will say to them, "You people in Ottawa don't care what we think". I have often regretted the poor name that politicians have in this country, because I think most members here attempt to serve their country and their constituents in an honourable way, but this governemnt has neglected the wishes of the people and thus are harming all politicians.

In 1967 we went into a trial period during which the killing of a policeman or prison guard called for punishment by death. We were told that that trial period was not conclusive and in 1972 it was extended for another five years. However, the cabinet jumped the gun on this latest five-year trial period and reached a conclusion. Did they reach it by way of logic, by looking at the facts or by looking at statistics? No, they reached the conclusion because the Solicitor General said he could not enforce the act, and so long as he was Solicitor General nobody would hang. He disobeyed the will of parliament. I like the Solicitor General, he is a fine man, but he is in the wrong job. If he cannot do it, let him switch places with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) or somebody who can do it. I know that basically the Minister of Agriculture is a retentionist, but because he is in the cabinet he has to go along with them.

Mr. Whelan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that a long time before I became a member of this cabinet I voted as an abolitionist. I ran in four elections as an abolitionist.

● (1700)

I made no secret of what my stand was, and I have been elected to public positions for some 30 years. I have been honest with my constituents in whatever position I ever held.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Horner: I am glad I gave the minister the chance to put that on the record. We in rural Canada have wondered what made him tick. We are slowly sorting it out.

Mr. Whelan: I said the same thing in Alberta last week.

Mr. Horner: This is a serious matter. I hope we will vote on it tonight and that all hon. members can go home tomorrow. I hope they will not have to come back next week at all. If this amendment is passed tonight, we will be back in the trial period we were in before this bill was introduced, and the government will then have to obey the will of parliament on this issue until December of 1977. Then the government can make a decision, but to make a decision before that time, in my opinion—

Mr. Breau: The House already has.

Mr. Horner: —goes against the wishes of parliament when it accepted the trial period from 1972 to 1977. I urge all hon. members to give this a great deal of thought because the reputation of every politician is at stake. We have to obey the will of the people and, if we do not, we are hardly better than anarchists. I do not want to be a party to that kind of society, so I urge all hon. members to support this amendment.

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the report stage debate on Bill C-84, not to reiterate what my colleagues and I have said with regard to the retention of capital punishment—I think we have stated our case very clearly—but rather as a matter of duty to plead with the government to heed the wishes of the majority of Canadians who have stated that they want the retention of capital punishment.

Can the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) tell this House why the bill must be debated now? Could it not have waited until after the Olympics? I feel the timing is insane. To debate the bill now does nothing but cast a shadow of apprehension over and doubt in the minds of those taking part in the Olympics as well as of those responsible for security at the games.

It appears that the government is strongly in favour of pampering criminals. Surely we must have our priorities confused. What are we doing to protect the citizens of Canada? Precious little, I would say, when we are making it harder for those responsible for maintaining law and order to carry out their duties. What we are doing is suggesting to Canadians that if the government does not invoke strong deterrents which will curb the ever increasing crime rate, the citizens of Canada will have to take the law into their own hands.

I have respect for all my colleagues on all sides of this House. However, I feel that the moral responsibility of hon. members is being overshadowed by their own personal feelings, which should not happen when in each constituency some 20,000 Canadians went to the polls to vote for the man or woman they felt would bring to parliament the opinions of the majority in their constituencies.

Some hon. members argue that this is a free vote which gives them the right to vote as they see fit regardless of the feelings of their constituents. What has happened? Has this session lasted too long? Are some hon. members that out of touch with reality?

To bring us back to reality I would like to read just one letter, out of hundreds I have received, from radio station CJOC in Lethbridge, dated June 28, as follows:

Dear Mr. Hurlburt:

This letter has to do with the capital punishment bill that went through second reading on Wednesday, June 23, 1976.

I decided that it was about time that the Government of Canada knew exactly what the people of Southern Alberta felt about the bill.

On Wednesday, June 23 and Thursday, June 24 I opened the phone lines here at CJOC Radio to find out what the residents of Southern Alberta felt about capital punishment. The phone lines were opened between 1:30 and 5:30 p.m. both said days. The final vote read like this:

FOR capital punishment—384 votes

AGAINST capital punishment—18 votes

I also received some mail after the phone line vote was finished with. Enclosed are the letters I received.

I do hope that this will give you a little more backing in Ottawa knowing that 90% or more of Southern Alberta is right behind you as far as the capital punishment bill is concerned.

Adding the letter vote to the phone vote the final tally reads:

399 for capital punishment

18 against capital punishment

We here in Southern Alberta would appreciate it if you were to show this to either Mr. Trudeau himself, or someone that might care.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Regards,

Lethbridge Broadcasting Limited

I would also like to read a telegram from one of my constituents who happens to be an abolitionist, as follows:

Congratulations on your sturdy stand re law and order. Myself, an abolitionist of capital punishment by ideal, consider abolition presently the wrong measure, at the wrong time, in the wrong way, particularly remembering the coming Olympics. Good luck. G. R. C. Palmer, MD.

Dr. Palmer is from the city of Lethbridge.

For the life of me I cannot understand why the government thinks nothing of spending millions and millions of dollars on study group after study group—even study groups studying study groups—but when it comes to Bill C-84 it completely ignores the requests, wishes, and advice of our police forces across the entire country.

In conclusion, I think it behooves all of us to spend a few minutes reflecting on the wishes of our constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on Bill C-84, more precisely on May 11, I mentioned that I did not see any difference between the value of the life of a father or mother, a policeman or a prison guard or a defenceless citizen brutally attacked by bandits who are ever increasing in number. I might add that I have not changed my mind on this matter. However, I find that the motion under discussion is designed to give at least some protection needed by those who are responsible for the protection of society.

I know that policemen are better trained and prepared to defend themselves against bandits; on the other hand, they are much more exposed since their role is to try to arrest various types of criminals. And we notice from many examples that criminals are most of the time well armed and do not hesitate much before shooting down policemen on duty. The registration of their weapons is no problem at all for them. They have their own supply sources that are not subject to red tape which often lack flexibility. In view of the actual situation in general, we should at least give law enforcement officers the assurance that the legislators realize the importance of their role and provide them with enough protection through legislation to cause those who are planning, often long in advance, some acts leading to crime, to think twice.

A release from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, dated June 24, 1976, said the following, and I think a few excerpts from that release would be in order. The executive secretary-treasurer referred to certain matters in the second paragraph of his letter, after making reference to the statement made on June 15, 1976, by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) in his speech in the House of Commons. I remember very well the recent reactions of some members opposite when the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) alluded to the speech of the Prime Minister. And yet, that is exactly what he did say. I have the text of his speech right in fromt of me. I am quoting:

I want to make it very clear that, if a majority of hon. members vote against abolition, some people are going to be hanged. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by this House on this bill.

I now shall continue to quote from the letter of the executive secretary to the members of the House of Commons. It reads:

As for us, we appeal to your conscience and we take the opposite view of that expressed by Mr. Trudeau by saying that abolitionist would be responsible for all future murders of penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers, and we swear that each time one of these murders is committed, we shall impute them to all those who have supported the abolition of capital punishment.

Here are a few facts that you should consider in our opinon:

● (1710)

1—The irresponsible attitude of penitentiary commissioners and directors before the pressure groups who visit the institutions;

2—The lack of proper management by the authorities of most penal institutions in the country;

3—The shocking convict classification system which endangers the life of penitentiary employees as well as the life of most convicts who only want to obey the rules they must follow during their prison term;

4—The present lack of facilities to guarantee the protection and safety of the staff against habitual criminals who have nothing to lose because of the 25 years of imprisonment they would have to serve under Bill C-83.

For these reasons, the Hon. Warren Allmand, Solicitor General of Canada, who did not have the courage to reveal these facts to the members of the House of Commons, should, in all conscience, resign his ministerial responsibilities since he has lost the confidence of all penitentiary employees and all law enforcement officers in Canada.

We urge you, in your heart of hearts, to consider the safety of your family and that of penitentiary employees and law enforcement officers while reflecting on these words: "We want everyone to clearly understand that if most members of Parliament vote against the retention of the death penalty, people will be murdered. The death of these people would then be a direct result of the negative decision made by the House of Commons on this bill."

What our society needs is not an attitude of tolerance or permissiveness towards criminals but a return of everyone to spiritual and moral values. Let the murderes particularly return to them. Then, it will be easier to forego the death penalty. In the meantime, however, let there be no question of abolishing the right and the duty, through the civil and judicial authority, to take the lives of those who have too little respect for that of others.

We insist on the retention of capital punishment not in a spirit of revenge but of legal reparation for the greatest of crimes, and also to protect the lives of the people in the interest of the public and of order.

I already pointed out that the method of execution could be changed either for the gas chamber or any other method deemed appropriate. Considering the tremendous increase in the number of crimes of various types and the attitude of our leaders regarding the means available to reduce the number of crimes and allow a greater number of people to earn a decent living, a rather severe sentence must be maintained to give cause for reflection to those who, because of their behaviour, are likely to take the lives of others if they feel they stand in the way of their crimes.

It must be kept in mind that any individual who respects the life of his neighbour will never have to fear the death penalty if it is retained. In the part of the brief from the executive director of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police dealing with the attitude expected from the Solicitor General, the following was mentioned, of which I would like to quote two paragraphs:

> Such a philosophy is of deep concern to us, because even if the period proposed in Bill C-84 remains in effect, it involves a much greater threat and danger for our society, and more particularly the prison guards in our institutions.
> In view of that attitude, we submit that the minimum sentence of 25 years, as proposed in Bill C-84, is a flagrant hoax since, to all intents and purposes, a convict will have the right to ask for a remission after his first 15 years in prison.

Recently, I read an article published in Quebec City's Le Soleil dated July 4, 1976. Take good note of the title:

> U.S.A. Supreme Court Retains Capital Punishment
> No fewer than 582 prisoners on death row, of whom 10 are women, from 30 different states, may be executed as a result of a long awaited decision of the Supreme Court.
>
> By a majority of seven votes to two, the Supreme Court has rejected the request filed by the attorneys of six persons who were condemned to death after having been found guilty of murder in Florida, Louisiana, Texas, Georgia and North Carolina.
> The attorneys did not deny the convicts' guilt, but they argued that the death penalty was a cruel and unusual punishment and therefore that it was unconstitutional. It was actually a test case for which the League for the Abolition of Capital Punishment tried to stir up public opinion.
> Only Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall were in disagreement with their seven other colleagues who rendered their decision after studying the files for three months. In their majority judgment, the justices considered that capital punishment was not unconstitutional.

I am surprised at the attitude of the Canadian abolitionists who usually keep abreast with the situation prevailing south of the border. They will probably answer that capital punishment has been abolished in several states. This parallel shows the necessity of retaining capital punishment considering that the majority of the Supreme Court judges after pondering over what has happened in the states where capital punishment has been abolished, are favourable to its retention in the states where it still exists.

From the strictly religious point of view, with respect to the concern of the accused for his fate in the hereafter, the murderer sentenced to death can always rely on the assistance of a religious adviser. If he wishes to, he can always beg for God's mercy and prepare himself to die. But his victims seldom have had such an opportunity. In concluding, let me quote from an article published in La Presse of June 2nd, 1976, and written by Mr. Arthur Piché; I may add that I agree with him.

> Man has a right to life. Fine. But this is not equally true for the honest citizen and the murderer. To suggest the opposite would be denying a social and religious tradition which goes back to a thousand years and which has not yet been proved groundless or unfair even if abuses are unfortunately to be deplored. And when we say that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent against crime, we labour under a delusion.
> Like anyone else, criminals fear death. It is evidenced by the fact that in order to protect themselves they carry arms and have often a whole stock of guns hidden somewhere.
> And it has not been shown that a greater permissiveness and an absolute respect for the lives of murderers do help in curbing criminal activities. Indications would rather be to the contrary. We should therefore be wary of statistics purporting to show that the fear of death is not a deterrent, and that criminals do not value their own lives. If they do not why are we so concerned about saving them, once they are caught?

I also note that various press articles dealing with the subject illustrate on occasion what is going on. They should be food for thought to those who have the responsibility of deciding, because this is a very serious matter we are now discussing. I have here this other article that appeared in La Presse of April 17, 1975. It refers to the increasing rate of crime and the decreasing rate of case solving.

We would like some evidence that the government is making real efforts to try and reduce the crime rate in a way acceptable to the prople, to provide jobs and adequate salaries. But no, such evidence is lacking. In this country, we are living under a system that is totally upside-down. We are struggling between inflation and unemployment crises, without any solution whatsoever. It is that kind of situation that provides the ideal conditions under which discouraged people often feel compelled to do things that sometimes lead them to murder.

Clearly, in that kind of situation, over and above trying to improve the economic situation in Canada in general, and until there are more adequate ways of life, we must try and protect those who are paid to maintain law and order in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly in support of the amendment before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: I take cognizance of the endorsement and appreciation for my position shown by two members of the Liberal party. I hope it is reflected in their votes later this day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: They were only applauding because you said you would speak briefly.

Mr. O'Sullivan: On May 22, 1973, I had to make a speech which, while not brief, was the most difficult I ever had to make. Certainly much preparation, thought and soul searching went into it. That speech dealt, as well, with capital punishment. As you will recall, Your Honour, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) had brought before the House a bill which would abolish capital punishment except in cases where a policeman or prison guard was the victim of murder. On that occasion I said the following:

> For one thing, the minister—and I would predict, almost all of his cabinet colleagues—are abolitionists. Yet they present us with a bill that provides for the death penalty in the case of murder of a prison guard or law enforcement officer. If that alone is not questionable, surely the hypocrisy of this legislation is clear when the government presents us with a proposal it has no intention of carrying out. If a government is unable, or just plain unwilling to carry out legislation, it insults this House by presenting such legislation . . .
> The present government would not enforce the penalty provided for in this legislation for the murder of a policeman or prison guard. To suggest it would do so is preposterous; to incorporate that suggestion into legislation is hypocritical.

I do not quote from my previous speech on this subject made when the Solicitor General brought forward the partial abolition bill because I want to claim credit as a prophet. It did not require powers of prophecy to see through the sham of the legislation he was presenting. I quoted my remarks to show that I understood the real designs of the Solicitor General and the government. Now, before the expiry of that experimental legislation which he claimed was so necessary and of paramount importance to the country, the Solicitor General says to us: "Let's wipe out the experiment. Let us forget what we promised with regard to another five-year period in which we would partially abolish capital punishment except in cases involving the murder of a policeman or prison guard. We are going to call the experiment off, abort the experiment in midstream, so to speak, and end capital punishment in this country." I say that the track record and attitude of the Solicitor General in matters concerning parliamentary democracy can only be viewed with deep regret.

It is interesting to note how government supporters proceeded when this bill was before the committee. When any ordinary piece of legislation is being considered, the members of this House, wishing to represent their constituents in the best way possible and not being experts in all fields, find it necessary to call witnesses to appear before a committee and to testify. Members hear what experts say about the application of this or that legislation. As I say, hon. members do not claim to be experts in highly controversial, difficult, and involved fields. We are a collection of commoners. Yet when this bill went to committee for study, the proposal of those opposing the bill to hear representatives of policemen and prison guards was turned down by the government majority on that committee.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was a bad thing.

Mr. O'Sullivan: As the House leader of my party says, that was a bad thing. It is apparent that the government is not willing to listen except when it suits its own convenience. We believe that those witnesses should have been called and heard. If anyone has his or her life hanging in the balance on the outcome of this debate and this bill, surely it is the men and women who serve on our peace enforcement forces and as guards in the prisons of this country.

● (1730)

Earlier in the debate, speaking on the amendment of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), I discussed the situation of the Canadian penitentiary system as I found it while studying that system as part of a special subcommittee of this House. Little did I know at the time that support for the assessment which I gave of the prison system in Canada would come from Dr. Ezzat A. Fattah, the great friend of the Solicitor General and this government relating to this peace and security legislation, in particular in its proposals to abolish capital punishment. After bringing in his report he wrote an article for Simon Fraser University weekly publication. I quote from that article:

> It is a barbaric act, an act of unusual cruelty, to put people in cage-like cells for a minimum of 25 years without the faintest hope. Anybody who knows the living conditions in our penitentiaries would agree that this amounts to a slow death one hundred times worse than rapid death by execution. It is simply hypocritical to abolish a cruel, barbaric and savage punishment such as the death penalty while replacing it with another punishment even more cruel and more barbaric.

Dr. Fattah does not agree with the stand that I have taken on capital punishment, and I do not agree with his findings. However, we both agree, he an abolitionist and I a retentionist, on the barbaric cruelty that one finds in the prison system and the suggestion of the Solicitor General that we box people in them without offering them any hope, or any reason for maintaining themselves in a manner which would not endanger the lives of others.

The government decided that we should not hear representations from spokesmen for policemen or prison guards whose lives are on the line. Their own proponent, their own so-called expert advancing the cause of the abolition of the death penalty, says that it is a barbaric act to cage people like this. It will obviously create tensions that will endanger the lives of both inmates and prison guards. Somehow the government does not think we should listen to those representations or that side of the story.

I do not look down on public opinion. There seems to be an undercurrent of argument put forward by some in this House that members of parliament who support the maintenance of a strong law and order system through the retention of capital punishment are somehow capitulating to the forces of public pressure.

At no time have I ever suggested that anyone should support capital punishment only on the basis of what his or her constituents suggest should be done. At the same time, however, the same members of parliament who at election time return to their constituents with plaudits and praise for the good common sense of the people, asking for their trust and seeking their support, are not in a position to turn around and say that we who have been sent here by them somehow have a greater wisdom, a more developed social conscience that permits us to block out representations we receive from constituents. That is folly. It undermines democracy.

We serve our constituents best when we do what we believe to be in their best interests, when we do what we believe to be right, and when we do what we believe will bring the maximum possible good to the maximum number of people. However, in our search for putting forward legislation which reaches that goal, we dare not ignore that same good common sense that we appeal to at election time and perhaps give lip service to all too often.

I accept personal responsibility for the decision I have made in this very difficult debate. When the Solicitor General first introduced his bill in 1973 I said that I had never faced a more difficult decision during my lifetime. I could not conceive of a more difficult decision to make. Nothing has happened in those intervening years to change my mind. It is the most difficult decision that any man or woman could be asked to reach.

I suggest to all hon. members that in reaching such a decision we should not ignore the counsel of the constituents we are honoured to represent. I do not suggest for a moment that it is always possible to say at any given point what the majority wants. That is a subjective thing. However, any member who returns to his constituency as frequently as he should, maintains contact with his constituency, reads his mail and stays in touch with his people, surely knows what that same good common sense is telling him.

When it comes time to consider the most important legislation that perhaps any of us will have to debate at any time, we should listen in open forum to the submissions of those who perhaps have additional insight into the problems of criminology. They spend their lives day in and day out treating both the victims of crime and those who have committed crime to ensure that justice is done and the security of our nation is upheld.

I want to bring to the attention of this House the submission of the Police Association of Metro Toronto. At page 22 of their brief they speak about the situation that would arise if you placed a man into a penitentiary without any hope of getting out. It is along the same lines as suggested by Dr. Fattah. I quote:

> When the only hope becomes one of escape or when additional crimes do not bring about additional penalties, then the lives of prison guards and prison officials and other prisoners will be placed in jeopardy by those who have "nothing to lose".

That is exactly the situation that will develop. According to the Solicitor General we are going to make sure that those people who, in full possession of their mental and physical capabilities commit premeditated cold blooded murder, will be sentenced to first degree murder and the penalty that they pay will be severe. I agree that it will be severe. I do not agree that it will be effective. It will place in further jeopardy some innocent lives. I refer in particular to the lives of prison guards who live in the pressure cookers we call federal institutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Tonight we shall be voting, as agreed upon by the House, on a series of amendments. It has been suggested that we should not prolong the debate. In fact it has been suggested that representatives of the official opposition are involved in some kind of conspiracy to filibuster. I am glad that at least one member of the government found it possible for him to break the eerie silence on the other side of the Chamber and entered into the debate earlier this week.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

I would draw attention to the fact that if we had proceeded as quickly as the Solicitor General and some of his colleagues had wished, the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), which the minister is now accepting, would not have been written into the bill. So I would suggest there is great benefit in declining to deal with this controversial and difficult legislation to suit the timetable of some hon. members. Consideration of the value of human life cannot be carried out on the basis of a timetable; there is no reason for trying to speed up debate on the many issues involved in this important measure. Rather, every member has an obligation to his own conscience, if that is the basis upon which he is deciding what his view should be, out of respect for the constituents he represents and the need to protect the lives of innocent Canadian people. Every member has a responsibility to consider as judiciously as he can each amendment, each clause of the legislation, and assess the consequences which would follow from the decisions we take here.

The lives of policemen and prison guards are on the line every day. I should like to see capital punishment enforced across the board for first degree murder. But I realize what happened not so long in this Chamber when we voted on second reading, and I understand that a vote on third reading might very well go the same way, though perhaps by a slimmer margin. I want to ensure that prison guards and police officers who daily face exceptional danger receive the protection which we owe to them. To those who are the champions of decisions according to conscience, I say that this, too, is a matter for the conscience of the House.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to intervene at this point in the debate and address myself to the amendment which is before us, namely, the amendment designed to continue to protect those upon whom we rely whenever our society, or safety, or integrity is threatened by subversive elements from within.

We as a society have the right to establish borders and perimeters in a geographical sense, in the moral sense, and in an ideological sense. Between ourselves and subversive elements we place people who protect us against intruders, against those who threaten to destroy us, disturb our ideological integrity or offend our moral values.

I said in the debate on second reading that I found it exceedingly difficult, as did many of my constituents, to put into context this willingness to abolish capital punishment and the protection which goes with capital punishment while spending up to a billion dollars annually to enable our armed forces to protect us against intruders from outside our borders. We have the right to protect ourselves and sometimes those arms destroy innocent lives, though quite often the intrusion, or the offence, is not against life in our country but against our moral or ideological guidelines.

As long as a threat exists from the outside it is accepted throughout the global community that we have a right to protect ourselves, a right to gear up industry to produce tools of aggression and tools of defence—tools to take lives.

Why is it then that within our society we seem willing to ignore the fact that there is a threat to the established norm? We seem content to ignore the fact that there are people within our society who cannot live in accordance with those norms and who challenge the system we have created for ourselves, the system which has evolved.

I also find it difficult to understand what is happening in the global community. Looking back on the wars, of 200, 300 or 400 years ago and comparing them with the wars of today with all the sophisticated weaponry and tools of destruction we have spread throughout the world, it seems to me that as we have evolved as a global community we have designed tools of destruction more sophisticated and deadly than any formerly used, weapons which can kill 100,000 people at one time. And then, because no one actually chops off a man's head—someone sits in an aeroplane and discharges a bomb and by the time it hits he is far away—nobody seems to worry too much about it. The same is true in a different area.

I cannot put into context the ideas of those of my colleagues who favour abolition. Many of my colleagues are in favour of abolition of capital punishment, yet when they talk about the other great emotional issue, that of abortion, their views seem to be directly opposed to any one might expect—one of the hon. members from the Social Credit party has touched on this point today. He found it difficult to understand why it would be that a person who is so determined to preserve life at all costs, even at the cost of innocent life, would also at the same time be prepared to destroy life that has not even had a chance yet to commit any act.

I make this comparison between those who design these tools of aggression and tools of destruction because they are meant to destroy something we do not really see. The doctor makes an intrusion in a private room or an operating room in the hospital. He reaches in some place with a tool, and it all ends up in a garbage can. Just because we do not see what is being done we do not really have to worry about it. It does not offend us any longer. Yes, there were some pictures published of a garbage can in a hospital in Winnipeg containing the bodies of these human babies, three of them wriggling around as captured by the cameraman. That offended us because that was not very nice. It offended our charitable instincts as it appeared in the newspapers, but it was soon forgotten.

What makes these people tick? What makes them think? We have a right and a responsibility, if we are successfully to perpetuate and preserve what we have achieved in a human and responsible way through a voluntary process in the global community of society. We must have the fortitude to accept the responsibility of recognizing and identifying those who have become subversive, and we must act in a way similar to the way we act in respect of cancer in the human body. We must identify the sickness, and we have the responsibility to find cures. We must work hard and diligently to learn and understand more about the human mind.

When we have identified one of these cancers as incurable, after we have gone through the process of examining all the possible cures, all the possible methods of leniency and mercy and there is no recommendation from any source, and no hope that there is any cure for this particular cancer, then we have the responsibility to remove that cancer from the otherwise healthy body. We must protect the healthy body from the spread of this cancer. This is not something new. It has always been that way. This is part of life, part of our system, and part of the burden that those who have elected us have placed on our shoulders. They have the right to protection, the right to security, the right to enjoy the fruits of their labours, the freedoms of our system, and the sanctuary of their homes. They have the right to feel free, with the security to send their children out on the streets at night.

When this feeling of security erodes, as it has in recent years in our country, our whole society is threatened. We place between ourselves and those who threaten our system from within, people who are paid and equipped to protect us against those who perpetrate crimes against us. As we are confronted by the criminal element in our homes and on the streets we do not take direct action. As a matter of fact it is illegal to take direct action. Even though we do as citizens of Canada have the right to arm ourselves under proper licensing provisions, we do not have the right to take another life. We do have the responsibility to call on the law enforcement agencies to take over from us.

Sometimes we are partially to blame because we have put ourselves into a position that creates the difficulty we face. Then we find ourselves confronted by the criminal element and looking down the barrel of a gun. Perhaps we have left the home unlocked, or maybe we have left some material thing lying around that attracted the eye of the criminal. Perhaps we have offended the criminal and he is seeking revenge. When this does happen we get to the telephone and ask someone to intervene on our behalf. Inevitably a member of the law enforcement agency will come and take over the problem, putting himself between the criminal and us.

A policeman is a public servant and has accepted his responsibility voluntarily. In this country we have people who are members of the armed forces. These people like to think they are providing a service, doing something very special in the carrying out of their duties. The very special thing they are doing is protecting society, protecting the achievements of society, and preserving our moral values against offenders.

In return we have the responsibility to protect those people because we lay down specific guidelines on how they shall conduct themselves in their jobs. We tell them when we give them a pistol or a rifle to be very cautious in the use of that weapon. As a matter of fact when a criminal is confronted and is killed in an attempt to escape, we have a very rigorous procedure through which the policeman is put. He must defend his action in taking the life of another.

As we now renege on this responsibility to protect those we ask to intervene on our behalf, I wonder how they will react. I wonder what will happen after the death penalty is abolished. I can imagine myself being in a back alley some place attempting to arrest a criminal, starting the judicial process, then appearing as a witness in court, with the result that the individual is condemned to 25 years, five years or ten years in prison. I wonder what I might be thinking because I would have to look ahead and consider my wife, my children, and my position in the community. I would wonder if I might have to confront the same prisoner again in some back alley. I wonder if I would not be tempted to pull the trigger, knowing the ineptness of the judicial process. I might wonder about the final result of my labour, particularly if I had made many arrests. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, before we allowed ourselves a short recess for dinner I was recounting the difficulty that I have in equating our approach to protecting ourselves against subversive elements from beyond our borders with the apparent failure to recognize the necessity for protecting our society from simmering elements within our borders.

The motion we are debating tonight deals with the retention of capital punishment for certain forms of murder, namely, the murder of prison guards or police or law enforcement officers. I would like to extend this provision to include at least the crime of treason. We spend millions of dollars on arming a very efficient force, as our Canadian armed forces are recognized to be throughout the global community wherever we have a military presence. I have been unable to reconcile why it is that we maintain this kind of safeguard for the protection of our society and, at the same time, make it possible for people to take out visitors' visas, come to Canada and perhaps assassinate our Prime Minister, or our provincial premiers, members of parliament, or other officials.

In other words, such people could come to this country on visitors' visas and take over. If my colleagues in the House of Commons see fit to pass this bill, and if we are able to catch these people, the worst punishment we can give them is to lock them up for 25 years. I should like to know who would be doing the locking up. There are no restrictions on the class of person who can travel to this country and we would have no protection against their activities unless it is to have our law enforcement officers shoot them down on the street.

I am sure that none of my colleagues in this House are naive enough to believe that the government is serious about maintaining in perpetuity a provision in the Criminal Code that incarcerates persons convicted of first degree murder for 25 years. This would indeed be a cruel and unusual punishment, particularly when compared with the punishment given in other countries. I think such a punishment would be more severe than the punishment meted out even by a country such as Russia to balance the ledger of people who attack their system.

In its recent report the Law Reform Commission suggested that we should find ways in which criminals can make restitution and pay for damage done to the victims of their crimes. That is part of the Russian system. It is argued that this is a more humane system than the one we use. Surely no one is naive enough not to believe that after one, two, or at the most three years the government would once again come to the House of Commons and say, "Look, we have had a couple of suicides in prison, we just cannot maintain this kind of inhumane approach on our law books; we will have to go back to the good old days when a person convicted of a major crime can be back out on the street after 7 or 10 years".

The law enforcement officers who protect us against criminals in our society are human too. The average policeman in this country is willing to step between us and the criminal. He is willing to accept his job and the danger that goes with it. But he also wants some protection. He wants some respect for what he is doing, and he wants some recognition. If this bill passes and these amendments are not considered favourably by our colleagues—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2010)

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy extended by my colleagues. It comes as no surprise to me, or to any of us, that many people who are members of our renowned police force should want to leave the force if this kind of approach by parliament were to have a deteriorating effect on the morale of those on whom we call to protect us against subversive elements. They might also act differently in dangerous circumstances.

On the one hand they might use the tools which we give them to carry out the job more effectively; in other words they might point the gun a little lower, they might not fire that warning shot but, looking down the gun barrel themselves, they might point the gun at the person who is pointing the gun at them. On the other hand they might not respond as readily to the call of duty and might avoid future dangerous situations in which they might be placed. Of course it would be no surprise to anyone that the effect would be that citizens in our country would have to take the law into their own hands. We have already experienced that when we went out to dialogue with our constituents on the other portion of the peace and security package, that is, Bill C-83. I know that most of my colleagues have had similar reactions, perhaps not in the larger centres in our country, but in the frontier and the more remote areas of the country the reaction is loud and clear.

People are not altogether as enchanted with the permissive society as we seem to think they are here in Ottawa. They have this feeling of fear, the feeling that they might have to take the law into their own hands as they used to when the more remote areas of our country were being developed and when pioneers had to defend themselves against nature and intruders. That is the very real feeling I experienced when dialoguing with the people I represent. They have experienced this feeling of insecurity, of having to call on the law enforcement agency to protect them against delinquent juveniles, for instance, and have found that our law does not have the teeth it should have to react to the kind of situation that we have imposed on our system as the result of the permissive society.

I should like to touch briefly on the climate which may exist inside our prisons as a result of the abolition of capital punishment and if the amendment, which would at least protect prison guards and policemen, is not passed tonight. Already we have news of the massive resignations of prison guards who guard some of the institutions in the province of Quebec.

Inside our prisons there will be a massive deterioration in morale and a brand new approach will have to be adopted. We will have to train a new generation of prison officials and we will have to find new ways of handling this new phenomenon. As is the case in countries where capital punishment is no longer in existence, some prison guards will make an unholy alliance with some of the dangerous criminals inside prison to avail themselves of their protection against others. The situation will be very serious. The only person who would really be safe inside the prison will be the prisoner himself.

The Solicitor General has brought before parliament measures to create new facilities for maximum security institutions which are now outmoded and outdated. Certainly the institutions which we need today to isolate criminals from our society are not adequate, never mind the situation that will exist after we bring in this new stage of permissiveness into our system. I fear that it will be indeed a cruel and unusual punishment for a person to join the public service in the service of prison administration because he or she will really be in danger if this amendment is rejected today.

Since I do not wish to abuse the privilege that has been extended to me by yourself and my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I wish to conclude by expressing my concern about the fact that some of our colleagues who favour abolition of capital punishment have attacked those of us who have spoken in favour of retention as appearing to be barbarians. I have not been present during all the debate but I believe that none of my colleagues who have spoken here are really barbarians. Each one of us would much rather have afforded himself the luxury of total abolition if indeed we could offer the people whom we represent some hope of not being afraid to send our children out into the streets after dark, some hope that there is some way of dealing effectively with the criminal element or with the professional killer. None of them are advocating that we should broaden the imposition of capital punishment to persons convicted of first degree murder or premeditated murder.

Most speakers who have expressed their views in support of retention have said they would be happy if the existing law were permanently enshrined. I would like to see the present law extended in the case of treason and one or two other crimes. That is why it is so important that hon. members should support the amendment that capital punishment be retained for the murder of prison guards and policemen. It is the minimum we can settle for now.

If we look at the statistics since capital punishment was suspended in Canada, because it has not been effectively administered since 1961 when the last person was hanged, we find that 18 people should have been hanged, but none has been. Again, let us try to equate that number with the hundreds of people who have been murdered by criminals who have committed a second offence, or by people who have been found guilty of crimes of a lesser degree. When the Solicitor General tells us that we might be making a mistake, we might be hanging the wrong person, let him remember that there is only one chance in a million of this, but it is quite obvious from the statistics that there is a very good chance that one person in three who has been convicted of a capital crime and incarcerated for a limited period of time will go out and do it again, if he has not already done it within the prison.

I appeal to my hon. friends in the House here tonight seriously to consider supporting this very essential and important amendment and to give some protection for a further period of time to those upon whom we call when we find ourselves in difficulty and when we find ourselves confronted by the criminal element, by the organized criminal, by the paid criminal, and by the criminal who shows wanton disregard for any moral or human standards within our society. We should show some concern and commit ourselves to standing behind them when they carry out their duties, and when they often act beyond the call of duty to intervene on our behalf against these elements. We owe it to them because otherwise we cannot expect them to do their work as effectively and as efficiently as we have become accustomed to expect of them up to this time.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, consideration of amendments to the bill before the House leads us to serious thinking, since we should ask ourselves a good question: how is it that we have reached such an impasse and that Parliament finds it so very difficult to get out of it. The vote of principle taken at the second reading stage of the bill on June 22 last, is a good illustration of this impasse, in the sense that we realized that the House was divided almost exactly in two sections. But, when considering the reasons that have caused a faction of the House to vote in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, we find that the stakes have been altered.

The reason why these stakes have been altered are irrelevant to the basic principles involved when we are discussing whether or not to abolish capital punishment. I say they are independent from the only reasons that should concern us since they are the exclusive result of one man's ambitions and ideology, and that man happens to be the Prime Minister of Canada. As the leader of our party (Mr. Caouette) said this afternoon when he had the opportunity to take part in this debate, we can ask ourselves: who requested the abolition of the death penalty, how is it that while 90 per cent of Canadians openly support the retention of capital punishment, its abolition is being proposed?

Some hon. Members: That is not true!

Mr. Matte: Members opposite are shouting: that is not true. I challenge the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) to make a double investigation in his constituency and mine; I am sure that both in his constituency of Lapointe and in mine of Champlain 95 per cent of the people, and I am prepared to bet on this, are in favour of the retention of capital punishment.

An hon. Member: That is true!

Mr. Matte: So, Mr. Speaker, when we are faced—

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I say to my hon. friend that I advised my constituents, all 17,000 of them, that I shall vote for abolition, and I received three replies.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the people of Lapointe will answer him only when the next election comes.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to both hon. members that they are getting into a point of debate, and I suggest that the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) get back to motion No. 13.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: As someone already pointed out, and as the hon. member from the government side said, the Social Credit Party members are like dandelions: the more you cut them, the more they grow. Let there be no illusions on that score.

So, Mr. Speaker, to get back to my point, the vast majority of the Canadian people are in favour of keeping the death penalty, that is, they simply want present laws to apply. That is all the people want. So, how is it that we are being presented with bills no one wants, or only a minute part of the population wants, while overlooking the real problems and the solutions for which the people are clamoring? Those bills are being put through.

To wit, for several years now, and especially since the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has come to power as leader of this country, it has been noticed that we have been chasing things that no one wanted, all the while wasting time as we have now been for weeks, if not months, in this House. Why? Because one day we had a Prime Minister who made up his mind that, if he became Prime Minister, the first thing he would do would be to abolish capital punishment. Second, he would repatriate the Constitution. Third—and it has already been done—he would permit abortion and legalize homosexuality. In addition, at one time he even spoke of legalizing some drugs such as marihuana.

When a man is the leader of a country and he has such ideas and thinks that he must absolutely implement them, we come to the dead-end we have now, since we simply cannot go against the people's will expressing itself as clearly, as plainly as in the present circumstances. Moreover, what should we do about this problem of capital punishment? It is still an individual and personal problem of conscience for each hon. member in the House. It amounts to changing the very rules of democracy, since you have the choice of two things:

Either each one of us is here to promote his own little pride or to represent people who want laws pursuant to their principles and ideologies. We have the choice of two things: Either we are democratic representatives or we are not. To my mind, every member prides himself on being democratic. The dictates of my conscience are that even if I were in favour of the abolition of the death penalty, I do have responsibilities to fulfill here because I must reflect the opinion of the majority of the 70,000 people of my riding whom I represent.

I do not think for a moment that it reaches on the borders of my conscience to vote for maintaining the death penalty because, Mr. Speaker, if we want to discuss that point on a philosophical basis, I will not decide, by my vote, to maintain the death penalty or to hang the murderer of John, Jim or Joe. No, Mr. Speaker, it is the murderer himself who decides because he knows that the death penalty will be enforced from now on. The man who commits a reprehensible act knows quite well that his act will bring about the death penalty. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not the member for Champlain or his colleagues from the Social Credit Party of Canada or his other colleagues who will decide that that man should be hanged because he will decide by himself. Mr. Speaker, we are defending the principles of individual liberty; consequently, we should give his way to the man who decides so clearly and precisely that he absolutely wants to climb up the gallows.

This may sound like those words of revenge we often hear. Mr. Speaker, if we consider the situation as it is now, we are obliged to recognize that we have had a try with abolition. The law has not been enforced for so many years that we are now able, after a whole decade, to analyze and to come to the necessary conclusions. Consequently, we can say that we have had a try with the abolition of the death penalty. We know the results. I shall not put forward again all the statistics on this matter as we know them fairly well.

Mr. Speaker, we have a Prime Minister who, somewhere in his mind, feels obliged to go to posterity as the one who will have abolished the death penalty, as the one who will have repatriated the constitution from London. Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that we will come to that end. Many of my colleagues opposite suffer the blackmail of the Prime Minister. For several weeks, I have not been able to participate in the proceedings of the House but I could verify, in the field, as we say, the consequences, for our Parliament, of the measures he advocated.

Mr. Speaker, in 1970, during the famous October crisis, the Prime Minister went as far as speaking with a demagogy that only his attitude could equal. He said, not only to his friends of the Liberal party but also to all members of the House, that the 11 persons now on death row would be sent simultaneously to the gallows if necessary—

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Matte: —if the death penalty was maintained. I say that such remarks are not worthy of a man who holds such an important office. It is quite obvious that several of my colleagues opposite bowed to that blackmail. And I believe that explains why the House was pretty well divided in two clans when it came to the question of the principle of the bill on second reading. Were it not for that blackmailing, were it not for that fad the Prime Minister has to absolutely want to have that legislation passed, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the majority of the members of this House because of their personal interest and their role as genuine members of Parliament would truly reflect the thinking of the people in their ridings and consequently would vote for retaining capital punishment. So, Mr. Speaker, the game has been fouled and that is why the second reading did not truly reflect the opinion of my hon. colleagues in this House.

Tonight we have a chance to undo that, and this time, to move with the support of the majority of the people of Canada. Earlier, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) said that he had received only three replies in favour of the bill from his riding; I do not question that, because the people of his riding cannot get over the fact that he is going against the wishes, so they no longer want to have anything to do with him. That is very clear. For those three replies he mentions, I can show him over 8,000 I received from the riding of Champlain. Imagine 8,000 replies out of 16,000 questionnaires sent out! When 50 per cent of the people go to the trouble of writing their representative to indicate clearly and explicitly to him that they are in favour of something I would be very ill advised, Mr. Speaker, with an extremely scrupulous conscience, to say: How I hate to end the life of someone who has killed five or six children, or a poor old man, or a poor old lady! I hate to do it in my own conscience, I am shaking at the thought of that man being sentenced to die.

Mr. Speaker, that is utter ridicule since, as I said earlier, a person in full possession of his faculties who commits a capital murder, who decides at a given moment to kill, automatically decides also to have himself put to death. The decision was taken by him, not society. That is why I think we can therefore accept the principle of being against the fact that society has its revenge against an individual by committing exactly the same act for which the individual is blamed by that society. But this is not the case at all, I think.

From now, on we must say that we are no longer naive. I am not referring to those eleven people now sentenced to death. They were so sentenced in a system under which they were sure of not being hanged. Consequently they cannot be judged in that light, confident as they were because there had been no execution for more than ten or eleven years, I think. As a result, those who are now on death row were sure of not being hanged. We could say that after them, there might be some revision, that they should be sentenced to life imprisonment rather than do what the Prime Minister suggested—giving a show to all Canadians and send them all to the scaffold. No, of course!

Mr. Speaker, we will not give in to this kind of blackmailing on this side of the House, at least not the Social Credit members. We are not at all impressed by that because we consider that those individuals were convicted. Yes, they were convicted, but within a system where, for all practical purposes, abolition had been accepted. Now that it would be reinstated, that it would again take effect in a strict sense, we could say that from now on anyone who hangs would necessarily have decided so himself, and it would not be because society wants to exercise revenge, but simply because he has decided so. There is a distinction.

Therefore in my view the best way to do away with capital punishment is very simple, it is indeed very obvious, Mr. Speaker. Let no one commit murder. If there is no murder, then there is no capital punishment. It is just as easy as that. I have no qualm of conscience when I say to myself: Everybody has been warned; everybody knows what to expect. And I know that if I commit a murder of that kind, a premeditated murder, I deserve to hang. Every one will agree. Anyone who decides to commit murder has only himself to blame, not society, since it is he who has freely elected his course of action. He later will have to bear the consequences.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are completely justified to support the bill before us. This amendment gives all hon. members an opportunity to change their minds, all those who had been misled and blackmailed can straighten their views. Now is the time to review one's decision. I am now addressing myself especially to those who felt some compunction, and I am trying to prove to them that they need not let their conscience bother them. Let them simply say: As for me, I object to anyone being killed, I do not want at all that society take revenge on anyone. In that sense, I am against capital punishment. It is as easy to abolish it as to refrain from committing murders. Some people say: "We are smarter than anybody else". I even heard on the radio one member say that if he is a member of Parliament, it is because he is the most intelligent in his riding.

That is why he was sent here and, therefore, his opinion was worth much more than that of any other person in his riding, with a population of close to 90,000 or 100,000 inhabitants. His opinion is more important than that of his 100,000 constituents. Mr. Speaker, I would not have a clear conscience if I reasoned in this manner. I find that a reasoning which questions the very principle of democracy is worse than one which would restrain by every means someone who wants to be hanged. I find it is a good thing to respect public opinion, and if society is sick and there are murderers, I say that it is because it deserves it. If our present society, which is admittedly decadent and in which the level of morality is getting lower and lower, demands capital punishment, it is because it feels the need for it. I say therefore that it deserves it.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all my colleagues.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I do not consider our role in the House to be holy nor do I think that we should take for granted that we want to establish a perfect society which would therefore allow us to abolish capital punishment. No, we are no angels, and I do not know of any in this House. There is no need to have scrupules, particularly because basic principles prevent us from doing so in view of the moral corruption, the violence as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) pointed it out today, which is systematically shown on television, from childhood to adolescence to adulthood, in a society that teaches violence to its youngsters. When we finally talk about exercising some control over television, radio and the press, our honorable colleagues of the New Democratic Party are shocked, they rise as offended virgins in defence of the principles of freedom while at the same time taking a contradictory approach in their actions.

Mr. Speaker, once again this goes to show how sick our society is. We intentionally produce violent people and then we want to abolish capital punishment. This is utterly illogical. I repeat that our society needs capital punishment. When it will be proved to me that we have an almost perfect society, then it might be logical to consider the abolition of capital punishment. But in the meantime, we are far from that and whoever pretends that the material advancement which characterizes this phenomenal era of industrial and scientific progress, has improved the moral fibre of our society is all wrong. We have gone back to the Middle Ages and today, as some people would say, capital punishment is something left over from the dark ages.

I am sure that the crimes we are witnessing today are worse than those ever committed in the Middle Ages and with all those movies about violence on television, we are seeing things still worse than what may be described in any historical movie relating events which occurred in 1100 or 1200. This is much worse. Then, society today is worse than it was in the Middle Ages. Then, we can say that if the people are informed that in the future, anyone who commits a crime will be hanged, if someone does it, he will condemn himself.

In concluding, I would like to refute the argument brought about by those who say that the retentionists are motivated by a desire of revenge and some kind of cruelty. I shall tell them that it is even more cruel and inhuman to sentence a person to 25 years in prison. I recall that here in this House, my former colleague for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) had read a letter from Leopold Dion, the murderer of five children who had begged his member to arrange for him to be hanged. He could not bear living in the penitentiary. And this murderer was asking that the law be applied in his case. Who is cruel? I suggest it is those who ignored the desire of this criminal and preferred to have him rot in prison. This kind of Chinese torture is worse than hanging for who knows what to expect. So I think that tonight the majority of the members will have a chance to openly express the views of the vast majority of Canadians who favour the retention of the death penalty.

[English]

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on second reading of this bill I said we are embarked on a serious debate which demands sober judgment. Sir, the amendment we are considering will, if passed, provide for the execution of those convicted of murdering prison guards or policemen. This is not a debate between enlightened abolitionists and barbaric retentionists. Sir, this debate concerns the very roots of justice itself.

We speak of prison guards and policeman. Who are they? Who are these guards and policemen to whom we refer so glibly in this House? Sir, they are the fellows next door; I suppose I should add, as well, the gals next door. They are people with hopes and dreams; they experience the same joys and sorrows which you and I experience; their expectations are the same as yours or mine and they want to realize, to fulfil them the same as we do. They love life.

They are the people who protect us from those who would plunder our cities, destroy our freedoms, murder our people, strip us of our liberties, and clothe us with fear. Sir, our prison guards and policemen protect us from these elements, from criminals who act without regard for the historic values Canadians hold dear and the traditions which have been built within our nation, within our very borders, a bastion of strength and liberty. Sir, policemen are symbols of the authority which protects Canadian people. If you want to analyse the protection of the Canadian people, and resolve that these policemen and prison guards are symbolic of this protection, this protection is the will of the Canadian people to do right and to act against those who have no such will. It is the collective determination of Canadians to live free from fear and violence.

Seldom in the history of this parliament has the collective determination of the Canadian people been so clear. I am not refuting that from time to time parliament is called upon by the people of Canada to lead. It is a rightful duty of any parliament and any government to lead. Surely if it is the responsibility for parliament to lead, it is also the responsibility of parliament to reflect this obvious collective will of the people. It is blatantly obvious that the government is not in harmony with the collective will of the people, but the government by gentle reason and sound argument can lead the people until the two wills are a reciprocate echo of a determined direction. But the government is not displaying gentle leading. It is displaying a flagrant violation of its mandate.

Where there is no common will or purpose, there can be no justice. Laws ought to—and I know that often laws passed by this government do not—at least to some degree reflect the common will. The antithesis of courtroom justice is street justice.

It is alarming to me when I hear among the highways and byways of this country, in the coffee shops, on the street corners and in the homes, about Canadians taking justice in their own hands, executing justice on the spot rather than in the courts. It is a sad situation when the government by its inaction to reflect the common will forces Canadians to take this kind of justice, which is the way of anarchy.

Because the time is late and there are other members on this side who want to speak, I will conclude my remarks. However, I first wish to point out that when the government runs contrary to the obvious common will of the Canadian people it threatens to unravel the frail fibre of justice that was so carefully and intricately woven by our forefathers and is now jealously guarded by the courts of our land. This parliament must accept this amendment. I say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that we have not the liberty to do otherwise.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this report stage debate, particularly with regard to motion No. 13, will be very brief. I have not spoken to date, but the letters I have been receiving from my constituents indicate that I should put on record some of my feelings.

The amendment offered by the hon. member for Barnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) deserves the support of all members. Before commenting on that, I want to make a brief statement regarding the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) just before the dinner hour. I look at this very bright young man and realize that at half my age he has a maturity that belies his years. In my opinion the speech that he made shows a responsiveness that is not felt by members of the cabinet. I came here in 1972 at the same time as this young member. In 1973 we were faced with a vote. The history behind it is well known. It was also supposed to be a trial period in 1967. It was not a trial period. There had been no attempt to use it as a trial period. It was merely a façade.

When it was brought back in the second time in 1973, we were told this would be the second five years of a ten year trial period. We were asked to vote for it. The vote at that time was basically the same vote as we are faced with now. Anyone who voted for that bill was called an abolitionist. Tonight, voting for the same bill, one is termed a retentionist. I find that ironic and difficult.

In 1973, I voted with the cabinet on second reading to support the bill in principle. I did so with some reservation, on the promise by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that he would provide some protection. Instead what did he do? He tried to bootleg the bill through committee. I was disgusted with what I term a dishonest action on the part of the Solicitor General. On third reading I changed my vote and voted with what was then termed retentionist. The vote at that time carried. Frankly I do not have a great deal of hope that the vote tonight will carry. However, I am convinced more than ever that it is absolutely necessary to curb the growing crime rate in this country and to have something on which the people of Canada can rely. It is now three years since the Solicitor General promised he would carry out that bill. After all, he brought it forward. Now his hair shirt is bothering him.

The Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) brought in a public relations package with a real fanfare. They termed it the peace and security package. Bill C-83 was a ripoff. There were more amendments to that bill than any other bill in the past.

Canada wants protection. I polled my riding, as I am sure many other members did. The figure happened to be 81.4 per cent in favour of retaining capital punishment. That is a little higher than the national average. Nonetheless that is the percentage of those in my constituency who want capital punishment retained.

I do not particularly think that capital punishment is a deterrent, but that does not matter. As far as I am concerned, we need to support the police at a time when crime is rising.

I was a member of the board of police commissioners in the city of Belleville for four years. I was instrumental in enlarging the police force there. After having hired some of those men I can say that it is a police force that stacks up against any other police force, and is finer than many, in any city of comparable size in Canada. I have a tremendous amount of respect for them and a high regard for and faith in their judgment. They, like many others, want to have the protection of capital punishment.

Like the hon. member who preceeded me, I am going to be brief. I would have liked to have gone on at some length. However, there is one question I have to ask. Why does the government want to continue with this confrontation? It recently had a confrontation with the air traffic controllers. Not long ago it started a confrontation with the people of Canada as a result of the Anti-Inflation Board. Now there is the worst confrontation of all, the matter of capital punishment.

Over 75 per cent, possibly 80 per cent, of all Canadians want capital punishment. If between 15 and 20 million Canadians want capital punishment as opposed to the lives of eight, ten or a dozen individuals who are murderers, or maybe something quite a bit worse, our legislative priorities are out of whack. As far as I am concerned, if the people of Hastings will sleep a little better at night should capital punishment be retained, then this member will vote for capital punishment as often as he has a chance to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion is in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, June 29, a recorded vote on the said motion stands deferred.

We shall now turn to mention Nos. 21 and 22 in the name of the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

[Translation]

The House will now consider motions Nos. 21 and 22 standing in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

Motion No. 21.

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 7.

Motion No. 22.

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 8.

Mr. Speaker, with your leave and following a discussion with my colleagues from all the parties represented in the House about motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23.

Since these are technical motions concerning pleas, refusal to plead, allowing time, pleading over, and peremptory challenge, I will simply refrain from any comment on the matter. These subjects are very clear to the House, and I would rather hope the House would vote on motions 21, 22 and 23 in order to speed up the business of the House. We should prevent any unnecessary debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

That Bill C-84, and act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting clause 7.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.
And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, June 29, 1976, a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. This also applies to motion No. 22, since it has been suggested that a negative vote on one of these two motions will dispose of the other. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As suggested by the hon. member, is the House also ready for the question on motion No. 23, in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière? Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting clause 10.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.
And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday June 29, 1976, a recorded vote on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[English]

Mr. Reynolds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been some agreement in the House that having reached motion No. 23 we should skip to motion No. 36 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and forgo discussion of the other motions until tomorrow.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there is agreement on that.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we also agree to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I still have to ask hon. members whether there is unanimous consent that we do not proceed in the order which has been set out but that we go directly to motions Nos. 36 and 37.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

Motion No. 36.

That Bill C-84 be amended in clause 21 by inserting in line 18 at page 12 immediately after the word "Act" the following words:

"in the absence of a judge's order,"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall also put motion No. 37 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Fortin) as follows:

Motion No. 37.

That Bill C-84 be amended in clause 21 by (a) striking out lines 22 to 43 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"669. The sentence to be pronounced against a person

(a) whose sentence of death is commuted to imprisonment for life or who is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life for an offence under subsection 214(3) or paragraphs 214(5)(b) or (c) shall be that he be sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole until he has served twenty-five years of his sentence;

(b) who is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life for second degree murder, shall be that he be sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole until he has served at least ten years of his sentence or such greater number of years, not being more than twenty-five years, as has been substituted therefor pursuant to section 671; and

(c) who is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life for any other offence, shall be that he be sentenced to imprisonment for life with normal eligibility for parole.";

(b) striking out lines 35 to 44 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"672.(1) Where a person has served at least fifteen years of his sentence, where he has been sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole until he has served more than fifteen years of his sentence,".

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, with regard to motion No. 36 perhaps I might first of all deal with the proposed change in the wording now on the Order Paper. Hopefully I shall get the unanimous consent of the House. This motion was prepared in some haste. Our object was to ensure that the granting of temporary absences to convicts sentenced to life imprisonment should be accorded stricter scrutiny. My first thought was that this might be secured by way of a judicial review—a judge would review the proposal to allow a temporary absence. However, upon reflection it is generally felt that it would be preferable to have the National Parole Board review these cases.

If it is in order I should like to suggest that the amendment now before us be changed to read, "by striking out the words after the word "offences" and substituting the following therefor:". It would then read:

"be amended in Clause 21 by striking out line 20 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

'under the Penitentiary Act, and no absence with escort for humanitarian and rehabilitative reasons may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act without the approval of the National Parole Board and no day' "

Perhaps I may explain the procedure as I understand it. It is possible for me, with the unanimous consent of hon. members, to change the wording of the motion I now have before the House to the new wording, and that is what I hope to do. The thought is not changed, this is simply to make the clause more readable, making it clear that it is the National Parole Board that must give approval. I understand the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) would like to speak on the matter.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and, because he merely wants to change the wording of his amendment, I am agreeable to asking for unanimous consent, or agreeing to unanimous consent for him to do that. We all know he had to prepare these amendments rather quickly for the report stage, and I think it is only right that we give him the opportunity to have his amendment debated in a proper fashion. I would ask the House to give him unanimous consent to change the wording of his amendment as proposed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course the House is the master of its own rules, but I would want at least to have a copy of the proposed changes to the motion that has been moved and of which notice has been given by the hon. member.

I feel the best way to accomplish what the hon. member seeks to do is not by way of an amendment but, as the hon. member requested, with the unanimous consent of the House allowing the hon. member to modify wording of the motion. Otherwise I do not see how this can be attached to the motion as an amendment. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) to make the modification or changes he has just suggested to the House, taking into account the fact that this would attempt to reach the same objective?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will read the new motion. It is moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan):

That Motion No. 36 be amended by striking out the words after the word "offences" and substituting the following therefor:

"be amended in Clause 21 by striking out line 20 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

'under the Penitentiary Act, and no absence with escort for humanitarian and rehabilitative reasons may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act without the approval of the National Parole Board and no day' "

Mr. Stevens: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for unanimous consent in accepting the new wording. Perhaps I might explain the motion we now have before us.

I would refer hon. members to Clause 21 of Bill C-84 at page 12. At the present time Bill C-84 proposes that:

Notwithstanding the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act, in the case of any person sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole for a specified number of years pursuant to this act, no absence without escort may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act—

It goes on to say certain other things. I feel first of all that the clause as it is now worded is not clear that it is only an absence with an escort that may be permitted under any circumstances in the event somebody has been jailed for life. Secondly, I feel it was too easy, if you like, to permit even an absence with an escort on the say so, as it now is, of the commissioner of the penitentiary, or on the say so of the director of the jail where the man has been imprisoned, or in the case of a person who has been referred to a provincial mental hospital, on the say so of the director of that provincial mental hospital.

If accepted, the proposed amendment would simply make it clear that, first of all, in the case of those who have been convicted for murder and sentenced to life imprisonment they may not obtain an absence without an escort under any circumstances. The amendment would also make it clear that in the case of an absence having been granted with an escort, if it is for medical reasons that is one thing and the local jailer or Commissioner of Penitentiaries can permit that absence with an escort, but in the case of an absence for humanitarian reasons or on the grounds of rehabilitation, under the proposed wording such absence would not be permitted without the approval of the National Parole Board.

In short, it is time to ensure that if the death penalty does not apply to convicted murderers and they are sentenced to life imprisonment, that life imprisonment will in fact mean there will be a minimum incidence of convicts being released even with an escort.

In drawing attention to this amendment I would mention to hon. members various statistical information and points in the brief presented by the Solicitor General on this subject in March, 1976. Under Question No. 28, dealing with parole eligibility, release and violation, and temporary absence, there is an interesting review of the whole question and what has been the record of those who have been allowed this or some other type of freedom under the Parole Board. If I may, I should like to quote from Question No. 28 as follows:

> The responsibility for temporary absences has been shifted from the Penitentiary Service to the Parole Board.

That is under Bill C-83. This is the Solicitor General's own submission. Let me point out in respect of that reference that it is not totally correct. If we read Bill C-83 we find that while absences without an escort have been referred to the Parole Board under Bill C-83, oddly enough absences with an escort have not been referred to the Parole Board. Consequently you have a rather odd situation in which a man may be sentenced to prison for life and, if released with an escort, does not need Parole Board approval.

Based on the minister's own submission, what I am suggesting is that it would be wise and responsible for this House to ensure that if a person is to be released with an escort, and I emphasize that, he should only be released for humanitarian or rehabilitative reasons with the approval of the Parole Board. Hopefully it will only act under very, very special circumstances.

It would be natural for hon. members to ask to what extent this is a problem. Again I would refer hon. members to the Solicitor General's submission to this House of March, 1976, and specifically to Question No. 54 which deals with the simple question:

> What is the performance on temporary absence of inmates convicted of murder?

If I may, I should like to read the response, and again I emphasize that this is the Solicitor General's own information. It states:

> Preliminary statistics indicate that during 1974, a total of 275 individual murderers were released on 2,703 temporary absence permits.

It is also pointed out that:

> —8 inmates failed to return from temporary absence, but all were subsequently returned to custody.

The point I want to make is based on the 1974 figures. You can see that it was not an unusual thing in the past to give temporary absence permits, 275 individual murderers having received them in 1974 alone, not only for one time but in 2,703 different instances.

● (2120)

I also refer hon. members to question No. 58 in the same submission of the Solicitor General's Department. It deals with how many persons convicted of murder have murdered a second time while on parole, while on temporary absence, while incarcerated, and after escape from an institution. The response in this case is as follows:

> With the exception of one case, our knowledge of murderers who murdered again is limited to cases since 1963. The study is based on a review of CPS case files. This study excludes cases where the charge was originally for murder but the conviction was manslaughter, or the original charge was for manslaughter.
> While on Parole:
> 3 persons.
> One person committed both murders in Canada (executed in 1944). The other 2 persons were involved in the same first murder which was committed in the United States; they jointly committed their second murder in Canada.

The next heading deals with persons who have been in jail but were unlawfully at large following a temporary absence. Presumably these are people on legal temporary absence and who, for their own reasons, failed to return. One person is listed who committed first and second murders in Canada. In the "While Incarcerated" category there was one person who committed first and second murders in Canada. In the "After Escape" category there were two persons. One committed his first murder in Canada, escaped from the B.C. pentitentiary to the United States and committed his second and third murders there. The other person committed his first murder in a prison in the United States, escaped to Canada and murdered a policeman.

I hope that will summarize what I am attempting to achieve in the amendment now before the House. In short, if the government wishes to do away with the death penalty for the ordinary crime of murder, I believe it absolutely imperative that the members of this House ensure that life imprisonment means life imprisonment, and that absences from prison on the part of convicted murderers should be kept to a minimum.

As we know, Bill C-84 proposes that people who are convicted of murder and jailed for life may not get leave from prison without an escort. My point is that even with an escort there has to be more scrutiny of any application for leave. In the absence of the death penalty surely even abolitionists agree that life imprisonment must mean life imprisonment.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, it is comparatively easy to escape from an escort. You cannot keep a man shackled indefinitely. Leaves are granted for periods of five days, 15 days, even longer. Even though a man is out of jail on leave and is escorted, he can easily escape and perhaps commit another crime or a murder. This is why I believe any application should not be left to the local jailer, or to the provincial medical institution if the inmate is in a mental institution, or even to the commissioner to decide; the deicsion should be for the National Parole Board to make. This is what my amendment provides, or will provide if hon. members see fit to vote for it.

I see it is almost 9.30, Mr. Speaker, and there is a House order that we vote at 9.30. I should like my proposed motion No. 36 to be voted on at that time, so let me conclude my remarks by saying that if we are to do away with the death penalty, let us make sure there are as few cases as possible where leave is granted even with an escort. One safeguard would be to insist, as this amendment does, that any application for leave is subject to National Parole Board review.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the penitentiary service about this amendment. The principal problem with it is that it would prevent the penitentiary authorities from taking an inmate who is sick, or who suddenly becomes ill, to hospital with an escort for emergency treatment. At the moment, when an inmate becomes ill—let us say he has a heart attack in prison—he is taken to the hospital under escort pursuant to section 26 of the Penitentiary Act. If on each occasion we had to go to the parole board for permission to take him to the hospital, the man could die as a result of not getting the medical treatment he required.

I agree with the hon. member that we should do everything possible to tighten up our scrutiny of temporary absences, both escorted and non-escorted, and I am committed to doing that. But I do not see how we can accept this amendment if it means that we cannot take an inmate to hospital with an escort unless we get the approval of the National Parole Board. If he made a distinction in his amendment so as to require this to be done in the case of escorted temporary absence for rehabilitative or for humanitarian reasons, perhaps I could accept it.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Allmand: But in the circumstances, since this is done principally for medical reasons, I do not think I can.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

● (2130)

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) suggests sending an escort with criminals who suffer a heart attack. Does he suggest the same thing for innocent people who have to put up with strikes in hospitals and can die because of that?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: They have that right now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I know the Solicitor General's point, but perhaps he was unaware that I included that exception in my proposal. I propose that an absence with an escort for humanitarian or rehabilitative reasons may be authorized. I added those words so that medical cases would not be restricted by my proposed amendment.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when the amendment was given to me this afternoon it did not contain that provision. I have not had a chance to discuss it with the penitentiary service, and when I will get the chance to discuss it it may be possible to agree with it. If it is voted on tonight I am afraid that I would have to vote against it, since I want to make sure that this can be administered properly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I guess we had better follow the procedure stated in the order. It being 9.30 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, July 5, 1976, it is my duty at this time to interrupt proceedings and to put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of deferred divisions at the report stage of Bill C-84. Call in the members.

● (2140)

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House will proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on motions Nos. 4, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 18 and 38. There has been a grouping, for the purposes of discussion, of motions Nos. 4, 9, 18 and 38. I think it is clear that motion No. 38 joins itself with another motion which is yet to be discussed and is in a certain respect consequential upon the passage of some other motions, and therefore it ought to be deferred for voting purposes at least until after all of the motions this evening have been put. That may depend on the result of the vote. Perhaps it would be out of order, or in any case not sensible, to vote on motion No. 38 before the rest are voted upon.

● (2150)

Motions Nos. 4, 9 and 18 have been grouped for discussion and it would be the intention of the Chair to take a vote on motion No. 4 and then, because the principle that is involved in that motion is common to motions Nos. 9 and 18, to see if the House gives its unanimous consent to the registration of the same result on those two motions. If there is not unanimous consent then a separate vote must be taken on motions Nos. 9 and 18. If that is agreed, the question before the House at this time is motion No. 4.

The House divided on motion No. 4 (Mr. Halliday) which was negatived on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare motion No. 12 carried.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members may be aware that one of the members of the House who is a physician has been asked to step outside the Chamber for a moment because of a possible emergency in the lobby. Under the circumstances it does not seem sensible to proceed with the taking of such an important vote as the next one in the hon. member's absence. Perhaps hon. members might simply extend their indulgence for a moment or two. I would not suggest that hon. members leave the Chamber. The doctor apparently is prepared to return momentarily.

Order, please. The question is now on motion No. 13.

The House divided on motion No. 13 (Mr. Reynolds) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 13 lost.

● (2250)

The result would obviate the necessity of taking a vote at this time on motion No. 38. However, there is some difficulty in a further deferral of the vote unless the House gives unanimous consent because we are operating under an order of the House that deferred motions have to be voted on within a certain period of time. It would seem better to leave motion No. 38 to another occasion when the result of the voting tonight might be taken into account in assessing what should be done with regard to the remaining motions. A recorded division will be further deferred, at least until remarks have been made in the House tomorrow at 12 o'clock to see what ought to be done, and this would allow for time for discussion tomorrow morning.

As a result of discussion this day divisions were deferred as well on motions Nos. 21 and 22. The question therefore is upon motion No. 21 in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). This motion ought to be taken together with motion No. 22.

Capital Punishment

The question is upon motion No. 21. All those in favour of motion No. 21 will please rise.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that motion No. 21 should carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Shall it be recorded that motion No. 21 was negatived on division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 21 (Mr. Fortin) negatived on division.

Mr. Speaker: The question is therefore on motion No. 22 in the name of Mr. Fortin. Is it pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Shall it be entered that the motion was lost upon division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 22 (Mr. Fortin) negatived on division.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 23 has also been deferred for division at this time. Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Shall it be recorded that motion No. 23 has been lost on division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 23 (Mr. Fortin) negatived on division.

Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

To accelerate the business of the House and because of the votes that have taken place this evening, without wishing to interpret them, I would like to suggest, if I have the unanimous consent of the House, to proceed in the same manner with motions Nos. 24, 26, 27, 30, 31, 33, 37 and 43, and in this way, we shall have disposed of the amendments that I have moved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an excellent suggestion by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

[English]

But as I have indicated earlier, perhaps the remaining motions, many of which will have to be given consideration, might be held off pending consideration to determine whether they might be grouped or withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock!

Some hon. Members: Carry on!

Mr. Speaker: If it is the pleasure of the House to proceed I would think the only process to be followed would be for the Chair to continue to call motions consecutively and dispose of them by voice votes.

The question is therefore upon Motion 24.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) moved:

Motion No. 24.

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 12.

[English]

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: Shall it be recorded that Motion No. 24 was defeated upon division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 24 (Mr. Fortin) negatived on division.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 25 in the name of Mr. Lawrence—

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To prevent this ridiculous procedure, could I suggest, with unanimous consent, that these motions be simply withdrawn?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is indeed a very co-operative suggestion and an orderly way of doing this. It would take only a minute to separate these motions that stand. Perhaps as we call the motions seriatim for votes, those that stand in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) could be dealt with. In each case where the hon. member seeks the consent of the House perhaps he should do so as the motion is called. The question, therefore, is on Motion No. 25 in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Shall the same result that has already been recorded for the other motions be applied to this amendment to Clause 12?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member for Lotbinière have the consent of the House to withdraw Motion No. 26?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) moved:

Motion No. 26.

That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended by deleting Clause 14.

Is there unanimous consent that the House proceed to the taking of the division at this time on Motion No. 26.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent to the taking of the division on motion No. 26 at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the House is not in the position to proceed to the taking of a division on any of the remaining motions until such time as they have been dealt with and deferred by the House. Therefore, it being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 11 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF NON-SMOKERS IN TRANSIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the official opposition's outstanding record of constructive suggestions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government forthwith bring forth legislation similar to Bill C-242, an act for the relief of non-smokers in transit to ensure reasonable and expeditious attention thereto.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can only be debated with unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED DENIAL OF LANDING RIGHTS TO AIRCRAFT OF COUNTRIES HARBOURING AIRCRAFT HIJACKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I raise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a matter that is urgent and pressing. It concerns the problem of international hijacking and terrorism. In view of the fact that several countries in the world continue to provide hospitality and landing facilities to hijackers and terrorists, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That Canada deny all landing rights at Canadian airports to aircraft of any country which provides aid, hospitality or landing facilities to aircraft hijackers and use its influence at the United Nations and in the world to encourage all other countries in the world to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON GARRISON DIVERSION PENDING REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government operations committee of the United States House of Representatives has released a report which has sharply criticized the planning and construction of the Garrison irrigation project in North Dakota because of the environmental damage that could be caused to Manitoba rivers and in light of the fact that the International Joint Commission is still studying the Garrison project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

● (1110)

That this House instruct the government of Canada to call for an immediate moratorium on the Garrison project until the International Joint Committee presents a report on the Garrison project.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF TRANSPORT DISAVOW AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS AND MAKE PUBLIC APOLOGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Given the situation resulting from the government's surrender to CALPA and CATCA regarding bilingual communications over the Quebec territory; considering that the decision of the Minister of Transport is at best an alarming commitment which contradicts the very principles of the bilingualism act, besides further breaking the ties between Quebec and the rest of Canada; and considering that this protocol insults all members of parliament and particularly upsets French-speaking representatives, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That the House instruct the Minister of Transport to disavow the agreement he has signed and to apologize publicly for the offensive action he has taken.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

MINISTER'S INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO STATEMENT ON DAIRY POLICY

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I will ask the question of the Acting Prime Minister, who probably knows less, if that is possible, about dairy policy than the Minister of Agriculture.

On Wednesday, June 30, the Minister of Agriculture in answer to questions regarding dairy policy—and Lord knows we need a new dairy policy—indicated that if he is going to make an announcement, it would be made next week some time. Remembering that last year the Minister of Agriculture made an announcement during the Easter recess when we could not rebut it and then six months later changed it, can the Acting Prime Minister tell me if the minister intends to make some statement on dairy policy today, or will there not be the required change in the dairy policy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not in a position to make a statement on dairy policy as yet.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Sharp: Because consideration of the matter has not been concluded in cabinet.

Mr. Ellis: I wonder, then, if I might ask a general question of the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the policy of this government to have confrontations with the people of Canada? There have been confrontations with air traffic controllers, with labour, and recently in the matter of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would he ask it.

Mr. Ellis: If we are not going to have confrontation, will the Acting Prime Minister please ask the Minister of Agriculture to come up with a policy some time between now and next Wednesday which will satisfy the dairy farmers in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: I think we have probably had the most successful agricultural policy this country has seen because we have the present Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Moreover, as I look around the world, I see no other country which has had an agricultural policy which has been more satisfactory to producers and consumers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

DAIRY POLICY—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. The simple statement that we have a good agricultural and dairy policy indicates that the Acting Prime Minister obviously has not been talking to farmers lately.

In view of the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in this House on June 30, as reported at page 14976 of Hansard, in which he stated, and I quote: "Before we make any change we have to notify and discuss this with every province concerned with the dairy issue," I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether this consultation with all provinces has taken place, has the Minister of Agriculture received agreement from all provinces and has he conveyed that agreement, or lack of it, to cabinet?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that consultation is now proceeding.

DAIRY POLICY—FINANCIAL LOSSES OF PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, again to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture at a public meeting that Canadian industrial milk producers are the highest paid milk producers in the world, and in view of the fact that a number of milk producers have had part or complete cheques held back by the Canadian Dairy Commission, was the Minister of Agriculture expressing government policy that these producers, having been encouraged to produce by the Canadian Dairy Commission, will have nothing to worry about and the financial losses they are now facing are of no consequence?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very argumentative question.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

SUGGESTION PROGRAM END IN VIEW OF LOW CANADIAN UNIT LABOUR COST INCREASES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. At the outset of the government's so-called anti-inflation program the New Democratic Party pointed out that factual support for it simply did not exist. Once again, in figures provided this time by the United States Bureau of Labour and published in today's press, it is documented that Canadian unit labour cost increases during the past eight years have been the lowest among the top eight industrial nations. Given the fact that the unit labour costs have not been pricing us out of our competitive markets and the fact that prices are continuing to rise, will the minister finally come to his senses about this program and bring it to an end?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman many times in the past and I am glad to repeat it, that we are not blaming labour for the inflation that we encountered nationally and internationally in 1973-74. What we are saying is that if the settlements being claimed for the year 1975 were carried forward into 1976, that is 20 per cent or 30 per cent increases in our unit labour cost, we would, over time, prejudice our economic position. That is the position we have taken in the past and I shall be glad to repeat the answer, again and again, I am sure, to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to outline the facts for the minister. In 1975, in the figures that were published today, and contrary to what the minister has just asserted, Canada had the lowest increases amongst the same eight countries in 1975 in its unit labour costs. So the minister is wrong in precisely the year he says was used to justify the program brought in last fall. Will the minister now concede that he was wrong and concede that the program has no intellectual justification and is morally offensive to working Canadians?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. gentleman to read my answer. As in previous ones I pointed out it was the anticipation of increased settlements of 20 per cent to 30 per cent which would have had this impact on Canadian business. We were not looking back over our shoulder and pointing a finger at what Canadian business and labour had done in the past; we were looking ahead and saying if they get this kind of settlement in the future then we will not be in a position to compete. It was for that reason we made efforts to restrain the increase, among other things, of wage rates in 1975. The fact that we were able to restrain them is some credit to the program.

REQUEST FOR FIRST QUARTER FIGURES SHOWING WAGE INCREASES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, what the minister has said is just rubbish. He knows very well the government had no program in operation until the end of 1975. He shifted from 1975 in his argument which was of his first answer, to "anticipated" increases in 1976. I should like to ask the minister if he could provide us with first quarter figures comparing wages and salary increases in Canada with other countries to document in some way support for the argument he has just recently provided in that answer?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman said I shifted. I would repeat for the third time: we were talking about anticipated labour costs. The hon. member has talked about things being morally offensive. I find it morally offensive when I have said one thing and the hon. member keeps pretending I have said another.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTED REDRESS OF INSULT TO FRANCOPHONES AS RESULT OF AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry to repeat it, Mr. Speaker, but there is interference in the unilingual communications.

In view of the many protests provoked by the action taken by the Minister of Transport in the conflict opposing him to CALPA and CATCA, and as even the right hon. Prime Minister seems to have recognized the gross error the infamous protocol of agreement constitutes by accepting the resignation of the Minister of the Environment, can the minister tell the House what steps he intends to take to make up for the affront he made to all French-Canadians generally and Quebecers in particular?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since it has been asked in those completely inappropriate terms it would be impossible to grapple with the question.

[Translation]

PROTESTS AGAINST AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is entirely mistaken when he answers this way, since the words I have just spoken are far from being of the same sort as those he used in his agreement.

In any case, I should like to ask him whether he is aware of all the protests and if he received some, particularly from Quebec. Would he then be prepared to tell the House what he intends to do in the light of these events?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course I am conscious of the concern expressed, particularly in Quebec, following the memorandum of understanding with CATCA and CALPA. It was obvious to me that a good deal of the concern was based on a fundamental misunderstanding of that memorandum and I have been endeavouring in every way I know to reassure the people in Quebec by restating that there is no move by this government in any way away from our fundamental commitment to the official languages policy and bilingualism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Indeed, the whole purpose of our efforts with the simulation study and the commission of inquiry is to implement safe procedures for air traffic services bilingually throughout the province of Quebec. That is the whole purpose of what we are doing, what we intend to accomplish and what I am still confident we shall accomplish.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS CONCERNING ADMISSION OF TAIWAN

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, may I direct my question to the government House leader in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister? Because of the preponderant views of most Canadians, that is most Canadians outside the cabinet and the Department of External Affairs, that the Olympic Games should proceed on schedule no matter what any international group may want to call itself, I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister would condescend to let the House and public know the result of the latest negotiations and consultations which are proceeding between the government and the International Olympic Committee?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, discussions have been going on at various levels between the International Olympic Committee and representatives of the government in an endeavour to reach a settlement or compromise on the question of the participation of athletes from Taiwan. These discussions are not completed and I would urge on all in the House the desirability of not creating unnecessary difficulties by anything which may be said in the House today.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, that was hardly a breathtaking answer. I was asking the Acting Prime Minister to tell us what stage the negotiations have reached. Has the government made a proposal to the IOC and has the IOC made a compromise proposal to the government? Surely, the Acting Prime Minister can tell us what is going on and who is taking the initiative.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know about taking the initiative: we took the initiative one year ago with the IOC, when we asked them to consider the implications of this situation; then, when nothing happened, we had to call in the representatives to clarify the Canadian position which we had indicated a year before and on which they had taken no action. We are having the discussions today. There are proposals being made from both sides. We are all hoping that within the next short time a settlement will be reached.

[Mr. Lang.]

POSSIBILITY OF DECLARING SITE OF GAMES INTERNATIONAL TERRITORY TO FACILITATE PARTICIPATION OF TAIWANESE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. When Queen Juliana was in Canada and her second child was being born, in order to ensure that she would have Dutch ancestry, a section of Canada was declared as being Dutch territory. This facilitated the establishment of the required nationality of the child born to Queen Juliana. Will the Acting Prime Minister give consideration to declaring the Montreal olympic site as being international territory belonging to the IOC in order to get around what obviously is a problem that cannot be resolved by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I strongly advise the hon. member not to make that a plank in his election platform.

MULTICULTURALISM

PROPOSED TEACHING OF LANGUAGES OTHER THAN ENGLISH AND FRENCH IN SCHOOLS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—POSSIBLE FEDERAL SUPPORT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for multiculturalism, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the report of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism recommends that federal funds be made available for the teaching of languages other than English and French, and in view of the fact that the recent non-official languages study indicated support for the teaching of such languages in the public schools, has the federal government undertaken any discussion with the provinces on this matter in order to encourage the setting up of such a program and to discuss in what form federal support can be provided?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows education is in the hands of the provinces. Representations of that kind ought to be made more directly to the provinces concerned. As far as the federal government is concerned, it may be a useful way of maintaining the cultures of the various groups that make up the Canadian population to give support to the teaching of those languages within or without the educational system. As far as the federal government is concerned, we are giving some consideration to the matter.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

USE TO BE MADE OF EAST BLOCK FOLLOWING RENOVATIONS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO EXTERIOR CHANGES WILL BE MADE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the quiescent Minister of Public Works. I understand that the East Block is now included within the buildings of parliament and that extensive renovations are being carried out. Can the minister advise this House or this member what is contemplated with regard to the use of the East Block now that the extensive political machine, the PMO, is being removed? Who will move in? All Canadians would like to know what is being done and what the cost will be in this period of restraint.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as yet no definitive decision has been taken in relation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: Ask a stupid question. A committee has been appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Abbott to define the needs of the parliamentary precinct. In anticipation of that report, we are not taking decisions as to the ultimate disposition of various elements of the parliamentary precinct.

Mr. Nowlan: I prefaced my question by directing it "to the quiescent Minister of Public Works". The fact that no definitive decision has been taken illustrates my preface. My supplementary question relates to history. I know the minister, in another capacity, was on Parliament Hill at the time of the last change in government. It was only the change in government that saved the West Block from the intentions of the cabinet under Mr. St. Laurent. Will the minister assure the House that as far as the exterior of the East Block is concerned nothing definitive, like demolition, will take place?

● (1130)

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nowlan: You may laugh, but that was what Mr. St. Laurent was going to do with the West Block. Can the minister assure us that when definite plans are made any work to be done will be done to the interior and that the exterior will remain as it is?

Mr. Drury: I think I can reassure the hon. gentleman that there will be no demolition carried out by this government. I wish I could feel as confident with regard to the alternative government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We shall soon have a chance to say no.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO PROVINCE WILL RECEIVE LESS UNDER NEW PROPOSAL

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Two days ago, referring to the new equalization formula presently being negotiated, the hon. gentleman gave an assurance that overall equalization payments would not be less than the present figure of $2.2 billion. Since each of the options presented by the federal government involves less than that amount, and since the minister has stated that these proposals were for demonstration purposes only, could he say what increase he is prepared to consider in total equalization payments so that no province would be worse off under any new scheme than it is at present?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I have indicated both to the conference and in responses in the House, the overall impact of equalization would not, in general, be less. The impact varies, of course, from province to province and I am not sure I can give the guarantee the hon. lady is seeking. Very often, particularly if there is a shift in provincial earnings, there would be a change. However, the overall impact would be the same. I suppose the best example of what I mean would be Saskatchewan. That province might well, through economic progress, move into the category of being a "have" rather than a "have not" province. If that were to happen it would, of course, be receiving no equalization payments at all.

Miss MacDonald: I realize the minister may not be prepared to give a dollar figure in relation to his commitment, but since his objection in April to the present rate of growth of equalization payments was that it was outstripping such indicators as the growth in federal revenue and the growth of the gross national product, would he be prepared, for instance, to consider a growth rate in equalization payments at least in line with one of those two indicators?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In general terms, we set out the view that these transfer payments should grow at a rate not greater than the growth in the gross national product. That would be the trend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION BY UNITED STATES ANTI-TRUST AUTHORITIES OF CANADIAN URANIUM PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Some hon. Members: And others.

Mr. Gray: —I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Canadian production, sale and export of uranium are under federal jurisdiction and regulation and that two of the Canadian producers are federal Crown corporations, what is the government doing to prevent possible extra-territorial application of United States law within Canada arising out of the current investigation by U.S. anti-trust authorities into the affairs of uranium producers both inside and outside the United States? In addition, could he or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell us whether the government was formally notified by U.S. authorities in advance of their investigation as is provided for in several agreements between the United States and Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I can reply on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would simply confirm his viewpoint and mine, as expressed by the hon. gentleman, that the United States anti-trust administration should in no sense seek to export its anti-trust law into Canada and that an attempt to do so will be an unacceptable course of action. In this context, the government of Canada recently had an opportunity to make its views known in Washington, and I would be glad to confirm with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he has been in communication with Washington as well in relation to uranium.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED DENIAL OF LANDING RIGHTS TO AIRCRAFT OF COUNTRIES HARBOURING AIRCRAFT HIJACKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the recent hijacking incident in Uganda. Can he advise us whether the government is now giving consideration to imposing sanctions against Uganda or, for that matter, against any other country which shelters and assists hijackers? I am particularly interested in ascertaining whether this country is considering the cancellation of landing rights to governments such as Uganda so that the Canadian people can do something more than express pious statements at the United Nations on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman will recall that Canada took the lead in the international civil aviation organisation and at the United Nations in trying to get a universal rule which meant there would be no harbouring of aircraft hijackers. Unfortunately, the rest of the world did not agree with our position. We have not, however, felt it desirable to apply the kind of sanction the hon. member has mentioned. I would remind him that far more than Uganda is involved; a great many countries in the world are involved. It is our view, however, that as a result of the tragic events which took place in Uganda there will be some change in world opinion in favour of our approach.

Mr. Leggatt: I thank the hon. gentleman for another pious statement on the subject. I would draw attention to the importance of providing leadership rather than waiting for the rest of the world. There are two other countries closely concerned: Libya continues to violate world opinion in this area and so does Algeria. I am asking the minister whether consideration is being given to acting alone so that Canada can show some leadership instead of waiting for some international agreement, which at present seems far from likely, or at least acting in concert with other like-minded nations.

Mr. Sharp: We did explore the possibility of acting in concert with other like-minded countries and we did not receive support.

[Mr. Gray.]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED PROPOSAL FOR DECENTRALIZATION—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Can he confirm reports appearing in the press today that in a fortnight the President of the Treasury Board will be presenting to cabinet a longer list with a projection in stages of how a thorough-going decentralization of the Public Service by department and agency will be carried out, the purpose being to decentralize the larger agencies in Ottawa? Can the minister confirm that report and give us some details as to the phasing of such a program?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I neither confirm nor deny reports about what is going on in cabinet.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the event that at some time the minister and his colleagues are presented with a report recommending decentralization under a program which is really, as outlined by the President of the Treasury Board, intended basically for the purpose of job creation—something which is, in principle, not an unlaudable motive—will the hon. gentleman assure the House that when considering such a report it would be in the mind of the government that it ought not in all cases to be creating yet another level of bureaucracy through which action would need to be taken by the public and that if this is basically a regional employment scheme special attention should be paid to the problems of those public servants who are employed in agencies in the National Capital and elsewhere which are to be transferred and who are remaining here? There is a great deal of concern in the public service not only with respect to the move but with respect to what will happen to those who choose not to move.

Mr. Sharp: The government is motivated in its decentralization program not only by considerations of employment but by the principle that it is desirable to have federal representation throughout the country as distributed as extensively as possible. That is one of the main reasons for considering, as we have, the question of decentralization and taking some steps in that direction. I can assure the hon. member that when it does consider these moves the government is very conscious of problems which may be created here in Ottawa.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—INCLUSION OF FLOOD CONTROL ON SOURIS RIVER IN INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION STUDY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of the Environment but in his absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary would answer. In view of the continuing controversy over the Garrison diversion project, would the hon. gentleman give an up to date report of the IJC study on the matter, particularly as to whether flood control on the Souris River was now included in the terms of reference?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the hon. gentleman that the report is due on October 25, and I think the important thing to remember is that the report can recommend the abandonment of any portion of this project if it adversely affects Canada. As far as flood control measures are concerned, I can report to the hon. gentleman that we are in the process of negotiating three agreements with the province of Manitoba, one being a flood damage reduction agreement, the second a supplementary flood mapping agreement, and the third a study agreement. These agreements should be signed within 30 days.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The parliamentary secretary missed my essential point, the IJC consideration of this important boundary water matter. In view of the extensive flood damage this spring amounting to millions of dollars and the support of the government of the state of North Dakota for having the IJC investigate this matter, is Canada also pressing this viewpoint?

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Yes, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the representation made by the hon. gentleman about a month ago, I was personally in touch with our two representatives on the IJC and the board was considering that very point.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON PURCHASE OF LOCKHEED ORION—POSSIBILITY CANADA WILL PURCHASE REFITTED UNITED STATES NAVY AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister bring us up to date on whether Canada will be purchasing the 18 Lockheed Orions, and would he inform the House whether there is a plan under which the United States navy will buy the Orions now in their reduced form as Lockheed P-3's, and a year from now Lockheed will take them back, fit them out as Orions, sell them to Canada and make new P-3's for the U.S. navy?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, the Lockheed proposal is before cabinet, as the hon. member knows. With regard to the second question, I have heard nothing about an arrangement of that kind.

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT FROM COMPANIES OTHER THAN LOCKHEED

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would point out to the minister that there have been newscasts today on the subject to which I referred. The minister said he is concerned that a number of other aircraft firms have just submitted bids two days before he was going to make a final decision. Will this make any difference to the plans for purchases, will there be further delays, or has the minister any idea from whom he will consider purchasing the aircraft?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there have been no other bids or firm bids. There have been some very vague proposals but we do not have any other firm bids before us at the present time.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER—ALLEGED ESCAPE PLAN FOR HUTCHISON AND AMBROSE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Further to the questions which I put to the Solicitor General on July 6 at which time I inquired whether he would report to the House of Commons details of an escape plan for Hutchison and Ambrose and the existence of a cache of arms in Dorchester penitentiary—I understand now that the dynamite information was incorrect—is the minister now in a position to report the details to the House, or will he table the report which was sent to the commissioner of penitentiaries, particularly in relation to the comments of Mr. Ambrose when at approximately 2.20 p.m. on June 22, following the bulletin concerning Bill C-84 passing second reading, he said: "Now, we can get all the pigs we want"?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): When I replied to the hon. member on the last occasion I said that I could not recall all the details of the incident, but I have the report now for the question period.

On April 27, several rounds of ammunition were found at Dorchester as well as a homemade gun and some homemade knives. These weapons were found in the kitchen area and there was no evidence that they were related in any way to the two inmates referred to by hon. member, Hutchison and Ambrose. On June 11, another gun and some more ammunition was found in another cell block, but again no evidence was found to relate that to Hutchison and Ambrose. In both cases, the penitentiary service was able to stop whatever was being planned.

Mr. Dick: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister confirm or otherwise that in fact, as a result of a tip to the officials, a softball which was thrown over the wall with an inscription on it of the escape plan for Hutchison and Ambrose was picked up, that extra duty guards had been put on, and that a 32 revolver along with 15 rounds of ammunition had been found subsequent to the softball being thrown over the wall from the farm annex side of the prison?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have no information with regard to the softball, but it is correct that a gun and 15 rounds of ammunition were found near the entrance to cell block seven. I might say that Ambrose and Hutchison are being kept in a special wing of the penitentiary apart from all other inmates.

Oral Questions

DORCHESTER—ALLEGATION SPECIAL GUARDS FOR AMBROSE AND HUTCHISON BEING PAID BY PROVINCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Solicitor General confirm that there are seven guards who have been taken off their regular duties to secure the area Ambrose and Hutchison are in, that these are being paid by the province under a special arrangement, but that since they have been taken from the regular contingent, the regular contingent is now light these seven guards; and that as of July 1 two posts were cut by the penitentiary service and there are seven posts short this weekend, a crucial weekend?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not have those details. However, I am told that everything is under control at Dorchester penitentiary. The hon. member is quite correct in stating that Ambrose and Hutchison were being guarded by provincial employees. Under ordinary circumstances inmates on death row are in provincial prisons. Because of the special security problems in New Brunswick, and the fact that they had no institution which they felt was suitable for these inmates, they made a special arrangement with us to keep these two fellows at Dorchester pending the outcome of their appeals.

INDUSTRY

BELLEDUNE FERTILIZER CORPORATION—THREATENED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of plans by the Noranda group to close its subsidiary company, Belledune Fertilizer Corporation, shortly, I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would take up the matter with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as well as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arrange discussions to see whether some solution might be found to this problem to avoid laying off some 200 people in that area already bothered by high unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am prepared to do so, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. The chairman of the Economic Council of Canada was quoted recently as saying that he supports the Canadian Labour Congress in the belief that, and I quote, "a system of national, social and economic planning is indispensable" for Canada. Does the Acting Prime Minister agree with Dr. Raynauld and, if so, can we soon expect position papers by the government on this part of the government's policy when the present ill-conceived controls are lifted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has been giving urgent consideration to the policies that would be appropriate following the end of the anti-inflation program. It has been having some discussions with various parties, including the leading representatives of the trade union movement, with the Economic Council and with a number of other agencies. However, the problem is of such complexity that I would not think it would be possible to put these plans before the House before it adjourns for the summer break. It would be our hope, however, that in the new speech from the Throne some indication could be given of the government's approach.

● (1150)

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I should like a confirmation from the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very high unemployment in Canada, the second highest in the western world outside the United States, with the lowest per capita growth rate of any western country, will the minister confirm that this planning mechanism that Dr. Raynauld advocates will be in the speech from the throne?

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF RIVER GUARDIANS TO PROTECT SALMON RIVERS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries, I would direct my question to the parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that river guardians patrolling our salmon rivers are getting lay-off notices this month and the salmon season does not close until September 15, has the minister been made aware of the existing emergency? What action is being taken by the Department of Fisheries with regard to extending the time of the river guardians so our salmon rivers will not face the danger of depletion of salmon stocks, providing poachers with a paradise?

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that we have received several representations on this matter, and also confirm that notices were sent out for terminations I believe for the 24th of this month and the 15th of next month. I can also assure the hon. gentleman that the matter is presently being re-examined.

REQUEST FOR IMPROVED WEATHER FORECASTING SYSTEM FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, turning to another dangerous situation having to do with weather forecasting, which is causing a danger situation for fishermen and the loss of gear, specifically with reference to the timing between the weather forecasting and the time the fishermen get the information. Does the parliamentary secretary have any information in respect of improving the weather forecasting system and an expansion of the program? What action is being taken to overcome this situation.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have received representations from two provinces on this matter. We are attacking the problem from two fronts: Number one, a continuation and possible expanding of the special in-shore ice and storm reporting that was begun this spring and, secondly, a re-examination with the hope of increasing the number of spot coastal stations reporting to weather offices. I can also tell the hon. gentleman that we are opening a new weather office, the first one in Prince Edward Island, next month, and one is scheduled to go into the hon. gentleman's riding in western Newfoundland next spring.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

URBAN AFFAIRS

TRILEVEL CONFERENCE ON MUNICIPAL FINANCING—POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs. Will he indicate the present status of the proposed Montebello trilevel conference to discuss municipal financing? Is it going ahead and has the Minister of Finance given the minister any assurance that he may offer additional financing at the federal level to municipalities at the conference?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no pre-commitments. The meeting is to discuss the first and, presumably, the only report of the trilevel task force on public financing. This will be the first time that others, other than the three chairmen, have met to discuss this matter, to develop a common data base and to exchange our views in relation to it. There are no commitments anticipated as a result of these discussions. The meetings are intended to clarify some of the concerns that each level has with reference to the report itself.

FINANCE

ALLEGED REJECTION BY MINISTER OF FEDERAL FINANCIAL AID TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that federal revenues continue to soar, will the minister confirm or otherwise his reported statement at the finance minister's conference this week that the Urban Affairs Minister may go ahead with his Montebello meeting, but the Minister of Finance hoped it was understood that there would be no federal assistance offered directly or indirectly to the municipalities, which could mean that the conference might well be pointless?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement at the finance ministers' meeting. I did canvass the provincial finance ministers as to whether they proposed to attend, and whether they would like the federal finance minister to attend. The unanimous feeling was that the finance ministers should not attend the meeting.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

EFFECT ON QUADRA MANUFACTURING OF TRAIL OF ACTION BY HELLER INC.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who I am delighted to see back in the House after some absence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to familiarize himself with the conduct and ruthless business practices of the United States firm called Heller Inc., particularly in view of the fact that a DREE established industry, Quadra Manufacturing of Trail, has been driven to its knees and shut down, with a resultant 50 unemployed, by Heller Inc. of Toronto holding back nearly 50 per cent of the cash flow of this company?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am always absent from the House of Commons on July 1.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: And on December 25. I think, if possible, this question would be better directed to the Minister of Finance. If the hon. gentleman is really concerned about the problem I should think he would have sent the documentation to my department instead of waiting and trying to make capital out of it, perhaps to the detriment of the firm affected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, it would appear that the minister is trying to make capital of the fact that he has been absent from the House for some time. My appeal was genuine and had the minister been here I would have sent him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID BRITISH COLUMBIA PRODUCERS MARKET CATTLE QUARANTINED FOR BLUE TONGUE

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious situation in which some ranchers in central British Columbia find themselves due to the quarantine in that area by the federal Department of Agriculture because of blue tongue, has the minister any plan or is he taking any steps to help them market the 15,000-odd head of cattle which they usually market in the fall?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not intimating that the total cattle population in that area is infected with blue tongue, because we are quite certain it is not. We want to make sure that the rest of the cattle population in Canada is protected. We have a full-time, top CDA veterinarian stationed in that area. We intend to be as fair as possible in co-operation with these people, and they are co-operating with us 100 per cent at the present time in testing the cattle, rounding them up, and so on. We are sure that with the full co-operation of everyone, including the hon. member, we can have this settled in a harmonious fashion, and that everybody will be treated fairly and squarely.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is well recognized that there are many ramifications of a quarantine of this nature. I would specifically ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is ready to move, and move quickly, this fall if there are no buyers for these cattle, especially if the buyers that do come attempt to take advantage of the ranchers because of the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the large hypothetical element in that question I would hesitate to allow it.

HEALTH

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING ON MERCURY POISONING—REASON FOR EXCLUSION OF NATIVE REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare why it was that at this morning's meeting between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the ministers of the provincial governments regarding mercury poisoning the native Indians of the area were not included in the decision-making portion?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it there was a meeting this morning with the very Indians about which the hon. member expresses concern. I have no report on the actual way the meeting took place this morning. Perhaps after the meeting has concluded, which should be in the next half hour or so, the minister might be available to answer that question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would direct this supplementary question to the Government House Leader. Could he indicate what was so sensitive about this morning's meeting that card-carrying press people were barred from the hallways of the Confederation Building where the meeting was taking place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to answer the question because I was unaware of the event.

REASON DEPARTMENT REFUSED TO PROVIDE INFORMATION ON THE CONTENTS OF PILLS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I understand that in the minister's absence he is prepared to answer a question I asked the minister on June 28 as to the reason the department refused to provide to members of the general public information as to the content of drugs, including in this instance the birth control pill.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a report now from the department about that inquiry. What seems to have happened was that the inquiry was directed to the family planning branch which does not have scientists with the technical expertise to give information about the content of birth control pills. They give information about the pill in general but not about the content. The practice of that division is to refer technical inquiries of the sort to which the hon. member refers to the health protection branch where that information is available. In fact, the active ingredients of pills are a matter of public record published annually in the condominium—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You mean compendium.

Mr. Kaplan: The information is published in the pharmaceutical and specialties compendium. As I said, the practice of the branch is to refer such inquiries either to the health protection branch or to the physician who prescribed the pill in question. I cannot tell in this particular case whether the person who inquired was or was not referred, but that is the general practice of the branch. Apparently she telephoned again a few days later and she was referred to the health protection branch or to her physician for that information.

An hon. Member: I hope it was on time.

Mr. Baldwin: Following that penetrating answer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he could confirm that it is not the policy of the department to refuse information to members of the general public who inquire as to the contents of drugs.

Mr. Kaplan: That is correct. They are referred to the branches of the departments which have the information.

AIR TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO ENSURE PROCESSING OF PILOTS' LICENCE RENEWALS IN VIEW OF AIR INSPECTORS' STRIKE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it is supplementary to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Wellington. About two weeks or more ago a question was asked also by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex regarding the licensing of civil aviators. My question relates to the fact that when the minister replied to the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex he said the following, as recorded at page 14802 of Hansard:

Nevertheless, some steps are being taken to deal with the situation.

In view of the backlog of some thousands of applications, can the minister indicate specifically what steps have been taken and would he consider reinstituting the old mechanism which was simple and practical whereby licences could be granted by approved instructors?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, certain steps have been taken in the difficult situation of serious backlogs, including the additional extension of 30 days validity of licences pending receipt of a valid medical update. There are serious limitations, however, to any further steps which we can take because of the impact upon the whole air safety system. We are looking at one or two other items in the licensing system, but I can hold out no real promise for those affected by the current strike in the absence of a return to work.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I address a question to the Minister of National Defence. I asked him if there would be any new firm proposals and he said there had been none. I am in receipt of a telex that was sent by General Dextraze, chief of defence staff, to Mr. K. Patrick, president of Patrick Consultants Limited. The telex reads:

To confirm our conversation of yesterday, I would like you to present a new proposal for an Argus replacement next Thursday at National Defence headquarters. Your proposal should have the following features:

Then, General Dextraze goes on to list the features that Mr. Patrick is to present to him next Thursday. Is the minister aware of this or is this not a firm proposal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I do not question the right of the chair to deny me a supplementary question—that is not my point of order although it did follow upon a sequence of events on which my question was based—but I think that because a member remarks on the absence of a minister, which in this day and age is frequently necessary, and the minister then alludes to the fact that the particular member has not done his homework and has not provided the minister with prior notice, requires the answer that there is little point in providing the minister with prior notice when he is not in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty in which the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) found himself was that he was not asking a question but rather making a representation on behalf of an individual constituent. It is difficult to permit the question period to be used for that purpose, although this is done from time to time, and therefore the question was put on the record. The reason for cutting the hon. member short was that—and this happens often—he got into an argument and others were waiting to ask questions of a more general scope. The question was put on the record, and in the circumstances this was sufficient since it was a representation on behalf of a constituent.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I realize that the question period has ended, but in view of the question which was asked, I simply want to say that of course I was aware of the letter from General Dextraze but it does not alter in any way the answer I gave. We have not received a firm bid.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is with regard to the ruling that you made on the question I asked the Minister of Agriculture which you said was hypothetical. This is a matter of real concern and it is being discussed. The question which I asked was, whether or not, because of the quarantine in this area for blue tongue—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether or not the hon. member agrees, the question was whether the minister would be prepared to move quickly if one of two things happened. In its very terms and essence it is hypothetical, and I do not see how else the chair could have ruled. In any event the question period is terminated.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

TABLING OF ORDERS OF ADMINISTRATOR RESPECTING WENTWORTH COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION AND SUDBURY DISTRICT ROMAN CATHOLIC SEPARATE SCHOOL BOARD

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table copies, in both official languages, of two orders of the administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act. One is a disposition of the matter involving the Wentworth County Board of Education in Hamilton, Ontario, under the clerical and secretarial group, and the other concerns the Sudbury District Roman Catholic Separate School Board custodial and maintenance staff.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUMMER RECESS

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been quite extensive discussions among the House leaders and with various leading members in the debate on Bill C-84 as to the disposal of the remaining stages of this bill. From these discussions we have reached certain conclusions. The first is that because of the nature of the remaining motions at the report stage, the report stage could be finished today and we could then proceed to third reading this afternoon, if there was unanimous consent, or if there was not, at least on Monday. It has also been concluded from these discussions that there would be time to debate third reading of this bill before the end of Tuesday. In order to provide some additional time, if that is required, we also discussed the desirability of adding a couple of extra hours on Monday morning just as a precaution to help us to reach this goal, if it is attainable.

Taking all these facts, as we could ascertain them, into account the House leaders have encouraged me to seek unanimous consent today for a motion which would enable us to take a vote on third reading of Bill C-84 on Wednesday, after prayers, without any other routine proceedings, and to adjourn, subject to the usual provisions about recall for royal assent and for emergencies, until October 12.

I therefore seek unanimous consent to move the following motion:

That the House shall sit from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. on Monday, July 12, 1976 for the purpose of considering Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences;

That if the debate on all stages of Bill C-84 is concluded not later than Tuesday, July 13, any division or divisions required to dispose of the third reading and passage stage of the said bill shall be taken on Wednesday, July 14, 1976, immediately following proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 15(1);

That immediately following the disposal of the third reading and passage stage of the said bill, the House shall adjourn and shall stand adjourned until a time to be fixed by Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the government, when the House may meet for the purpose of dealing with any subsequent proceeding or the giving of royal assent to any bill or bills that have been passed by the House at the time of the said adjournment;

That, after the giving of royal assent to the said bill or bills or in the event the House does not meet for that purpose, the House shall be adjourned or stand adjourned, as the case may be until October 12, 1976, provided that at any time prior to that date if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time;

And that, in the event of Mr. Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for the purpose of reconvening the House.

That is the motion which I seek unanimous consent to introduce, and I believe it has the approval of the House leaders. However, as this is a matter which concerns more than just the House leaders, and since it concerns, mainly, a bill which is not a matter of confidence, I felt I should give the explanation of the background of this motion and the reason it is being moved at this time.

Apart from the special provisions dealing with sitting for a couple of extra hours on Monday and the taking of the vote on third reading of Bill C-84, the remaining adjournment motion follows the usual pattern.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as the government House leader has indicated, there is general agreement among House leaders, and I trust with other hon. members of the House, although in this situation they can, of course, speak if they have any questions about the matter. I have one question I would like to raise for the purposes of this discussion, and that is the question of what might happen today. As the government House leader knows, the debate ended last evening, to all intents and purposes, in terms of substantive amendments, and we met early this morning to set a time which is somewhat short.

I do not know whether all speakers on either side of the House will be here to carry on the report stage or third reading stage today. That is not to say that consent could not be given later to move into third reading stage, but there may be one or two speakers who might not be here. Is there an understanding amongst all of us that, in the event we have moved into third reading or are still at report stage and run out of speakers, in terms of the business then before the House, the House would adjourn today at that time and the debate would commence again on Monday at eleven o'clock in the morning? It is really a question, but not a question with regard to the terms of the motion. I would just like some clarification.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when this motion was being discussed amongst the House leaders this morning, our view at that time was that apart from getting unanimous consent to deal with this motion today we would be able to deal with the remaining stages without varying the orders and rules of the House. The only complication I see is the possibility that if we do not conclude the report stage today, could we then carry out this program? It had been premised on what we thought was a fact, namely, that the remaining debate at report stage would be concluded today so that we would have the ordinary notice to proceed to third reading on Monday. So it would require, perhaps, some amendment to the House order if we do intend to move toward the target of Wednesday because there might not be sufficient time, if we were at the report stage on Monday, to finish third reading stage on Tuesday and conclude debate on the bill. I hoped there would be agreement on this order—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is agreement.

Mr. Sharp: —and that if the hon. gentleman feels there may be some speakers at the report stage who want to be heard before we move to third reading, there would also be unanimous consent now to move to third reading as soon as the report stage is concluded.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think we understand that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I indicate quite clearly that so far as my colleagues and I are concerned, we are happy to support the motion which has been presented by the government House leader after consultation with all the House leaders.

If I may address myself to the point which has just been discussed between the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and the President of the Privy Council, it seems to me that we do not need to write anything more into the order. As I understand it, if the report stage concludes some time today, then it is a question of whether there is unanimous consent to move into third reading. If there is not, then we just adjourn.

If there is unanimous consent to move into third reading, then I think it would be reasonable, if some time later this afternoon the House decides to adjourn, to take the rest of the debate on Monday and Tuesday. As I say, I think there is enough understanding among us that we do not need to amend the order with respect to this phase of the matter. In fact, I point out that although the proposed motion is a lengthy one, it really does only two things in so far as the present debate is concerned. It provides for two extra hours on Monday morning and then it provides—in other words, there is no closure on this motion—that if the debate is ended by some time Tuesday night, the time for the vote on third reading will be just after prayers on Wednesday next. It seems to me this is a sensible proposal that has been worked out by consultation, and we are happy to support it.

● (1220)

Although I said that all the motion does with regard to the present debate is the two things I have indicated, it does, of course, do other things that are quite usual at this point in a session. It provides for a few days off for the other place to consider Bill C-84 before we meet for royal assent and then adjournment of the session until October 12. I note, in that connection, that the government House leader has not indicated when a new session will start, whether on October 13 or later. I suppose the government wants to keep its options open on that point. By that time, however, this first session of the thirtieth parliament will have lasted for two years and 13 days so I would hope that a second session would start fairly soon.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, and while we are discussing matters of the remaining day or two, may I raise one other point. Many references have been made in recent weeks to Bill C-242, a bill having to do with prohibiting smoking in—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. President of the Privy Council has sought unanimous consent to put a motion at this time. Other points of order can certainly be raised, but I am anxious to get some sort of comment on this matter and I should like to keep discussion confined to this area. I do not want to get into debate on the motion itself, which can be debated later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Your Honour, I do not think I was as far afield as you might have imagined as, after all, you could not be at our House leaders' meeting. One of the points we agreed upon this morning was that no other business would be brought forward, but there was discussion about Bill C-242 and whether it could be dealt with unanimously and without debate. It seems to me the government has some justification for not wanting to bring in its own bill, but I hope that the option might be kept open for a few moments, by unanimous consent, between now and Tuesday night just to conclude third reading of Bill C-242 as it stands. As I say, this was part of the discussion this morning. It was agreed by the government House leader that no other business would be attempted between now and next Wednesday, but there was this discussion about Bill C-242.

As far as the motion itself is concerned, my colleagues and I join in giving unanimous consent for putting the motion, and we are prepared to vote for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order raised by the House leader, I would like to point out that we took part in the discussions with the leaders of the other parties and we want to confirm that we agree on the motion moved by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). Since the votes taken last night, everyone realizes that we cannot amend Bill C-84 at this stage, and it has become an established fact. Therefore the most important stage becomes third reading. As far as we are concerned, it would desirable that the debate on third reading begin as soon as possible to save the time of the House and allow the greatest number of members who want to take part in this debate to express their views on third reading.

Mr. Speaker, this could be done easily since I personally maintain the same position I took in the House last night concerning motions considered at the report stage, that is motions Nos. 24, 26, 27, 30, 31, 33, 37 and 43. Therefore we could proceed very shortly with the third reading.

[English]

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, although I was in the building until midnight last night and have been here for some time today, it was not until the government House leader rose on his motion that I was aware of the plans he announced. I am not saying that critically, but merely to explain that I am not quite clear exactly what it is that is being proposed; but more so, I am not at all clear why it should be necessary to change what, over the years I have been here, I find to be adequate procedures for dealing with legislation in this House. It is only because of the government's headstrong attitude in wanting to rush this vote through that this proposal is being made, and any urgency that exists to get this vote passed soon escapes me. I cannot understand why the government House leader wishes to get this vote through so early.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, the hon. member is entering upon debate. I may say it is very clear and I think it should be understood that it is not a provision of the motion that in any event the vote will take place on Wednesday. The provision is that if the debate is concluded on Tuesday, the vote will take place on Wednesday afternoon. It does not say the vote will take place in any event and therefore terminate the debate. It is simply an arrangement for the convenience of members to know that if the vote is finalized on third reading by Tuesday evening, the vote will take place on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. Clarke: I am not certain about that, Mr. Speaker. I thought it might be appropriate to explain my thinking on this. I have no objection whatever to the government adjourning this House at whatever date it wishes, but it is not my intention to give unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: The unanimous consent that is sought is simply for the introduction of the motion. The motion itself is debatable, and in fact votable, and opposition can be registered in that way. The motion cannot be put at this time without unanimous consent. The President of the Privy Council has requested unanimous consent for putting forward this motion. Is there unanimous consent for putting this motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RECOVERY OF LOSSES FOR SMALL COMPANIES

Question No. 5,751—Mr. Herbert:

Is any consideration being given to providing financial compensation for those small companies who have lost considerable sums of money from the manufacture of large quantities of non resaleable material for Indian nuclear reactors?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes. Until very recently negotiations with the Government of India were continuing and there was a possibility that Canadian manufacturers might recover some of their losses through a resumption of deliveries. Following the May 18, 1976 decision to terminate nuclear cooperation with India, the government is giving active consideration to requests from industry for compensation to cover losses for undelivered equipment and materials. Export permits for these goods were suspended on May 22, 1974 following the explosion of a nuclear device by India.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed from Thursday, July 8, consideration of Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and motion No. 36 (Mr. Stevens) and motion No. 37 (Mr. Fortin).

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are now considering motions Nos. 36 and 37, but there are certain points of order on other motions, specifically those moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), that is motions Nos. 26, 27, 30, 31, 33, 41 and 43.

The hon. member for Lotbinière has indicated that he wishes to withdraw the motions.

The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the following procedure would be the easiest: instead of withdrawing the motions, since they are valid, they should be passed or defeated as a whole on division as they were last evening.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to indicate, in respect of the motions I have just enumerated, that the Chair would have the greatest difficulty in finding such motions procedurally acceptable at this time. The motions relate in some manner to the imposition of the death penalty which, as a result of the defeat of motions last night, no longer exists in the law.

● (1230)

The Chair would be prepared to entertain discussion at this time on why it should not rule the motions which I just enumerated, along with motions Nos. 40 and 41 which relate to commutation, as being procedurally out of order on the ground that since they are consequential upon the existence of the death penalty, the death penalty not being part of the bill they are completely irrelevant to the bill. Therefore, it would be my disposition, if there is no argument to the contrary, to rule them all out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Considering your explanations, Mr. Speaker, with them in mind, I agree.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the mover of a number of motions, I would agree that a number of them are strictly consequential. I do not care how we dispose of them, whether with the unanimous consent of the House they are withdrawn or whether you rule them out of order; it does not matter how it is done. I point out to the Chair that two motions are not consequential but are substantive and should be considered at the report stage.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Our review this morning would indicate that the two motions now before the House, Nos. 36 and 37, would remain for consideration. Motions Nos. 45 and 46 are not in any way related to the death penalty, and motion No. 42 relates to the transitional provisions. I could entertain discussion on whether it is related to the death penalty. It would appear from our review that motions Nos. 42, 45 and 46 remain to be discussed. Motions Nos. 36 and 37, now before the House, also remain to be discussed, and the remaining motions which have not been voted on up to this time would be ruled out of order by the Chair. I so order at the present time, because all such motions are consequential upon the existence in the Criminal Code, or this amended statute, of the death penalty and as a result of last night's vote that does not exist.

Therefore, there is no sense, procedurally, in accepting any such motions. The simplest course would be, rather than seeking consent to withdraw such motions, to put them to a quick vote. The Chair ought to take the decisive step; therefore, I order all such motions to be procedurally unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: This is not to indicate that motion No. 45, in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), is not without procedural difficulty. However, no argument has been made on the procedural regularity of that motion.

Motions Nos. 42, 45 and 46 have not been called. Their calling is without prejudice, in other words, to the right to raise any procedural argument which may be raised when such motions are called.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question about the deferred division on motion No. 38 in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). I do not raise the matter in any argumentative sense. I am concerned about the procedural difficulty in which we may find ourselves if there is still listed a deferred division on motion No. 38—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for bringing that to my attention. That motion is equally out of order, I would think, as a result of last evening's votes. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), the mover of the motion, is in the House; I see him assenting to that decision. I should have included motion No. 38 in that ruling along with the others because it is consequential upon the imposition of the death penalty under the statute, and that is no longer possible as a result of last night's votes. Although discussion was completed on that motion and there was an order that the vote be deferred, I now rule, unless there is objection or argument to the contrary, that that motion is also out of order and therefore the possibility of a future vote on it ought not to be considered.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid confusion on my side of the House, may I raise a question? I understand that the motions still left for debate are Nos. 36, 37, 42, 45 and 46.

Mr. Speaker: That is correct. The debate now is on motion No. 36.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of motion No. 36 moved by my colleague from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I shall try to keep my remarks brief. I think the House ought to give serious consideration to the worthwhile motion moved by my colleague. I think the amendment would, if passed, provide greater protection to the Canadian public and assure our people that the process whereby we grant absences with escort to those convicted of serious crimes will not be abused.

From my conversations with Canadians I have learned that many are concerned about abuses which occur with respect to absences, with or without escort, from prison. Sometimes prisoners who have been sentenced to long prison terms are allowed to be absent, with or without escort, and some of them have not returned and have violated the conditions under which they were allowed to be absent. The amendment which the hon. member has proposed would ensure that no absence with escort for humanitarian or rehabilitative purposes may be authorized under the Penitentiary Act without the approval of the National Parole Board.

At present it is possible for such leave to be granted by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries on the say-so of the director of the jail wherein the person is imprisoned, or in the case of a person who has been referred to a provincial mental hospital, on the say-so of the director of that provincial mental hospital. I feel that the present procedures to which I have referred are too loose, and suggest that the bill should be amended in this regard. Canadians are entitled to be reassured that the present procedures will be tightened.

Because the government has done little to reassure Canadians that it takes seriously the fight against violent crime, that it will take strong action to deal with it, and that it is prepared to reform the overly liberal provisions with regard to bail, parole and sentencing, Canadians are frightened. They have good cause to be frightened. They are looking for extreme remedies to solve a serious problem. I hope that the government will take its reponsibilities seriously and will reassure Canadians that their safety is of paramount concern. Therefore, I hope the government will look favourably on the motion my colleague has proposed.

Last evening, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), alluding to the proposal made by my colleague, suggested that if this motion were passed it might not be possible for a person who had, for example, suffered a heart attack, to obtain medical attention if it were made necessary for the Parole Board to approve absence with escort. As I understand it, the amendment would not affect the ability of the inmate to receive medical attention. It would affect only those prisoners who are released temporarily for humanitarian or rehabilitative purposes. It makes no mention of medical purposes. In my judgment, if a prisoner needed, on grounds of medical necessity, to go out of prison with escort, perhaps to go to hospital, that would be possible.

It cannot be stressed too often that Canadians are disturbed by the increase in violent crime. The increase in the last several years is demonstrable statistically and from one's reading of the newspapers. Clearly, violent crime is on the rise in Canada. Canadians are entitled to expect assurance that the government will do everything it can to put the security of the Canadian public before any other consideration.

Any measure which is reasonable, moral and just which can be taken to provide safety for the Canadian public should, in fact, be taken. The reason we are in this policital situation today, where there is a question about the legitimacy of the government putting forward the legislation now before the House, is the government's failure to come to grips with this issue. They have failed to prove to Canadians that they take seriously the issue of violent crime. The Canadian public do not feel that the government regards public safety as a concern.

As an illustration of the way the government has acted in this area which cannot help but lead to cynicism and doubt on the part of many Canadians, I refer hon. members to the exchange last fall when I pointed out the fact that one half of the people in Toronto charged with murder were out on bail at that time. This concerned me. I felt there was a positive incentive for a person with the prospect of being convicted to violate the terms of his bail. I placed a question on the order paper asking the Solicitor General what percentage of those persons charged with three very serious categories of crime, murder, arson and rape, and granted bail had violated the terms of their bail.

The federal government has the responsibility of passing legislation dealing with bail, parole, prison security, and so on. Obviously, the onus is on the federal government to monitor the effect of these laws, to keep up-to-date statistics about the way they work and to make amendments where it is proved those laws are not functioning properly. I was distressed with the answer I received from the Solicitor General, in which he indicated that the government had not bothered to keep statistics with regard to the percentage of persons violating the terms of their bail when they had been charged with serious crimes. The government's approach to this whole issue of violent crime is so lackadaisical that obviously Canadians cannot help being concerned about public security. They cannot help questioning the government's sincerity in dealing with this issue.

The motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), is a good motion. It would provide some assurance to the public about the importance this parliament attaches to their right to safety. It would do something to ensure that abuses that can take place under the present legislation will be corrected. It should commend itself to all members of this House.

I hope that when the Solicitor General has had an opportunity to consult the legal authorities in his department he will realize that this provision cannot do anything but good for the Canadian people and our prison system. I hope that all members will give consideration to the motion, will support it enthusiastically and insure that it will be incorporated in the new legislation.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am concerned about motions Nos. 36 and 37, particularly motion No. 37 on which I would like to say a few words. I share the concerns of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) that there are some aspects of Bill C-84 which suggest that not enough protection is provided for society against the serious crime of murder. There is not enough protection against those individuals who perpetrate serious types of crime, those individuals who are not capable of any resolution or correction, with our present knowledge of reform of prisoners.

There should be something in this bill to give assurance to the citizens of Canada that we intend to protect them against these heinous crimes—granted, by some other method than capital punishment, and with this I agree. I do not see anything in the bill which precludes, in practical terms, a person who has committed first-degree murder or treason being out on the street again in 25 years' time. This concerns me because some people occasionally commit more than one murder on different occasions. If a person has been given one chance to reform, and commits a second murder, he should not be permitted a third chance to do the same thing. I feel the same way about those who commit treason. An attempt should be made to get something into the bill, even as late as this, to protect society against this kind of offender.

In view of these remarks, and in view of the fact that many members of this House are concerned about providing better protection against that type of prisoner, I would like to propose a subamendment to motion No. 37. If it meets with Your Honour's approval, I will read it at this time. It is:

That motion No. 37 be amended by striking out paragraph (a) thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) Strike out lines 22 to 31 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"669. The sentence to be pronounced against a person who is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life shall be,

(a) in respect of a person who has been convicted of high treason or first degree murder, that he be sentenced to imprisonment for his natural life without eligibility for parole,

(a)(1) in respect of a person who has been convicted of second degree murder and who has been previously convicted of either first degree murder or second degree murder, that he be sentenced to imprisonment for his natural life without eligibility for parole,"

This subamendment is not unlike my amendment which was defeated in the House last night. However, it will be obvious to Your Honour and to hon. members that I have removed the offensive part which gives the prisoner the option of choosing life imprisonment for this natural life or death. I appreciate that many members find that offensive and I am quite prepared to accept that. By the same token, I believe there is no question in the minds of most people that we must protect Canadians against those who would commit murder on more than two occasions. That is the intent of the subamendment. I commend it to Your Honour and to all members of the House.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As I understand it, the hon. member cannot introduce his amendment at this time without the unanimous consent of all members in the House. Standing Order 75 refers to an amendment to any clause of a bill. I suggest that an amendment to an amendment to a clause of a bill is included in that Standing Order and cannot be introduced without 24 hours' notice.

● (1250)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would suggest to the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) that he put his amendment in writing. I understand it is in order to move amendments to motions, so I would request the amendment in writing.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Does he not need unanimous consent?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that unanimous consent is not needed because in the past amendments to motions have been allowed.

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order. We are dealing with clause 36, and I understand that the proposed amendment relates to clause 37. I have no objection if there is consent on the other side to debate all the remaining motions in one group in order to hasten our proceedings—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that motions 36 and 37 were to be grouped together for purposes of debate, but voted on separately.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say a word on the point of order, Mr. Speaker? I am satisfied that you ruled correctly on the point raised in the first instance by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). It is clear, under Standing Order 75(8), that a report stage motion can be amended. However, there are other rules relating to amendments, and it would seem to me that at this hour of the day, five minutes to one, that aspect might be looked at more closely. It appears to me that the amendment proposed introduces substance which is new to what is already there, and on that score there might be some question about it. Has the hon. member not gone a bit far afield from what was contained in the motion on the order paper?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall we call it one o'clock by unanimous consent, and take this matter under advisement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At one o'clock the House had under consideration motions Nos. 36 and 37. Moved by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) was an amendment which in effect would redefine imprisonment for life in order to introduce the concept of imprisonment for natural life, without eligibility for parole, in respect of a person convicted of treason or first-degree murder and in respect to a person convicted of second-degree murder who had previously been convicted of either first or second-degree murder. The Chair at that time reserved its decision on whether such a motion is procedurally acceptable.

The ground of concern regarding the acceptability of this motion procedurally, of course, is that the introduction of a new concept of this sort should be made upon proper notice, under the provisions of Standing Order 75. If there are any further arguments on the procedural acceptability of the motion—and I must say I have serious misgivings about it—I would be pleased to hear them now.

Mr. Halliday: I appreciate the fact, Mr. Speaker, that you feel there may be a problem with this new concept that I have added, namely, "for his natural life". If that is the case, I would be pleased to ask the House whether Your Honour would consider removing those three words, "his natural life", and replacing them with "fifty years".

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the offer of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), but it is not for the Chair to propose alterations at this stage. I have seen that attempted in the past and it always seemed to lead to problems. It is really better for the Chair to stick to making decisions as to the procedural acceptability of motions. If any changes or alterations are to be made, that privilege could rest with the hon. member who already has an amendment on the floor, and he may have the opportunity to get consent to move a different amendment. Alternatively, he might be able to persuade a colleague to move the amendment for him.

In any event, I should stress that the reason for my misgiving is that the provisions of Standing Order 75 require, for the introduction of report stage motions, first of all a 48-hour period between reception of the report by the House and the taking into consideration by the House of the report stage of a bill. The purpose of this is to enable all hon. members who seek to make substantial amendments to the bill to do so upon 24-hour notice, as required by the rule.

It is not, by any means, that the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Oxford offends the provisions regarding motions at the report stage: far from it. Had it been put forward as a motion under Standing Order 75, upon 24-hour notice, there is no doubt in the Chair's mind that it would have been extremely relevant and very much in order from the procedural point of view.

The only question that concerns the Chair at this time is this. If hon. members are required to give 24 hours' notice of an amendment which introduces a substantial change to a bill, how would it be possible or fair to allow other members to move subsequent amendments to one of the motions which is not in any way to be construed as a simple explanation or alteration of the language or a change in some of its terms, but must be taken to introduce an important new concept?

I am sure that the hon. member for Oxford agrees that this amendment introduces an important new concept, otherwise he would not have bothered to move it. It is a very important concept, one that would have been a worthy subject for consideration. However, in fairness, if there is to be justice and equality under Standing Order 75 which provides that 24-hour notice must be given by members who seek to make this kind of change in a bill, surely it would be improper to allow, by way of what is, in effect, a subamendment, the introduction of a rather important new concept into the whole debate and to ask hon. members to vote in that regard without having had the benefit of study and examination of the question that is provided by the 24 hours' notice rule.

In respect of paragraph (a.1) of the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Oxford, I would rule it out of order now on a different ground. The passage last night of motion No. 12 in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) in effect redefined the definition of first-degree murder so that a second offender does, if I understand the amendment correctly, become liable to prosecution for first-degree murder.

That being the case, paragraph (a.1) of the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Oxford would seem to be covered as it is in respect of a second offender and a more severe penalty being imposed. To a certain extent, therefore, it is redundant to the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. However, it is only redundant to a point, because it does not accomplish the full change envisaged by the hon. member for Oxford, and that is "life imprisonment" meaning imprisonment for one's natural life, without eligibility for parole.

Therefore, I would have to rule that both paragraphs, in the final analysis, are out of order on procedural grounds because they ought to have been put forward as a substantive amendment to the bill under the ordinary 24 hours' notice provision of Standing Order 75(5). I think it would be unfair and improper to put them in this way because they introduce a substantive, new concept into the definition of "life imprisonment".

I would not want to comment again as to whether the hon. member might be in order in changing the language of the clause to read "50 years" from "25 years"; whether he could do that or get someone else to attempt to do it for him. This is a decision I would prefer to make only if and when such a step is taken by the hon. member for Oxford or others.

I should like to add one other word. The House should remember that this is a bill amending the Criminal Code. There is absolutely no restriction at any time on the right of the hon. member for Oxford or any other member to put forward a bill amending the Criminal Code in respect of the definition of "life imprisonment" after careful consideration and refinement of the ideas that have been put forward and discussed in respect of this particular amendment. Nor is there any restriction on the right of the hon. member to put forward a notice of motion which would call on the government to take into consideration such an amendment. In any case, there is no reason to believe, if there is merit to the amendment that is proposed, that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) or others who would be responsible for such an amendment could not be persuaded privately that such an amendment might be put forward by the government.

Therefore, I rule out of order the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Oxford. Is the House ready for the question on motion No. 36?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions in respect of motion No. 36. I am not sure whether the Solicitor General is prepared to say anything yet, but if he were given the opportunity to add to this debate we might defer the putting of the question until later this afternoon.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have sought advice from the penitentiary service and the parole board in respect of the hon. member's proposals in motion No. 36. While I have some of that opinion, I have not been able to reach all those I was seeking to consult, and I would be willing to suggest that we agree to the hon. member's request that we postpone putting the question on motion 36 until later this afternoon. Maybe after we have dealt with a few other motions I will have heard from the Commissioner of Penitentiaries.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: We will now proceed to motion No. 37. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Shall it be recorded that the motion was lost on division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 37 (Mr. Fortin) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 42 in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham) moved:

Motion No. 42.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in clause 25 by striking out lines 38 and 39 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"25. (1) This act shall come into force on the 1st day of July, 1978, and if, on that day any person is under a sentence of death".

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are two elements involved in this amendment. First, no matter when the law comes into effect, presumably there will still be people who will be under sentence of death. If the measure comes into effect now, comes into effect on proclamation or comes into effect six months from now—no matter when—unless commutations have been made under the existing Criminal Code there will be people under sentence of death. The whole clause refers to that probability.

The amendment before the House seeks to change the date of the coming into force of the act. The reason I would like to see the effective date of this measure postponed to the first day of July, 1978, is really a reference back to an original undertaking when the present sections of the Criminal Code were enacted in 1973. You will recall at that time, sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), on behalf of this ministry, undertook that there would be a further trial period of five or six years of the law as it is presently enacted, to see whether the present provisions of the Criminal Code would be effective in reducing the rising incidence of violent crime in this country.

That period will not be completed until 1978. Therefore, I feel that the undertaking which I took very seriously at that time and which has been broken by the Solicitor General and this ministry in respect of the bill now before us, should be adhered to. Obviously, the government will not stay with that undertaking, and I think they should be made to do so. That is the purpose behind this amendment. The purpose is to put off until July 1, 1978, the coming into force of these amendments. I submit it to the House for approval.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate some of the logic in the hon. member's argument, I have to say that we would work a very inequitable system if we were to do what he suggests. If I understand him correctly, he is suggesting that this law, which is an abolition law, should only come into effect after July 1, 1978. I assume he suggests that in the meantime we should apply the law in force at present, which is to hang some of the people on death row or selectively to commute some and hang others. In response to that, I can only say that if the House takes the decision to abolish capital punishment, I think it would not be just to hang some people merely because they happen to be sentenced before a certain date, and commit to life imprisonment those who were sentenced after a certain date. I think the House should decide either to have capital punishment or not to have it, and once we have made that decision the law should go into effect. So, with all respect, I suggest that we reject this amendment.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 42 (Mr. Lawrence) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): We move on to motion No. 45 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

Motion No. 45.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in clause 28 by adding immediately after line 7 at page 15, the following new subsection:

"(3) Where, at any time after December 31, 1977, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than 50 members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that section 218 of the Criminal Code, as enacted by section 5, be amended, so as to reintroduce capital punishment

(a) for the murder of police officers and prison employees,

(b) for first degree murder,

(c) for any form of first degree murder, or

(d) for treason,

for any period, fixed or indeterminate, commencing after the motion is adopted, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, the Minister of Justice or Solicitor General shall take such steps as are necessary in order that a measure in their name giving effect to the motion may be placed before the House without delay."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting motion No. 45 partly because the present bill proposes that the death penalty shall no longer be in effect in Canada for ordinary crimes, yet Bill C-2, to which my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has already referred and which was passed in the last parliament, provides that the death penalty shall continue in Canada, for certain crimes, until December 31, 1977.

In view of the public interest in this question and, if you believe the various gallup polls, the fact that the public is heavily in favour of the death penalty being retained, I believe it is important that the House retain unto itself some facility to allow the members to reintroduce this question, if they see fit, some time after December 31, 1977. That is why I am proposing that any 50 members in the House can introduce a motion in the terms that I have set out in motion No. 45 and that, should the House agree to the motion, it would instruct the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General to bring in whatever motion or legislation is required to give effect to the will of the majority of the House.

In short, it is a way to ensure that this parliament will always be responsive to the public will. If we are going to agree, as appears to be the case now, to end the death penalty immediately, I believe the original commitment which the Solicitor General gave, that the death penalty would continue until the end of 1977, should be acknowledged and that at some time after that date, when there has been time to see to what extent the murder rate has dropped in this country or any other consideration that may come up, it would be helpful if members of the House had the possibility of reintroducing the topic and a debate to bring them to a different conclusion.

In suggesting this 50-member approach, I would remind hon. members, and I am sure they will agree, that it is not a particularly new approach. In fact, in the last parliament and in this parliament there were two obvious examples of this being done. First, with respect to the Turner tax affecting manufacturing and processing industries a clause was put in allowing 50 members to initiate a debate concerning the effect of that tax on the manufacturing and processing industries. Second, when we dealt with that very contentious piece of legislation, the anti-inflation program, and were setting up the AIB it was specifically provided—in this instance it was really the government which in a compromising mood suggested that 50 members should have an opportunity to review the anti-inflation program after a date which was set down in the legislation.

So certainly it is not uncommon for the House to allow 50 members an opportunity to have a further debate, and in view of the fact that there is at least a token gesture in the way of a free vote on the death penalty, surely the House should try to facilitate a free vote being taken if at least 50 members of the House see fit. That is the thrust of what we are saying. Granted, any member could perhaps introduce a motion asking that the Criminal Code be amended to return the death penalty, but we know the frustrations and difficulties involved in setting any precedence so far as the order of business of the House is concerned. In short, this motion will ensure that if there are 50 members—after all, it is a significant number; about 20 per cent of the membership of the House—who would like to have the matter debated and brought to a new conclusion, it may be done.

I urge hon. members to support this motion, bearing in mind that perhaps in this parliament we should not pass a piece of legislation that is so dramatically out of step with the public will as we are doing currently in July of 1976. I think it behooves members of parliament to say, when we are so out of step with the public will, that at least we will facilitate a new debate in the House in order to get back into step with the public in this country.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

An hon. Member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 45 (Mr. Stevens) negatived.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved:

Motion No. 46.

That Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be amended in clause 30 by deleting lines 11 and 12 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"30. This act shall come into force on the 1st day of January, 1978."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Paproski: On division.

Motion No. 46 (Mr. Reynolds) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding that earlier we deferred motion No. 36. I would suggest that we now complete consideration of this motion.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have not finished all the consultations I wanted, but on balance I think I will accept the proposal of the hon. member and agree to it. In principle, I was in favour of it. It was the wording about which I was a bit worried. However, I have rechecked the wording and I hope there is no legal technicality which will make it difficult to live with. The principle is good, so we will accept motion No. 36.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion No. 36 (Mr. Stevens) agreed to.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): By unanimous consent, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUMMER RECESS

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the debate on third reading begins, I understand that there has been further consideration of the motion I put forward this morning and I would like to repeat my request for unanimous consent to put the motion. I hesitate to read it all again because it is a very long motion. It is on the record, and I hope I can dispense with reading it again. However, I seek unanimous consent to introduce it now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the House give the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) unanimous consent to introduce his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I assume we are now on the third reading debate of the bill. Quite frankly, I think at this hour on a Friday afternoon, in spite of the fact that perhaps they should be here, there are several hon. members who would like to have an opportunity to speak on third reading but who are not present this afternoon. While it is fine for those of us who are here to think that that is too bad and that perhaps they should be present, they are not present. If I may say so, I think the House leaders would be quite ill-advised to try to push the final stage of this bill through the House this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I believe some hon. members who have left Ottawa for their constituencies left in the belief that some time on Monday or Tuesday there would still be an opportunity for them to enter into some sort of meaningful debate on the third reading stage of the bill. Therefore, I hope there is no intention this afternoon to close off the third reading debate.

On that assumption, I would like to say a few words about the actions and attitude of the government in the last few years with respect to the whole field of law and order, crime and punishment and the administration of criminal law in this country. The third reading debate gives one an opportunity to do exactly that. First, I think it is a betrayal of the integrity and the moral honesty of this government that the whole subject of Bill C-84 came before the House this session.

An undertaking was seriously given—and for those of us who are retentionists it was seriously accepted over two years ago—that there would be a five or six-year period before we would be plunged once more into the emotional chaos and confusion which we have all gone through in the last three or four weeks. I think all of us have to look at the reasons or, as I am firmly convinced, the one and only reason we have gone through this heartrending and mind wrenching experience of the last few weeks in this House once more on this very emotional subject of capital punishment. It is simply this. If the full period of time is to run, as the undertaking given in 1973 indicated, then the next time this House and this country will debate this emotional issue will be during or just before a general election. I am firmly convinced—and I am led to believe that I am not the only one in this House or across the country to think so—that the sole reason the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) brought this matter to the fore is that they were afraid to face public opinion of this country when approaching a general election. There is no other reason.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Lawrence: I do not know whether "yellow-bellied, mealy-mouthed politicians" is a parliamentary expression; I suspect it is not, and therefore I am not going to use it in relation to this government. I merely say to you, Mr. Speaker, I am not only disappointed, I not only feel betrayed by the actions of my government, but I am sure my feelings in this regard are shared by countless thousands across this country. I do mean thousands. I do not think there is any question that the majority of public opinion in the country is decidedly against not only what has been done but the way in which it has been done. I want to say no more than that. I think this government, if you will excuse the expression, should hang their heads in shame over what they have done on this issue. I think it is a betrayal of the principles and concepts of democracy. They may think it is sour grapes because of the way the votes have gone, and there may be an element of that.

I would point out that I did not speak on the second reading debate because I believed that this time the government was going to win. This is the fourth time in ten years that this matter has been dragged before the House of Commons. It is usually brought up when the temper of the House is getting pretty crotchety due to a prolonged session and the heat of Ottawa in summer. I think all the elements surrounding the introduction and passage of this bill through the House by the government has been despicable, and come 1978 they will rue the day. The people of this country will then have an opportunity to express their opinion. The government is counting on the public having a short memory. Maybe, they have, and maybe they have not.

If I have anything to do with public opinion in the next general election, the whole question will once again be an issue. It is not only the principle of capital punishment that will be the issue but also the moral integrity of those who have been running this government and this House and the manner in which they brought in this bill. I think they are very foolish indeed to add an extra weapon to the armanent of retentionists by behaving this way.

For several weeks I have managed to bottle up my mental outrage at what has happened here, but on third reading debate I feel I can be silent no longer. I am sorry the Solicitor General is unavoidably absent for the remainder of the debate, because the final thing I want to discuss is the abuse by this government and its predecessors of what used to be commonly known as the royal prerogative of mercy.

Mrs. Holt: But your backbenchers supported that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has the floor.

Mr. Lawrence: I do not think the principle of the royal prerogative has been recognized throughout the country. When questions have been put to the Solicitor General, he has attempted to shrug them off by saying the only commutation that has taken place since he has been Solicitor General is the one case that was openly discussed in cabinet, and only after a great deal of discussion was a decision made. Nevertheless, the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister are on record as enunciating the general principles of capital punishment and unquestionably, whether they were fully discussed or minimally discussed in cabinet, the final outcome was that every death sentence that has been imposed has either been stayed or commutation has been granted outright.

There has been a terrible abuse of a worth-while discretionary power in the hands of the parliament of this country. I am firmly convinced that due to the actions of this government and the principles respecting capital punishment which have been enunciated by various ministers of the Crown, that although the royal prerogative of mercy is based on a sound principle, it has been sadly abrogated and the whole matter has been brought into disrepute. They have made a mockery of the whole procedure, and that is a shame because it is a worth-while procedure.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the present ministry has completely destroyed the concept of the royal prerogative and the discretion of the Crown. I am a member of this House, I am a citizen of this country and I am no longer going to trust the word or the integrity of the people who make up this government. I do not believe that such discretion should longer be vested in them.

There are many other discretionary matters which, although they may not be built into the statutes of this country, are traditions of this country. Most of them from Great Britain. Many of these discretions exist because they are a matter of tradition, not a matter of statute. I, for one, having watched the way in which the government have abused that discretionary privilege with regard to the royal prerogative of mercy, do not trust it with any further discretion. That is not a nice thing to say, and perhaps it is not even a polite thing to say, but it is something I must say as we debate the third reading of this bill. I cannot let this occasion pass without indicating to the front bench opposite that my opinion is neither unique nor exclusive.

● (1450)

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry; if the hon. member merely wishes to raise a question, I will not entertain it.

An hon. Member: Chicken!

Mr. Lawrence: The way in which the front bench opposite has acted in the last couple of years and, indeed, in the last couple of weeks—I am speaking about their handling of this bill and the capital punishment issue—leads me and many others in this country not to trust their word any longer.

With that, sir, I will sit down. If the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), or any other prattling member opposite has a question to ask me, I will be glad to try to answer.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat made some comments about the duration of the debate on third reading. I assure him that the government does not intend to ask for completion of the debate today. If we run out of speakers, I will take the opportunity to move the adjournment of the House so that debate may resume on Monday.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I intend to say only a few words on third reading. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) built his case of mistrust in the government on false premises. He suggested that the commutations which have taken place in recent years are based on the royal prerogative of mercy; at least, that is how I understood his argument. I stand to be corrected, but believe that the commutations in question have not been based on the royal prerogative of mercy. There may be one or more cases in which that prerogative has been exercised. In general, however, commutations have not been based on it. They have been based on a section of the Criminal Code authorizing the governor in council to commute sentences without using the royal prerogative. Surely the hon. gentleman is misleading the public if he builds his case of distrust in the governor in council on the royal prerogative of mercy argument when this very parliament gave the governor in council authority to commute sentences without using the royal prerogative. That prerogative has been untouched.

That will be my only intervention in this part of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking just because the government House leader said we shall adjourn if there are no more speakers this afternoon. I want to say a few words on third reading. Since there are not too many people present whom I can bore, this is a good time to speak.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) who suggested there has been unfairness in this debate. In my time as a member of the House we have discussed capital punishment four times. We have gone through a good deal of emotion, discussion and soul-searching in this matter. In the end it boils down to this: either you believe in capital punishment or you do not. When all is said and done, all the arguments about capital punishment being or not being a deterrent really come down to one thing: you are either for capital punishment or against it.

About a week ago, when speaking with constituents who were berating me for being an abolitionist, I pointed out that I had fought three elections since I had made known my position publicly and they had not objected. Judging from my last questionnaire, the majority of people of my area were in favour of abolition. If they have changed their position, it is not known to me; although I must point out that retentionists have made their position known vociferously.

I asked my constituents how many people they thought would be executed in one year if we were to reinstitute capital punishment. One chap said he thought about 5,000 would be executed; another said the number was not so high, maybe about 3,000. I said to these people that if we executed that number every year we should quickly eliminate the criminal element right down to the level of pickpockets or kids who go joyriding, because it would not take long for the message to get across to people in jail that crime does not pay. But I do not think even retentionists suggest we should hang that many people.

When I told my constituents that the retention of the death penalty might mean that we would hang, say, ten or 15 people a year—unless something really drastic were to happen within the next few years—one of them, I think the one who thought we would hang about 5,000, said,

[Mr. O'Connell.]

"Then you're making a hell of a lot of fuss over such a small number of people." Perhaps because of the small number involved the deterrent argument is no longer being used.

I did not vote with my party when the House divided on motion No. 4, which would allow a convicted person to choose death instead of imprisonment because I have for long felt that an extremely long prison term is the highest price anyone can pay for an offence. I felt, when the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said that there would be imposed a 25-year mandatory sentence for first-degree murder and a 15-year mandatory sentence for second-degree murder, that he was calling for an extremely stiff penalty. I know that in certain cases the court might recommend reduction of sentence. Even so, think of it this way: the person of 40 or 50 years of age faces the prospect of spending the rest of his life in jail, with no hope of getting out, with no hope of being with his friends and relations. He must be locked away for the rest of his natural life. I suggest he will pay far too great a price, and in those circumstances I would favour providing the prisoner with the means to end his own existence. That does not mean the state should execute him; it means he should make the decision. Because he is in confinement, the state must provide him with reasonable means for eliminating himself. Frankly, I think a lot of people would take that choice. It think it would be a good choice.

Mr. Speaker, we will soon be faced with the problem of mercy killing. I am thinking of the person in hospital, terminally sick and suffering untold agonies. I am thinking of those whose minds have gone, an example being the young lady in the United States who was in a coma for a long time. People like that obviously have lost the ability to decide. Equally obviously, any prudent person caught in such circumstances would, if capable of making a decision, take that way out.

Some have said that it is a barbaric situation to allow people to commit suicide. However, we may remember a situation not too long ago with our neighbour to the south which is not considered barbaric. Many of that country's citizens berated Francis Gary Power for not taking the cyanide capsule he was given when he fell into enemy hands. Because of his special mission, it was anticipated he would take the pill and destroy himself. He carried a large number of national secrets. Therefore he was a great risk to the United States. They felt he should have done the honourable thing.

If it is all right in those circumstances, it should be available to someone with no hope for the future. A society that is socially well adjusted should make that kind of provision. I am sorry other hon. members do not see it that way.

I am not the least bit pleased with the way the motion has been written. If passed, I am not sure it will accomplish exactly what is intended. That brings us to another problem. Many motions presented during this debate have been poorly constructed. This indicates that members of parliament are receiving inadequate legal advice on how to prepare these amendments. This is something that should be looked into. A member who does not have legal training should be able to get the proper legal wording for his amendments in order to accomplish what he wants. Many motions in this debate were not properly worded.

I would not only be surprised but offended if what the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham said should come to pass because of something that he does. I have known him for a long time and have considerable respect for him. I would not like to see him travel throughout the country fanning his argument for the purpose of an election. If the Conservatives form the next government, they will not immediately change this legislation. If the hon. member gives that impression, he is being dishonest. If some opposition members argue that they have been unfairly treated in this debate, this is also dishonest. The number here today who are in opposition are very small.

Mr. Towers: They are good, though.

Mr. Peters: I do not think they are good. I remember two members of this House who really believed in an idea. They were here every Friday for six years. Every time that particular subject was discussed, they were here to discuss it. They put up a good fight.

With all the amendments to this bill, we have had an excellent fight. It has been a parliamentary fight. It has been the kind of fight that ought to take place here, one that is fought hard and with all the weapons at our disposal. However, when a decision is made, even though the majority is small, it should be given a chance to work.

This is only a simple amendment to the Criminal Code. It could be made by any government or any parliament. If circumstances change, and the reintroduction of the death penalty is warranted, it will be reintroduced. If new evidence comes forward or if circumstances change, I am sure the government will reintroduce capital punishment. Despite what the injured lady member may think, as circumstances change, members' opinions usually change. In my opinion, this is not a final decision. However, I am happy that it is not going to come forward on a periodic basis. It should not become an election issue.

There was another piece of legislation within the past ten years that was very important. I refer to the flag debate. That was fought hard and long during many hot summer months. The legislation finally passed. As I travel throughout this country, particularly northern Ontario, with the exception of the May 24 weekend, I am pleased to see that the Union Jack is no longer flying from the masts of this country.

Mr. O'Connell: Put it the other way around.

Mr. Peters: That is the way I see it. Although I was not totally enamoured with the design of the flag, it was adopted and became the Canadian flag. Canadians accepted it. I think that they will accept this piece of legislation, although reluctantly in many cases. If it does not do what they want, I am sure they will demand that it be changed. I believe members of parliament will react in that way.

Mr. O'Connell: Were you happy to see it go?

Mr. Peters: I certainly have no objection to the Royal Ensign being flown on the Queen's birthday. I fought under that flag for some time. It served its purpose. However, we made a change. The Canadian public accepted that change, and I hope they will accept this one.

I have never been particularly interested in one thing that is inherent in many of the amendments. I refer to the price we paid five years ago with regard to police and prison guards. I think most people will agree that those in our police forces have been paid a fairly good salary and have received the benefit of certain legislation. In addition, they have the right to carry a gun. That does not necessarily make the fight even, but it certainly helps. There have been a number of cases where that has been a factor.

A jury in North Bay recently heard the case of a policeman stopping a car and hauling out the driver of that car. A scuffle ensued, during which time the policeman drew his gun. The driver of the car took the gun away from the policeman and shot him. The jury found the accused not guilty, and he walked away a free man. An interesting comment made during the course of that trial was that if the policeman had not brought the gun into the fight, no one would have been killed. There is a certain amount of truth in that.

In my opinion the police have to exercise a great deal of responsibility. The other day a retentionist said that the police will now shoot all criminals rather than take them captive. If that happens we will be well on our way to becoming a police state. I believe we are headed in that direction fast enough without encouragement being given to those who want to accomplish that.

We are always happy to ask other people to do unpleasant things for us. The general public has to decide that it also has a responsibility for maintaining law and order and that when the need arises it has a duty to respond. If they have to give testimony in court they will have to do so even if they lose a day's pay. I have heard people say they would not testify in court because they would lose a day's pay, receiving only a pittance in exchange. Surely that is not the spirit in which we should approach the process of justice. We should not always depend on other people to do the proper thing.

There is no doubt that the public is demanding protection but I do not believe that killing ten or 12 people a year will make any difference to the social morass we find in our major cities. I do not think there would be any great change in habits of those in the drug-oriented sections of society or those who are involved in organized crime—the latter have been able to acquire a good deal of status in the community which they damn well do not deserve; they get it because some of them are reaping great rewards from activities which take advantage of discreditable social conditions.

I am surprised that the Solicitor General has not spent more time and effort helping to correct some of the problems which will affect our penitentiaries after the passage of this legislation. I am not thinking of the legislation itself but of some of the things which have been said during the debate, both here and outside.

It has been said, for example, that no guard will be safe in a penitentiary when there are murderers confined there because they will be able to commit murder again with impunity. The fact is that this has only happened twice in our history. Only twice has a person convicted of murder been allowed out and murdered a second person, so it is not a real argument. Nevertheless it is the kind of argument which will stir the guards up and scare the pants off them. A scared penitentiary service will be dangerous to itself and to the whole institution, and the injured lady, despite anything she may say about this, any ideas she has on this subject are purely superficial. The remarks she makes are an indication of that.

Very few guards get into difficulty unless they are violent and rough with inmates. Undoubtedly there are psychotics in these institutions to whom normal standards do not apply but in the main, and I have talked to hundreds of guards, guards who are good guys are in no trouble. Those who are not, either get out or find themselves in serious difficulty.

This was well demonstrated in St. Vincent de Paul. We remember the difficulties which occurred daily in that penitentiary. They were eliminated by giving the guards some training and using more selectivity in choosing the guards. Efforts were also made to improve relations between the guards and the administrative staffs. The situation was improved 100 per cent with very little effort on the part of the penitentiary authorities. A little instruction and a little help would be of great value in lessening the animosity which develops between the guards and the prison staff. I have in mind the situation in British Columbia, for instance. In my opinion the guards decided to shoot one of the counsellors because they were very unhappy with her conduct. That was a decision, and that kind of thing indicates a total breakdown in the relationship between the two sections. I think a lot more money will have to be spent—

Mrs. Holt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the guards at the British Columbia penitentiary have been maligned and that feeling is borne out by the inquest which ended last week. I think the hon. member's remark was grossly unfair to the tactical squad whose lives are now in jeopardy. They have been absolved of all blame.

Mr. Peters: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't know anything about the inquiry which was held. I will just leave the one fact with you, Mr. Speaker. You can decide for yourself.

An hon. Member: What fact?

Mr. Peters: It seems to me they decided to issue guns to a number of guards, and then they got the guns back and mixed them up right away so that they would not be able to find out which one fired the shot, knowing that the bullet would eventually be recovered. This indicates to me that there is a breakdown between the two sections, the one which dealt with security and the one which was trying to accomplish a measure of rehabilitation. It is my opinion that the rehabilitation section did not come out very well.

I raise this aspect because assertions that the guards will be placed in jeopardy will create a great deal of dissatisfaction and fear among the guards and, if this happens, nervousness itself will create a situation intolerable for many of the guards and others working in that field.

[Mr. Peters.]

I myself have no objection to violence. I am not a pacifist by any means. I have no objection to being in the armed forces and killing if necessary. That does not bother me, because it would be an action against an enemy, whoever the enemy might be. And this might apply even against my own neighbour. I could be very vengeful in many situations. But I do not think I could justify going into a court tomorrow as a member of a jury knowing that my vote, one of 12 but the only one that exists for me, would lead to the execution of some individual. I would never be sure I was right. And because I would not ask anyone else to do what I would not be willing to do myself it is not hard for me to make up my mind on this issue.

There is no need to call further attention to all the doubts and misgivings which may arise, or to the part played by such important factors as the environment or the social background of an accused person. An important consideration to my mind is that no rich man in this country has ever been hanged since the days of Confederation. And no rich man ever will. If you can buy a proper defence under our court system you will not be convicted of a capital murder. But this is not true of all classes in our society. It is not true in the case of the poor Indian who comes into court undefended, possibly unaware of the charge against him. Such a person as he would inevitably face the severest possible penalties. He is the one who is always picked on.

I firmly believe there should not be capital punishment. I think society is big enough now to take care of most of the people who are anti-social and who cannot fit into what we set as the standards for society. It is my opinion that we are getting to the stage of also being able to look after people in our mental institutions, society's misfits. We have not been concentrating our attention upon them. Surely the answer is not building more jails to hold more people; instead we should determine how these people relate to society.

Society has not the right to vengeance. If those who want to keep the death penalty are not prepared to argue on the basis of its deterrent value, then I suggest all that is left is vengeance, and surely society cannot afford the luxury of vengeance. We should continue to eliminate the cause of crime, which in many cases is committed by people who are unable to help themselves in any other way.

I suggest that whatever decision we make in the next few days, it will not be final. Most of us who believe in the abolition of capital punishment are fully aware that if the situation develops where we can no longer handle our criminals without capital punishment, we shall have to review the situation, not as moralists, not from the point of how we feel about it, but on the basis of passing the legislation that society requires. I only hope that those who fought on the other side will carefully watch what takes place and ascertain whether or not the time has come for them to renew the fight for what they believe in on the basis of what has developed. I hope they do not stir up emotions that are easily stirred up on the part of people who have not had the benefit of the knowledge imparted to members of the House by many notable organizations that have presented their case very fairly and with great ability.

I feel that this, like most other laws, has no particular finality to it. It is an indication that most members of the House feel that society does not demand a death penalty to deal with its criminal element; but if the situation changes, then another day the other side might win.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of my colleague from Timiskaming who said that in Canada a rich man could never hang. It reminded me of the policy of capital punishment instituted by this government over the past eight years or so. This policy does not relate so much to the life of a man as to a man's capital.

The government across the way has determined upon a new way of capital punishment. Its members tax the industrious people of this country in order to raise huge government revenues, and they then turn around and invest the revenue in businesses which compete with the businesses of the taxpayers from whom they took the money in the first place. However, that is not particularly relevant to this debate and I would not want to be anything other than relevant.

I should like to refer to the preparedness of the government in this debate. It was evident earlier today, I think, that the government was completely unprepared, even though the bill has been before the House, before committee, and then has been brought back again to the House over a period of many months. The calendar this year is very similar to the calendar last year. The government knew very well when July was going to begin and it could very well have determined when the session would end or the recess was going to commence.

This morning we witnessed what I would call a spectacle of incompetence when the government House leader tried to short-circuit the well-established rules of the House. One member cannot, of course, control the House. Even the four House leaders found that they were not completely in control this morning. Therefore I have no real complaint when I find the government House leader has finally succeeded in putting his motion and getting it approved by the House in my absence. They are the rules, Mr. Speaker; I understand them within the limit of my ability after four years in this House, and I accept them.

The point I want to make to the House, Mr. Speaker, is that the government had no need to pass this bill on any particular day. It makes not a particle of difference to anyone in Canada whether Bill C-84 is passed today, next Wednesday, July 29, or indeed October 12. Although capital punishment has been on the law books of Canada for goodness knows how many years, there has not been one instance during the last 14 years of capital punishment being carried out; every single death sentence has been commuted or deferred.

This is a typical example of the attitude taken by the government. Its members feel they can order things just as they wish to have them ordered. I hope that once in awhile they continue to get a few surprises. As I said on second reading, there is absolutely no need for this debate in the first place since the present law on capital punishment does not expire until December, 1977, a year and a half from now.

When I first came to this House in 1973 following the 1972 election the House then considered a bill on capital punishment, the reason being that the government at that time had let things go for too long. The government does not know what timing is, it seems, except perhaps when it comes to winning elections. In 1973 the capital punishment provisions had expired and so we considered a bill. We are now being asked in 1976 to pass a law that will replace a bill that does not expire until 18 months from now.

I made what I thought was to be my only contribution in this debate on second reading, but I find myself compelled to make some summary remarks regarding the issue of capital punishment itself. I was, of course, disappointed at the result of the votes to date. I do not say this for any political or personal reasons but because I have the genuine belief, though I think some others in this House have not, that society deserves the protection that capital punishment provides.

Many questions have been raised during this debate and in committee on how the state is to protect the innocent members of the public. The government says it will put the murderers in jail. The very people to whom we have entrusted the jail-keeping and the enforcement of our laws have told the government and members of parliament on all sides, time and again, that there must be some ultimate penalty for murder in this country. I am going to use the word murder, although in the debate so far it has been obvious that a similar penalty has been called for in respect of high treason, treason, and other serious crimes such as the hijacking of aircraft.

I do not know whether it is appropriate at this time to mention the incident at Entebbe, but there was a case of air piracy, pure and simple. There is no question about it. Hundreds of innocent peoples' lives were put into danger. There was no government in a position to impose a penalty on those hijackers that was suitable or at least sufficient to ensure the safety of those hostages. What happened in that case? We had what we might describe as an international incident. Really it was a matter of a minor war in which a force from one country made a sudden, middle-of-the night invasion of another country.

There was all sorts of killing and the world in general praised that act, although one or two were moved to call it an act of supreme aggression. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) said in this House that he, if not welcomed, at least admired the action of the Israeli force that went in there in an admitted act of bravery and rescued those innocent people. Yet the Government of Canada assumes no action is needed to protect the innocent of this country. The state has a duty to protect the innocent, and what has been proposed in Bill C-84, which has been unchanged to date, is that we will take despicable murderers and imprison them for life.

Perhaps we should divert for a moment and define for ourselves what is a murderer. We are not talking about someone who in the heat of passion kills, or one who kills accidentally one way or another. There are lesser penalties for that. We are talking about the most heinous crime, murder; the willful taking of another's life.

There was an incident just this week in the United States, I believe it was. In any event it occurred on a bus when, with the slightest provocation, a passenger pulled a gun, shot and killed another passenger on the bus, then ran off and disappeared somewhere, probably never to be found again. If that had happened in Canada and he had been found, the government's proposal is that if he were convicted of murder, and that is not even certain, he would simply be sent to prison for life. Of course life is subject to definition. The bill would lead you to believe that life means 25 years. I would hope that many men who were convicted of murder and sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment might, when they came out, be so old and feeble they could no longer be considered a menace to society. But our prisons are not always like that.

The situation in prison is untenable and certainly unpleasant, and when a man of any age whatever is facing 25 years in prison what is another life? He can only serve one. The Solicitor General and his friends over there were so accommodating to accept the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), which provided that one accused of murder for the second time would be charged with first degree murder. What a sop that is.

Those on the other side do not seem to have considered that these killers have contacts on the outside. They have certain abilities. We heard during the question period today about guns and ammunition being found inside prisons. There are countless stories of weapons being fabricated in prison workshops. At the British Columbia penitentiary in the last 16 months there have been seven hostage incidents. I do not know how many deaths have resulted from them, but certainly there have been some.

I would ask those on the other side, and the government which presented this bill, to consider the effect on the work of prison guards particularly, and on the very people we call upon to enforce our laws, the police all over this country. I do not understand how we can be so fortunate in Canada to have a force of policemen and prison guards remaining on duty today. The government have shown that it cares not at all for the lives of these policemen and prison guards.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to the retentionists that if capital punishment were retained in Canada somebody would hang, and that such hanging would be on the shoulders of the retentionists. Of course that is the case, and I do not think there is any retentionist in this House who does not fully realize that and is not fully willing to accept the responsibility. Neither the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) nor any single member of that cabinet over there apparently had any consideration for the responsibility that would fall upon them and all of the abolitionists who voted in favour of this bill for the death, by any gruesome method, of any innocent member of society in Canada. It disturbs me greatly; more than that, it confounds me how such a caring group of people could so easily dismiss the fate of some innocent members of society.

[Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra).]

I have heard all the bleeding heart arguments about how we must be kind to prisoners because society was mean to them and we must try to rehabilitate them because they are really good people. I could not really argue that there is some amount of truth in it, but how can that be a truth when it is applied to a hired killer, someone who has been paid thousands of dollars to kill a person? How can that be applied to the killers in Montreal last year who locked up 13 people and burned the place down? I have not heard a single argument from the government side, or from the abolitionist side, to justify the saving of the life of this kind of person.

● (1540)

The abolitionists are all very concerned about the lives of a few murderers in this country. How many can there be? Why should they spend all this time agonizing over this scum of the earth? Why do we not worry a little bit about you and me? Why do we not worry a little about the policemen's widows and children? Six thousand people are killed on the roads in this country, but this hardly gets a headline. People are used to this sort of thing; it is not news. But one murderer who for some heinous crime against society deserves to die, deserves to be removed from society permanently, gets all the attention. It is absolutely incomprehensible.

I often think that there is very little difference between the abolitionists and retentionists in most cases. I have spent many hours talking to my friends and my colleagues who are abolitionists and I find that we agree right down the line up to a point. My abolitionist friends agree that persons convicted of murder should be removed from society permanently. The only difference that we seem to have is in how to implement it permanently. The abolitionists say that such a person should be kept in jail for the rest of his natural life. When the bill was finally presented to us we found that "the rest of his natural life" has been reduced to 15 years, and although I cannot interpret all the technicalities in the Solicitor General's bill, my information is that many murderers will be out of prison in much less than 25 years, perhaps 15. I have even heard, and I have not had it refuted yet, that escorted absences may be allowed after one year in prison.

If the abolitionists and retentionists agree that a murderer guilty of some terrible crime against society should be removed from that society permanently, then the argument should simply evolve on how best to achieve that end. Obviously if the removal from society is achieved by executing the guilty person, that is fine. We heard from my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), that the law we are passing now is not final. Well, it may not be final for the murderers but you can be sure it will be final for a good deal more innocent victims that it would have been if the opposite case were true.

I have asked many of my abolitionist friends how we should keep these horrible offenders away from society if we do not execute them, so that the innocent members of society are protected in this so called free and democratic country of ours. Well, they say, we will put them in prison. Then we get right back to the argument about how we should keep them in prison where, skilled as they may be, they have nothing better to do all day in prison but to make their weapons, or receive them over the fence, and dream up ideas on how to escape. What deterrent is there in a life sentence once one is serving a life sentence?

We have heard all the arguments about whether hanging or execution is a deterrent or is not, but our whole society is built on the deterrence of punishment of one kind or another. If that were not so, we would not need to worry about any kind of fines today. We would not have to worry about policemen issuing tickets here on the hill, in the city, or on the highways for speeding. We would not need to bother locking our shops and our houses because breaking and entry would not be an offence punishable in any way. The whole thread of our society is based on punishment for deviation from the accepted rule.

There are many changes that occur as society evolves, and I am not one to suggest that society should remain rigid. We can all think back 50 to 100 years when crimes which are laughed at today were considered capital offences. At one time the stealing of a loaf of bread carried the death penalty on conviction, and pickpockets had their hands cut off. Those punishments were on the books and were meted out for their deterrent effects, just as all the punishments that are on the law books today are meted out as deterrents. It was decided, as society evolved, that certain crimes did not call for quite such severe penalties as others. Whether that added to the incidence of crime I am not able to say, but the principle remains that if we are to continue our society as we know it, we must have some penalty that is a deterrent.

It may be that life imprisonment is a sufficient deterrent for some people. I think that life imprisonment might keep many in this House from committing that final act that they might sometimes think of committing. But what can we expect a prisoner under a life sentence to think, when all he has to lose by killing anyone in sight is a further life imprisonment?

The basic premise is so simple, so easy to understand, that I do not understand what the government in presenting this bill, and the abolitionists in supporting it, can possibly be thinking. They say they want a safer Canada for innocent citizens. How can you make a country safer for innocent citizens by removing from the law enforcement agencies the final tool that they have for the protection of society?

I spoke earlier about the duty of the state. I heard the Solicitor General say that the state does not have the right to impose the death penalty to protect the innocent citizens of Canada. What can the citizens expect of the state if they cannot expect protection? In fact something like 80 per cent of the people in Canada seem to be demanding that these days. I have yet to hear the government explain the difference between executing an enemy of the state in the form of a murderer or of a person guilty of treason or piracy. What is the difference between executing one of those despicable people and calling upon an ordinary citizen in time of war to kill another kind of enemy of the state? To me the difference is minuscule, and the explanations offered are not satisfactory.

I would welcome any explanation which could answer some of these arguments. Over the months I have listened to the arguments, but there has been no explanation about how we are going to keep these heinous criminals from harming Canadians. There has been no explanation of the difference between killing in war an enemy of the state and the killing of a person who on July 17 becomes an enemy of the state. I think the people of Canada want an answer. They have let their opinion be known, and the majority of this House in its so-called democratic way has given its answer. I suspect that the people of Canada in their democratic way will give their answer the next time they get a chance.

I have mentioned some practical considerations with regard to keeping murderers in prison. Perhaps I should say impractical considerations, because I do not think it is possible. Some would raise the matter of cost. It is certainly costly to keep a prisoner locked up. I am told that the cost is about $18,000 per year per prisoner. At one time I might have attached more significance to that cost than I do now. It is obvious that this government in the past eight years has paid very little attention to costs of any kind, but I think it is fair to say that one should not argue about human life in terms of dollar costs.

People have argued that juries and judges can make mistakes, and that innocent people can be convicted. In my remarks at second reading of this bill I quoted an old friend and jurist in Vancouver, the Hon. John Valentine Clyne. He wrote to me with great concern at the time of the earlier stages of the consideration of this bill, because he was concerned about what would happen in Canada. When he was on the bench he saw many of these cases. He was concerned that too many people would feel that the system of justice in Canada would not serve to protect an innocent accused person, but he was convinced from his experience on the bench that the system available to an accused in Canada, whether he be rich, as the hon. member for Timiskaming said, or whether he be poor, assures that there is no danger of having a wrongfully accused person executed.

However, as an aside, I ask what difference would it make if a person was executed or if he was imprisoned wrongfully for 25 years? There is no way the state can bring back a life, but there is also no way the state can repay a man for 25 years of wrongful imprisonment. Arguments such as that should lead those who think that way to spend the rest of their lives in bed because, if they dare set foot out of bed, they might break their leg, be run down by a car, or fall down a flight of stairs. That kind of thinking is so antiquated and backward that it hardly deserves comment at this time.

In a week or so we shall be having visitors from around the world at the Olympic Games. One month ago Vancouver was host to representatives of 136 countries in the United Nations for the Habitat Conference. These major events invite violent visitors to this country to perpetrate their vile acts. The passage of this bill will leave Canada powerless to control that kind of violence. We know that particularly this year there have been special rules put into effect for immigration purposes so that we can keep undesirable aliens from entering Canada and causing trouble at such things as the Habitat Conference and the Olympic Games. However, we know that people can come across the border either by subterfuge or by sneaking across.

We talk about our undefended border; it certainly is. Anybody can come into this country from the United States through miles and miles of the undefended border. It is all very well to have rules for immigration if a visitor wishes to come in through the formal channels and be examined, but it is clear that there are many roads open into Canada which are not officially scrutinized. If we have an incident in this country this year, next year, or in the future, what will we do then? Are we inviting people to come here and commit crimes? It may be that some countries instil fear in their criminals by imposing severe penalties. Canada will be putting every visiting dignitary in a danger that would not exist in his own country or in many other countries. I think I referred already to hired killers. They come into the same category.

If I may summarize what I am trying to say to the good minded abolitionists who are voting for this bill, it is that they owe something to the protection of the citizens of Canada. I have never criticized the motives of an abolitionist. As I said earlier, our ideas are very close, that is, the removal of the offender from society, permanently. I am simply saying that the method of long prison terms—even for the rest of one's natural life in prison—is not a satisfactory way of removing a killer from society permanently. There is only one way to do that and it is by some form of state execution. It does not need to be hanging. I think the press has done an injustice to the people of Canada because every time the media mention capital punishment, especially on television, there is a picture of the noose in the background. The noose may not be the answer.

An old friend from Vancouver, the Hon. John Valentine Clyne, wrote to me saying that he had done a study when he was on the bench about methods of execution. He had compared hanging with the gas chamber and one or two other methods—and for whatever reasons that he was unable to give me in the letter—it was his conclusion that hanging was probably the most satisfactory.

I sense, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to rise so I will close my remarks with a final appeal to the abolitionists in this House who also represent the innocent citizens of this country that they give final consideration to the innocent people in Canada who desire, deserve, and demand the protection of the state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the undertaking that I gave a little earlier that there are no more speakers this afternoon, I move the adjournment of the debate and, if that is acceptable, I will move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is moved by Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Drury that the debate be now adjourned.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clarke: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I understood the government House leader properly, but if he said he was moving the adjournment of the debate then I do not think it would be acceptable, but if he meant to adjourn the sitting for today that is quite a different thing.

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Clarke: I did not hear him say that, Mr. Speaker. In his incompetent way he has bungled it again. Perhaps he could repeat it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister, by adjourning the debate, was postponing it until Monday morning when it would start again, to make sure that if something happens during the week end there is no difficulty. The debate is suspended until the next sitting of this House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to the order made this day.

At 4.08 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Friday, July 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter the debate at this point to indicate to the House what my position will be when the third reading vote on this bill is taken.

When I voted in favor of the principle of abolition of the death penalty on second reading of the bill, I did so after a great deal of study, in which I learned that in no country has it been demonstrated that capital punishment is a deterrent to committing murder, and it is for that reason that I believe that the most effective punishment for the crime is life imprisonment.

However, since the second reading vote, I have learned from my riding that the overwhelming majority of the people living in Prince Edward-Hastings strongly favour the retention of the death penalty for the crime of murder committed against any person. I have always believed that when a member of parliament is made aware that a clear majority of those living in his riding hold a strong opinion on an important matter which is before parliament for decision, it is the duty of the member to express that opinion in parliament on behalf of those he represents, and to back up that opinion with his vote.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to vote against this bill when the third reading vote is taken, and by so doing, express the very strong opinion of the overwhelming majority of those I represent in parliament that the death penalty should be the punishment meted out to those who commit first degree murder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members recognize that at this time there is not very much new which can be said with regard to the retention or abolition of capital punishment. I think, however, that the events of recent weeks have demonstrated quite clearly to Canadians that Canada, in all likelihood, is about to become an abolitionist state.

● (1110)

I should like to take some time on third reading to put on the record what I think becomes the obligation, now in view of the fact that we are likely to abolish capital punishment, of some sectors of our society other than parliament. The real issue that we have been talking about has been the issue of law and security or law and order. That is not a goal that can be attained by legislation alone. The attainment of that goal is an obligation that must fall on other groups of our society, and it is highly important that some of these people take on the full responsibility of achieving peace and security.

In this debate I should like to refer to what happens in radio and television, that is the emphasis on negative concepts in which we keep marinating our minds, the soaking up of what we find is bad in society and making that the main subject in our news. Obviously, this is one of the factors leading to the violent crime which takes place in our society. The fact of the matter is that we never hear all the news, we only hear part of the news; we hear the bad news, the negative aspects of the news which enter into the newscaster's script. If advertising sells Chevrolets, bubble gum or beer, then surely it is also true that if we marinate our minds in negative concepts it will have an effect on how we behave, it will have the same effect as advertising on our behaviour. If every time we turn on the television to listen to the news or open up a newspaper and the predominent issues we hear or read about are the negative aspects of what has happened in society, that will have an influence on people who are wavering between behaving acceptably according to the mores of our society and behaving not in accordance with the norms of prescribed behaviour.

Recognition is more important to a human being than whether that recognition is obtained through good or bad behaviour. People have a psychological need to be recognized, and if they know that in the newspaper, the television or the radio we give recognition to the negative aspects of what happens in our society, then obviously that will have an influence on how people will behave. I believe that the spreading of the news has largely been the cause of the hijackings that have taken place around the world. The first hijacking was very novel, but it hit the news every hour following the incident. It is interesting to note that within the first week of that hijacking more hijackings took place. Aeroplanes have been around for a long time but the hijacking concept is very recent and it is interesting to note that following the first hijacking there was a rash of them. I believe the cause was in large part prominence and attention given to it by the media.

I should like to underscore another situation which I think was an inexcusable example of how the press focuses on the negative. This past summer I attended a national student debating seminar for high schools students from across Canada which was held in Winnipeg. There were students from every part of Canada at that seminar which was held on the topic of regional and economic development. The organizers of this large event invited over 100 students from all over Canada and asked the press, radio and television to film and report some of the activities that were taking place. The television people announced that they would not attend that particular seminar. However, when the organizers arrived the next morning they found the television crews had arrived. The reason they were there was that some vandals had broken windows in the school the night before. Here was a national event with students collected from all parts of Canada speaking on major topics at a seminar which could not get publicity, but when some vandals broke windows in the school the press found that this had to be reported. This exemplifies the fact that the negative aspects get attention in the press. I believe that this kind of reporting leads to some of the violence and to some forms of unacceptable behaviour. In my view, it is not only the politician who should bear the burden of trying to achieve peace and security in our society.

I should like to give another example. Recently on parliament hill the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was drenched in milk during a demonstration. Later that night I heard on the radio that milk had been thrown on the minister when he spoke in English to French speaking farmers. The implication was obvious, that this was not simply a situation of upset dairy farmers but that the bilingual issue was involved. That kind of reporting is not only inaccurate, it is malicious. When we get that kind of reporting which focuses on the negative, when recognition is given to only certain sectors in our society, this stimulates the amount of violence in which certain elements engage. Surely, there must be a balance between the positive achievements that take place and the negative behaviour that occurs. We should not be continually exposed to such words as terrorist, hijacked, escaped, defrauded, incarcerated, raped, government graft, ransom, arrested, on strike, commando raid, demonstrators, execution, mercenaries, security, alleged plot, revolt, armed guard, Liberals, or defeat. All those words were gathered from one news broadcast. When you listen to such broadcasts and focus on the words, you ask yourself where all the good news is.

I should like to recommend two possible ways of trying to develop a system in which we can focus more on the positive achievements of man and give more credit to those who do positive things by giving them more attention in the news we hear and read. The newspaper guilds should establish within their ranks a regulatory body similar to that established by the College of Physicians and Surgeons. There have been a number of examples across the country of the College of Physicians and Surgeons severely disciplining doctors within its own ranks. I know there is a newspaper guild, but it does not ensure that newspapers give proper balance to the positive achievements in our society versus negative aspects, such as crime and violence. I believe there should be such a regulating body that would have some muscle. Obviously, this is not the role of the government or of some outside agency; it is high time that the press organized such a regulating body.

The other suggestion I should like to put forward is that radio and television should change their practice of coming before the CRTC in Toronto. Such hearings should take place on a periodic basis in the radio and television broadcast regions. I have heard people in my constituency recommend on numerous occasions that news about crimes be taken off the air, but when you talk to them you find that they watch such programs as Kojak, and this is reflected in the ratings. A more reasoned discussion, however, might show that the very people who watch are those who recognize the risks. If groups made representations at CRTC hearings in a more thoughtful manner instead of basing their judgment purely on the ratings, society would probably have a greater influence on the kind of television and radio programs it receives, and I think this is important.

● (1120)

I would simply conclude by saying, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to have peace and security in society, it is not the role only of the legislator—it is not the role only of the press either; it is the role of all Canadians. I think we could take a tremendous step forward if we could establish a number of organizations which would ensure that radio and television programs would reflect some of the positive achievements of Canadians. In this way, our young people would find a sense of reward in the programs rather than growing up believing that human nature is slanted to the negative and that there is more to gain outside the mores of society than from within. I believe all sectors of our society would then begin to pull together to give the young people a sense of achievement and to play down negativism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have chosen to speak again on third reading debate to oppose Bill C-84 because statements have been made here that beg answers.

The statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—which were most impressive—also require some answers. Those statements better argued for retention than abolition, I may say. The Prime Minister has said this is a guessing game. It is indeed. Any time the state seeks solutions to human behaviour with its hundreds, perhaps thousands or maybe 22 million variations, it is a complex guessing game with no definitive answers possible. No absolutes are available, whether at the polarized ends or in the middle.

There will never be, and never has been, a perfect solution. There cannot be formulas to solve the social problems of a fast-changing, fast-moving society that is bombarded on all sides with depressing, disturbing, distorted information. Not only is society fast changing, but people change and as fast as a solution is found for one individual, never mind the whole of society, another change occurs.

Rather than debating with the Prime Minister I would have preferred to debate with the abolitionist statement of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Unlike our leader, he is consistent in that he says nothing—nothing worthy of debate. In fact, I suspect his politics consist of two sides and a fence.

This will be my last attempt to halt a dangerous experiment in the lives of innocent people and the fabric of our society, Mr. Speaker. I hope that some of the additional knowledge I provide in this debate may cause some who voted for this bill on second reading and who rejected motion No. 13 at report stage, to rethink their position. This vote will be the last chance they will have to represent the wishes of their constituents and at the same time halt some premeditated ruthless killers who have proclaimed they have nothing to lose if they kill again. I believe capital punishment is a deterrent, Mr. Speaker, and I shall explain that later. I am not making a token speech. Some such people have already served notice on our guards and police. Throughout the country the number of murders, attempted murders, vicious, assaults with rape is growing at an accelerated pace.

Perhaps one day in the future when we are advanced sociologically far beyond where we are now in our preventative correction—as was suggested by the hon. member who just spoke—we can face the abolition question and end hanging in Canada. We must not do it in the way of Bill C-84, however, which is an abomination in justice, a trade-off in brutality and cruelty.

When all our children are assured of safe passage into adulthood, when mature programs replace whimsical, hit and miss social work for preventing family breakdown and destruction of children, when our institutions—-schools, hospitals, treatment centres and holding facilities—are competent to prevent and cure social ills before frustration, violence, paranoia, psychopathy and sociopathic ills develop, then I shall be the first—if I am still alive when that great day comes—to strive for abolition. I did work for abolition in the 1950's when every person who killed was sentenced to death if convicted.

Before I go on I want to discuss briefly the right of every member to participate fully in this debate. One or two members—perhaps three—have indicated that we on this side should only participate with token statements to let our constituents know we have taken a position in this debate. I suggest this was a reprehensible attempt to silence and intimidate us which reflects the superficiality of those—very, very few, I might say—who would say that. It only inspires me to greater determination to complete my intervention in this debate.

It is my understanding of parliament that this is the place for debate—that it is here that we make our points and if possible influence others who may have less knowledge or experience in the subjects under discussion—whether it be abolition or finance. Many talented people are gathered in this House and each has some knowledge, experience and wisdom in his or her own field to pass on to others. I have learned much from hearing and reading the debates; I must admit I have also learned a great deal about corn and balderdash.

I feel very strongly that I have every right to use my time in debate here, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe in the backroom lobbying that I have seen in this House. If the debate continues in the lobby, I will participate. But I do not believe in rigged votes whether in this House or in party conventions—that means the other parties and my party—where the advocates of one side pack the vote. It is a fraud on the people of Canada. Nor do I believe that inducements or threats should be used to influence people to change their vote—especially when this is a free vote. Unfortunately, both the cabinet and the opposition shadow cabinet are toeing one line so we are not alone over here in the lack of a totally free vote. The NDP is even worse, toeing a party line on an issue as serious as this. Participatory democracy is thus frustrated, Mr. Speaker. Had this been a totally free vote the public wish for retention of the death penalty would have been fulfilled.

Perhaps this rush to get this bill through is so that some people can make history—Richard Nixon made history from his victory—and they are prepared to win by default, by limiting debate and witnesses in committee and trying to intimidate their opponents, thus imposing their wish on the people of Canada and denying the majority the right to the protection of the state.

Canadians today are perhaps more angry over parliament's—and that is both sides of this House—arrogance or elitism in overriding the wishes and demands of about 18 million of their 22 million constituency than they are over the issue itself. This is not the society of Edmund Burke. Ours is a public that is wise, educated and sees what we do within minutes of our actions. It judges us from a background of its own knowledge and experience which in the majority of cases is equal to if not superior and even better than, that of many of us here. In the majority of cases that knowledge and experience is equal to if not superior to that of many members of this House.

My remarks apply even to the media which tries to press its convictions on the public. I am thinking particularly of that segment of the Ontario group which imagines, amusing as that may be, that it is an opinion maker. It tried to establish an erroneous opinion on the Calgary Stampede. The hate mongering Maclean's magazine tried it with reports of anti-Americanism, which does not exist in the west. They have been found to be wrong. People of this ilk are writing this type of material on this issue which we have been reading. There are those in this eastern group of the media, and some stragglers from other areas of Canada, who attempt to press their convictions on us and on the public. Perhaps some may mistake this as public opinion. I do not. Most people recognize such writing for what it is, that of one single voice. The public also has the intellect to recognize the exaggeration, perversion of truth and the strange practice of reporters interviewing other reporters on events they all covered together. The Prime Minister described that as "Drinking each other's bath water."

I am disappointed at finding it necessary to say all this. Fortunately, there are some great reporters in this country who can call themselves part of the fourth estate. The others dare not take that name. They are a disgrace to the fourth estate.

There is emptiness in mere talking or writing and in never doing anything. There are those who verbalize about standards of behaviour and morality but cannot meet them themselves. There are those who express compassion for a concept such as abolition but would not fight for the life or freedom of one convicted person. I have seen this both in journalism and law. The very people who criticize my position today have never worked on a parole and never as lawyers or journalists cared a damn for the people locked in cages we call prisons. Nor have they attempted to listen to the anguish of the guards who are spoken of by some here as less than human. I have heard a member of the NDP talking about bad prison guards. We assign them to the role of protecting us. How dare any member suggest that these people should expect to die or that they are less than human.

It is the attitude of some that our prison guards and policeman are less than human. As if this were not bad enough, inside prisons policemen and prison guards are called pigs. In this very House they were held up to contempt on Friday. If they try to achieve control or discipline, they get no support from the administration. That is the truth in British Columbia. Their lives and the lives of their families are in jeopardy, and they face many threats. But who in this House is listening to them or cares? Which member of this House will take their places after this House enacts laws whereby killers will be locked away for 25 years, their only hope being in hostage taking, murder and escape? That is the only way open to them.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is the only way out for them.

Mrs. Holt: That is right. I recall, in days when there was only one degree of murder, capital murder, and on conviction the judge had only one choice, to sentence the killer to death, that I was involved with the tenants of death row. I am speaking of the period of the early 1950 and early 1960s. During that period I approached lawyers, the Law Society, reporters and columnists—all the big talkers, the ones who should care and who put out much of the dialogue we hear on the issue—I appealed to them to help to save some who today would not even be charged with second degree murder, perhaps not even manslaughter, let alone first degree murder.

Most lawyers then who took murder cases did it for everything the accused owned. They charged all the traffic could bear. Few top flight lawyers took murder cases on the basis of legal aid. Legal aid fees then were $100 for the trial, no matter how long, and $50 for preparation fees. There was provision for payment of a transcript if the case went to appeal. Naturally, the amateurs and beginners did not care about the fee. They needed the publicity to establish a practice. I fought at that time to bring legal aid defence fees up to the level of the prosecution fees, which ran at $100 per day, plus all the resources of the state. The Law Society was silent in response to all appeals. Yet some of those people—I hasten to say that there are only a few—are crying out today for abolition. In those days only beginners chased after murder cases in order to get headlines. As a result, many accused were convicted because they were represented by a bad lawyer. But the killer had to face the gallows.

There is a columnist in the west today—at that time he was at the top of the professional ladder—who today accuses me of "wanting to hang every jaywalker." Others here have described me as an ardent retentionist. That is remarkable inaccuracy. I believe in capital punishment for persons who plan and carry out murder for a fee or to satisfy their own ends.

Let me come back to this western columnist. Recently, while searching through some papers, I found a letter I had written to him on July 17, 1957, pleading for his help to save several condemned men in death row. I offered information, letters from these people and insights into life on death row from those facing the gallows who, as I said before, today would not be charged with first degree murder; at best they would be charged with manslaughter. Any reporter would have welcomed this kind of material handed to him on a platter. That columnist would not do anything; he would not help and he remained silent. Today he sits in his study and writes nice columns and attacks all those who did something. But wait; he would do nothing to help even one person. Today, he still does nothing either but verbalize high principles. I could name others.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who is it?

Mrs. Holt: I could name a couple of others, but I will not. Some day I may write a book in which I shall name them.

As I watch some of the lawyers who were involved in those cases and are now abolitionists, I wonder at the load of guilt they are carrying. In those days, because the convicted killer went to the gallows, they had real reason to feel guilt. I wonder if they do not feel that, somehow, they can cleanse their own souls by voting for abolition because they could not prevent convictions in the past.

I also wonder at some of the journalists who engage in punditry. I remind them all that the end of all talk must be action. When I oppose this bill now, I oppose it because I believe that killers of policemen and prison guards, contract killers, international terrorists who kill and criminals who in the course of rape and robbery kill another human being should be prepared to face the courts on a capital murder charge. They should face the consequences of their acts. I do believe in equality in justice.

There have been many generalizations bandied about in this debate and in the newspapers based on emotionalism. I was going to say, male emotionalism, but that would be chauvinism. I note, too, a great reliance on academia. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) hired a man from academia, Professor Ezzat Abdel Fattah, to say what he wanted said in support of his abolition position.

There are a number of competent people in academia; certainly, those who leave the cloistered halls periodically to work in the real world can make judgments based on reality. But too often academia is a retreat for those who dare not grapple with real life: those whose egoes cannot stand the competition of valid expertise born of worldly experience. They dare not leave those cloistered halls lest their dreams be shattered by life's truths. They would rather collect government money to write "learned papers", for which the only source material is usually provided by students learning to research. Usually, the work is a series of footnote fantasies. They rewrite other theories which, too often, are footnotes from the writings of others who theorize but who are maintaining tenure in accordance with the university syndrome, publish or perish. Perhaps it would be better for society if their academic contributions did perish. I would not waste any more time analysing that ridiculous document produced by Professor Fattah than I would analysing the sort of person who produces such nonsense.

There is another incident to which I must refer, another attempt by the Solicitor General to distort facts so as to make his point. Mr. Speaker, it was necessary for the Solicitor General to demolish a major study of an economist well known in this country and in the United States, Isaac Ehrlich, in order to sustain the abolitionist claim that the death penalty is not a deterrent. Ehrlich examined documents covering some 36 years. On the basis of data pertaining to the period 1933 to 1969, he was able to claim that each execution prevented either seven or eight murders. Some say he has stated that some executions prevented as many as 17 murders. That is a pretty significant deterrent argument. But I gather it does not convince the abolitionists.

The Solicitor General hired one Robert G. Hann, a lecturer and principal of Decision Dynamics Corporation of Toronto, whatever that is. Who knows Hann, and what is Decision Dynamics? I never heard of Hann in the west; perhaps he is known in the east; I do not know. Why should anyone take seriously his report, an instant report assigned to contradict information compiled by Ehrlich in his study? Obviously, it was intended to demolish obstacles raised in this debate aimed at abolition. As retentionists, we are challenged to prove that capital punishment is a deterrent. I have already given proof through statements from the mouths of would-be killers. They admitted they were deterred from committing murder when the death penalty existed but would act quite differently now that there is abolition. No one took me very seriously because they are still mouthing their platitudes. With all the research facilities available to hon. members, this documentation can be found to prove that capital punishment is a deterrent. I also pointed out that where murder is deterred, there cannot be comprehensive statistics. Most members here must have, at least, elementary education; they learned that ten times zero is still zero. Therefore, if it is a zero, you will not have a valid statistic.

● (1140)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), whom I consider to be the most brilliant member of this House, even though he is a refuge from academe, had a worldly experience to offset the cocoon intellect of many who hide in the cloistered halls. In his abolitionist speech of June 15, he said:

> Strictly speaking, therefore, it is not up to me, as an abolitionist, to prove that the execution of murderers will not prevent other murders. It is up to the advocates of capital punishment to prove that it will. If they cannot, their case must fail.

Why is it up to us? We are not the ones who are changing the law, imposing a dangerous unproven experiment on the public. We are not the ones fighting for a weakening of the law, diminishing the protection of the public. We are not in the minority of this nation as are those who are fighting for abolition. We share with the majority, a majority which knows the society in which we live has become angry, the knowledge that death is occurring that would not occur if there were strength in the law. However, since the Prime Minister and others appear not to have noticed the examples given by many members of the deterrent effect of capital punishment, I will provide a few more, and if necessary reiterate some previously given.

First, there is the case of Charles David Garry. Head, age 30, who murdered the seven year old daughter of a British Columbia penitentiary guard, a constituent of mine. He raped the child, Tanya Bush, in every perverted way, assaulted her and then murdered her. His words—and if this is not a message I do not know what is—were "If I kill the father I swing: if I kill his daughter I get nothing more than what I'm serving." Therefore, a child who could not defend herself died. The guard, who was protected by the law, survived. There might not have been another murder because the guard would have been stronger than his daughter and possibly could halt this murder. The little girl could not. No deterrent, hon. members?

Leonard Peletier, the American Indian who killed two FBI agents in the United States and was arrested in Calgary, has been carrying on a relentless battle against extradition in Vancouver. He knows he faces execution for his crime in his country. It is known that he is prepared to kill a Canadian, probably a guard, rather than be returned to the United States where he can die. He knows in Canada he can remain in prison and live, perhaps take a hostage or two, kill someone and escape. It would not matter if he killed two or three people; he would get exactly the same punishment. No deterrent, hon. members?

John Waslynchuk, the aristocrat of bank robbers and safe crackers in the west for many years, gave me insights into prison and crime from his knowledge and experience. Most of this was after I was involved with two police officers in collecting evidence that proved he was innocent in a capital murder case in Seattle, Washington, a bank robbery murder. He was not there at the time and we were able to prove it. Though close to the gallows himself, but reformed by the experience, he still maintained after modified abolition was introduced here in 1968, that if he were still in "business" he would shoot his pursuer or any witness because he could be sentenced to the same time in prison for murder as for armed robbery. It did not matter if it was 14 or 20 years. To him, it was life. What is the difference, he said to me. He told me, "There are advantages to killing". He and one of his associates told me the advantages of killing were so obvious that they wondered why those who abolished capital punishment did not see them. There is the gamble of escape, the elimination of witnesses who could identify them and give evidence against them in a trial. No deterrent, hon. members?

Incidentally, the word in Vancouver is that all witnesses in major cases, cases where long sentences are inevitable, will be put on contract for murder. Can you see what will happen to justice? What citizen or police officer will take the risk to do their civic duty in a court of law? Warnings have gone out to the B.C. Penitentiary task force who were assigned to a terrible responsibility in the hostage incident of June 11, 1975 in which Mary Steinhauser died. They were absolved of blame in that incident by a coroner's jury last week. An NDP member attacked the guards and claimed in this House, without even studying the facts, that the guards had killed her. The coroners' jury found that the killer, Andy Bruce—a man who had already killed on contract—was responsible for Miss Steinhauser's death. He had participated in four hostage takings. He was held responsible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mrs. Holt: No, it was the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). I would like to remind the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and all the others who deny the deterrent quality of the death penalty of a case that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) would probably have used in her speech as a retentionist had she been able to participate here. She was the one who told me the background on Leopold Dion. After he and his brother raped a girl in Quebec in 1940, he started to strangle the victim to death. His brother shouted: "If you kill her, Leo, you will hang." Leopold loosened his grip. The girl survived. She no doubt gave the evidence that convicted him.

Paroled in 1960, Leopold picked up four small boys aged about nine to 13, and one at a time assaulted them and forced them to their knees to pray before he murdered them. He was convicted of murder, his sentence commuted by cabinet, and his execution was carried out by the inmates of St. Vincent de Paul. But I suppose such executions are acceptable to the abolitionists, as long as the state does not do it, as if the state is not responsible. I am sure the original victim of Leopold Dion would tell you that capital punishment was the deterrent that saved her life.

By 1971-1972 police murderers and guard murderers were pretty sure they would never hang for their crime. Certainly by 1974 it was an absolute certainty. Thus, John Miller, 29, and Vincent Cockreill, 19, could feel secure in their plan to kill a policeman—any policeman. On March 29, 1974, RCMP Constable Roger Pierlett, 23, was ensnared by them in their plan for the senseless execution of a cop. The next day he was to celebrate his engagement. His parents, flying west from Montreal for the occasion, found him on a slab in the morgue. His assassins were protected by the law from the same fate. Roger's older brother, Luke, 29, who at the time did not know whether he was an abolitionist or not, recently said, referring to his brother's killers:

> I am not bitter against them as persons. I don't even know them. But they should hang for the deed they did. When two men can kill a complete stranger, I maintain this behaviour is undermining our whole moral fabric. What the government is doing is giving everyone a licence to kill. They are devaluating the price of everybody's life.

I list these facts because abolitionists say that capital punishment is no deterrent. Somebody will no doubt be saying we shall have to mop up the floor of the House again. But I do not mind a little compassion being shown in this chamber.

Then there is the case of Rainier Peter Schuenemann, 27, who kidnapped Mrs Margaret Siborne, 53, on May 1, 1976. He left her in the woods to die, bound, gaged and tied to a tree, while he attempted to extort money from her husband. When picked up by the police, Schuenemann said:

> I'm a dead man. The woman in the bush for three days without food or water must be dead.

Told Mrs. Siborne was alive, that she had escaped her bonds, the prisoner fell to his knees with his hands over his face and wept uncontrollably, according to witnesses at his trial. He knew that the only person who could identify him had survived to give evidence against him. He knew he would get the same sentence if she had died. But in that event there was a chance that no witness would appear against him and he might thus have escaped conviction.

We are speaking of deterrence. Since there is de facto abolition in Canada, perhaps the price demanded for murder in Vancouver today will tell us something about the usefulness of the ultimate penalty as a deterrent. Life is very cheap in Vancouver today. In the 1950s and early 1960s when murder could bring the death penalty, the price of a contract to murder ran anywhere from $2,500 to $25,000. Today it is $50 to $500. Indeed, paid killings are now child's play since it is easy and the penalties are not too severe for hardened criminals to contemplate. Most killers are certain they can get away with it anyway.

Members may be interested to learn that a 10 year-old boy has built up a sophisticated crime gang among peers in Vancouver. He has formed a crime ring, organizing it in a way few older people could have done, and has advertised through the underworld that his gang is prepared to accept contracts to kill. A sidelight to this story is that social workers and civil libertarians, many of whom favour abolition, are upset that in the course of investigating the numerous crimes of this "child Fagin" the police decided to take his fingerprints.

Ernest Von Den Haag in his book "Punishing the Criminal"—and I wonder why the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) did not assign a local to debunk this work—said:

> Life becomes cheaper as we become kinder to those who take it. The burden of proof should be on those who oppose the death penalty, not on those who favour it . . . for say the death penalty does not deter; all we have lost in exacting it is the life of a convicted killer. But if the death penalty does deter, then by refusing to impose it we have consigned to death some future innocent victim.

In refutation of those who maintain capital punishment is not a deterrent, I can produce statements by the very people who use murder as a tool in crime—evidence which the abolitionists could find themselves with a bit of effort. How many times have hon. members read or known personally of cases where the robber got the loot he had come for, but killed anyhow? There was such a case in Burnaby, B.C., in the past week. Three brothers ordered a young clerk to lie face down on the floor while they carried out their crime. They robbed the company, Lumberland, and then they shot the young man in cold blood. They got what they wanted, but the slaying could add little to their penalty if they were caught; it was a gamble, and the murder was an outlet for their brutality.

I could give further proof of the deterrent value of capital punishment, but at the moment I will simply refer hon. members to other evidence which I have put on record in previous speeches. I challenge those who say it is not a deterrent, to prove their case. The onus is on them, not on the majority of Canadians. To quote Von Den Haag:

> If the death penalty does deter, by refusing to impose it we have consigned to death some future innocent victim.

Apropos the dialogue on the deterrent effect, the day after the vote was taken on the second reading of Bill C-84, inmates in B.C. jails and in the B.C. penitentiary were jeering at the guards, shouting such things as, "You lost, we won." Some were saying, "Our quota: one cop a day, one guard a day," or "Careful, pig; we can slash your throat." One particularly violent inmate expressed himself in this way, "Careful, pig; we can slash your throat; we have nothing to lose. You had better start taking Dale Carnegie courses to improve your attitude, because we can cut your throat."

In addition, there were two attempts in recent weeks to take hostages. These, I presume, are now barely noticed in the B.C. penitentiary because they have become so commonplace. The technique in one case was to start a mattress fire in order to lure one or more guards into the cell. This method was used in an American prison last week and it ended in death for four people. We were more fortunate in B.C. because the penitentiary guards there have greater experience. They fought the fire from outside the cell and the inmates got the smoke, not the hostage they had expected.

Let me turn to another aspect of this proposal. I find it remarkable that no serious contingency plan has been prepared to take into account the instant effect of the passage into law of Bill C-84 which provides for 25 years' imprisonment, without hope, for those convicted of first-degree murder, and 15 years—possibly 10 or 20 years—without hope, for those found guilty of second-degree murder. To my mind, this trade-off for abolition is inhuman in its effects both on inmates and the staff. Perhaps the army is being prepared to enter our prisons and assist in dealing with the explosive situation there.

What is likely to happen is that we will return to the medieval practice, dropped 15 years ago, of caging men in tight security locking them in their cells for as long as 22 or 23 hours a day, and put an end to programs which might have rehabilitated a few of them? We are already seeing the abandonment of the practice of issuing day passes to prisoners with possibilities of rehabilitation, brought to an end because of careless handling of this valuable technique for rehabilitation. Yet the only real protection society has is the prospect that convicted criminals will return to the streets better than when they were sentenced, not worse, as is the case after long imprisonment with poor treatment services.

A number of abolitionists resort to the specious, yes, childish whimper, "If you favour capital punishment, you should be prepared to spring the trap." Mr. Speaker, by the same reasoning, those who would abolish it should become guards to look after desperate killers who have nothing to lose if they kill again in the course of a 25-year sentence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: There are other stock lines which are used ad nauseam. One is that the death penalty is simply legalized murder. Mr. Speaker, that is as stupid as it would be to suggest that arrest and imprisonment are nothing more than legalized kidnapping or legalized slavery.

I agree with Von Den Haag that the application of the death penalty to those guilty of premeditated killing is the mark of a society which holds dear the life of its citizens. It is the society which holds life cheap which imposes weak penalties for taking life.

There is another point that must be raised in this debate, and that is that those who attempt murder, intend to kill. When statistics are used in this debate, few recognize the significant fact that there is a large statistic of people who fail in their attempt to murder, though they may succeed in maiming or injuring their victims for life. Take the case of the UBC and Florida criminologist, Dr. Charles Eichman, 38, who beat his wife Cora, 48, almost to death. She had a good life ahead of her, having completed her education to the Ph. D. level in education. She had a considerable amount to contribute. She now lies in an institution in Regina. This was not murder, but partial murder, because in this institution she is unable to do anything for herself. She cannot even think. They use the word "vegetable". Eichman was given a ten-year sentence, and if when he comes out he succeeds in a subsequent murder attempt, this will be regarded as his first murder. When he comes out he will be the better prepared to finish the job because of the lessons he will have learned in prison.

There are two reasons why attempted murder is not murder. The first is because the killer was a bad shot, or did the job badly. The second is that medicine was too good; it saved the life. Attempted murders have quadrupled in Vancouver since modified capital punishment came into effect in 1968. In Canada it has more than doubled. Montreal statistics and general reports indicate that murder and attempted murder has increased as much as or more than in Vancouver.

Candy Knowles, 16, a constituent of mine who lived only a few blocks from my office, died at the hands of a man who once served time for attempted murder. This man's name is Edward Donald Bigelaie. He shot his girlfriend and knifed himself in Toronto in 1960. The girlfriend did not die that time. After 11 years in prison he was released on a pass and never returned. In Vancouver, as Mile Lewis, about age 30, he dated Candy Knowles. The girl's former boyfriend, a postman, was threatened by Lewis but wrote it off as idle talk. Something happened to stop the murder—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but her allotted time has expired. She may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Holt: On September 20, 1974, the man who had attempted murder in Toronto succeeded in his second attempt. Candy Knowles bled to death from six bullets that he fired into her. Her cries for help were unheeded by people passing by.

The remarkable speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which influenced so many members of this House, requires answering. He accuses the retentionists of engaging in "specious philosophy" in discussing the fact that if capital punishment saves one innocent life, it is worth while. He called it "compelling rhetoric". However, he set it aside because of a fatal flaw, namely, that we would be experimenting with human lives.

So much that the Prime Minister said in his speech could have been said by the retentionists. What he said could more appropriately apply to the abolitionist philosophy and I repeat it in that light. It is compelling rhetoric, but it contains a fatal flaw, namely, that the abolitionists in this House who want to remove the final and ultimate punishment would be experimenting with human lives. I repeat, the abolitionists, not the retentionists, are experimenting with human lives.

As for the concern of the Prime Minister over a society that adopts vengeance as an acceptable motive for its collective behaviour, is it vengeance any more than any other punishment, or is it strong and equal justice for the most horrible crime possible, that of taking—without right or law—the life of another human being? And what about the collective behaviour for which the state must be held responsible, that of allowing execution by the underworld to continue unabated without any threat to their own style of justice, by police who know that the state is no longer willing to protect them, by inmates in prison, by guards and by citizens who believe that the state's machinery has faltered and broken down? What about that collective behaviour?

The abolitionists constantly ask the question: What civilized country still uses capital punishment? I ask them, what civilized country does what Bill C-84 will do—lock men up for 25 years without hope other than escape through hostage-taking? As reported at page 14500 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had this to say:

—it is inevitable that the defeat of this would eventually place the hangman's noose around some person's neck.

If I am willing to take on my conscience the execution of police killers and those who commit deliberate murders, I am quite satisfied, if I vote as all of you vote, that I am taking the responsibility for my vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: But the abolitionists must also take responsibility, especially those who voted in 1968 and 1972, for saving the lives of sadists. Take the example of three ruthless killers who seized hostages in the B.C. penitentiary incident that ended in the death of Mary Steinhauser and the mental breakdown of at least two prison workers. Because of those votes, these three lived to kill another day. They are Andrew Bruce, a paid contract killer, Dwight Lucas, who planned and carried out an axe murder on the prairies and was the one who for 41 hours held a knife tip in the eye and at the throat of John Ryan, who is now mentally ill, and junkie killer Clair Wilson who, after his conviction, stabbed a sheriff who was guarding him. I think that the abolitionists must accept responsibility for the conduct of these three people.

If the abolitionists win this week in this major vote, the public, which no doubt will feel that their wishes have been treated with contempt, will have their say in the next major vote. Let us hope that the sanction to kill that will be given by this House will not allow the hoodlums to move beyond control before the mistake that the majority vote of this House could be making this week is corrected. I urge hon. members at least to study the points that many of us have made in support of the retention of capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak following the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), whose speech was one of the better ones that we have heard in this debate. I have been in touch with this debate right from the beginning of second reading and all through committee stage, and have spoken a little over three hours in total, so I am not going to take long on this third reading stage. Most of the cases that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway brought up are good examples of why I am a retentionist, though I was an abolitionist at one time. Having heard some of the cases that the hon. member referred to, I think a lot of people will, or should, show consideration for change.

One of the points that I want to bring up in this final stage of debate concerns the method of capital punishment that is used today. I think this is one of the reasons some people in this country are still opposed to capital punishment. All through this debate, every time the CBC, CTV or any newspaper carried a major story on capital punishment they showed a rope and noose and talked about how cruel was that aspect of capital punishment.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that some day there will be a return to capital punishment in this country, but I hope that the next time we have to debate this subject we will decide on a more humane form of capital punishment before the debate begins which would remove the situation where everyone who is a retentionist is called a hanger. Other methods of capital punishment can be used, and personally I think the gas chamber is a much better form. Had that method been in effect in Canada, I do not think some of the comments that have been made would have been made. I think the way the press reported the method of capital punishment that is used was irresponsible.

I should like to quote a couple of articles that were sent to me. During this debate all members of parliament have received a lot of mail, and I am no exception; but I have a couple of items that I think are very appropriate. One of them was sent to me by a constituent in my own riding of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and is about the government's attitude toward capital punishment. I was sent this copy of an editorial which appeared in our local paper, and I should like to read it. It states:

● (1210)

Morally, intellectually and psychologically there is a glaring irrational streak in the federal government's attitude toward the sanctity of human life.

The Trudeau cabinet is committed—some of its members emotionally so—to the total abolition of capital punishment. Yet it not only condones but actively encourages an enterprise which can endanger the lives of millions.

That enterprise, of course, is the peddling of CANDU nuclear reactors to unstable nations.

There has been ample evidence, including India's behaviour, of the dangers inherent in CANDU sales. Now from the U.S. energy research and development administration comes a terrifying report.

A study completed for that body six months ago, but only just made public, says that, based on the output from just half the reactors that the International Atomic Energy Agency has projected would be sold to the less developed nations in the next 15 years, "the annual production of plutonium in terms of minimum bomb equivalents is truly staggering." The 46 countries studied, according to the survey, "could annually produce some 15,100 kilograms (33,022 pounds) of plutonium by 1990—enough to produce 3,002 small nuclear explosives."

In the face of this, continuing CANDU sales to unstable countries like Argentina is to bury our heads in the sands of balance sheets.

It makes a mockery of the government's cliché-ridden expressions of concern for the human predicament.

That is the concern of many of my constituents. I wanted to point that out to the House because I think it is very appropriate at this time. I received another letter, from a young lady in Quebec, which I was not even sure I should read into the record. It is a sad type of letter, but I did check it out and I think I should read it because it is very important, particularly if we are to talk about one of the things that I consider important, that is, what happens to the victims of crime. I am very saddened that even before we got into this debate the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) did not introduce something to this House which would tell us what he and his government plan to do for victims of crime. With the type of easy-going attitude which this government has adopted in respect of law and order, I think we are going to see an increase in crime in this country. I am sure we will see that increase in the next few years. What is this government going to do for the victims of crime?

Let me read the House this letter to show what can happen to families as a result of these tragic happenings that occur from time to time. It reads:

Dear John Reynolds:

I am 15 years, and cannot wait to be 18 years old so that I will be able to vote, (that is if I make it to that age). And when, and if I ever get a chance I will make sure the person who I vote for is a retentionist like you. And many of my friends intend to do the same. When we are teenagers, people ignore our opinions, but soon we will be the future voters. You see, sir, since last year our whole family's life has changed. My mother has been in the hospital, under psychiatric care. She is out of the hospital now, but still has to take many pills. She cries all the time, and sleeps with a knife under her pillow; she also bought a gun, just in case someone breaks in. My twin sister and I are afraid to go to the store alone, or even to the bank. It is terrible to be afraid, but our family has a good reason to be, because last year my 16 year-old sister, Sharron, went to the store and never came back. She was kidnapped, raped and murdered. And that was at 7 p.m. on a Saturday. I was taught to love and trust, but now I trust no one, not even the government.

Doreen Prior.

It is in cases like this about which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has expressed the fear that some of these sick individuals are getting out of prison and doing it again. In one case that she mentioned this did occur, and there have been a number of others. For that reason alone, I think capital punishment has a place in our society at this time. For this reason I emphasize the question as to what the Solicitor General and his government intend to do to protect the victims of crime. Certainly, these people are not being protected at all at this time, yet the persons who are guilty of such crimes under the law that has been in force could be out again in seven years and back on the streets with very little to worry about. I do not think these other people will ever again lead normal lives.

Let me also ask the Solicitor General about the intended review of our penal system. When is he going to put a program before us that will solve the problems that occur in places like the British Columbia penitentiary and Millhaven? We have not seen that program, yet we are being asked to abolish capital punishment. When is the Solicitor General going to bring before this House a program in respect of juvenile crime? The Solicitor General might well say that he does have a book out called "Youth in Conflict with the Law" that is being discussed across the country. That is true, but why can this program not be considered as quickly as the measure to abolish capital punishment? I do not think the priorities of the Solicitor General's department are appropriate.

One of the major problems in this country is associated with juvenile crime. Certainly, in my own area we have taken an active part, with the Solicitor General's department, in respect of this specific problem. I have attended a number of meetings of interested parties. In fact, we are now having meetings on a bi-weekly basis. These meetings are attended by my constituency secretary when I am unable to attend. The people in the area are trying to come up with solutions to the problem of the juvenile crime rate there. I must admit that there is no money available, but the people and the programs are available to solve the problem. Yet here we are abolishing capital punishment, spending a lot of time in this House on the one thing that would probably result in a very small number of people being put to death over the years.

I think the Solicitor General owes it to the country, before this vote is taken on Wednesday, to take some time to come up with his priorities, to tell us what he intends to do in respect of penitentiaries in this country, and to solve the juvenile problem across the land. None of us expects a utopia, and we know the Solicitor General is unable to solve all the problems; but we would certainly like to see a blueprint of a plan the Solicitor General might possibly have to cut down on the number of problems that lead to the existence of some of these vicious people about whom we are talking.

I would like to finish by talking for a minute or two about the vote to be taken on Wednesday. I hope all members of this House will be here for this vote. I know a lot of people are saying that the whole issue has been decided and maybe they should not come back. We heard that from a number of sources over the weekend. Let me point out the closeness of the vote on second reading and the fact that since then we know the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) has indicated he is switching his vote. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) also indicated on the weekend that he is switching his vote. If you add to that the two gentlemen who are retentionists who could not make it for the last vote due to unforeseen circumstances, such as the airline strike, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), that brings us to within two votes.

In view of rumours that others in the House intend to switch their vote, I hope every member will see fit to be here to exercise the responsibility of voting on Wednesday, because I would not like to see an issue that is so close, an issue that has so divided this country—for which we must blame the government—won or lost by one or two votes, with one or two members not present in the House.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, we are now getting down to the time when we will finally have to make a decision on this very important issue. My great concern—and I will be very brief—is for the feelings of the people in the riding of Middlesex-London-Lambton and, I believe, of the people throughout Canada. I had a very disturbing phone call this morning from one of the teachers in our local high school. She said, "Larry, I took a poll of our grade 13 class with regard to capital punishment, and I am afraid it is going to be quite a shock when you find out exactly what the consensus is, and the percentage." I asked her to tell me, because I felt that perhaps some small pocket in my riding would agree with the abolitionists. She said, "Larry, 90 per cent of this grade 13 class agree with the retention of capital punishment."

I believe this is an overwhelming indication of how the people of Canada feel. I thought the 90 per cent figure was too high, but I have also heard 80 per cent and 70 per cent expressed as being in favour of retention. My great concern in this respect is for the people and their viewpoint. During my political life, including my background of 11 years in municipal politics, I have always tried to remember what the people want. I was told many years ago never to forget the people, because they are the ones who put us here and they are the ones who will take us out. If we do not listen to the people, we are in trouble because we are not doing the job we have been put here to do.

I am not endowed with an intellectual background. My background, rather, has been one of hard work, getting things the hard way, sometimes by using my shoulders and arms to a greater extent than my head. It is my belief that the people of this country feel that our basic problems can be related to hard work, and their existence may be the result of a lack thereof. When they look at this parliament and see its members completely disregarding the feelings of the people, they lose confidence; and when people lose confidence in government they lose confidence in the basis of the democratic system—this is, government for the people, by the people, something that is said many times in retort. But in this case, on this bill, in making this important decision we come right down to the crunch that these things can be rhetoric no longer.

Let us get back to the grass roots. If I were an abolitionist I would have no qualms about going back to the people and listening to them. There has been some discussion but it is obvious that the abolitionists have not been listening. I feel that at this time perhaps we should take more time and let the abolitionists talk to their people, get their feelings, not just through the newspapers but directly from the people who elected them. It is important to listen to the people of this country if we are to keep it united. There is always the danger that this great union of ours will be broken up, and I would hate to see that done through this bill. I am sure the abolitionists would be glad to talk to their constituents over the summer. If they believe in abolition, they will come back at the end of the summer and vote for abolition. There is no problem there.

So, Mr. Speaker, I propose a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles):

That all the words after "that" be struck and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day three months hence".

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I considered speaking on third reading prior to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon). My reason was twofold. I will not go into all the pros and cons of abolition and retention put forward in the philosophic debate we have had on Bill C-84 for several weeks. I am one of the members who has been confronted with this question three other times in parliament and, like the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), who in my opinion made a very powerful speech at the third reading stage and mentioned that she had been an abolitionist, in the philosophic sense, prior to her election as a member, I voted the first time on capital punishment in 1968 in favour of abolition, and the second time I voted for a qualified abolition, or retention, depending on how you define that vote.

I believe that perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was more interested and involved in the matter than I was when I was practising law in Vancouver for some years and used to read some of her columns. I must confess that I was not all that involved in the issue before I became a member of parliament, and since then, quite frankly I have been overinvolved in this issue, as has the parliament of Canada, because four times in 11 years this House has debated the issue.

I believe that this issue should have been resolved some time ago. This bill flies right in the face of 70 per cent to 80 per cent of Canadians from coast to coast, and that is one of the reasons I wanted to speak at this time. I do not think this is a normal debate on capital punishment. Before this time we were supposed to be in a trial period, and perhaps Canadians were uncertain as to the conclusions to which such a trial period might bring us, and thus the public, in my opinion, has not been as aroused or irritated and certainly not as frustrated as they are today with Bill C-84 which does not propose a trial period but proposes the total abolition of capital punishment.

We all know that the law until now has been for capital punishment for the murder of prison guards and policemen, yet it has not really been followed, and therefore there has not been a reasonable trial period. In a general sense, that is one of the reasons the Canadian public has been more exercised over the debate on capital punishment this time than at other times. I also think that the Canadian public at large has never been more frustrated, and capital punishment has become the focal point for the frustration of Canadians over a good number of issues, even more than the law and order issue.

It is the feeling of the Canadian public from coast to coast, regardless of their political leanings or beliefs, that the government in Ottawa—that "far away" government if you live in the east or the west, and even sometimes if you live close to Ottawa, geographically—is very far removed from the pulse of the people of Canada. This time it is the feeling of the people that capital punishment is not only symbolic of law and order and the punishment for heinous crimes, but an assurance that law and order will be applied more strictly so that people perhaps will be able to walk on the streets with a greater sense of security.

On this occasion, because of the circumstances in which the country finds itself, capital punishment has become the focal point of people's frustrations on a good number of issues. I will not name them all, but if you pick up the paper you read about air traffic controllers, the Olympics, the unemployment insurance fund, almost any other issue which makes headlines in the papers. There is a feeling among people that the government which they elected is so far out of the mainstream on an issue with which they can identify as much as the member they elected, namely, capital punishment, that, ipso facto, the government must be out of the mainstream and out of touch on other issues.

We have heard the views of members from both sides of this issue, but certainly those favouring abolition, justify their position by saying that this is a free vote, a matter of individual conscience. What has always bothered me about this type of reasoning—the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway certainly met head-on a couple of the specious arguments of the abolitionists against the retentionists, such as, "Will you pull the trap?" and in some cases which I know about, I think I could pull the trap—is that it is the same type as that which says, "Let the abolitionists go to prison or walk the streets at night with a policeman." What she said about legalized execution, if you believe in retention, was a good argument in rebuttal. If you believe that retention is legalized killing, then it can be said that if you arrest someone and put him in jail where he will be making baskets, you are in favour of legalized kidnapping and slavery. This is how ridiculous these arguments have become.

Let us come back to the individual conscience. I do not know whether the motion of the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton will pass and there will be a summer lull in the debate—the realities of numbers may prevent that happening—but I know members of parliament who over the July 1 long weekend deliberately did not go home to their ridings because they did not want to encounter, during the July festivities, a public which was not so favourably disposed to their vote in favour of abolition. Well, I went home.

Mr. Boulanger: Name them.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to name them.

Mr. Boulanger: I do not think what you say is the truth.

Mr. Nowlan: You are entitled to believe what you believe. I can tell you what I know.

Mr. Boulanger: Prove it.

Mr. Nowlan: I know my hon. friend very well, and respect him. He has a conscience, and I have a conscience; but the constituents who sent us here also have consciences and I have been bemused, even though it is rather serious, by the fact that the individual conscience of hon. members dominates the collective conscience of their constituents. As hon. members who have spoken on this matter, certainly from the retentionist point of view, have said, rarely has there been an issue where the collective conscience, reasoning or verbal expression of constituents from coast to coast, regardless of whether they are Liberal, Conservative or NDP, has been as clear as on this issue. Never has it been as clear, although every hon. member will say something else. Instinctively, I do not think they are right, although I cannot prove my case from statistics or figures.

The abolitionists certainly cannot prove their case from statistics or figures, no matter how preconceived some of the studies have been on this issue. We should not try to confuse the Canadian public with statistics, facts and figures, legal reasoning or logic to which they could be exposed only if they came before the justice committee or heard some of the lucid arguments put forward on the floor of this House. We all know that on this issue, that type of logical assessment of facts and figures just does not apply and it does come down to an individual conscience situation.

I said that it bemused me to hear hon. members, albeit sincerely, stand up for their individual consciences, and I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that this is not the day and age of Edmund Burke, who wrote a letter to the electors of Bristol to tell them that he stood, not just for the people of Bristol but for all the people of England. Hon. members who referred to that quotation failed to point out that he was not elected at the next election.

I agree that hon. members must lead on public issues, but it is a paradox, to me, that when in this House we say we have a free vote and there will not be pressure applied by the government to lead government members—and we had a good example today of two government members who spoke out for retention—we are nevertheless deliberately defying the larger context of the collective conscience of Canadians by voting for this bill. I just cannot rationalize that paradox. If it is good enough for hon. members to vote according to their individual consciences in a free vote, why are we ignoring the collective conscience as expressed in the polls and by the people who have written to us? I defy any hon. member, including my hon. friend, to say to me that his correspondence has been heavily in favour of abolition. I would say, conservatively, that it is the other way around. It certainly has been for me.

In any event, this will become a focal point of alienation and the people will feel more removed from the government. I say "government" in generic terms; I mean the government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). If things keep going this way, we will obviously have a government of another kind when we have another election. However, this issue has become a focal point of alienation, and if Bill C-84 carries by this type of vote, that alienation will be increased. It is a paradox that the individual conscience of hon. members reigns supreme because they are members, but they deny the collective conscience of their constituents who sent them here. Some of those hon. members who are abolitionists are my best friends, but I sincerely believe this will not be like the other capital punishment debates and the public will not forget, because it has become a focal point of alienation. I do not think the public will forget about this, because they will continue to feel alienated.

This is not the final time the question of abolition will be before us. It will be before us every time a policeman makes a raid on a house and a suspect is shot. That will bring the issue back through the newspapers and the question will be asked: Did the shooting occur because the policeman knew that if the suspect ended up with the protection of the judicial process, he would never pay the supreme penalty anyway? Thus the policeman may decide who should live and who should not live. That is a horrible thing, no matter how sincerely motivated the officer may be. A colleague of his might have been shot to death, but there is no way that type of thing should be substituted for the judicial process. If we have policemen and, more especially, prison guards in the next two years before an election ending up dead in prisons or on the streets, that will reactivate this issue, and it will not go away if a one-time killer, as has been demonstrated here in debate—and I am not going to review all the cases—kills again.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway did not mention the case which switched me, but it happened in British Columbia. I refer to the case of the two-time killer who killed a third time, in that case a little girl. That finally switched me, because in my opinion the pendulum has swung too far in redress for the accused and not protection for society. I think that was the fundamental reason.

I can argue the sanctity of life philosophically, on either side of the coin, but other than in the Evans' case in England back in the 1950s, a known case in the Commonwealth of a man convicted of murder, put to death and then later proved to be innocent, hon. members cannot use the argument of wrongful execution. That may have happened in the judicial system before the Second World War or immediately afterward, but the sad thing which has happened is that abolitionists keep saying that we do not want to make a permanent mistake by putting to death someone who cannot afterwards be resurrected.

On the other side of the coin, since 1961 there have been four cases of one-time killers who have been let out of our prisons or who have not observed weekend passes and killed a second time. I think that for some of these reasons this issue will stay alive and hon. members will have to be prepared to live with it.

In conclusion, there is a funny paradox—not funny "ha, ha", but funny "sad, sad"—that while this House was voting on one of the amendments the other night as to whether there should be capital punishment for the murderers of prison guards or policemen, or whether there should be capital punishment for acts of terrorism or insurrection against the Queen, the Israeli cabinet, which is one of the most liberal in terms of small "l" governments in the world, and which created a country almost out of the ashes of many millions of their race, whilst still believing in the sanctity of life is seriously considering exacting capital punishment on convicted terrorists where lives have been lost. They are not necessarily arguing the sanctity of life; they have argued that and have lived through it.

The state of Israel was created after millions of Jews were hideously brutalized and had gone to gas chambers. They are not debating the sanctity of life, but they do not want to be put into a position which we have witnessed from afar. That is what makes it so easy for some of us to debate philosophically this issue; we really have not been confronted with some of the realities of the world. Nor do they want to be placed in the Uganda situation again, where 43 convicted terrorists were held within their jails. Whether they were all terrorists who had killed, or whether they were all crimes committed in Israel, I am not sure. They do not want to get into the position again of having hijackers keeping citizens of their country as hostages in exchange for the transfer and release of convicted terrorists who have killed citizens of that state. It is an interesting paradox that we, in the abstract, not having gone through the pain of birth that that state has and the agonies of so many of its citizens, can sit here and have this philosophical debate. That state which has lived through hell, and grew up through the smoke of hell, is thinking of bringing back capital punishment for that kind of crime.

Mr. Speaker, I have been on both sides of this issue, but this time when I vote against Bill C-84 it will be with more conviction than I have ever had before. I believe fundamentally in the potential of the ultimate penalty for the ultimate crime. It is not likely that any prime minister is going to sign the paper, figuratively speaking, for capital punishment on the first occasion, should the bill be defeated. In the mood of this country, it would have to be a heinous crime, with no extenuating circumstances, for the penalty of capital punishment to be exacted, but the fact that it was on the books might set a standard for a stricter administration of justice.

I do not want to digress, Mr. Speaker, and I should end right there, but I am confronted with a problem. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) mentioned that hon. members should be present on Wednesday for the vote on third reading, which I suspect may be a closer vote than some of the others would indicate. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday Her Majesty is going to be in my home town at two o'clock in the afternoon when the vote is to be taken. I may resolve the conflict if I can be paired with a fervent abolitionist who will also be away. But I might very well be here, because I am rather irritated and I believe that the people of Annapolis Valley have been insulted by some of the arrangements made for the royal tour. Due to sloppy planning at the least, or to petty politics at the most, on the part of those making the arrangements, which I believe to be the premier's office in Halifax, but they must have been advised by Ottawa—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member return to the terms of Bill C-84.

Mr. Nowlan: My remarks are relevant, Mr. Speaker. I am explaining why I might well not be here on Wednesday. On the other hand, the reason I may be here is that I am so irritated and the people of the Annapolis Valley are so insulted by the arrangements which may be due to sloppy planning or petty politics. According to protocol, a member of the House of Commons ranks ahead of even a provincial cabinet minister. Yet I have not been invited to one of the functions taking place on the day Her Majesty visits my riding. I have only been invited to a luncheon because I am a member of the board of governors of Acadia University. This is the fault of the provincial government in Halifax, unless I can move around from Greenwood to Wolfville to Windsor and be there when she visits the premier's home town. There is no reason why I, as the member for Annapolis Valley, who ranks ahead of an MLA, the mayors and other elected officials, should not have an opportunity to be present when Her Majesty visits, rather than to be at table No. 10 at a luncheon with several hundred other people.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta that this issue will not go away even though we are coming to what is supposed to be the final vote. Members of parliament are going to live with this vote and the issue will come back to the House of Commons on another day. I certainly believe that several members, partly as a result of their votes, will not come back to this House one day.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in this debate as one of the few who has abstained from speaking on the bill so far and yet has listened to all the speeches given on the matter.

Miss Bégin: Poor you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The abolitionists have not changed my mind with the weak arguments they have brought forward. I feel it is important to place on the record that on second reading and report stage I voted as a retentionist, as I shall vote again on third reading. I am prompted to speak by the remarks made by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) in his speech on June 15. As reported at page 14497 of Hansard, he said:

> Our constituents do not have the time to weigh the evidence and consider the arguments. They are preoccupied on a day-to-day basis with earning their livelihood. That is their serious, immediate and pressing concern. They do not have the opportunity that we in this chamber have to look at the evidence and listen to each other in order to formulate a final opinion. We, therefore, must make the decision. As elected members of parliament, we must take the consequences, not only on capital punishment but on all other issues.

I was rather surprised at that, Mr. Speaker. I would answer the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that at least my constituents are human beings with souls, intelligence and compassion. They know what is going on in Ottawa and around the country, and they can make up their own minds. Surely to goodness, if any member of parliament assumes that constituents cannot make up their minds on matters as serious as the death penalty, or in fact any other matter, there is something wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The people of my constituency are good living, honest people. They are concerned with the subject of capital punishment. I feel they are as smart as any member of this House, and as capable of making a rational decision. The volume of correspondence that I have received indicates this very clearly. Yet they do not always necessarily vote along party lines.

● (1250)

To answer the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, let me tell him that I was committed to the retentionist cause before my election to this House. When I was mayor of my city and chairman of the police commission, I was convinced that capital punishment was a necessity. My decision at that time was not based on whether the majority of Canadian citizens wanted, or did not want, capital punishment. It was based on the experience I had gained in my particular position, and that is still my personal conviction. I was convinced then of the validity and effectiveness of capital punishment, and I have yet to be convinced that there is a better way to deal with certain types of crime.

Some say that the death penalty is immoral. Mr. Speaker, I honestly feel that we commit a greater immorality when we put people in cages for 25 years and treat them like dogs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Nobody calls that immoral.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a living death.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Yes, it is a living death. It is even worse. We know what goes on in this country's penitentiaries. We hear about escapes, about orgies, sex scandals, and so on. Why do we tolerate it? Yet we are to imprison some people for 25 years. I am concerned about the ability of some people to obtain parole or to leave prison.

At least the death penalty has one effect; it protects society from the risk of a second offence committed by the same criminal who, if not executed, may subsequently be released or escape. The death penalty is thus based on the principle of self-defence. Since the death penalty is the only means of eliminating the offender altogether, this penalty is necessary, at least provisionally, when the public peace is endangered by certain particularly dangerous forms of crime.

I say that public opinion remains generally favourable to the retention of the death penalty. The public as a whole, particularly the police and prison officials, believe in its effectiveness. I say that this sincere belief should be respected in its own right, especially since it may be correct. It would be virtually impossible to find another penalty to replace capital punishment. Imprisonment, even for a long time, is inadequate and its effects are minimized by anticipated release. A man sent to jail for 25 years knows he has been given the maximum penalty and knows that he will not receive a greater penalty if he kills a prison guard. Even if he kills a prison guard and is given another 25 years, what is there to prevent his killing another prison guard, and yet another? How many could such a man kill?

Mr. Clarke: One a day.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Has nobody thought of this? Mr. Speaker, I could say much more on the subject, but I will try to limit my remarks. I say that the death penalty would safeguard the police, because in the absence of the death penalty a criminal seeking to avoid arrest would have much less to fear from the consequence of the use of firearms or violence. The punishment inflicted for a grave crime should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens. The ultimate justification of any punishment is not that it deters, but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime. From this point of view, some murders demand the most emphatic denunciation of all, the death penalty. The law should not ignore the public demand for retribution which a heinous crime understandably provokes. Further, it would be dangerous to move too quickly, far in advance of public opinion.

Many abolitionist speakers have recited statistics to prove that the death penalty is not a deterrent. Mr. Speaker, statistics which ordinarily fail to demonstrate the deterrent effect of capital punishment are, for the most part, assembled by people who want to abolish the death penalty. In other words, such statistics are not compiled for the purpose of reaching a conclusion; rather, they are compiled to support a conclusion already reached morally, philosophically or intuitively. Statistics, as we know, are susceptible of different interpretations and are unreliable and misleading. It is almost impossible to draw valid comparisons between different countries, owing to differences in the legal definition of crimes, the practice of the prosecuting authorities and the courts, the methods of compiling criminal statistics, moral standards, customary behaviour and political, social and economic conditions. I submit that life imprisonment is not necessarily less inhumane than the death penalty. In any event, there is no longer any true life sentence in view of our practices regarding parole which I mentioned previously.

Let me draw to the attention of hon. members two instances of crime which occurred in my constituency. The first incident involved constable Shakespeare. He and his partner were patrolling in a police car and answered a call to investigate a break-in which had occurred in their patrol area. One constable ran out and the other stood beside the car and radioed for help. While he was summoning more help on the radio, a criminal who was lurking just around the corner leaned forward and shot him. Constable Shakespeare fell. He was not fatally wounded but was unconscious and bleeding. The other constable did not know this had happened. He ran to the river to try to head-off the other criminal who was running away. The criminal who had shot constable Shakespeare, knowing the other policeman was away from the scene and that the constable was by himself, came up to the police car, kicked the constable who was on the ground to see if he was still alive, looked him in the face, then shot him three times in the face and once in the heart. If that was not deliberate murder, I should like to know what is. As far as I am concerned, criminals like that should hang.

There was another incident in Winnipeg in which constable Houston was killed. He left a widow and family. Nobody now talks about what happened. There are several other crimes in my area which I could mention. We did not find the murderers in those cases. We do not even talk about those events any more. Somebody said we should reassure the police because the worst thing you could do is parole those convicted of murder. I say that abolishing the death penalty will do more harm to the morale of this country's police forces than almost anything you could do.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), a long-time member of this House, say the following:

> I have always believed that when a member of parliament is made aware that a clear majority of those living in his riding hold a strong opinion on an important matter which is before parliament for decision, it is the duty of the member to express that opinion in parliament on behalf of those he represents, and to back up that opinion with his vote.

Mr. Speaker, I shall finish shortly. I say that we should have undertaken a much deeper and serious study with regard to our problems regarding penitentiaries and rehabilitation. This study has not been undertaken. I suggest that if all members of parliament were to vote in accordance with the wishes of their constituents, capital punishment would be retained.

I remind all members of this House that the vote on third reading is to be held on Wednesday at two o'clock. I expect all members of this House to be present in order to vote. I feel that no excuse for absence ought to be tolerated. No member ought to say, "I will not be present in the House for the vote." The people of Canada expect us all to be present. No member should say, in any circumstance, that he cannot be here to vote. No excuses should be accepted. I am sorry that I must say this, but the hon. member speaking before me said he had to meet the Queen and he suggested that as his reason for being absent. Mr. Speaker, the vote to be held next Wednesday is of paramount importance. It is more important to be present for the vote than to attend any ceremony. The vote we shall register will affect all the people of our community. It is on a most serious subject, and every member of parliament should discharge his responsibilities and vote. No member should accept any engagement save that of being here and voting in the manner he or she wishes on Wednesday at two o'clock.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House met at 2 o'clock.

OLYMPIC GAMES

CONDEMNATION OF CANADA'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS PARTICIPATION OF TAIWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I should like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

> That this House voice its thanks to the delegation of the Republic of China at the Montreal Olympic Games for the dignity and generosity it has shown in the imbroglio which occurred between the Canadian government and the International Olympic Committee;
> That this House deplore the fact that the Canadian government has interfered with the international rules of the International Olympic Committee thus introducing political considerations in the field of international olympics and creating a dangerous precedent for the future of the games;
> Finally, that this House extend its apologies to the International Olympic Committee for the way Canada has intervened in its internal administration and has compelled it to meet its requirements, thus jeopardizing the time-honoured principle of the non-political character of international olympic events.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

ELECTIONS

PROPOSAL TO APPOINT RETURNING OFFICERS ON THE BASIS OF MERIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the fact that the government will shortly appoint by order in council returning officers for the 282 constituencies that will exist as a result of redistribution of electoral boundaries in Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

To ensure the conducting of federal elections on a strictly non-political basis that, with the few exceptions where impartial and experienced incumbents may be reappointed, all future appointments of returning officers for each constituency be made on the basis of merit as a result of advertising competitions held by the Public Service Commission of Canada and that the present system be ended where such appointments are again about to be made on a political basis by rewards to party faithful with generous scoops from the Liberal party's pork barrel.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED IMPLEMENTATION OF BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS AT OTTAWA AIRPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Since this House has agreed to the principle of bilingualism and the fact that the Ottawa-Hull area or what is called the National Capital region has a francophone population of over 40 per cent; since the Ottawa airport serves all this region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to set up bilingual air-to-ground communications at the National Capital airport.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED SECRET BALLOT ON THIRD READING OF BILL C-84—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a great majority of Canadians are opposed to, if not outraged at, the outcome of the recent votes on capital punishment, largely because of the fact that a number of members were unable to, and indeed did not, vote as they would have liked—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Neither pursuant to Standing Order 43 nor in any other way is it ever in order to comment upon a vote in the House of Commons. If the hon. member has a motion which he wishes to put, he might put it.

Mr. Jelinek: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I say because of pressure tactics by members of the ministry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That this House dispose with normal voting procedures on the third and final vote on Bill C-84 and that instead a secret ballot vote be applied in order to give all members the opportunity to vote pressure free on this most vital issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRAIL

CONGRATULATIONS TO CITY ON SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in order to perhaps change the tone of the House I should like to inform the House that the city of Trail, which is the home of the world champion hockey team, the Trail Smoke Eaters, twice world champions, in 1939 and 1961, and also home of the largest silver-lead-zinc smelter in the world, whose workers have contributed much to our prosperity, is currently experiencing its 75th anniversary. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That the House of Commons, representing all Canadians, extends congratulations and best wishes to the mayor, and municipal council, and to all the people of Trail, British Columbia, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the incorporation of this industrial and industrious community in south central British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the presentation of the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Having heard the terms of the motion, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON WHETHER ARGENTINA PROHIBITED FROM REPROCESSING SPENT FUEL FROM CANDU REACTOR

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises from an answer he gave on July 6 to my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, in which he indicated that the present safeguard agreement between Argentina and Canada precludes the possibility of Canada taking steps to prevent Argentina from reprocessing spent fuel from the CANDU reactor into pure plutonium. In light of that assertion I should like to draw his attention to Article III paragraph 3 of the Argentina safeguard agreement which states in part:

Nuclear material referred to shall be reprocessed . . . only as may be mutually agreed between the two Parties—

I ask specifically whether this gives Canada an interest and whether Argentina can produce plutonium from the CANDU reactor?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe the quotation the hon. member read supports the answer I gave to that hon. member earlier. I will be happy to look at the text again, and if I have made a mistake I will be ready to acknowledge it.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I raise the question because I think the answer given on July 6 is far from clear. I would ask the minister specifically whether under the safeguard agreement Canada has the right to say to Argentina that it cannot in fact reprocess this, and that Canada is a participant in that decision-making process with the Argentina government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think the words of the agreement justify that conclusion.

Mr. Gillies: In view of press reports and so on which indicate that Argentina does not have that same interpretation, has Canada communicated and made it clear to the government of Argentina that in fact that government cannot reprocess plutonium from the CANDU reactor without the agreement of Canada?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this particular agreement was very closely negotiated over quite a period of time, and I am sure that the Canadian negotiators have made every term abundantly clear to the Argentina side. In respect of this point, which is a very important one, I will again read the agreement to make sure there is no confusion whatsoever. I will do so because it is a vital point.

INQUIRY WHETHER NOTICE RECEIVED ARGENTINA INTENDS TO ESTABLISH PLANT TO PRODUCE PLUTONIUM

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, has the government, this particular minister or his department received any notice as yet from Argentina that it intends to build a reprocessing plant for the reprocessing of pure plutonium in Argentina? Have you received that notice, have you received information, or have you not received it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally received any such information.

POSSIBLE OBLIGATION TO SUPPLY HEAVY WATER TO ARGENTINA—EFFECT ON DOMESTIC NUCLEAR GENERATING CAPACITY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): In view of the impending shortages in the heavy water supply predicted by many authorative sources in the nuclear industry, including close advisers to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, can the minister tell the House whether the agreement with Argentina calls for Canada to supply heavy water for the Cordoba reactor and, if so, does it mean that there will have to be a curtailment of the Canadian domestic generating capacity simply because we will not have the capacity to produce heavy water for both Argentina and our own needs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no recollection that any such obligation is included in the safeguards agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: Did the minister and his advisers consider when the Cordoba agreement was being negotiated, just what the future situation of the heavy water supply will be because there may well be a supply going to Argentina from Canada for this purpose? Does it mean that Canada's own domestic requirement will have to be cut back?

Mr. MacEachen: I will check on this factual point as to whether there is any obligation to provide heavy water to Argentina. I know of no such obligation included in the safeguards agreement. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, may have some other commercial arrangements upon which I would like to check before making a categorical disclaimer that there is any obligation whatsoever. I do not believe there is any such obligation, but I would like to recheck with the minister.

INQUIRY WHETHER SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT PROHIBITS ARGENTINA FROM ESTABLISHING PLANT TO PRODUCE PLUTONIUM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When this matter was being discussed in the House some weeks ago, if I remember correctly the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Argentina already had a small experimental separation plant capable of extracting plutonium from the waste from a CANDU reactor. Has the minister specifically put into the safeguards a provision either that Argentina will dispose of this separation plant or, even further, that it will not purchase or operate one? Are there any specific commitments that there will be no separation equipment in operation in Argentina so as to produce plutonium from waste from the CANDU reactor?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, the safeguards agreement was not intended nor could it apply over the whole field of nuclear operations in Argentina.

REASON GOVERNMENT NOT MAKING ADHERENCE TO NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY CONDITION OF SALE OF CANDU REACTOR

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Surely, it is ridiculous to talk about this being the strongest safeguards agreement in the world if it does not deal with the important question of whether or not a country which has a CANDU reactor can produce plutonium from the radioactive waste, plutonium being the material from which explosives are made. I want to ask the minister, in view of the fact that most countries which are anxious to co-operate in order to stop the proliferation of nuclear arms have signed the non-proliferation treaty, why the government has not insisted that in the case of Argentina, South Korea and indeed Pakistan they must sign and ratify the non-proliferation treaty as one of the conditions for purchasing a CANDU reactor from this country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have not made membership in the non-proliferation treaty an absolute pre-condition.

Miss MacDonald: Why not?

Mr. MacEachen: In the case of the Republic of Korea, with the assistance of other countries and with a good deal of persuasion, we have secured the ratification of the NPT. That has not been the case with countries like Pakistan, for example, which have taken the view that the NPT is a discriminatory instrument. It is, of course, a discriminatory instrument, and for that reason they regard it as objectionable from their point of view. They will not ratify the treaty, even though in our view it ought to be ratified, but we have not made it a pre-condition of doing business with any particular country. What we have done up to the present time is ensure the strongest possible safeguards upon Canadian supplied materials and technology. We have not been able to go beyond that and include the total coverage of nuclear materials in that country.

● (1420)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the government rests its whole case for selling nuclear reactors in some of the troubled spots of the world on the ground that the developing countries are entitled to this technology to meet their particular economic needs and if Canada is prepared to take the risk of selling CANDU reactors, surely these countries should be prepared to play their part in this deal by acceding to a request to sign the non-proliferation treaty and to give firm guarantees that they will not procure separation plants to produce plutonium. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs why Canada should not insist on this, particularly in the case of Argentina, where we are going to lose over $25 million on the deal.

Mr. MacEachen: I have made the situation quite clear already—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —that we have not insisted nor do we intend at the present time to insist, as a precondition, on membership in the non-proliferation treaty because there are legitimate objections which can be taken to that treaty on the grounds of national sovereignty and the existence of discrimination, and the treaty is a discriminatory treaty.

BILINGUALISM

POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTING BILINGUAL AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS AT OTTAWA AIRPORT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Considering that the principle of bilingualism was adopted by the House a few years ago, that the National Capital Region has an airport which is not provided with bilingual air-ground communications, and that this is a bilingual region, since 40 per cent of its population is francophone, could the minister advise the House whether he is considering the development of a bilingual communication system at the Ottawa airport?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has been our intention to proceed with first things first, and that includes the attempts to develop the appropriate procedures for bilingual air traffic services in the province of Quebec, including the Montreal region. We are anticipating doing that. We have no plans in terms of a schedule beyond that, but we have always indicated the distinct possibility that, as we proceed to a conclusion with those steps, we would be examining the Ottawa region to see whether similar service ought to be extended there, in view of its geographic location and also in view of its nature as the national capital. I repeat, however, that we do believe that first things must come first, and that this is a matter which does require a step by step implementation. Therefore, we have been concentrating on introducing bilingual air traffic services in the province of Quebec.

REASON PAKISTAN EXEMPTED FROM DEADLINE FOR RENEGOTIATION OF NUCLEAR SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Given that the government undertook in 1974, at the time it introduced its new safeguard proposals, to renegotiate within one, and now two, years all safeguard agreements with countries receiving Canadian nuclear supplies, can the minister explain why Pakistan was exempted from this deadline for the agreement on upgraded safeguards?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Pakistan has not been exempted from the decision of the government to secure upgraded safeguards. However, the deadline has been extended because of a number of factors, particularly the question of Pakistan wishing to be considered in tandem with India. Pakistan was not prepared to enter into an upgraded safeguards agreement until our decision with respect to India had been taken. That decision having been taken, we are presently proposing a new series of negotiations with Pakistan this month, I believe including, we hope, an upgraded safeguards agreement with that country.

Miss MacDonald: In view of the fact that this is beginning to look more and more like a two nuclear policy, and in view of the obvious reluctance of Pakistan to upgrade their nuclear safeguards agreements, can the minister say how long Canada is prepared to continue supplying nuclear material to Pakistan without having obtained an upgraded agreement?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As long as there is a buck in it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are presently providing materials to Pakistan under previously arranged agreements. At the present time Pakistan has not been in default of any agreement it had previously concluded with Canada. That ought to be made very clear. What we are seeking is an upgrading of agreements with Pakistan. The hon. lady should not insinuate in her question that in some way Pakistan has been in default. It may be that the stringent proposals we will put before Pakistan will prove to be too onerous for that government, and at that point we will have to consider what we will do by way of further co-operation with Pakistan.

POSITION OF PAKISTAN ON NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION AGREEMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It is more than four months since the Prime Minister stated in this House that he could not give the House any assurance that Pakistan would change its position on the NPT, can the minister report now if in the current negotiations with Pakistan they have indicated any willingness to change their position with regard to the NPT?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would say no, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Lang.]

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL IN QUEBEC

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask whether his statements in conversation with CFCF were correctly reported this morning in the Montreal Gazette in the headline "Both Languages in Quebec air space by 1978". If so, can the minister explain what purpose he foresees for the commission or whether he was merely summarizing the obvious, as there are already six airports in Quebec offering the two languages?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the remarks and the report have to be put in the context of what our intentions are in relation to the volume of air traffic serviced in Quebec, assuming that we can indeed establish certified, secure procedures which assure safety. The conversation, in other words, related to the fact that at all times we recognize the need to certify procedures as safe before moving toward the implementation of the actual procedures. Of course, a lot of work has been done on that in our own ordinary departmental office and also with the commission. The conversation would continue with the question: assuming that that all works favourably and you get the procedures which are assured as safe, then what is the timetable? That is when I indicated that our timetable had been for progressive implementation throughout the province of Quebec through to the end of 1978. That is not a guaranteed time because there are implementation questions that arise as it moves forward but that is the target and that is the way it was described.

POSITION OF FRANCOPHONE AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS ON CO-OPERATION WITH COMMISSION ON BILINGUAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for that explanation. I think it is most important that it be clarified. I should also like to ask whether the minister has had any indication of a change of attitude on the part of Les Gens de l'Air who to my latest knowledge made no suggestion whatsoever that they were prepared to co-operate with the commission. I think it is highly desirable that they should.

● (1430)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, some of the discussions we have been having with Les Gens de l'Air have been for assuring that co-operation with the commission. This is quite apart from the necessary involvement of Les Gens de l'Air with the simulator exercises and other activities. We have been making progress in that regard, but the discussions will no doubt be continued.

NEW AIR NAVIGATION ORDER ON USE OF LANGUAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport to do with the memorandum of agreement among the controllers, pilots and the minister which stipulated that by July 1 there would be an air navigation order regarding the use of language and the enforcement thereof. I understand that this was complied with on June 30, under air navigation order Series 1, No. 1. Will the minister explain to this House, and confirm, that last Friday the air navigation order was repealed and a new order brought forth?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The actual reference in the memorandum of understanding was not that the air navigation order would necessarily be effective in its final form by July 1, but, rather, that a form to become effective would be put forward to the Privy Council office for the usual processing. We have since looked at the order from a text viewpoint and made a number of changes in it. We may make more changes, either before it becomes effective or shortly thereafter.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister in a general way could clarify precisely what the second order contains? Is it now in effect, or has the second order been repealed? What is its status? I ask this particularly since we hope that by bringing about some harmony and understanding we may be able to improve the air situation in the Montreal air control region.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I understand that air navigation orders become effective upon or after publication in the Gazette. This has not yet taken place. Therefore, they are about to become effective orders.

Mr. Mazankowski: You are breaking your own agreement.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And creating confusion.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO DO JUSTICE TO FRANCOPHONE AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Considering that CATCA is in process of expelling the only Quebec member from its board of directors and that the ostracism of the French-speaking minority by CATCA is now indisputable and obvious, is the President of the Treasury Board prepared to consider and amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act to enable Les Gens de l'Air du Québec and French-speaking controllers who no longer find a place within CATCA, which will not defend them any more and even wishes to expel them, to negotiate with the government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if a union member believes he is being discriminated against by his union bosses, he can apply to the Public Service Staff Relations Board and ask for an end to the discrimination. I hope that, if this discrimination does exist, the board will give a more favourable ruling concerning Les Gens de l'Air's claims. However, the right of appeal is provided for and I invite Les Gens de l'Air to avail themselves of it. If the law is unfair, we shall amend it later but I think the normal procedure should be followed under the circumstances.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE EVICTION OF NATIVES FROM WHITE DOG AND GRASSY NARROW RESERVES TO CREATE PARK

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister confirm that, given the loss of livelihood and the serious health problems suffered by the Indian people of the White Dog and Grassy Narrows reserves as a result of mercury pollution in the English-Wabigoon river system, rather than compensating the Indian people the government intends to expropriate their land and evict the people from their homes in order to create a national park?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that is not correct.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the creation of a national park which I suppose the minister will call "mercury pollution national park" will in no way deal with the problem of loss of jobs and compensation for health as a result of mercury pollution, nor with the assessment of liability against the polluting company, I ask the minister how in heaven's name the creation of a national park in this polluted area will help the Indian people most directly affected?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has mixed up several matters. The prime thing the Indian people were interested in achieving was the closure of the park; the second was the question of compensation and the third was the question of the economic development of this area. We discussed these matters at some length and feel that with the vehicle of a national park we can best accomplish those three objectives.

Mr. Symes: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister, in view of the unanimous opposition of the peoples of both affected reserves, still intend to proceed with this ridiculous scheme?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, if they continue with strong, unanimous opposition we shall certainly reconsider the scheme.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF THREE CANADIAN MISSIONARIES FROM VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government requested from the Vietnamese government any explanation as to why three Canadian missionaries have been expelled from Viet Nam, along with 23 other missionaries from other countries?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must look into this question.

Mr. Wagner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is looking into these questions, will he also tell the House if the government of Canada intends to protest against the unwarranted expulsion of these Canadian citizens, and against this flagrant violation of the United Nations charter on freedom of movement of peaceful persons by the Vietnamese government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, once I have had an opportunity to examine the facts, I will make a judgment whether a protest is justified. If the action carries all the surrounding approbrium the hon. member alleges, of course we will make our views known to that government.

Mr. Wagner: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister advise the House if the government is prepared to facilitate the return of those Canadian missionaries to Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker; obviously.

DECLARATION OF 200-MILE FISHING ZONE—DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can reassure the House and country of the government's intention to proceed with the declaration of a 200-mile economic zone for Canada by the end of the year, notwithstanding French intentions in this regard? Perhaps the minister could also tell the House what progress has been made in talks with the French government regarding their intentions off Canada's east coast?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt but that the government will implement its decision to bring into effect Canadian jurisdiction not later than January 1, 1977. We have not had talks recently with the French government with regard to the implications of the extension of the 200-mile limit with respect to St. Pierre and Miquelon but we have made clear our views that the land mass of these islands when compared with the land mass of Newfoundland, justifies a more appropriate solution than that suggested by the French government.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask if Canada still holds to the position arrived at during talks at an earlier stage? Are we prepared to enter into some kind of reciprocal arrangement with France with regard to fishing rights off the east coast of Canada in those areas lying within the 200-mile limit off the French islands?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, our general policy has been to enter into bilateral discussions and reciprocal arrangements where, in those arrangements, Canadian interests are fully protected and we would take that attitude with respect to the French.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED DISCOVERY OF THREE VEHICLES CONTAINING EXPLOSIVES AT OLYMPIC SITE

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister been privy to any rumour or report saying that three unauthorized military vehicles were recently discovered at the Olympic site, and that these vehicles contained explosives?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I have not heard that report, and am kept informed daily of the activities of the Canadian Armed Forces in support of the Olympics.

Mr. Brisco: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the possibility that the report is accurate, I wonder if the minister will perhaps examine the circumstances and determine if these vehicles may have originated from a Montreal armoury and contained explosives which were in a deteriorated state and ready for disposal.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased if the hon. member would provide me with the source of his information; I will of course be ready to look into it. But I have no report of that kind.

BILINGUALISM

THE DIFFICULTY IN MAKING IT UNDERSTOOD

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last Friday night I had the opportunity to listen to the Prime Minister during a CBC broadcast, from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m. He was answering questions from French Canadian reporters. At least two of these reporters were block heads who could not and would not understand anything.

Does the Prime Minister feel he will have as much difficulty getting through to the air pilots and air traffic controllers as he experienced with these block heads during this Friday night interview?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has come to realize once more something of which we are all perfectly aware by now, namely, that there are block heads on both sides of the linguistic barrier.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

Has the government, in their meetings with the pilots or air controllers, managed to make them understand that the province of Quebec is an important province from the French point of view on an international basis in that it is, I believe, the third or fourth in rank among Francophone entities in the world? Do Anglophone pilots understand that they are not being kept from speaking English with the Quebec control towers? Far from it, they get their answers in English. But do they understand that two Francophone employees can discuss freely together, either from air to ground or ground to air, without anyone objecting to their use of French, just as we are not opposed to their using English in other Canadian provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: I thank the hon. member because, in the first part of his question, I believe, he states a fact which unfortunately has been distorted by adverse propaganda. The fact of the matter is that no one forces the pilots to speak French or to learn it so they can use it when they fly into Quebec. English remains the language they can use in Quebec as well as in Ottawa, Edmonton, Madrid or Rome. But they must be made to understand that, just as they accept to speak English and hear Spanish spoken when they get to Spain, they should be able to speak English while hearing French when they get to Quebec.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a final supplementary.

I fully share the Prime Minister's opinion on that matter, but how come he could not succeed and convince his former colleague and ex-minister, the hon. member for Langelier, of the reasonableness of what he has just stated in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit leader should know that it was not because he could not understand that that the Minister of Environment has resigned from the government, it is mostly because of his irritation at the systematic and voluntary inability to understand that by other Canadians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE ON IMPLEMENTATION OF 200-MILE FISHING ZONE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. The minister has confirmed on a number of occasions that the 200 mile limit will be implemented on January 1, 1977. As negotiations between Canada and France with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon are hanging in the air, can the minister advise the House and the country when there will be a meeting with France on this important question? How many meetings have been held? Have any meetings been held with France since 1972 on this question?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary for the Canadian negotiators to have a meeting with the French authorities before the coming into effect of the extended jurisdiction. There are quite a number of meetings and quite a number of negotiations in play. We hope it will be possible to fit in a meeting with the French authorities before the coming into effect of the extended jurisdiction.

Mr. Marshall: Has the minister been officially notified by the French government as to their intention to extend the 200 mile limit off St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have had no official communication indicating the intention of the French government with regard to such an extension.

OLYMPIC GAMES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PARTICIPATION OF TAIWANESE ATHLETES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister inform the House of the government's reaction to the statement of the International Olympic Committee Board in the form of a direct appeal to the government "to review its attitude in keeping its word, and hold it entirely responsible for any harm which the olympic movement may suffer"? That statement was made with regard to athletes from the Republic of China. What was the government's reaction to that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the best answer to the olympic committee and indeed to members of this House and the country who have shown concern, is that it is not our policy nor our practice to bar any athletes from the games. We welcome the athletes from Taiwan. We hope they will compete. We do not discriminate on the basis of sex, race or, indeed, national origin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: All we are saying, and it seems to me this is a policy that would have the support of any member of this House regardless of his party provided he believes in a one China policy, is that we will not let athletes come into Canada under false representations and to pretend that they represent a country, China, that they do not represent. That is all we are saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Will the Prime Minister explain how his attitude has changed with regard to athletes from the Republic of China compared with delegates from the PLO who attended the Habitat Conference? He stated at that time that other people made the decision about who would be the delegates at international conferences. Why not in this particular instance?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question was answered about two or three days ago.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

REASON FOR LACK OF PATROLS BY FISHERIES VESSELS ON THE WEST COAST

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). On June 14, page 14452 of Hansard, speaking of fishing patrols, the minister said:

I said in Montreal, and I say here, that we are doubling the level of boardings and inspections this year.

On the west coast the number of patrols by fisheries patrol vessels has dropped to zero. Can the minister give the House any assurance that he can find sufficient funds to resume the patrols that are required to maintain our sovereignty out to the 12 mile limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want to mislead the House. I will of course take his question very seriously and look into the facts. I suspect what may have happened is that DND patrolling is taking place in some cases while Department of the Environment and Fisheries patrols are not. I will have to look at the facts. I suspect the hon. member is probably confusing the two.

● (1450)

Mr. McKinnon: I hope I am not confusing the minister. My question was about fisheries patrol vessels, not about DND vessels, with whose movements I am familiar. On the West Coast, the Laurier has been docked for over a month, the Tamu has been docked for over two weeks and the Howay has been laid up since April 20, all because of a 40 per cent cut in their annual operating budget which is keeping them from their periodic refits. Can the minister seriously contend that Canada is maintaining sufficient sovereignty under these conditions, that is, with all our fisheries patrol ships tied to the dock for lack of funds?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): The Tamu is under refit right now, which answers part of the hon. member's question. He obviously has not read the press release which indicates clearly that DND and Ministry of Transport vessels are undertaking patrol activities on our behalf and, as such, can be called fisheries patrol vessels since they are doing this job for us.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLEGED LEASING BY DEPARTMENT OF BUILDINGS BEFORE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can he advise the House whether it is a practice of the Department of Public Works to agree in principle to lease buildings on which construction has not commenced and on land which the builder does not, at the time of the agreement, own?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): That would be a rather strange lease agreement.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Huntington: It would, indeed, be a strange agreement. In the light of that answer could the hon. gentleman explain the minutes of the National Capital Commission Advisory Committee on Design of June 2, 1975, which state: "Campeau Corporation assembled the land for development before the NCC—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question of that sort which relates to an event in June, 1975 ought surely to be raised another way.

MULTICULTURALISM

LACK OF WORK PERMITS BY FOREIGN STUDENTS WORKING ON PROJECTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, now that the Secretary of State has had an opportunity to travel to London to consult with his officials there regarding the activities of the London office, may I ask him whether he was correctly quoted in the London Free Press on Saturday as stating that his officials in London probably knew that two foreign students working on a government-funded project did not hold Canadian work permits and, if so, does he not feel they had a responsibility to bring this possible violation of the law to the attention of the proper authorities?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): What I pointed out to the reporter was that my officials had warned the two students involved that they were obliged to have work permits before they could work on a student community service project. I also pointed out that it was the responsibility of those administering the project, not only in London but right across the country, when they were hiring foreign students, to make sure they had work visas.

GIVING OF SECOND GRANT TO PERSON WHO HAD NOT COMPLETED FIRST PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Is the Secretary of State correctly quoted in the London Free Press to the effect that although the individual who last year received a government grant to prepare a film and a saleable book on the London Polish community by September, 1975 has so far completed nothing more than an essay for one of his professors, the fact that the church which helped him sponsor the project has not complained satisfies his concern? Or does he feel it was questionable for his department to give this individual a second grant this year in connection with another project?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. I spent some time talking to Father Peter who is the priest at the church concerned and who signed the submission. He pointed out to me that the submission was made to some 20 or 30 members of the Parish Council who debated the merits of the proposal, discussed whether the individual who applied was one they should support, who questioned whether or not he was too young, and so on. They satisfied themselves the project was all right and went ahead. Incidentally, Father Peter is the only one who has seen the completed project. The critics have not seen it yet but that does not seem to have prevented their criticizing it in advance. Father Peter tells me he is quite satisfied with it as an independent history of the Polish community and is one which will probably serve the community well.

BILINGUALISM

POSSIBILITY OF SUSPENDING APPLICATION OF SECTION EIGHT OF AGREEMENT WITH PILOTS AND AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association instituted disciplinary procedures against their regional director in Quebec because he supported the establishment of bilingualism in air communications, and considering that section 8 of the agreement reached on June 28 between the minister, CATCA and CALPA amounts to depriving a controller who is being prosecuted for such an offence of the basic right of being defended by his union, can the Minister of Transport tell the House whether he proposes to suspend the application of section 8 until an appropriate defence procedure is established and to enable a controller being prosecuted to go on supporting the policy of bilingualism of the federal government? In addition, what measures does he intend to take to ensure that this situation does not recur?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): It is our intention that there should be a regulation which supports the rules which are in existence with regard to the flying and controlling of aircraft. It has always seemed to us to be extremely important that the rules be obeyed even while studies are going on to determine whether different rules should be put in place. It is true there is a difficulty in terms of union representation in present circumstances between CATCA and the controllers who are Francophone in obtaining the full services of the union on their behalf. I think this would only lead us to be very careful about the way in which proceedings against such a member would take place and perhaps to look for alternative procedures in which his defence could be full and adequate, notwithstanding his membership in CATCA.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST THAT CAPE BRETON BE CONSIDERED FOR DECENTRALIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the genial President of the Treasury Board. It relates to the decentralization of government services, a subject which I have raised on a number of occasions, in the light of the minister's most recent announcement involving Winnipeg, Moncton and St. John's bearing in mind that it would appear from the comments made in these announcements that high unemployment, indeed, continuing high unemployment, is part of the criteria taken into account when considering decentralization. Can the minister advise us whether he will soon be making another progressive statement in this regard involving Cape Breton Island where we have the qualified people and where we sure have continuing high unemployment?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): I can tell the hon. member that we are thinking of it. We hope to make some further announcements on decentralization and I might add that in the case of Cape Breton I am receiving on a daily basis diplomatic notes from the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

HOUSING

RURAL REMOTE AREAS PLAN—AVAILABILITY TO NATIVES OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs but in his absence today may I direct it to his parliamentary secretary? It concerns the recent announcement that some housing units are to be built in British Columbia under the rural remote areas housing plan. Does this plan fall within the government's rural and native housing policy and if so what process is being used to consult with local native people? Further, is this program available to residents of the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I shall have to take notice of that question. The minister is absent today but I am sure he will be able to answer it when he returns.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DATE OF CLOSING OF ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS TO SPORT FISHING

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the hon. gentleman tell us when sports fishing will be banned on the English and Wabigoon rivers? Has he in his negotiations with provincial cabinet ministers from Ontario fixed a date when sports fishing on this river system will be stopped?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): At this juncture the federal and Ontario ministers present at the meeting must now take a proposal back to their respective governments. Both levels of government are very much aware of the urgency of the matter but we have to get approval from our respective governments before further action can be taken.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE ON STATUS OF ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the right hon. gentleman's well known interest in the patriation of the constitution, may I ask whether, in any talks he might have had since he was Prime Minister with the French president or any authorities in France, there has been any discussion about the status of St. Pierre and Miquelon with a view to removing an anomaly of history which, while it does not greatly disturb Atlantic Canada, might well have considerable significance in the event of substantial oil discoveries and the implementation of a 200-mile fishing zone?

● (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must humbly confess that I did not have the gall to raise that with the President. I do not think that the Leader of the Opposition raised with the President of the United States the question of repatriating the panhandle either.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the Prime Minister's well known ability in gall—not Gaul but gall—I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would seriously consider the next time he or officials of the external affairs department, which seems to be more busy in travel than discussion, have the opportunity, raising the matter so this anomaly of history can be removed and we do not have to worry about balancing the interests of two small islands against the territorial mass of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in such important matters as this concerning Canadian territorial ambitions I would think it would be useful to have at least a bipartisan policy, so I will approach the Leader of the Opposition, when he is here, to see whether he is interested in forming a package in which we could claim a lot of land, including St. Pierre and Miquelon, the Alaskan panhandle and perhaps parts of Maine for New Brunswick. If I can get that support for a bipartisan policy we might also have a joint election campaign.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGED CHANGE IN REGULATIONS GOVERNING ISSUANCE OF PASSES TO WIVES OF MEMBERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to a question that I asked on June 25 which is reported at page 14840 of Hansard. Leaving out the portions that have nothing to do with the question, I said this:

> Naturally, I am concerned over the revelations, to use the mildest term possible, as reported in the Toronto Sun yesterday's date and the Globe and Mail of today, concerning promiscuity in the issuance of passes. In the absence of the minister concerned—

I was referring, of course, to the Minister of Supply and Services.

> [Mr. Buchanan.]

> —who apparently admitted everything contained in the statements, I will just ask one question: Has there been any change made by Air Canada concerning qualifications on the part of spouses for passes, and why is it that a pass was issued to one described as a common law wife, an expression which of course is non-existent except in the vocabulary of certain people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not speak of changes in policy but I would confirm that Air Canada does have a general policy of dealing with common law wives, which they know has a definition in connection with passes, for instance, for their employees and presumably by extention for other categories. Of course, the expression is also well known in the administration of other programs and is becoming better known all the time in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister in question made common law wives well known in the vocabulary of our country. My question arising out of his answer is this: Why did the corporation grant the request of the minister to issue a pass for which there is no justification to one whom he described quite frankly as his common law wife?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think that answer was given rather fully in the same case when the incident was raised, and quite frankly I regret the right hon. gentleman taking the time of this House to raise that specific point at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I now give the answer and I ask what portion of it the minister is referring to. I feel very sorry he is exasperated and I express my deep regret to him in that regard. The Minister of Transport replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is accurate to say that that was the description used in the past.

That is, a common law wife.

> However, I will be glad to have a look at what is the current policy of Air Canada with regard to passes and to report more fully on whether there have been any changes since the time the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister.

The minister says today the answer was given on June 25. Why the cover-up, I would ask?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the right hon. gentleman taking this trouble to draw my attention in the House to the fact that the word "past" appears in the third line of the reply, whereas the word "pass" should appear. I will see whether that correction helps him.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LALONDE—ANSWER TO ACCUSATION OF INFLUENCE CONCERNING FREE VOTE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege concerning a statement made some days ago by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) and which, in my opinion, is detrimental to the privileges of

hon. members, particularly those representing the province of Quebec.

This is related to the vote on capital punishment held in the House last week. According to a press release, the hon. member said that during a reception I gave for all members from Quebec, certain undue pressures were exerted on them, and I quote the statement he is reported to have made:

[English]

He made them believe the government could fall if the bill was defeated. They were also told if they voted for abolition they would have more chance of advancement, possibly being appointed parliamentary assistants and get government trips.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my first reaction after reading such a statement was to burst out laughing, as did a good many members. I do not think, however, that we should remain silent about it because I feel it affects the privileges of hon. members. It questions not only my own integrity concerning my relations with members but also the reputation of government members who represent the population of Quebec.

I positively and categorically deny that I, or anybody I know, have or has approached Quebec members to influence them about a free vote. I declare that all members from Quebec who were present in the House voted freely according to their own conscience. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe should withdraw this assertion from his statement:

[English]

It's silly, but it impressed some.

[Translation]

I believe that his statement is not only silly but scandalous and if the hon. member is a gentleman, he will apologize to hon. members of the House.

[English]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Outremont was rising on a question of privilege—

[Translation]

An hon. Member: Speak French.

Mr. Wagner: I hear people from the other side say to me again "in French". Did they not listen to the program in which the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) called upon Quebecers to support him in his bilingual program?

An hon. Member: You may speak as much as you want, but at least be clear.

Mr. Wagner: The hon. member could at least say "vous" to me instead of "tu".

[English]

I thought the minister and hon. member for Outremont was rising on a question of privilege to apologize to the majority of Canadians for the betrayal by the cabinet on the question of capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: However, I notice that he is more worried about his cocktail parties, about the timing of the cocktail party, about how much was drunk, whether or not it influenced some people, whether or not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think he should be allowed to finish.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You let the minister go on, and he did not have a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not propose to stop the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe continuing to make an equal contribution to the question of privilege. However, I insist that he stay within the limits of the question of privilege that has been raised.

Mr. Wagner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will do my best to abide by your ruling. I was suggesting that the minister was preoccupied with his cocktail party. I think it is the responsibility of the Speaker to decide if there is a well-founded question of privilege in this case. I may chide the hon. member for Outremont for relying on a press clipping emanating from the Globe and Mail whose correspondent secured the information—

An hon. Member: From you.

Mr. Wagner: No, not from me, but by listening at 8.15 in the morning to a seven-minute program on CKEC, Montreal, and who probably did not grasp all the nuances that were made in the declaration, which declaration followed immediately after the declaration by the hon. member for Outremont which was an attempt to extricate his government from the blunder of the Trudeau-Lang-Sauvé approach to cabinet solidarity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Prime Minister is getting so annoyed. That is awful. Perhaps he will cool off for a few minutes and maybe he will get his money's-worth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: In order that you are able to appreciate the situation, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I did declare on that program that it was shameful and, I think, in very poor taste for the Quebec leader of the Liberal caucus to hold a potent cocktail party a few hours before the vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the celebrations had nothing to do with the vote, because the vote was on Tuesday night and usually these celebrations are on Wednesday night. Maybe it was designed to strengthen the grasp the Quebec leader has on the Liberal caucus, or maybe it was designed to show that he does rise above the ankle of the hon. member for Langelier as leader of the Quebec party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: I for one, declare that I do not believe the rumour that whoever arrived at the cocktail party arrived by a Seagram's jet. I do not believe that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: Now the Prime Minister is getting angry again. I am so sorry. I like the Prime Minister when he is smiling. What did occur, Mr. Speaker, is that eight Liberal MPs, avowed retentionists, changed their vote under pressure.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Wagner: I am sure that this pressure did not include pressure by the hon. member for Outremont, because he is obviously above such cheap tactics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: In any event, Mr. Speaker, that performance, added to the Prime Minister's verbal harangue in this House, succeeded in defeating the will of the majority of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Joe Clark had no effect on your party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about Stanfield?

Mr. Wagner: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would not only reiterate what I have just said, but add that I have nothing to retract from what I said, and I would even welcome wholeheartedly any motion by the hon. member for Outremont which would refer this matter to the committee on privileges and elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: I assure hon. members that the information submitted would require more than the presence of a doctor in the House to come to the aid of the Liberal backbenchers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: However, Mr. Speaker, I shall let the matter rest in your hands. I am convinced that when an election comes—and it will not be too soon—those hon. members will receive the verdict in their ridings that they should obtain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Try another one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The proposed question of privilege has not been followed by a motion. It implicated one other member of the House who has now responded with equal time. No motion is attached to the alleged question of privilege and therefore, no action is required of the Chair. As far as the Chair is concerned, the matter is closed.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, on my supplementary to a carefully prepared question you called me out of order, apparently because I was referring to some specific minutes. The minutes I referred to contained actions that were very germane to the first question and, indeed, confirmed by answer given by the minister that the deal I was referring to was indeed strange. I am wondering if I might have a reason why I was cut off so quickly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in relation to an attempt at an answer a few minutes ago by the Minister of Transport. I cannot complain that he has not answered in full. All I can say is that this manner in which he endeavoured to pretend he was answering indicates an attitude on the part of this government to cover up, conceal, and not reveal. It is the finest example I know of during the present session of a government that is forever hiding the truth.

I am surprised that the Minister of Supply and Services has not risen to explain the unexplainable, namely, his conduct, admitted in the press, of having got in touch with Air Canada to obtain a pass for what he describes as his common law wife. I cannot insist on an answer, but this is indicative of the manner in which the minister pretended to answer today, and knowing I was going to rise he coincidentally disappeared from the House as fast as he could.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I would like, first, to say that I did not use the words suggested by the right hon. member when I spoke to Air Canada. The words I used were that I had a personal and very stable relationship. Secondly, I asked for a courtesy ticket, and it was issued with the provision that the ruling would be made according to the normal practices of Air Canada in respect of its own employees. The ruling was not made, and I decided to reimburse the company, which I did. That's it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After the investigation started.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1520)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of answers given to me by the Minister of Transport in connection with the questions I raised regarding the air navigation order and its status. I regret that the minister is not in the House at this time, but I feel compelled to rise because I believe the minister may have inadvertently misled the House. If he did not mislead the House, then to say the least he did leave a number of questions unanswered and in fact confused this very sensitive issue more than it is confused right now.

The minister left the impression that the air navigation order, series 1, No. 1, which was dated June 30, was not published in the Canada Gazette because it requires an amendment based upon technical grounds and the details were in fact being worked out in consultation with all parties to the agreement. Section 8 of the memorandum of agreement provides as follows, and I will read it for the information of hon. members:

That Transport Canada will submit before July 1 a recommendation to the Privy Council which the government will process expeditiously—

I emphasize the word "expeditiously".

—and publish in the Canada Gazette at the earliest possible date as an air navigation order with regard to the use of language in the air, and Transport Canada undertakes to pursue the enforcement thereof.

I need not remind the House that today is July 12 and that the matter has not been fully complied with as yet. But what is most irritating is that we are informed now that the air navigation order, series 1, No. 1, file 75/519, which was brought forth on June 30 has now been revoked as of July 7. In my view, this has the effect of nullifying the terms of the agreement. In fact, it deviates from the very heart of the agreement and from the principal conditions of the memorandum. Second, the memorandum of agreement provides, as an inherent condition provided for consultation between all members of the air navigation industry—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely, the hon. member realizes he is getting into an interpretation, or disagreement with the minister which, while it may be a valid point of disagreement, goes far beyond the question of whether the minister intentionally or otherwise misled the House in the answer he gave today. The hon. member has made his point more than adequately, and it seems to me that he should not be permitted to go into a debate at this time.

Mr. Mazankowski: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presenting reports—

Mr. Mazankowski: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has received the ruling from the Chair in respect of an extension of the question period. If the hon. member has a new question to raise by way of a question of privilege, I will hear him. If it is simply to question the ruling that has been made, I do not think I can entertain his question.

Mr. Mazankowski: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The minister left the impression that on technical grounds the air navigation order was being amended. The fact is that the air navigation order has been revoked, and the minister did not say that in the House. I believe that deliberately, or inadvertently, he has misled the House, and that is my question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. What I indicated to the hon. member for Vegreville was precisely that he was given the floor to register the fact that there was an interpretation of the circumstances which would lead to the conclusion that the minister may have inadvertently or otherwise misled the House. I thought the hon. member had made that point but was going into a debate.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY—GRANTS AND PROJECTS

Question No. 3,980—Mr. Matte:

1. Has the Canadian International Development Agency ever made grants for the creation of projects in foreign countries and, if so, how many?

2. For each such grant, what was the (a) name of the project (b) location of the project (c) year it was made (d) amount?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes, since it was established the Canadian International Development Agency has made many thousands of grants to developing countries to provide direct economic, technical and social development assistance to these countries. From 1968 to date, CIDA has made grants to developing countries in the following amounts:

Year	Amount
1968-69	$133,503,723.18
1969-70	156,593.396.05
1970-71	193,303,414.15
1971-72	197,454,117.93
1972-73	245,903,031.66
1973-74	262,192,803.90
1974-75	333,749,668.83
1975-76*	382,946,791.00

*Expenditures up to 31-1-76

2. The data required to answer this part of the question are not maintained for the years prior to 1969-70. Since 1970, there have been many thousands of grants made. To provide the information requested for each and every one of these grants would involve massive research which could be done only with the expenditure of large amounts of both time and resources, which during this period of financial restraint, are not available.

NOVA SCOTIA—GROSS PROVINCIAL PRODUCT

Question No. 5,112—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the government's best estimate of its dollar level contribution to the gross provincial product of Nova Scotia in each year for which figures are available since 1968?

2. For each such year, what percentage of Nova Scotia's gross provincial product does the federal spending represent?

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. No official federal estimate exists of Nova Scotia's Gross Product, nor do official estimates exist of the total contribution of all federal government actions to economic activity in Nova Scotia. Estimates of Nova Scotia's gross provincial product are available from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, and estimates of expenditures in Nova Scotia under a number of major federal programs are available from Statistics Canada. These estimates are shown in the first panel below. The second panel shows the expenditure estimates expressed as percentages of estimated gross provincial product though this is only to provide a general indication of their importance relative to the size of the Nova Scotia economy. These percentage figures do not, in any way, represent estimates of contributions to gross provincial product. Apart from federal wages, the expenditure series shown are not actual components of gross provincial product. They are, however, major sources of financing for personal expenditures and for expenditures by the provincial and local government expenditures. Many other federal actions, expenditures, revenues and non-budgetary actions, both in and outside Nova Scotia, influence Nova Scotia's economy directly or indirectly.

METRIC CONVERSION

Question No. 5,687—Mr. Beatty:

1. For what reason did the government decide to phase in the metric system at the present pace instead of implementing the change at the same time as the United States?

2. Is the government prepared to make special financial assistance available to businesses and other organizations for whom the introduction of the metric system will create a heavy financial burden and, if so, what is the nature of such assistance and to whom should inquiries and applications be made?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Canadian sector plans and schedules to take into account the interdependency of conversion activities in Canada with those in other countries, particularly in the USA. Although Canada is slightly ahead of the USA with its Investigation and Planning, much progress has already been made in the USA. Each sector committee in Canada has developed or is still developing a plan which takes into account the extent to which programs of conversion in Canadian industries require to be coordinated with similar programs in the United States.

2. A program of loans is available to small business; such loan assistance is available to business facing special financing difficulties resulting from metric conversion when such businesses are unable to obtain financing from commercial lending institutions. The loans and counselling services to small business are available through the facilities of the Federal Business Development Bank. There is no indication in Canada or in other countries that the introduction of the metric system will create a heavy financial burden. Refer to the following background information for further explanation.

Background Information:

1. The U.S. Metric Conversion Act was signed by President Ford December 23, 1975. Despite previous delays in the passing of this legislation, U.S. industry, coordinated by the American National Metric Council (ANMC) has been proceeding with metric conversion for three years. The Metric Commission is keeping in close touch with developments in the United States in regard to the adoption of metric standards and measurements, and its sector committees maintain liaison with their opposite number ANMC sector committees which now number 34. Each sector committee in Canada has developed or is still developing a plan which takes into account the extent to which programs of conversion in Canadian industries require to be coordinated with similar programs in the United States. The Canadian Program of Guideline Dates for Metric Conversion is a four phase program. The first or Investigation Phase where sector and steering committees are formed and policies and strategies agreed upon is essentially complete. The second or Planning Phase is about 50 per cent complete, and the third or Scheduling Phase now underway. Canadian sector plans and schedules do take into account the interdependency of conversion activities in Canada with those in other countries, particularly in the USA. Although Canada is slightly ahead of the USA with its Investigation and Planning, much progress has already been made in the USA. It is anticipated that in many sectors, where close coordination is essential, that the fourth or Implementation Phase will proceed at about the same pace in both countries. The fact that the USA has not publicized very many sector plans or schedules so far, should not blind us to the very rapid progress they are making, nor to the ability of the US economy to implement change quickly now that the basic decision has been made.

2. The policy of the government in regard to Metric conversion was outlined in the White Paper on Metric Conversion laid before the House in January 1970 and approved by the leaders of all parties. In the White Paper the overall policy is that the costs of conversion will be borne by those incurring them just as the benefits flowing from conversion will accrue to the individual organizations either directly or through the general health of the economy. The policy does not, however, preclude any adjustment of the incidence of costs that might be desirable to avoid unjust burden on any individual group or sector of the economy or to guide and stimulate the conversion process in particular sectors to the advantage of the country as a whole. To this effect three financial concessions are at present under consideration by government in addition to the program of loans which has now been worked out with the Federal Business Development Bank. The first concerns employed persons required to own measurement sensitive tools for the performance of their duties who, as a result of Metric conversion, are compelled to duplicate tools. As envisaged this concession would consist of a cash reimbursement amounting to 50 per cent of the cost of such duplicate tools and made retroactive to January 1, 1976. The second concerns the owners of retail scales. Under consideration is the provision that parts and units required for the conversion of scales or weighing devices from imperial measure to metric measure or for replacement of scales in imperial measures by scales in metric measure be allowed entry into Canada free of duty and be exempt from payment of Federal Sales Tax. The third concession would be that net capital expenses incurred by firms or undertakings in replacement of imperial scales or weighing devices by metric scales or weighing devices be allowed as an expense for purposes of corporate income tax in the year of installation. Such concessions would be in effect for the limited period of the conversion phase, anticipated, at present, to be five years for tradesmen's tools and two years, beginning in mid 1978, for scales and weighing devices.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Question No. 5,095—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. For 1974-75, what was the total value of agricultural exports, except cereals?

2. What were the products exported?

3. What was the number of pounds or tons of the products?

Order Paper Questions

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The answer to question No. 3121, until the parliamentary secretary mentioned that he was prepared to table it, had not been given, and I was about to ask why that was so simply because he had given us a guarantee shortly before the Christmas recess that all questions on the order paper prior to that date would be answered before the House adjourned, which is likely to be tomorrow or the next day. Now he has answered the question, but the answer has been tabled rather that included in Hansard.

In view of the fact that the question was whether a jet was purchased from the T. Eaton Company by the government, in view of the fact that this question was not answered when question No. 344 was answered, and in view of the fact that the question asks how many times the Prime Minister, his family and the cabinet ministers used this jet both after its purchase and before it was purchased from the T. Eaton Company, I feel that it is unacceptable for the answer to this question to be tabled. Whether it is an honest answer or the usual government cover-up answer, this answer should be not tabled, but inserted in Hansard.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary two questions which I have on the order paper. The first is question No. 3565 which I filed on the order paper last November 14 and has been on the order paper for the longest period of time. I am wondering whether the parliamentary secretary might be able either to expedite the answering of this question or give some reason as to the delay. I am a bit concerned that the government may not feel it is a very serious question because it asks whether it has given consideration to requiring that government documents be put into readable and understandable language so that the average citizen may understand them. I assure the parliamentary secretary that that is not a flippant question; I was very serious.

Another question I thought I might bring to his attention was placed on the order paper on May 28, with respect to the government's 1976 census. In view of the fact that we are about to adjourn for the summer recess, the current aspect of the question would be lost if it were allowed to be held over until the fall, and I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary will do whatever he can to expedite the answering of that question.

Mr. Blais: With a great deal of pleasure.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass, and the motion thereto of Mr. Condon.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, we have now reached a point where we have one more vote in so far as determining whether Bill C-84 will become law. If it becomes law, the abolition of capital punishment will become a reality in this nation. One would have to assume, having examined the votes which took place both on second reading and during the report stage, that we have reached a point where it is likely that capital punishment will be abolished in Canada for all crimes, including high treason and skyjacking, as well as for the murder of police officers and prison employees.

I do not intend to take a great deal of time today, but I want to point out some facts which give me a great deal of concern both with regard to the coming events in Montreal in so far as terrorists and their activities are concerned and with regard to the situations which will develop both in law enforcement in the nation and in the work of employees in penitentiaries. We have to appreciate that the elimination of high treason as a capital offence could be an open invitation to many terrorists in the world and will take away some of the protection which might have been available to Olympic athletes who could face terrorist activity as was the case at the last Olympic Games in Munich.

This is a rather appropriate day upon which to discuss this matter because it is the anniversary of the murder of the Isreali athletes who were in Munich strictly as athletes participating and endeavouring to show the excellence of their sports ability and who died because they happened to come from a country which certain terrorists believed should see the degree of disrespect they felt for that country, for human life, for humanity in general and certainly for any aspect of international law. So it is an appropriate day for a member of parliament to consider the situation once again and to make a decision on whether capital punishment should continue for certain individuals.

In so far as law enforcement in this country is concerned, I am very fearful that as a result of the action of this parliament, which is certainly contrary to the view of almost every law enforcement officer in this nation, there will be a change in attitude on the part of law enforcement officers. If parliament will not react to the wishes of the great majority of the people of this nation and impose capital punishment on those who carry out the murder of police officers and penitentiary employees, I am fearful that in too many instances in the days ahead we will see police officers taking the law into their own hands and shooting first and asking questions later, rather than believing that the courts of the land will deal properly with individuals who embark upon the kind of crimes which the law now says should call for the supreme penalty.

Canadians may well see law enforcement officers embarking upon an altogether different approach, not being willing to risk their lives in endeavouring to stop crime or to apprehend criminals in the way they did previously, because they now know that parliament has ignored their wishes that the death penalty be retained, has ignored the wishes of the great majority of the Canadian people, and has even ignored the attitude of the supreme court of the United States which recently indicated that it still believes, contrary to an earlier decision, that there are crimes which call for the forfeiting of one's life.

This parliament is ignoring the will of the people. We are saying to the people that we are superior to them and that we know better than they do what the law of the land should be. In other words, once elected we are disregarding their views, and every time we do that we drive another nail into the coffin of democracy because there is just no way people can continue to respect this institution if it has no respect for the institution's point of view.

There can be no doubt in the mind of the public that this parliament has indicated, by the votes which have been taken up to now, that it has no respect for the great majority of the public as far as capital punishment is concerned. I regret this deeply. I do not believe that parliament and parliamentarians today are highly regarded, because all too often we ignore the wishes of the Canadian people on crucial issues which they really believe in; and the more often we do that, the less likely it is that we can raise the standard of parliament and improve its relationship with the people. If we do not do that, all the talk about participatory democracy, people's politics, and so forth, are just hollow words. They are words politicians can say, but when it comes to the crunch politicians really do not believe in them. If politicians do not believe in them, before very long, if it is not happening now, the public will be so sour about parliament and parliamentarians that it will say that parliament is just incidental and is not really important.

The public will say that what we really have in this country is a benevolent dictatorship under which every four years the people are given the opportunity to elect members to carry out their wishes, but it turns out that those wishes are ignored or superseded when it comes to really important matters of the day.

The one amendment that was passed provided that capital punishment will be retained for individuals who commit murder a second time. That is some small benefit to employees of penal institutions, but is of no major benefit to prison employees and law enforcement officers. It will be of benefit to prison employees if the government carries out the sentence, but nothing in the history of this government shows that such punishment will be carried out even when it is written in the statute. That concerns me, as it does many Canadians, and I am sure it is the reason so many people believe there should be capital punishment. As the murder statistics grow, an increasing number of policemen and employees in penitentiaries have been killed, so the public want to see the death penalty carried out.

In the end, Mr. Speaker, I think all of us in this House will be sorry that parliament did not react the way the public has indicated it should act. A growing number of crimes that were at one time punishable by death will become statistics in the days ahead as a result of the stand we have taken.

I feel sorry for the people who have assumed the responsibility of working in our penitentiaries. Some have been there for many years and would like to leave, but because they must have security for their families cannot leave now and start all over again. Inmates who have not committed murder will be forced to stay longer in penal institutions when in some instances it would be more realistic to shorten their period of imprisonment. Indeed, I believe that about one third of all inmates should not even be in institutions. Surely there are other methods just as appropriate for rehabilitating criminals who are not guilty of vicious crimes. The government felt it would have to be harsh on all criminals in order to secure agreement for abolition of the death penalty, so now they are all to suffer and become charges on the state. We should be moving toward releasing them on parole, with proper supervision, to prepare them to become contributing members to the community.

The whole matter is very sad, Mr. Speaker, because it ignores the rights and views of Canadian citizens who pay the bills. It is sad because we adopt a hard line when we should be moving toward greater rehabilitation, and inmates who are not hardened criminals will become so if they remain in our institutions for a longer period of time. It is sad because parliament is going to mean less to the Canadian public: it really is not an institution that mirrors the view of the people who sent us here. As a result of the voting on this legislation that has taken place up to now, we have become very unrepresentative and this damages the faith and respect that people have for the institution. It is a sad day for parliament and Canada, and I am sorry that parliament has acted this way with the legislation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet must take a great deal of the responsibility for parliament's action. There is no other way that as many individuals as are in the cabinet could have voted one after the other in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, especially if a member voted a different way when he was not a member of cabinet. It is an indication that freedom of vote does not exist in the cabinet. That being the case, it reflects on parliament. That is probably the saddest thing of all, Mr. Speaker.

One area of this parliament that should be most reflective of the view of the general public is the executive branch, the cabinet. After all, they make the laws of this nation, and if they do not appreciate what the public wants, God help them and God help parliament. There will be less respect for parliament and the public will not want to participate to such a great extent, in days ahead, in the democratic process.

After all, a person's vote will not mean much if after a general election the representative pays no heed to the views of his constituents. We can say all we want about following our conscience, about being leaders and not followers, and all the other things. We can quote Edmund Burke to our heart's content. Yet if we want parliament to reflect the point of view of the nation, parliament must listen to the nation. That parliament is not listening is clear if one looks at the bill before the House. It is also clear, if one examines other legislation which this parliament has passed. In the end, parliament, democracy and every person in this country will suffer. As far as I am concerned, these remarks apply especially to this peace of legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-84 is coming to an end. A great many members have taken the opportunity to express their views, but seldom those of their constituents, because I still maintain that 85 or 90 per cent of the population favour retention of capital punishment in specific cases, where there is absolutely no doubt about guilt.

Several members have spoken about a free vote. I also dit it recently and I even stated to the press that the free vote seemed to me rather like a lot of eyewash, a manouver to allow the government, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), to have Bill C-84 passed, a bill nobody wants in Canada. Once more, I ask the Solicitor general, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government: who requested from the government the introduction of such a piece of legislation, when it has absolute authority to commute all death sentences to life imprisonment? What organization used its influence so that the government introduce Bill C-84?

A short while ago, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) replied to the question of privilege raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to the effect that it was a free vote and there was no coercion, no strong pressures applied on members. However, I talked with two Liberal members whose names I shall not mention who told me that the ministers were twisting their arms to make them vote the way the government wanted, that is for Bill C-84. They threatened them, for example, to have a convention in their ridings before the next election or they told them that if they did not agree with the government they would not have access to electoral funds if an election were called within one or two years.

And I congratulate the member for Saint-Hyacinthe for having upheld his views this afternoon. But what surprised me in his case is that he blamed the government for disregarding the wishes of 90 per cent of voters. He was applauded by the Progressive Conservatives while he should have started by persuading his own leader (Mr. Clark) who voted for abolition and the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party (Mr. Stanfield) who, two years ago, voted also for the abolition of capital punishment.

It is all very nice to throw stones into a neighbour's garden, but the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe should try to change the mind of his own leader who voted with the government on the capital punishment issue. I understand that this is a free vote, that the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party may vote in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, but is he thus respecting the will of the vast majority of the voters? Is he taking into account the pressures exerted upon him and the government by various chiefs of police, chiefs of firemen, prison guards and various organizations, these pressures aiming at maintaining law and order in a country such as Canada? What are their reaction to these pressures? What are they saying? Not a word.

[Mr. Coates.]

We have received a document from policemen of the City of Calgary, in Alberta, the home province of the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. How does he react to the opinion of these people who are blaming the government for not respecting the greater majority of the Canadian public? Is he aware of the hoax being committed by some Liberal and Progressive Conservative members? I feel that the Liberals who are in power are responsible for the introduction of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this morning I was listening to three inmates who answered questions at Temps Present, on CBC. Some inmates supported the death penalty rather than 25-year imprisonment, others said that it was more dangerous, among others a newsman named Claude Poirier who stated that the new legislation would make it more dangerous than before for policemen.

Mr. Speaker, even the Solicitor General does not give a hoot about public opinion, the Prime Minister does not give a hoot about public opinion, those people in the government do not care about organized groups, about the policemen we pay. What will policemen have in the future to defend themselves against criminals, usually against hardened criminals? At the present time, a policeman running after bandits to arrest them will fire one shot in the air to warn them that he is firing at them. In the future, the policeman will fire at the criminal first and he will fire the second shot in the air instead of the first one. So the Solicitor General will blame policemen and say that they were too quick, that they did not take the trouble to examine or to question the criminal before firing at him.

As I said recently, an individual came at my door in Hull with a revolver. Was his revolver registered at the office of the RCMP? I doubt it.

● (1600)

Can we assume that police officers will come and go with the assurance that their life will be respected in the name of humanism? What humanism?

Since the vote on second reading, we have received communications, we have received letters, and I have one here from the Province of Quebec Police and Fire Chiefs Association, law and order people, an association which dates back to 1926. They wrote and I quote:

Mr. Réal Caouette, M.P.

House of Commons

Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Caouette:

We just learned with consternation that Bill C-84 dealing with the abolition of capital punishment in Canada has just been given second reading in the House. It is difficult to restrain our deep deception and the deception of millions of Canadians at this unfortunate setback, an open door onto a dubious future. Acting on the authority of public opinion to which we are consistently listening, we send you herewith this brief.

A 35-page brief which has been submitted to the Solicitor General as well as to the federal cabinet. I go on with the quotation:

The latter, far more than the right alone of the association will bring, we are convinced of it, new and decisive arguments to strengthen the open and frank position of those who oppose the bill, and to win over the dissidents.

The stakes are high, namely our institutions, the security of each and every Canadian citizen, law and order in our land.

Sincerely,

J. P. Pelletier,
President

In addition, I have a letter from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, 116 Albert St., Ottawa. I quote:

Comments addressed to members of the House of Commons and addendum to the CACP brief on capital punishment

In view of the possibility that Bill C-84 on capital punishment may not be referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Justice and Legal Affairs, we wish to draw your attention to the following observations:

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police is studying with keen interest the debate now in progress on capital punishment and we wish to assure each and everyone that we respect all opinions expressed, as well by those who want abolition as those who would keep the death penalty.

Through the briefs we have already presented on that matter, we have clearly indicated our position in favour of retention and any further discussion would only bore you. However we wish to point out that in none of the speeches delivered so far is there any of our recommendation . . .

They will now have the assurance that someone did mention their recommendation in the House of Commons. I go on with the quotation:

. . . that a committee be set up with people representing the executive, the legislative and the judiciary to examine carefully the permanent banishment of an offender and its alternatives. The alternative proposed in Bill C-84 does not stem from careful consideration but can be considered as a deceptive replacement so that capital punishment will be deleted from our legislation. This assertion is based largely on the comments made by the hon. Warren Allmand to the John Howard Society in Ottawa, on April 8 last, when asked that question, that of course a 25-years term was too harsh but that first we had to get rid of capital punishment and then we could all work together to reduce this imprisonment period.

Do you realize the sincerity and frankness of the Solicitor General of Canada? He is an hypocrit and a liar, in my opinion, nothing else, by moving bill to abolish capital punishment, just so he can later reduce the number of years from 25 to 5, 10, 7 or 8 years. The Solicitor General has it in mind, but he is not frank enough to say so here in the House.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police goes on, and I quote:

Such a philosophy deeply concerns us because even if the period proposed under Bill C-84 remains in force, it includes a threat and a much graver danger to our society and more particularly to our prison guards.

In view of this philosophy, we submit that the minimum sentence of 25 years as provided in Bill C-84 is a false flashy representation because, in practice, an individual would have the right to ask, after serving 15 years, a reduction of his sentence.

We also believe that a minimum sentence of 10 years in some murder cases is much too severe compared with that of the odious individual who thinks only of killing for money.

No matter where those contract murderers operate, be it in Quebec or elsewhere, they belong to the same kind, to the same rapacious gang, ready to take the life of anyone as long that they get money to do it. I resume the quotation:

What is the protection given to those whose duties are to keep this vicious mafia? A prison sentence merely means that the person who deserves capital punishment will be able to kill at will. Even with retention of capital punishment, the traditional commuting would have the same effect.

Since we, as representatives of police forces throughout Canada, have a knowledge of criminal life accessible to very few people outside our profession, we feel duty bound to express our deepest concern directly to you, our legislator. Furthermore, the police community and even all our society remains certainly perplex after hearing coming from the same breath a plea for the a survival of a political party and the abolition of capital punishment. The conscience of the legislator should not be troubled the least bit concerning capital punishment, since the public itself has expressed time and time again its desire to retain it.

The ministers are well aware of that, even hon. members, particularly those I know well and who are from the province of Quebec. Yesterday, speaking on CJMS radio in Montreal, I said so plainly. I took a riding as an example, that of Montreal-Mercier, where 95 per cent of the population is in favour of retaining capital punishment. How can the member who represents them in this House say: "When the free vote is taken, freely and conscientiously, I vote against 95 per cent of my constituents".

Mr. Speaker, this also applies to the hon. member forBonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I challenge the hon. member—

Mr. Béchard: Yes!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —to accompany me in his constituency to conduct a poll—

Mr. Béchard: I made one.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —and find out that the majority favour retention.

Mr. Béchard: I voted four times for abolition.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —for abolition. What made him change his mind? Are the pressures of the government compelling him to vote for the abolition of the death penalty?

Mr. Béchard: Speak for yourself!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): He is the undecided type who always follows the party.

Mr. Speaker, I go on with my quote:

If we are convinced, beyond any doubt, that the death penalty has a deterrent effect, . . .

Mr. Béchard: Nonsense.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine says that it is nonsense. I offer to send a letter to his riding—

Mr. Béchard: I already made a poll.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —and so to prove to him that the majority of the people in his riding favour the death penalty in Canada. The hon. member rises to tell me that I lied, if I lied. He knows that I am right, because what I say is right.

The whole population of Canada thinks that way. Not only the constituents of the hon. member's riding, everybody has the same feeling.

Mr. Béchard: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, I also speak for Canadians. I am the leader of a national party, I speak for the guidance of the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police goes on:

. . . and we challenge anyone to prove to us the contrary . . .

—to show us that this has become a frightening danger.

. . . the legislator should maybe have on his conscience the killings of police officers and prison guards because of the absence of appropriate protection.

Each member of our association eagerly awaits the day when no punishment will be necessary.

And so do I. Mr. Speaker, nobody likes hanging, not even those who favour the death penalty.

● (1610)

Hanging is for the real and known killer who will never be brought back to a normal or a reasonable way of life, and, Mr. Speaker, we tell them: The killers have been warned and if they kill they know what to expect. But no, the government prefers to protect criminals, even to the detriment of society, and to the detriment of its people. The police officers write on:

Unfortunately, the nature of man is such that there will always be some people who will be hostile to their neighbour and who will be led to commit crimes. The only way to prevent it is by way of punishment. No one would like to see someone condemned for a single mistake and, to this effect, we believe that the arguments voiced by both abolitionists and retentionists could meet in a middle path, mainly that, in the absence of the execution, whether by commutation of the sentence or otherwise, the repetition of a first act of violence such as those now punished by capital punishment, would lead automatically to banishment for life from our society.

We are confident that the democratic principles with which we all want to indentify will come first when you make your decision.

Respectfully yours,

Bernard E. Poirier, LL.L,
Executive Director.

Mr. Speaker, Wednesday we shall vote on third reading, that is on the final stage of Bill C-84. As we are about to vote on this bill, all of my colleagues have spoken, and you will note that with no influence on my part or on the part of anyone else, each one was truly free to express his opinion, and to take a position, and that 11 out of 11 members have voted against Bill C-84, not out of a wish for revenge, but to say to those who might propose to commit crimes or murders: Gentlemen, watch out! Do not take someone else's life or else you will have to give up your own life to pay for the one that you have removed from society. Then, Mr. Speaker, the individual is truly free: It he wants to hang, he can act consequently, and we, the Parliament or the government, shall apply the law so that this individual will be punished exactly like he could expect to be because of his actions. As the Canadian Parliament is preparing to abolish the death penalty we can read in American newspapers, and recently in the La Presse newspaper of July 3, 1976:

The Supreme Court maintains the death penalty in the U.S.A.

This means throughout the United States. There are states where the death sentence is commuted to life imprisonnment. There are others, like Florida, Georgia, Texas where the death penalty is still in force. There are rather highly organized mouvements in Great Britain seeking the reestablishment of the death penalty. There are other countries where no thought has been given to abolishing it, for instance in most African countries. The death penalty is still in existence in France, and when the French Minister of Foreign Affairs came to Canada recently, he said: I am in favour of the death penalty in extreme cases. This is what we are asking. We are not asking the Solicitor General to hang all criminals for any reason whatsoever, we are asking him, in extreme cases, in the case of murders committed for gain, to take the criminal and hang him or put him in the electric chair or to use any other means to eliminate him to protect society.

I have often heard the Solicitor General say: There are other means than the death penalty to protect society. I have often asked him: Give us those means, tell us that they are. Mr. Speaker, no means have ever been suggested. The Solicitor General is always saying that there are better means than the death penalty to stop crime, and Montreal has now had murder number 53 or 54 for 1976. That represents an average of over 100 a year and it seems like the Solicitor General does not see or does not pay attention to what is going on around him.

Mr. Speaker, if the United States sees fit to maintain that penalty, if England is talking about reinstating it, if in other countries of the world there is renewed talk of returning to capital punishment that is so because indeed there are criminals for whom there is absolutely no hope. There is hope for some, yes. Murders are committed for which the death penalty should not be applied, yes. But we say that in cases of premeditated, planned, loathsome murders where the guy has his gun fully loaded those people are not going to the St. Joseph Oratory to pray St. Joseph or Brother Andrew. No, sir. They go into a small grocery to kill the guy if he resists. It is going to cost us $15,000 to $20,000 a year to keep those people in jail during 25 years. And that would be reasoning? Mr. Speaker, that is not reasoning. I think the general public reasons better than this government. And I would like to know once more what organization or organizations asked this government to introduce Bill C-84, for all practical purposes an act to abolish the death penalty in Canada.

In concluding, I say we are going to vote conscientiously against Bill C-84, and I ask the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) to convince his leader, before he starts convincing the Liberals, to vote against Bill C-84 and also convince his former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), to vote against this bill. Then, he may try to convince the Liberals, ministers or others, to vote against Bill C-84 that I consider to be a terrible calamity against society, against the honest citizen of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on third reading of Bill C-84. I have spoken before on this subject, and rather forcefully, so I certainly do not intend to pursue the matter now at any great length.

I am well aware that this is an absolutely free vote and that it is up to the conscience of each and every member as to how he or she should vote on Wednesday afternoon. I am also aware that the votes of some members of the House are freer than those of others. But we shall wait and see what happens on Wednesday afternoon. I might add that I am not too optimistic of the outcome. Nevertheless, I want to put on record a few points which I believe to be important.

Most of us went back to our ridings over the weekend. I did so myself and I attended four or five different functions. Among them were two funerals. Believe it or not, I was cornered even at the funerals. Notwithstanding the sadness of the occasion, people found it necessary to express their views loud and clear with regard to Bill C-84. I stated my position, in turn, and needless to say it agreed with what a great many of my constituents were saying.

I believe capital punishment should be imposed in cases where the jury has made no recommendations for mercy and when the cabinet, in its wisdom, declines to commute the death sentence. Especially do I think the death penalty is appropriate in the following cases: First, the murder of prison guards in the execution of their duty or while off-duty if the murder is related to their duty; second, the murder of police officers in the execution of their duty or while off-duty if the murder is related to their duty; third, murder committed by persons whose records include one or more convictions for violent acts; fourth, pre-meditated murder or contract murder. I am thinking here of mafia-type murders committed by a "hit man" who knows what he is doing; he is a gangster, he shows no mercy, he probably does not even know who he is killing, but does so because there is a $5,000 or $10,000 payment for his services. Then fifth, where death is directly attributable to a crime of violence where the possibility of death occurring is great and where, in fact, death does occur.

I might say, with regard to that last category, that I am thinking of armed hold-ups where the hold-up men go in with machine-guns and automatic weapons, well knowing what they intend to do. In my opinion, the death penalty should be applicable in such cases.

Let me repeat what I have said earlier. I believe hanging to be a brutal and barbarous way of taking life. I believe executions should be carried out in the most humane way possible. I have suggested that a drug be injected so that the criminal could be painlessly removed from society with as little fuss as possible and as humanely as possible. Those who favour abolition usually talk about hanging, the scaffold, the horror of the rope, and so on. This comes from the press and from the media generally. Most of the news media seem to be abolitionist, bleeding hearts that worry more about the criminal than the victim. I have been surprised to read in editorial pages a great number of letters from citizens of Canada. If the media have received the same number that I have received, I am sure they would agree that the writers favour by ten to one the retention of some form of capital punishment.

When we vote on Wednesday, let us remember that there are 11 men on death row awaiting the outcome of the vote. On that basis I would say we should start afresh following the vote. These men who have gone through terrible agonies wondering whether their lives will be taken or not should have their sentences commuted, and if the bill is defeated capital punishment should be retained from there on for the crimes I have outlined, as well as for high treason. A good many members who are abolitionists at heart, I am sure feel that 15 years in prison—not 25 years—is an inadequate penalty for the crime of high treason, especially in view of the fact that this sentence may be further reduced on the unanimous decision of three judges. The same is true of hijacking or piracy. In my view, the hijackers of aircraft who cold-bloodedly kill the unfortunate passengers who are taken as hostages should also receive the ultimate penalty.

I hope a good many of my colleagues who voted for the bill will seriously reconsider their position when the final, third reading vote is taken. I should like to read into the record a letter I received from a friend of mine who I met a month or so ago. He wrote me a personal letter and and also sent me a copy of a letter that he addressed to the editor of the Globe and Mail under date June 24. He writes:

Dear Sir:

Geoffrey Stevens' article "A Day of High Drama" is an example of the hyperbole of which he is capable and further represents the "bleeding heart" socialist that he is.

Yesterday was not a great day for parliament as the vote registered did not represent a "free vote" as publicized but rather the imperious will of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Yesterday was the beginning of the end of any semblance to a democratic state. There may have been free votes to a degree in the opposition parties but within the Liberal party enough coercion was exercised by the Prime Minister who by his "supreme power" can and does reward with position and favour those who agree with him and remove those who do not.

Stevens is wrong constitutionally, ethically and morally. An elected member of parliament is duty bound to present the views of his constituents who did or did not elect him. To indicate that the fundamental duty of an elected member is to make "his own best decision" and ignore the people is also fatuous and without credence. It suggests a feudal state of primitive nature where only the elected have intellectual capacity and, therefore, will think, decide and dictate to an ignorant compliant mass.

The reference to Edmund Burke circa 1765 and his famous or infamous Bristol statement, which along with stating that elected members should make their own decisions (and inferred "to hell with the people"—Stevens) neglected to point out that Burke also stated that "he should be representative not delegate. He should attend to their interest but he must address himself to the general good of the whole community" etc.

It is also a matter of record that Burke made this statement while the elected member of parliament for Bristol but failed to retain the confidence of his constituents and lost his seat. His further re-entrance to parliament was in a "pocket borough" controlled by Lord Rockingham one of the Whig (Liberal) leaders of the time.

I would suggest that all members of parliament who are voting for the "abolition of capital punishment" and by so doing ignored the intelligent wishes of over 80 per cent of all unfettered Canadians be soundly defeated at the polls, whenever the next election is called. I would also suggest that the issue of capital punishment be put to the Canadian public at the same time.

Yours truly,
J. Douglas Wilson

That is one of a great many letters that have gone to the press and to various members of parliament. I appreciate that it is a free vote and that it is up to each of us to decide how to vote and then answer to our constituents. I am hoping that members of parliament will look at it in this way. Needless to say, I am rather cynical as to the outcome, but I hope I shall be surprised on Wednesday and that Bill C-84 will be defeated.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, we are on the threshold of the passage of this bill and I do not intend to hold up the House for very long. I have a few words I should like to say since I have not spoken in the debate on this bill. There are some things, that have been said throughout this debate, and repeated again today, that I think should be challenged.

First of all, we do have a free vote in the House on this bill and it is a question of personal conscience. For some members of the press and even some members of the House continually to suggest that it is not a free vote I think is degrading and certainly an insult to the members of the House. There is no such thing as coercion or anything else exercised on anyone, to my knowledge, and it seems to me that if that sort of thing were going on on this side of the House I would be one of those approached to change my stand, just as would any other abolitionist. That is certainly not the case.

The point is that in our system the member of parliament is the representative of the people in his constituency. We have a representative kind of government. We come here to represent our constituents who have elected us, each with his own general make-up and morality and everything else that goes to make him or her a human being. They have voted for us because they like everything about us in general. They do not accept everything we say. Perhaps they do not agree with every word we utter or every idea we propose, but in general they accept us as men and women whom they send here to represent them. This does not mean to say that they are telling us we had better vote exactly the way they say we should vote in every instance.

To say that the majority of the people are retentionists and that we should be following the will of the majority oversimplifies this question. In the first place, who says that the majority of the people are retentionists? Gallup polls and the rest. Since when have Gallup polls been the last word on what is the will of the people? In the first place, I suspect the retentionists are far more vocal than abolitionists on this question, and therefore that would throw the poll out immediately. I do not think the majority of the people of this country are retentionists. In my constituency there are a lot of people who have written to me and made representations who are retentionists, but there are also many others who are abolitionists and who made their point of view known.

One group in particular, consisting of the major Christian churches, have officially come out against the retention of the death penalty. This is a very sizeable group, Mr. Speaker. I am not suggesting that everyone who belongs to a church in Canada follows everything that their church says, necessarily, but the majority of the people in my constituency are God-fearing and believe in the religion they pratice. Generally speaking, they follow the ideas put forth by the morality of their particular religion. I feel that those who have expressed their point of view on a religious basis in my constituency are sincere in so doing. Certainly, they believe it is not right to take a life. In my view, no human being or group of human beings has the right to take the life of another human being. That is the principle upon which I stand, and neither pressure nor anything else would make me sell my soul.

• (1630)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is, therefore, on the amendment by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Pursuant to the order passed on Friday last relating to the deferral of votes until Wednesday there has been a discussion with House leaders, with an agreement that the vote on the amendment be deferred until two o'clock on Wednesday of this week.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There has been no understanding that the amendment would be voted on Wednesday only. We would like to have it now, and if the bill is not negatived today the final vote on abolition will take place on Wednesday.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, and before the question is put on the amendment to the third reading, motion, I would indicate that the leader of the Social Credit Party suggested the proceedings were pursuant to the understanding. It is on that basis that I allowed the third reading motion amendment to be introduced pursuant to standing order.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, we discussed among House leaders Wednesday last, and the agreement was that if amendments appeared on the order paper at that time, votes on them would be deferred until Wednesday or simply cancelled.

The sponsors withdrew them. Namely the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and the Conservative member that introduced them. But this amendment to defer to three months time the third reading of Bill C-84 was not discussed at the time the House leaders were consulting.

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the order—and I am not referring to discussions among House leaders—as agreed to was that all questions would be deferred until Wednesday next. It seems to me that the amendment indeed is a question that would be included in that category.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, obviously there has to be a ruling in respect of the interpretation of the order so we should have all matters before us in respect of this extremely important legislation. We ought to have all possible interpretations before the House in order that Your Honour can consider the matter. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has put forward one possible interpretation. I should like the House to look at Votes and Proceedings for July 9, 1976, distributed this morning, and page 1419 which states:

That, if the debate on all stages of Bill C-84 is concluded not later than Tuesday, July 13, 1976, any division or divisions required to dispose of the third reading—

I gather from this that a division of this nature would not constitute the completion of the debate at all stages. I think that is a proper interpretation of the words. The debate at all stages has not been completed. Whatever that may mean in terms of this argument, I think we must realize that the agreement which was worked out by unanimous consent must be dealt with on that basis. I do not think we can slur over this fact and assume that all stages have been completed. I do not believe that is the case. That is my respectful submission to the Chair on this matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, references have been made to the order passed on Friday. It is true that one person might interpret it one way, and another person in another way. But, I certainly understood that any votes at the third reading stage would be put off until Wednesday.

May I also remind Your Honour and the House that there was a previous order. I have been trying to locate it, but have not yet turned it up. I refer to the one that was passed by an overwhelming vote and which said that at the report stage and at third reading any divisions called for would not be taken immediately, but would be held at a time to be determined, by recommendation of the House leaders, not more than five days later. I submit that order still holds and that because of that order, if we cannot agree on what Friday's order says in respect of votes on Wednesday, we cannot take the vote now but, rather, that the House leaders have to meet and decide when the vote on the three months' hoist amendment will be taken.

It seems to me that if there is any doubt about what was meant by Friday's order, the previous order was very clear. I am sure I speak for both sides in this debate when I say that we agreed that this debate was so important there should not be a snap vote with the possibility of many members not being here. I submit, therefore, that if there is not unanimous consent that the debate be regarded as concluded at this point, with all votes to be taken on Wednesday, then by virtue of the previous order the House leaders will now have to meet and fix a time within the next five days.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I think the logic of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Center (Mr. Knowles) is impeccable, except for one flaw. That is, of course, that the House order passed on Friday, I suggest to you, sir, would certainly supersede the motion passed on June 27, I think it was—either June 27 or June 29.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): June 29.

Mr. Lawrence: I am sure the House order passed last Friday would therefore supersede and make completely redundant the previous order. There is ample precedent for that. I would draw to your attention once more, sir, the actual order passed unanimously by the House on Friday last which states, in part:

That, if the debate on all stages of Bill C-84 is concluded not later than Tuesday, July 13, 1976, any division or divisions required to dispose of the third reading... shall be taken on Wednesday, July 14, 1976—

I remind you, sir, of the point made by the opposition House leader that all stages have not been concluded. This is not a motion that concludes the third reading stage of the bill. If the third reading stage is not concluded, then that order does not apply to the requirement for the vote to take place on Wednesday next. Therefore, there is no House order which would require the stacking of this motion, and therefore the vote should be taken right now in the House. I know of no authority which would permit the chair to postpone the taking of the vote. Certainly, the motion passed last Friday would not be the basis for that authority, in any event.

● (1640)

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the House that the motion introduced last Friday, pursuant to the agreement between the House leaders and the government leader reads as follows:

That if the debate on all stages of Bill C-84 is concluded not later than Tuesday, July 13, any division or divisions required to dispose of the third reading and passage stage of the said bill shall be taken on Wednesday, July 14, 1976,...

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this means that the amendment moved this afternoon on third reading has nothing to do with the vote on third reading which has been deferred until 2:15 p.m., next Wednesday. Therefore, under our rules, that motion should be put this afternoon.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that somewhat disappoints me.

[English]

The comments of the House leader of the Conservative Party disappoint me. When I discussed with him the procedure which we intend to follow, as I did with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), it was understood that the debate had been completed to all intents and purposes at the amendment stage of third reading and the third reading stage, and in effect everyone had agreed that the vote would be taken on the amendment and subsequently the division would be called on third reading and then the vote deferred. That is why I am most disappointed at this turn of events.

Evidently we must turn now, not to the understanding among hon. members but to the strict legal interpretation of the motions we have before us. I agree fully that an interpretation of the Friday motion could be that recorded divisions would only be delayed until the debate had been completed. It was my understanding, from the indication received from the House leaders, that indeed that was the case. Had it not been for the subsequent declaration by the House leader of the Conservative Party, that would still be my understanding.

In adopting the legal interpretation perhaps I would not be successful in arguing that indeed the vote cannot be deferred until the debate has been completed and that, in fact, the debate may not be completed. But having said that, if that is the interpretation to be placed on Friday's motion, then there is a void. What is to take place in the event that a vote is taken prior to the debate having been completed? If the interpretation of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is correct, that the debate has not been completed on third reading, that situation is not covered by the order approved on Friday. That being the case, we must now go to the other order to be found in Votes and Proceedings of June 29, which reads:

That any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage or the third reading stage of Bill C-84 . . . shall be held at a time to be fixed by the House leaders, provided that that time shall be not more than one week after the request for the division.

A division has been requested and the request is now before the House. Therefore, we should have a House leaders' meeting to determine at what time the vote on third reading should be held.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, throughout this debate on Bill C-84 there was a general understanding in the House that there should be no votes by surprise or by trickery. It was felt that this question was so important that all votes should be set at a time which would be known to all members well in advance. It was for that reason that we fixed the date of the vote on second reading; it was for that reason we fixed the date of the votes on report stage; and it was for that reason we fixed the date of the vote on third reading. It was the general understanding of the House, and it was one with which I agreed, that we should run out this debate this afternoon. If it was not known to be on that basis, hon. members would have continued to speak because nobody wanted a surprise vote or a vote by trickery this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: If this motion is to be interpreted as meaning that we are to have a vote, without notice, this afternoon—and I do not know who might win that vote because no count was taken, since nobody expected there would be voting today or tomorrow—I would point out that from the speeches made this morning by hon. members it is evident they expected the vote to be on Wednesday, because they were encouraging every hon. member to be here on that day. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) and many other hon. members stressed that all members should be here for the vote. They could not be here for a vote if a surprise vote were taken this afternoon.

[Mr. Blais.]

I would then refer hon. members to the motion, and ask them what other reason would there be for having any division or divisions if there can only be one vote, that is, the vote on third reading? The intention must have been to include any votes that would wind up this debate.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, this appears to be a difficult question because it encompasses a number of elements, but if the elements are taken one by one it really is not such a difficult question at all. Governing the whole debate is the order of June 29, which provides that all votes are to be deferred, with no exception. The next element in this equation is the order of July 9. That order does not, as the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) would suggest, contradict the earlier order. It specifies it; it provides that certain kinds of votes are to be taken at a certain time. In other words, it is the application of the general order, and in no way contravenes the order of June 29 which still governs the orders before the House for dealing with all stages and all votes on Bill C-84.

Taking both these elements as understood, we come to the fact that I believe the Chair should put the question on this amendment, and the vote on it will be deferred. Then the Chair should resume debate on Bill C-84, at which time we shall ascertain whether there are further speakers on this bill, apart from the amendment. I believe that is the procedure that should be followed. At the time the Chair puts the amendment there can be no agreement as to the date because it is not provided in the order of July 9. But that is not necessary. All that is necessary is that it be deferred and that the time either be established by the House leaders or, if the debate is finished by tomorrow night, that we revert to the order of July 9 which automatically establishes the time for the vote as being on Wednesday at two o'clock.

If you look at these elements one by one, your Honour will find that there is no problem here at all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has given us the key to this whole thing by referring us back to the order of June 29.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When I was on my feet earlier I had not turned up the wording of the motion of June 29, so I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, your letting me have the floor for a few minutes again. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) was kind enough to refer to my logic as impeccable, but then he tried to set it aside. May I point out to him that there was nothing in the order of last Friday that sets aside the order of June 29, which states quite clearly—and it was decided by a vote of the House—that any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage or third reading of Bill C-84 shall be held at a time to be fixed by the House leaders, and not more than a week later.

This motion for a three months hoist is either one of two things. One choice is that it is one of the divisions required to dispose of the third reading and passage stage of the bill. That is the language of Friday's order; any division or divisions required to dispose of the third reading and passage stage, by Friday's order, shall be taken this Wednesday at two o'clock. If Your Honour rules that this three months' hoist motion is one of those divisions, it seems to me that you should order that the vote be taken on Wednesday at two o'clock.

● (1650)

The other choice open to you is to rule that it is not specifically covered in Friday's motion but that it is covered in the motion of June 29 in this language: any recorded division requested during the third reading stage. I think the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) and I might have trouble trying to apply the language of Friday's order to achieve what we thought we agreed upon. I certainly was in on that agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: You goofed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If we cannot achieve that by arguing the point, then certainly, so far as the order of June 29 is concerned, there cannot be a vote today until there has been a meeting of the House leaders to recommend a time for that vote.

I appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) that we go on with the debate, but I do not see how we can go on with debate on third reading until we find out whether the bill has been given a three months' hoist. We have to have that vote. This is not like the report stage, where the votes can be stored up. It seems to me we cannot go on with third reading debate until we have made a decision on this three months' hoist amendment. But I appeal to you very strongly, sir, that you have two choices: either you rule that it is covered by the wording of Friday's motion, and therefore it is to be voted on Wednesday at two o'clock or if it is not covered there, it is certainly covered in the motion of June 29 and be taken now; it can be taken only after there has been a meeting of the House leaders to recommend the time for that vote.

Though I happen to be known to be on one side of this whole question, in the discussions we have had and when we meet as House leaders we are divided two and two. We have all taken the view, right through the piece, that a surprise vote would be no way to deal with this important issue. It was our understanding that if the debate collapsed on Friday, we were prepared to call it five o'clock. It was our understanding that if the debate collapsed today, we would be prepared to call it ten o'clock and not sit tomorrow.

I think it is unfortunate that this misunderstanding seems to have developed. But if it comes down to a case of the Chair having to rule, I submit very strongly the argument I am making, that Your Honour has to make one choice or the other: either it is covered by Friday's motion, and therefore it can be voted upon on Wednesday—

An hon. Member: A third choice would be to ring the bells.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the third choice?

An hon. Member: Ring the bells.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is exactly the choice Your Honour does not have. There are two orders, and this situation comes under one or the other. There is no possibility of Your Honour calling in the members at this time. It is either covered by Friday's order that it may take place Wednesday, or it is covered by the order of June 29, in which case the House leaders have to meet and recommend the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said earlier that there was an agreement to prevent an unexpected or a snap vote. Then, so as not to be accused or have my colleagues accused of a such an intent, I shall say that we have nothing to do with the motion before us calling for a three-month hoist. So there is no bad faith on our part.

Now, as concerns the amendments considered recently, it was not at all at the same stage. We were then in committee and at that time we had moved the amendments which were disposed of only a few days ago. This morning, it is an amendment that is in order and is designed to defer third reading until three months from now. Mr. Speaker, you asked for the "yeas" and "nays". We said "yea" and the others said "nay". Your Honour had decided that the "nays" had it and you said: Call in the members.

Then, the agreements made earlier between the House leaders have nothing to do with the amendment now before us. The amendments that were at an earlier stage were discussed and it was agreed that a vote should not be taken before Wednesday at 2:15 p.m., like on third reading. But this amendment has only one purpose, and it is to defer to three months from now the vote which was to be taken Wednesday. That is why we do not change our position. You asked that the members be called in, and I think we should vote on this amendment immediately.

[English]

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, you have heard a great deal of learned advice, some not so learned and some partisan. I would just like to make a plea that on the question of the abolition of the death penalty it has been long understood that there would be a free vote for every member of the House, and when we left last weekend, the date was set for next Wednesday. At that time everybody will be here and will be given a chance to have his or her vote recorded. In my opinion, that would be the only wise thing for Your Honour to accept. It must be a vote on all motions, deletions and amendments, on Wednesday after debate is finished. Everybody has been counting on that. Why should we change it now? I think Your Honour has the welfare of the House and the people of Canada at heart, and the members of this House want their votes recorded.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a principle that this House should apply from now on, and that is consistency. Now, on June 29, we passed a resolution precisely to avoid this type of discussion. And that motion provided that no vote, at any stage should take place, and I quote:

That any recorded division requested during the consideration of the report stage or the third reading . . .

—which goes against the arguments of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette)—

. . . shall be held at a time to be fixed by the House leaders, provided that that time shall be not more than one week after the request for the division.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see anything in last Friday's motion which cancels the motion of June 29. Therefore, I do not see how it can now be decided to hold a vote. The House leaders should meet and hold discussions. If they agree and if the vote is held within 10 minutes, that is fine, but I still think we should go by the June 29 resolution which has not been cancelled. This House actually passed it, and I do not really see the purpose of the present discussion.

[English]

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, I seem to have caused a little consternation with the motion which I put, which was seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), this morning. I assure the House that it was not my intention to embarrass either the House leaders or any hon. member of this House. My motion was prompted by the way I feel, and I felt it was necessary because of the concern I have for the constituency of Middlesex-London-Lambton. It was my assumption that the vote would be taken on Wednesday as outlined in a previous order. I am in your hands, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to present this position. When the vote comes, I would prefer—and I am sure the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand would agree—to have all hon. members in the House to express their opinions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak because I cautioned the House about the question of postponing all votes until a specified day. I thought it was wrong then, and the hon. member, whether his intentions were correctly received by the House or not, pointed out clearly how wrong it is. This House has to debate and its members have to stand and be counted at the end of a debate.

● (1700)

As I understand it, the end of the debate on the amendment has come but not the end of the debate on the bill. The debate on third reading can continue. I have not spoken on third reading and I am sure there are other members who intend to speak, but the order laid down on July 9 suggests if—and "if" is a big word—the debate is not concluded the vote will be taken on Wednesday. I suggest to you, Sir, that you have three options: to call it six o'clock and allow the House leaders to meet; to have a vote on the amendment on Wednesday; and the third option is to have the vote on the amendment taken right now.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): As the seconder of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, I should like it perfectly understood that there was no trickery in our minds when it was moved. We felt Bill C-84 should be postponed until after the Olympics—that the capital punishment legislation should be in force during that time, and that point was stressed during the debate many, many times.

Having said that, and without having listened to all the argument just now, I assumed that the vote would be taken on Wednesday afternoon as set forth in the order before the House now. I just want to make myself clear. I have no strong feelings one way or the other as to when it is taken, but in fairness to everybody I think it should be Wednesday.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, all we need to know is whether the last motion moved last Friday can change anything to the motion moved by the government House leader on June 29. If that motion, which reflected the views of the House leaders, is still valid, we must wait until Wednesday to hold the vote. But if the June 29 motion drafted by the House leaders is no longer valid because it is cancelled, so to speak, by last Friday's motion, it is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to rule on this matter and decide whether the vote shall take place Wednesday or today. If that motion is valid, because each motion to amend has to be voted on and the date of the vote agreed upon by the House leaders, then, it is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to make a ruling.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I have received some very valuable contributions from hon. members, although I must say that did not help solve the problem. The House is in a difficult situation at this time. The motion of the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon), which was seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), has come to a vote, and although both members declared it was not their intention to bring about this complication, the Chair cannot rule on their intention, and I have to consider the situation the motion is putting the House in at this time.

[Translation]

As far as I am concerned, in answer to the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), I, for one, have no difficulty with the two orders that were passed by this House on June 29 and July 9.

My interpretation of the order of July 9 deals with a specific matter and is merely a notice given to those hon. members who were to return to their respective ridings, so that they would know when the vote would be taken. It could have simply been announced in the House that an agreement had been reached between the House leaders, but it was decided to introduce a supplementary order. Initially, it was decided as a general principle that all the votes on the report and third reading stages of Bill C-84 would be taken only after an agreement was reached and the time decided upon by all the House leaders.

The order was put last Friday by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) in order to make it quite clear, the report stage having been disposed of, that the vote or votes on third reading would be taken on Wednesday, July 14, immediately after the prayers. There is no inconsistency whatsoever in that.

The only difficulty lies in the fact that an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon) and that the debate was concluded on the amendment which proposed that third reading of the bill be deferred for three months. Therefore, the House now finds itself in a dead end. I think that the point made by the Solicitor General——to the effect that there has been a general understanding that no snap vote will be taken, is well understood. As far as I am concerned I agree with that principale, but that does not solve the difficulty. I agree with the principle that no snap vote should be called, and on that point I think the point of order raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Blais) was well taken.

[English]

[Translation]

Although the hon. member for Témiscamingue mentioned earlier that the Chair had said to call in the members, this does not mean that a member cannot rise on a point of order. Thanks to this point of order, I was able to review the general principles set forth in the previous orders passed on June 29 and July 9.

I see no problem in deferring the vote on the amendment until next Wednesday, since the House cannot, according to all precedents, proceed with the debate on third reading without ruling on the amendment now before us. We must therefore look for a way out of this dead end.

[English]

I know the minister is trying to stand up, and I shall welcome his suggestion at the end of my remarks.

Now that the question has been put on the amendment, we are facing a dead-end difficulty for a different reason. Members who are not here and who have the right to participate in a vote, if my interpretation is correct, according to the order, cannot be blamed for not being here and would have the right to blame the House for any vote taken in their absence without notice. Any member who was planning to speak on third reading tomorrow might be prevented from speaking if we postpone the vote until next Wednesday.

The fact that the vote is postponed or would be postponed on the amendment, might prevent other hon. members from bringing in amendments to the third reading motion. To delay that vote until next Wednesday, and if at that time the House felt that a third reading vote should be taken immediately, because some members might have planned to go to their ridings or have other engagements, would also cause confusion. But at this time my immediate conclusion is that no vote can be taken immediately if I interpret the two orders correctly.

[Translation]

The vote cannot be held right now. Accordingly, it must be deferred until next Wednesday, unless the House unanimously decides to amend the previous orders.

● (1710)

[English]

The House is master of its own rules and of its own decisions. Unless hon. members after consultation can bring some definite proposal to the Chair which could be put to the members so that, with the unanimous consent of all hon. members, there might be some modification as to the set time of the vote on the amendment, we cannot proceed any longer and I would have to call it either six o'clock or ten o'clock. We could call it six o'clock so that the House leaders could discuss the question during supper time and, when we reconvene at eight o'clock, suggest a solution. I invite the minister to speak at this time.

Capital Punishment

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances, in order to enable those further conversations to which you referred to take place, I move, seconded by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand):

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I know the motion is not debatable; therefore I rise on a point of order. I wonder, before Your Honour, puts the question, if there is not some possibility of our agreeing now, with unanimous consent, to adjourn until eight o'clock this evening to allow House leaders to meet. This motion could certainly be put at eight o'clock. I do not know if that would be contrary to what the minister had in mind. Frankly, I do not know what the minister had in mind, but I think there would be agreement for the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will agree that the rules are strict with regard to motions such as the one moved. They are not debatable. I must put the question immediately, unless the minister decides to withdraw the motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Its adoption will mean that the House will be called to sit at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)) which was agreed to on the following division.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

On the order: Government Orders:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Solicitor General,—That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be now read a third time.

Deferred division on the motion in amendment thereto of Mr. Condon, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand),—That Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day three months hence.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when I left the House yesterday to attend the commemoration service for the eleven Israeli athletes who were killed in Munich, I remarked to my parliamentary secretary that I hoped I would not see him again until Wednesday, and he smiled reassuringly.

An hon. Member: Change secretaries.

Mr. Sharp: However, some rather unforeseen difficulties seem to have arisen partly because, if I may say, the French version of the House order which had been approved did not accord with the English version. This is a point which perhaps ought to be looked into, but be that as it may, the House leaders met this morning to see what might be the best way of proceeding with the continuation of the debate on Bill C-84. The House leaders are agreed on all points, particularly that we do not in any way want to hamper the debate on Bill C-84. Indeed, our wish is to facilitate it and to bring it to an eventual conclusion.

Our unanimous recommendation, therefore, is that with the consent of the House we proceed now with the debate on the main motion for the third reading of Bill C-84.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the government House leader has said, and he has put the proposition precisely. As one of the House leaders I certainly consent, and I commend that arrangement to all members of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is an arrangement to which we also agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I think the government House leader forgot to mention one little thing which we also discussed this morning, namely that if the discussion on third reading ends before one o'clock this afternoon, there should be an oral questions period this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it understood, therefore, after discussion this morning, that the House will consider it one o'clock if the debate terminates so that there will in fact be certain to be a two o'clock proceeding this afternoon, including a question period and routine proceedings? The recommendation before the House is that, notwithstanding the practices and precedents of the House which would preclude discussion of Bill C-84 as long as the amendment motion remains outstanding, the House give unanimous consent to proceed to use the time today to discuss the main motion for third reading of Bill C-84. Does the House consent to that?

● (1110)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Was the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I was not apprised of the actual consent for this Procedure until a few moments ago. I wonder if the government House leader would have the courtesy to at least advise me. One of the House leaders did, but I should like to hear it from the one who has to announce it to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it that the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) is not on this occasion withholding his consent but is establishing a plan for the future and a very valid one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Monday, July 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84 to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Condon.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I must admit there are times in the House when we have the impression it is absolutely useless to make a speech. As regards the discussion on abolition of capital punishment, I think we can state, if we consider the position of the cabinet, that it would be pointless to extend this debate. However, as the majority of Canadians have already showed that they do not agree with the position of the federal government, we should try once again to give them a little common sense, a little logic and to inform the leader of the government and his staff that the protection of Canadian society is more important than the personal principles of any member of the cabinet.

An hon. Member: Tell that to Mr. Clark.

Mr. Wagner: I already did.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I think before continuing with this debate on capital punishment, and without intending to prolong it needlessly nor to repeat arguments that others have already advanced, I should like to congratulate those members of the House who courageously and persistently have fought so hard both in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and at report stage in this House for the cause of social order and common sense in advocating the death penalty for premeditated murders. Without discriminating against anyone may I with your permission, Mr. Speaker, single out the determination and the resourcefulness with which the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has led the fight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: He has been an inspiration to everyone, and he has sincerely believed in the necessity of keeping capital punishment in order to check and prevent the numerous activities of organized crime.

After a conscious examination of the views expressed in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, I must admit that I remain unshaken in my opinion that, especially because of the existence of organized crime and in order to protect the lives of innocent people and to secure a greater degree of safety for our policemen and prison guards, Bill C-84 must be defeated on third reading.

During this debate I have been particularly impressed with what a convinced abolitionist like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said about the necessity of retaining capital punishment for such odious crimes as high treason or espionage in wartime. His experience as prime minister during a difficult period of the cold war and his lifelong devotion to the cause of fundamental freedom and penal reform should have been enough to convince the government to amend this bill on this point at least. It should also incite some members who voted for the bill on second reading to reflect further and, hopefully, to reverse their position and join the ranks of the retentionists.

[Translation]

It is no mere coincidence, but the result of a vast experience and constant devotion to the cause of law and order that another abolitionist of international fame, Mr. Jean Imbert, whose book entitled La peine de mort is authoritative in this field, also comes to the conclusion that the state must maintain capital punishment for crimes of high treason and those of spying in times of war.

Is it not terrifying, Mr. Speaker, to think that the adoption of this bill would leave Canada without any real punishment for those who would conspire against the security of the state or the lives of its leader and other officials?

[English]

As discussion progressed in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs members of the House discovered a series of serious omissions, shortcomings and deficiencies in the legislation, giving the bill all the appearance of having been unduly improvised and rushed to this House. For instance, there is no provision for a more severe penalty—which could be death—for the commission of a second or even a third murder, yet it is not using scare tactics to suggest that the possibility of escape accompanied by murder by hardened criminals, is very real. Nobody can deny that. But under this bill the worst punishment such murderers can expect is to be condemned, for a second time, to life imprisonment. Mr. Speaker, there must be an end to softness or, as we say in French: il y a une limite à la bonasserie.

● (1120)

Had the government been sensible enough to accept amendments providing death sentences for high treason and second murder, I am sure some of the retentionists would have been more inclined to vote for this legislation. But as it stands now I, for one, cannot in conscience accept that the security of the state or the safety of prison guards and policemen should be put in jeopardy by the adoption of Bill C-84.

While I disagree with him, I do respect the views expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the course of this debate. I know that he is sincerely convinced of the rectitude of his position, as I am of my own. But I less than admire one argument brought forward by the Prime Minister when he spoke on second reading. Making his appeal to the House on June 15, as reported in Hansard, page 14499 the Prime Minister said:

> It is not open to anyone among us to take refuge in the comforting illusion that we are debating nothing more than an abstract theory of criminal justice, and that it will be the Cabinet's sole responsibility to decide the actual fate of individual murderers if this bill is defeated. I want to make it very clear that, if a majority of hon. members vote against abolition, some people are going to be hanged. Their death would be a direct consequence of the negative decision made by this House on this bill.

Some people have held this statement from the Prime Minister as showing strong leadership. I personally regard it, on the contrary, as an attempt to scare and even to blackmail the opponents of Bill C-84 into voting against their own convictions for fear of being regarded as executioners.

There is something frightening in the Prime Minister's tactics; for members of parliament, while open to compassion, should nevertheless remain above such personal considerations as the ones the right hon. gentleman mentioned. Be it for murder, rape, theft or even a minor offence, we are here to determine the law of the land and the penalties for misbehaviour. We are in no way responsible for the way citizens respond to legitimate decisions of this parliament; nor should we be influenced in the knowledge that in their disobedience of the law such persons will be imprisoned or put to death. The argument advanced by the Prime Minister in this regard is tantamount to undue pressure, impeding the freedom of thought for those who are about to take a very serious decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I totally reject the allegations of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that, should Bill C-84 be defeated, those who vote against it will be responsible for the death of the murderers. None of us, including members of the cabinet, ought to feel guilty for action according to his conscience and enacting legislation to uphold social order and deterring the most hardened criminals from making attempts on the lives of others, especially policemen and prison guards. The first and only ones to be responsible for their own deaths would be those who have cold bloodedly slain their victims in defiance of a law which clearly and plainly stated the death penalty would be imposed for their crimes. Moreover, those criminals, during their trials and through appeals, had every chance to clear themselves and prove they deserved commutation.

The fact that the Prime Minister has thus attempted to personalize the debate, by pointing out to 11 prisoners awaiting the gallows, proves how desperate is the situation in which he has placed himself by trying to impose his own wishes on Parliament and the Canadian people.

However, it is the very same Prime Minister who has created this problem by systematically refusing, since 1968, to implement a legislation which has been twice ruled out by Parliament, during the time he has been a member of the cabinet. Only the Prime Minister is responsible for the situation in which he willingly placed himself and from which he is trying to extricate by setting up a detestable scarecrow to urge us to vote against our deepest convictions.

[English]

The Prime Minister knows very well that no member of parliament is asking for a mass execution of those waiting in the death rows. Every one of us, I dare say, would be satisfied to see the government exercise the royal prerogative of mercy in every case where it is warranted. As for the others, they knew the law when they committed their crimes. Moreover, they had been warned in no uncertain terms—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): By the Prime Minister.

Mr. Wagner: —by the Prime Minister himself on May 16, 1973, when his government proposed Bill C-2. I quote what the Prime Minister said on that day, as reported in Hansard, page 3843:

> Those who mock the desire of Canadians for an orderly, law-abiding community, those who hold in contempt those restraints on human conduct that enable us to live as free men and women, will be shown that society is not only resilient but that it is capable of protecting itself and of meting out whatever punishment is required.

● (1130)

That is the end of the quotation from the Prime Minister. You remember, Mr. Speaker, during the October crisis how the Prime Minister derided those weak-kneed bleeding hearts who, he said, were afraid to take the necessary measures to protect Canadians against a handful of FLQ members. You remember that, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

We also remember, Mr. Speaker, in what anguished terms the Prime Minister at that time—

Mr. Béchard: It sounds like a sermon!

Mr. Wagner: As the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) says, the Prime Minister's speech did sound like a sermon.

Mr. Béchard: Yours.

Mr. Wagner: That is right. It sounded like a sermon when he was then warning people that the next FLQ victims might be either a bank or credit union manager, or the corner grocer or even an innocent child.

Without echoing the melodramatic tone of the Prime Minister, would I not be even more justified in resorting to the same argument the head of the government used during the October crisis, because bank robbers and hired assassins have given us ample proof that they will never hesitate to kill to reach their ends.

Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of this text, I wish to repeat the warning given on May 16, 1973 by the very distinguished right hon. Prime Minister of Canada to potential murderers of policemen and prison guards, and I quote:

> Those who mock the desire of Canadians for an orderly, lawabiding community, those who hold in contempt those restraints on human conduct that enable us to live as free men and women, will be shown that society is not only resilient but that it is capable of protecting itself and of meting out whatever punishment is required.

Now then, what was the punishment advocated by the Prime Minister, what was it? It was the death penalty for the murder of policemen killed on duty. The Prime Minister cannot deny it today because, on October 24, 1973, he voted for Bill C-2 on second reading. Mr. Speaker, either the Prime Minister was convinced in 1973 of the necessity to maintain capital punishment in some specific circumstances, and if so nothing can explain the automatic commutations of death sentences made since then, or—and Bill C-84 confirms it eloquently—the head of the government was resorting to subterfuges to hide his real intentions from Parliament, and in that case I leave it to the public to judge his actions. As it happens, Mr. Speaker, the great majority of this public want Bill C-84 defeated. We will soon know, in a few days probably, whether the will of the public or the will of Parliament, under the direction of the Prime Minister, under the direction of his majority government, will prevail.

[English]

I hope we will not hear any further tales from the government side about the so-called free vote on Bill C-84.

An hon. Member: Yes, you will.

Mr. Wagner: If we do, we shall respond. By moving this bill as a government bill, the Prime Minister has prevented his own colleagues in the cabinet—some of whom in the past have expressed contrary views—from now expressing their personal views or, to use the words of the Prime Minister, to vote according to their own conscience. Had the Prime Minister wanted a truly free vote, he would have asked a private member to bring in this bill, even on his own terms, and every member of this House could have voted as he wished, whether the member were a backbencher, a member of the cabinet or a member of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: As regards government backbenchers, had this been a private member's bill, they would not have been exposed to ever possible undue pressure not directly related to the capital punishment issue.

Mr. Speaker, I know that if Bill C-84 is accepted the morale of our policemen and especially of our prison guards will be greatly shaken. Yet I am sure that as law-abiding citizens those peace officers will accept, despite their reservations, their apprehensions and their fears, the will of a parliamentary majority. I hope at last there will not be massive resignations among them, which would jeopardize security in our penitentiary institutions.

But peace officers are men like everybody else. They are not inmune from errors or unpredictable reactions. Thus it is essential that in the performance of their duties they can enjoy the greatest possible serenity of mind. Will it be the case if Bill C-84 is accepted? I doubt it.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall what the right hon. Prime Minister himself stated, for it is strange, Mr. Speaker, how sometimes their own statements come back to haunt politicians. Might I remind you that the Prime Minister himself declared in this House on May 16, 1973, when Bill C-2 was under study, and I quote:

> Out of fear for his safety, and the safety of his loved ones, even the most merciful of men becomes unwilling to assist the wayward.

● (1140)

[English]

Because of the importance of that statement, I want to read in English the warning expressed by the Prime Minister only three years ago:

> Out of fear for his safety and the safety of his loved ones, even the most merciful of men will become unwilling to assist the wayward and the feckless.

I pray God, Mr. Speaker, that this warning of the Prime Minister will never become a prophecy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, if I take part in the debate on third reading of Bill C-84, I do so not to delay the work of the House but rather to point out, once again, that if the government has reached the point where it introduces a bill to abolish capital punishment, it does so because of its many commutations in the last few years. To my mind, the government, through this bill, wants Parliament to approve what cabinet has done in recent years.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length at this stage because the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada dealt with the matter yesterday in some detail, and I share his point of view. That is why it would be useless to repeat the logical arguments that can be invoked to oppose passage of this bill.

I also listened very closely to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who made a very sensible speech and recalled the words of the Prime Minister, at the time when discussions were echoed by the press throughout Canada, and to a certain extent I support the views expressed by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) on Bill C-84 concerning capital punishment.

I would have appreciated it, however, if the hon. member had been successful in convincing the leader of the official opposition to reconsider his position and go along courageously with those who oppose Bill C-84 for reasons as valid as those advocated by abolitionists. Having said that, I still believe however, that if we could have a really free vote in this House, the leader of the opposition would also enjoy that choice. I do agree on that. But as I said earlier I am not yet convinced that a genuine free vote can be held in the House on that issue. Members of some parties are so used to following the party line that even if the government allows members to express themselves freely, they will not take this opportunity to vote according to the will of the population.

Mr. Speaker, I submit what I indicated a number of times, namely that on the occasion of such an important legislation, the people of Canada should have been consulted through a referendum. Not that kind of plebiscite that was held in 1941, when the Liberal government wanted to get released from their commitment that there would be no conscription across the country. Not a kind of referendum where members of parliament and ministers would appear one after the other before television, to try and convince the people to vote this or that way, but a true referendum, a really democratic one decreed by this House and held without TV debate.

When the people are consulted, they should be trusted to take their own responsibilities. Such a consultation would have given an opportunity for democracy to go through this difficult stage. More trust would have been shown toward the younger Canadians, and they would have realized that our parliamentary system, one of the best in the world, is capable of respecting the people's will and giving them an opportunity to express it when important decisions have to be taken.

The holding of such a referendum was flatly denied for a number of reasons. However, some groups held consultations, and I would take this opportunity to commend the Canadian Police Association for holding such a referendum on this subject. And I refer to the brief dated May 3, 1976 that was submitted to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. May I quote the following excerpt from that document:

> Our association recently circulated through various newspapers a questionnaire on capital punishment. Here is the response of the public to the following questions. Question No. 1: Should capital punishment be retained only for the murder of police officers on duty, or prison guards?
> Reply of the public: Yes, 4,855; no, 55,425.

This is a significant reply obtained after free consultation.

Question No. 2: For the murder of anyone while carrying out a premeditated crime? Reply of the public: Yes, 55,374; no, 8,516. Question No. 3: Should the capital punishment issue be decided by a Canadian referendum? Reply of the public: Yes, 55,282; no, 3,444. Question No. 4: Are you against the death penalty because of the means of execution (hanging)? Reply of the public: Yes, 9,954; no, 44,258.

This is significant. The word "hanging" is not at issue, but the whole basis of the question is truly analyzed. People truly went to the bottom of things.

Question No. 5: If yes to question No. 4, what means of execution would you favour? Reply of the public: Electric chair: 2,822. Gas chamber: 2,486. Drugs: 2,911. Firing squad: 856. Any public means: 693. The means used by the murderer: 37.

I will come back to this question later.

Question No. 6: If you are against the death penalty by any method whatsoever, what penalty would you favour? Reply of the public: Psychiatric treatment and rehabilitation: 168. No parole: 11,712. Parole: 194.

The number of respondents represents 87 per cent of the total population. It is therefore with good reason that members of Parliament oppose the passage of Bill C-84. They argue that te majority of the population favour retention of the death penalty. The population is absolutely right if we consider this consultation made by the Toronto Police Association.

● (1150)

Mr. Speaker, we have also received many letters from the public. I shall certainly not read even one of them because they all express approximately the same opinion. But I still insist that this is a very serious situation. We are all Christians. We all need some light and I believe that it would not be improper for the House to ask the Holy Ghost to enlighten us so that we may receive the enlightenment that we need before the vote and be truly able to take an action that will be in accordance with the wishes of the people. A proverb says Vox populi, vox Dei, which means that the voice of the people is the voice of God. As Christians, we must therefore have the humility to ask the enlightenment that we need to do what the people wish for the greater good of Canada.

I would like that between now and tomorrow, when we have the opportunity to ponder some more over the seriousness of the choice we have to make, we can so express ourselves that people will rest assured that all members voted conscientiously. That is the important thing to do if we are to restore credibility in the minds of Canadians about the role of members of parliament.

It is current practice for bills introduced in the House, after being dealt with at the second reading stage, to be sent to a committee. Bill C-84 was sent to the justice and legal affairs committee but, unfortunately, I believe the purpose of that committee was distorted because I have always believed that the referral of a bill to a committee of the House aims at giving the public a chance to be heard, to present briefs, to express verbally their approval or disapproval of the bill.

Unfortunately I deplore the fact that the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs proceeded so fast that it was not possible to call witnesses for or against capital punishment so that we might have had the widest consultation possible and be in a position to present amendments that would have made this bill better understood by the public. Canadians could have hoped for the future of our country to have the best possible law and the closest to their expectations.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we depreciated the actual value of committees as the public has been deprived of that benefit. I know that the committee sat but it did so rapidly that it was impossible for the citizens concerned to come to Ottawa and make representations that would have surely been well received by every member of the committee as it is their role to entertain representations from the public.

I am sorry but I think that that kind of procedure is an attempt against democracy and, in the future, I am afraid that the public will not have too much confidence in those committees and that they will neglect to express their point of view in other circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, no need to say that my position has not changed because I am more convinced than ever that we should give to those responsible for the protection of the individual, the protection of our property and the public. I regret that the majority did not agree to offer that protection to which the public is entitled. I am afraid that henceforth the people will not have enough confidence in the protection we can give them and will take the law into their own hands. This would lead to a society of disorder, a society of violence. However, as I said last week, God knows we are well on the path of the society of violence that we accept as a normal evolution. We talk about evolution but what is it? We can have forward evolution but we can also have retrograde evolution. So the word evolution does not mean in our society that we are wiser than our fathers and our great-grandfathers. Fair enough, there must be evolution but if we really want that it be in the right direction, we should take measures to avoid the situations of violence, we should suppress all the causes that lead us to violence. Whether these causes are political, social or economic, as parliamentarians we have the duty to open our eyes, to be well aware of the glaring facts and to take the necessary measures so that there can be more justice in our country and so that we can prevent that idea from springing up in the minds of those who suffer from persecution before justice, I mean that of wanting to take the law into their own hands. Moreover, we should repress those criminals who have the regrettable tendency to attack their fellow-beings, even though they are deterred by the courageous attitude of society and by the parliaments which adopt laws to protect them against themselves.

I think that was our ancestors' aim: to provide that punishment for the criminals in the Criminal Code. We must protect society against those who have this tendency, against those who are prepared to go to any end to seize the property of others by violence, at the point of a gun.

Mr. Speaker, I think we could have found a form of execution for criminals without talking about hanging. I still hope it will be possible to find a humane way of applying death sentences, likely to make those who will be aware of it understand that society is sorry for having to execute the guilty, to deprive him of the great gift of life, but doing so in a human way, society will understand that such action is prompted by a sense of duty, a spirit of justice and at the same time a respect for the great value of human life.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude on these words, asking my colleagues to think again about the seriousness of the situation and to trust those who are responsible for administrating and enforcing our laws, for promoting as well the justice we are asking for. These people must have confidence in us. Within a few days, the Olympic Games will take place in Montreal. There will be 16,000 members of the Armed Forces, thousands of policemen who will risk their lives and will be the advanced guard; those people will be there to protect society against those who might wish to take advantage of the situation to cause trouble and disturbances or to take barbaric action. We rely on them to protect us, to ensure public protection. But for God's sake, tomorrow, let us give them the necessary tools to enable them to carry out their duty, which will hopefully prevent us from going through unpleasant events that would damage the reputation of our country, our province and the city of Montreal. Thus, policemen will be able to carry out their duty while feeling protected, and should potential murderers plan to do something, they would act very carefully to avoid being sentenced to death.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that I do not fear capital punishment at all because I do not intend to murder anyone. Now, if the present act is amended, capital punishment will apply only to those convicted of murder. With Bill C-84, all these provisions are removed, there will be life sentencing, and God knows how many life sentences, in the past, have been commuted to a few years in prison only. Then, life sentence is changed again; they speak of 15, 20 or 25 years. This is not even a life sentence, but a specified period in prison.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly vote against Bill C-84 on third reading and I hope that meanwhile, the government will review its position and introduce a better legislation.

● (1200)

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend hon. members who spoke today and yesterday at this stage of the proceedings. I have been extraordinarily concerned with the turn of events in this particular debate. First of all, this bill was advanced, not because there was a demand by the government caucus, nor because there was a demand from the public, but merely as a cabinet relief bill. It was introduced merely to relieve the cabinet of a decision that it has assumed over the years, a practice which I have deprecated, placing itself in the position of the final court of appeal on capital sentences.

As a body, the cabinet is totally unsuited for that position. Nowhere else do we have questions of justice or legal decisions taken by a civil body as a final decision. This is a practice that grew up in the 1960s. Certainly it was the practice when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was leader of the government. It is a practice that I protested then and during the years following under Mr. Pearson. We know there were political considerations in the determination of whether the sentence against this or that condemned person, whose rights had been fully protected by the courts all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada and in respect of whom the courts had decreed the penalty according to law, should be exacted. There has been this 14 years of practice.

I can understand that the cabinet, having backed itself into a corner as a result of the illogical law of 1967—that is, the limitations on capital punishment at the time, renewed in 1972—is now facing some cases where it actually would have to carry out the law. As a result, the cabinet brought forward this bill under the guise of a free vote.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), and others in this House demonstrated—and I will not repeat the arguments—just how free the vote really was. This is the biggest hoax on the public in years and, goodness knows, there have been real hoaxes perpetrated on the public in the last few years. The very circumstances surrounding the introduction of the bill, under the principle of cabinet solidarity, ties up the cabinet. The cabinet had no free vote in this regard. There will be pious confidence that as a result of a free debate and a free vote, this House adopted on second reading the principle of abolition of capital punishment. I will speak about the second reading vote in a moment. The suggestion that there was a free vote is the laugh of the century.

Government supporters found themselves, for one reason or another, under various pressures—which were not applicable to members on this side of the House—in spite of the so-called right to exercise a free vote. I could even go to the extent of suggesting that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was restricted in his role as Conservative House leader in negotiating certain aspects of this debate because members of the Conservative caucus said this was not a party position, and if there were to be arrangements made with regard to the debate they would be made between supporters and opponents of the bill. That was not apparent on the government side.

Yesterday, during discussion on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe indicated quite conclusively that there were pressures put on certain members, as did the hon. member for Témiscamingue, and no one would dare controvert their positions.

It is now said by some pundits that parliament seems irrelevant to the public scene. Well, I do not agree with that, but certainly this debate can be used as an example. There is no public demand for the abolition of capital punishment. To the contrary. Those hon. members who are honest enough to speak about the reaction among their constituents, either through polls or otherwise, know that there is only a small fraction of the Canadian public which advocates the abolition of capital punishment. Therefore, this long debate on Bill C-84 is not as a result of public demand. The situation is to the contrary.

● (1210)

There is another point on which I should like to comment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If junior hon. members of the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Notwithstanding what we say on either side of the House, Mr. Speaker, I resent the suggestion that there may be some inequality amoung members. We are all hon. members.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is obvious that my words struck home in that I am taken back to the point which I started making, that certain people like to read many of the speeches that are made. I would say that usually when I refer to hon. junior members of the House, I mean to refer to inexperience. Other than that, we all stand equal.

An hon. Member: Innuendo.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I should like to point out to the hon. member that we are here to debate Bill C-84, and I suggest that he keep to the subject matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it is the noisemakers who interrupted me. If they are to be permitted the opportunity to make irrelevant interruptions, I have the right to reply.

An hon. Member: Shame.

An hon. Member: We are all equal when it comes to irrelevancy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are also equal when it comes to conforming to the practices of the House so far as reading speeches is concerned. The point to which I wish to come back concerns the so-called principle of the bill. Some hon. members felt at some point in the report stage of this bill that if they were to support certain amendments they would be voting against what had been adopted as the principle of the bill. Nothing could be further from the truth.

It is a fact that in the preparation of the amendments to the rules, or the changes in the procedures in 1969, second reading ceased to be the adoption in principle of a bill. The rules that have been quoted in the House go back to British practice, which also predates changes in their rules. There is nothing like using wrong authorities to support a poor case, and that is what has happened. For instance, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put out in the debate that there had been adoption of the bill in principle. Occasionally these things are reported in the press and then someone keeps insisting that second reading is adoption in principle. But there is nothing in our rules, as they were changed, to say so.

Second reading is passage of a stage and reference to committee. How many times over the past seven years have bills been brought forward by the government which were controversial, but which were given second reading by the opposition with the reservation that certain amendments would be adopted. This is so the House can proceed to the next stage. Here, again, I should like to make reference to hon. members whose experience is relatively limited. Prior to the time I mentioned, if hon. members wish to go back to the debates they will see what happened when there was a total block on second reading because it was deemed to be adoption in principle of the bill. But to get away from that, to make the proceedings more flexible, it was changed to mean reference to a committee.

We are now at the most important stage of the bill.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is important all the way.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But the most important stage, if I may say so, is the stage after which there have been amendments. The minister in charge of Bill C-84 has accepted some amendments and there have been others put forward by members of the House and adopted by the House. Let us look at Bill C-83 to which some 60 amendments were made, if not more. It is the stage at which the House will vote on the bill and either accept or reject it. At that stage we see the embodiment of the law which will be applied in future to govern the actions of the Canadian public. It is not that which is there as a framework on second reading.

There is another point which I should like to make. I challenge the common belief that in an amending bill there is any other principle than that a certain law shall be amended. Bill C-84 contains many provisions which may indirectly have to do with changing the nature of the penalty, and it is merely a bill like others such as Bill C-83, a bill to amend the Criminal Code of Canada. Can anyone tell me that Bill C-83 is a gun control bill, when there are important sections in it dealing with wiretapping and other matters?

This is merely a bill to amend the Criminal Code. If there is to be a principle, it is merely that. The distinction must be made with, for instance, Bill C-79 which set up the whole framework of the Anti-Inflation Board. It started out with the title and proceeded in detail. This bill has no title. If there is a total bill, one can find the principle such as in Bill C-79. What was it? It was an act to create the Anti-Inflation Board and give it certain powers. That is not so with this particular bill. Therefore, I say that the debate on principle is at this stage, and that a vote at the report stage which is contrary in part to the vote at second reading stage is not a vote against the principle of a bill previously adopted by this House. To me it is a fallacious argument to say that on an amending bill there can be a vote against the principle of the bill. The only vote which would be against the principle of this bill would be one which would refuse to amend the Criminal Code.

This subject was brought forward, as I said, by way of a government bill. There recently came to my study a paper prepared by Sir David Stephens, the former Clerk of the House of Lords in Britain. It is available to the procedure committee, particularly to a subcommittee headed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane). It deals with private members' initiatives and with private members' legislation. There are classic examples of how, in the British House, subjects which are highly arguable from a moral point of view—abortion, divorce, capital punishment, homosexuality, and some others—always come through a private member so that there is a true free vote. The government there recognizes that there is a very deep and fundamental difference among its supporters.

That is how this bill should have come forward. I am sure the government could have found any number of its supporters who would have been the proudest people on earth to act as sponsors of this bill, and possibly the seconder could even have come from somewhere in the opposition. But it would have been a private member's bill and then we would have a true free vote. However, there are other people in this House who decide how things shall be done.

All I can say is that this has been a grievous lost opportunity for actually giving private members in this House the opportunity of expressing themselves and voting according to how they see it, rather than merely being caught up in the party machinery, the caucus machinery and in some other areas where it is said there are powers which have even greater influence on a particular party and its members. I am quoting from a British document which refers to the Trade Union Council, The TUC, which in many instances has to be directly consulted by the British Labour Party and the Labour government in order to determine what legislation shall come forward and what shall be contained in the legislation. I hope we do not have that practice and that we will not turn back the clock in so far as the influence of the private member is concerned.

Rule changes are proposed for this House always under a banner of so-called efficiency. All they do is make it easier for the cabinet. All they do is hack away at the few remaining controls there are; and this is supposed to be a responsible government! Whatever powers there are of examination, of questioning and control of the cabinet by the House go out under the expediency of efficiency.

Then we get the pundits outside complaining about parliament. Parliament itself, under the influence of very overpowering cabinet power, has fashioned its own hair-shirt and has sown the seeds of its own destruction in many ways. To use another simile, perhaps the way has been prepared for the charge that parliament is irrelevant because what is the point of discussion? Government backbenchers sit impatiently because they are precluded from participating in debate—and I have sat on the government side—because cabinet ministers want their legislation to go forward. People are asked blindly to support legislation, not to criticize publicly and not to rock the boat. But that is not parliament. I must say that in this particular debate I was glad to see some hon. members on the government side break those chains and speak independently with regard to this bill.

I and many hon. members have made reference to public opinion. To be subjective, this past weekend I was in Edmonton. I must say that I would not dare put down in Hansard, for fear of offending some souls, the nature of the language of the criticism of this bill and of the government which was expressed to me. Only one person, a lady friend of our family, called me and said she was glad that the vote went as it did. I expected that; I have known her as a lifelong abolitionist. I respect her opinion; but she is one of few, and her rights were not being trampled on. Certainly, the government, in insisting on going forward with this bill, is flying in the face of public opinion.

With regard to an entirely different subject, I was rather amused last Thursday when the Prime Minister tried to justify the incomprehensible stand of the government on Taiwan within the context of the Olympics. He asserted to the right hon. member for Prince Albert that because the government felt there was a strong majority of the people of Canada supporting its "one China" policy, it was correct in going forward as it was regarding Taiwan and the Olympic controversy. The government said, "Public opinion is with us, and therefore we are right". But what about this particular bill, Mr. Speaker? Public opinion is against the government so if the other argument was correct, this one is equally correct and the government is wrong. If in one case public opinion is used as an argument in support of the government's position, then the government must, logically, rely upon public opinion with regard to this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am a retentionist and I appreciate the speech the hon. member is making. With regard to the policy on China, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said many times that we recognize only one China, so let us not mix the cards here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is not a point of order; it is an argument which can be made at another time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will start back at square one, Mr. Speaker. The question is whether there shall be reliance upon public opinion to justify the government's stand. On Friday last the Prime Minister used the support of public opinion to buttress his case with regard to Taiwan in the Olympic context. To be logical, the government must have regard to public opinion on Bill C-84; but in this particular case public opinion is to be disregarded.

We have seen the reaction of the police and prison guards to this bill, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to have recourse to, nor would I repeat the worst threats that have been made. I think policemen and prison guards are reasonable people and they have a very difficult job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They have been doing a very difficult job with a law that specifically singled them out for protection, but in effect the law was set aside. Now there is being substituted a longer penalty of 25 years' imprisonment. We are saying to the prison guard that the only way we are going to protect him from being fatally attacked by prisoners is to keep them under his care for many more years. We are going to incarcerate murderers longer, and if they kill one, two, three, four—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They can kill one very day, if they want to.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —all they will get is 25 years. There is nothing to lose.

Mr. Darling: Fifteen years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then there is the question of parole. I do not suppose anybody who killed a second time or killed in a prison would get much sympathy with respect to parole. But it is ludicrous to think that long-term sentences of this kind will provide protection for prison guards. Society has a responsibility for the protection of fellow prisoners as well. The fact that a man is sentenced to jail, for whatever crime he may have been found guilty of, certainly is not to be taken to mean that he is being sentenced to exposure of being killed by someone within the prison system. In practice, one might be so cynical as to say that is what some of the abolitionists may hope. It is a very harsh form of attrition, but I honestly think that some people hope that will happen. What a penal system we would have if we were to substitute the lawful executioner and put in his place the unlawful executioner within the prison system!

As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) detailed the other day, many sections within the National Defence Act still provide for the death penalty. That act says that every person—not merely a serviceman or servicewoman—who commits an offence under certain sections is subject to the death penalty.

What about all the bleeding hearts in regard to the elimination of the death penalty by the cabinet and those who support them? Why were no amendments brought forward in this bill to remove those sections from the National Defence Act? It would have been very simple, if the principle had been to eliminate capital punishment. But certain sections of the Criminal Code are amended to change certain categories of crime, parole is arranged differently, and the death sentence is left in a very important statute of this country to cover certain circumstances. I suppose it would be ironical to say it would be rather strange to see an event happen within the next few months which would bring the perpetrator of a certain crime under those provisions of the National Defence Act. That would be a really interesting situation.

As I said on second reading, the burden of proving that the change is for the better is on those who advocate support for this bill. It is not up to the so-called retentionists to prove their case; it is for the abolitionists to prove it. I will not go so far as to say that they must prove their case beyond any reasonable doubt, but it is their responsibility to prove that the abolition of capital punishment will be a change for the better and that our system of justice and protection of the public will be improved. I submit that the arguments put forward by the supporters of this bill are inadequate. They have not proved their case. They have failed to discharge the burden put upon them by logical debate. For this reason, any in this House who doubt that the abolition of capital punishment will be an improvement in our system of justice ought to reject this bill. I invite my colleagues in this House to do so.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, one of the aspects of this debate which I find most deplorable arose when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) virtually accused all retentionist members of parliament and Canadians of being seekers of vengeance who were not interested in justice. I suggest that was a false imputation and a harsh accusation. I submit there was no justification for so accusing those who in this House and elsewhere favour the retention of capital punishment.

I abhor the fact that some hon. members debated this whole question, as epitomized by the Prime Minister's speech, on the basis of what is a deterrent to murder. Arguments were put forward to show that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. I suggest that this debate should not have been conducted in those terms. Certainly, the Prime Minister should not have put the matter in that light. We are considering the imposition of capital punishment only in for a small category of serious crimes.

I agree that not every case in which a human being loses his life as a consequence of another human being's action should be considered as murder punishable by death. That is not the subject matter of this debate, notwithstanding all efforts to make some people believe it is. Mr. Speaker, in essence we are considering capital punishment only in relation to a few serious crimes against mankind and the state. Hon. members who proposed amendments to the bill felt that the offences which warranted capital punishment should include treason, piracy, hijacking and murder by hired killers, by the "kill for pay" people.

I think that most proponents of abolition would find themselves in an uncomfortable position if they were members of cabinet. I acknowledge that if I were in cabinet and had to consider the commutation of the death penalty, I should face a most heart-rending decision. Nevertheless, such decisions fall within the responsibilities of elected members. When seeking election, members know that they may be called on to face such hard decisions. The members of the cabinet must make hard decisions on behalf of all society. Abolitionists would face hard decisions: Any one of us, if we were in the cabinet, would face hard decisions in this regard. They would not be easy; they would be disturbing. Nevertheless, when we were elected we agreed to shoulder our burden of responsibility on behalf of all members of society.

I am concerned about the lives of individuals, and I am absolutely convinced that the abolition of capital punishment will not save lives in Canada. I submit that, on the contrary, it will cost lives in Canada. Perhaps lives will be taken within prison walls, as the previous speaker suggested. Perhaps lives will be taken on the streets. If capital murder were punishable by death, a criminal might think twice before shooting someone during an armed robbery. A criminal would think twice before shooting to kill. The retention of capital punishment would, I submit, save the lives of prison guards and police officers. Whether we shall save lives is the decision we must make as we vote on the bill.

Another question which must be considered is: Would capital punishment be a deterrent to serious crimes committed in a fit of passion? I suggest that it would not. An individual in the grip of passion acts abnormally. When in the grip of passion, an individual may be driven to commit a crime for which capital punishment is no deterrent. But I submit that capital punishment would deter premeditated acts of murder. The death penalty would save the lives of innocent people on the streets and would be a fit punishment for criminals who murder deliberately. Therefore, those who, like the Prime Minister, suggest retentionists are only seeking vengeance are no longer entitled to the respect of their fellow man. That was a harsh, unfair and improper basis on which to conduct this debate.

There are no statistics to show how well we have rehabilitated those who have been in prison. We know that harsh treatment can sometimes change the mind of a man. Such harsh treatment has been described as brainwashing. We have heard of instances in which brainwashing has been cruel. But, as we know, minds have not been changed. There is no evidence to show that psychology or other forms of treatment can change the minds of hardened criminals who have no inclination to change. There are no records to substantiate success, as might be the case in the scientific world. We cannot measure success in this field with the accuracy with which a mathematician might define a problem. In this field we cannot be guided by laws of nature which work steadfastly and continually in other fields.

In short, one cannot say that men have been induced to change their minds by psychiatrists. I suppose the best example of what I am talking about is to be found in the treatment of those who indiscriminately and unwisely have resorted to the use of drugs. Alcoholics Anonymous have assumed that there is little use trying to correct the behaviour of an alcoholic unless that person really and truly wants to change. The same is true of other psychiatric treatment. When the mind wants to change, it can accept help and benefit from it. However, when the mind of man is determined to remain on course, it is difficult, if not impossible, to treat that mind so that it again fits into the rank and file of society. We are assuming that we can correct a mind that does not want to be corrected. That is an unwise and dangerous assumption. In the long run, it will be proven that it is one that costs lives in this country, not one which saves them. It will be difficult to prove, but I believe that it is the way the mind of man works, particularly that of the hard-core criminal.

I know I am being repetitive and that this has been said by speaker after speaker. However, I am deeply concerned about the lack of concern for the safety of our peace officers in this country. We are being traitors to them when we behave as we are presently doing, and traitors to ourselves and the rank and file of society as a whole. I submit that when knowledge of capital punishment being inevitable is in the mind of a man who premeditates a crime, it is, and must be, a deterrent.

[Mr. McCain.]

This so-called free vote is one of the most capricious things that has been perpetrated upon the people of any country in the name of democratic government. The behaviour of the government and its influential people as this subject has been brought before the House in a pseudo free vote situation is deceitful at best. I believe the people of Canada recognize that there is a free vote only within the limits in which that vote will safely follow the policy of the government. When the safety of the policy of this bill which has been introduced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is in danger, freedom of behaviour will come to an end.

Suggestions are made as to what it might mean to certain individuals in this House if this bill fails to pass. That is a most regrettable thing. While the Conservative party has not been united in its stand on this matter, and its members voted as they chose, at no time has any prominent member of this party asked any individual, by persuasion, force or other means, to change his vote.

Mr. Sharp: Nor has ours.

Mr. McCain: I submit that the evidence at hand indicates that anybody who makes a comparable claim and sits on Your Honour's right is oblivious of the facts as they are known to the public of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Tell some more lies.

Mr. McCain: There are some people in this House who knew a great deal more about the professions they practised before coming here than they have learned about the profession they have practised since coming here. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) indicates that he has learned little. He has not listened and has no awareness of what is going on around him in this situation. Possibly he wishes to be oblivious of the efforts being made to compromise the free vote which has been so vigorously promoted as being the will of parliament.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to remind the hon. member that the whip and myself voted on different sides in this situation. I think the hon. member should refrain from references to a free vote.

Mr. Blais: You should not reflect on a vote in any event.

Mr. McCain: I do not remember asking the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain to rise. I do not remember mentioning the whip.

Mr. Sharp: Whom did you mention?

Mr. McCain: I mentioned that the government exerted pressure.

Mr. Allmand: On whom?

Mr. McCain: You know.

Mr. Allmand: No I do not. On whom? Let us have some names.

Mr. Stevens: How about the Lalonde party?

Mr. Allmand: Were you there?

Mr. MacFarlane: It must have been the same person who gave you the letter out of my files.

Mr. McCain: Let us reflect for about 15 seconds. With regard to whether it was the intention of the government that this was to be a perfectly free vote, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who preceded me in this debate outlined the method by which that could be done without reflection on the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member completed his remarks?

Mr. McCain: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Rulings have previously been made by the Chair on comments similar to those just made by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain). According to my recollection, the Chair has held that it is not proper for any hon. member to reflect upon a vote. I think that principle is eminently acceptable. Each and every member of this House is free to exercise his judgment in accordance with his conscience and volition. To indicate that any member could be influenced to vote contrary to his conscience is a direct attack on the privileges of members of this House. I suggest that the hon. member's remarks ought not to have been made.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House provide that an individual should not in any way reflect upon another individual personally. I reflected purely and simply upon the pressure of the government to obtain as many votes as it could for its position in respect of this legislation, and I said that pressure was such that the government could no longer claim that it was a free vote. I did not reflect upon an individual. There were individuals who took offence at my reflection against the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here the whole morning and I think the remarks which were made with respect to the matter, if they constitute a point of order at all, arose out of what was said by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The hon. member for Edmonton West said that traditionally in parliament, when a matter was to be proposed upon which the whips would not be applied, it was always dealt with through private members' business. I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) said, and it was clear to me that he was leading up to that point, a point a finally made which was in line with what the hon. member for Edmonton West had said immediately before him.

There might be some sensitivity among members of the House with respect to what occurred—and I have no idea what occurred—but surely we have not reached the stage at which discussion of the various methods by which debates are conducted and questions taken and put to members is to be deemed a reflection on a vote such as might be contrary to the rules. If this is a point of order at all, and there is some doubt about that, it is not a point well taken. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte and the hon. member for Edmonton West stand in exactly the same position; both were speaking from the point in view of methodology. There was no reflection on a vote of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must say my first reaction to part of the remarks made by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) was to question their relevance. As to the point of order suggesting there might have been a reflection on the vote, I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte implied that pressure was brought to bear, but he did not reflect on the decision reached by the House. This was more or less confirmed by what the hon. member himself just said.

Parliament, after all, is an institution in which debate takes place and in which hon. members seek to convince others by speeches both inside and outside the House. I do not think that to say so is passing judgment on a vote or on the freedom of a vote cast by a member. It is a natural fact of life and the rules of the House permit it. So I do not agree with the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary. I do not think that, strictly speaking, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte was reflecting on a vote.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): One o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH NOVA SCOTIA CONCERNING OWNERSHIP OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the delay and procrastination which has extended over several years in resolving the question of ownership of offshore mineral resources adjacent to the Maritime provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or some minister on his behalf, report to the House on motions later today on recent discussions with Premier Regan on this vital issue which could, with the co-operation of the federal government in resolving this dispute, do so much to change the attitude and economic situation prevailing in Atlantic Canada at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTED DELAY OF PROPOSAL TO CREATE ST. CATHARINES A BILINGUAL DISTRICT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity concerning the proposal under consideration that the St. Catharines area in Ontario be classified as a bilingual district, despite the fact that 97 per cent of the population is not French-speaking. I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

In view of the fact that a copy of minutes, reportedly labelled confidential, of a secret meeting held on this subject at the Constellation Hotel in Toronto by the bilingual districts' advisory board has recently been given to the member for Lincoln on instructions of the President of the Treasury Board, and also in view of the fact that a copy of these confidential minutes are reportedly to be in the hands of a reporter from the Globe and Mail, that the President of the Treasury Board is requested to make public the contents of these documents and at the same time that he assure the House that no action will be taken creating the St. Catharines area part of a bilingual district while parliament is not in session this summer.

[Mr. Prud'homme.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be presented to the House without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

That this House requests the governments of Tanzania and Mauritius, fellow members of the Commonwealth, to reverse their stand and participate in the Olympics in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires that before the presentation of such a motion the House give its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

MEASURES TO STIMULATE STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance, who is one of the few ministers in the House at the present time. Since April, when university students finished their studies, there have been 94,000 fewer young people employed in Canada. It is also apparent that the sole reason youth unemployment is remaining relatively stable is that students simply are not entering the labour market; in short they are giving up. Given this situation, is the minister willing to recommend to the government re-evaluation of the student summer employment program so that students will be encouraged to enter the labour market and thereby accumulate the savings required to return to school next year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister answered with his usual arrogance, as demonstrated last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1410)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to ask the minister a question. In view of the fact that Statistics Canada noted today the continually declining participation rates among young women in Canada which is now around 3.1 per cent, does the minister not realize that lack of savings among this group and any accompanying deferment of education among them can only lead to social inequities in access to higher education, and, if he realizes this situation, is he not willing to concede that this government's student employment strategy requires a complete and immediate review?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I should point out to the hon. gentleman that with regard at least to those young people who will be reentering university in the fall their student summer employment earnings, as well as other financial means, are taken into account. If it happens that a student has not been able to augment his earnings sufficiently during the summer, he will be entitled to supplemental assistance under the Canada Student Loan Program.

PROPOSAL TO CHANGE BASIS ON WHICH LOANS AVAILABLE TO STUDENTS TO ACTUAL EARNINGS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): On July 8 the minister was asked, with respect to the provisions of the Canada student loan plan which bases the loans available not on the actual earnings but on the length of time students are available for work, if he will take steps to have the basis of the plan changed to actual earnings as defined under the Income Tax Act. In view of the fact that he has now had some notice and the opportunity to look into the matter, can he now report to the House if he is prepared to take steps recommended at the time?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated that the present provisions of the Canada Student Loan Program take recognition of the problem.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO LESSEN BURDEN OF STUDENTS UNABLE TO FIND SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Recent reports of Statistics Canada have revealed that we are now experiencing the worst record of youth unemployment since statistics were accumulated in 1953, and furthermore, the national and Ontario union of students fears that student unemployment this summer is already running at 20 per cent to 25 per cent and that this could increase. Does the minister have any indication if student unemployment is as high as the national union of students suspects and, if it is, is the minister prepared to introduce emergency legislation to lessen the burden of students who will be unable to find work this summer?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I will be glad to make inquiries to see whether those figures are soundly based.

Mr. Dick: As the Minister of Finance does not seem to know what the unemployment situation is, perhaps I might ask him a supplementary question. A cut-back in the student summer unemployment program was introduced under the guise of restraint. A high level of student unemployment this summer will undoubtedly result in either the deferment of post-secondary enrollment for some individuals or an increased demand for Canada student loans for others, which is not a saving to the federal government. On June 16, the national union of students—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would he put it.

Mr. Dick: I would ask the minister whether he could confirm in unambiguous terms to the national union of students that he is willing to remove the requirement of summer savings in order that students will be able to get Canada student loans to continue their education?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have just responded to that question in my reply to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You did not respond at all.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AND CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the Supreme Court has decided that the federal government has constitutional authority to deal with inflation on a national basis,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: —foolish as the particular program may be, can the minister say whether the government will consider the development of a national program to deal with unemployment, and, more specifically, would the minister ensure that unemployment is put on the agenda for the meeting scheduled for this fall of the finance ministers of the provinces along with the federal Minister of Finance, and at that meeting would the federal government submit a national program dealing with unemployment?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The question was much discussed in the context of the budget and I do not have any further proposals to put before the House at this time. I think it is fair to say that the question was not extensively discussed at the last meeting of finance ministers, and while there is scope for general economic discussion at these meetings, the question was not extensively canvassed. I would be prepared, if provincial ministers wished to discuss it during the course of the meeting.

Mr. Broadbent: I am asking the Minister of Finance to make that specific suggestion himself. I would like to ask him a second question. Since there are still more than 700,000 Canadians without jobs, which in percentage terms represents a year over year increase from the same month of last year, would the minister tell us if the federal government now has any specific programs to expand job opportunities in the country, or will we have to rely simply on the program which was announced earlier by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, which will not come into effect until January, 1977?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I indicated, I do not propose to announce any further proposal at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: I will ask my final question, probably with no better results. Given the fact that in Atlantic Canada, the four provinces considered together, there is an unemployment average running at between 10 per cent at the bottom end to something in excess of 12 per cent at the top, in every case exceeding the national average substantially, could the minister tell us if the government will be presenting to the House any specific proposals to deal with this persistent unemployment in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I just indicated to the hon. gentleman that I have no proposals I intend to put forward at this time.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN HOUSING STARTS TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

As The Conference Board in Canada has indicated that there will be a marked increase in unemployment in the fall because of lower housing construction in Canada, which is considerably lower in Canada even now, can the minister tell us what he intends to do to stimulate housing or encourage people to become homeowners?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the hon. member asked this question. I think he would be interested in the housing starts for June, which are at the rate of 275,000 per year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: That is substantially higher than the rate of 235,000 starts which we targetted, and it is 7,000 more than the rate for May, so we are doing a great deal at the present time. The industry is holding up extremely well. The housing starts are for the right people at the right price, and we expect that this level of activity will continue throughout the year and that employment will be maintained at a very high level.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The minister seems very optimistic but unfortunately he is unaware of what is going on in the province of Quebec where, according to the information from that province, housing construction is slowing down. I do not know whether the minister goes to Quebec from time to time, or whether he knows what goes on there, but that is the case.

I therefore ask the minister whether he can tell the House what he intends to do to stimulate construction, especially in the poor provinces or those where development is slower. Would he say that, in the next few months, the interest rate can be lowered, or that subsidies can be given new owners with regard to interest rates, to a greater extent that is being done now, and so encourage people to own their own homes?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. First of all, with regard to Quebec, the starts for June alone are up to 6,900 compared to 4,000 last year, so there is an increase there. We have programs with regard to interest reduction, grants for moderate priced housing and programs to make it possible for people of moderate incomes to purchase housing which is of good quality. These programs will continue. In addition, we have extensive rehabilitation programs going on in the province of Quebec, including rural areas.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MINISTER'S ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF NEW JOBS CREATED—SECTOR OF ECONOMY IN WHICH JOBS CREATED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. I note that the principal reason for the improvement of the unemployment rate over the second quarter of the year stems from a decline of the labour force in the past quarter, down some 63,000, rather than an increase in employment, which in turn is down 72,000 in the last quarter. Can the minister indicate when he expects the economy to be producing jobs at a rate which would conform to the prediction that he included in his budget of 250,000 new jobs this year and would he indicate what sector he expects will produce these jobs?

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these are questions that were very fully canvassed in the course of the budget debate. It does not seem useful to repeat them at this point. Of course, it will be difficult to say within the context of any monthly period when they will change or indeed in what aspect of industry. I would just remind the hon. gentleman that we have set out our expectations for the year in a rather comprehensive way.

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT PREDICTED BY CONFERENCE BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A further supplementary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Noting that the minister has already stated today that he has no new programs that he cares to announce today for job creation, and in view of the fact that the Conference Board of Canada has predicted steadily rising unemployment rates throughout 1976-77, can he identify any factors which in his opinion indicate why the current economic situation would not lead this House and himself to view the forecast put out by the conference board as being inaccurate?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the hon. gentleman. The conference board substantially agreed with our analysis for the year 1976. Its prediction with regard to unemployment was an unemployment increase with respect to 1977. I think as the year goes on we will want to review the facts as they turn up to see whether or not that seems to be a substantially founded expectation.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister stick by the budget forecast of 250,000 new jobs for 1976 and would he explain if he means average 1976 figures over average 1975 or January to January figures?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I have said, we consider all the statements set out in the context of the budget still to be those guidelines governing the development of the economy.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO MARKETING SCHEME—DATE OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture of which I have given him notice, with respect to the important meeting last week with representatives of the potato industry from five of six of the eastern Canadian provinces, at Fredericton. Considering the fact that just prior to the meeting one of the officials of the New Brunswick government indicated that they hoped to have a plan in place for marketing by mid-September for this marketing year, could the minister indicate what progress was made at the meeting, when producers will have an opportunity to study the new revised plans and to vote on representation for a regional potato marketing council?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the meeting that took place. This is an ongoing thing. These meetings of potato producers have been taking place between the provinces for well over a year. They have been trying to formulate a plan for marketing potatoes. I understand that they should soon be able to make recommendations to producers and I understand it will be further discussed at a meeting of provincial ministers of agriculture if they can work it into their schedule at the end of this month in Quebec City. I understand representations are being made by ministers from other potato producing provinces in which it appears the producers are going to be in dire straits again this year.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the importance of these measures to the potato industry in the six eastern provinces and the importance of there being adequate funds and personnel to establish an effective secretariat, can the minister indicate whether a commitment was made by the federal government at this meeting to supply funds and appoint personnel so that the decisions taken by producers and the representative ministers can be put into effect for this marketing year?

Mr. Whelan: We would hope so, Mr. Speaker. It would need the utmost co-operation of all parties concerned so that some kind of plan could be put into operation for the coming crop year. The hon. member will recall that two years ago we spent approximately $16 million during the crop season because of the depressed prices. At that time we said that would be the last time we would put that kind of money into such a program and that they had better find a more orderly marketing system. That is what these meetings have been concerned with. It appears that the provinces and the potato producers, who are represented on the committees, are close to a plan at the present time but I am not in a position to say what it will be. I have not gone over anything since the meeting in Fredericton, not having had the time. I have received verbal reports about the meetings. They realize the seriousness of this matter and I believe they are serious about doing something about it.

PUBLIC WORKS

REASON FOR ENTERING INTO TERRASSE DE LA CHAUDIÈRE LEASE-PURCHASE AGREEMENT—CONTROL OF CONSTRUCTION COSTS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Public Works is with reference to the Terrasse de la Chaudière lease-purchase agreement. I wonder if the minister can tell the House why his department apparently agreed in principle to lease a building on which construction had not commenced, to be built on land which the lessor at the time did not own, in light of the fact that the minister said yesterday that this would be a rather strange lease arrangement.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would agree that to enter into such a lease arrangement would be a strange procedure. The fact of the matter is there have been negotiations—

Mr. Horner: He was a good Liberal.

Mr. Drury: —leading up to the lease-purchase, which is distinct from an ordinary lease, of the building which is to be designed to meet the specific needs of the federal government.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works? In view of the multiplier involved as between the cost of the building and the lease price of the building, a multiplier of about three, does the government have any supervision rights over the construction costs of this building?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the arrangement if entered into, and it has not yet been, would provide what by extrapolation and calculation would appear to be the most economical method from the government's point of view of acquiring use and eventual ownership of the property.

Mr. Huntington: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House if the reported $54 million option to purchase Terrasse de la Chaudière covers the entire project or just that portion of the project to be built on government-owned land?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the part of Terrasse de la Chaudière in which we are interested is merely that portion related to the office accommodation which the government would occupy.

REASON FOR VARIATION IN PRICE OF LAND PURCHASED IN HULL

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works? Has the minister reviewed the situation whereby the National Capital Commission, as agents for the Department of Public Works, paid $86 per square foot last month for the Quebec Hydro property in Hull, when Campeau had been buying adjacent land six to ten months previously at an average cost of $30 per square foot? Can he tell the House why this was done?

Mr. Horner: He was a good Liberal.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as I think the House is aware, the National Capital Commission in Ottawa is a semi-autonomous body which operates to acquire and control the bulk of the government holdings of land within the national capital area.

[Mr. Huntington.]

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

SOURCE OF ALLEGED DIRECTIVE TO USE CERTAIN COMPANY TO APPRAISE LAND PURCHASED IN HULL

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister aware of any over-riding directives which were issued to the staff at NCC to use a specific appraisal company for the evaluation of the Quebec Hydro properties on Rue Principale, Hull, Quebec, which were to be purchased by the National Capital Commission for the Department of Public Works? If so, from which level did these directives come; if not will the minister make inquiries?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the situation is that the purchaser and vendor indicate one appraiser each; a third one is mutually agreed upon so that comparisons can be made and the most satisfactory solution is achieved.

Mr. Darling: That is not an answer.

AIR TRANSPORT

REVOCATION OF AIR NAVIGATION ORDER ON USE OF LANGUAGE—CONSULTATIONS WITH PILOTS AND AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the minister in response to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount confirmed that there should be a regulation supporting the existing rules with regard to the flying and controlling of aircraft, as outlined in section 8 of the memorandum of understanding reached by the minister and the parties to the contract. At the same time the minister stated, in answer to my question, that he would be making changes to the air navigation order of June 30 from a technical point of view. I ask the minister to confirm that the air navigation order which was filed with the registrar of statutory instruments on June 30 has been revoked rather than amended.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the ordinary procedure for amending orders like this is to revoke them and substitute a new text. That has been done in this case.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister explain to the House precisely what are the technical difficulties to which he referred in his answer yesterday, and will he confirm whether the parties to the agreement, CATCA and CALPA, were consulted before the revocation order was given? If they were not consulted, will he advise the House why they were not so consulted?

● (1430)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, no, they were not consulted. If the hon. member will refer to the memorandum of understanding, he will see that there was an agreement about proceeding with an air navigation order, but no agreement about its exact content. At that time we were indeed aware that while we would move forward quickly with a draft, a good deal of further work would have to be done on the ideal form of that order. The general purpose of the order was understood between us as enforcing the existing rules in relation to language. We proceeded immediately with a first draft of the order and have now substituted a second for it. As I indicated yesterday, while the second draft is the one that may come into effect, we are looking at further possible changes prior to its effective date.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister confirm that last Thursday when he met Les Gens de L'Air he gave to them an amended version of the air navigation order or did he discuss the revocation order with them? If so, what form of consultation has taken place with Les Gens de L'Air or what form of consultation does he anticipate? In view of the fact the minister is not consulting with the other parties to the agreement, why is he in fact consulting with the Gens de L'Air?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will talk with almost everyone. What we did at our last meeting was indicate to the Gens de L'Air the latest form of the order. We had indeed superseded the first form with the second prior to that meeting. We therefore indicated what the second was and gave them copies of it. I am pleased to make copies available to others. I am sure the hon. member has one. I am prepared to discuss the further content of that particular order. Indeed, I expressly indicated to the Gens de L'Air that I would be pleased to have their comments on it and that if they saw some specific difficulty, I would be glad to take it into consideration. In particular, there is a special difficulty for the members of the Gens de L'Air if an order like that is used as the basis for disciplinary action within their union because there is less than adequate treatment for the Gens de L'Air within that union at the present time.

SUGGESTION TANZANIA AND MAURITIUS REVERSE DECISION NOT TO PARTICIPATE IN GAMES

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to urge the governments of Tanzania and Mauritius to reverse their decisions and to take part in the 21th Olympiads?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we regret deeply the decision of a number of countries and olympic teams not to participate in the games. There is nothing we can do, however, for Canada has no voice in the policies of the International Olympic Committee. However, we wish indeed that everybody would participate.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question can be directed to either the Minister of State for Science and Technology or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the absence of the latter minister, I hope the former one has a favourable answer. In view of the statement of concern that was presented last week to the Minister of State for Science and Technolgy and the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges urging the government to change its stance with regard to medical research funding, may I ask the minister, who is looking at me rather hopefully, whether favourable consideration will be given to this request so that there will not be a deterioration in health research, in health education or in the Canadian health care system?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says I am looking at him hopefully. I was hoping that he was not going to be unreasonable. The hon. member is perhaps aware that following the initial allocation of funds to university research through the Medical Research Council, as a consequence of representations made, the Minister of National Health and Welfare was able to find some $2 million of additional funds from within the departmental estimates to transfer to this purpose. In the view of the Department of National Health and Welfare, this should suffice to ensure there is no retrogression in medical research. In so far as the future is concerned, I tried my best to convey to the representatives who came to see me the other day that we really would have to wait for next year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the statement of concern presented to the ministers last week was made after that $2 million adjustment, will the minister at least consider the request of the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges that an attempt be made to establish an adequate base level of research support with a view to maintaining that level in future years?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the representation that we should endeavour to establish, and agree on, a base level, not only with respect to medical research but in a number of other scientific areas. It is in default of agreement on what is an appropriate base level that some of our current difficulties have arisen.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WITHDRAWAL OF BUS SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Canadian National, by withdrawing its road cruiser passenger service in Newfoundland last night, violated an order of the Canadian Transport Commission in 1968, broke the law of Canada, notwithstanding any dispute they may have with the Newfoundland Regulatory Commission. As minister responsible for the National Transportation Act, does he intend to order CN to resume this service immediately?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, Canadian National only discontinued this bus service when, in the particular legal dispute it had with Newfoundland, its drivers were beginning to be charged by Newfoundland for continuing to operate its buses in that province. That made it as impossible to continue as though barricades had been erected. Those barricades had been erected by the government of the province of Newfoundland. I am hoping that in the almost immediate future some arrangement can be arrived at whereby the legal issue can be resolved for all time. In the meantime, the buses can continue to operate without that barricade in place. I know there are discussions going on between CN and the province of Newfoundland to that end. I trust they will resolve the issue. If not, I will have to reconsider the position I may have to take to ensure that service is given to the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. McGrath: Since the CN has a monopoly on ground passenger service in the province and by withdrawing the service has deprived the people of Newfoundland at a critical time of year of this essential service, in direct violation of the order made by the CTC, may I ask the minister whether he intends to order the buses back into service immediately or whether he intends to provide some alternative service until the dispute has been resolved?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will appreciate that ordering the bus service back into operation, as long as the drivers are being charged for continuing that service, would hardly be an acceptable action. The hon. member will also appreciate that the government of Newfoundland, and its highway traffic board, has jurisdiction in this situation only as a delegate from the federal government. I could obviously take some action by withdrawing that delegation but such a course would have some serious implications in principle not only for Newfoundland but for bus and trucking services across this country. I would want to do that only with great care. My first reaction, therefore, is to suggest that the barriers which I have described and which have been erected by the government of Newfoundland be removed by the government of Newfoundland. The buses would then continue to operate.

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND IN VIEW OF WITHDRAWAL OF BUS SERVICE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that CNR are not abiding by order No. 2673, as indicated by the hon. member for St. John's East, but are taking a very unfair attitude by denying the public the only transportation available, and since the bus drivers are not being denied the right to drive the buses, apart from which the company's action prompts dissatisfaction toward the bus service, would the minister now consider reviving the Newfoundland passenger rail service to correct the piracy which occurred back in 1969?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any move to reinstitute the rail service would require some planning and I am not sure the people of Newfoundland would see it as an immediate solution in view of the fact that passenger cars are simply not available in adequate numbers to provide the service. Other problems have arisen affecting the railway system configuration since the Bullet was discontinued, which would probably mean even slower service than was the case at that time. I think the only really sensible solution—and I would really urge the hon. member to join me in asking for this solution—is for the government of Newfoundland to make it possible for the bus system to operate. I assure the hon. member that CN is quite pleased to continue to operate the service but does not see how it can do so if its bus drivers are being charged under Newfoundland statutes for doing so.

Mr. Marshall: Under the order of 1969 the CNR was supposed to maintain a railway line between central and western Newfoundland to provide service in an emergency. This service is deteriorating and since it is very obvious that the reason for this deterioration is that the public service commission asked the company to reduce its rate increase from 150 per cent to 30 per cent, would the minister look into this matter in the national interest?

Mr. Lang: I would inform the hon. member that, in effect, the CNR was not objecting to the reduction in its rate increase to 30 per cent by the Newfoundland Traffic Board. It was quite prepared to live with that ruling but there were other conditions attached which made it impossible for the CN to submit voluntarily to what it did not consider to be appropriate or binding upon it. The simple fact is that the Newfoundland Traffic Board seems to have wanted to take advantage of the best of both situations—on the one hand to exercise jurisdiction as though the bus system were provincial and on the other to explicitly ignore the provincial law itself which requires that the rates which are set by transportation systems be compensatory. If they had followed their own law about compensatory rates they would have allowed even more than the increase permitted but, as I say, even with those qualifications CN was prepared to ride with that increase but was not prepared to abide by the other conditions.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGING DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that three months ago today the minister announced the dairy policy for the current year which was based on the fact that there was overproduction, may I ask the minister whether he can say to the House if he has valid information that production has sufficiently decreased to enable him to cancel the penalty of $8.60 a hundredweight?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the marketing supply management committee from all the provinces is meeting this week in Ottawa. We know that some of the provinces have done a good job in curtailing production. But we also know, for instance, that La Belle Province has not done such a good job.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

PROPOSAL RESEARCH BE UNDERTAKEN TO ESTABLISH STANDARDS FOR SAFE USE OF ASBESTOS IN BUILDINGS

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the fact that the National Housing Act and the National Building Code make no provision in their construction standards for the safety or health of home occupants with respect to the use of asbestos in insulation and other processes, and in view of the fact that a federal-provincial task force has urged a wide range of safety and health measures to prevent the irreversible disease of asbestosis associated with asbestos use, will the minister ensure that the National Research Council undertakes research into the health hazards arising from the use of asbestos in federally-assisted housing with a view to introducing safe standards in the National Housing Act and the National Building Code?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for having drawn attention to this problem. The National Research Council has for some time been working at making structures safer for the inhabitants or occupants through the National Building Code. The accent to date has been principally on structural safety and fire precaution. Increasingly, however, the question of the use of materials having toxic properties is arising and research into limiting their use and establishing proper precautions is already under way.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE OF LEOPARD TANKS—POSSIBILITY OF STATIONING CF-5'S IN EUROPE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell us anything new about the progress of negotiations for the Canadian acquisition of Leopard tanks which was announced, of all people, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Can he also tell us whether he has yet made up his mind on the question whether any of our surplus CF-5's will be stationed in Europe?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, negotiations for the purchase of Leopard tanks are proceeding very satisfactorily with the Kraus-Mafei Company, the manufacturer. Discussions with the German government are proceeding satisfactorily for the use of Leopard tanks in the interim while ours are being manufactured. These negotiations are all on schedule.

REASON FOR BOOKING PRESS CONFERENCE ROOM FOR JULY 15

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Perhaps the minister will tell me later about the CF-5's. My supplementary question is to the same minister. Is it true the minister has booked the press conference room in the press building for a press conference for this Thursday, at 4 p.m.? Would the minister tell the House of Commons if he booked the room for that specific time and date or did he merely book it for use 24 hours after parliament recesses, thus attaining a new level in contempt of parliament?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet meets on Thursday as a normal practice and the Lockheed decision is before that cabinet, and possibly future cabinet meetings. I do not know what arrangements may have been made by information services concerning a possible requirement for an announcement. In reply to the earlier question on the CF-5's, we have no plans to move any of the CF-5's permanently to Europe.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for York-Simcoe relating to the creation of 250,000 new jobs in 1976 over 1975, the Minister of Finance referred the hon. member to his budget speech to see how these jobs would be created and the increases calculated. I reiterate the question: how will the job increase from 1975 to 1976 be calculated, average to average, for the years in question or from December 31, 1975 to December 31, 1976?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Even on the hon. member's own description that is a repetition of an earlier question.

COMMUNICATIONS

STRIKE AT TELEGLOBE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. I should like to ask whether the minister can bring us up to date on the strike at Teleglobe; and if it is still continuing, what does she personally intend to do to avoid a further black eye that Canada may get over this whole Olympic situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the strike, which was to have lasted for a period of 24 hours, is going on and the impression is that it will continue for an indefinite length of time. Through consultations with the president of Teleglobe, I am doing what is necessary to resume negotiations. It is extremely regrettable that these negotiations must be made under pressure because the Olympics are to be held shortly. It is always very difficult to negotiate a solution under such conditions. In any case, I can reassure the hon. member by saying that measures are being taken to ensure essential services for retransmission of the Olympic Games in Europe. Essential services will be maintained. Extremely strict measures have now been taken against any attempt at wilfully damaging the equipment; our main effort, however, is directed at resuming the negotiations.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF ST. LAWRENCE SHORES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Environment.

Could he tell the House if he is aware of recent complaints made by residents along the St. Lawrence River at Pointe-aux-Trembles about a renewed outbreak of pollution from oil? If so, what does he intend to do to correct the situation? Moreover, has the minister held or does he intend to hold with the qualified authorities in Quebec talks aimed at exercising continued and more efficient supervision to protect the environment in that part of the St. Lawrence River, next to the Montreal urban area?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Acting Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I tried to read most of the files, but I have not become acquainted with this one. I will do so and try to give an answer to the hon. member tomorrow.

Hon. I said yesterday that the Tanu, one of our modern vessels, was in refit. That was misinformation; it is under repair because of an unexpected engine failure. The Laurier is also under refit. We are using other vessels for surveillance and DND is also giving us a hand. In fact, for this year there will be 495 sea days of fishery surveillance compared to 180 for 1975, this being made possible through the excellent co-operation of the DND and the Ministry of Transport.

Mr. Hees: You don't know Donald.

Mr. Halliday: I will try anyway. Now that the government of Canada is rated second highest spender in 1975 for space and time advertising among all businesses and corporations in Canada, according to figures released recently by Elliott Research of Toronto, would the minister tell the House what, if any, money is budgeted to obtain evidence by independent research workers as to the efficacy and success of the $11 million spent by the federal government in 1975?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that involves a statistical response beyond an answer that I can give today, but I will yet be glad to dig it out and write to the hon. member.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

PROPOSAL TO TRANSFER JURISDICTION OVER IMPORT PERMITS TO DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is serious consideration being given to a proposal to remove the Canadian Wheat Board's import licensing powers on grains over which they have jurisdiction with a view to having these powers transferred to the import permits branch of industry, trade and commerce?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the general notion of the transfer of power over import control to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was included in our broad feed grains policy statement in 1973 and 1974, has been repeated since, and it is our intention to do that at some convenient time. We do not consider it either a major change or an urgent matter, because as a practical matter the permit system operates as though the power were residing there. However, it is seen rather as a presentational matter better to have what appears to be a neutral agency in charge of the permits.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO USE ELECTRICITY PRODUCED IN LABRADOR IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of his recent visit to the Atlantic area and particularly to Churchill Falls, Labrador, is the minister now optimistic that hydro resources in Labrador can be developed for the benefit of the Atlantic area, and will he ensure that the full force of his office and indeed of the government of Canada is used to bring this about?

PENITENTIARIES

MEASURES TO INCREASE SECURITY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would the minister please be good enough to advise the House what steps, if any, are being taken or have been taken to increase security measures and staff, including the authority of the staff, at maximum security penitentiaries, particularly in respect to greater security measures for the hardened criminals there?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am still trying to work out something and I hope to make an announcement later today.

TRANSPORT

DATE OF INCREASE IN FUNDS TO ALLOW AUXILIARY COAST GUARD ON WEST COAST TO OPERATE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which is a follow up to the question asked the other day about the coast guard auxiliary. Would the minister advise the House when we can expect a decision by cabinet regarding the coast guard auxiliary in view of the urgent situation on the west coast right now?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the establishment of the coast guard auxiliary is ongoing and has already begun. The current questions which are before cabinet are rather with regard to the total equipment available for the coast guard itself. The auxiliary role of a variety of vessels not directly associated with the government will always be of extreme importance. On the west coast, the auxiliary organization is now in an important phase of its introduction.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the coast guard auxiliary, which was started in Delta and Richmond in my riding, has been stopped now due to lack of funds, can the minister say when there will be a decision of cabinet to put these funds in place so that they can continue to do the excellent work that both he and I agree they do?

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister arising from the consideration being given by the government as to whether St. Catharines and the general area should be classified as a bilingual district. In view of the fact that a confidential document containing minutes of a meeting sponsored by the bilingual districts advisory board in the Constellation Hotel in Toronto has been given to the hon. member for Lincoln and also reportedly, given to the Globe and Mail, would the government agree to make this document public so as to enable everybody concerned to learn what happened at this meeting?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be my understanding that the body to which the hon. member refers is an automous body that is advisory to the government, and I do not think it would be appropriate for us to put any pressure on them.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister probably misinterpreted my question since it was the President of the Treasury Board and his staff who gave out these documents. That is why I directed the question to the government. Will the Acting Prime Minister at least assure the House that no action will be taken to create St. Catharines and its immediate area a bilingual district during the summer months while parliament is not in session, with the result that the matter cannot be debated?

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary arising out of the continued notoriety and problems of the London, Ontario, office of the Secretary of State dealing with multiculturalism grants. Can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the Secretary of State is aware of the recent statement by the president of the London Folk Arts Council that the investigation being conducted by the Department of the Secretary of State into the activities of its own London office is "a farce" and "an insult to Londoners"? Is he satisfied that the inquiry can be complete and impartial when one of the officials involved in the inquiry has been appointed the next head of the London office of the Secretary of State and other officials involved in the investigation have spent little time if any in London but are content to investigate from their Toronto office?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not had occasion to speak to the Secretary of State since his return from London, but I will certainly bring the hon. member's representations to his attention.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED

REASON COMPANY FAILED TO OBEY ORDER TO DISCONTINUE DUMPING RADIOACTIVE WASTE AT PORT GRANBY, ONTARIO

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which relates to the fact that the Atomic Energy Control Board has ordered Eldorado Nuclear Limited to stop disposing of its radioactive residue from its refining operations at a site near Port Granby, Ontario.

In view of the fact that this dumping has been going on for years and that Eldorado Nuclear Limited has had two extensions despite the growing concern about possible seepage of toxic material into Lake Ontario, I should like to ask the minister whether he has ordered Eldorado Nuclear Limited, a Crown corporation, to comply with the order of the Atomic Energy Control Board in order that it may be clear to all that public corporations are subject to the same controls of any regulatory body as are private companies?

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I did not order Eldorado to comply for one very good reason. I believe the authority vested in the Atomic Energy Control Board is quite sufficient to force it to comply. Indeed, I think it might be most inappropriate if I as minister were to superimpose myself between the agency and Eldorado Nuclear Limited. I am quite confident that the powers of the Atomic Energy Control Board are sufficient to force compliance by Eldorado Nuclear Limited.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that both the Atomic Energy Control Board and Eldorado Nuclear Limited come under the minister's administrative responsibilities, I would ask the minister first of all why it has taken the control board so long to become aware of a situation that has been public knowledge for a long time and, secondly, why he has allowed Eldorado Nuclear Limited to stall on taking action to stop dumping the radioactive waste into a site close to Lake Ontario? The minister surely has some responsibility to see that these agencies under his responsibility act in accordance with public safety for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Atomic Energy Control Board has acted with expedition. I think it has moved quickly. If the hon. member were to read the release dated July 7 and see the terms that have been set forth by the Atomic Energy Control Board in respect of Eldorado Nuclear Limited I think he would fully agree that this is not just a simple question of saying that Eldorado should clean up its act. There is very much more involved in terms of permanent storage, future storage and the cleaning up of the city as well. I believe the Atomic Energy Control Board has acted expeditiously.

TREATIES

Question No. 5,359—Mr. Forrestall:

1. How many international treaties, conventions, accords, etc., have been signed by Canada but have not been (a) ratified (b) implemented by either the (i) provinces (ii) Parliament of Canada or the executive of the government of Canada?

2. What treaties are involved and on what date did Canada sign them?

3. How many such arrangements has Canada ratified but have not implemented, if any?

4. What consideration is Canada giving to implementing the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada (1972) that international treaties be ratified by Parliament rather than the Executive and the Crown?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Ratification following signature is only one of several ways in which an international agreement may enter into force for Canada. Many bilateral agreements enter into force either on signature or on some other date in accordance with procedures specified in the agreement. Most multilateral treaties require either signature followed by ratification, or, if they have not been signed, the deposit of an instrument of accession, approval or acceptance. In considering Canadian treaty procedures it is necessary to recognize the distinction between the treaty-making power, i.e. the power to enter into treaties and thus incur obligations in international law, and the treaty-implementing power, i.e. the power to enact whatever legislation may be required to bring Canada's domestic law into accord with the international obligations embodied in a treaty. (a) This sub-question is concerned with the treaty-making power. In Canada the constitutional authority to enter into treaties is part of the Royal Prerogative which in practice is exercised by the Governor General in Council. Ratification is therefore an executive act. For this reason no treaties, conventions or other international agreements signed by Canada which are subject to ratification have been ratified by either the Provinces or the Parliament of Canada. (b) This sub-question deals with the treaty-implementing power. Many treaties are in accordance with existing domestic law and therefore do not require further legislative action for their implementation. Other treaties will require legislative action, either federal or provincial, to permit implementation by Canada. The Canada Treaty Register does not contain complete information on legislation which has been adopted by the Parliament of Canada for the purpose of implementing treaties. The Register contains no information on legislation enacted by the Provinces for the purpose of implementing treaties, the subject matter of which falls within provincial jurisdiction. For these reasons it is not possible to indicate the number of treaties which have not been implemented by legislative action of either the Provinces or the Parliament of Canada or have not required specific executive action for their implementation.

2. The compilation of detailed lists of treaties binding on Canada which have not been the subject of specific implementing legislation by either the Provinces or the Parliament of Canada or of specific executive action for their implementation, together with the date of Canada's signature, would necessitate a search of every entry in the Canada Treaty Register and would require an inordinate cost and length of time.

3. Canada has implemented all treaties by which it is bound, whether by signature, ratification or accession. As explained above, legislative action either by the Parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the Provinces is not required where the performance of treaty obligations does not entail alteration of existing domestic law. The number of treaties ratified by Canada which have not required specific legislation by Parliament for their implementation is approximately 296, of which 88 are bilateral agreements and 208 are multilateral agreements. As explained above, no figures can be given for treaties ratified by Canada which have not required implementing legislation by the Provinces because this information is not available from the Canada Treaty Register.

4. No active consideration is being given to this matter.

NAMELESS POSTMARKS

Question No. 5,410—Mr. Dinsdale: (Corrected)

1. Has the Post Office Department recently introduced a policy of nameless postmarks and, if so, for what reason have the names of cities and towns been replaced by a code?

2. Does the Department have a policy of replacing all names with numbers and, if so, what is the next planned change?

3. Did the Department examine the experience of the USA Postal Service, which introduced similar nameless postmarks, and which more recently restored city and town names in the face of popular demand?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. The Post Office recently introduced the use of the postal code in its cancellation mark primarily for certain centres where changes in the pattern of mail processing made the continued use of a community name identifier impractical. This has occurred where mail from a number of communities is now gathered into one major processing plant and collectively processed in one stream. In these new mechanized plants it is impractical to keep segregated the mail from different source locations, and rather than select the name of one community to be used for the cancellation of all mail processed through such a plant, it was decided to use the postal code of the plant. For example, the processing plant located in Scarborough, Ontario will process mail from surrounding areas such as Richmond Hill, Willowdale, Thornhill, Markham, Ajax, Pickering and others.

2. No, the Post Office does not have a policy of changing all names to numbers. It is not planned to use postal code postmarks at St. John's, Newfoundland as originally stated.

3. Yes, the Post Office Department is familiar with the United States Postal Service experience. However, the systems are different in the two countries and there is no practical relationship.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DOCKYARDS, HALIFAX, N.S.

Question No. 5,494—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the total value of contracts to private firms for work at the government dockyard in Halifax previously done by employees of the Department of National Defence for each of the past five years?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Nil. No contracts have been given to private firms for work which has previously been done exclusively by Department of National Defence dockyard employees in each of the past five years. The number of manhours worked in the ship repair unit has been stable over the past five years, although the changing nature of the workload has resulted in some alteration in the proportion of the various trades employed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DOCKYARDS, HALIFAX, N.S.

Question No. 5,495—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the government's best estimate of the number of Department of National Defence employees replaced in contracting out work to private firms at the government dockyard in Halifax since 1970?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): None. For further detail see answer to Question No. 5,494.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS CORPORATION—AUTHORIZED MAN-YEARS

Question No. 5,498—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. How many man-years were authorized for the National Museum Corporation in each year 1973, 1974, 1975 and 1976?

2. What is the actual number of man-years in each year and, if such man-years exceeded the authorization (a) for what reason (b) who (i) authorized (ii) recommended the excess?

3. How many actual man-years in excess of those authorized were in the (a) administrative branch (b) other branches or agencies of the Corporation?

4. Have any instructions been given to the Corporation or any of its officers to reduce the actual man-years in the year 1976 and, if so (a) by whom (b) what reduction will occur in (i) the administrative branch (ii) other branches or agencies?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Museums of Canada as follows: 1. Authorized man-year utilization: 1973-74, 696; 1974-75, 741; 1975-76, 949; 1976-77, 997.

2. Actual man-year utilization: 1973-74, 656; 1974-75, 741; 1975-76, 949.

3. Man-years have not exceeded authorized levels.

4. No instructions have been given to reduce the authorized level of man-years for the Corporation for 1976-77 from that printed in the Main Estimates Blue Book 1976-77 of 997. However, all sections of the Corporation have been advised that the man-years authorized for their activities in 1976-77 must be strictly adhered to because the Corporation no longer is capable of providing the flexibility necessary to accommodate over-utilization of man-years in any of its components.

TERMS OF CHILEAN DEBT AGREEMENT

Question No. 5,520—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. (a) What were the terms of the Chilean debt renegotiated by the agreement of November 17, 1975 (b) what (i) was the amount of debt outstanding (ii) were the terms for payment prior to renegotiation (c) what are the terms for payment under the renegotiated agreement?

2. For what reason was there no mention of the debt renegotiations made in the 1975 Annual Report of the Export Development Corporation?

3. Is the Chilean debt to Canada now held in its entirety by the EDC and, if not, where else is it held?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Finance and the Export Development Corporation as follows: 1. (a) In accordance with an international agreement signed in Paris on May 6, 1975, Canada together with most other creditor countries agreed to refinance 70 per cent of the payments due in 1975 arising from commercial credits signed prior to December 1973 and with a maturity exceeding one year. It was further agreed that the amount rescheduled (70 per cent) would be paid in 13 equal semi-annual payments starting on January 1, 1978 and that the balance of 30 per cent would be paid as follows: 10 per cent in 1975, 10 per cent in 1976 and 10 per cent in 1977. The bilateral agreement signed by EDC on November 17, 1975 implemented this multilateral agreement; the same terms applied to the amount due to EDC which was estimated at $3.1 million. (b) i) The amount of debt outstanding as of January 1, 1976 was about $18.7 million. ii) The terms of payments prior to negotiation varied with each transaction from 2 to 10 years. (c) The terms of the loans have not been changed since, as is normally the case with multilateral debt reschedulings, the original loan agreements were not renegotiated. Only the payments due in 1975 were rengotiated. The terms are detailed in 1(a).

2. In 1975 EDC in consultation with the Auditor General changed several areas of its accounting procedures to conform more closely with those of similar organizations. EDC now reports debt rescheduling in aggregate.

3. At present the Chilean debt to Canada is held by EDC, by private firms exporting to that market and by Canadian chartered banks. The amount of these private Canadian credits is unknown. CIDA approved, under the terms of an agreement with the Inter-American Development Bank, two Bank loans (involving Canadian funds contributed to the Bank) to Chile in 1967-68. However under the terms of the above agreement the repayment of these loans is made direct to the Inter-American Development Bank.

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT—CONSTITUENCY OF LEEDS

Question No. 5,529—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Were Canada Manpower offices in the Constituency of Leeds advised this year that they would no longer have anything to do with processing of applications for summer student employment with Canada Customs and Canada Immigration within Leeds and, if so (a) what is the name and job designation of the highest government official giving these instructions (b) to what Canada Manpower offices were they issued and on what date?

2. Were Canada Manpower offices in Leeds instructed to forward all applications to Canada Manpower in Ottawa and, if so, what is the name and job designation of the highest official issuing this order and on what date?

3. (a) What are the reasons for this change in policy (b) is it designed to cut down or eliminate the number of university students whose homes are in Leeds from gaining such employment (c) has there been any political influence used by the government in hiring of such summer students within Leeds and, if so, what are all the details (d) is this an attempt to downgrade the work and duties of the local Canada Manpower offices in Leeds and, if so, for what reason?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Canada Manpower Centres across the country, including those in the Constituency of Leeds were advised this year that they would no longer have anything to do with processing of applications for summer student employment with Revenue Canada—Customs. (a) These instructions were given out by the Director of the Post-Secondary Recruitment Program, under the direction of the Director General, Staffing Branch, Public Service Commission. (b) These instructions were issued on February 3rd, 1976, to Manpower Centres across Canada and in the Constituency of Leeds to the following Canada Manpower Centres: Brockville, Gananoque, Smiths Falls.

2. Canada Manpower offices in Leeds were not instructed to forward all applications to Canada Manpower in Ottawa but to forward them to the Post-Secondary Recruitment Program, Public Service Commission in Ottawa. These instructions were given out to them on February 3, 1976 by the Director of the Post-Secondary Recruitment Program, under the direction of the Director General, Staffing Branch, Public Service Commission.

3. (a) In 1975, all the Customs Inspectors positions (Revenue Canada—Customs and Excise) which were classified at CR 5 were reclassified to the PM 1A level. As the CMC's can only make referrals to positions in the Administrative Support and Operational Categories, they could not refer candidates to the PM 1A positions which are part of the Administrative and Foreign Service Category. Appointments of summer students in positions which are career related or oriented to the Administrative and Foreign Service, Scientific and Professional or Technical Categories, are not delegated to departments or to the CMC's, but remain the responsibility of the Public Service Commission. Such programs are administered by the Post-Secondary Recruitment Program of the Public Service Commission. (b) It is not designed to cut down or eliminate any university or community college students from gaining such employment. As proximity of job location was established as a criterion for selection, only those students whose area of residence was within the immediate area of the border point to be served, could be considered. (c) No political influence was used in the hiring of summer students within Leeds. The merit principle was followed and these selection criteria were used: (1) Canadian Citizenship (2) Eligibility as a student (i.e., be a full-time student and be returning to full-time studies in the fall) (3) Proximity to job location (4) Job experience with the public. (d) There was no attempt to downgrade the duties of the staff of any CMC in Canada (this is a national program). The authority to staff these positions was simply not delegated to either the Department of Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise or the CMC's, and staffing of these positions falls under the authority of the Public Service Commission.

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 5,547—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Agriculture fly to Windsor, Ontario, on August 27, 1975 and, if so (a) what government aircraft was used (b) did the aircraft have four engines?

2. Was the Minister the only person on board and (a) if so, for what reason was an aircraft with such power used (b) if not, what are the names, addresses and job designations of all others on board?

3. (a) Where did the flight originate (b) what was the cost involved including (i) flying time (ii) waiting time (c) was the purpose of the flight as stated in a letter to Mr. Charles S. Pringle, 500 Ouellette Avenue, Windsor, Ontario, dated October 14, 1975 "to officially open Harrow Fair" and, if so, what are the reasons that the Minister did not take a regularly scheduled commercial flight to Windsor for this occasion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Minister of Agriculture and Transport Canada as follows: 1. Yes. (a) DOT Viscount—CF-DTA; (b) Yes.

2. Yes. (a) The most suitable aircraft available was used. (b) N/A.

3. (a) Ottawa. (b) (i) $3,117; (ii) Nil. (c) The purpose of the flight was to officially open the Harrow Fair. Official commitments prior to departure from Ottawa precluded the use of a regularly scheduled commercial flight.

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 5,549—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Minister of Agriculture write a letter dated October 14, 1975 to Mr. Charles S. Pringle, 500 Ouellette Avenue, Windsor, Ontario and, if so, did this state in part "As you know, in my position as Member of Parliament and Minister of Agriculture I read and sign secret documents and papers and it would be impossible to do so travelling on Air Canada" (a) does the Minister consider this a valid excuse for large expenditures of public funds for his use of government aircraft (b) what are the reasons that the Minister could not sign and read secret documents and papers on Air Canada (c) has the Minister evidence that his activities are under any surveillance when on board Air Canada or that secret documents or papers he might be carrying are in any danger (d) what is the description of the type of secret documents and papers that the Minister claims to carry with him?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Yes. (a) See also 5,547, part 3c. (b) Documents were of a confidential nature. (c) No. (d) The documents relate to the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown and as a member of the Privy Council.

QUESTIONS REGARDING FIRE PROTECTION

Question No. 5,558—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In regard to the various questions presently on the Order Paper concerning possible inadequate fire protection in government owned and leased buildings, in recent weeks, have a number of different sets of answers been prepared for the questions and has the Department of Public Works ordered revisions on each occasion and, if so (a) for what reason (b) how many sets of answers have been prepared for each question and for what reason?

2. Was a meeting held by officials of the Department and representatives of the Dominion Fire Commissioner's Office at which time the proposed answers were discussed and, if so (a) on what date and in what location (b) for what purpose (c) what are the names and job designations of all persons in attendance?

3. Were the answers as finally approved transmitted to the Privy Council Office on or about Friday, May 21?

4. What are the reasons for the time taken to prepare the final answers?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): The Government takes responsibility for the answers it provides to questions and for the process involved in replying to such questions. It is not appropriate therefore to provide information about internal administrative arrangements.

NUCLEAR POWER REACTORS

Question No. 5,565—Mr. Woolliams:

1. How many countries have obtained nuclear power reactors from Canada and what are their names?

2. Does Canada intend to enforce nuclear safeguards on foreign powers who have purchased reactors if the contract and safeguards are breached and ignored and, if so, in what manner?

3. Is there any real safeguard under such circumstances?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Two countries: India and Pakistan. Contracts for the sale of power reactors are in effect with the Republic of Korea and Argentina. Canada has also sold a 40MW (thermal) research reactor to Taiwan.

2. Canada intends to enforce safeguards through the mechanisms provided by the IAEA, and as appropriate, bilaterally. Safeguards required under Canada's policy leave no room for misunderstanding on the use of which Canadian nuclear exports can be put. Use for any nuclear explosives purpose is explicitly precluded. Other elements of Canadian safeguards give a high degree of assurance against any such use. Violations, should they occur, will have to face the reaction of Canada and the international community.

3. The Canadian Government strongly supports the international safeguard system and is participating very actively in efforts to improve that system to which constant technical and legal improvements are being made. Canada is also making efforts on many fronts to improve the international security situation in general in order to lessen the temptation which may be present for some countries in certain circumstances to wish to resort to a nuclear capability for national security.

USE OF CENSUS PENCILS

Question No. 5,640—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is a special pencil required for filling out the five-year Census?

2. How many pencils have been distributed with the 1976 census forms and what is the cost to the taxpayer for such pencils?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports the following: 1. It is necessary to use a soft lead pencil to complete the Census questionnaire. The Census questionnaire is processed by machine which does not readily read responses coded in ink. Manual processing by Statistics Canada of responses coded in ink is a very expensive operation—given the potential volume involved.

2. Pencils have been distributed to approximately 7,200,000 households at a cost of approximately $198,000.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION

Question No. 5,641—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs aware of a memo sent on government stationery by Mr. L. V. Thornton, the Department's Director of Personnel, to all departmental employees on May 14, 1976 promoting enrollment by employees in the transcendental meditation course offered by the World Plan Executive Council for $115 and, if so, does the Minister feel that the memorandum constitutes the promotion of a commercial enterprise at government expense?

2. What was the total number of copies sent to employees?

3. Does the Department sanction and recommend such a course and, if so, what research has been conducted by the Department in support of its recommendations?

4. Is it departmental policy to allow government facilities to be used for the promotion of quasi-religious organizations?

5. Is the Department aware that promotional material for the World Plan Executive Council represents their transcendental meditation course, the Science of Intelligence, as "the basis of solutions to all problems" including providing improved resistance to disease, development of personality and increased normality and improved relations with supervisors and co-workers and promises that "any government supporting the implementation of the World Plan, will bring integrity to its own internal organization, will develop the level of self-sufficiency of the society and will raise the dignity of the country in the family of nations" and, if so, is the Department satisfied that this material does not represent false and misleading advertising?

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Yes, the Minister became aware of the memo after it was issued by the Director of Personnel. The purpose of the memo was to respond to a number of enquiries received from employees about the technique of transcendental meditation. It is part of the function of the Personnel Division to inform employees of courses of instruction that could improve an employee's performance of his or her duties. The circulation of this memorandum is not considered by the department as the promotion of a commercial enterprise at government expense.

2. Approximately 1350, one copy to each employee at Headquarters.

3. No, the department did not sanction or recommend the course. The memorandum only brought the course to the attention of employees so that they could make their own decisions about taking the course. Yes, research was conducted on the technique of transcendental meditation by the Director of Personnel. A number of articles were consulted including the Conference Board Record (July 1975), Canadian Business (February 1975), Academy of Management Journal (Volume 17, No. 2), The Lancet (April 1970), Scientific American (February 1972); and a number of books including Transcendental Meditation by J. Forem; Tranquility without Pills by J. H. Robins and David Fisher; The Transcendental Meditation Program for Business People by Robert B. Kory; and TM Discovering Inner Energy and Overcoming Stress by Dr. Harold H. Bloomfield.

4. No.

5. The Department was not aware of these specific quotations and they have been brought to the attention of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act who has responsibility for the administration of the misleading advertising and deceptive marketing practices provisions of the Act. Under the Act, it is the Director's duty to initiate an inquiry whenever he has reason to believe that there has been or is about to be a violation of any provision of the Act. In view of the subjective nature of transcendental meditation and the fact that no complaints concerning any promotion by this organization have been received in his office, the Director believes that it is unlikely that a court would hold beyond a reasonable doubt that the quotations were in violation of the Act. The Director, however, will examine the organization's promotional material in greater detail and take whatever action is necessary in accordance with the statute.

Order Paper Questions

4. What (a) are the names of the beneficiary companies (b) is the location of their head office (c) was the purpose and nature of their investment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the reply is as follows:

Chart of CIDA'S involvement in the pre-investment incentive program from 1972 through June, 1976:

* Preamble: CIDA, through its Business and Industry Division, offers a pre-investment incentive program to Canadian companies under stringent guidelines (see reply to Part 3 below). Part of the requirements are that any subsequent investment made must be to the benefit of the developing country, as well as to the Canadian company involved. CIDA does not, directly, promote investment, rather it tries to encourage Canadian investment overseas. It never supports investment financially. What it does do is: (a) Offer funds to reimburse a company, up to a maximum of $2,500, to do a Starter Study in the country of its choice. This is a brief, almost superficial, look into a particular location by a particular company as to whether or not it could possibly establish an enterprise or form a joint venture in a country designated by CIDA as a "developing nation". All companies must submit an application to CIDA beforehand, and these must be approved prior to the Study's commencement. These funds basically cover minimal travel expenses for a period of not more than 15 days. (b) After the Starter Study is completed, the company may decide to apply to CIDA for a Feasibility Study, providing the area of interest looks promising, and this is done in much greater depth. In this instance, CIDA will match funds (50 per cent of the cost) in reimbursing the Canadian company which has made such a Study, to a maximum of $25,000. Upon completion of the Feasibility Study, the company wil then decide to either invest their funds in the developing nation or not. The choice is entirely theirs. CIDA requires a report giving the reasons for their decision. Most of the companies listed numerically in Part 1 of the following chart decided not to invest, thus the discrepancy between the figures in Part 1 and Part 4 of each Question (or country). The grants given are not ongoing from year to year, but rather are a lump sum amount as reimbursement for a particular Study already completed.

RCMP—GASOLINE SERVICE STATIONS, EMERSON, MANITOBA

Question No. 5,697—Mr. Epp:

1. At what gasoline service stations are the RCMP authorized to purchase gasoline, oil and minor repairs in Emerson, Manitoba?

2. Were open tenders called to establish where such purchases could be made and, if not, what criteria were used to determine where purchases could be made?

3. Were open tenders called to establish price per gallon of gasoline and, if not, how was the purchase price determined?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): 1. There are three service stations located in Emerson, Manitoba, Shell rated (B), Gulf rated (E) and Texaco rated (E). The R.C.M.P. are authorized to use any of these outlets, however the higher discount stations are to be used where possible. There is no outlet for the (A) rated company in Emerson.

2 and 3. The R.C.M.P. use the National Credit Card System for the purchase of gasoline and related products for vehicles. The National Credit Card System is administered by Services and Supply Canada and is based on open tenders called by Services and Supply Canada to establish an order of preference based on discounts offered. These tenders are called every three years to establish a Standing Offer Agreement to supply petroleum products for purchase of the products as set out in the Handbook for Users of Government of Canada Credit Cards published by Services and Supply Canada. The handbook lists companies that are authorized to accept the National Credit Card for use in payment of supplies and services provided and discount rate by province e.g., (A) would be best discount and then descend down the scale according to discount offered. As a result of this, the policy of the Force is to use the company which offers the greater discount, however in cases of emergency and after hours any of the approved companies listed may be used.

The use of airlines in Fort Frances is based on convenience to the patients, nurses, private physicians, availability of aircraft in winter and summer, short notice, and the quality of service. Mr. Blais: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, my point of order goes back to a question placed on the order paper on October 14 of last year, No. 3,140. In this question I asked four things: I asked for the amount of legal business given a lawyer named N. Dwayne Dixon, of Smith Falls, within a year of his being appointed president of the Leeds Liberal Association. It also asked for a breakdown of his business. On December 5 the question was answered, in part, that he received within one year $15,585 worth of business. Then it said the following:

Information will be communicated at a later date to the hon. member in regard to what this business was.

That was seven or eight months ago. The information has not been communicated to me. Accordingly, on May 4 I put two further questions on the order paper, Nos. 5,425 and 5,427, asking why this information was not forthcoming and also asking if it was government policy to award lucrative government business to those who had served the Liberal party as presidents of ridings.

None of these questions has been answered although I have been promised this list for seven months. I think it is legitimate to raise the question, as parliament is about to adjourn for the summer, as to where this list is, why the government is not willing to make it available, and why this man got $15,000 worth of business shortly after he became president of the Leeds Liberal Association.

I think this is a legitimate question and either the parliamentary secretary or the President of the Privy Council should be willing at this time to rise in the House and explain the reason this information is not being given, so that the matter will not stand in abeyance until the fall and be put off and put off like everything else this government does when it does not want to tell the people the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds was just recognized. He had the floor and completed developing his point of order. Then he sat down. Surely nothing could have happened in the interval that would give rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Yes, Mr. Speaker, something did happen in the interval. The hon. member for St. Boniface asked me, across the floor of the House, how much money I received as president of the Leeds Liberal Association. I ask him to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No way.

Mr. Cossitt: I also ask him—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Are you prepared to say how much you got?

Mr. Cossitt: I am prepared to say I never received one cent. I resent the implication, and I demand—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. No unparliamentary language was used or alleged to have been used in the exchange that has taken place. Besides that, the hon. member accepted the occasion to take the floor and put on the record whatever statement he wanted to make in response to the question.

Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Condon.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-84, the famous and notorious bill to abolish capital punishment, seems to be nearing a close. I spoke on this subject and on this bill early in the debate on second reading, and at that time I presented what I thought were reasonable and logical arguments for retaining capital punishment and for sincerely opposing Bill C-84. Since that time many pages of Hansard have been filled by those who have participated in the debate, some pros and some cons. A large majority of my constitutents have made it quite clear to me by petitions, by letters, by telegrams and by personal calls and contacts that they support capital punishment for all premeditated murders. I sincerely believe the great majority of Canadians all across the country think the same way, and that opinion should be reflected in this House. There has been no hue and cry from Canadians to introduce a bill to abolish capital punishment, let alone Bill C-84. On the contrary, there is an open and very clear demand on the part of the vast majority of Canadians to enforce capital punishment not only for the slaying of policemen and prison guards but also for all premeditated murders.

● (1520)

There is no question in my mind that all the avowed statements and pleas about there being a free vote on this subject are a lot of hogwash. There has not been a free vote. It would be naive for any person to say that all members of parliament exercised a free vote without fear or the threat of being affected regarding their desire for promotion within the political party system. I have no hestitation in pointing out quite clearly that I have a free vote, and I am proud to vote freely on all matters. There is only one influence which affects my votes and decisions, and that is the collective majority of opinions and views of Canadians generally, in particular the collective majority of opinions and views of the citizens of the federal constituency of Moncton.

Quite frankly, if I, as a member of parliament, were to support Bill C-84 to abolish capital punishment, it seems to me that I would be sorely irresponsible and would be responsible for the slaying of future police officers, prison guards and citizens generally, because by supporting this bill I would be an accomplice before the fact.

Let us think about this very seriously. Those who support this bill are vested with a serious power of judgment and should vote uprightly and impartially without any personal consideration or consideration for the political party system. They must divest themselves of prejudice and preconception they might have because of the party system. They must not be motivated by stubborn pride of opinion, nor should they be too facile in yielding to the views and arguments of their fellow members of parliament.

I suggest that responsible members of parliament in a democratic system based upon democratic principles should be prepared to adhere to public opinion. Members of parliament are supposed to be responsible. We are supposed to be representatives of the people, not necessarily of a party. People should be first. As members of parliament we are representatives of and responsible to the people, and we should be a government and a parliament of the people, for the people and by the people.

Canadians are urging those who supported the bill on second reading to reconsider their position. They are asking members of parliament who supported it on second reading to oppose it now. Believe me, public opinion is important and must be taken into consideration. When public opinion on this bill is so clear and of such significance, it is no time for concern for personal promotion within party ranks or for considering personal opportunities. It is contemptuous not to adhere to public opinion in a situation of this kind.

Now is the time to vote to kill this bill, and for the government to bring forward a bill for the complete reinstatement of capital punishment for premedicated murder and to show a proper sense of direction, responsibility and stability, for a change. It occurs to me that probably the only way to obtain a free vote would be for the hon. member for Moncton, yours truly, to present a bill for the reinstatement of capital punishment at the next session. Then, just maybe, we might have a free vote because I am the one member of parliament in the House today who, by virtue of the exercise of freedom of choice, would have a non-partisan vote.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: You are slow on your feet.

Mr. Caccia: A new speech, please.

Mr. Stevens: In speaking at third reading on this bill I would first like to say, in reply to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), that I would be very interested to hear him make a speech trying to justify his position on the vote at second reading.

Mr. Caccia: I did.

Mr. Stevens: The fact is that the hon. member is a very ambitious member in the Liberal caucus and he knows only too well that he must toe the party line with respect to this bill, rather than show any free will or free conscience.

Mr. Dinsdale: All we hear is his master's voice.

Mr. Stevens: I referred to the hon. member for Davenport, but I could refer to several hon. members from metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) knows well enough how we on this side of the House have voted, as well as hon. members on his side of the House. By imputing to us motives as to how we voted, he is really not doing justice to the spirit with which we have approached this debate, namely, to try to find the answer we think is best for the country. I think he should at least withdraw the comment he just made as to the motives which inspired the intervention I made at second reading and the way I voted. I do not think that this is within the spirit and the direction of the rules which govern debates in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Jones.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that he is skating on thin ice again. I think he should withdraw that last remark.

Mr. Stevens: If I may ask, Mr. Speaker, what last remark?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member did impute motives. He implied that there was pressure applied to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that just prior to our lunch break this question came up with regard to another hon. member who suggested that there was pressure brought to bear on hon. members opposite with respect to their votes, and Mr. Speaker at that time held quite clearly that that was just a question of debate and that this is a debating chamber. That is what parliament means.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: It is only natural that hon. members, especially in a so-called free vote, might apply pressure upon one another in order to try to influence them to their way of thinking. My comment was simply provoked by the hon. member for Davenport who made a comment when I rose to speak. I am simply challenging him. If he wishes to speak and try to persuade hon. members as to why they should vote for abolition at third reading of this bill, as opposed to what I suggest, which is retention, he should do so.

Mr. Caccia: I must repeat the same question of privilege, because earlier the hon. member for York-Simcoe imputed to me motives and ambition as guiding elements and factors in my making a speech at second reading and my manner of voting. Therefore, he has imputed motives with regard to my pattern of voting. I again ask Your Honour to ask the hon. member to withdraw his comments.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose every day in this House motives are imputed to hon. members. One of those motives may be to curry favour with authority. There could be a motive, from time to time, to curry favour with the Chair. There could be a motive, from time to time, to vote in accordance with one's conscience, or it might be a motive to vote in accordance with the wishes of one's constituents. There may be a motive to speak and act in order to get out of this place early, or to stay late, depending upon one's point of view. This House operates, and hon. members make up their minds with respect to motives, and the imputing of motives is certainly not contrary to the rules. It is contrary to Standing Order 35 for any member to reflect upon any vote of the House; not upon individual members in the House but upon votes of the House of Commons.

● (1530)

I am repeating something I said before the luncheon break to the hon. gentleman who then occupied the chair and who ruled, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr.

Stevens) indicated, that this is a debating House and that we can reflect, subject to the use of abusive language, upon the motives or anything else of the debating member although we cannot, as the rules say, reflect upon any vote of the House of Commons, which is a quite different thing.

I have listened to what has been said and I would not enter into this discussion if I thought anything improper had been imputed to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). I would not get into this question except, perhaps, to go to the defence of the hon. member for Davenport. Nothing has been said about the vote of the House of Commons, however, but only what may, correctly or incorrectly, have moved the hon. member for Davenport. I respectfully suggest that the hon. member ought not to be so sensitive, but should get on with the business before this House so that he will have an opportunity, for whatever motive he might have, to cast whatever vote he wants with respect to this particular bill.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the principle that is being advanced by the House leader of the official opposition has not been ruled upon by the Chair. The proposition of the opposition House leader ought not to be left unchallenged, although at this time I do not think the matter should be decided by the Chair because it is not before you, Mr. Speaker.

The point is that Standing Order 35 applies only to reflections upon the vote of the whole House. That, to my mind, is not the proper interpretation of that particular Standing Order. It is improper to reflect upon the vote of the House or upon any member within this House. To impute motives on the way an individual member casts his vote, or what those motives may have been, is not acceptable.

I fully agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) was treading a very thin line when he indicated that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) was toeing the party line on this particular issue. I say that on two bases. If there is one independent member in this House, it is the hon. member for Davenport. Mr. Speaker, if the comment was made about the intervention of the hon. member for Davenport that he may have been espousing certain arguments in his remarks that were espoused by the leader of his party and espoused and advocated by me, that may have been the interpretation of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Having said that, I am sure the hon. member for York-Simcoe would not impute motives to the hon. member for Davenport on the way he cast his vote at any stage of the debate on Bill C-84.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on this point of order. If I interpret correctly what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) said, it was that he had no ambition. If he has no ambition, I think it is only fair that he make his constituents aware of that. I am sure they would like to know what kind of member represents them in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I believe we are getting into discussion and debate. I suggest we return to Bill C-84.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, to continue with my remarks on Bill C-84, I should like to touch on ten separate points which I feel are relevant before we come to the end of this important debate. One of my colleagues to the left suggested, "Keep politics out of the House of Commons". Mr. Speaker, certainly I am the last to introduce politics as far as debate is concerned on a matter as important as this question of retaining or not retaining the death penalty.

I wish to put a very basic question to hon. members. Is the retention of the death penalty in fact a deterrent? I believe most members would say it is a deterrent, as far as they personally are concerned, if there were any question of their committing a crime that might result in the loss of somebody's life or a crime that would be punishable by death. Certainly it would be a deterrent to me, and I believe most other members would say it would be a deterrent to them. The simple premise is that, if convicted, they might lose their own life. Surely in that case few could argue there is no deterrent.

There is considerable evidence, based on the statistics supplied by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), gathered over the last 16 to 18 years, which would indicate that the death penalty may be a deterrent. I say that bearing in mind that for the six-year period ended in 1962 we found that the murder rate in Canada was approximately one per 100,000 people and it has gone up steadily since. Is it simply a coincidence that since 1962 the death penalty has not been imposed? Is it just coincidence that by 1974 the rate was 2.4 per 100,000? I think that says that perhaps the death penalty was a deterrent, and I think we have to face third reading of this bill with the assumption that in all likelihood the death penalty is a deterrent.

When we reach our decision on how to vote tomorrow, we should recognize to a greater extent than we have to date that public opinion in Canada favours the death penalty. Many estimates have been made on the degree of acceptance. I would say that in my area 75 per cent, or maybe 85 per cent, of the people would answer "Yes" if asked the simple question: Do you think the death penalty should be retained for at least some crimes? I hear my socialist friends to the left saying, "No." If they are so sure my figures are incorrect, then let us have a plebiscite. Let us find out in an accurate way, preferably at the next general election, whether Canadians feel the death penalty should be retained or not.

I find it interesting that the more you see this Liberal-Socialist alliance, the more you see the Solicitor General proposing a bill in effect seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) as this one is, the more you can sense that there is nobody in this country so intolerant of public will—if public will happens to be against their views—than the Liberal-Socialists we have in this House. That is the simplest interpretation one can make of the fact that the government, aided and abetted by its Socialist friends to my left, has, by bringing forward this legislation, ignored the public will. If they do not believe that between 75 per cent and 85 per cent of Canadians favour retention of the death penalty, why can we not find out? Let us consult the public. Is there anything wrong with consulting the people, in a democracy, to learn if they think we should pass legislation abolishing the death penalty?

My third point is this. How does Canada stand in comparison with the rest of the world on this question? If we become an abolitionist nation, will we be in step with the rest of the world, or will we make ourselves a veritable island among nations which have retained the death penalty? There can be little doubt about the facts. United Nations' figures show that the world trend is increasingly to retention. More and more states are retaining the death penalty. It is clear, if one examines what is happening in the United States, that the trend in that country is to reimpose the death penalty. It is not in favour of more and more abolition.

When the United States Congress in 1974 passed anti-hijacking legislation dealing with air piracy, it specifically provided for the death penalty for air piracy. Yet we in this country, by passing Bill C-84, will do exactly the opposite of what has been done in the United States. Also, Mr. Speaker, the United States Congress is not alone in reinstituting the death penalty. Earlier in this debate I said that the United States supreme court had made it clear that the death penalty may be introduced in the states of the union and that it is not against the United States constitution. We began debating this question in the twenty-ninth parliament when this country began moving in the abolitionist direction. It is interesting to note that since 1972 no less than 35 states of the United States have introduced legislation which would make the death penalty mandatory or an alternative option, for many crimes, to life imprisonment.

Let me put on record which states south of the border have reintroduced the death penalty, together with the date of passage of the legislation. I wish to make it clear that the states I am about to list reintroduced the death penalty for one or more crimes. Mr. Speaker, Alabama passed such legislation on September 9, 1975, when it became a retentionist state. Maryland passed such legislation on July 1, 1975; Missouri, on June 23, 1975; Virginia, on October 1, 1975; Washington passed such legislation last year; Arizona passed it on August 8, 1973; Arkansas, on July 24, 1973; California, on January 1, 1974; Colorado held a referendum on November 5, 1974 and passed legislation on January 1, 1975; Connecticut passed it on October 1, 1973.

I emphasize that the dates mentioned are those on which legislation reimposing the death penalty was passed or became effective. Delaware passed the law on March 29, 1974; Florida, on December 8, 1972; Georgia, on March 28, 1973; Idaho, on March 27, 1973; Illinois, on July 1, 1974; Indiana, on April 24, 1973; Kentucky, on January 1, 1975; Louisiana, on July 2, 1973; Mississippi, on April 23, 1974; Montana, on January 1, 1974—and amendments were subsequently passed, effective later in 1974. Nebraska passed its law on April 20, 1973; Nevada, on July 1, 1973; New Hampshire, on April 15, 1974; New Mexico, on March 20, 1973; New York, on September 1, 1974; North Carolina, on April 8, 1974; Ohio, on December 22, 1972; Oklahoma, on May 17, 1973; Pennsylvania, on March 26, 1974; Rhode Island, on June 26, 1973; South Carolina, on July 2, 1974; Tennessee, on February 27, 1974; Texas, on June 14, 1973; Utah, on July 1, 1973; and Wyoming, on February 24, 1973.

[Mr. Stevens.]

In short, since 1972 no fewer than 35 states of the United States of America have brought back the death penalty. The United States Congress in 1974 brought back the death penalty for air piracy. Therefore, who is out of step with whom? Can we be absolutely assured that by abolishing the death penalty tomorrow, if hon. members so choose, and making this an abolitionist state, we shall move in the right direction? Will we not be out of step with the rest of the world by joining the mere one per cent of the population of the world which is abolitionist in the sense in which we shall be abolitionists if this bill carries tomorrow?

Let me now touch on the question of the misrepresentation that there is a free vote on this bill. It should be drawn to the public's attention that of the 133 members who supported the bill on second reading, 27 were cabinet ministers who voted en bloc. Clearly, since more than 10 per cent of the members of this House voted en bloc, according to a previous understanding, the vote was not entirely free. If you were to ignore the vote of the cabinet, the members of which voted en bloc, the net result of a truly free vote would have been that retentionists would have cast 125 votes, as against 106 abolitionist votes. In short, I believe the government intends to make this an abolitionist state; otherwise it would have allowed a truly free vote.

I suggest that the proper procedure would have been to allow a private member to introduce the bill and then to allow each member to vote on it according to his or her conscience. There should have been no suggestion of government involvement. I remind hon. members of that moment in this House, when he voted on June 29, when the question arose as to what extent the rules should be warped in order to allow us to finalize the vote. Hon. members will remember that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rose and indicated to all members on his side of the House that they should vote in accordance with his wish. Was the vote free?

Mr. Allmand: That was a procedural matter.

Mr. Stevens: The Solicitor General says it was a procedural matter. But it was a procedural matter touching on what was supposed to be a free vote in this House.

I next touch on the suggestion raised by abolitionists that in place of the death penalty the sentence for murder should be true "life" imprisonment. I challenge that. I do not think there is such a thing as life imprisonment as that term is generally interpreted. Certainly, we shall not impose the kind of life imprisonment whereby we can say to a prisoner that he will never regain his freedom, never be released on parole and never see his sentence lessened.

We must be honest with the Canadian public. In place of the death penalty we say that we shall impose life imprisonment for 25 years, but the sentence can be reviewed after 15 years and there is a possibility for the prisoner to be absent from prison for various periods, with escort. That sort of sentence is to be the alternative to the death penalty. Tomorrow, when hon. members cast their vote, they should remember this. I want to make it clear to the Canadian public that we are not substituting life imprisonment, in the true sense of the word, for the death sentence. It is simply life imprisonment for 25 years, open for review certainly after 15 years. In any event, from day one it is subject to the privilege of taking an absence from prison with an escort at any time for various periods of time. That is something I feel many are not cognizant of or are weighing properly.

Again I must take exception to the committee proceedings which took place with respect to this bill at second reading. Quite rightly, we were urged to allow the bill to go to committee so we could have intensive study, a review of the bill and proper discussion. I believe that most of my colleagues will support me when I say that in committee we were subjected to a majority of Liberal members who, by coincidence or otherwise, happened to be mainly abolitionists. They insisted, first, that we should have no witnesses before the committee and, second, that our time be limited as far as study of the bill was concerned. On this type of issue I do not think that is fair to the Canadian public.

I ask hon. members to record the number of people who have written to them requesting that they be heard before the committee, or to say how disappointed they were that they were unable to come before a committee of this House to give their evidence concerning this important matter. I have received letters. I can only assume that many other members have received letters from people who have taken exception to the fact they were not given an opportunity to appear before the committee which presumably was to look in depth at the desirability of passing the bill in the form that was submitted.

The seventh point I wish to touch on, very quickly, is with regard to air piracy. Even if you are an abolitionist, surely the fact that every nation surrounding us has air piracy laws providing for the death penalty in case of death ensuing as a result of air piracy requires us to keep the death penalty for piracy. Until other nations on this continent and nations such as Japan, Russia and Ireland, for example, do away with the death penalty, it would be unwise for us to do away with the death penalty with respect to air piracy, at least. Why should we make Canada one of the most hospitable countries for an air pirate when other nations have the death penalty for such a terrible crime? I hope those who vote on third reading will give consideration to that point.

If you like, be an idealist and say that in concept we should be an abolitionist nation. However, we must be practical and realize that many countries of the world are not at that stage. Until we get to that stage, let us not jeopardize Canada needlessly and act irresponsibly by saying we should do away with the death penalty, come what may; that we are not worried about air piracy or any other terrible crimes being committed. That is irresponsible. I hope members who feel otherwise will reassess their position.

The eighth point I wish to touch on is what I feel is a type of distortion by abolitionists. I refer to the argument as to the method of execution. In a sense, the abolitionists like to use the hangman's noose as their symbol. That is not the important question. The important question is whether there should be the death penalty. Once that is decided upon, the method of execution is a very secondary thing. I feel that whatever is the most humane method of execution is the one that should be followed. My colleague, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), suggested that this could be left to the cabinet: they could decide by regulation the method of execution.

I supported that proposed amendment because I believed it would be a humane way of handling it. It is handled by regulation under the National Defence Act. That is how executions are prescribed. It is not laid down that it must be by hanging, firing-squad or any other way. It simply states in the National Defence Act that by order in Council the cabinet can determine the method of execution in any particular case. Let that be clear. When we speak about the death penalty and its retention we are not necessarily saying that the hangman's noose should be retained; we are saying that, regardless of the method of execution, let us make sure that capital punishment remains a deterrent to crime the way it was in former years.

The ninth point I wish to touch on is one I really believe is related. I am pleased that the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) is here. If this legislation passes tomorrow, a new drive will be commenced by those who have been abolitionists, and I do not fault their motives. For some odd reason there seems to be a relationship between the pro-abortionists and the abolitionists. There will be a new drive to make our abortion laws still easier. That will be a retrograde step for Canada. I hope the attitude that is moving some people to support this bill will be arrested short of new legislation to make abortion on demand virtually the rule in Canada. That would be most regrettable.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As a member of the House who happens to be an abolitionist, I resent the implication the hon. member is making, somehow linking my position as an abolitionist with the abortion movement, on either side of the question. The hon. member should retract that kind of comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member should now get back to the point of debate.

Mr. Stevens: My tenth and final point is this. For many of the reasons I have outlined, if Bill C-84 is given third reading tomorrow I can assure hon. members that the subject will not be ended in Canada. New legislation will be demanded by the Canadian public. They will demand the return of the death penalty. I would guess that within a decade the death penalty will be restored in Canada because of public demand.

I intend to make sure, in my area, that in the coming election, whenever it is called, the cards are laid squarely on the table to show who stood for what in so far as the retention of capital punishment is concerned. Basically, on this side of the House this has been a free vote. It is to the credit of the official opposition that it has been free. It is to the discredit of the government that they have faked their free vote. That is why I am so confident that if we go to the Canadian public and spell out the truth concerning this important issue, they will respond with their votes to ensure the death penalty is reinstated in this country, come what may tomorrow.

Capital Punishment

● (1600)

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly very pleased with the summary which has just been provided by my hon. friend, the experienced member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who in my view has completed a careful, point by point analysis of the issue before us. Frankly, I do not expect to persuade anybody to my point of view, and bearing this in mind I intend to be brief. Nevertheless, at third reading there are certain areas of concern I should like to put on record. Not too long ago I received a letter from a professor of human behaviour at the University of Notre Dame in Nelson, British Columbia—Professor W. A. Forsyth. I took the liberty of marking some of the points he made. He followed a line of reasoning which I felt to be original and genuine. Among other things, on this issue of capital punishment he said:

> The state has a responsibility to indicate its degree of disapproval by assessing and carrying out a just punishment.
> That certainly applies to any criminal action.
> The arguments for abolition of the death penalty seem to be based on the question whether the state has more right in applying equal justice for all than the individual has to make his own decision to kill anyone he chooses for whatever reason . . . If the murderer finds less disapproval of his act of murder than he finds of the imposition of the death penalty, then he knows that, officially, it is not that bad. This is where the lack of a deterrent is centred.

Mr. Forsyth went on to say:

> Some members of parliament focus their attitude upon the taking of life by the murderer rathern than upon the legal act of justice.
> If we are afraid an innocent person will be executed, let us improve our judicial system. But let us not protect those proven guilty. The death penalty is final, but not a bit more final than was the unjustified act of murdering an innocent victim . . . Let us make it clear that we disapprove more of the taking of another's life by the individual acting on his own judgment and desires than we do of the death penalty as just punishment for the murderer.

In my opinion, the professor has made an excellent point. He is certainly skilled on the subject of human behaviour.

I should like to move on to quote from a document provided by Statistics Canada two relevant passages from "Homicide in Canada" which appear at pages 162 and 163. The report states, in summary:

> In all, there have been 29 persons in Canada between 1961 and 1974 who after being charged with murder and receiving a court decision on their cases were again involved as suspects in a homicide incident. In 12 of these cases the person is legally definable as a repeater of the offence of homicide. Of this group, five were convicted murderers who killed again, three while in prison and two while at large following an escape. There were seven men initially convicted of manslaughter who were convicted for another homicide after this first conviction. Four of them received life sentences for the second homicide offence. Of this group, two were on parole, one was an escapee and one killed again while in prison. Another seven persons who were initially convicted of manslaughter or another lesser offence were charged with murder in a new homicide incident. Six of these men were not convicted of any offence for a second incident.

The report goes on to say, on page 163, that there is another type of repeater murderer. We read:

> This consists of persons who murder more than once in separate incidents before being apprehended and charged. With these persons, the police and courts did not intervene until after two or more murders are committed by the suspect.

I suggest that the words in that sentence are poorly chosen.

[Mr. Stevens.]

> In any event, between 1961 and 1974 there were 31 suspects who killed more than once on separate occasions before being apprehended. Between 1961 and 1974 there were 31 suspects who were involved in more than one murder incident for which they were charged with murder. These were charged with murder for as few as two and as many as seven incidents.

There is one set of figures simply not available to us in this context. These are the statistics with reference to those who have murdered and murdered again, and will murder yet again until they are apprehended. We do not know how many of these people are presently on the loose, whether they be insane, whether they deal in contract murder or whether they are in yet another category.

There is one further comment I should like to make. I can only say I am sorry, in making this reference, that the members to whom I wish to refer are not present in the chamber this afternoon. But I find it more than passing strange that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) should have done a complete flip-flop on the second, third, fourth and fifth votes in connection with the amendments we dealt with the other day. I also find it passing strange that the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall)—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This matter was raised earlier today. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) is reflecting on votes which were cast by hon. members, and that is contrary to Standing Order 35. I am sure he would not want to argue that he is entitled to reflect on the way in which other hon. members voted at any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Perhaps I should quote the Standing Order. It reads, in part:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the House except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

I suggest that the hon. member refrain from mentioning the voting.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I only wish I was in a position at this time to move that the votes of those members be rescinded. However, since the hon. member across the way has risen on this point of order—and it is a valid point of order—I shall not go on to mention other members from British Columbia about whose voting record I am rather concerned when this matter was before the House and the committee. But I should like to reinforce the comments made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. There is a very grave concern among Canadians that a gaggle of cabinet ministers has clearly demonstrated to all Canadians, certainly to the members on this side of the House, that we have not truly seen a free vote.

● (1610)

I should like to conclude by saying that throughout the lengthy debate on C-84 I have had an opportunity to read the speeches of various members of the House, and I have found there are three classes of members who speak or vote according to their particular persuasion on this vital issue. We have those who for very genuine and real reasons support the retention of capital punishment. We have those who for very genuine and real reasons support the abolition of capital punishment. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have those who for reasons best known to themselves have waffled on the issue. They have not demonstrated to the people in their ridings that they have a firm and true conviction regarding where they stand on this issue. Indeed, the record shows that there are those who stand squarely in the middle of the fence, and I only hope that the fence is a picket fence.

I was particularly impressed by the contribution to this debate of the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga). In the brief period that this member has been in the House of Commons much of what he has said has made not only good sense but good reading. The hon. member happens to be a retentionist, and although I am quite prepared to speak favourably on behalf of any member who may support the other point of view, I just wish to go on record as saying that I have been particularly impressed with his contribution.

I should also like to single out for special mention the contribution made by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), and also the very singular and dedicated manner in which the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) has conducted the fight for those who, like myself, firmly believe in the retention of capital punishment.

I recognize that members on both sides are most anxious to see this debate come to a conclusion. Frankly, I do not believe that anything I have said, or for that matter anything many other members have said on this side, is going to change the thinking of any other member of the House; indeed I would be surprised if it did. But at least, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada know where I stand; the people of Canada know where we all stand.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, prior to getting into my comments I should like to pay special tribute to the member who has just concluded his remarks on third reading of this very important piece of legislation, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco). In regard to this issue and in regard to the majority of issues on which he has shared his views with the House, he has always given an extremely fair analysis. I am sure the constituents of Kootenay West are truly proud of him and happy to have him represent them in this chamber.

Since I spoke on this issue when it was before the House on second reading, my remarks will be extremely brief. I should like to go back to what I said on second reading when I questioned the about-face of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I asked the minister whether he would be kind enough to explain to this House and to his constituents what prompted him suddenly to support abolition when at every other time he had supported retention in this chamber. To this date, Mr. Speaker, he has not shared that information with us, and that is his right. But I think we also have an obligation to share our views and concerns with the country as a whole.

I believe that if this piece of legislation is passed tomorrow in this chamber, it will truly be a sad day for Canada. I say that because in essence what it will mean is that the government has demonstrated there is no such thing in Canada as participatory democracy. I think surveys have indicated that close to 75 percent to 80 per cent of the Canadian people are in favour of capital punishment. I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) what makes him feel that his conscience is so much wiser than the collective conscience of his constituents. It will indeed be a sad day for participatory democracy in this country; it will take us back into the dark ages when we almost lived under a dictatorship.

Those members who support the abolitionist stance say the reason they do so is that the country will be totally abolitionist. If this bill passes, Mr. Speaker, Canada will still not have total abolition. I had hoped to be recognized today during the question period to ask the defence minister whether he could give the House any indication of what the government's plans are regarding the introduction of amendments to the National Defence Act. As I understand it, this act presently provides capital punishment for 36 offences, some of them as strange as an individual getting drunk on watch. We will not have total abolition, since these provisions are still contained in the National Defence Act. I would appreciate very much some indication from the government side of the House as to what the government's plans are in this area, whether changes are planned or whether we are going to have a certain segment of our society that has a special responsibility to Canada, in a sense discriminated against; a situation where for the ordinary citizen there will be total abolition, but for military personnel there will not.

Let me conclude by emphasizing once again that if this bill passes tomorrow, it will be just one more sign that this government has no concern for the will and wishes of the people of Canada—and that will be a sad day for participatory democracy.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, four times since I have been a member of this House the subject of the death penalty has been debated in this chamber. Until now, on each occasion I have, for one reason or another, not been able to participate in the debate, even though on the first occasion I was one of the movers of a tripartite resolution for abolition during my earliest days as a freshman member. Therefore, I welcome this opportunity to speak briefly and to state my position in what I hope sincerely will be the last and decisive debate on this subject in this parliament.

My concern about the death penalty extends back not only a decade but goes back about 30 years to the time when, as a teenager, I took time off high school to attend the first murder trial I have witnessed. It was a trial of a very poor, friendless man who was accused of a very heinous crime, the killing of a young girl and the disposal of her body in a furnace. It could hardly have been a more horrible crime or one calling more for the ultimate penalty. The accused was convicted, and he was executed. Only a few months after his execution it became apparent that his defence was entirely inadequate, if not incompetent, and there was grave doubt about his guilt. From that day forward I have been asking myself what possible rationale there could be for such an irrevocable penalty in our law. Whatever the arguments for capital punishment, and there have been many persuasive ones put forward in this House, we must bear in mind that the death penalty is the one penalty that is irrevocable. There is no way we can correct the errors of our human legal processes, and they are human and fallible.

Many thoughtful speeches have been made during this debate and the debates during these past ten years or more in the House on this subject. I will not try to repeat the arguments which have influenced my thinking. Many of my constituents have written me, telephoned me and discussed with me in person this issue over the past ten years. If there is any member of this House who has attempted to consult his constituents, to stimulate their participation in the democratic process and their commentary on current affairs and national issues, I hope I am one. I have felt that it is my duty as a member of parliament, a duty given me by those who elected me, to study an issue of this importance as deeply as I can and to reach a responsible and conscientious decision based on the facts as I found them. During these past ten years I have searched for evidence that would persuade me that the death penalty is a necessary part of our law. In the process of this consideration I have, perhaps incorrectly but in my own mind correctly, eliminated every other justification for the death penalty but one, and that is the protection of society.

In all the debates and all the evidence in this House during these past ten years I have not been persuaded that the death penalty has anywhere in the world been effective in reducing the incidence of capital crime. If it were otherwise, I would not hesitate to accept capital punishment. I do feel that the state has the right to levy such a punishment, but only where it is clearly demonstrable that society achieves some protection as a result. I have not been so persuaded and I am, therefore, still very much convinced that capital punishment should be removed from our statute books.

What is the responsibility of a government in this respect? Much has been said about that in this debate. For me, this is a free vote, but I must say I do not think it should be. I feel that a free vote in many ways is an abdication of responsibility on the part of the government. Why capital punishment should be less a matter of commitment on the part of any government than bilingualism, than divorce, than any other subject which is constantly put before this House by a government, for which a government takes responsibility, I do not know. I would have much preferred that the government had not only put forward a bill in the terms which met its convictions, but that it had been prepared to stand or fall as a government on the way in which this House dealt with it.

The government initiative on which we are now about to vote is long overdue. I regret that the impression has been allowed to build over the last few years of an almost routine commutation of death sentences. The cabinet, I have reason to know, takes each case very seriously and considers the merits of each one. However, the longer the government put off committing itself to abolition and carrying out its intentions in the most direct way, with the approval of parliament, the greater the chance there has been that the public would lose confidence not only in the government but in the processes and administration of the law. I welcome this initiative for abolition. I wish it were an initiative on which the government were prepared to take full responsibility as on other important measures, but I am prepared, as an individual member, to take my responsibility as will all other members when they vote tomorrow.

It has been suggested that as members of this House we must vote according to our estimation of what our constituents want. I believe in consulting my constituents. I believe in their wisdom, and what they tell me influences my thinking a great deal. However, I believe members of parliament are here in the best British parliamentary tradition to take responsibility for their own decisions and not to pass the responsibility for those decisions to those who sent them here.

● (1630)

I believe it is incumbent on each member to satisfy himself or herself about the wisdom of a decision that he or she is called upon to make, and if they do not do so they are short-changing those who sent them here. So I will cast my vote, as I have in the past, bearing in mind what my constituents have told me on various aspects of this matter, bearing in mind my own feelings and conscience but, most of all, I will base my decision on the facts as I have found them to be and on the judgment that I can bring to bear as a responsible and conscientious representative of my electors.

Probably all members have received a letter from a man in Biggar, Saskatchewan, who wrote very movingly about his 17 year-old daughter who was killed in 1973. This man wrote:

> Courtrooms, laws and even the hangman's noose seemingly provide no influence or restraint whatever over an anxious, distressed or afflicted mind.

He suggests that hanging is meaningless and even disgraceful for this day and age. The noose, he says, will only serve to indicate our backwardness. He goes on:

> You and I have an obligation in attempting to erase as much of human suffering and punishment as is possible. We, the Canadian people look to you as a member of the Parliament of Canada for the required leadership toward such an end.

I hope that on whatever side of the matter members find themselves, we will attempt not simply to reflect the mass feeling of the moment but that we will exercise our conscientious judgment, bearing in mind the interests of society as a whole, not simply those who might be under sentence of death now or in the future, and that we will put our emphasis on the prevention of crime and suffering and on respect for life; in short, that we will exercise leadership. In so doing, I hope sincerely that tomorrow we will dispose of this question in the Canadian parliament once and for all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It appears that the debate on third reading of Bill C-84 has been concluded, as no other hon. member is seeking the floor. However, the House will recognize that it would be improper for me to put the question on the motion for third reading until the House has pronounced itself on the amendment. Does the House agree that the debate on the motion for third reading of Bill C-84 has now been concluded, and that the question will be put, if necessary, immediately after disposal of the question on the amendment which has been deferred until tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, during the discussions that took place among the House leaders who had also consulted the various members who had taken an active part in this debate, we had an understanding that if the debate should conclude before closing time tonight no other business would be introduced.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a point of order before he moves any motion?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister is quite correct that in our discussions it was agreed that if we concluded this matter before ten o'clock tonight, no other business would be put forward. But it was also discussed at our meeting that if there could be unanimous consent to dealing without debate with the finalization of Bill C-242, that would be a possibility. Bill C-242 is a private members' public bill having to do with the prohibition of smoking in certain vehicles of transport. I think I am stating the case correctly, that if there was to be any debate the government was not prepared to bring it forward, but if there was a possibility of completing the debate on third reading of that bill and passing it without further debate, this could be entertained.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. As the House will recall, there were two, or perhaps three occasions when the official opposition indicated that if this matter could be considered and called as a government order, we would be prepared to deal with it. This is still the situation. There was some question about it as private members' business, as I explained to the House on another occasion and to many people across the country. But as a government order we would be prepared to deal with it.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, so that the record is quite clear, I should like to say that I agree entirely with what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the House leader of the official opposition. However, at no time have I ever been given any understanding that if this motion were brought forward on any basis, it would be approved without debate. I was not able to get that assurance from either side.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister ask for it now?

Mr. Sharp: I was just going to say that if the House were disposed to approve Bill C-242 now without debate, we would have no objection.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is it the intention of the government House leader to bring forward this bill now as a government bill? We have indicated on a number of occasions that we are quite prepared to do that, but we have explained the difference to members of the House and to others. The difference is well known to the government House leader and to others. If the government House leader is prepared to say that the bill will come forward as government business, we are prepared to deal with it. If it is private members' business, then the government House leader knows even better than I do that House leaders have no place messing about in private members' business. That has been a long-standing tradition of this House.

Mr. Sharp: It is not the intention of the government to bring forward a government bill to replace Bill C-242 which would have to go through all the stages. Therefore, I think this is a hypothetical case. I would, therefore, like to conclude the remarks which I began. It was agreed among us that apart from the question of Bill C-242 which was raised in the way it was, if we did conclude the debate on Bill C-84 there would be no other business introduced by the government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if you would now call it ten o'clock there would certainly be no objection from this side.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make it clear, with regard to Bill C-242, that if the government had been prepared to introduce it as a government measure this afternoon, we on this side of the House would have been prepared to complete it at all stages without debate.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it ten o'clock and, I suppose, eliminate the adjournment debate, because I would think that no hon. member has received due notice?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.42 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MEASURES RESPECTING PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER AND OTHER SERIOUS OFFENCES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, July 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-84 to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences, be read the third time and do pass, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Condon.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Friday, July 9, 1976, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division of Bill C-84, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences and the deferred division on the motion in amendment thereto of the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon).

Before doing so, perhaps I could inform hon. members that, through an error in the Printing Bureau, some text was omitted from the last page of yesterday's English Hansard. The French text is complete. The members concerned in respect of the omission from the English text have been supplied with photo copies of the text that has been omitted. A complete corrected page will be printed in today's Hansard.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF HON. KENZO KONO, PRESIDENT OF THE JAPANESE HOUSE OF COUNCILLORS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before proceeding with the deferred division I wonder if I might ask hon. members to join with me in recognizing the presence in our gallery of an extremely distinguished visitor who, I might add, in his official capacity as President of the House of Councillors of the Diet of Japan, had occasion one year ago to cast a deciding ballot with respect to a tie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Kenzo Kono, President of the House of Councillors of the Diet of Japan, and Mrs. Kono are here on this occasion in Mr. Kono's capacity as the leader and President of the Japanese Olympic delegation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Before the taking of the Vote:

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The question for deferred division at this time, pursuant to an order made on Friday, July 9, 1976, is on the motion of Mr. Allmand and on the amendment of Mr. Condon. In accordance with the practice throughout the deliberations on this bill we will take the votes by row on each side of the House.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Condon), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Bearing in mind the terms of the order of this House made July 9, 1976 and before making reference to the provisions of that order which called for the adjournment of the House, may I say it is one of the more pleasant duties of the Speaker at this point to extend the customary invitation to members of the House, members of the press gallery and to those other officials too numerous to mention but who have been recipients of the invitation in the past, to join us all in celebrating a much needed rest from the travails of this place in room 16 at the moment of adjournment. Pursuant to the same order of July 9, and in conformity with every and each of the terms of that order, this House stands adjourned until October 12.

At 2.59 p.m. the House adjourned until October 12, 1976 pursuant to special order made July 9.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that his Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th day of July at 12 noon for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills;

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that Messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills without any amendment:

Bill C-68, An Act to amend the Medical Care Act;

Bill C-58, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act; and

Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences.

Order, please. By way of communication the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) drew to the attention of the Chair a problem respecting the recordings of his own vote on Vote No. 149 held on Thursday, July 8, 1976. Several motions were voted upon that day and with respect to all except Motion No. 12 the hon. member is recorded as being present in the Chamber and voting. It is his recollection clearly and that of other hon. members near him that day, that he also voted with respect to Motion No. 12, casting his vote against that motion; but, for some reason, he was missed with respect to that particular motion. On investigation, it seems certain that he was missed through error. The hon. member has brought this to our attention and properly is entitled to have it recorded, as it will be as a result of the remarks I am making, that he was present in the House and cast his vote against Motion No. 12, although at this stage no further reflection can be made, nor can any amendment be made to the Hansard record of that day.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that His Excellency, the Governor General, had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to the punishment for murder and certain other serious offences.—Chapter No. 105.

Bill C-58, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act.—Chapter No. 106.

Bill C-68, An Act to amend the Medical Care Act.—Chapter No. 107.

Bill C-20, An Act respecting citizenship.—Chapter No. 108.

Bill C-88, An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act (No. 2).—Chapter No. 109.

Therefore, pursuant to the order made Friday, July 9, 1976, this House, subject to the conditions contained in that order, stands adjourned until Tuesday, October 12, 1976, at 11 o'clock a.m. Needless to say, this provides a very much needed break from the work of the Chamber. While hon. members no doubt will find other work to do, it will at least provide hon. members with an opportunity to take a much needed rest.

The House adjourned at 12.10 p.m., until Tuesday, October 2, 1976, at 11 a.m., according to order made July 9, 1976.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 12, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before reading the communication I have received, and since it is predicted that the present session is soon to terminate, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the fact that there is some disposition on the part of the government to answer certain questions and some agreement on the part of the House to receive answers at this time. At this point this procedure can only be embarked upon with unanimous consent. Before we receive the messenger may I ask, is there unanimous agreement at this point for depositing certain answers to the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Apparently there is not unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I speak to that matter for a moment? I hope the government is not merely asking for the right to table answers to questions. There are orders for returns to be tabled and I understood that the government would be answering questions in the normal way. We would be giving consent to do that. They would be printed as part of today's Hansard, in the normal way. That was the understanding arrived at. I say this as I think the House should be made aware of the discussions which have taken place.

● (1110)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the volume of questions to be answered today, in one way or another, is obvious to the House by the stack of material I have on my desk. This includes answers in three categories; answers to be made in the normal fashion, a number of orders for returns to be tabled immediately, if that is the wish of the House, and a number of orders for returns to be tabled at a later date. I could read through all of the numbers, all 566 of them. I would prefer to have unanimous consent to simply deal with them in the normal way. Depending on the nature of the answers, they would be printed in Hansard and/or Votes and Proceedings as usual.

Mr. Speaker: I therefore ask, does the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) have the unanimous consent of the House to make these answers at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Ottawa, September 29, 1976

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber at 11.00 a.m. on Tuesday, October 12th, for the purpose of proroguing the First Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

Then, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the thirtieth Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The First Session of the Thirtieth Parliament was opened on September 30, 1974. In the 744 days since the opening, the Senate has met 216 times and the House, 343 times. Both in terms of the amount of elapsed time and the number of sittings of each House, this has been, by far, the longest session in the history of the Parliament of Canada. In terms of public legislation, this has been our most productive session, although, if examined on a yearly basis, the pace of legislation has been at the rate that has come to be normally expected in the last two decades.

The principal direction of the legislation enacted during this session has been toward the reasonable development and the just and equitable sharing of the great riches of our land. In addition to several important fiscal measures that have been passed, Parliament has put into place a program to combat inflation so that Canadians may indeed reap the benefits of their own productivity. As part of this program the Government has imposed upon itself a policy of restraint in the growth of its own expenditures and Parliament, as part of this program, has enacted alterations to such statutes as the Medical Care Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

At the same time, Parliament has not been unmindful of the need for continuing growth of the economy and has amended the Export Development Act and created the Federal Business Development Bank. The orderly development of business will be assisted by the enactment of the Canada Business Corporations Act and healthy competition in the free market will be stimulated by the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

[Translation]

In both economic and social terms, housing has been of great concern during this session and you have twice amended the National Housing Act and related statutes.

Energy resources are central to the development of the nation. This has led to the enactment of the Petroleum Administration Act and to the creation of Petro Canada.

Agriculture has been of major concern to you during this session. You have enacted a measure to provide for two price wheat and you have passed the Agricultural Stabilization Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act. You have made important amendments to the Farm Credit Act and to the Canadian Wheat Board Act as well as to several other statutes of great importance to the farmers of this country.

Several measures have been enacted to strengthen our social security system. You have improved the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act. Amendments to the statute law with regard to superannuation have been enacted. The services of those who fought for our country have been remembered in amendments to the laws relating to veterans' and civilians' war allowances, veterans' and returned soldiers' insurance, and to the compensation for former prisoners of war.

[English]

The institutional framework of Government has been a significant concern in this session. Parliament has enacted statutes to create the office of Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations and to amend Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements. Measures have been passed to protect the representation of all provinces in the House of Commons and to improve the representation of the northern territories in Parliament. You accepted your responsibilities by dealing with the financial arrangements for representatives of the Crown, for judges and for legislators. A number of measures relating to the structure of the courts were enacted, including important amendments to the Supreme Court Act. Committees of both Houses considered and made recommendations on the subject of members of parliament and conflicts of interest. A special joint committee of both Houses considered and made recommendations on employer-employee relations in the public service. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has not only effectively taken up its responsibilities under the Statutory Instruments Act, but also has embarked on an important study of government policy on the release of information, the conclusions of which are eagerly anticipated. Both Houses have considered procedural reform and, while progress has been made, both are to be encouraged to continue the work in future sessions.

[Translation]

You have made several amendments to the criminal law, including the enactment of a permanent law with regard to the punishment for murder and certain other offences.

Several of the statutes enacted have been designed to protect the equality of men and women in the letter and administration of the law.

During this session, a new Citizenship Act was passed and a measure to regulate the import and export of articles of cultural value was enacted. The Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission was created and a measure was enacted to assist the development of Canadian publications and broadcasting.

Almost all of the legislation that was forecast in the Speech from the Throne opening this session on September 30, 1974 has been enacted. This, however, constitutes merely half of the legislation that Parliament has adopted in the session. Parliament has indeed produced a remarkably great amount of legislation. Nonetheless, the demand for even more continues and Parliament has little time to spare in its effort to meet the needs of the nation.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provisions you have made for the service of Canada during the present and the two previous fiscal years.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence continue to bless our country.

This concluded the first session of the thirtieth Parliament.
