I intend to deal this afternoon more with the condition of our international trade than with the possibilities of war and the great efforts that are being made by so many countries, including Canada, to make certain that we have peace and do away entirely with any possibility of war. I listened with interest to what the honourable senator from Cochrane said about the situation in Germany. I had not meant to say a word about this, but the thoughts he expressed made me think of what Stalin did just a little while before World War II started, when he made a treaty with Hitler. Khrushchev is thinking now of making a treaty of a similar nature with a part of Germany, so-called East Germany. East Germany was created entirely by communist Russia. Every individual in the Government of that part of Germany is a creature of the actions of communist Russia. Now, what did Russia pay for the treaty that she made with Hitler? It is true, of course, that she got a great deal of territory—a big portion of eastern Poland—so much that a million Poles left eastern Poland and went to the most westerly part of that country, and took over a part of Germany. At that time that was eastern Germany. Hitler disregarded the treaty as soon as he seemed to be making progress with his war. He invaded Russia, particularly Stalingrad, where hundreds of thousands of people lost their lives, for because Stalin had made that treaty with Germany Russia was not in a position to meet an attack made by Hitler. Afterwards we, in turn, gladly accepted the action of Russia on our side in World War II. Now Khrushchev says that his solution of the German problem must be accepted or he may present an ultimatum. If he does, there will be war again, without any question whatsoever. However, virtually everyone in Canada today is hopping that out of the approching summit meetings peace will emerge, and with that in mind I do not intend to say much more about war.

If these meetings bring peace to the world we shall have to pay much more attention to our economic situation.

I listened with interest to the speech made the other day by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) in which he dealt with trade and commerce. Canada's trade is very largely international. Consider for a moment one of our great industries, the lumber industry in British Columbia. With its lumbering operations, the pulp and paper branches, and all the other activities connected with it, it is one of the biggest industries in Canada. Without foreign markets that industry would die today—it could not live if it had only the domestic market in which to sell its products.

The same is true of many other industries. For instance, many of the minerals which we produce primarily or industrially must be sold in a foreign market or they could not be produced at all.

In that regard I want to say a few words particularly in connection with management and labour in relation to the operation of our economy. But first let me state I agree entirely with the honourable senator from Shelburne that we must make some arrangement under which we will be able to trade with both the so-called Inner Six and Outer Seven groups of European countries, or with one of the groups, because we must have those markets.

Last year there was a great deal of labour trouble in British Columbia. All honourable senators are aware of the widespread strikes that we had there. I may say that the Senate helped to settle a strike out there through the splendid work that was done last session by the Senate Finance Committee in its study of inflation. That committee did a great deal of good, no question about it.

I have two quotations that I am going to read. One is a statement made by Mr. Claude Jodoin who, as you know, is head of the Canadian Labour Congress. He is a very able man and that organization is an excellent one. He said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of March 18:

> Organized labour in Canada feels it is on the threshold of a growing conflict with management . . . This brings up the subject of production. We are well aware of the role labour plays in production, but we also know that labour is not the only factor. Even in this frame of reference relations between labour and management are often of great importance to production.

Nothing is truer than that. I agree with that statement 100 per cent. He continues:

> We cannot expect to have efficient production in an atmosphere of conflict.

My other quotation is from a speech made by the immediate past president of the Canadian Construction Association at a meeting of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association a few days ago. I am reading from a report in the Montreal Gazette of March 23:

> ...labour and management might hold "periodic meetings" to discuss problems of mutual concern. This kind of meeting of minds is the best way of reducing labour problems. Purpose of such meetings would be fuller understanding of objectives of both sides, of the economic aspect of work stoppages, of competitive forces at home and in foreign markets, of the role of profits in future expansion and of the rights of the individual and the general public.

Now, honourable senators, you have heard two statements made by leaders in their field, one representing labour and one representing industrial production and management. Why cannot we get them together immediately? I have been wondering whether the Senate could not take the steps necessary to start such a getting together or a series of getting-together meetings that will make it possible for Canadian production to find its main market, which is the international market—or the foreign market, call it as you wish.

I want to say a word or two with respect to a suggestion made here by the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) when speaking on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I refer to his suggestion that the Senate Committee on Finance make a study of the premium on the Canadian dollar. Well, it happens that when speaking in this chamber on May 25, 1954, I suggested that the Senate, or a joint parliamentary committee, whichever was thought better, should make a complete study of the cost of production. Fortunately, during the last session of Parliament part of that suggestion was carried out through the Finance Committee's study of inflation. In 1954 I suggested that we should study the various factors that lead to the continually increasing cost of production which is making it so difficult for us to sell in foreign markets. I said then that increasing wages was one of those factors, but I pointed out that it was not the only factor, that other factors contributed to the increasing cost of production and I recommended that all these factors, together with the increasing cost of sales, should be considered.

Incidentally, honourable senators, in the statement made by Mr. Jodoin, to which I referred a moment ago, he made a similar recommendation for such a study. The newspaper dispatch says:

> He also referred to labour's proposal that a royal commission be named to investigate the inflationary propensities of wages, prices and profits.

I have quoted statements made by Mr. Jodoin, representing labour, and Mr. Harrington, representing management, the latter suggesting that labour and management get together at conferences from time to time. If we do not bring something like that about, we shall lose a great deal of our markets in the world at large. There is no question about that. Unless we can bring labour and management together to do something about prices we shall lose out.

That brings me to the question raised by the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi about the premium on the Canadian dollar. I agree with him that it would be very wise and helpful to our trade if we made a study of the causes and effects of this premium. What the result of that study would be I do not know, but there is no doubt whatever that this premium is playing a very important part in increasing our costs of production and making it more difficult for us to sell. Let me give you an illustration. In the district which I represented in the House of Commons and the district from which I take my designation in this house—Cariboo, in British Columbia—there was at one time a great production of gold and other minerals. The only market for that gold and the other minerals is a foreign one, the United States, and there is very little production of gold or other minerals in my district today because of the premium on the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar. A study of the question by a Senate committee might not reach any conclusions as to whether the premium should be changed, but the matter should at least receive serious consideration.

While speaking to this particular motion, I would like to draw attention to a committee of the Senate which plays an important part in our relationships with the world at large, the Standing Committee on Canadian Trade Relations. Perhaps that is the appropriate body to make a study of the relationship of the Canadian dollar to the American dollar. In any event, a study should be made. I wish to congratulate the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi for having made his suggestion publicly.

I should like also to congratulate the honourable senator from Cochrane (Hon. Mr. Bradette) upon his excellent presentation this afternoon. I join with him in an expression of good wishes to the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), the Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Relations, the body which is about to be authorized to review Canada's role in international affairs. As a member of that committee I will be very glad, as I am sure the other members will, to do everything possible to assist the chairman in his work. I am confident that this committee, by reason of its membership and its interest in international affairs, will do great things.

Before concluding my remarks, honourable senators, I should like to make a personal reference with respect to Canada's position at large. It happened that in 1946 I was chief Canadian delegate on a twenty-nation United Nations commission which sat in London for the purpose of deciding what assistance should be given to the war-torn countries of Europe and the Far East. That commission divided itself into three travelling committees, and each delegate, with the exception of Canada's, stated to which group or field party it wished to be appointed. As the delegate representing Canada, I did not have to ask for any particular appointment because as each of the other countries made their wishes known they asked that Canada be represented in their field party in the study of economic and social problems. It became necessary for me only to decide, on behalf of Canada, which invitation I would accept. I chose the group that was to travel in the Soviet Union, the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Poland and Czechoslovakia. We travelled through Poland and Czechoslovakia, but when we finished our work there we were informed that the other three countries had not answered the United Nation's letter and therefore we would not be visiting those countries.

I mention that experience, honourable senators, to show that as far back as 1946 a very good feeling for Canada was held by the countries represented on that commission. That being so, I am most hopeful that before long, through the study of the question now before our committee, we shall succeed in bringing labour and management into better relationships, and that when the opportunity for good world trading comes we shall be able to play our part and carry out our economic improvements.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Harold Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-26, to amend the National Energy Board Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. A motion for third reading of a bill on the day on which it is reported from committee cannot be made without unanimous consent of the house. I do not rise to object to this bill's receiving third reading at this sitting, but I think that before we give the consent the sponsor of the bill, or someone, should explain to the house the reason for the urgency.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We are only adopting the report at present, as I understand.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The bill was reported without amendment. If I understand the rules correctly, when a committee reports a bill without amendment it is automatically adopted. Now, I believe it has been suggested that on account of some urgency the bill should receive third reading tonight. Before I give my consent, which I do not expect I shall withhold, I should like to know the reasons for suggesting that the bill be given third reading tonight. What is the urgency?

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, this bill was considered by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this afternoon and, as reported by the Acting Chairman (Hon. Mr. Connolly), no amendments were made.

On second reading I explained the purpose of the bill, which is to make two amendments to the National Energy Board Act. The first is with respect of tolls on the transportation of gas within a province by an interprovincial company, and the second amendment extends the date of expiry of licences for exportation of power.

I have here a list of 20 licencees for exportation of power, whose licences will expire on March 31 next unless this bill receives third reading here, then goes to the other place and receives three readings there and finally is given royal assent by March 31. It is because these outstanding licences to export power will expire on March 31 that I am asking that the bill receive third reading tonight.

I have a table here which, with leave of the Senate, could be placed on today's Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Power: Why don't you read the list? Let us have the names.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The first is a licence for the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, on a firm contract, involving $1,700,000.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Whom is the contract with?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It does not state whom the contracts are with. It simply lists the companies and commissions which are exporting power and gives the amount of money involved in each case.

The second licence is to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario for the export of surplus interruptible power. It is estimated that this amounted to $8,300,000 last year.

The other licensees are:

Cedars Rapids Transmission Company, a firm contract involving $1,199,000.

Canadian Niagara Power Company, a firm contract involving $931,000 and an interruptible contract involving $155,000.

Ontario-Minnesota Pulp and Paper Company, a firm contract involving $252,000.

Maine and New Brunswick Electrical Power Company, a firm contract involving $354,000 and an interruptible contract, involving $131,000.

British Columbia Electric Railway Company, a firm contract involving $25,000 and an interruptible contract involving $37,000.

West Kootenay Power and Light Company Ltd., a firm contract involving $374.

Two contracts with the Southern Canada Power Company, one a firm contract involving $70,000, and one an interruptible contract involving $188,000.

Northern British Columbia Power Company, a firm contract involving $1,360.

Fraser Companies Ltd., an interruptible contract involving $294,000 and a firm contract involving $1,814.

Detroit and Windsor Subway Company, a firm contract involving $1,379.

The Manitoba Power Commission, an interruptible contract involving $770.

The New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, an interruptible contract involving $281,000.

Finally, the British Columbia Power Commission exports power on an irregular basis, as to the value of which I have not been able to obtain any figures.

For table see appendix "B" to today's Hansard, p. 456.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, those of us who were at the committee meeting this afternoon will, I am sure, agree that it was an excellent meeting. We had before us two very good witnesses, Mr. Ian N. McKinnon, Chairman of the National Energy Board, and Mr. E. A. Driedger, a representative of the Department of Justice. Mr. Driedger has been before our committee previously, and is an eminent counsel. We also had placed before the committee an opinion of Mr. E. Russell Hopkins, our own Law Clerk.

Both Mr. Driedger and Mr. Hopkins gave it as their opinion that passage of this bill was within the jurisdiction of Parliament. Mr. Driedger relied on the Winner Case, which I believe the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) mentioned when the bill received second reading on Thursday last. I am not going to dispute what was said, that in the light of that case Parliament has jurisdiction to pass this bill. However, the question that did arise in my mind was whether the facts in this case stand on all fours with the facts in the Winner Case. Mr. Driedger did not give a definite opinion on that point. He was reasonably certain of it, but to one question I asked I thought he gave just a half-favourable answer.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: He hedged, in other words.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My friend says he hedged. Well, I do not know whether he hedged. I do not think he was too sure of his ground. However, he is recognized as an eminent constitutional lawyer, and I am not going to question his opinion.

In committee we did feel that the provinces should be notified of the amendment to this act. Honourable senators will notice that the present section 61 of the act contains a provision which reads:

> Where the gas transmitted by a company through its pipe line from any place within a province to any place outside the province is the property of the company . . .

The committee agreed that even if it was within the jurisdiction of Parliament to pass this bill the provinces should be made aware of it. The Chairman of the National Energy Board was questioned as to whether the provinces had been notified. He said that so far as he was concerned the provinces had not been notified, and I believe I can safely say that the Government has not notified the provinces. The committee felt that, had time permitted, the hearing should have been adjourned at that time, and it would have had the provinces notified, but on account of a certain urgency the committee unanimously decided that instead of withholding the report to the house it would instruct the Clerk of the committee to send a copy of this bill by registered air mail to the Attorney General of each of the provinces. I have been informed that copies of the bill have been sent forward to each of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In addition to that, a copy of the bill has been sent to the counsel for the province of Alberta, who has an office in Ottawa. He is getting in touch with his people in Alberta. The other work has all been done. I saw to it that it was sent by registered mail, special delivery, to the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: By air mail?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, air mail, special delivery.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators can be satisfied to this extent, that we have at least notified the provinces of what is taking place in Parliament. It may be asked "Well, why did you not hold up the bill?" As the sponsor of the bill has stated, under the present act there is a provision that the existing licences will expire on the 31st of this month unless renewed by that date. Honourable senators, they may or not be renewed. That will be, to some extent, up to the House of Commons, because even if the bill passes this house tonight it cannot be considered there before tomorrow. Unless the rules of that house are suspended by unanimous consent it cannot get through there in two days. I feel we have done our part by notifying the provinces. If the House of Commons feels the provinces have had sufficient notice and that the matter is so urgent that it should be passed without waiting for their opinion, well, that is the responsibility of the House of Commons.

There does appear to be some urgency, but if honourable senators will read this bill they will see that the Government has a safety clause in it. There is a safety valve in the machinery.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is the one to forgive sins.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I refer to the third clause of the bill, which provides that if for any reason whatsoever this bill is not assented to before the 30th day of March but is eventually passed, the companies will be deemed to have been operating as if the bill had become law on or before March 30. That is to say, the Government is prepared to allow the companies to operate without a licence if the bill is not assented to by the 30th day of March. For instance, if royal assent were not given until, say, the 1st of May the Government could say: "What you did was wrong, but we will forgive you." The bill says they would have been doing everything legally since the 30th of March.

You see, honourable senators, there is some question in my mind as to the urgency of this whole matter. I am speaking for myself only when I say I feel that the committee gave very careful consideration to the bill this afternoon, and I feel it came to the right conclusion. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the provinces should be notified. There was not any opinion taken as to whether we should send it over to the other house tonight and let that house wrestle with it. So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to consent to proceeding with the third reading tonight.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I will not oppose the bill at the present time, but I want to qualify my good disposition toward it. We are part of the legislative system of this country—Parliament. When visitors come to this building, honourable senators, they are given a booklet telling of the importance of Parliament, which enacts laws that concern every man, woman and child in this country. Parliament is supreme. Our Parliament is fashioned after an institution which has existed for centuries in England, in Switzerland and in all other democratic countries of the world. Visitors are told to have respect for Parliament. I wonder why the Chairman of the National Energy Board has not been given one of those booklets to inform him about the importance of Parliament. He should have been lectured about the importance of his own job. Whoever would think, honourable senators, that any Crown authority would be so careless of its duty as to forget to look at the calendar so as to know when it has to do such an important thing as renewing permits or granting permits?

The board pays no attention to that and if the Government gave the impression of being composed of Progressive Conservatives in a hurry it was because the National Energy Board played a dirty trick on the Government. I am sorry to use that word, but one has only to glance over the pages of Hansard of the House of Commons to see that I was right when I asked questions about those people.

Here in the Senate we form a chamber which must take everything quietly with due consideration, with wisdom, and give a chance to all those concerned to make their representations. Now, what has been done? I do not know if radar was used, but the most rapid means of communication available were used to get in touch with the provinces and to notify them that they would have to appear before the committee to make their representations to this honourable chamber. This is not the way to proceed. But, mark you, honourable colleagues I do not blame the Government. I am too broad-minded for that, and I will not say that those who would do so are narrow-minded. Far be it from me to say that. But I complain of the incompetence of the National Energy Board, whose members forget their essential duties, which are to look after their own business and ask the Government for a continuation of rights and privileges. That being said, I will not insist any more, but the next time such a thing occurs I will make a two-hour speech to denounce it, and I will be much more violent than I have been tonight.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I do not propose to make a two-hour speech to denounce this situation, but I am puzzled as to how an inefficiency of this kind has come before our house tonight. It is all very fine to shift the blame from one to another, but there are officials of our Government whose duty it is to know about matters connected with the export of power, and they should have seen to it that the National Energy Board was giving the necessary attention to the subject and, if not, to have come to this house for relief at a much earlier date. There is evidence of incompetence on the part of the Government, the departments involved and the National Energy Board.

This is one of the most important bills that have come before us, if you take into account the millions of dollars involved, yet the Government comes to us tonight asking for emergency legislation, together with an escape clause in the bill, to which our honourable leader on this side (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has already referred.

I think it is clear that if this bill is not assented to by the 30th of this month the exportation of power from Canada to the United States will be illegal, contrary to the law of the land. Knowing that, and the awful mess the Government will be in should the assent not be given by that time, there is included in this bill a saving clause, designed to permit the illegal export of power. It is clause 3, which reads:

> Sections 1 and 2 shall come into force on the day this act is assented to, except that if that day is after the 30th day of March, 1960, section 2 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 30th day of March, 1960.

That is to say, without any authority of Parliament, because until this bill is passed it is a nonentity, a nothing, a nullity. The Government notifies in this way the exporters of power that they may illegally and contrary to the law of the land ship power from Canada to the United States or elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Power: Does my honourable friend know of any other case in which an indemnification act has been passed before the crime has been committed? I never heard of one.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I have been in Parliament a good many years and in a Legislature, but I never before heard of procedure like this, and I hope I shall never hear of anything like it again.

Hon. Mr. Power: It is an act of indemnification.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is an act of indemnification for commission of a breach of the law.

Hon. Mr. Power: Exactly.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And a most important breach.

Hon. Mr. Power: And before it is committed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, before it is committed, because the Government knows it will be committed, if the bill is not passed before the end of the month. Honourable senators realize that export of power means the sending out of natural resources from this country for the benefit of people abroad and that we in Parliament, in both the Commons and the Senate, have set our faces against this for many years, as we do now. Only last session we fought this matter out on the floor of the house and decided against a resolution that favoured exportation of power. Here we are saying to these companies that, contrary to the law of the land, they may export their power. That is the imputation in this bill. We are saying in effect, "You may break the law of Canada if you like to do so and we will fix you up after the crime has been committed"—as my honourable friend from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) has put it. That is an outrageous thing to bring before men and women like us who are law-abiding people. Canada is a law-abiding country and I presume these power companies are law-abiding. It is subversive.

I know something about power and the situation that confronts us. I have served as a commissioner of the great Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. I have taken part in the export of power, the very power that is now the subject of this legislation. I know what it would mean should we not give this authority and if these exporters stayed within the law of the land. It would bring about an international incident. If we cut off the export of power suddenly without any notice to our American friends it would be a disaster to them and it would be an international incident as between our two countries. You would hear from Washington by wire. It would not be by the mails, which we have used to send out copies of this bill. It would be by telephone. The wires would be hot. And that is how we should have contacted the Attorneys-General of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I interrupt my honourable friend? I understand very well the stupidity of that clause which legalizes illegality. Why should we not in this chamber demand to have this clause deleted?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, if my friend moves an amendment, I shall find it very difficult to vote against it, very difficult indeed. We are in a mess owing to inefficiency on the part of the Government or its officials. We simply cannot afford to allow the right to export power to expire on the 30th of this month and thereby bring about what I was describing as a disaster to the people of our neighbouring republic, and perhaps an unfriendliness between our two nations—an international incident. Much as I dislike this situation, and much as I condemn the procedure that has brought us into this mess, I am forced to accept the bill and not to object to its being passed. It should go to the Commons. They should realize its importance and should pass it without delay, and they at least can eliminate this section, because if they pass the bill in time the section will not be needed. The Government will then be saved from legislating to justify an illegality in this horrible way. So I am going to consent to passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, there are just a few remarks I would like to make in reply. The first relates to section 3—the forgiving section that is contained in this bill. When Mr. Driedger, of the Department of Justice, appeared before the committee this afternoon he was asked a question regarding this particular section. As near as I can recall, he stated that it was the practice of the Department of Justice to include such a section as this in a bill if there was any doubt that the bill would be passed in time. I took from what he said that this particular section had been included in other bills.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did he tell us the bills?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I did not ask him to name the bills. He gave the statement quite voluntarily. I have no reason to doubt him. I know of no such bills. However, he did give the impression that this was common practice, if there was doubt about a bill's passing through Parliament in time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: A bad practice, if it ever was followed, that should be wiped out.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am just stating what Mr. Driedger told the committee this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Power: There have been no circumstances of that kind happen that I can recall, and my recollection goes back fairly well over the past 40 years in Parliament. It may be that at times we have said an act would take effect retroactively, but never to my knowledge has it been said that a breach of the law would be covered in advance of the breach. I cannot recollect anything of that nature.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I cannot give you any examples of when it was done; I simply say the statement was made by Mr. Driedger in committee this afternoon.

Now I would like to address a few words to the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot). He and I have been pretty good friends in the short length of time I have been here, but I must object to the remarks which he made concerning the National Energy Board. I feel that this country is very fortunate to have a National Energy Board composed of such men as Mr. Ian McKinnon, Dr. Howland, Mr. Briggs and its other members. They are doing an excellent job. They have had a hard job to do and are doing it well. They have had before them five very important applications dealing with the exportation of gas. The sittings that took place lasted for a long period of time. They have had to prepare very extensive reports. This afternoon the chairman of the Board, Mr. Ian McKinnon, frankly stated to the committee that he was to blame for this predicament, and in doing this I think he went far beyond anything that was expected of him.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That statement was not accepted by the committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, it was not accepted by all of the committee, but I want to tell honourable senators just what he said. He stated that this bill had been prepared and sent to him, and that he had followed the practice with which he had been familiar in the province of Alberta, namely, he wrote back to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and said he had gone over the bill and found that it was satisfactory in form and also that it was satisfactory to the National Energy Board. That is in accord with the practice followed in Alberta.

Hon. Mr. Power: What about here?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Let me finish the explanation. In Alberta the Executive Council orders the printing of the bill. In Ottawa that is not done. The printing should have been ordered by the Chairman of the National Energy Board.

Hon. Mr. Power: Where did he get that idea?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Well, that is the practice.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes it is.

Hon. Mr. Power: No bill is ever printed before it gets the assent of council.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: He definitely stated that the printing had to be ordered by him and he neglected to order the printing. That is one of the reasons why the delay occurred. I am simply stating what the chairman said before the committee this afternoon and this is one of the reasons why the delay occurred. I am not saying the Government is blameless in this, but I have been pressed ever since this bill was introduced to give some explanation of the delay, and this is one of the reasons why the delay occurred.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think it is fair to say that the committee felt it was not the National Energy Board, but the Government, that was to blame.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Some members of the committee felt that.

I do not think it is fair to criticize in the manner that has been done this evening the chairman of the National Energy Board, and the board itself. As I have said, I think we have a good board that is doing a tremendous job. I feel that Canada is very fortunate to have a board made up of men of the calibre of its members. They are doing their best, and I believe that most people in Canada really appreciate the effort they are putting into their work.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is the honourable senator willing to accept responsibility on the part of the Government for the delay of the board?

Hon. Mr. Power: On the strength of the explanation given by my honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt), I would not think of criticizing the chairman of the Energy Board. The chairman did just what he was supposed to do, and what any other board or organization under the Government is supposed to do. He said he had no objection to this bill and he handed it back to the minister. Then it became the minister's duty to bring it before Council, and before Parliament, if Council approves.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The bill must be printed before it comes before Council.

Hon. Mr. Power: Then it is printed on the orders of the minister, not of any board or other organization which has no legislative function. It can only recommend to the Government. We have not a bureaucratic government to that extent as yet.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: All I can say is that the chairman of the Energy Board stated this afternoon that the bill was printed on his instructions.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I was present at the committee meeting today and I was very proud of the chairman of the Energy Board. It takes a fellow with a lot of honesty in his heart—not in his head—to say what he said today.

Hon. Mr. Power: I would say loyalty to the Government more than anything else.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Will the honourable senator let me finish? I did not interrupt him when he was speaking. The honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) said he has been 40 years in Parliament. Well, so have I. I have been 40 years in Parliament and my town never defeated me. I never lost my seat. Make no mistake about that. My constituents believed what I told them, because it worked out that way, and they returned me election after election.

I say I was very proud of the Chairman of the National Energy Board today. He is in a difficult position. Just try it out and see. He is a new man in that post. He is in one of the most responsible positions to which the Government can appoint a man, the position of chairman of the board which is responsible for the shipping of oil, gas and power outside of this country to another country, a greater country than ours. We know that if we make a mistake we will have difficulties with them, as my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) said. I want to say this and I don't care what you say, that ultimately the Government is always to blame. It appointed the man to that position, and if he makes mistakes it will be bad for the Government. But don't for a moment think that the Government wants to make a mistake. I know the man who was appointed to the post, and I know him to be a very efficient and capable man.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was the people who elected the Government who made the mistake.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The people did not make any mistake, and the Government is not making a mistake now. It is trying desperately hard to meet a difficult situation in a difficult world, and I am all for helping out the people who are in a struggle of that character.

Today I was proud that a man had the strength of character to stand up and tell us that the responsibility backed up to him and to nobody else. Now nine men out of ten—and I think I would be one of the nine—would be trying to pass it on to somebody else, and I think there are many of us who would do that. I say it is a credit to Canada that we have at the head of one of our most important boards a man who would do that. And the board will become more important as time goes on, because if our oil and gas development continues hundreds of thousands of dollars will come from the United States to Canada.

I am sorry, and so are we all, that this bill was not brought in two or three weeks ago, and I have no doubt that if the National Energy Board had been in existence for several years this would not have happened. But we can be sure of this, that none of its members is trying to slide out from under. They said: "We will take the responsibility. We did not intend to do it and we are sorry it happened." I am glad we have men of that kind in the public service. That attitude tests the nationhood of a country. What counts is the kind of men and women who are appointed to public office who stand up and take the responsibility they ought to take, and today that was illustrated to a very marked degree.

I never saw the chairman before, I don't know where he comes from, but I was impressed because in quiet and unassuming terms he told us what happened and he said, "I take the responsibility." There was no argument about it. That ended it.

Like my honourable friends the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I am sorry that this mistake has occurred. I do feel sorry for the whole Civil Service of Canada—not so much for the Government, but for the civil servants, the people who have to carry out the administration. But I think the men and women appointed by both the old Government and the new will stand up well in comparison with a similar body in any other country. We have nothing to be ashamed of in acknowledging the men and women we have in these positions. There may be better people, but by and large they are Canadians, they are loyal to the country, they are loyal to the jobs that they have on hand to do, and they carry on in a way that is a credit to them.

I am glad to be able to speak this way this evening, and I am glad to be one here to rectify the error that was made. If you want to blame the Government—

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Why don't you blame it on the Government?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I have had plenty of experience in political life. I ran in eleven elections and I won them all, and I want to say this, that it is a credit to the country to have a man stand up and do what the chairman of the National Energy Board did today.

I have sat in this chamber for some twenty-five years and I would not like to mislead the house nor the people of Manitoba. I would not like to think that the Manitoba people are getting an unfair deal and to prevent that I will stand up and fight for them, because I am from that province. They are fine people.

We are not saying we like mistakes to occur. We do not. But, if you have business of any kind with a man and he says: "Mr. Haig, I made a mistake. I should have registered those papers last week and I didn't do it, I overlooked them on my desk"—what do you do in that case? Do you fire him? Oh, no, you don't. You say, "There is a fellow who can tell the truth when he is in a hole." I say again, I was very proud to be at that meeting today and hear that man take the stand he did. I hope we will turn out to be as good men and women in this house as he was today.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) a question? I notice the bill was given first reading on March 24, that was Thursday of last week. This is the 29th of March, five days later. May I ask what the Government has done during those last five days to obtain the consent, for instance, of the Attorneys-General of the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can answer for the Government in this case. The answer is one word: Nothing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It does not have to get the consent of the provinces.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) a question. It grieves me to bother him in any way.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Be honest about it now.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In his remarks a few moments ago he said that in the ordinary course the bill had been sent to the Chairman of the National Energy Board for his comment, and that he found it satisfactory and returned it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The way it happened was this: he wrote back to the Minister of Trade and Commerce stating that the bill was satisfactory in form and as far as he was concerned he would approve of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That amounts to the same thing. He perused the bill and notified the Department of Trade and Commerce—I mean the minister or an official—that the bill was satisfactory in form. Now, my question is: When did that happen? When was the bill first sent to the Chairman of the National Energy Board?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I have no information as to when it was sent or when the letter came back.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have just a comment or two to make, and I certainly do not wish to delay the house. May I say, first, that the chairman of the board acted quite properly. Here was an important bill that was sent to him for his comments. He reads the bill, studies it, and advises the Department of Trade and Commerce that as far as his board is concerned it is satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Power: He advises the minister.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: He advises the department and the minister that the bill is satisfactory. Now, after that, whose responsibility was it to get the bill moving through Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Power: The minister's.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My point is that it was the responsibility of the department, not of the National Energy Board. If it was the responsibility of the department—and it is clear to me that it was—why was there this delay in getting the bill before Parliament? If the transmission of the bill to the chairman of the board occurred only a few days ago, what were the minister and the officials of the department doing? They knew this was an important bill. Why did they not get it to the chairman of the board, say, two months ago? No criticism whatever can lie at the door of the Chairman of the National Energy Board.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Criticism was made of him earlier this evening, and I was replying to it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: He certainly was a most magnanimous gentleman.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Quite.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am not a member of the Transport and Communications Committee, and I was not at the meeting today, but apparently this was a most magnanimous gentleman who took upon his own shoulders what were clearly the sins of the department.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, before the bill receives third reading, may I say a few words? I do not intend to make a two-hour speech, such as was referred to a moment ago, but I want to say that I do not wish to be unfair to anyone.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What I have said about any individual applies mostly to the board, because it looks after its own business and co-operates with the Government, to see that legislation is passed on time.

Before I conclude my remarks, may I say I sympathize wholeheartedly with the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig), because I have never heard one of our colleagues repeat so often in a speech that he was sorry. It made me sad. I want him to be more cheerful. The spirit of the Senate is very good, and he must share it with all of us.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Brunt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Aseltine, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Reid: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, on division, and passed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask His Honour the Speaker how it is possible to have unanimous consent if the bill receives the third reading on division.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was carried on division. The unanimous consent was to the motion for third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried on division.

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Harold Connolly, for Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-26, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): With leave, I move that the report be now adopted.

Report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2

SECOND READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill C-54, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1961.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, which has been passed by the House of Commons, is the first interim supply bill for the present session of Parliament. It has nothing to do with supplementary estimates or the like, but merely provides money so that the Government can carry on its services until the next supply bill is brought in.

On that account it is known as an interim supply bill. I would like to inform honourable senators before I deal with the bill itself that the total amount to be voted in the main estimates for 1960-61 is $3,561,353,870.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: How much?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The total of the main estimates is $3,561,353,870, which includes loans of $125,650,715. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) doubts my figures, but if he looks in the estimates he will find that the remainder of the expenses in 1960-61 are statutory expenses, and we do not have to vote them. We are just voting a share of the estimates which are not of a statutory nature.

Honourable senators, this bill proposes to vote one-sixth of all the items to be voted in the estimates I have just mentioned, and the one-sixth amounts to $593,558,987.34.

In addition to one-sixth of the main estimates, certain additional amounts are required with respect to some eleven items on votes. I will mention them. The Government requires an additional seven-twelfths of Vote 212, $904,166.67; an additional one-third of Vote 36, $216,666.67; an additional one-sixth of Votes 176, 183 and 184 $615,247; and an additional one-twelfth of Votes 62, 263, 367, 394, 460 and 463, $8,193,843.84. This makes the total amount covered by this bill in so far as the main estimates are concerned, $603,488,902.52.

In addition, the usual authority is included to borrow up to $1 billion for public works and general purposes.

In the estimates, honourable senators, there are many hundreds of votes. This bill, in addition to asking for an appropriation of one-sixth of all of the votes, asks for an additional appropriation with respect to eleven votes only. The reason why this additional money is required is that during the next two months, April and May, certain work goes ahead more quickly than in other periods.

The appropriations requested by this bill are intended to provide all necessary requirements for the public service up to May 31, 1960. In no instance has the total amount of any item of any vote been released by this bill.

The form of the bill is the same as that of similar interim supply bills passed last year. I would like to call the attention of honourable senators to the form of this bill. It is in the form that was suggested by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) a year or more ago and by other honourable senators. That form has been adopted by the Government and has been followed ever since. In that connection I refer to the way the amounts are set out on page 2 of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I say that we are indebted to the Leader of the Government for taking our suggestion to the Government, and to the Government for following his suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was not taking any credit for it, but I am pleased that the Government did adopt the suggestion. I am sure it makes it much easier for honourable senators to study the bill.

I would like to advise honourable senators, as I have on every occasion when introducing a bill of this kind, that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable senators to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration on other occasions. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected, and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure. Plenty of opportunity will be given for study of, and comment on, any of the items contained in the estimates.

Honourable senators, that is a general explanation of the contents of the bill, and I trust it will receive the approval of this house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is there any urgency with respect to the passing of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask a question of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) as to clause 4 of this bill, which gives the Government power to raise an additional loan of $1 billion? Clause 4 begins in this way:

(1) The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament...

Have we any idea what are these sums still remaining unborrowed and negotiable which, when added to $1 billion, would give us some idea of what the total borrowings of the Government will be? Also, could some indication be given as to how this sum of $1 billion compares with other such general sums in former years?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I can give the honourable senator the last information. The amounts included in this category since 1955-56 are as follows:

1955-56	$1,000,000,000
1956-57	1,500,000,000
1957-58	1,000,000,000
1958-59	2,000,000,000
1959-60	1,500,000,000

It has been customary to include the $1 billion in the first interim supply bill.

Hon. Mr. Wall: It was the first part of the clause that interested me. What are the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am afraid I have no figures in that connection. I did not expect to be asked that question. Whether I can obtain the information before the debate is concluded remains to be seen, but I will endeavour to get it for my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This appropriation bill is more than an appropriation. It gives wide powers to departments, and I would like to know if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) can give me some information on one point. Section 4 gives the Government power to raise by way of loan under the Financial Administration Act by the issue and sale or pledge of securities, and so on, the sum of $1 billion at such rates of interest and upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve. Now, can the honourable leader give us any idea what fantastic rates of interest are to be paid on this $1 billion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It would be the current rate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is that rate?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would the honourable senator expect me to be able to tell what rate of interest would have to be paid to borrow this money?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why not? We are asked to approve the power to borrow, so are we not entitled to know the rate?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Who fixes the rate?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Only after negotiations to find out at what price the bonds will sell.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It says:

> ... at such rates of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve ...

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right, at such rates as the Governor in Council may approve after it is known at what price the bonds can be sold.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I assure you that my remarks on this bill will not be extensive. In my judgment we are embarking tonight, so far as this house is concerned, upon the most important part of our parliamentary work. There was a time in the somewhat distant past when the raising and spending of public money were regarded as the most important functions of Parliament. In these latter days we appear to place less emphasis upon that aspect of our work, yet when one thinks of it realistically there is nothing more important in a democratic country such as we live in than the raising of money by Governments through taxation and the manner in which that money is spent. In other words, it is the responsibility of Parliament above all other responsibilities to see that taxation is equitably levied and that the people's money is not wasted. In my humble judgment these are the most important functions of Parliament. Tonight, as we embark on the first vote of supply to the Government for the next fiscal year, it is well to keep this thought in mind.

As the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) stated a few moments ago in his explanation of the bill, this interim supply covers only the non-statutory items. But I do not take much consolation out of that fact. Whether the items are statutory or non-statutory, the money has to be obtained from the taxpayers, and if we are going to keep the whole matter in proper perspective it is necessary to look at the figures as a whole. In the main estimates this year the total amount asked for by the Government, excluding old age pensions, is $5,740,000,000.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In the main estimates a year ago the figure was $5,649,000,000. Old age security will require $590 million this year. Last year it required $577 million. As I look at all the youthful honourable senators around me—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —like my honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt), who nevertheless in the course of a few years will be on the old age pension list, and when I have regard to the certainty that life expectancy is lengthening, I can foresee that before a great many years this item will probably be $750 million or $800 million a year.

Another item for which the Government votes money appears in the main estimates, under the heading of, "Loans, Investments and Advances". Those are such items as advances to the Atomic Energy Board, and the National Harbours Board. Some of them are recoverable. On some of them interest will be paid. On many of them interest will not be paid. We vote the money under this fancy name of "Loans, Investments and Advances", and we can kiss much of the money goodbye, for it will never come back.

One other point: We have already voted for the fiscal year just ending—I am not going to discuss supplementary estimates—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is, not today.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: We have voted on supplementary supply bills a total of $153 million. We shall have another supply bill here in a few days. If the information we have been furnished with is correct, it will amount to $117 million. So we can look forward to supplementary estimates in this fiscal year amounting to $270 million.

The estimates for the new fiscal year are substantially above those of a year ago. On the two items I have given, the increase is a little over $100 million.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No; $90 million. It was $5,649,000,000 last year, and it is $5,740,000,000 for the coming year.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: To that you must add the increase in old age pensions. Anyway, I will take my honourable friend's figure of $90 million. Then if we look at the defence estimates we see there has been a decrease in the amount. We shall be asked to vote this year, according to information now available to us, a lesser amount by almost $90 million. In any way we look at it, the total vote is a substantial increase over the vote that Parliament gave the Government at the last session of Parliament a year ago.

I would offer this criticism, that the Government has not used the pruning knife with sufficient energy. We hear a good deal of talk these days about the spending of money. It has been suggested in certain quarters, in a fairly high place, that we are living beyond our means. I profoundly believe it. I look at all the provincial budgets that have come to my notice and there is not a single one of them that has not very substantially increased its spending over a year ago. The important thing is—and let us never forget this—that the total amount of money taken out of the taxpayers' pockets by all levels of Government is increasing. Today we have the peculiar situation of one Government trying to throw responsibility on another Government; there is no co-operation between them. The overall load is increasing in a rather startling fashion.

Honourable senators, my criticism of the Government on this question—and this is the first opportunity we have had to state it—is that it has not cut its expenses sufficiently this year under the circumstances in which we live. We are building up a great edifice of expenditures at all levels of government, and we shall be extremely fortunate indeed if we do not pay some penalty in the future for our rather extravagant habits at the present time. I think that is of prime importance. Frankly, I regret that the Government found itself apparently unable to come and do what I think should have been done, present Parliament with an estimate of expenditures $100 million less than a year ago. Had we found ourselves in that position I would have been quite willing to give the Government a cheer. As it is, I can offer nothing but criticism.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, this is an opportunity to say something which has been on my mind for a long time. It was brought to my attention by the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), when he said he looked around and saw a number of senators who sooner or later, probably sooner, would be on the old age pension list.

My understanding is that no one gets on that list unless he applies for the pension. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to suggest to the Government that it take a very serious look at the old age pension system and see how many people are drawing the pension who certainly do not need it. I know that companies pay a three per cent tax, and three per cent is paid in income tax, and I think three per cent on certain luxuries on which there is a sales tax. That is all right. Admittedly, we contribute. I have discussed this matter with some people who do not need the old age pension, but who are drawing it, and each one says, "Well, I am getting back some of what I pay in income tax." I think we should take a broader view, and that men and women with high incomes should not take the old age pension. The pension should be reserved for those who need it—and there are a great many such people in this country, I am sorry to say.

That is why I think it would be a good idea for the Leader of the Government to suggest to the Government, or to the Department of Finance, or to whomever the suggestion should be made, that consideration be given to the placing of some restriction on the payment of old age pensions to men and women who have incomes above a certain amount.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Has the honourable senator in mind the establishment of a means test?

Hon. Mr. Davies: No. I have in mind the fact that if a man has an income of, say, $10,000 a year he does not need the old age pension and should not get it. Of course, some people might want to live at a higher level than $10,000 a year, but I think some level of income should be set as a limit for recipients of the pension. I do not feel that a person with an income of $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 a year should be drawing $55 a month from this country as an old age pension just because he happens to be paying a three per cent income tax. Sooner or later, if we do not give serious consideration to this question we shall be obliged to have a contributory plan for old age pensions, and everyone will have to contribute toward it, as is done in Great Britain, where there is a contributory plan for a number of things.

Honourable senators, I rose to make this suggestion in connection with the old age pension because I feel that a great many people are drawing the pension who do not need it, and that this is one of the extravagances which the Government might find it easy to omit.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, as we shall probably have the final supplementary estimates before us tomorrow, I am wondering if the house would unanimously agree to third reading of this bill now, or do honourable senators prefer to have it tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WITHDRAWAL OF FORCES FROM ALDERSHOT, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. John A. McDonald inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

The recent withdrawal of our active military forces from Aldershot is alarming as it leaves Greenwood Airport, Cornwallis Naval Training School, Halifax naval and airforce signal stations, civil microwave equipment, radar posts and Kelley Lake Airport all without the necessary protection of a mobile field force in the vicinity.

Since the small number of troops in Halifax have definite duties from which they should not be withdrawn, the nearest available mobile force is at Gagetown, a good day's travel away for even a passenger car; therefore I would ask the Government if it would not give consideration to establishing at Aldershot the seemingly necessary protection of a strong mobile force?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have received the following answer to this inquiry:

It is considered that there is no need for the establishment of such a force at Camp Aldershot. Present arrangements are deemed adequate for the security of this area and the local protection of the service installations mentioned is the responsibility of the Service concerned.

NEWFOUNDLAND

FLAG AND COLOURS

On the notice of motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot for production of the following papers:

Pictures of a) the National Flag for Newfoundland;
b) colours to be worn by Newfoundland vessels; and
c) the Badge for the Newfoundland Flag as described in the National Flag Act and schedule. (Revised Statutes of Newfoundland, 1952, c. 272, amended by 1954, Newfoundland. No. 45).

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, this motion has been standing in my name on the Order Paper since the 9th of March. In our race to get the information I had the honour to be neck and neck with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and I have won by a nose.

I have the pictures asked for in my motion, but I can hardly place them on Hansard. This information came after correspondence I had with the Premier of Newfoundland, who addressed a meeting here in Ottawa and spoke about the flag. In my letter I asked him if he had spoken in his private capacity as an individual, as a Canadian, or as Premier of Newfoundland. The letter was sent to him in the beginning of December, and he did not have the time to concoct an answer to my question. He could have answered me by repeating the last sentence of the speech that I made on May 29, 1946 before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on a national flag for Canada, and which reads as follows:

If the choice of a distinctive national flag is premature, we have only one thing to do: Let us stay where we are; let us keep the Union Jack alone and a full-sized Union Jack as an emblem of colonialism to show that we have regressed a century backward to colonial status. Thank you, gentlemen.

Now I have asked about the national flag of Newfoundland. It is the Union Jack, but they call it the Union flag. It is the Union Jack only when it is flown on the mast of a ship; on land it is the Union flag, according to heraldry.

I asked for pictures of the colours to be worn by Newfoundland vessels. It is called a red ensign, and in the middle of it there is a badge which is described in the Statutes of Newfoundland, 1952, Chapter 272, as amended by No. 45 of 1954. The badge consists of a representation of Mercury, the God of Commerce and Merchandise, presenting to Britannia a fisherman who, in a kneeling attitude, is offering the harvest of the sea, all as described on the Great Seal, and followed by the motto Haec tibi dona fero, which, translated, means, "These gifts I bring to you." So what is on the flag? On the badge is a Newfoundlander kneeling down to offer gifts to Britannia, in front of Mercury. Why Mercury, I do not know.

This is very interesting, because it dates back to 1637, and I thought that from a historical point of view the Senate should be acquainted with my question which I worked hard to answer as best I could.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before these bills are passed I would like to give some information about an answer to a question I asked concerning the appearance of private detectives before the Divorce Committee. The answer given to me apparently was as complete as it could be, but it was not disposed of as I would have liked it to be. I do not complain, because it requires quite a lot of time to make the statistics comprehensive. What was placed on Hansard of March 17, at pages 373 and 374, was a list of the names of the private detectives who appeared before the Divorce Committee during the sessions of 1955, 1956, 1957 (first and second sessions), 1958 and 1959—six sessions in all.

I asked my secretary to prepare another tabulation, putting the names of the detectives in alphabetical order so as to show the total number of detectives who have appeared before the committee during the six sessions. She did so, and afterwards she prepared a tabulation indicating the number of cases in which each one appeared during each one of the six sessions. By looking at it one can, without any difficulty, find the number of cases in which any one detective appeared. From the information that I was given on March 17 it is impossible to tell at first glance the total number of divorce cases submitted to the committee. It was necessary to make an addition. It would have taken a long time to find out in how many cases each detective appeared.

This tabulation indicates the total number of cases for each of the six sessions as follows:

Session	Cases
1956	444
1957 (1)	536
1957 (2)	270
1958	443
1959	565
Total	2,806

That is quite a large number, but it represents about half the number of cases that come before the provincial courts.

Another interesting question was the number of detectives that attended at the cases. The names had to be arranged in alphabetical order, and the calculation shows a total of 156 detectives in all.

What is also very interesting is to make a differentiation between the private detectives who have appeared in a very small number of cases and the big fellows who have appeared in hundreds of cases. It is a distinction that is important to make, and it is very difficult to do it without proceeding in the manner in which it was done on my instructions. I will take nine of them.

There is Kal Wiseman who had 63 cases in the six sessions; Barney Tulin, 71; Sam Garelick, 77. Then it goes up. Mr. Laurence Steele had 102 cases; Clovis Paquette, 180; Jerry Brault, 244; Charles Charron, 252; Gerard Daigneault, 339; and Mr. Etheridge, 379. That is a total of 1,707 cases for nine detectives. If we subtract the three less important ones who had respectively 63, 71 and 77 cases, or a total of 211 it means that six private detectives appeared in 1,498 cases. One has only to divide 1,498, or 1,500, by six to realize the very large number of cases, and the size of the clientele, of those private detectives. It was much more than the average. If we divide 2,806 by 156 we have an average of between 11 and 12 cases for each one, but Mr. Etheridge had approximately 30 times the average number of cases, and the same thing applies to Mr. Gerard Daigneault. It is very dangerous.

I wonder if the Senate would have any objection to including in the record this tabulation, based on the previous one which appears in Hansard, but which makes it more comprehensive. I have considered the matter objectively. As I have said before, my intention is to try to be of help to my colleagues in having them take the least possible time in dealing honestly and concientiously with these matters. The detectives are here in more cases than are many lawyers, and whether it is good for them or not I will not discuss now, but I find that the number of cases handled by the half dozen detectives is quite stupendous. This calculation has never been made before, and I would like to place it on the record of the Senate for future reference, if necessary.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank you very much.

For tabulation, see appendix "A" to today's Hansard, pp. 453-5.

There is something else I want to say. All the information is there. I have extracted it myself. I do not complain. The staff of the Divorce Committee is very busy, and it has not the time to extract all that information. However, it could be done and it was done, and I am very glad to give my colleagues the opportunity of benefiting from it.

There is another thing I want to say about this matter of divorce, dealing with it objectively and considering it upon its merits. I refer to the procedure. I was struck by the number of senators who appear on the Divorce Committee. I understand the membership of the committee is 25, and that a sub-committee of three or four hears each case, which is afterwards referred to a much larger committee. I might say that I have just made these calculations from the last committee reports, which I have chosen at random and not selected in any way whatsoever.

Two cases were submitted to 5 senators; 3 to 6 senators; 23 to 8 senators; 2 to 9 senators; 9 to 10 senators; 19 to 11 senators; 26 to 12 senators; and 25 to 13 senators, which number is four more than the complete bench of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Honourable senators, I feel that one must have a sense of proportion. I trust my colleagues, I have confidence in them, I admire them, and I believe that three senators are enough to decide most of the divorce cases. I do not see why 13 senators should meet together to discuss a case which is similar to the one preceding it and similar to the one which will come after. Until there is another occasion to discuss the matter from another angle I suggest that they divide the work and not gather together in a large number to listen to the same story and come to the same conclusion. This is said in the best possible spirit.

Naturally some of my colleagues contend that because some of us do not belong to the committee we should not speak about it, but there is still more to say. In the Senate I once mentioned that the Senate was called a divorce mill. I did not have at hand the newspaper which reported it, but it was published in very large letters and can be easily seen: "Ottawa is a divorce mill". It has been published regularly. Not long ago in the largest French-language newspaper, La Presse, there was an article about the Senate being a divorce mill. I do not think it is fair to the members of the Divorce Committee nor to the members of the Senate, but this is the impression that some journalists may have of the Senate: "Ottawa est une usine à divorce". It applies to the House of Commons as well as to the Senate.

Honourable senators, this is quite enough for tonight. My honourable colleagues will have an opportunity to look at these figures that I have given and those that are on the tabulation, and they will see that sometimes it may happen that some work that does not seem conformist may be useful.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I must say something in reply, although I think we are both out of order. I compliment the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) upon his skill in mathematics. He has done a wonderful job of subdividing, adding, subtracting and so forth, and I have no doubt the results will be very interesting. I appreciate also the amount of labour that his secretary has done to accumulate all these subdivisions. But I would like to point out to the Senate in general that here we have in two pages of Hansard, double columns, a list of names of detectives. Beside the names are the number of cases in which the various detectives appeared. It will be clear to any honourable senator who looks at it just how much work this question laid upon the staff of the Committees Branch. We have a very busy staff, a large portion of whose time is devoted to divorce work, preparing cases for hearing and so forth. My honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will back me up in this. It is a big piece of work. To analyse every case that we have tried for the last six sessions, in the last five years, and pick out the various detectives and tabulate how many times each has appeared in each session has been a task of major proportion. I know that my own secretary joined in the force to try to get this work done. When she was not engaged on my particular work she was busy on this matter, devoting ten hours to it as just one of the staff.

I would request any honourable senator who contemplates questions similar to this to realize the burden he may be putting upon our very short-handed and overworked staff.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I be permitted to interrupt my honourable friend? I was fair to the Committees Branch. I expressed my appreciation and moreover I said, or I wanted to say, that I give them credit for the work they are doing. I realize it was impossible for them to do the kind of work I wanted to have done.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am merely pointing out as a matter of interest how much labour the question involved.

There are two additional comments I ought to make. The number of times a detective appears in various cases does not give any indication of his character and truthfulness, or the integrity with which he tells his story. If my honourable friend will look over the number of solicitors who have appeared he will find they are equally great in number, and that some have few cases while others have many. There is little significance to be attached to the fact that one detective has more business than another.

The third point I feel I ought to make is this. I should invite my honourable friend to watch the Divorce Committee in action. The number of senators that he counted were those of the general committee, which itself does not hear evidence. The general committee meets at 10.15 in the morning and takes about fifteen minutes to transact the business of the day, which consists largely of receiving reports from subcommittees, the discussion that follows naturally from those reports and the passing or refusing, as may seem fit, of the reports of the subcommittees and then itself reporting to the Senate. The subcommittees are seldom composed of more than three senators. That is the usual quorum. Usually there are three subcommittees, so that there are nine senators in all hearing the cases. My honourable friend is in error in his count as to what he thought were the number of senators hearing individual cases.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The large number of senators' names appears on each report.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is true, for each report to the Senate is made by the general committee. If my honourable friend will look at the reports a little further he will see that a subcommittee has recommended to the general committee, and the general committee recommends to the house. He will find my signature, as chairman of the main committee, on every case, and he can find the signatures of the various chairmen of the subcommittees appended to their reports.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I realize that. All I want to do is to try to simplify the work and to lighten the burden.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You are not helping very much.

Motion agreed to and bills read third time and passed, on division.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

On the Order:

Second Reading of Bill S-25, intituled: "An Act to make Provision for the Disclosure of Information in respect of Finance Charges".—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, at the request of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), I ask that second reading of this bill stand for one week. Unfortunately, the honourable senator was obliged to fly to Windsor late this afternoon on account of the sudden death of a member of his family.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands for one week.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 30, 1960

CANADA'S CENTENNIAL

SUGGESTIONS FOR CELEBRATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Cameron rose pursuant to notice that he would "call the attention of the Senate to Canada's Centennial Year 1967 and suggest that appropriate steps be taken to mobilize the resources of governmental and non-governmental agencies in making this celebration an occasion to mark the achievements of the past and to plot a course for the future".

He said: Honourable senators, at the outset may I join my colleagues who have spoken before in welcoming the new members to this chamber and wishing them long and happy years here.

Honourable senators, the completion of one hundred years of growth and development is always an important milestone in the history of any human agency. The completion of the first hundred years of growth and development of a sovereign nation is an event of history which happens so rarely that it is a special occasion not only for the nation concerned but for the entire world. When the occasion concerns a nation like Canada, with its historical, bicultural tradition, with its record of substantial achievement, its strategic location among world powers and its tremendous potential for the future, this is not an ordinary occasion, but one which should be seen in the perspective of history and in the potential of the future. The first hundred years of Canadian nationhood should be recognized as a milestone in the march of destiny in which we record the achievements of the past, assess the weaknesses of the present and establish a benchmark from which to project the future.

While a Centennial celebration can and should contain many elements, it must be the occasion of a national stocktaking from which Canadians will obtain a national balance sheet and an inventory of Canada's achievements, her assets and debits, and a prospectus for the future. Such a national inventory will show a territory of 3,684,723 square miles —huge in the geographic sense and as yet only developed in the southern fringe. It will show a nation with 3,000 miles of undefended frontier on the south and 5,000 miles of undefended and undefendable frontier facing Asia in the west and Russia in the north. Her eastern frontier makes her inevitably a member of the Atlantic Community, subject to all of its ethnic, historical, economic and political involvements. While the natural trading lines of this vast storehouse of resources should be north and south to complement those of our southern neighbours, history, tradition, and politics have decreed that these lines must run east and west, thereby creating some of the physical and economic strains which have plagued, and are likely to plague, in accentuated degree, our fiscal policies of the future.

Within the confines of this great land and water mass, comprising less than 2 per cent of the earth's surface, lives a population of 17½ million people—a population so small in relation to its resources that it can neither defend them nor develop them without the help of others. This lack of population is another of Canada's problems which casts its shadow on the future and calls for policies that are bold, imaginative and new.

Canada, as a middle power which has exercised an influence in world affairs beyond her numbers and strength in years past, is now in the difficult position of having to choose whether she is to continue the role of impartial arbiter among the nations, a role she has gained because the nations of the world community knew that Canada wished nothing for herself except peace and prosperity, or to sacrifice her reputation for impartiality by being tied, on the one hand, to the policies of the United States and, on the other, to the Atlantic involvements of NATO. Certainly she can't have it both ways. These are difficult and complex decisions to make, yet they are part of the national inventory which should be made if we are to use the opportunity of the Centennial year for the kind of national stocktaking which can be worthy of our best efforts and productive for the future.

The noted Chicago architect D. H. Burnham has penned some lines which I think set the stage for the kind of thinking that should guide our planning for the Centennial:

> Make no small plans; they hold no magic to stir men's blood.

This is the concept I would like to see applied to our planning for 1967 and I suggest this is the kind of concept which will be necessary to enlist the resources and enthusiasm of all Canadians if we are to make our Centennial the milestone of history it should be.

There are signs that plans are beginning to be made, and these are not a moment too soon. On May 6, 1959 the Canadian Association for Adult Education and the Canadian Citizenship Council held a one-day conference of voluntary agencies in Toronto to give some preliminary consideration to plans for 1967. This was mainly an "idea" session and was productive of a lot of useful suggestions as to the kind of things that might be done. Some thirty-two organizations were represented. The general consensus of the conference was that 1967 should be much more than a year of entertainment and celebration, although these aspects should not be neglected. There was general agreement that in addition to making a start in correcting and strengthening those elements in our national life which had been neglected, we should also take steps to get under way as early as possible a great variety of activities which would go far toward making many of Canada's aspirations and dreams a reality by 1967, and that if we were to do so there was need for careful thought, detailed planning and co-ordinated effort between private citizens, community and business organizations, and Government at the municipal, provincial and federal levels. In other words, if we are to achieve maximum results there must be total effort and the fullest participation by all Canadians. Plans were made for a second conference to be held in Montreal, and this was convened on February 12, 1960. This conference too was well attended and was considered of sufficient importance to warrant the attendance of a federal cabinet minister.

In the meantime the federal cabinet had taken the initiative in establishing The National Committee on Canada's Centennial, a body representing the federal and provincial governments and selected private citizens. This body held its first meeting in Ottawa on February 8, 1960.

These developments are all to the good, but I respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that there is need to establish, without delay, a National Centennial Planning Commission with broad powers and an assurance of the necessary funds to be expended in an orderly, imaginative and productive manner between now and the close of 1967. This commission should be so constituted as to be able to enlist the support of every citizen, every community, every business and every government in Canada. It should encourage every community to examine its own situation and to submit detailed plans as to what it could do with its own resources to make the Centennial a vital and memorable occasion in that community. In other words, the Centennial will not reach its full potential unless some central agency, representative of the entire nation, can encourage every citizen and every community to mobilize its resources of imagination, talent and funds to make the Centennial a living memorial for everyone in the community.

It has been reported that Canada is in the process of trying to attract the World's Fair to Montreal as one of the features of the Centennial year and that the federal Government is prepared to put up the sum of $20 million as an inducement. It has also been reported that the City of Montreal and the Province of Quebec have each promised to put up $5 million as further inducement. Let me say at the outset that a World's Fair in Canada will be a good thing and I can think of no more interesting nor more suitable place for it to be held in than Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What's the matter with Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: However, I could wish that the World's Fair could be brought to Canada in some other year than 1967. Let there be no misunderstanding: I think a World's Fair is good for business and that Canada, particularly Montreal and Quebec, would derive a lot of useful advertising and publicity from the venture. At the same time, while I do not think a World's Fair and Canada's Centennial are necessarily mutually incompatible, I do feel strongly that the fair would detract from the Canadian emphasis of the Centennial. It would take away resources of men, materials and money which would otherwise go into making the Centennial significant not just for 1967 but for many years thereafter. It would be my opinion that if the federal Government, for example, put up $20 million for the World's Fair, that would be $20 million which would not be available for investment in some of those permanent values that could make the Centennial of real significance to the future.

In the event that Canada does succeed in getting the World's Fair I would suggest to the Government that it give immediate assurance that the substantial contribution to the fair will not be used as an excuse to curtail things that should be done for the Centennial. Secondly, I would hope that if we do have the World's Fair it should be planned in such a way that the Canadian section of it, representing a panorama of the history, achievements, resources, and potential of each of the ten Canadian provinces could be constructed and displayed in such a way that it could be converted into a travelling exhibition which would go on tour of every province of Canada. For example, I know it would be a good thing for western Canada if what might be called the Quebec section of the Canadian exhibit could go westward and be on display for two weeks in Winnipeg, thence go west to Regina, Calgary and Vancouver, returning by way of Edmonton, Saskatoon, Toronto, and then on to the Maritimes and finally to Newfoundland. Such an exhibition as one of the features of the Centennial year, if planned in such a way as to display through models, pictures, materials, books, musical and theatrical productions, the life of the people in each Canadian province, could have a lasting value. In this way we might recoup something of value to all Canada out of the expenditures for the fair and contribute to a better understanding and appreciation of those diverse elements which, blended together, make for such a rich and diverse kaleidoscope of Canadian life.

I have stressed the importance of an exhibition of this kind because I believe one of the features of the Centennial should be a project which would help us to understand each province and each region and to interpret them to one another in such a way that the great majority of Canadians who do not or cannot see at first-hand the far parts of our country should be able to get some feeling of it through the travelling exhibition. Fair grounds, auditoriums, arenas and trains could all be used. Admission could be charged and the whole project set up on a basis that would return the major share of its cost. I have dealt with the idea of a travelling exhibition first, not because I think it is the most important item of our Centennial bill of fare, but because it arose naturally out of the consideration of a World's Fair and the Centennial being held in the same year.

From this point I would like to enumerate a number of productive activities which would have the effect of recognizing and informing our people on the significant achievements of the past; to suggest a number of projects which if undertaken with vision and pursued with vigour could be completed in 1967; and finally, to suggest a number of things which might be worthy of tackling between now and the year 2000.

The federal Government has already established The National Committee on Canada's Centennial. If this committee can be armed with sufficient powers and funds to do the necessary job of organization, well and good. If not, immediate steps should be taken to convert it into a Centennial commission with the powers and resources to do what is necessary in the way of mobilizing the total resources of the country. The committee or commission must be the national clearing house and thoroughly representative of both governmental and non-governmental agencies. Each province should be asked to establish its own provincial committee, and likewise each municipality. Following this, all the non-governmental agencies should be invited to appoint their own Centennial committees, and these should be represented on municipal, provincial and federal committees. Local committees should be asked to explore and develop those matters of historical significance in their communities. This might take the form of writing, including books, poetry, plays, pageants, songs and films. Plans should be made to mark and develop historic sites, to plan and erect community buildings such as auditoriums, playgrounds, hospitals and parks, and to prepare an assessment of the communities' present achievements and a blueprint for their next forty years. While a lot of work would be duplicated across the country it would not be duplicated as far as most of the individuals who lived in a particular community were concerned, and there is no more effective way of securing the enthusiastic support of all of our people than by giving them a sense of partnership and participation in the building of Canada.

Having established its Centennial committee to work in co-operation with the provincial committee, each community should assess its contribution in terms of two general criteria. First, what are the physical and/or material assets which might be planned, prepared for financially and otherwise, with a view to having some specific project or building completed by 1967? Secondly, and even more important, what are the cultural developments which can be or should be undertaken and executed between now and 1967? This would include historical pageants, the writing of histories, the commissioning of works of art, music, ballets, plays, scholarships and the establishment of permanent projects for the future. Small communities would obviously be limited in what they could do; therefore they should join with other communities in regional projects. Ethnic groups should be given the greatest encouragement in recording and portraying their own special contributions to the national life. For example, Ukrainian choirs and dancers might be organized and sent on tour. They might join with other groups in a series of folk festivals which would feature the music, the dances, the skills in needlework and other arts of each of the ethnic groups. These are just a few suggestions of the kinds of activities that might be done at the local, community or regional level.

In additon to encouraging and supporting the kinds of activities suggested for the individual and non-governmental groups and organizations, municipal and provincial governments should as a first responsibility make sure that the resources of talent, skills, material and financial capacities of individual business and non-governmental agencies are planned and co-ordinated in such a way as to achieve the maximum total effect. Beyond this these governments should assess their present position, determine the targets they would like to achieve between now and 1967 and the priority to be given to these targets. The targets might include the building of schools, auditoriums, hospitals, parks and parkways, recreation facilities, libraries, university buildings and colleges. Plans should not overlook the need to assess and plan for the business and industrial needs which must be the base upon which ideal and permanent communities can be built.

Municipal and provincial governments should assess now their anticipated needs for new government buildings of all kinds between now and 1967. They should reserve for opening in 1967 buildings of special significance to their communities, and these buildings should be planned with special care as to both design and décor. Artists and sculptors should be commissioned—the artists to do murals with appropriate themes, and the sculptors to cast in stone and bronze and other media suitable monuments and decorations. Municipal and provincial authorities should start planning now to commission works of art, music, literature and history designed to capture and preserve for all time the heroic exploits of the pioneers and founders of Canada.

Cities like Calgary, Vancouver, Stratford, Banff, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and the community of Cape Breton should start planning now for special centennial features of those activities with which these cities are associated in the public mind. For Calgary it would be the stampede and the pageant of the rangelands. Vancouver's festival might feature a number of themes from the exploits of Captain Vancouver, through the trials of the Hudson's Bay Company to the fabulous legends of the west coast Indians. Stratford might plan a Shakespearean spectacular to dwarf anything yet accomplished and send its companies on tour of the globe. The Banff Summer Festival might become in co-operation with the Canadian Pacific Railway a major summer tourist attraction for people from all over the world. The Festival Opera Company and the National Ballet Company of Toronto might conceivably replace Roy Rogers or George Gobel at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto. Gratien Gélinas and the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde, the Montreal Ballet and the Museum of Modern Art might even compete with the attractions of a World's Fair. Quebec City could feature a pageant of history with more colour and authenticity than any other city in Canada. Halifax could marshal its resources and produce a program with a distinctive flavour of the Maritimes and rich in the history of Canada. Finally, those doughty Scots of Cape Breton could stage the Gaelic Mod to surpass all others. Such are a few of the activities which might challenge the imagination, stir the souls and inspire our people to make the Centennial a living pageant of Canadian history and a milestone in our progress.

The responsibility of the federal Government in ensuring that Canada's Centennial will be worthy of the nation is great and far-reaching. In addition to taking the lead in establishing the machinery of co-ordination which will make for a truly national effort, the federal Government has the responsibility of providing the initial financial encouragement and making its appropriate resources and agencies available to the fullest possible extent.

On the physical and material side the Government should assess its present position and chart the course of its construction program for the next seven years, planning it in such a way as to have some major public buildings, some significant bridges, some major land reclamation, forest and water resources conservation projects, major national highway projects and possibly the all-Canadian section of the St. Lawrence Seaway. To pick a few specific examples, could we not plan to have completed, at least by 1967, in Ottawa, a centre for the performing arts? Surely the nation could compete with the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, where the finest auditoriums in Canada are in existence today. Such a project, worthy of the nation, might cost $10 million, but if the province of Alberta can spend $11 million on its two auditoriums in Calgary and Edmonton, and if Vancouver can spend $6 million on its Queen Elizabeth Theatre, surely the Canadian people can supply the funds necessary to provide a centre for the arts worthy of the nation's capital and in keeping with the development of the National Capital Plan.

While on this particular subject, I wish to make a special plea for a modern theatre and convention centre as part of the facilities of Banff National Park. A theatre and convention centre in Banff, which the Banff School of Fine Arts would be glad to operate, would cost between $1 million and $2 million, and would pay for itself in increased tourist business alone in a period of 25 years.

Further on this subject, I would like to put in a plea for an imaginative development of all of our historic sites, national monuments, and national parks in Canada. We should never forget these significant words of Joseph Howe:

> A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures and fosters national pride and love of country, by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

What more appropriate time to give new recognition to the importance of those words than by planning now to restore the magnificent fortress of Louisburg, the Halifax Citadel, and similar places which played such an important role in the history of our country and which can be made into admirable aids to the understanding of history and the development of national pride for our own generation and generations yet unborn? Last year 237,000 visitors registered at the Halifax Citadel; 26,000 visitors registered at Louisburg. I wonder how many thousands each year visit the Chateau de Ramezay and the old Bonsecours Church in Montreal, or, for that matter, the Plains of Abraham in old Quebec. It is time Canadians took a leaf from our American neighbours, who have done a magnificent job in preserving and marking such places as Gettysburg, Williamsburg and the Custer battlefield in Montana, to mention a few. Properly developed, our historic sites and monuments and our national parks can play a much more vital role than they are playing in developing an appreciation of our history and a love of our country. Properly developed, those places can lend distinction and colour to our land and make it a much richer place for the Canadian and foreign tourist as well. By establishing a scale of modest admission fees, as is done in other countries, substantial sums could be earned toward the maintenance of these national shrines.

While plans to develop our physical and material resources as part of our Centennial plans are important and must not be neglected, the phase of the Centennial which should excite our deepest interest and receive our most imaginative attention should be in the wide realm of those things having to do with the Canadian spirit, Canadian culture and Canadian nationality. Here again, the number of projects which could be thought of are legion, but the application of certain criteria would have the effect of limiting the projects, first, to things that are within our competence; secondly, to those which would be of significance in raising Canada's cultural, scientific and material standards; and finally, to those in which Canada could make a significant contribution to the world.

Taking first things first, it is recognized today that the basis of every country's standard of living, her material prosperity and her economic and military survival, depends on the quality of education it provides for its citizens. Education is the great propulsive force of modern civilization. It is more powerful than atomic and hydrogen bombs, and, if used intelligently, will make these monstrosities obsolete and unnecessary.

Recognition of the constitutional limitations under which the responsibility for education is vested in the right of the provinces does not absolve either the provincial or the federal Governments from doing what is vital and necessary in the national interest. Intelligent men of good will can and must find the means of adapting our constitutional procedures to the needs of the twentieth century. Fortunately, the recent agreement on university grants between the federal Government and the province of Quebec is the latest proof that men of sincere purpose and national stature can evolve mutually acceptable formulas. There should be no question but that the public schools should remain the responsibility of the provinces, although the time may come when, through the device of tax-sharing arrangements, the broader resources of the federal Government should assist the provinces in the capital cost aspects of education.

In the realm of higher education and research, there can be no question that in the interest of our economic and military survival the federal treasury will have to find means of supporting, to a much greater extent than now, our universities and technical colleges. My colleague the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall), in his excellent speech of March 11, and my colleague the honourable senator from L'Acadie (Hon. Mr. Savoie) have each underlined how vitally important education is today. I shall not repeat what they have said so well, but I do want to put in the context of this address what needs to be done. With this in mind, I am going to suggest two steps which should be taken. First, the grants to Canadian universities, which are presently on the basis of $1.50 per capita, should be increased to $2 per capita in 1961, and $3 in 1965. Secondly—and here I support my colleague from Winnipeg, but in a Centennial context—we should establish 5,000 pre-Centennial scholarships in the arts, humanities and sciences by 1965, and in 1967 formally establish another 5,000, making a total of 10,000 Centennial scholarships. These might be divided as follows: 3,000 $500 scholarships available to undergraduates entering their second year; 3,000 $1,000 scholarships available to undergraduates entering their third year; 2,000 $1,500 scholarships available to undergraduates entering their fourth year; 1,000 $2,000 scholarships available to graduates working towards a master's degree; 500 $3,000 scholarships available to graduates working towards a doctoral degree; and 500 $4,000 scholarships available to students pursuing post-doctoral training. The total annual cost of such a program would be $13 million, and it would be one of the best national investments we could make.

One of the most imaginative and productive contributions in permanent values that Canada could make would be to take steps now to establish a number of research projects which with good fortune might conclude in 1967 with the holding of a series of world conferences in Canada on the social sciences and health. At these conferences, what might be called the Centennial Papers could be presented by teams of the most competent researchers mobilized by Canada from all over the world. The studies to be initiated now in two fields, as an example, should be of such a nature that if we were fortunate in finding solutions to some of the problems the results would be of benefit to not only Canada, but to all mankind. Could we find any more important or productive way of making our Centennial significant than by finding a solution to some of the ills of our society?

With this in mind, may we not say to our Social Science Research Council and to our authorities in public health: Will each of you suggest a number of problems which, if the necessary resources of trained manpower, facilities and funds are made available, might be modified or solved by seven years of intensive research? These agencies should suggest the budgets and facilities needed; and the Government of Canada, in co-operation with the provinces, industry, and private business might be asked to find the funds to get the projects under way. Examples of the type of project which would have far-reaching economic as well as humanitarian benefits, not only for Canada, but for the world, would be co-ordinated and concentrated attacks on such causes of economic loss in the area of public health as the common cold, heart disease, arthritis, alcoholism and cancer, and in the general field of preventive medicine.

In the social sciences and humanities, could not Canada establish projects designed to eliminate unemployment, to effect more equitable distribution of goods and services, to study the taxation structure at all levels of Government, to cultivate international understanding and preservation of world peace. These are all practical projects which would be of benefit not only to Canada, but to the world at large.

What would a Centennial Fund of one million dollars a year between now and 1967 enable us to do in the humanities and social sciences? And another million a year applied to the solution of agreed problems in public health? By putting teams of researchers to work now and by inviting a world conference on the social sciences, and another on health to Canada in 1967 and by presenting at the conference the results of our studies in the form of the Centennial Papers, is it not possible that with good fortune and through the mobilization of the best international brains we can find, Canada's Centennial Papers could mark the beginning of a new breakthrough in the realm of human knowledge? These are the kinds of projects which would make our Centennial different, productive and significant.

While the kinds of projects I have described are those which combine productive use of funds and national and even international significance worthy of a nation's Centennial, we must not forget that a Centennial should be a time of gaiety, entertainment and happiness. With this in mind, let us examine for a moment some of the purely cultural themes which our governments and our people ought to encourage.

Starting with governments at all levels, one of our targets should be to set standards of beauty in the development of our cities and in the erection of our public buildings. The principles of Ottawa's National Capital Commission should be extended to every city and municipality where governments erect public buildings. Governments should set the example in good architecture and style. They should set the example in community planning to combine utility and beauty, and each public building should have provisions made for suitable and appropriate murals and sculpture. This should be standard practice, but for special buildings opened in our Centennial year particular attention should be given to suitably marking the occasion with mural decorations that are appropriate and significant. Private business has been setting a good example in this respect. One has only to mention the British American Oil building and the new wing of the Royal York Hotel in Toronto, or the new headquarters building of the Great West Life in Winnipeg, which has one of the most tastefully designed and decorated interiors of any office building in Canada. But enough of buildings. Let us turn now to those things of the spirit, of gaiety and fun.

The Government of Canada should, as part of our Centennial, commission our musicians, choreographers and playwrights to write operas, ballets and plays, and commission our painters to paint the land and its people in all its moods and beauty, so that Canadians may come to know and love their country, if not at first-hand, then at second-hand through travelling exhibitions of paintings, sculpture and handicrafts organized and sent on tour by our National and other galleries.

We should make plans to send the finest productions of the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde, the Crest Theatre, the Stratford Players, the National and Winnipeg Ballets, on tour both in Canada and abroad. Writers like Hugh MacLennan, Merrill Dennison, Donald Creighton, playwrights like Gratien Gélinas, Robertson Davies, Patricia Joudry, Gwen Ringwood, Elsie Park Gowan and a host of others should be commissioned to write plays and pageants which would capture for all time the colour and romance of our homeland and do it in such a way that it will communicate the spirit and vitality of Canada to the far corners of the globe. To our composers we should throw out the challenge to write the symphonies and the operas and the folk music of our country. I am sure the Healy Willans, the Arnold Walters, the Claude Champagnes, the John Weinzweigs, the Sir Ernest MacMillan, the Boris Roubakines, the Adaskins, the Hambourgs and many others like them can compose the music, the songs, the symphonies and the operas which will portray this throbbing land and its people in all its colour and diversity, from the banjo-playing cowboys of the rangelands to the rollicking voyageurs and lumberjacks of Quebec and New Brunswick.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and our chain of private broadcasting stations have an opportunity here to contribute great things to the national life by joining with governments, community agencies and individuals, in deliberately encouraging Canadian writers, musicians, actors and ballerinas. The opportunity for the broadcasting and television stations to more than justify their licences is here for the taking. Will they seize it? If they do, they can greatly help to make the Centennial the success it deserves to be.

The Canada Council will have a special responsibility in planning for our Centennial, because theirs can be the initiative in commissioning works of music and art, in sending companies of players, choirs, orchestras and ballets on tour of Canada and beyond. Theirs can be the initiative in inviting to Canada, as part of our celebration, artists and groups from other lands. But the Council, with its limited resources, cannot do it all. Private groups, business and governments can supplement and help to enlarge what the Canada Council can do, and the Council itself can provide the spark which may kindle the flame of encouragement in many a local group. The planning and the achievement of our Centennial year can be a real time of testing of the courage, the wisdom, the strength and the imagination of Canada's cultural agencies—the C.B.C., the National Film Board, the National Gallery and the National Museum and Archives. These can all play a great role in helping to make Canada's Centennial a pinnacle of achievement in the arts in Canada. Let us hope they will rise to their opportunity.

In the course of this address I have tried to sketch in rough outline a few ideas which I think would help to make Canada's birthday celebration in 1967 a time of rejoicing, a time of happiness and a time of dedication. The celebration provides the excuse, if one were needed, to record and recognize the inspiring achievements of the pioneers who laid the foundations of a great Canadian nation. It provides the opportunity to examine our national inventory, to correct its deficiencies and expand its virtues. It provides the opportunity for us to make some imaginative plans and resolutions for the future, but above all it provides the opportunity for Canadians to assess themselves and to measure their achievements, their resources and their national dedication against the realities of life in the last and challenging forty years of the 20th century.

We are a nation endowed with natural wealth beyond the dreams of many people from older and less fortunate lands. We have a people enriched by the cultural streams of many nations. We have a system of justice that is the envy of many, a system of government based on freedom of the individual and government by consent. In other words, by our own free choice we are what we are. We are free to choose our type of government, our standard of living, and the height of our material and cultural achievement. Maybe in the first hundred years of Canadian nationhood we have placed more emphasis than we should on the material yardsticks of success. In the next hundred years these yardsticks will be gained and surpassed by millions of people in the underdeveloped countries of the world. We can only claim a superiority for our way of life if, in addition to maintaining our material standard of life for all our people—and this means the elimination of chronic and recurring unemployment—we go beyond this material yardstick and also excel in those things of the spirit which can make even a small nation great. The Centennial will provide us the opportunity to stake a claim to a place of leadership among the nations. How well we may justify that claim, how well we shall rise to our opportunity, will be determined not by what we do in the material sense, important as this may be; but our success or failure on the road to the future will be determined by how well we succeed in establishing a new sense of values, a new appreciation of a man's worth and dignity, whether he be rich or poor, a new appreciation of the eternal values of life, truth and honesty, beauty and justice, and a new sense of discrimination which will help us to distinguish what is shoddy and bad from what is beautiful and good. These are the things that the Centennial will help us to decide.

The opportunity is great, and the rewards will be rich if we develop to the full the resources of a young and virile people whose talents are an amalgam of the best from many lands. We can rise to new heights in the realm of industry and the arts or we can accept the shoddy, the superficial and the inconsequential. The choice of Canadians of today will be as it was in the days of the pioneers, to live in friendship with all our neighbours, to help each according to his need, to work hard and enjoy life.

In conclusion, let us consider a few of the tasks we might set ourselves as a nation as we enter the second century of our nationhood. For example:

1. Abolition of unemployment. Surely we have the wit to devise some scheme or schemes that will be more productive and less demoralizing than unemployment insurance. Could we not devise instead employment insurance—a means of collecting funds in advance to ensure productive employment when normal sources fail?

2. Establishment of an organization for peace and disarmament. While we have today many agencies which are ostensibly devoted to the purposes of peace and disarmament, it might be that Canada, by virtue of her traditional position of objectivity and conciliation, could make a vital contribution to the promotion of peace and disarmament by assigning some of our defence funds to special studies and actions in the field of peace.

3. Establishment of an organization for feeding the hungry. Canada, as an exporter of foodstuffs on a large scale, has a greater stake than any other country in finding ways and means of feeding the world's hungry and at the same time curing the paradox of starvation in the midst of plenty. Surely we could set up a research team of biologists, economists, financiers and transportation experts to work with the Food and Agricultural Organization and others to solve this problem.

4. Establishment of a joint interprovincial-federal committee on taxation policies. Our federal-provincial tax structure becomes more of a complicated maze year by year. Wouldn't it be a good idea to establish a research committee, representative of the provinces and of the federal Government, to do a thorough investigation of the whole incidence of taxation and see if they could evolve some more rational and logical scheme than we have now?

5. Establishment of a national transportation policy which would regard all forms of transport—rail, water, truck and air—as one integrated task.

There are countless other tasks to which we ought to be applying the best brains of the nation. I commend these, together with the earlier suggestions, as being the kind of approach which would make Canada's first Centennial celebration both a significant milestone of the past and a landmark for the future.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all grateful to the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) for introducing this timely subject and making so comprehensive a contribution to it. My remarks will be brief, and of necessity on a much lower plane. However, I do wish to stress that when Canada is 100 years old it will be a time for rejoicing, a time for looking at the past and a time for planning for the future.

Three great nations have had an important influence upon Canadian development. From France we got the explorers, the early settlers, and a culture which has never faded.

From the United States we have had friendship, which has been a great blessing to us in times of war and of peace. From Great Britain we obtained our Parliamentary system, a love of freedom, a love of British justice, and a design for transition from an empire to a commonwealth state.

I was glad to hear the honourable senator recall the words of Joseph Howe, and I trust you will pardon me if, for emphasis, I repeat them. He said:

> A wise nation preserves its records ... gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures, and fosters national pride and love of country, by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

We have had in Canada some great accomplishments and as well some great sacrifices. The name "Canada" in times long gone by probably meant a collection of huts, and as the Europeans—from France in particular, and from Britain—came in, some permanent settlements were established. Probably the first of such establishments was at Port Royal, in 1605, in the beautiful Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia. There for the first time gardens were planted and some wheat was grown. Quebec was founded in 1608 under Champlain.

Some 150 years later the Battle of the Plains of Abraham was fought. After that the country Canada became a scattered collection of British possessions. In the next hundred years there were discord, friction and difficulties, and the leaders of those times decided that some scheme would have to be worked out by which all these scattered settlements could be gathered into one country. They succeeded beyond their fondest hopes, and Canada as it stands today is a monument to their statesmanship.

The Fathers of Confederation were determined that this country should no longer be a collection of huts and scattered colonies, but should be a young nation, with new life beating in its breast and a glorious future in its eyes, and that it would become the Britain of the West. That idea took hold with the people. What did they hope to accomplish? Many difficulties had to be overcome. They felt that interprovincial trade could be fostered. They thought that railway extension would more easily be accomplished. They thought that people of different classes would mingle together, and that consequently there would be stronger union. They also looked forward to acquiring more territory.

There was, as well, fear in their hearts, and they felt they should prepare for defence. As D'Arcy McGee said:

> If we remain as fragments we are lost. Let us unite and then we will stand as the rock that throws back the waves that are dashed against it without injury to itself.

There were other sectional difficulties that had to be overcome. The Act of Union of 1841 had failed to solve the political and racial difficulties of the times. The two provinces, Upper and Lower Canada, were so nearly equal in strength that a deadlock resulted. Upper Canada—Ontario—had to be persuaded that union would solve some of her trade and political problems. Lower Canada—Quebec—had to be convinced that its ancient rights in matters of language, religion and education would be preserved. The Atlantic provinces, which had traded with the south, knew that their economy would be upset by union. They had to be convinced that railway construction and the opening up of the west would compensate them for the burdens which Confederation would impose upon them.

Then, in the west, the powerful Hudson's Bay Company still had control of all the vast area drained by streams flowing into Hudson Bay. At that time very little was known of that great western region of primeval forests, great rivers, inland lakes, boundless plains and vast mountain ranges unsurpassed in grandeur and beauty. In the northern states railways had been built and settlers had gone in. Some of the settlers had come over into Canada and they were thinking they would like to see the United States Government in control of that part of Canada, and the annexation feeling was quite strong at that time in British Columbia.

These many difficulties had to be overcome, and the American Civil War which was just over at about that time had fostered hostility against Great Britain and against Canada. Most of the people of Canada, of course, favoured the North, but some Confederate soldiers got into Canada and made it a base for raids against Vermont and other parts of the States, and were not altogether controlled at that time. So there was fear that the United States might come and conquer Canada, and in 1886 the Fenian Raids made that seem even more likely.

The greatest work of the Fathers of Confederation was in reconciling all these diverse interests, and persuading the people of Canada that the common interest far transcended any local interest. They succeeded in accomplishing their great objective. After many conferences had been held the United Kingdom Parliament passed the British North America Act, whereby on July 1, 1867 Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were united in one dominion called Canada. Manitoba joined three years later, in 1870, and in 1871 British Columbia and Prince Edward Island joined. Then, in 1905, four districts of the Northwest Territories were united into two provinces, which joined the dominion, and in 1949 Newfoundland came in. So, we have the great Dominion of Canada, with its population of over 17 million people now, but which at that time had a population of 3.5 million.

There have been some sacrifices and some glorious accomplishments. During 20,000 or 30,000 years the Indians had roamed over that land in the west. They were the only inhabitants of that great solitude. They were lords of the forest and monarchs of all they surveyed. Then the explorer, the trader, the pioneer settler and the Christian missionary went into that country. Too much cannot be said for the devotion, heroism and courage of those ancient missionaries. They thought not of themselves nor of their comfort. They endured fatigue, frost and poor food, and they lived in wretched camps called wigwams with the dogs and the smoke. They endured resentment and torture in doing their noble work of spreading the gospel and helping the sick and the destitute. Their efforts were not always in vain. One was Bishop Rundle, who worked in the foothills of the Rockies. When he had to go away on account of sickness people said of him: "Poor he came among us; poor he went away, leaving us rich." For generations the tribes that he contacted held services and sang the sweet little Sunday School hymns which he had taught them. As beneficiaries of these sacrifices and accomplishments, we of the present day must be true custodians of our heritage. We must look after the material welfare of Canada, we must make our surplus foods available to the starving peoples of the world, and, as has been said, we must spend some time and thought on the finer things of life so that we shall pass on to future generations not a mountain of debt but, rather, for a heritage, a country where peace, happiness, health and right living abound.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, debate adjourned.

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-55, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I should like to have leave of the house to commence dealing with these supplementary estimates now. I might not be able to finish, but in the event that it becomes advisable to have royal assent tomorrow evening we shall have more time in which to consider them than we would have if we postponed consideration until tomorrow.

Honourable senators have had copies of the supplementary estimates in their possession for some two weeks or so. Although the bill has not been printed since it was passed this afternoon in the other place we have, nevertheless, 50 copies of it here. The bill contains only four clauses, with the supplementary estimates attached as a schedule. Is it agreeable to honourable senators that I commence dealing with the supplementaries this afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The bill will be distributed, will it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, we have 50 copies here to distribute. If the house so desires, I will ask the page boys to distribute them. I presume that honourable senators who have been studying the bill also have their copies with them. I remember asking honourable senators if they would study the estimates over the weekend. If they have done so I shall not have to go so deeply into some items as otherwise would be necessary.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would agree with the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that consideration of the supplementary estimates be commenced at this time, but I would not like to hold out any hope that consideration will be completed this afternoon. We could at least start consideration now, and if any honourable senator so desires, the debate could be adjourned until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I now move the second reading of the bill.

The total amount required to be authorized by the bill for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1960, is $117,844,324, of which $1,028,728 is for loans.

If honourable senators have studied these supplementaries they will be aware of the fact that the bulk of the $117,844,324 is made up of two items: Vote 640, for the purpose of recouping the operating loss of the Agricultural Stabilization Board, in the amount of $57,661,176, and Vote 698, to cover the Canadian National Railway deficit of $43,588,290. These two items amount to $101,249,466, which is almost the total of all the supplementary estimates. The remaining ones amount to something like $16 million.

I propose to deal with the two largest items first and then come to some of the other large items, such as Vote 650, for $1,064,220, to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for dry skimmed milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and Governments; Vote 675, in the amount of $2,344,000, for the Post Office Department; Vote 691, $825,-090, for the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals; Vote 692, $649,886, for the Newfoundland ferry and terminals, and Vote 706, $1,095,154, for steamship subventions for coastal services.

When I have dealt with all these items I shall be prepared to explain to the best of my ability any other items honourable senators might wish me to deal with.

Vote 640 is the estimated amount required to recoup the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for the net operating loss of the Agricultural Stabilization Board during the fiscal year 1959-60 and, as I said before, it amounts to $57,661,176.

By way of explanation I would like to say that the Agricultural Stabilization Act, chapter 22 of the Statutes of Canada, 1957-58, was enacted to stabilize the prices of agricultural commodities and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and cost of goods and services which they have to buy. Under the act, the Stabilization Board is required to stabilize the price of nine named commodities: cattle, hogs and sheep; butter, cheese and eggs; and wheat, oats and barley not produced in areas designated under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, at at least 80 per cent of the "base price", which is defined as the average price obtaining for commodities at representative markets for the ten previous years. Other commodities not named in the act may be stabilized at percentages of the base price prescribed by the Governor in Council. Under section 10 of that act the board has power to purchase any agricultural commodity at the prescribed price. It also has power to pay to producers of an agricultural commodity, directly or through such agent as the board may determine, the amount by which the prescribed price exceeds a price determined by the board. That is commonly known as a deficiency payment. It also has power to make such payment for the benefit of producers as the Governor in Council may authorize for the purpose of stabilizing the price of an agricultural commodity at the prescribed price. That is commonly known as a subsidy payment.

I could give honourable senators detailed information of how this sum of $57,661,176 is made up, but I do not know whether they want me to do so or not.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think it would be as well to do so.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): May I ask the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), a question? Does the item $57 million include deficiency payments on hogs and eggs in existence, and which have been in existence for some weeks?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If I were to read the figures, I think that would answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Without giving all the details, have you the amount for hogs and eggs?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is called pork here.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was a hog before it became pork.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It had to be.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: For butter the estimated cost for the year ending March 31, 1960 was $3,023,691; eggs, $4,775,707; dry skim milk, $8,109,882; cheddar cheese, $109,-308; fowl, $137,336; B.C. tomatoes, $56,850; B.C. raspberries, $30,280; lamb, $362,510; pork, $24,650,428.

Those figures are the losses on the commodity products. The deficiency programs cover soya beans, of which the estimated cost for the year ending March 31, 1960 was $1,205,785; sugar beets, $2,656,720; and asparagus, $357,214.

Subsidy programs: wool $1,040,637; B.C. tomatoes, $37,926; milk for processing, $11 million. The amounts I have given total $57,554,257. If to that sum is added the loss underestimated in 1958-59, $106,919, the whole thing comes to $57,661,176.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Can the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) give the estimated cost to the Government of these products, and also tell us what quantity of products is on hand at the present time? I am thinking of eggs, butter, and so forth.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have so much information here that I may have to spend a moment or two looking for these figures. Does my honourable friend want the figures for each of the commodities that I mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Golding: I would like to know how much of each product under price control is on hand at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have here a table showing the estimated inventory as of March 31, 1960. The figures given are as follows: Butter 61,726,166 lbs; dry skimmed milk, 5,000,000 lbs.; cheddar cheese, 1,500,000 lbs.; B.C. raspberries, 2,576,986 lbs., plus 159,600 lbs. Hogs: frozen cuts, 33,599,750 lbs.; canned pork, 97,086,698 lbs.; canned hams, 8,331,-876 lbs.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What is the figure for eggs?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Eggs, nil.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Where are all these products stored?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I imagine they are in cold storage.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, but where are the cold storage plants located?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would have difficulty in trying to answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A great volume of these products is in storage and I am curious to know where they are stored. Has the Government cold storage warehouses throughout Canada?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not sure of that, but I understand they are stored and the Government pays the storage charges. I shall probably be able to get some information for honourable senators later.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Eggs are no longer subject to a floor price; the Government is not buying and storing eggs, but instead is going to make a deficiency payment on them. So there would not be any storage charges on eggs.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question? The total we are being asked to provide here is $57 million odd. Does that represent the accumulated loss up to the end of this month, tomorrow, or the estimated loss that may arise before final disposal of these large quantities of commodities which the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) mentioned a moment ago?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The estimated cost for the year ending March 31, 1960, is $57,661,176 —that is the cost to the board. That is what has to be made up.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Then we may assume there may be, but not necessarily will be, further losses?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would not want to say.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): Honourable senators, I understand the purpose of this item is to recoup the Stabilization Board for the loss that it has incurred up to the end of March. That does not apply to all stocks on hand at the present time and the losses that may occur upon their disposal. This amount is to cover only the losses of the board up to the end of the fiscal year.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable leader a question. When the Agricultural Stabilization Act was passed we often heard it called insurance for the farmers. At that time the floor price of pork was raised from 23 cents to 25 cents a pound, and the price of eggs also was raised. Now, did the Government make a mistake in raising the prices at that time, so that now we have to do away with the floor prices and pay deficiency payments instead?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think that is an argumentative speech you are making, sir.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would not be expected to answer that.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: If I am well informed, the Government has distributed free many million pounds of canned pork to hospitals and other charitable organizations. I suppose the cost of that distribution is included in this $57 million?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That would include the loss on the pork that has been given away, yes.

Honourable senators, I will now take up Vote 698, covering the Canadian National Railways deficit for the calendar year 1959. This vote is not as complicated as the one I have just been trying to explain. No amount was provided for in the main estimates for this item, and this supplementary estimate is for $43,588,290.

Section 9 of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Acts of 1958 and 1959 authorized the Minister of Finance to make advances to the Canadian National Railway Company on deficit account to enable the company to meet its current financial obligations, subject to reimbursement from the annual revenues of the company in so far as such revenues are sufficient, and any insufficiency shall be provided by a subsequent appropriation by Parliament. Advances made to the company by the Minister of Finance on account of the 1959 deficit, under the above Statutes, are recoverable from this appropriation.

I would like to give a little information to honourable senators with regard to the operating budget of the Canadian National Railway system last year. The operating revenues of the railway were $740,165,041; the operating expenses, $720,822,338, and net operating revenues, $19,342,703. When you deduct taxes and rents of $21,029,922 there is a deficit of $1,687,219. But there was other income of $11,017,815 from which the deficit is subtracted, leaving available for fixed charges the sum of $9,330,596, which when deducted from the fixed charges for the year, in the amount of $52,918,886, leaves a net deficit of $43,588,290, the amount of this appropriation.

Later on the president of the Canadian National Railway Company will be before our committee, as he was last year. Any further information required by honourable senators can be obtained at that time.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the honourable gentleman if the amount for fixed charges comprises only interest on capital debt?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am of opinion that that is correct. That is, the carrying charge on the debt.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a question? Did we not a few years ago assume a tremendous amount of accumulated debt of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: We wrote it off.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: We wrote it off in a sense, but it did not disappear into thin air. It was assumed as part of the national debt of Canada. As I understood it, there was a reasonable chance that from then on the railway system was going to be on an even keel. Could the honourable Leader of the Government give any indication as to why in a period of relatively prosperous conditions there should now be such a large deficit?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I can answer the question.

My honourable friend refers to the time we wrote off something like $1,000 million—at any rate, a huge sum. In committee I asked Mr. Gordon, the president of the railway, if this would be the last write-off and if we could look forward to the railway's being able to pay the interest on the balance of its debt. He said that it should be able to do so without any trouble at all. Last session, when Mr. Gordon was again before the committee, I asked him a similar question about the debt, and he told me that expenses had run higher than had been expected, that the transportation system had not earned as much money as estimated, and therefore they were short of the amount required to pay the charges on their debt. It is for that reason that we have to pay the extra money now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I think the explanation is that this huge amount of indebtedness was taken into the national debt of Canada, and the railway system started on an even keel, so far as arrears were concerned.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It started clear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The railway still had a debt, but it had no arrears of interest. Under the present arrangement the railway does not carry a deficit from year to year. If it loses $43 million this year, the Government pays that amount.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And the railway begins next year clear. If it does not make enough money to meet its running expenses, debt charges and so forth next year, the Government will again come along and pay the deficit.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The difference is that the railway does not accumulate a great debt from year to year; the Government looks after any debt that occurs on an annual basis.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, we are forgetting one thing, namely, capital expenditures made by the railway each year. In order to make those expenditures the railway company has to go into the bond market year after year and borrow money. There has been one bond issue this year for about $300 million. Of course it has to pay interest on its bonded indebtedness. If the railway operates at a loss the Government pays the deficit.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Under the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, which was passed by Parliament a few years ago, that part of the railway's debt which was considered to be irrecoverable was written off. It was hoped that from that time forward the Canadian National, one year with another, would be able to proceed upon an even keel. That hope has not materialized.

The expenditures referred to by the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) for equipment, dieselization and other improvements are capital amounts which are not included in this deficit, except in so far as interest upon the borrowings is included therein.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The railway this year paid its operating expenses and, I think, made a contribution of some $7 million or thereabouts.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: $9,300,000.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: But the total interest charges, if my memory serves me aright, are in excess of $50 million at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: $52 million-odd.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The item of $43 million is the deficit after the railway contributed what little surplus it had to the Treasury against the charges on the money borrowed.

Another feature about the Canadian National Railways is the manner in which it deals with its debt. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) referred to that matter a moment ago. If the Canadian National has a deficit, as it did in 1959, the Government provides the money to pay the deficit at the end of the year. But if in any year the Canadian National should have a surplus—and there have been one or two years when it did have a surplus over its operating costs and fixed charges on its debt—that surplus is paid into the Treasury at the end of the year.

I have never been enamoured of this method of financing the Canadian National. Should the railway have a surplus after paying all its fixed charges and operating expenses, the surplus is paid into the Treasury; if, on the other hand, it has a deficit over its operating costs and fixed charges, the Government foots the bill. We are footing it here today in this estimate for 1959 to the extent of $43 million-odd.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: The honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) quite properly reminded us that every year the Canadian National Railways have had to borrow money for capital expenditures. One such item was for construction of the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal. I recall a discussion which took place in this chamber when that construction was undertaken, and the amount mentioned was a sizeable one. Can my honourable friend the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) tell us how that capital expenditure has worked out?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is included in the other income of $11,017,815, which I mentioned in the statement.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What is the amount?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Any profit from the operation of the hotel is included in the $11 million-odd.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask whether the conundrum of the railroads and their continuing losses and deficits stems back to our statutory rates which have remained stationary for the last half century? The value of money has steadily decreased, while the cost of operation has continually increased. We must not complain if at times we have to make up the railroad's deficits, because we have regulated their earning ability. This subject is now being considered by a royal commission, but that fact does not interfere with our appreciation of the situation. The railways are not losing money because of inefficient operation, but because we have limited their earning capacity by statutory rates.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was not we who did it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: When I said "we" I meant Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, I cannot allow the observations of my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) to pass unchallenged. The only statutory rates that I know of in the whole railway freight rate structure are the so-called Crowsnest Pass rates.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We are not going into those today.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No, but as a good westerner my honourable friend should sympathize with me. I am going to question the point raised by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity. If you look at railway costs you will see that they have increased enormously. Why have they increased? I am not criticizing anybody, but the fact is that wages and the cost of ties, steel rails, boxcars—

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: And fringe benefits.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes—you will see that the cost of everything they have to pay for has more than doubled in the past twenty years. However, I can assure this house—and it has been demonstrated time and time again—that on the basis of the cost of building the railways in western Canada the present grain rates, even under the Crowsnest Pass Agreement, are among the most profitable rates that the railways have.

Hon. Mr. Reid: A few minutes ago reference was made to some profit being made by the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal. I was wondering if that profit is over and above the interest payable on the $28 million that was spent in building the hotel. Interest on $28 million at 5 per cent would cost $1,400,000 a year. Has that been taken into account?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think that is information we should get from the president when he comes before our committee a little later in the session to make his explanation of the whole year's operations.

I would like to deal now with Vote 650. I appreciate the interest that honourable senators have taken in this matter. The purpose of this vote is to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for dry skimmed milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and governments. In the first supplementary estimates we voted $2,500,000, and this supplementary estimate is for $1,064,220, making the total required for the fiscal year 1959-60 $3,564,220.

I can give honourable senators a little information on the subject. On August 6, 1959 the cabinet agreed to increase the amount of dry skimmed milk for donation to international relief organizations and agencies from 50 million to 60 million pounds. Further authorizations were subsequently received permitting total donations of 64,512,182 pounds. The Department of External Affairs has been directed to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Board for the total amount authorized and which has been distributed by the Board. UNICEF obtained 46,576,932 pounds; Unitarian Service Committee of Canada, 635,300 pounds; Canadian Lutheran World Relief, 2,361,750 pounds; CARE of Canada, 14,103,250 pounds, and so on. That is all the information I have with regard to that item.

I would like to go now to Vote 652.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the honourable leader selecting these votes because they are the larger amounts?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, they are the larger amounts, and together they make up almost the total of $117 million. The others are considerably smaller items, but any senator may discuss them and ask questions about them when I have finished with these items which I have selected.

The purpose of Vote 652 is to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for canned pork donated to international relief agencies. This is a new item. There was no previous supplementary with respect to it. It amounts to $1,096,442. A total of 5,482,206 pounds of pork was distributed to the Canadian Lutheran World Relief, CARE of Canada, the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Red Cross, the Mennonite Central Committee, and the Unitarian Service Committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What did these organizations do with this pork?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This was for relief.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not within Canada?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Yes, some.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The Canadian Red Cross distribution would definitely be within Canada.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Also the distribution by the Canadian Council of Churches and the Canadian Red Cross.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: And the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What I am getting at is that we gave away this large poundage and we have to make up the amount of a little over $1 million to pay for it.

I would like to go on to Vote 675, which has to do with the Post Office. This is quite a large item, totalling $2,344,000. It covers mail service by railways due to increased volume of mail carried over railways, $690,000; mail service by ordinary land conveyance including rural mail delivery, $855,000; mail service by air, $439,000 and mail service by water, $360,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does the honourable Leader of the Government know why this additional expenditure could not have been foreseen? Is there any special reason why the expense in the Post Office Department should be so much greater than anticipated?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, our population is increasing all the time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It did not go up as greatly percentage wise last year as in previous years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: People are writing more letters and sending more mail. The Christmas mail was terrific last year, almost double what it ever was before.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That should have resulted in more profit.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, the department operates at a loss.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the carrying of Christmas mail done at a loss to the Government?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know that. You asked me why there was so much mail carried.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I did not ask why there was so much mail carried. I asked why this loss in the Post Office was so much greater than anticipated.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will give you one example. The extra vote for mail service by air, $439,000, is occasioned by the prolonged air service in Newfoundland due to delay in opening of navigation by ice conditions, and also the increased volume of mail going to that province which I imagine could not be foreseen.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Does the amount of $2,344,000 represent the full deficit of the Post Office Department or only a part of it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the amount required to balance the books for the year.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Why does the Government not balance the books by taking from the income of the Post Office Department?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This represents what is left to be paid after the income has been used up.

I would like to go on to Vote 691 which has to do with the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Would the honourable leader know the amount provided in the main estimates for the Prince Edward Island car ferry?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The amount in the main estimates is $1,741,000 which, together with this supplementary of $825,090, makes a total for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, of $2,566,090.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I think this item would have been better charged to the Canadian National Railways, because they are carrying the passenger and freight cars, and so on back and forth. If they paid anything like they should this amount would not be charged to the car ferry.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Does it matter to whom it is charged?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Vote 706 has to do with steamship subventions for coastal services through the Maritimes.

The final item I would like to deal with is Vote 664, which has to do with the retirement of Lieutenant-Colonel W. J. Franklin as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons. I want to say a few words about him at this time. Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin served his country with distinction in the two World Wars and proved himself an able administrator in the difficult position which he filled here for so many years. He is a fine gentleman, possessed of what it takes to get along with people, and as a result his retirement prompts all of us to express our appreciation of and personal regard for him.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why did you throw him out, then?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We didn't. He resigned.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He retired.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: His service to Parliament will be gratefully remembered for a long time, and I feel sure all members of this house will join with me in wishing him many years of good health and happiness to enjoy his well-earned leisure.

The simple explanation of this item is that Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin did not complete within the required thirty-day period the necessary papers in order to enjoy the benefit of the supplementary death benefit plan under the Superannuation Act. The item is not related to his superannuation or pension. Upon retiring from public service it is apparently necessary to make an election within a period of thirty days if the person concerned wishes to continue under the death benefit plan. The thirty-day period was inadvertently permitted to elapse, and it is now desired to legislate to correct the error so that Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin may continue under this plan. I am sure honourable senators will be only too glad to see that this is done.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A magnanimous gesture at a very late date.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He was a great help to us in this house on occasions and I enjoyed his personal friendship very much. I am making this statement because I liked the man and I am sure my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) did too. Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin performed a valuable service to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall have something to say on that myself, but I want to repeat that I think it is a very late date to make this magnanimous gesture.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is the first opportunity I have had.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was not the first opportunity the Government had.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Now that the bouquets are all through, could the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) tell us how much money is involved in this $1 item?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not finish. There is no money involved in so far as the Government is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Then why is the item here?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The purpose is simply to give Colonel Franklin the right to qualify under the death benefit plan.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Before we adjourn, may I ask a question concerning Vote 648, which deals with $600,000 for the World Refugee Year? How much of that has been spent on the 340-odd refugees who came to this country?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have a very long explanation of that item here. Do I understand that the honourable senator asked if I had the figure that was spent during World Refugee Year?

Hon. Mr. Wall: No. I should like to know how much of that money has already been expended for the refugees who have been brought in under special circumstances, how much is still left, and how many more refugees we might have. However, in view of the lateness of the hour, perhaps that information could be furnished at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This is a new item. There is nothing in the main estimates to cover it. I can give a brief explanation.

The amount is $600,000. On September 11, 1959 the cabinet considered a proposal for a special Canadian contribution to World Refugee Year. It was agreed that Canada's special contribution to World Refugee Year would be the admission of about 100 tuberculous refugees, together with their families, and that the tuberculous patients would be treated at public expense. It was also agreed that the details of the plan should be worked out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Ministers of Citizenship and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, and Finance and with provincial Governments, on the understanding that the provincial Governments and the Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year would be encouraged to contribute as much as possible, and that the total cost to the federal Government during the first year should not exceed $600,000.

That is all the information I can give the honourable gentleman at the moment.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

On the Orders of the Day:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on March 17, 1931, the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, issued and distributed to honourable senators the following instructions regarding the use of the Senate Gallery in the House of Commons on Budget night:

Upon the occasion of the delivery of his Budget Speech by the Minister of Finance, none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons. This step is taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible.

In past years many senators have been excluded from the gallery upon similar occasions on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

This practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers. Reference to the ruling, which I too have adopted, will serve as a reminder that tonight is Budget night.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted a question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Are wives considered to be relatives and friends?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, unless divorced.

INDIAN BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Thomas Reid, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-2, to amend the Indian Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

THIRD READING

Hon. James Gladstone: With leave of the Senate, I move the third reading now.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, prior to the third reading I should like to make a few observations with respect to the bill. As you are aware, the substantive clause repeals subsection 2 of section 86 of the Indian Act. This subsection concerns exemption from taxation of property situated on a reserve, which tax exemption until now was not applicable if the Indian had chosen to exercise his right to federal franchise by executing a waiver. Such waivers will no longer be necessary because the Indians will now receive the statutory right to federal franchise through Bill C-3, nor will the 122 waivers which were signed be valid.

There was some difficulty and concern about the waivers, and to resolve the doubts regarding these existing waivers the very happy and fruitful suggestion of the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) was graciously accepted by the minister, namely, that letters will be sent to each of these 122 Indian citizens with copies of the new act or acts and an explanation that the waivers previously signed are no longer valid.

The honourable members of the committee spent some time in considering an amendment which I moved to Bill C-2, and I would like to refer to it briefly at this time. The purpose of my amendment was to strike out section 112 of the Indian Act which deals with enfranchisement of the Indians. Enfranchisement in the act has to do with the voluntary or involuntary leaving of the reserve by an Indian and thereby losing some of his treaty rights. The references to voluntary leaving are contained in sections 108, 109, 110 and 111.

Now, section 112 provides what I called this morning a unilateral ministerial initiation of proceedings for the enfranchisement of individual Indians or bands by appointing a committee of inquiry of three, and so on. I had raised that problem in this house immediately after the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Gladstone) expressed his very grave concern about the fact that there was among his people a great fear concerning section 112 and he made a very eloquent and sincere plea about this particular section 112 and its effect, in view of the fact that the Indians were now being given the franchise.

I also read what was said in the other house about section 112, and I had also noted that commitments had been made by both the former Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the present Minister that this section would not be used. In my simple way I thought that since there was a commitment that the section would not be used, the section was in effect redundant, and that since it was redundant it might as well be repealed along with subsection 2 of section 86.

I also contended, and from this contention I do not depart, that under sections 108, 109, 110 and 111 there is adequate flexibility both in ministerial right and in ministerial procedure, departmental or otherwise, for dealing with cases of voluntary enfranchisement, and therefore I moved the motion to repeal section 112.

However, in view of the discussion which took place upon this motion to strike out section 112, and especially in view of the statements of the honourable the Minister which indicated: that it was not her intention to make use of this section; that this section would have to be struck out and that it was her intention to have this section go; and that in this context there may be other amendments needed in the enfranchisement section to make certain that everything fitted well and that suitable machinery did exist for wise and democratic carrying out of these enfranchisement procedures on a voluntary basis; and, further, knowing that this problem would be receiving careful scrutiny of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian Affairs now sitting, I withdrew my amendment—not without some regrets—and I wish to make this point at this time so it will be on the record.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, when this bill was before the committee I raised a point that I should like to present to the house and have on record.

Apart from the granting of the franchise to the Indians, the manner in which we are doing it is, in my judgment, setting up a discrimination which may lead to unfortunate consequences in the future. The position at present is this. Indians living on reserves are not subject to property tax or income tax, except on any income they earn off the reserves. They are not taxed on earnings made on the reserves. Also, on many reserves Indians are entitled to benefits conferred by treaties made between the Government in the right of Canada and the Indian bands. For instance, they are entitled to treaty money and certain other benefits that exist on most reserves, if my recollection is correct.

Now, under this legislation Indians everywhere in Canada, from the international boundary line to the Arctic wastes, would be given the franchise on the same terms as other citizens of the country enjoy it. The Indians would be enfranchised irrespective of the provisions of treaties which they have entered into in the past, and they would be exempt from taxation on any earnings made on their reserves. We all hope the Indians will improve their economic position and rise in the social scale. However, their enjoyment of all the rights of citizenship while exempted from taxation on any income made on the reserves would constitute a discrimination which sooner or later might cause trouble. It is a discrimination which I submit should not be written into our laws.

I am not going to carry my protest further, but I do wish to place before the house this discrimination which, in my judgment, is an important matter. In that respect, I think the bill is certainly at fault.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall), in his attitude toward this bill. The first amendment that was proposed, namely, to make it abundantly clear that the waivers which some Indians had previously signed would henceforth be null and void and of no effect, was withdrawn. I stated once before in this house why I thought the bill should contain a provision to make it abundantly clear that the waivers were void. Such a provision would not weaken the bill in any way but, I felt, would strengthen the bond between Parliament and the Indians. I regard it as a mistake not to incorporate that provision in the bill.

The honourable junior senator from Winnipeg moved an amendment for the repeal of section 112 of the act. I supported him in that. However, my support weakened when the very capable minister gave us an assurance that when the bill is presented for consideration to the Joint Committee on Indian Affairs she would recommend to the committee that that section should be repealed, and that at the same time some appropriate amendment to other sections would be proposed. Accordingly, the amendment was not put to a vote, although a number of honourable senators had misgivings as to whether section 112 should be allowed to remain in the act.

The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has this afternoon raised the point which he raised in committee this morning. I did not agree with him at that time, and, with great respect, I am still unable to agree with him.

I shall not repeat all I said in committee this morning, but I would remind honourable senators that the Indians of Canada do pay some taxes. True, they do not pay income tax, but we must not get the impression that they are entirely free from the payment of taxes. For instance, if they own an automobile and buy gasoline, they pay the gasoline tax. They pay customs duties and sales tax, and other indirect taxes, such as excise duties and hidden levies of various kinds. The Indians pay those taxes just as we do.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Do they pay succession duties?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Indians pay succession duties. And, I may say, they do pay income tax on earnings which they make off the reserve. I mention these things to emphasize the fact that Indians are not exempt from taxation. It is, however, true, as our distinguished colleague has said, they do not pay income tax on earnings on the reserve.

I submit to honourable senators that the enfranchisement of the Indians and the question of their liability to income tax are two distinct fields of legislation. The Indians are not exempted from paying income tax because they are now to get the vote. It is true that previously they had to waive their right to exemption in order to get the vote. That requirement is now being abolished, and they will be entitled to vote, as all other citizens of Canada are. In my opinion, every citizen in Canada should get the vote upon attaining the age of 21 years. When a citizen becomes 21 years of age we do not inquire if he or she pays income tax or any other tax. That is a matter of secondary consideration. My honourable friend is entitled to his opinion as to whether Indians should or should not pay income tax, but that is another question. He could take up the question of whether the Indians should have other rights and responsibilities which we have, quite apart from income tax. But, honourable senators, my point is that there is no connection whatsoever between payment of taxes by the Indian and their enfranchisement. I stand by my previous statement that if any honourable senator is dissatisfied—and I personally am not—because Indians do not pay income tax, that matter can be brought up at any time without relation to their right to the franchise. I think we should forget all about whether or not the Indians pay income tax, and pass this bill giving them the right to vote.

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to this important question before the house today.

When I entered public life, in 1929, I was elected in a riding where there was a large and important Indian reservation known as Caughnawaga, and the Indians there, as a matter of courtesy, organized a big celebration and appointed me their honorary chief. Since then I have considered myself a member of their band.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You are a real Indian.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Do you get treaty money?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I have had lots of advantages that my honourable friend from Provencher (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) never had in his life. I have the pleasure of being invited to Caughnawaga whenever there is a party. The Indians there know how to live. I dance with them and I smoke the pipe with them. They gave me a nice plumed hat, and what is more they gave me the right to have a tomahawk in my own house for protection against anyone who might try to assault me. I still have it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You should bring it here.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, we could use it.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I have not used it up to now.

It is said that although vengeance is sweet to the Indian, recognition is sweeter. I myself believe, as do many other honourable senators who have expressed themselves since the bill has been before the house, and especially my distinguished leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), that the Indians have the right, the inalienable right, to vote. As my leader stated, whether or not they pay taxes does not enter into the question. When a citizen of this country becomes of age, namely, twenty-one years, he has the right to vote—and not only the right, but the duty, for by voting he participates in the selection of those who will represent him and his fellow citizens on the floor of the other house.

There is another reason why I am in favour of seeing that the first citizens of this country enjoy all the privileges of citizenship. After all, when our ancestors came here in the seventeenth century—Jacques Cartier, Roberval, Champlain and others—they found here people who were established and who owned this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They had been established here for centuries before the white man ever thought of coming here with his great idea of conquering the new world and civilizing its occupants. In many ways, honourable senators, I think we have learned more from them than they have learned from us. I do not want to be mistaken if I summarize my own views in the words of the great teacher who said: "Do unto others what you would have them do unto you."

I am a citizen of this country, and I belong to a race which came here to develop this country. After the Indians they were the second citizens. They did their duty to this country and played their part in developing it. It happened that owing to the unknown ways of Providence Canada fell into the hands of another country—England. When England became the possessor of this country it granted the French citizens inalienable rights, which we still enjoy today. It gave them the right to practise their religion. Although in the British Isles there was some restriction on the Catholic religion in those days, the French citizens of this country were allowed freedom of religion. We have our French language, which is dear to us, as its own language is dear to any nation. We were granted the right to speak the French language, and that privilege was incorporated in legislation passed during different periods in the history of this country. It was set down in the law—in the Act of 1791, the Union Act of 1841 and the British North America Act of 1867. I am proud to render tribute to the British people, I am proud of being a Canadian of French origin, and I am glad to enjoy these privileges which are dear to me.

I know that sometimes we have to fight to maintain our rights. Nevertheless, they were guaranteed to us by other people, and all Canadians of French origin are glad to have obtained them. I do not believe we are entitled to refuse those same rights to the first occupants of this country.

Hon Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I hesitate to join in this debate, because I was not present at the committee meeting, but I was greatly impressed by the eloquent words of my honourable friend from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) and the spirit with which he has expressed them.

He told us that in the past his ancestors were granted certain rights. They may not have been quite contractual rights, but they were understood rights which have been enjoyed, and enjoyed perhaps more exclusively than they have been by some other people. By that I mean that the French are different from the Ukrainians, for instance, who have had no such rights granted to them, but who, nevertheless, enjoy them. Now, I do not suppose anyone, certainly not my honourable friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), would suggest that the French people be denied the right to vote because certain rights were granted to them by a pseudo-contract or a partial contract.

I own a house in the city of Toronto, and it comes to me as a grant from the Crown. I am a tenant in fee simple from the Crown in the ownership of that house. I have that house exclusively as against all comers, yet nobody has suggested that I be denied my right to vote because I have a special privilege granted to me by the Crown in the ownership of the natural resources of this country. Were I to sell that house to the Crown, as I might well do under certain circumstances, and were I to take something in return—such as an annual payment or, to make it a little relevant still, an exemption from taxation—I do not suppose anyone would suggest I be denied my right to vote. It seems to me that this situation with the Indians is also one of contract. My honourable friend from Rigaud says that the whole country belonged to the Indians at one time. I do not know that I would go that far. The Indians were here ahead of us, it is true, but they did not settle the land as international law would now require owners of land to do. However, they did have certain rights, and in days gone by we recognized those rights and entered into contracts, not vague ones such as we entered into with the French people, but written contracts which gave the Indians certain rights, perhaps superior to but certainly different from the rights of other people in this country.

Because we gave them special privileges in return and in consideration for something they gave us, does that deprive them of the right to vote any more than it deprives me of the right to vote because I hold a piece of land by grant from the Crown? I think it is a matter of contract and absolute logic and law. The one thing has nothing whatever to do with the other. I did not hear the evidence given before the committee, but in my judgment the fact that we have contracted to give these people certain privileges has nothing to do with their right to be citizens of this country.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, before this bill is read the third time I would like to say a few words as to why I think it is going to be of benefit to my people.

Since 1951, when the act was amended, putting into effect this qualification or threat in connection with the waiving of our right of exemption from taxation, only 122 Indians from all over Canada expressed their desire to have the right to vote. Speaking for my people in Alberta, I would say that ten, twelve or fifteen years ago none of them wanted to vote under any circumstances, but a lot of the things we have approached the Government for since 1948 have come to pass, which we all appreciate, and the Indians are now beginning to feel that the Government is keeping its word.

Another point is that with the medical assistance Indians have received since 1948 the population of our reserves has increased and, in order to breathe, so to speak, we have had to go out in the world and meet with other people and make a living outside the reserve. Another factor is that our young men and women have been attending school and gaining a little more knowledge than Indians have had before, and some of them are working at white-collar office jobs and such like. In order to make the life of the outside world attractive to them I feel it would be wrong for me not to help give them the same right that the people they are living among have—the right to vote. When they are living away from the reserve they pay all the taxes other citizens pay. There is no getting away from the fact that we have to go out in the world and live alongside other people. Because of being given this right, without any threat attached, many more Indians will vote and, as the years go by, I think all the fears they have in their hearts now will gradually go away.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson):

That, for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourabl senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out in the motion for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

This is the usual motion which is made at about this time every session. Perhaps before the motion is voted on I should give honourable senators what information I have with regard to the Easter adjournment. As you all know, the House of Commons will adjourn on April 13 and reconvene on the 25th. I think I can safely say that the Senate will reconvene a week later than that, but I am not certain when our adjournment will commence.

I notice that there are several bills that may soon come to us—for instance, the Trans-Canada Highway Bill, the Yukon Bill and the Northwest Territories Bill. Even if we receive none of those next week we shall probably receive the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Bill. It seems that we would have plenty of time next week to deal with all those measures and I am hoping that our adjournment will commence at the end of the week.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, all I have to say is that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is very optimistic about the progress which may be made in the other house during the remainder of this afternoon and tomorrow. As I understand, the budget is to be presented tonight, so no legislation will be dealt with before tomorrow. Next week and the three days of the following week prior to adjournment will probably be taken up with the debate on the budget. How we can expect to receive all the bills mentioned by the Leader of the Government, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, may I ask a question with regard to this motion? In the past when such emergencies as envisaged in the motion have arisen how much notice has been given to senators from, say, British Columbia, Alberta or Newfoundland?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: All I know is that honourable senators are notified by telegram in time for them to get to Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he is in a position to inform the house whether we shall shall sit tomorrow? He has intimated that he will propose that the house should sit next Monday. Can he tell us at this time if we shall adjourn this afternoon until Monday afternoon or night or Tuesday afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not yet in a position to give that information. I am waiting to see what happens in the other place.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-283, for the relief of Joan Dunn Ostrosky.

Bill SD-284, for the relief of Teresa Greco Caputo.

Bill SD-285, for the relief of William Pinkerton.

Bill SD-286, for the relief of Frank David Cousens.

Bill SD-287, for the relief of Denise Baril Sarrazin.

Bill SD-288, for the relief of Wassily de Krokhaleff.

Bill SD-289, for the relief of Henriette Rioux Beaupre.

Bill SD-290, for the relief of Lillian Olive Robertson Reinhold.

Motion agreed to and bills read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I move that these bills be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill C-55, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, I was unavoidably absent from the chamber yesterday afternoon when the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) moved second reading of this bill. However, I have read his remarks in Hansard, and I note that he explained it with his usual care and clarity.

My first remarks, therefore, are by way of general observation in connection with the supplementary estimates, as they are called, but which in fact are now expenditures because they close the federal ledgers for the fiscal year ending today.

If a commercial corporation was closing its year on a similar set of figures there would be a good deal of red ink splashed around. We wind up our national business with a deficit on ordinary accounts of $405,800,000, or $12,800,000 more than the Minister of Finance estimated last April. If we include the deficit in the Old Age Security fund, we must add another $24,100,000, making a total of $429,900,000. This is the second largest peacetime deficit, exceeded only by the deficit of the preceding year, which amounted to $617 million. The combined deficit for the two years is $1,046,900,000.

When a trading corporation's expenses exceed its revenues it is viewed with great alarm as being on the road to bankruptcy. It is different in the case of a sovereign country—and unfortunately we have perhaps become too inured to the prospect of governments at all levels operating on deficits. A sovereign country simply adds its deficit to its national debt, which is what we have done, and all the taxpayers will pay more interest and principal to those taxpayers who hold the additional bonds that are issued.

Nevertheless, these deficits do have economic consequences in the country. Much of the deficit is represented by moneys paid out for things that are immediately consumed, as distinct from moneys that go into capital expenditures, and to the extent that we borrow from the savings of the people for such current expenses of the Government we are like the individual who lives beyond his means and borrows in order to meet his normal day-to-day expenses.

There are of course times when deficit financing is proper in planned, cyclical budgeting for the purpose of counteracting depressions. But that is not the kind of borrowing we are doing in connection with our present deficits. To the extent that we borrow for these deficits, we are reducing the savings pool available for capital expenditures of other governments, of business and the public generally. We must finance these capital expenditures by our own savings, supplemented by whatever foreign investments may come into Canada. So the federal deficit borrowing to which I have referred tends to tighten money and increase the interest rate.

Tonight we are to hear the plans of the Minister of Finance for the coming year. I am encouraged to think and to hope that he may go a long way toward bringing the 1960-61 accounts into balance.

The largest item in the estimates before us is Vote 640, for $57,661,176, to pay the net operating loss of the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Board. The size of this item, coming as it does after substantial payments in previous years, causes me to question whether this is the right method to use in assisting agriculture.

Prices are always governed by the inexorable law of supply and demand. Some people seem to think that law has been repealed or amended, or that you can get around it. So from time to time we have various plans and schemes to deal with with situations where the normal operation of the law of supply and demand appears to be causing hardship. So far as those plans are designed to take care of a temporary situation or an emergency, or where they are consistent with the operation of the law of supply and demand, they are remedial and helpful. For example, where there is a twelve-month demand for a product which is produced only seasonally, plans designed to spread the supply over the twelve-month period would be beneficial. But too often what is likely to happen from price supports and deficiency payments in the long run is that they tend to worsen the basic situation. Sometimes such plans actually operate to increase the supply of the product, thereby making the real price problem even more difficult. Or, they may decrease the effective demand because the buyers know that there is a surplus, and therefore a price that is meant in point of fact to be a floor becomes a ceiling overhanging the market.

For example, notwithstanding the fact that we are paying the sum of $57,661,000 for the losses on this year's operations of the Stabilization Board, look at what has happened to the price of one of the commodities with which that board deals. The Consumer Price Index shows a drop in the price of eggs from 55 cents in January 1959 to 41.9 cents in January 1960, and yet our Stabilization Board has been in operation.

My personal view is that an equivalent amount of money spent on improving the basic economic position of agricultural industry would achieve much greater results—money spent on doing the kind of things that our Special Committee on Land Use has been studying, such as eliminating submarginal farming, improving efficiency, fertilization, irrigation, and rural development schemes. I believe that these ideas are supported by leaders in agriculture, and I quote with approval a remark of Mr. H. H. Hannam, President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture:

Contrary to what may be the popular impression, Canadian farmers would much prefer to receive a fair exchange value in the market place for the farm products they produce and sell, rather than find it necessary to adopt programs involving Government assistance or subsidization.

That is a philosophy I would like to see put into practice.

The second largest item is the perennial deficit of the Canadian National Railways, which this year has amounted to $43,588,290, but we can take some comfort from the fact that it is $8 million less than in the previous year. All I propose to say about that item is this, that I think we have the best man in the country for the job of running this railway. We are fortunate to have his talents and his energy in this capacity. If any one man could solve the problem of the C.N.R. deficits, I think it would be he. I am all for giving him as free a hand as possible and supporting him in the tremendous job that he is doing, and supporting him in every way possible.

I turn from all these large and substantial items to something which is much smaller, namely, Vote 663, dealing with the House of Commons and involving an expenditure of $85,000. The fact that there is an item in these estimates concerning the House of Commons causes me to voice some thoughts that have been in my mind lately concerning the members of that house. You may have noticed a week or so ago that the Minister of Finance filed a return in the House of Commons giving a list of ex-members of Parliament who are entitled to pensions for their Parliamentary service, together with the amounts that they receive. The maximum amount that any such member can receive as a pension is $3,000 per year. This amount is reduced when he becomes 70 years of age, or if he is 70 years of age, by the amount of the old age pension, so that an ex-member who is 70 years of age or over receives a maximum pension of $2,340 a year. In the case of one ex-member whose name appears on the list, and who now receives $522 by way of pension, his pension will cease when he becomes 70 years of age. At that time he will receive no pension whatsoever from the House of Commons. When it is considered that these pensions are contributory—that is to say, the member himself makes a contribution towards the cost of the pension, and that the recipient must have been a member of at least three parliaments—this pension seems to be inadequate and ungenerous.

It is not easy for members of the House of Commons to put forward a case for themselves in matters of this kind. Perhaps I should say that I have not spoken to any member of the House of Commons in this connection, but for my part I feel sure that if the public knew the extent of the expenses and the sacrifices to which an elected member is subject in discharging his parliamentary duties there would be general approval of a more generous provision for pension when he is retired from Parliament. I think we in this house can speak quite freely on this matter because our appointments are for life, and at the same time we do know something about the problems of members of Parliament. We know how a man, when he is first elected to the House of Commons, must make a decision as to whether he is willing to keep two establishments going—one in his own constituency and one down here—or whether he is going to go to the expense of moving his family from his home so that all the family may be together here in Ottawa, with all the additional expense that goes with setting up a new establishment, plus the fact that after he has been here in Ottawa for four years, eight years or twelve years he may have to go back, after having given up the better part of his life, and attempt to pick up the threads of his business or profession or whatever it may be. For those reasons I am speaking on this matter with the suggestion that the provisions for pensions for members of Parliament are ungenerous and inadequate.

There seems to me to be another striking omission along a similar line. In the United Kingdom, in the United States, in Australia and elsewhere special pensions are provided for those who have held the highest position in their countries. As far back as 1937 the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed an act providing a pension of £2,000 a year for a Prime Minister over and above the pension which he would receive as a member of Parliament. In 1958 the United States Congress provided a pension for its President of $25,000 a year, plus certain allowances for expenses.

We in Canada should not lag behind in making proper provisions for the highest office in our country. This is not a matter to be judged upon the personalities or the circumstances of the men who from time to time may be our Prime Minister. We owe it to ourselves, to our own dignity and our own self-respect, that the office of Prime Minister in this country be recognized fittingly by an adequate pension. It does not matter who is now Prime Minister, or who have been Prime Ministers in the past, or who may be in the future. Canada should provide a special pension for Prime Ministers, past, present and future.

May I read to you some of the remarks made in the House of Commons in England in 1937? At that time the Right Honourable Stanley Baldwin was Prime Minister. A bill was introduced by Sir John Simon, as he then was, Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, on second reading, said:

It seems to us that the position of ex-Prime Minister is quite by itself. A man who has been Prime Minister in this country is sure to have had a long public career. He has borne far the greatest burden in the state. There are many possible sources of income which are open to lesser men which he cannot suitably exploit.

The provision was supported by the leaders of the other parties. Mr. Arthur Greenwood, the leader of the Labour Party, which was then the official Opposition, said:

I think that the principle of providing what we on this side of the house would call "adequate maintenance" for ex-Prime Ministers should be maintained. We are not accepting any particular figure, but it is no doubt right that an ex-Prime Minister, having borne the weight of responsibility as Prime Minister, should be relieved of the temptation of writing for the Hearst press in America or seeking to make adventitious gains by other means. Therefore it seems to us right, apart from the question of the figure, that this house should honour the services, irrespective of party, of one who has achieved the very high rank and carried out the very arduous duties of Prime Minister.

Mr. Archibald Sinclair, Leader of the Liberal Party, said:

I agree that a Prime Minister ought to receive a pension.

The then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Stanley Baldwin, in speaking to the bill, quoted from a statement by the Right Honourable Herbert Asquith as follows:

I confess I think the Prime Minister is underpaid. I was in office myself continuously for eleven years and I do not suppose that my experience is in the least unique, but I was a much poorer man when I left office than when I entered it.

These quotations are equally applicable in Canada. In calling attention to this matter I do so in the hope that my suggestion will command the support of all members of this house, and if so, that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will commend it to the attention of the Government itself. I believe it would have the support of all reasonable Canadian citizens.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I had intended to make reference to a number of items in this bill, but as the hour is getting along and we are to have royal assent at 5.45 p.m. I will restrict my remarks to one or two matters. I had thought royal assent might be at 10 o'clock tonight, but as the budget is being presented in the other house this evening I suppose it would not be appropriate to have royal assent at that hour.

I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for making sure that the bill which has been presented to us on this occasion is in the same form as that in which a similar bill was presented on a former occasion. It is a great improvement over the form in which such bills used to be drafted. I am sure the house is grateful to the honourable leader for having brought the need for a change in the form of these bills to the attention of the Government.

Under the circumstances I am going to refer to one item only, namely, Vote 664, which has reference to the superannuation of Lieutenant-Colonel W. J. Franklin. As the honourable Leader of the Government said last night, Lieutenant-Colonel Franklin has rendered splendid service not only to Parliament but also to his country. He served Canada in two World Wars. He was honoured by his regiment, the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders, by being made its Honorary Colonel. He came to the House of Commons as Sergeant-at-Arms, and during the time he held that post I had the good fortune to be Speaker of the House of Commons. No member of Parliament has more association with the Sergeant-at-Arms than does the Speaker of the House of Commons. In that house the Sergeant-at-Arms holds a position comparable to that held in the Senate by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. The duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms include the administration of a large portion of the affairs of the House of Commons. He must deal with many employees and officers, and I always found Colonel Franklin to be a man of tolerance, patience and great understanding. He served Parliament very well indeed, and I might say that our relations during the four years in which I was associated with him were indeed very happy. I am sure we are all glad that the provision referred to yesterday is included in the bill, and that we all wish Colonel Franklin great happiness during the many years of retirement which we trust lie before him.

Honourable senators, I would also like to say a few words in regard to the matters mentioned in the latter part of the remarks made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard). He referred to the pension which is paid to members of the House of Commons after they have retired or are defeated at the polls after having served in that house through a number of Parliaments. I have always felt the amount of the pension is indeed rather small, to say the least.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Entirely inadequate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Any honourable senator who has served in the House of Commons or any Legislature throughout the country knows that it is difficult, indeed impossible, to fulfil one's duty as a member and at the same time carry on a business or profession. It just cannot be done, and many members who have been faithful to their constituents in Parliament have gone back home to find their business or profession practically gone. For this reason I should be most pleased if the Government could see fit to review the present scheme. I am not going to suggest how it should be done. The honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale reminded us that it is a contributory pension, and I think it should be, but in my opinion it should be higher than it is at present for those who have devoted such a large part of their time to the affairs of the nation.

I am in complete accord also with the honourable senator's suggestion regarding payment of a pension to ex-Prime Ministers. The honourable senator reminded us that in the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and other countries a pension is paid to ex-Prime Ministers and Presidents. I believe there are certain provinces in Canada where at the present time a pension is paid to ex-Prime Ministers.

We know that the duties of a Prime Minister are arduous and responsible and we can never repay him in dollars and cents for the services he has rendered. I think that any Canadian Prime Minister could have made a vastly greater sum of money had he devoted his time and talents to private interests. Upon the retirement of a Prime Minister to private life his public services should be recognized in some way. There are not many ways in which that can be done in this country, but the least we can do is to award a pension. I join with the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale in suggesting that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate bring this proposal to the attention of the Government.

(Translation):

Hon. Léon Méthot: Honourable senators, without endorsing everything that was said by the two honourable gentlemen who spoke before me, I would like to express my wholehearted approval of the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. M. Leonard) with respect to the life pension which we should grant to those who have been Prime Ministers of our country.

It would seem proper that those who have devoted themselves to that extent should not have to suffer because they were willing to give such generous service to their fellow citizens. If they were chosen to direct the affairs of the country, it was because we had faith in their ability and wisdom. They might very easily have refused the position in order to continue working in their own interest and that of their family. If they were willing to forgo advantageous positions for the good of their fellow citizens, it is not reasonable that they should suffer for it.

(Text):

We justly claim that our form of Government permits us to choose the best men for the administration of our country. In many cases, these persons in agreeing to perform the function we ask them to undertake are faced with the necessity of abandoning the practice of a profession, an art or a trade which provided them with the income to improve the situation of their families.

I understand that in the old days members of Parliament did not receive anything, even in reimbursement of their expenses. I believe I read somewhere that during the winter session they were obliged to bring along their own food. I did not notice any reference to liquor, though. After a certain time it was found that only wealthy persons were able to accept such a situation and that consequently our Parliament was not representative of all our fellow citizens. Since then we rightly thought that it was better to pay members a salary. Later it was unanimously decided that after having served three terms they were entitled to a pension.

Our friend the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) suggests that a special pension be paid to every past Prime Minister. I am convinced that after a man has devoted himself to the service of his country he should be entitled to have a security which would be in accordance with his merit and the services he rendered. I entirely approve of the proposal made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) and so eloquently supported by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and I hope that the Government will give careful consideration to this suggestion.

Hon. William H. Golding: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a question, but before doing so I will explain what it is that I desire to get information on.

In the schedule to Bill C-55, page 3, reference is made to an expenditure of $57,661,176, the estimated amount required to recoup the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for the net operating loss of the Agricultural Stabilization Board during the fiscal year 1959-60.

On page 4 we find three items, Votes 650, 651 and 652 under the Department of External Affairs. Vote 650 is to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for dry skimmed milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and governments—I presume that was for distribution outside of Canada—the amount required being $1,064,220.

The next item, Vote 651, is to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for canned pork donated to Japan for the relief of typhoon victims. The amount required is $60,000.

In Vote 652 an amount of $1,096,442 is required to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for canned pork donated to international relief agencies.

Adding those four amounts we get a total of $59,881,838, which is the loss incurred in handling these products that are under a floor price. My question is: Does this represent the total loss to the Government in handling these products? Have any payments been made to any sources other than those organizations described in the four items I mentioned, and if so, what is the amount involved?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I think I explained the $57,661,176 item fully yesterday when I dealt with Vote 650.

I believe I stated that there was a first supplementary estimate of $2,500,000, and this supplementary estimate of $1,064,220, which is to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Account for dry skimmed milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and governments. The total of the two items in this supplementary and the previous one is $3,564,220. But that is not a loss under the operations of the Stabilization Board, as far as I know.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Actually, it is a loss in the handling of these products, as I understand it. But what I am concerned about is whether we have the figure of the total loss for the fiscal year 1959-60. What does the total loss for the year amount to?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I refer you to Vote 640, in the amount of $57,661,176, which I believe is the total loss to the Stabilization Board.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the honourable leader if the $57 million-odd is the amount of the loss after reimbursement by the Department of External Affairs for the donations of skimmed milk, canned pork to Japan, and so forth, or is it in addition to these items?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It is in addition to these items.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Department of External Affairs made these contributions of food, I suppose, by way of relief, and the cost of them is charged up to that department.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am quite aware of that. The three votes, 650, 651 and 652, are to reimburse the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization account. As a matter of bookkeeping, the Department of External Affairs is paying these amounts over to the stabilization account.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My question is this: Is the $57 million loss which we are providing for in Vote 640 the amount before or after the transfer of funds from the Department of External Affairs?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The payments in Votes 650, 651 and 652 are for losses in addition to the $57 million.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator why he describes these items as losses?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: If you look at item 640 you will see the words "net operating loss".

Hon. Mr. Golding: The question I would like to get an answer to, if I can, is whether that amount represents the total loss in the handling of these agricultural products that have a floor price, or have other payments been made previous to these supplementary estimates now before us? In other words, what is the total loss for the year?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The amount of $2,500,000 was included in the first supplementary item, and I believe that would have to be added to this amount.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I make a remark apropos of the question asked by the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding)? I understood yesterday afternoon that we had purchased approximately 130 million pounds of pork and that it is now in storage. Therefore I would assume that when that quantity of pork is disposed of we shall find additional losses creeping up, perhaps in next year's estimates, charged to the stabilization account on this year's operation.

Honourable senators, while I am on my feet, may I ask a question and make a suggestion? When bills of this nature come before this house would it not be helpful if we resolved ourselves into a Committee of the Whole, where questions could be more easily asked and the answers more readily given?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is practically what we are doing now.

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, I would like to refer to Vote 691, Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, $825,090. I am not opposed to the amount, but I should like to point out the importance to Prince Edward Island of the ferry service between the mainland and the Island.

In the autumn of 1958 the Boards of Trade at Summerside and Charlottetown sent well-worded resolutions to the Minister of Transport asking him to provide a new ferry ice-breaker, somewhat like the Abegweit. Then, in March of last year I wrote a letter to the Honourable George Hees, Minister of Transport, in which I told him I had received copies of the resolutions that had been sent to him by the Boards of Trade and that the people on the Island were concerned about the service. He replied to me, as follows:

> As you know, the question of constructing a causeway at Prince Edward Island has been under active consideration for some time, and it, of course, has had to be taken into account in the current investigation of the feasibility of providing the new ferry to which you refer. As yet there is not available a complete report on the subject, but it is expected that at least a preliminary report will be submitted in the near future.

Having received no further report, about two weeks ago I again wrote to the Minister of Transport. He advised me that a contract has been let for a new automobile ferry to be built at Halifax. This ferry will carry 68 or more motor cars, but it will not take any railway cars. The causeway, as it happens, comes under the Minister of Public Works, and the ferry service is under the Minister of Transport. I am not one who is complaining about the Minister of Public Works for not giving his report, because it is such an undertaking that I think every part of it should be examined, and it should be known whether it is feasible to build it there before anything further is done. I am of the opinion that we shall not get a report very soon.

In Prince Edward Island on the Trans-Canada highway a causeway is being built across Hillsborough River. Two years ago they started to put in the fill. It is about half a mile across the river, and the contract for the piers was let to a firm in Halifax. That firm started to put in the piers after the fill was in. They poured hundreds of tons of concrete and they have lost it all. Consulting engineers came from different parts to see if they could tell them what was wrong and what they should do. There were about nine spans across the river before they put in the fill. They found that the tide was running at three or four knots before they put in the fill, and after they put in the fill it was running at about 13 knots, and this is what the engineers did not figure on. I think we are entitled to expect that engineers will not go out on a limb and recommend something they are not sure of.

The Abegweit is scheduled to go into dry dock on April 9, and is expected to be there until May 24, but it will likely be there much later than that. We are left with a car ferry that is nearly 45 years old, and another ferry that was used down at Canso in Nova Scotia. This matter is very important. I think it is more important than anything else for the economy of our province that we have a boat suitable to go across there in the winter.

May I read now something from the paper which I received last night? It says:

> The Abegweit continued Monday to battle heavy ice in Northumberland Strait after a weekend of shattered schedules and fidgety passengers.
> The powerful icebreaking CNR ferry was back on schedule after two tough days of bucking ice floes 10 feet thick in the narrow Northumberland Strait between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.
> Trouble with the ice—described by veteran railway men here as the worst in 15 years—appeared to be lessening, at least temporarily.
> "Saturday and Sunday were desperate," one official said. This community is the Prince Edward Island terminal for the ferry which runs to Cape Tormentine, N.B.
> The 6,694-ton Abegweit, specially designed to batter through the unpredictable ice that funnels through the strait in huge cakes, took up to four hours during the weekend to make the normal 55-minute crossing.
> The 372-foot vessel at one point Saturday inched her way into the ice-crusted dock here, taking two hours to do it. She failed twice to get into Cape Tormentine because of the crazy-shaped ice pans that rammed up into her berth.
> At one time Saturday, the Abegweit veered five miles off course to find a weak spot in the ice. Finally she reached Cape Tormentine, but was unable to dock.

Honourable senators will see that if we are to get our produce across in carload lots we must have a ferry that is capable of fighting the ice floes that are there. That car ferry will take 17 loaded railway cars along with 75 automobiles, and 200 or 300 passengers. A new ferry may not be as elaborate as the one that is there but it should be capable of going through heavy ice. If at any time a causeway is built the ferry can be used between Sydney and Newfoundland or at other places. There are lots of places where it can be used if it is not needed to serve Prince Edward Island.

My honourable colleague from Murray Harbour (Hon. Mrs. Inman) spoke of the hardships that were endured years ago, but that time has passed. We can now fly across the strait in a very short time. I would ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to bring this to the attention of the minister and see what can be done about it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard), the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the honourable senator from Shawinigan (Hon. Mr. Méthot). They impressed me strongly and I shall be only too happy to bring the whole question dealt with by them to the attention of the Government at the earliest possible moment.

With regard to the question asked by the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding), I will read the Hansard report of what he asked me to explain. If I have not already explained it properly I will make a point of getting him a full and complete answer. I will also bring the matter mentioned by the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) to the attention of the Government as soon as I can.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, I have no intention of delaying this house at this late hour. Following the behest of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) I studied the estimates and I did have a few observations to make, but time is getting late and it seems impossible for me to do so now. Consequently, the world will have to wait a little longer for my observations.

I would like, though, to add my support to the suggestion that was made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard) and endorsed by other honourable senators for payment of a pension to ex-Prime Ministers. If I remember correctly, once during the time I occupied the position which the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) now graces so well, I suggested it would be worth while to contemplate paying a pension to our ex-Prime Ministers, particularly in view of what was being done along that line by our leading associates, Great Britain, the United States, Australia and other countries.

As to my general observations on the bill, I did not intend to oppose the estimates in any respect, but there were some items as to which I thought we might learn some useful lessons. However, as I have said, the world will have to wait for my comments.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: When the Senate adjourns today will it stand adjourned until Monday evening or Tuesday evening or shall we be sitting tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Be patient.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: When we reassemble I shall be able to answer the inquiry of the honourable senator from Churchill.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.40 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-26, to amend the National Energy Board Act, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with some amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Amendments read by the Clerk Assistant:

1. Lines 4 to 12. Delete Clause 1.
2. Lines 13 and 14. Substitute for:

"2. Section 99 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:" the following

"1. Section 99 of the National Energy Board Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:"

3. Lines 28 to 31. Delete Clause 3.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: With leave, I move that these amendments be concurred in now.

Honourable senators, as I understand the amendments, clause 1 was deleted from the bill, and clause 2, which now becomes clause 1, is amended to read:

Section 99 of the National Energy Board Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

Clause 3 of the bill is deleted.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am not surprised that these amendments have been made. Honourable senators who were at the committee meeting will recall that the need for the two clauses which have been struck out was questioned, and when the committee report came to this house further criticism was made of the inclusion of the clauses in the bill. The objection to clause 1 was based on the question whether or not the Government was interfering with provincial rights and also if there was any urgency in respect to it. The honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) was not sure whether there was any urgency.

The need for clause 3 was questioned by a number of honourable senators on this side of the house. One of our most experienced senators, the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) remarked that in all his forty years in Parliament he could not recollect the inclusion of such a clause in a bill of this sort. I am sure he was right. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) made a similar observation.

I understand the amendments were proposed by the Government. It paid heed to the fears that were expressed by honourable senators and recommended that the bill contain only clause 2, respecting expiration of the licences.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was a matter of expediency.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There was some urgency as to clause 2. I for one am very glad that in the other place clauses 1 and 3 were struck out, and I think in future the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and his supporters in this house should pay more attention to the views expressed on this side of the chamber.

Amendments concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, as I said earlier this afternoon I am not sure of what we can expect to receive from the other house before the Easter adjournment. The bill with respect to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements may come to us on Tuesday. Therefore I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Monday next, April 4, 1960, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I table the following document:

Report on Patents of Invention, dated December 31, 1959, by the Royal Commission on Patents, Copyright and Industrial Designs. (English and French texts).

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JOINT COMMITTEE QUORUM

Hon. James Gladstone, Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Indian Affairs, presented the first report of the committee:

Report read by the Clerk Assistant:

Your committee recommend that 9 members of the committee constitute a quorum, provided that both houses are represented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be considered?

Hon. Mr. Gladstone: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

DIVORCE

PETITIONS—EXTENSION OF FILING DATE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's 341st report:

The committee recommend that the time limited for receiving petitions for bills of divorce which expired on Wednesday, February 24, 1960, be extended to Monday, April 4, 1960.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be considered?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Honourable senators, I think some explanation is due to those who are not members of the committee. It will be remembered that last year we extended the time because we wanted to ensure that a certain child would be born in wedlock. The situation of children appeals to this committee very strongly, as honourable senators know. At the present time there are three children in an exceedingly difficult position in their homes. I need not go into all the details, and I do not wish to do so; it is enough to say that the extension of the date for filing petitions is being requested on their account and on account of some others as well. There are only about 15 cases where petitions have been filed but not on time. In a single day we could clean up the whole 15 cases if all went on, but obviously that will not happen. Last year when we extended the date for filing there were, if my memory serves me, 18 such cases, and my recollection is that only three or four went on. What the committee recommends is not, therefore, a great matter. I can assure my colleagues that it is, however, a matter of kindness, which is thoroughly justified in the interests of the children. We are not acting on behalf of petitioners or the co-respondents; we are acting on behalf of the children, and no one but the children. That is sufficient to move the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman. We are not asking for very much, and we shall not be taking on very much of a burden if the filing date is extended. I therefore trust that the committee's recommendation will meet with unanimous approval.

Report adopted.

CONSTRUCTION

BUILDING PERMITS

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

What was the total number of building permits issued in Canada each year since 1945
(a) for new residential constructions;
(b) for non-residential constructions?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

Data on the number of building permits issued in Canada each year since 1945 are not available. Statistics on the value of building permits issued in Canada each year since 1945 are shown in the table below.

Value in thousands of dollars of Building Permits issued in Canada

Year	New residential construction	Non-residential construction

CURLING

DOMINION AND SCOTCH CUP CHAMPIONS—TRIBUTE TO VICTORIOUS RINKS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I with to draw your attention to a matter of considerable importance to Canada and particularly to the province of Saskatchewan, namely, an unusual occurrence in the history of that great game of curling. The Richardson boys have not only cleaned up in Canada, but they have also done so in Scotland for the second year. The grandparents and many other relatives of these boys live in the province of Quebec not more than 50 miles from where we are sitting at the present moment.

Another great honour for Saskatchewan is that the ladies from Saskatoon have cleaned up throughout Canada. Joyce McKee skipped the rink from Saskatoon.

So Saskatchewan is really coming into its rightful place in regard to sport, at any rate.

DIVORCE

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved third reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-283, for the relief of Joan Dunn Ostrosky.

Bill SD-284, for the relief of Teresa Greco Caputo.

Bill SD-285, for the relief of William Pinkerton.

Bill SD-286, for the relief of Frank David Cousens.

Bill SD-287, for the relief of Denise Baril Sarrazin.

Bill SD-288, for the relief of Wassily de Krokhaleff.

Bill SD-289, for the relief of Henriette Rioux Beaupre.

Bill SD-290, for the relief of Lillian Olive Robertson Reinhold.

Motion agreed to and bills read third time and passed, on division.

FEEDS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson moved the second reading of Bill S-27, to control and regulate the sale of feeds.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-27 is a revision of the Feeding Stuffs Act, which was last revised in a major way in 1937. The bill at present before Parliament in no way changes the basic provision of the present act. Some technical details respecting registration, standards, packaging, labelling and analysis are not in the bill, although in the present act, but authority is provided for their establishment by regulations of the Governor in Council. This is considered desirable to provide a more ready method of amendment of such details as may be necessary to maintain them in keeping with changing conditions and practices in feed usage. The present act is outdated in quite a number of details, as rapid changes have been taking place in usage and types of feed, so it was felt that the Governor in Council should have the privilege of establishing details as to registration, etc.

The act was originally passed in 1921, the last major revision was in 1937, and I think some small changes were made in 1946.

There has been an increased use of feeds as carriers of therapeutic agents for the control of diseases in livestock. This bill is to regulate the sale of livestock feeds, its main provision being that of requiring that feeds be labelled with a list of their ingredients, and that the prescribed chemical guarantee be registered prior to sale so as to meet certain standards of quality and safety.

The general form of this bill followed the pattern of similar agricultural legislation enacted over the past year or two. The proposed act, to be called "An Act to control and regulate the sale of feeds," and which has as its short title "the Feeds Act," provides for certain changes in the act presently known as the Feeding Stuffs Act.

Section 2 of the bill provides for changes in certain definitions. "Analyst" means a person appointed or designated as an analyst pursuant to section 6. Subsection 1 of section 6, you will note, provides that:

> The inspectors and analysts necessary for the administration and enforcement of this act shall be appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

An analyst may be a person who has special chemical knowledge or one who is able to use a microscopic screen.

Subsection 2 of section 6 provides that:

> The minister may designate any person as an inspector or analyst for the purposes of this Act.

I would point out that the reason for the provision in subsection 1, that analysts and inspectors shall be appointed under the Civil Service Act, is that extra help is needed during parts of seasons, and the minister may designate such persons to help for a short period of time.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I respectfully point out that subsection 2 does not say anything about their appointment for a short time. It says the minister "may designate".

Hon. Mr. Pearson: The honourable senator is quite right. The short period to which I refer might be for a year or two years, depending on the amount of work being done.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Just on that point, I think there is something to be said in support of the objection raised by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall). There appears to me to be a measure of conflict between subsection 1 and subsection 2 of section 6. Are we to understand that the Civil Service Commission is to set the qualifications for these analysts and inspectors? If it does, then it certifies that certain persons are qualified, but as subsection 2 stands the minister may ignore that altogether and appoint people who are not qualified. Subsection 2 reads:

> The minister may designate any person as an inspector or analyst for the purposes of this Act.

I am merely asking for information. The Civil Service Commission certifies certain people as being qualified. It says: "There is the list". Under this clause the minister could ignore the list altogether and make his own appointments. I do not think that is the intention, but that is the power we would give to the minister under this subsection.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Under the present Act there are a number of inspectors and analysts, appointed under the Civil Service Act. They are in no way being displaced offhand in order that somebody else might be appointed.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That would depend on the good faith of the minister in recognizing the individuals certified by the Civil Service Commission. I have not any doubt at all that the present minister probably would do that, but in the course of time he may be displaced and his successor may have different views. On the basis of the information we have at the moment it seems to me that we are really giving the minister quite extraordinary powers.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: I do not think we are discussing the Civil Service Act at this time. Appointments of men to handle this act are made under the Civil Service Act, but the minister, when he wants extra help at certain seasons, may appoint other people without going through the Civil Service Commission. We have a similar situation in the western provinces with regard to the P.F.A.A. Many members of the staff are appointed under the Civil Service Act at the present time, but the Governor in Council, or the minister, appoints a number of inspectors on a temporary basis. They are men taken on from year to year, but that system in no way interferes with the permanent members of the staff. I am just giving that as an illustration.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If I may say so, I do not think the circumstances are analogous at all. As I read this section, the minister could completely ignore the individuals who had been certified by the Civil Service Commission. He does not need to appoint them. True, subsection 1 reads:

> The inspectors and analysts necessary for the administration and enforcement of this act shall be appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Well, if they are appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, how can the minister designate anyone he wishes to perform these duties?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: The only reply I can make to the honourable senator is that this bill will be considered by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and he may get the information there from the officials.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That may be so. I am merely asking for information.

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): Honourable senators, in the present act there is a provision for appointment of inspectors and analysts. In section 2 of the act you will find this definition:

> (g) "official analyst" means any analyst appointed under this act.

And section 9 reads:

> There may be appointed in the manner authorized by law such inspectors and analysts as the Minister may consider necessary . . .

There is no reference to the Civil Service Act in the present act. This is the usual clause that is put into most agricultural inspection acts today. There is usually provision for the appointment of inspectors both by the Governor in Council and by the Civil Service Commission. There is also authority given to the minister to appoint qualified analysts in the event of emergencies when there are not sufficient qualified analysts appointed under the Civil Service Act to do the work that is necessary. As the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Pearson) has pointed out, it may at times be necessary to appoint additional analysts who are not required to be full-time employees.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Referring back to the interpretation clause:

> "Feed" means any substance or mixture of substances containing proteins, carbohydrates, fats, minerals, condiments or vitamins . . .

That definition is similar to the one contained in the present act, but there have been added subparagraphs (i) (ii), as follows:

> (i) for consumption by livestock,
> (ii) for consumption by livestock in combination with other materials.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask a question at this point? I notice that the definition of the word "feed" begins with the words

> ...means any substance or mixture of substances...

It does not exclude anything. The present act, in section 3, excludes from the regulations with respect to the sale of feed whole hays, straws, corn stover and silage when unmixed with any other material; also hulled oats, hulled barley, and so on. According to the definition here everything is going to be included in "feed" under this act and the regulations respecting the sale of feed.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: This was done deliberately, honourable senators, so that the minister or the Governor in Council would be enabled to use discretion under the regulations to indicate the substances and the mixture of substances instead of being restricted to certain types of things. The number of changes now taking place in mixtures would make it necessary to have frequent amendments to keep the act up to date. If each item is not specified the Governor in Council can bring the act up to date as changing conditions warrant.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Where is that power given to the Governor in Council?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: The definition of the word "label" has been changed. Subparagraph (d) of section 2 reads:

> "label" includes any legend, word, mark, symbol or design applied or attached to, included in, belonging to or accompanying any feed or package.

All feeds that are sold at the present time must either have the ingredients of the contents of the package stated on the outside of the package, or in a pamphlet which is attached to the package or which is given away when the package is sold. At one time a brand name was sufficient, but now all the ingredients have to be designated on the package.

Honourable senators will see that section 2(e) defines "livestock" as:

> "Livestock" means horses, cattle, sheep, goats, swine, foxes and poultry...

Mules have been left out. Apparently they have died a silent death in Canada. There are no more mules to worry about, so they have been left out of the bill.

Section 2(h) says:

> "Prescribed" means prescribed by regulation;

In other words, the Governor in Council will prescribe.

Section 2(i) defines "sell" as:

> "Sell" includes sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, have in possession for sale and distribute.

The feed has to be labelled before you sell it. It is not specified that you cannot advertise in newspapers, but if you do advertise in newspapers and do not produce the goods you are liable under the Criminal Code.

Under the heading "Registration," section 3, dealing with the sale and importation of feeds, reads:

> No person shall sell or import into Canada any feed unless the feed
> (a) has been registered as prescribed;
> (b) conforms to prescribed standards; and
> (c) is packaged and labelled as prescribed.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I interrupt the honourable senator to suggest that if it is convenient he might tell us the sections in which changes are being made. I think perhaps we could make more progress in that way.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is a good idea.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: I believe that section 3 is new.

Section 4 is an exception clause. In the present act section 3 is the exception clause. As the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) has said, section 3 of the act specifies whole hays, straws, corn, stover and silage, and so on. The new section 4 reads:

> (1) Section 3 does not apply to feeds sold by an individual grower thereof if they are free from prescribed deleterious substances.

These substances might be the sprays used for killing weeds and pests or they might be certain drugs in the feeds.

Section 4 (2) reads:

> Paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 3 do not apply to any feed consisting of whole seeds or grains of cultivated farm crops.

Next I would like to refer to one paragraph of section 5, under the heading "Regulations".

> The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (i) designating specific animals and birds as livestock for purposes of this act.

The word "birds" is used there instead of "poultry" because of the possibility of some bird such as a pheasant becoming a farm product. The legislation is made inclusive so as to avoid the need for a change later.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is section 5(i) in the present act?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Under "Regulations?"

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: No; there are very few regulations in the present act. Section 4(5) of the act reads:

> When in his opinion the public interest so requires the minister may by regulation provide that only feeding stuffs of the kind or composition specified in such regulations shall be eligible for registration under this act...

There is very little in the act with respect to regulations.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As a matter of curiosity, could the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Pearson) tell us what birds are likely to be designated as livestock?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: For the most part the birds one sees on the farm today: hens, turkeys, geese, ducks and guinea hens.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They are all birds.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Under the heading "Administration," dealing with the powers of an inspector, section 7(1)(b) reads:

7. (1) Any inspector may at any reasonable time (b) require any person to produce for inspection or for the purpose of obtaining copies thereof or extracts therefrom, any books, shipping bills, bills of lading, documents containing mixing instructions, or other documents or papers with respect to the administration of this act or the regulations.

That is, the inspector may at any time require a person whose feed sale room he visits to produce evidence of the goods he has for sale. In a manufacturing plant the person who is making up feeds has in front of him a list which designates the ingredients in those feeds. As these feeds are registered the inspector has been furnished with a copy of what should be in the particular feed being made under the registration plan, so when he goes into a plant he merely has to look at the list to determine whether the manufacturer is living up to the standard required under the particular registration.

Honourable senators, I think for the most part the remainder of the bill deals with seizure, detention, forfeiture, and so on.

The forfeiture is automatic. Subsection 3 of section 8 says:

Where a person has been convicted of an offence under this act, every article by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed is, upon the conviction, in addition to any penalty imposed, forfeited to Her Majesty.

Under the title "Offence and Penalty", section 10, subsection (1) (a) says that anyone who violates any provision of the act or any regulation under section 8(4) is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment,...

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Is there any change from the present section?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes. The present section specifies a minimum of $5 and a maximum of $500. Often if the person under charge committed quite a serious offence he was fined only $15 or $20, which was considered a fair penalty for his misdemeanour, whereas if no minimum amount had been mentioned he might perhaps have been fined, say, $100. The minimum fine is therefore omitted, and only the maximum fine of $500 appears in the bill. Thus the amount of a fine imposed would tend to vary according to the maximum rather than the minimum. I do not think there is any other change than that.

The Feeding Stuffs Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed, and section 14 of the bill says that the new act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

It might be interesting to have some figures—

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Before my honourable friend goes on, may I draw attention to subsection 2 of section 11, which section he did not mention. I admit at once that I am not familiar with the rules of evidence and the character of evidence that should be presented to a judge or a magistrate who might be trying a case. However, subsection 2 appears to me to be rather extraordinary. It says:

In a prosecution for a violation of this act, a document purporting to be the certificate of an analyst—

which I presume would be the basis of proof of the charge—

shall be received in evidence without proof of the signature of the person by whom it purports to be signed and without proof of his official position.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the usual clause in all these bills. If the defendant could prove, by evidence, that the certificate was an improper one, it would not be part of the case. At any rate, it could not be considered as evidence for a conviction.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Of course, in such matters I am somewhat handicapped. As I read this clause, a charge might be laid against an individual, who would be haled before a magistrate or a judge, and the prosecutor could present a certificate as evidence that the individual violated the law. Then, if I read this clause aright, the magistrate or judge would be required to accept the certificate as evidence—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Does my honourable friend think for a moment that under this section a prosecutor for the Crown would dare to produce a certificate that was not signed by a proper person?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If that is the case, then why have this section?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It saves a lot of trouble and expense.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It seems to me to be really rather extraordinary.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let me help out my honourable friend. I used to deal with liquor cases at one time when I was practising law. We used to have a certificate as to the alcoholic content of liquor seized. In 99 cases out of a hundred the lawyer on the other side knew the man who signed the certificate was a qualified person, but if he did not we had to get another certificate, to the effect that he was qualified.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think this is very important, because it may touch the liberty of the subject. A prosecutor may present a certificate which is not from an analyst at all, yet as I read this it shall be received in evidence without proof of the signature of the person by whom it purports to be signed and without any proof of his official position. It may be all right, but it seems to me to be rather an extraordinary section. Perhaps some of the legal gentlemen on this side of the house could make a contribution to the discussion.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Honourable senators, I think that matter can be brought up in committee and dealt with much more easily than here.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I dare say that is right.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: It may have been felt necessary to put that in the bill. The Department of Justice no doubt felt it was better to bring out an entirely new act than to amend the present one.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is this provision in the present act?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: No.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I thought my friend was going to explain to the house all the clauses in this bill which were not in the previous bill. Are there other clauses in this bill which were not in the act and which the honourable senator has not explained?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: As I said at the beginning, there is very little change. The bill before us in no way changes the basic provisions of the existing act. The only significant change is that technical details with respect to registration, standards, packaging, labelling and analysis are not in the bill, although in the present act, but authority is provided for their establishment by regulations of the Governor in Council. This is considered desirable to provide more ready amendment of such details as may be necessary to maintain them in keeping with changing conditions and practices of feed usage.

I have some figures which might be of interest for agriculturists. The total numbers of varieties of feeds registered in Canada are as follows:

Cattle feeds, 1271; cattle concentrates, 313; cattle minerals, 59; diethylstilbistrol, 88; cattle medicated, 21—total 752.

Hogs: complete feeds, 1609; hog concentrates, 214; hog minerals, 43; hog medicated, 313—total 2179.

Poultry: complete feeds, 2046—total, 3096 types.

Turkey feeds: 858.

The firms selling these feeds are scattered across Canada as follows:

Prince Edward Island, 13; Newfoundland, 7; New Brunswick, 23; Nova Scotia, 20; Quebec, 274; Ontario, 370; Manitoba, 51; Saskatchewan, 14; Alberta, 34; British Columbia, 58—total 864 firms.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? As I understand the bill it provides for a great deal of flexibility in prescribing new conditions under regulations. My question is this: In section 2, the interpretation section, there is a definition of "sell", which reads as follows:

> "Sell" includes sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, have in possession for sale and distribute.

I presume that this refers only to interprovincial trade, or trade that is within the jurisdiction of Parliament, and not to intraprovincial trade. Would that be correct?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: I do not know the answer to that question, honourable senator.

Hon. Austin C. Taylor (Westmorland): Honourable senators, I regret that I have not had an opportunity of studying the bill in its relation to the present Feeding Stuffs Act. However, since coming into the chamber I obtained Volume III of the Revised Statutes of Canada in which the Feeding Stuffs Act is set out as Chapter 113.

Having gone quickly over present act and the relationship of the bill to it, without having had an opportunity to study the act in its entirety or in detail, I am, generally speaking, much in agreement with the bill.

As the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson), the sponsor of the bill, indicated, there are few changes other than to bring the legislation up to date. For instance, provision is being made for the Governor in Council to make regulations on matters dealing with a lot of detail work that, in my opinion, speaking as one who has had some experience in the administration of agricultural acts, makes it almost impossible to administer. Under the present act, if certain changes are required to be made in details, the minister has to come before Parliament to have these changes enacted. Many of those details are being removed from the act. There are 22 sections in the present act, but in the bill before us there are only 14. I may say that most of the additional sections in the act deal with matters of minute detail ordinarily dealt with by the minister or by regulations passed by the Governor in Council giving the minister authority to do such things. As an illustration of that, a schedule to the present act sets out in detail many items of feeding stuffs and gives the details of what they must contain. For instance, the maximum percentage of crude fibre in bran, shorts, middlings and mill feeds is specified. Now, changes will be made from year to year in that content, depending on the protein content of the wheat or grain going into the feed, Therefore, I am sure that in the past it has been found difficult to administer the act.

I think I said something a few moments ago about the analysis. The bill makes the same provision in that respect as does the present act. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has brought up a question about the bill. I recall quite distinctly dealing with a similar question in 1957, when I first came to the Senate. While it was not exactly the same provision, it was criticized, but the measure was finally passed. I would say to the honourable senator that the same provision is in this bill. It is section 11(1), which reads:

> 11. (1) A certificate of an analyst stating that he has examined a substance or a sample submitted to him by an inspector and stating the result of his examination is admissible in evidence in a prosecution for an offence under this act, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary is proof of the statement of analysis contained in the certificate.

That provision is in the present act as section 17, and I think it will be found in practically all administrative acts of the Department of Agriculture or those dealing with agricultural matters.

Personally I think this bill is an improvement on the present act. However, I am not going to give it my final approval until I have had an opportunity to study it in detail and compare it with the act. I am sure that the bill has been approved by the officials of the department, and I for one have great confidence in them. I have had a great deal of experience with them and know that they are trying to do a good job in presenting to Parliament legislation that will give the farm people the best administration possible.

I should like to see this bill go before the appropriate committee so that the officials may be called to answer whatever questions need to be asked in connection with the bill.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, before the bill is given second reading I would like to make a few remarks. At the outset may I say that I know really nothing about the subject-matter of a bill which deals with feeds. However, I think it is quite obvious that in this bill we are passing a piece of legislation and at the same time making an act of faith in the minister and the officials who will administer it. This is the kind of legislation which I think Parliament should resist. While it still may be necessary to pass it in its present form, and to sanction the rather extreme provision it contains, I still regard it as an unsatisfactory piece of legislation.

I make that observation because of the extent of the delegation of authority of Parliament which is given by the bill. I make these remarks not in any partisan or political sense, as I am sure all honourable senators will acknowledge. For example, in section 2, the interpretation section, a rather elaborate definition is given of the word "feed". However, paragraphs (d) and (e) of section 5 provide for regulations under which any feed or any person can be exempted from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this act, and for prescribing the form, the composition and other standards for feeds. So regardless of the definitions contained in the bill, power is given to the minister to avoid their application through the regulations.

Some reference has been made to section 6, which provides for appointment of inspectors and analysts. By subsection 1 of that section inspectors and analysts are to be appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Subsection 2 of that section would give the minister blanket power to designate anyone as an inspector or analyst, and a person so designated may act as an inspector or analyst for as long a time as the minister shall prescribe. I do not think that the minister or anyone in his department is going to use that power for the purpose of appointing some improper person. Nevertheless, as has been pointed out, the authority is given, and the inspector who may be appointed in this way has under section 7(b) authority to enter any place in which he reasonably believes there is any feed to which this act applies, and to open any package found therein which he has reason to believe contains any such feed, and to take samples thereof. He can go into almost any place he chooses and open packages. Moreover, he can require any person to produce for inspection, or for the purpose of obtaining copies thereof or extracts therefrom, any books, shipping bills, bills of lading and other documents.

These are some of the very wide powers of inspection given under this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Are they not very necessary?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not arguing that they are not necessary. Perhaps they are, and the department may be able to justify their necessity, as indeed has the honourable senator from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Taylor). But I would make the point that this is an example of the type of legislation that is so loose and gives so much discretionary power, that I think a legislative body such as the Senate should resist its passage. If in the interests of the country and of the agricultural community the measure should be passed, I think we should pass it with full knowledge of what we are doing.

The provisions of section 11 of the bill, which have already been alluded to, are another example of very wide powers. Certainly, I would not wish to see them in many of the statutes which govern the liberty of the subject. I do not think it helps the case to say that similar provisions have been contained in previous acts. The fact that Parliament has made one such mistake is no reason for repetition of the mistake.

As I say, I do not make these comments in any factious sense, and certainly not in a political sense. But it seems to me that in passing legislation such as this we in this chamber ought to know the full effect of our actions. We cannot know the full effect, because the bill gives discretions almost without limit. It may be that, because of the peculiar nature of the work to be done and of the industry itself, such wide discretionary powers must be given. If so, I think it is a matter for the minister and the officials of the department to justify.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my honourable colleague from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has stated the criticism I have of this bill perhaps much more effectively than I could do it. My objection is to the principle involved in the bill, and I simply state my agreement with the remarks he made, that the fact that these powers existed in some previous legislation, which the present bill is seeking to supplant, is no evidence that they are justified.

As a matter of fact, there has for many years been a tendency to delegate the powers of Parliament to boards and ministerial bodies. For the information of the house I may say that some three or four years ago a judge of one of the higher courts, speaking to me about this question, said it was extraordinary the powers that Parliament was delegating to bodies like the Fisheries Board and the Department of Agriculture to make what was really substantive law. That is the practice I am protesting against.

After all, our function is to see that the citizen is protected in all his rights. The mere fact that the extraordinary provisions in the penalty section of this bill should have appeared in previous legislation is not the slightest reason why we should perpetuate them by this legislation. I am rather surprised to hear my good Liberal friend from Westmorland—

Hon. Mr. Taylor (Westmorland): I have had a lot to do with the administration of this type of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —attempt to justify it, if I understood him aright, on that ground.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: However, this bill is going to committee, and I certainly think that these provisions to which exception has been taken should be very thoroughly inquired into there. It is not a light matter to have a man in court subject to a penalty of $500 and six months' imprisonment, or both, if convicted on what may possibly be spurious evidence.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: On the other hand, a farmers' whole herd of cattle might be destroyed because a man sold improper feed. Anyone who did that should be fined $500, and possibly more.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That matter can and certainly should be considered by the committee. I repeat, because we have erred in the past is no justification for erring now.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I would like to ask the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Pearson) if he said that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce is the committee which is to consider this bill.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: No, the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 331 to 340, which were presented on March 31.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, reports adopted.

IMMIGRATION

MOTION TO DIRECT COMMITTEE TO REVIEW DEPARTMENT'S ANNUAL REPORT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 22, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Wall:

That the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour be authorized and directed to review the Annual Report of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, excluding that portion of the Report which deals with the Indian Affairs Branch; and

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) has paid a real tribute to the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour. He said that he has read all its reports covering a period of years, and he appears to think that the committee fulfils a very useful function.

For those honourable senators who were not members of the Senate in 1931 I would like to refer briefly to the restrictions which were then placed on immigration into Canada by Order in Council. Up to that time practically anyone who wished to come to Canada, and who could give proof of a fairly honest background, etc., was admitted, but the Order in Council limited immigration to three classes, namely, bona fide agriculturists, first-degree relatives, persons with sufficient capital to start new industries, and a few others with special qualifications.

I must say that despite the Fascist and Nazi persecutions, very few people came to Canada. In 1938 the Canadian National Committee on Refugees was set up, and I became its chairman. The purpose of this committee was to bring about a greater understanding of the refugee problem, and to instil in Canadians a more sympathetic attitude toward reception of refugees. We had not thought then that we would be looking after actual cases, but the war brought about new problems, and in 1940 about 3,000 friendly aliens were brought out with the Nazi prisoners of war and those known to have Nazi sympathies. Although the British Government did its best to rectify its mistake, it was many years before the last of these refugees were released in Canada. Between 900 and 1,000 were released in the first instance because they qualified under our Immigration Act in having first-degree relatives in Canada, and then very gradually others were released because they might be useful in war industries, in censorship and other vocations. It is hard now to realize how exceedingly difficult it was for people to come into Canada.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) moved a comprehensive resolution in 1946 asking that the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour look into the problems of immigration to Canada, and it was as a result of that resolution that the committee made its findings. The honourable junior senator from Winnipeg said that after reading the reports he found that the committee had been responsible for some very satisfactory amendments to the Immigration Act. We know that the public also acquired a much better understanding of the problem, because there was a great demand for the printed reports.

Perhaps the Senate and the country generally have suffered because that committee has not met since 1953. I was gratified, therefore, when it was proposed that the committee should look into the report of the Immigration Department for last year. I think we are all alarmed over reports in the press of deportations, and I know that many people are living with the threat of deportation hanging over their heads, which certainly cannot be a pleasant experience.

I know that we have profited much from immigration. Many immigrants have brought new skills and set up industries in Canada during the past twenty years. The Mayor of Prescott once said that despite unemployment in the surrounding towns, Prescott had none, thanks to Louis Fischl, the glove manufacturer, who was driven from his home after the Munich Agreement and set up his business in Prescott, where he continues to carry on a very satisfactory industry. British Columbia owes a great deal to the Koerners, who have been wonderful benefactors to the University of British Columbia and have prospered greatly from the use of the once despised Alaska pine, none other than our native hemlock. Saskatoon has welcomed the Mendells and the Polish ham packing industry, and Ontario, of course, has the Bata shoe industry.

I shall always remember a story told by Miss Kaufman, who brought a young Japanese woman with her to Canada. She said that while waiting for the boat at Victoria they drove out to the Butchart Gardens and this young woman said, "Don't these people live far apart?" Miss Kaufman replied, "Oh, they have radios and telephones." The young woman then asked, "Don't they need to work the soil and don't they need these logs that are lying about?" Miss Kaufman said she blushed with shame as she recalled how every twig had to be treasured in Japan. Finally, the Japanese woman said, "You never told me that your country was so beautiful."

In a speech by the President of the Ford Company of Canada, delivered in February 1959, I found many arguments in favour of increased immigration. He said in part:

> Collectively, our immigrants did not come empty-handed. Not only did they bring their skills, but they brought an estimated $600 million into this country. A recent report showed that in the past nine years alone at least 2,500 commercial enterprises have been established by new Canadians, some of which are large industries employing many hundreds of people.
> By every standard, the immigrants are earning their place in our nation. They are contributing a full share to our development and progress. Any small investment Canada may have made in the acquisition of almost 3,000,000 new people is being repaid many times over.

We are all happy that in 1956 the barriers were let down and we welcomed with very little examination thousands of Hungarians. Recently, I think on March 22, the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), the honourable senator from Murray Harbour (Hon. Mrs. Inman) and I attended a wonderful party given by the Hungarians in Ottawa in aid of World Refugee Year. We were entertained by a most charming and talented violinist and we saw fine specimens of handiwork and books, which I fear had been brought out before the days of the uprising. These people are now bending their efforts to help those who are still carrying out a dreary existence in those wretched camps in Europe. I feel exceedingly sorry for those people who were left behind and who saw others accepted without having to go through their own heart-breaking experience.

Our first-degree relative regulations sometimes bring out curious developments. My honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) told me the other day about a young woman in Brantford who had applied to have her sister come to Canada. She was well prepared to look after her sister and had a position awaiting her. When my honourable leader inquired lately whether the sister was coming he was told, "No, she couldn't qualify." She explained that they were children of the same mother and brought up in the same home but were of different fathers. I was thankful to learn that after due consideration, but I expect considerable delay, the sister was passed for admission to Canada. I think sometimes we must appear very hard-hearted. One woman in a camp was asked, "Are you able to go?" She replied: "No, my husband is too old and my child too young. I will have to wait until one dies and the other grows up."

I have received several letters lately which are quite interesting. I would like to read this one which I received from Owen Sound:

> We the people are inclined to think we, as individuals, can do nothing to change a situation with which we do not agree. With this kind of thinking we never can. It must then be the thought patterns which should be changed.
> Why, when we have so much, do we give so little? Why with our plenty are we not more willing to lift the barriers which keep little children, sick folk, and the needy, out of our country and out of our lives?
> It doesn't add up to Christian thinking and we are convinced that Christ did not die that we might be a privileged people.
> This land flows with milk and honey. If we keep ourselves so well protected that there cannot be an out-pouring of our overflow, the human race could become as the dinosaurs—extinct. Why cannot we venture forth with the courage and faith of a Sir William Drake and live?

There are several other letters written in a like fashion.

Honourable senators, I am very pleased that there is a proposal to have our Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour study our Immigration Act. Perhaps in this way we might obtain some reasons for many of the problems by which we are now troubled.

The Progressive Conservative Convention, I notice, adopted the following resolution:

> Whereas a healthy and judicious immigration policy is necessary in order to provide a guaranteed market for Canada's vast natural resources and to reduce our vulnerability in the export market; whereas there are still thousands of refugees desirable as citizens who are not admissible to Canada under current Immigration Regulations; whereas this convention notes with satisfaction the efforts at the United Nations of Canada's Minister of External Affairs on behalf of refugees; that this National Convention of the Progressive Conservative Party recommend to the Government that the Immigration Regulations be amended; to enlarge the categories of admissible immigrants; to re-define the term "refugee" so as to widen and extend the qualifications for admissibility under this category; consider and if deemed advisable increase and extend the existing facilities and personnel for the processing of immigrants in foreign countries.

Honourable senators, I welcome any suggestion that we examine our immigration policy more carefully.

On motion of Hon. Mr. White, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

REPORT OF SECOND 1959 MEETING

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. When will the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group report of the second 1959 meeting be tabled?
2. Will this report be accompanied by a financial report of the 1959 activities of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group?
3. Will the Senate be asked to concur in the basic rules of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group as far as they apply to the Senate, before the Easter adjournment?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. A report of the second 1959 meeting is in draft form and it is anticipated that this report will be ready for tabling in the immediate future.
2. No.
3. No.

CONSTRUCTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wish to make reference to the answer which was given to my inquiry as appears at page 489 of yesterday's Hansard. I asked for the total number of building permits issued in Canada each year since 1945 for new residential constructions and for non-residential constructions. The answer is not complete. I am not blaming the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for the answer. I know it is not his fault, but the fault of the department. I was asking for the number of housing or dwelling units, and what I got was the amounts of money spent on housing, which is an altogether different matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understood the honourable senator to ask for the number of permits. That information is not available, for there is no record.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The inquiry is partly answered, but I wanted to have the figures for ten years separately. That information is in the Canada Year Book for 1959, at page 694, under Tabulation No. 15: "Number of Dwelling Units covered by Building Permits, by Province, (5 years) 1953 inclusive to 1957 inclusive". If the department did not have that information for a year or two the only thing for it to do was to give me the information for the years for which it did have it.

I now wonder if it is necessary to ask my question anew. All I want to know is the number of dwelling units or housing units that have been built during the last ten years. I am not interested at all in the cost of these units; I want to know the number. I wonder if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will convey my representation to whom it may concern.

AUSTRALIAN TRADE AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John G. Higgins moved the second reading of Bill S-28, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Australia.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to implement a new agreement for reciprocal trade with the Commonwealth of Australia. Canada's existing trade agreement with Australia dates from the year 1931. Under it there has been a substantial increase in the trade between the two countries in both directions. However, during the past 28 years there have been important changes in the composition of our trade with Australia and in the tariffs of both countries. It was, therefore, deemed necessary to bring the 1931 trade agreement up to date and adapt it to new trading conditions.

The Governments of Canada and Australia announced their decision to review the 1931 agreement at the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference held in Montreal in September 1958. This review took place in Canberra in March and April, 1959. The resulting new agreement was signed February 12, 1960, in Canberra, and will come into effect when ratified by the two Governments.

It is essential to repeal the act of 1931, and this is done by section 5 of the bill before us. Moreover, the new agreement affects some provisions in other acts pertaining to tariffs, and it is essential to deal with this situation, as is done in section 4 of the bill, which states:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act, or the agreement, and the operation of any other law, the provisions of this act and the agreement shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

From the point of view of Canadian exporters the new agreement contains a number of improvements over that negotiated in the year 1931. Increased safeguards and improved access are provided for a considerable number of Canadian goods in the Australian market. Under the 1931 agreement Australia undertook to maintain margins of preference on a limited number of Canadian products and for most other items to accord Canada British Preferential treatment. There were no bindings or commitments of the actual rates of duty on Canadian goods.

The new agreement provides for a number of additional guaranteed margins of preference and also for the maintenance of free entry or existing low rates of duty on a number of important Canadian products. These include canned salmon, canned sardines, sausage casings, knitting machine needles, office machinery, some chemicals, papermakers' felts, and asbestos.

Minimum margins of preference will be bound on most products of interest to Canada. That is, Canada will be assured a lower rate than the most-favoured foreign country. These include, in addition to all items on which the actual rates of duty have been assured against increase: newsprint, paper board, certain fine papers, most types of lumber, motor vehicles, aluminum and stainless steel.

In the old agreement margins of preference were only given on a few of these items. In the case of motor vehicles and parts, the new agreement confirms that the full preferential tariff treatment now accorded to Canada will be continued. Under the 1931 agreement Australia was not required to grant Canada the same tariff treatment as the United Kingdom on motor vehicles and parts.

A further improvement is effected by a new provision relating to the operation of Australia's so-called by-laws. I refer to Article VII, page 4, of the agreement. Under these by-laws the Australian authorities may by administrative action suspend the normal duties on materials and equipment not manufactured domestically. This also, of course, automatically suspends any preferences. Under the previous agreement Australia was not obliged to consult with Canada about cases where margins of preference accorded to Canada were removed through by-law action. The new agreement provides that where preferences are eliminated through by-law action Australia will afford Canada an opportunity to enter into consultations, and will take into account any representations which the Canadian Government may make.

The new agreement also provides for continuation of the concessions accorded to Canada in the 1931 agreement regarding the determination of value for duty, and I refer to Article V. The Australian customs law requires that inland freight charges from the point of shipment to the point of export must be included in the value for duty. On shipments from Canada, however, duty is payable only on the freight charges which would be incurred if goods were shipped through the nearest point of exit, even if they are not actually shipped through that point. This is an important advantage for Canadian firms located close to the Great Lakes or the Canada-United States border but relatively far from Canadian seaports. For instance, if a motor car is ordered from St. Catharines to be sent to Australia it may be sent from St. Catharines to Vancouver, but the freight there would not be taken into account. The applicable freight would be that to the nearest port from St. Catharines, which is probably Welland.

With respect to Canadian tariffs, the new agreement provides for continuation without substantial change of most of the concessions which were accorded to Australia by the 1931 agreement and by a supplementary Order in Council which became effective on October 1, 1937. It binds in Australia's favour certain reductions dating from 1937 which previously were not bound. It also assures free entry of a few other Australian products not covered by the 1931 agreement, notably raw wool, cleaned sausage casings and raw sheep skins. These three items are already bound free to a third country under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

The new agreement also assures Australia of a continuation of British Preferential tariff treatment by Canada on all items not specifically listed, and of the existing margins of preference on a number of products of particular interest to Australia. However, in the case of dairy products the specific commitments of rates and margins of preference accorded in the 1931 agreement are to be withdrawn. Under the new agreement Canada is committed only to accord Australian dairy products whatever British Preferential rates of duty may be in effect, or any lower rates accorded to a third country.

I do not know if honourable senators understand exactly what is meant by "margins of preference", but when the matter is referred to committee all such information will be made available. I would refer honourable senators to Schedule B, at page 12 of the bill. Under the heading "Rate of Duty or Tariff Treatment" we find that the margin of preference for the British Preferential Tariff is 7½ per cent. That is what Canada gets under the British preference. The most-favoured foreign country must be charged at least 7½ per cent more duty than countries under the British Preferential Tariff. That is the margin of preference.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does the honourable senator say that Canada is to get a preference of 7½ per cent over and above the British Preferential Tariff?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: No. Canada pays only the British Preferential Duty, if any, and any country outside the British Commonwealth must pay at least 7½ per cent more. In other words, if the duty under the British Preferential Tariff is 10 per cent, any favoured foreign country must pay 17½ per cent duty.

There have also been some changes relating to the application by Canada and Australia of anti-dumping duties to one another's goods. The 1931 agreement provided that neither country would be subject to the anti-dumping legislation of the other. However, either country could, after three months' notice, apply its General Tariff in cases where material injury was being done its producers. In the new agreement Canada or Australia may apply anti-dumping duties to one another's goods after consultation and if remedial action is not taken within sixty days. However, except in these circumstances, the two countries would exempt each other from the application of their anti-dumping legislation. The new agreement also contains provisions for consultation between Canada and Australia on matters arising out of the agreement or on other problems of mutual interest. Special procedures are laid down for cases where either country wishes to withdraw concessions. All these are new features of the revised trade agreement. I would refer honourable senators to Article III.

The new agreement should provide a much more satisfactory framework for expanding and diversifying our trade with Australia. Australia is our third largest commonwealth market and seventh largest market in the world. In 1959 our total exports to Australia amounted to $54 million. The leading items which Australia purchases from us are newsprint, woodpulp, lumber, canned salmon and sardines, motor vehicles, aluminum, asbestos, and steel. Canada's imports from Australia in 1959 totalled $41.2 million and consisted mainly of agricultural products such as sugar, dried fruits and wool. Not included in this amount is the large quantity of Australian wool Canada imports from England, to which country Australian wool is sent in order to be processed.

The removal in recent months of most of Australia's import restrictions on Canadian goods in line with decisions reached at the Montreal Conference will open up many new opportunities for Canadian exporters in the Australian market. This is particularly the case with regard to manufactured items which until recently have been severely restricted for balance of payment purposes on account of the dollar exchange. The concessions and safeguards exchanged between Australia and Canada under the new agreement should provide a stable and secure basis for the continued development and expansion of our trade with this sister nation of the commonwealth.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, as you are aware, on the second reading of a bill we are supposed to discuss the principle involved. Unfortunately this bill came to my notice only this morning, so I have not had an opportunity to examine it closely. Therefore I am not really in a position to debate the bill. I do not know whether there is any change in principle. I do recall that, as the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins) has said, an agreement was made with Australia in 1931. It was modified from time to time. I believe that in 1938 or 1939, when I was in the Department of Trade and Commerce and had something to do with matters of this kind, the Australians insisted that someone from Canada should go to Australia to negotiate a new agreement. At that time the agreement—I think I am correct in this—was that in regard to practically all our exports to Australia we should have the British preference. I went to Australia myself at the time and at the first interview I had with the Minister of Trade Agreements —they had such a minister—he suggested that the whole British preference be set aside and that we should negotiate the various items on which they would give us the British preference. That did not suit us at all and our negotiations came to a standstill. We made no progress whatsoever, but I might say that prior to my departure from Australia the Prime Minister intervened and assured me that before I reached home he would give us the benefit of the British preference, which was almost exactly what we had before. That was done and the agreement was renewed at that time.

This is a new agreement and, as I say, I have not had a chance to study it. I do not know whether any consequential changes have been made. At one time we enjoyed a wide trade advantage with Australia, our exports being three or four times greater than our imports. I am not aware whether that proportion applies now, although I believe we still enjoy a considerable advantage in this respect.

The individual items in the agreement can be discussed thoroughly in committee, but I am wondering whether article VII does not interfere with the principle of the existing agreement. I am speaking now almost entirely from memory, which perhaps is not as good as it ought to be, but I thought that agreement assured to us, as long as it was in force, the benefit of the British preference. Paragraph 2 of article VII of the new agreement reads:

> Where the admission of goods under by-law has the effect of eliminating a minimum margin of preference accorded to Canada on goods specified in Part I of Schedule B, the Australian Government will afford the Canadian Government opportunity to consult and will take into account any representations which that Government may make. This undertaking shall not limit the right of the Australian Government to determine whether any particular goods shall be admitted under by-law.

I gather from this that, despite any agreement we may have with Australia now according to us the British preference, the Australian Government maintains the right to terminate or change any part of the agreement. If that is actually the case, I think that is, to a large extent, a change in the principle of the existing agreement.

Honourable senators, I am not prepared to discuss this agreement any further, because I have not sufficient information on it. I shall have to wait for that until the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, for my information, may I ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Higgins) a question? Article VI, clause 1, says:

> Australian goods imported into Canada shall not be subject to the provisions of section 6 of the Customs Tariff of Canada.

What is section 6 of the Customs Tariff of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: The anti-dumping clause.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I desire to make a few comments on this bill. First of all, I wish to thank the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins) for the very careful explanation he has given of this bill. I must admit I was not able to follow all the details which he put on Hansard, but I will read them, so that when the agreement is before the committee I shall be more familiar with some of its intricacies.

I am sure that all of us were pleased to hear the comments of the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), who for many years performed yeoman service for Canada as Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This house is indeed fortunate in having him here at the present time. In committee he will no doubt be able to bring out many points which will clarify this agreement for us.

Personally, I am very glad to take this opportunity to discuss for a few minutes matters of mutual concern between these two sister nations of the commonwealth. Any agreement which has the effect of promoting and creating better trade relations between nations, I am sure all will agree, is a most desirable document.

The honourable senator from Waterloo referred to a conversation he had with the Right Honourable R. G. Menzies. May I also quote a brief statement that Mr. Menzies is reported to have made a short time ago with reference to Canada and Australia:

> It would do us both a great deal of good if Canadians take a part in our expansion.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Excuse me a moment. The Prime Minister of Australia at the time I referred to was not Mr. Menzies, but Mr. Lyons.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Right Honourable Mr. Menzies has served as Australia's Prime Minister over so many years that I took it for granted he was Prime Minister at that time. Similarly, I still think of the Prime Minister of Canada as the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King.

Honourable senators, many comparisons can be made between our two great countries. Each is huge in area and is sparsely populated over a great portion of its territory. Each is engaged in an endeavour to build up industry and to provide the services which are necessary for the support of the industry and the population it engenders in terms of transportation, power, and the like. Equally, each is directly and indirectly concerned with the problem of trade expansion. Both are, in a sense, what I might describe as pioneering countries.

As has already been said, 54 years or more have passed since trade discussions were first initiated between Canada and Australia. Since that time there have been frequent discussions regarding trade, and from what has been said by the honourable senator from Waterloo I think we can assume that these discussions have always been carried out in an atmosphere of friendship.

Under article I of this trade agreement the Government of Canada grants to various Australian agricultural products rates of duty on a preferential basis. Under article II the Government of Australia grants preferential rates to a number of finished products, such as timber and paper, produced in Canada. So far as I know, there has been no major disagreement between the two countries regarding tariffs. I may say also that the two trading partners are fortunate in that in many ways their natural resources are complementary one to the other. For instance, Australia supplies us with sugar; we supply her with canned fish—mostly canned salmon from the western coast, I believe. As I have mentioned, we are in the position to provide Australia with timber, while Australia sends us part of her vast output of wool.

Over the years there has been a healthy and steady growth of trade between Canada and Australia, as was stated by the honourable sponsor of the bill. This growth has been assisted by the trade agreements between the two countries, the last of which was entered into in 1931. Since that time we have witnessed a spectacular economic growth of both countries.

I am sure honourable senators would be interested to know the extent of the tremendous growth in the trade of both countries since 1867. In 1868, when the commodities were, of course, carried in sailing ships, the total trade between Australia and Canada amounted to $38,000. In 1958, 90 years later, the total trade was in excess of $86 million. The sponsor of the bill gave the export figures for 1959. He is more up-to-date in his information than I am. Our exports to Australia in 1958 amounted to $53 million in all. Honourable senators will be interested to know just what goods we exported. They consisted of canned salmon, synthetic textiles, lumber, pulp and newsprint, primary steel, synthetic rubber, basic chemicals, and various machine parts. There may have been some motor cars, but I have no information as to them. In the same year, 1958, our imports from Australia amounted to $33 million, and these, as the honourable senator from St. John's East has stated, are up in 1959. We imported sugar, frozen beef, frozen lamb, other agricultural commodities, and some tools.

It may be of interest to honourable senators to know that one of our Canadian companies, Massey-Ferguson Limited, has one of its largest branches in Australia. Its plant at Sunshine, which is close to Melbourne, covers an area of 2,800,000 square feet. This plant was established as long ago as 1906. I refer to this company because one of its largest operations is carried on in the city of Brantford. The branches in Canada that I know of are located at Toronto, Brantford and Waterloo. There are no doubt others, but these are the largest.

This bill will no doubt be considered in committee. I am rising at this time only to express my support of its general principle, leading as it does toward the freer flow, to the advantage of both countries, of commodities in which Australia and Canada are concerned. We are, as Prime Minister Menzies has said, "trading friends". We share many mutual desires; we are equally concerned with the establishment of settled international conditions leading to world peace. We have great areas to open and frontiers to conquer. Our systems of government are both founded on a common constitutional basis. In supporting the principle of this bill to implement the treaty of 1960, I welcome the opportunity to express my appreciation of any advance which can be made toward increasing the flow of trade between our two countries to the mutual advantage of each partner.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make concerning Bill S-28, an Act respecting a new trade agreement between Canada and Australia. I have read the proposed agreement but have not had time to study it in detail. I have talked to some officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who inform me that the idea of the treaty is to further liberalize trade between Canada and our sister commonwealth nation, Australia.

I have been in close touch with Australian trade for many years and have had many visits from executives of importing companies of that country. The continent of Australia is developing very fast, both in population and industry, and anything that can further develop trade between ourselves and Australia cannot help but be very beneficial to both countries.

As was stated by the honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Higgins), in 1959 we exported to Australia $54,500,000 worth of goods and we imported $41,200,000. So trade between the two countries is in a very healthy position, although this country could bring the trade nearer balance if we imported more. We must remember that foreign trade is a two-way street: if we export we must import. Our exports are of course handicapped by the premium on our dollar. The Australian pound is tied to the British pound.

As the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) pointed out, the products that Australia manufactures are complementary to the products of this country.

Quite a number of years ago I played a part in helping Australia to get its wines into this country. The producers were very grateful for the help I was able to render, which was quite insignificant, and they showed their gratitude in many ways. Australia is an excellent country to trade with as, like Canada, it has very fine commercial laws. I thank the officials of the Departments of Trade and Commerce of both countries, acting under their ministers, for working out this valuable treaty, for I know it took a great deal of time and study.

A commentary on the British budget which appeared in this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail reads as follows:

> Britain is particularly concerned about trade with the commonwealth which has not been going too well. One of Britain's strongest selling points is stable prices for her goods, quite in contrast with the rising price of U.S. goods which we buy in ever-increasing amounts.

Well, if Britain is concerned with regard to intercommonwealth trade we should be far more concerned, for we are more dependent on international trade than England is. I think England depends on international trade to the extent of 16 or 17 per cent of its total trade, but in our case it is 30 per cent.

For the reasons I have stated, I fully support this legislation.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, in the region where I live there are great herds of sheep. There is a lot of work and risk in looking after them, and up to the present time it has not been a very profitable business. Of course, I am familiar with the fact that Australia's grazing season is much longer than ours, that its wool is much superior for some purposes, yet it is a fact that the sheep producers in this country feel that they are working under a very great handicap when they see such large quantities of wool and of lamb and mutton coming into this country. They have often suggested that if these products could be kept out at the season of the year when our lamb and mutton are ready to market they would be very greatly helped.

I may say, honourable senators, that I was a candidate in six elections and the sheep men always said that there would have to be a change of Government in order to keeep out Australian wool, mutton and lamb. I hope now that the Government has changed it won't be long before the sheep men will get some relief.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, I want to make just one brief observation. We have been told that this particular agreement is going to provide for the liberalization of trade. I am a trusting kind of soul and I accept that in a general framework. However, quite frankly, I would like to be able to judge for myself whether the general trend which is illustrated in this schedule is up or down, but I have no way of making any comparisons with the existing rates. I am rising to suggest that the next time such a treaty is brought to this house some additional information should be given which would enable us to make rational judgments on the basis of comparisons not found in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in my earlier remarks I said it was difficult to follow all that the honourable senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins) said about the proposed changes. Perhaps a schedule of the nature to which the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) refers could be prepared for our assistance when the bill is considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Hon. William R. Brunt presented Bill S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have a fairly important announcement to make. It looks as though we may have a short sitting this afternoon, and when we rise every item of immediate importance on our Order Paper will have been dealt with. We shall then adjourn for the Easter recess.

As honourable senators know, the House of Commons is adjourning next Wednesday until April 25. I understand that after the recess the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Bill, which has already been given the first reading in that house, and the Trans-Canada Highway Bill will be proceeded with and may be ready for us toward the end of that week. If we were sitting we might be able to deal with it partially or wholly then. However, honourable senators, I am going to propose that the Senate adjourn for one week longer than the other house and that we resume our work on Tuesday, the 3rd day of May, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

In the circumstances I would like to have unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed more or less expeditiously with these two bills when we come back, without two days' notice of the motion for second reading. I assure honourable senators they will have plenty of time to debate the bills. I expect that the first week after the recess will be a very busy one, as I understand that at least four or five committees will be sitting. On Tuesday morning, May 3, the Committee on Natural Resources will meet to consider the Feeds Bill, to which we gave second reading on Monday evening.

I would like to know if I have unanimous consent to commence proceeding with the two bills I have mentioned when we reassemble on the 3rd of May.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, we all appreciate the difficulties which the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has had in arranging the sittings of the Senate. As he has said, we shall complete this afternoon all the business on our Order Paper with which we can proceed at present, and we shall then be waiting for bills to come from the House of Commons. The honourable leader has concluded that certain business now before that house is likely to be completed and sent to us by May 3, but not before that date. I speak for myself, and I am sure for all honourable senators, in expressing to the Leader of the Government our concurrence in the arrangement he has suggested with respect to an adjournment, and I am sure he will receive the unanimous consent of the house to proceed on May 3 with the two bills he has mentioned.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I thank the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for his remarks, and I take this opportunity of wishing each and every senator a very happy and pleasant Easter recess.

With leave of the Senate I now move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Brunt, that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 3, 1960, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 30, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Cameron, who called attention to Canada's Centennial Year 1967 and suggested "that appropriate steps be taken to mobilize the resources of governmental and non-governmental agencies in making this celebration an occasion to mark the achievements of the past and to plot a course for the future".

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, the purpose of this discussion is praiseworthy. It is time for us to consider the eventuality of the centenary of Confederation, and I must congratulate the initiator of this debate, the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), for having brought this matter to the attention of the Senate. I am also very happy to congratulate the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) upon his most eloquent speech in which he spoke of the Fathers of Confederation and of the admirable work accomplished by the missionaries in the Prairie provinces and in the north. They were worthy successors of those who came more than three centuries ago to bring the benefits of civilization to this part of the world.

Let us be clear about it. It is not the centenary of our nationhood that we shall celebrate in 1967. Confederation took place 93 years ago, and in seven years we shall celebrate the centenary of the British North America Act of 1867. It is very important that there be no misunderstanding about that point.

What about our nationhood? What do we have? I remember reading that approximately fifty or sixty years ago—a long time after the British North America Act came into force—Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was then Prime Minister of Canada, said: "Canada is a nation". Everybody listened to him and cheered him because he acknowledged the fact that Canada was then a nation. But it was not absolutely a nation, an independent nation, a sovereign nation; it was a nation, a group of men with common ideals living in a definite territory and hoping the best for the future. We were together, we were a nation. But Sir Wilfrid did not say that we were a sovereign nation. He could not have said that.

Then in 1931 the Statute of Westminster was passed, one of the thousands of statutes of Westminster. Twice in the parliamentary history of England there were certain statutes that bore the name of statutes of Westminster. In this case, in 1931, the dominions were given some kind of equality by the British Parliament with the United Kingdom. But then again we did not have full nationhood and we do not have it yet, for if we celebrate the centenary of the British North America Act we must consider the act as it is in force now. Although some sections must be considered as spent—to use the legal expression—they exist nevertheless. The reason why I say, in all honesty and in all humility, that Canada has not reached the full status of a sovereign nation, is that section 56 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> Where the Governor General assents to a Bill in the Queen's Name, he shall by the first convenient Opportunity send an authentic Copy of the Act to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and if the Queen in Council within Two Years after Receipt thereof by the Secretary of State thinks fit to disallow the Act, such Disallowance (with a Certificate of the Secretary of State of the Day on which the Act was received by him) being signified by the Governor General, by Speech or Message to each of the Houses of the Parliament or by Proclamation, shall annul the Act from and after the Day of such Signification.

Honourable senators, can we say that we are a sovereign nation when our legislation can be disallowed within a certain period by the Government of the United Kingdom? There is a contradiction. It seems to me that from now on—

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I wonder if I may ask the honourable senator a question. As I understand it, under the Statute of Westminster the Queen of England ceases to have any sovereignty over Canada or any of the Commonwealth nations. Her Majesty is now the Queen of Canada, as far as we are concerned, is she not? I understand that is the point.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable senator for his interruption, and I agree that Her Majesty the Queen is designated or described as the Queen of Canada at the present time. But section 56 of the British North America Act has not been changed since Confederation, as my honourable friend knows very well. The only difference now is that the statute book for each session is not, as formerly, sent to the British Government by the Clerk of the Parliaments, who is the Clerk of the Senate, but by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The same procedure is followed, the only difference being that it is another gentleman than the Clerk of the Parliaments who sends our statute book to the Colonial Secretary in England. The fact that it is sent by Canada to the United Kingdom remains the same, and as long as that is done, whether Her Majesty the Queen is called the Queen of Great Britain, Ireland and her other possessions beyond the seas, or the Queen of the United Kingdom and of Canada, makes no difference at all. Our statute book is sent by one of our cabinet ministers to the British Government, and my honourable friend knows it very well.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt my honourable friend, but I am not quite sure about something he said. Does he say that under the British North America Act, as at present constituted, it is possible for the British Government—I am not speaking of Her Majesty the Queen—to veto legislation of the Canadian Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Surely. I am glad to answer the honourable gentleman, and I thank him for his interruption. I am open to interruptions—nothing delights me more, because from discussion comes light. The imperial statute which is the Constitution of Canada contains provisions that have not been changed since 1867. Section 56 is one of them. We are here to discuss the matter. I am open-minded and can express my views, and others can express their views. It is only by discussion of a matter that all of us can come to a satisfactory conclusion.

Hon. Mr. Monette: May I put a question?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Just a minute, please, until I finish answering the honourable senato from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler).

In this case we have the law as it was 93 years ago. In the meantime there was passed the Statute of Westminster, which was created with fanfare and drum beating. This section is in contradiction of all that has been said by all our statesmen concerning the independence of Canada, because we are tied by this provision to the old tradition. That is so much the case that our statute book is sent each year by Canada to Great Britain. If Canada had stopped sending the statute book to the British Parliament I would say, well, perhaps there is a hope that we have made progress. But, I repeat, the same procedure is followed, the only difference being that it is the Secretary of State for External Affairs, not the Clerk of the Parliaments, who sends the statutes. The main fact is still there. It is colonialism in full. I cannot deny it. The first thing we have to do is to amend the Constitution, not just to see about the retirement of judges, but to take it out of the British legislation. We must see that an address is sent by the Canadian Parliament to the British Parliament in order to change that provision in our Constitution. That is the first step toward determining that Canada has reached the status of a nation. I hope my honourable friend is satisfied with my explanation.

Hon. Mr. Euler: My honourable friend said that the statutes passed by the Canadian Parliament must be sent to some minister in Britain, but does it follow that the British Government can veto—probably "disallow" is the correct word—legislation passed by this Parliament? I think my honourable friend's answer was that it can.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I will answer you, perhaps not with clarity but with honesty, and you cannot ask for much more than that. The British Government has unquestionable right to disallow our legislation, according to the provisions of the Constitution, but it would not dare to do so—it would be afraid to do so. But it has the legal power to do that. That is my contention. I cannot say more than that.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is enough.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It is my contention and the conviction that I expressed in editorials that I wrote for La Presse many years ago, when Mr. Lapointe was Minister of Justice, and I had the good fortune to discuss the matter with him. Now I try to be as sure as possible of my facts; but the matter is of great importance, and we have so many times beaten the drum for this thing that it is high time we faced the situation as it really is.

If my honourable colleague from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) has a question to ask, I will be glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I am not for the moment trying to contradict the conclusion of the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), but in an edition of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1951, published by the Queen's Printer, Ottawa, I notice that note 25, under section 56, states:

> The present constitutional position is that the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to dominion legislation.

And there is a reference to page 20 of the report of the Conference on the Operation of Dominion Legislation, etc.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Is there a reference to the year?

Hon. Mr. Monette: It would be 1930.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Before the statute of Westminster?

Hon. Mr. Monette: I am not vouching for the accuracy of this note, but merely calling attention to it. I may have a word to say, or I may not, after the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has given his answer. I would ask the honourable senator if he has considered that position, or if he will do so and let us have his comments on it. I admit that the statement in the conference's report has not the authority of a regular amendment to section 56, nor of a decision of the highest court; nevertheless, I thought I should bring it to the attention of the honourable senator in view of the question he has raised, which I acknowledge to be a very important one.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank my honourable colleague for his remarks. I have considered the whole matter. The honourable senator will remember that every time there was an Imperial Conference the delegates who attended it were always beating the drums. True, they had gained more and more, but it was a very long process.

My contention is that all those who speak on constitutional matters should be honest in expressing their ideas and should not claim that we have more rights than we really have. If we have reached the status of national sovereignty in our ties to the British Crown—the Queen of Canada, if you like—we should leave no stone unturned to prove that it is a fact and that there is nothing that could come in conflict with our contention. In the present case, to stop all discussion, the only way to proceed is to follow the usual practice and see to it that an address is sent by the Canadian Parliament to the Parliament at Westminster asking it to amend the British North America Act by repealing section 56. Then there will be no ambiguity.

Well, honourable senators, that being said, in the meantime there might be some element of doubt which would be humiliating for Canada, especially for all those who on the first day of July, on St. Jean Baptiste Day, on St. Patrick's Day, on St. George's Day and on St. Andrew's Day claim that Canada is a sovereign nation. Up to now the doubt, if there is any, is against us.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Will the honourable senator permit me to interrupt him? I understand the remark made by the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) was to the effect that what he read was a comment only and did not change the law.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank you, sir, and I appreciate what you say. I do not know who wrote the note. It may have been written by some minor clerk. Anyway, it is there, and the Queen's Printer printed it. It is there without any signature. What counts is legislation passed by Parliament, sanctioned by the Queen, or orders in council sanctioned by the Governor General and published in the Canada Gazette—in so far as the orders in council are intra vires.

My second point is that if by civilization we mean central heating, plumbing gadgets and fixtures, electric stoves, refrigerators, etc., we have attained a higher civilization than any other country except the United States and are just about on the same level as the American people. If that is what civilization and progress mean I will leave it at that because I can suggest nothing more than what is on view at the present time in these matters.

I shall come in a moment to the suggestions that were made by my honourable friend from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron). First, I would suggest that we should not wait until 1967 for the celebration of the centenary of the British North America Act—calling it by its proper name. We must start right now, and what I have to suggest will not cost the country anything. My suggestion is that we revert to fundamentals. It is a very simple thing. I will not insist on culture, because what is meant by culture is very often superficiality. I mean that the education should be on a solid foundation, in the manner so well expressed by the honourable senator from L'Acadie (Hon. Mr. Savoie) not so long ago.

It is quite noticeable that immediately after the conquest, after the fall of Quebec and Montreal to the British army, when our forefathers had become British subjects, there was more patriotism than there is now, at a time when we claim we are a sovereign nation. One must remember the admirable parliamentary battles that were fought by our forefathers for responsible government. They were independent Canadian citizens, as we are called today, and they were British subjects. Canadians like Papineau, and Lafontaine, and English-speaking Canadians like Joseph Howe, Baldwin, and many others at various times, were British subjects, and they were prouder of Canada than we are. Canada was their only country, the country of their choice and their love. Now we have fallen so deeply into internationalism that we have become citizens of the world. It is so much the case that a clergyman from Toronto wrote to me suggesting that we should have two flags, namely, the British Union flag, to which I do not object, and the flag of the United Nations. Imagine the flag of the United Nations being the flag of Canada! That is the spirit of today. Those who travel to conferences in all parts of the world remind me of delegates of the railway unions who are sent abroad as champions of internationalism.

The difficulty with us now is that Canada is far from being a country with the good foundation in public affairs that it had in our forefathers' day. There is too much internationalism today.

We talk and hear a good deal about culture. What is being achieved by way of culture in our universities? It is the power to bring about the destruction of the world in the near future; they are busy trying to discover new methods of destruction. Well, if that is culture, I am not for it. Honourable senators, what is culture? To me culture is beauty and art; beauty in sculpture, in literature, in poetry, in painting. But what do we have now in these times of so-called culture? I notice that tonight in this city a titled gentleman is to give a lecture about the manufacture of horrors in Great Britain. This is an advertisement of it, if anyone is interested.

We talk about civilization too. I say our civilization is on the regress. How many people have I known in my long parliamentary career who have not had much education, but who were highly civilized and perfect gentlemen! It is not necessary to have completed a secondary school education to be a civilized man. There are many men, and women too, who know how to read and write—and some who may not even know that—who are highly civilized, but they are not cultured. Therefore, civilization is much preferable to culture as it is understood and talked about these days.

My third point is to remind my honourable colleagues of the meaning of the word "philosophy". Philosophy is not at all the teaching of Will Durant, or the recitation of all the silly dreams of the psychologists like Freud and others. Philosophy is the love of wisdom; and for those who have had an active public life, those who have had to debate important national questions, the most important part of philosophy is logic and dialectics. That part of the great science of philosophy is not well taught in our institutions of learning. So much is that the case that the world gives the impression today of being upside down.

Honourable senators, having said that, I turn, in all deference, to the most eloquent speech made on Wednesday last by the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron). He spoke of the size of the country, which is very large, and of our population, which is relatively small, but which is much larger than it was in 1867. He spoke of Canada's being a middle power. He said:

> ...Canada wished nothing for herself except peace and prosperity, or to sacrifice her reputation for impartiality by being tied on the one hand, to the policies of the United States and, on the other, to the Atlantic involvements of NATO. Certainly she can't have it both ways.

And that is true, if the United States does not agree with NATO.

But, there is a third consideration, which has been overlooked. It is that Canada should be herself. A moment ago I mentioned the discrepancy which exists in our Constitution. There is more to it. The honourable senator mentioned the Canadian Citizenship Council. What is it? He knows very well that in this country we have three citizenships. Each one of us is a British subject; each one of us is a Canadian citizen; and each one of us, we are glad to learn, is a citizen of the commonwealth. Why was commonwealth citizenship created? It was because India, Pakistan and some other countries did not want British citizenship. Therefore, we have three nationalities. It is a great wealth. Last year when I asked a question about the number of Canadians who were British subjects and who were Canadian citizens and who were citizens of the commonwealth I could not get a satisfactory answer. That was for the very good reason that under the Canadian Citizenship Act one who is a Canadian citizen is also a British subject and, moreover, is also a citizen of the commonwealth. What can the Citizenship Council do about it? They meet and say we are Canadians, and some others say we are British subjects. I remember an old correspondent of the London Times who said: "I will never apply for a citizenship certificate in Canada." He did not need to apply for it. He was already a Canadian citizen according to the law.

When we think of it, we realize that we have a Citizenship Council which makes no progress. We are tied. The status of any inhabitant of Canada has not changed from the year of the conquest, 1760, to the present time. It is the same thing. If we are to have pride in our citizenship we should be Canadian citizens, and those who are British subjects should admit that they are Canadian citizens and should not be ashamed of that. I am sure that Her Majesty the Queen is proud of being the Queen of Canada, as she is proud of being the Queen of England.

But this is a matter which is difficult to discuss, on account of the latent and persistent prejudices that exist. Let all Canadians and all men and women in Canada now call themselves Canadians, and let us initiate legislation by virtue of which those who come here in the future years, whether from the British Isles or elsewhere, shall be entitled to all the rights that are bestowed on newcomers from any country, but shall not be able to exercise any public right unless they are nationalized Canadian citizens. That would be real citizenship, and that would be a justification for the Canadian Citizenship Council. Up to now it has had no reason for existing. What I am proposing is difficult. There may be many objections. Some people may complain about it, and be ashamed and embarrassed, but it seems to me to be generous to take as our fellow citizens all those who are in Canada at the present time, and pass legislation for those who will come here later.

People are surprised that we have no Canadian flag. We have a national anthem which has been played in many countries of the world outside of Canada, even outside the British Commonwealth, and behind the Iron Curtain, as a tribute to Canadian sportsmanship. I was deeply moved by broadcasts from the Antipodes when I heard O Canada played to celebrate the victories of our sportsmen and sportswomen who had gained success and victory outside of Canada. But what about the flag? The flag is the emblem of the country. As I said before the Flag Committee of both houses in 1946, I have no objection to the Union Jack with the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew and St. Patrick—a full-sized Union Jack—as the emblem of Canada, as an emblem of our country, to show that we have made no progress, and that we are still the same colonials that our forefathers were years ago. But I strongly objected to the Red Ensign, and for very good reasons. I cannot understand how some people of English parentage have agreed to reduce the Union Jack to one-quarter of the flag. They have minimized it. I strongly object. I am sorry to say that my conclusion is that we have not reached a time when we can have our own flag. We must first have our nationality. Canadian citizens must be the only ones to exercise public rights in this country. It must be decreed by law, and then we shall be qualified to deserve a flag of our own. But what shall it be? I have made one. We see images in school books and alphabet books to give ideas to the children. In most books for children there are pictures to draw their attention and imagination to the text.

I have offered a proposal. It is a green maple leaf on a red background. The green maple leaf is the colour of the House of Commons. The red background is the colour of the Senate. The idea of the flag is a national emblem. The maple leaf is green and it should be green for the flag. When it is red or yellow it has fallen to the ground and is dead, but the green maple leaf is high above our differences of opinion. It is high enough to be seen and high enough to be respected. However, the colour is immaterial. One may choose the colour he likes, but the idea in the flag is to have a national emblem large enough to be well seen when it flies over public buildings and private houses. If we have a flag it will have the same effect as the national anthem. A national flag will rally all Canadians in this country and elsewhere. It will have its place in churches as well as in public squares, just as the Union Jack is seen in Westminster Abbey, the American flag in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York and the French flag in Notre Dame de Paris. Why? Because the flag is a reminder of the country, provided that one has a country of his own and provided, in the case of Canada, that the Canadian citizen likes Canada more than any other country in the world. And, mark you, honourable colleagues, how often have I been given the cold shoulder in the House of Commons when I was called a nationalist and an isolationist because I was expressing my sincere and honest views, on behalf not of myself but of future generations? I am proud of my country, and I want the coming generations to be as proud of their country when they grow up.

Shall we have a flag in 1967? Shall we have a national anthem? Shall we have Canadian citizenship in full? The purchase of new flags would not cost any more than the purchase of current flags. It is a small item when we consider expenditures. And in all this the Senate could accomplish something wonderful. There has been a tendency to consider the Senate as a "country cousin". It is not always on a par with the House of Commons in the minds of some people. This is most unfortunate. I have great hopes for the future of the Senate. If according to the spirit of the Fathers of Confederation, the Senate is true to its destiny, it will survive by virtue of the law of the survival of the fittest, and I shall not be surprised if some day the Senate is rewarded for its accomplishments. Naturally, all of us will have to work hand in hand, as we did for the material improvement of this chamber. It was not done by one, it was done by all of us together, and it was impossible to please all in this room. We now have a new ventilation system. It was once impossible to read a document here. Now with better lighting we can read easily. It used to be impossible to hear each other. Now there is a great improvement in the acoustics, owing to the amplification system. We had a rug that was filled with holes, that was worn out, but the attention of the Senate was drawn to the fact that Her Majesty the Queen was coming and a new rug was purchased. The walls were dirty, and they have been cleaned. Hung on the walls were the horrible pictures. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) suggested that we should have galleries on both sides of the Senate in accordance with the plans that were made years ago but which have never been put into effect. What he said was full of sense. Now people who do us the honour of coming and listening to our speeches see that the Senate chamber is clean, in good order and attractive. The improvement was brought about by common effort, and I am glad to praise the honourable senators who were responsible for it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think the improvement in the Senate chamber is a live topic today. Would the honourable senator tell us whether he is in favour of having a centenary celebration in 1967 or not? And if he is, would he give us his ideas as to what we should do?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable gentleman, whom I like very much, for his interruption. Let me answer him in all candour. The honourable senator from Banff suggested building construction that would cost an enormous sum of money, and he was not called to order, because what he said was within his notice. I am surprised that the honourable leader wonders whether I am in order when I make a small suggestion on our behalf, since so many suggestions have been made on behalf of others. But I am sure he will not insist upon it.

I will not take one by one the suggestions of the honourable senator from Banff and others; but let us be reasonable and let us not try to create a new organization for the national centenary, because it would be another Crown corporation.

And we must be very careful about education. Education is under the jurisdiction of the provinces, because the provinces are closer to the fathers and mothers of Canadian families—and we know that parents have the right to decide about the education of their children. That is an unquestionable right. If jurisdiction over education were at Ottawa it would be too far away to be practical.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? Is it not true that I was careful to emphasize that elementary and secondary education should continue to remain the responsibility of the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Well, to a certain extent. Probably my friend may have said that, but it is not enough. There will be no restriction on parental authority with regard to education until the students reach their majority. Then they can make their own choices, but in the meantime they are under the authority of their parents. What has been mentioned with regard to education in the British North America Act was well thought out by the Fathers of Confederation. I would suggest that my honourable friends read the masterly speech made very recently in the House of Commons by Mr. Noel Dorion, the member for Bellechasse; it is more enlightening than any remarks that I may make on the subject.

I hope my honourable colleagues have understood my point of view; it is the point of view of honesty, though they may or may not agree with me.

Before concluding, may I do something I have never done before, namely, read a newspaper article. This is an editorial which appeared not long ago in one of the best Canadian dailies, the Chronicle Herald, of Halifax, under the heading "A Father Figure":

In the current issue of The Dalhousie Review, retired Nova Scotia engineer and industrialist T. G. Mackenzie presents a convincing case concerning a necessary but long-ignored ingredient for this country's nation-building effort.

What we need, says Mr. Mackenzie, is the development in the mass public mind of the image of some one man as "The Father of Canada", some one who can match the United States' George Washington, Venezuela's Simon Bolivar, France's Joan of Arc, Scotland's Bruce and Wallace, and so on.

"It is precisely because Canada is a mosaic, a nation peacefully blending many peoples of diverse ethnic origins," he submits, "that we need to emphasize and iterate in our historical background some common rallying point, some symbol of unifying influence, which is distinctively and exclusively Canadian."

How true! The people of this country have been talking for years about creating a truly Canadian entity, the promotion of a Canadian culture, the designing of a distinctive national flag and the writing of a fitting national anthem, and hopelessly wandering in all of these fields. And the main reason, we are coming to believe more and more, is that we have failed to put first things first. We have neglected those factors that fire the human emotions and stir the human pride which in turn would produce the other earmarks of a nationhood of our own. And chief among these basic requirements is that for which Mr. Mackenzie pleads.

That is why Canadian youth knows all about Wyatt Earp, Jim Bowie, and other heroes of the early American West, real and unreal, whom television has resurrected, but are completely stumped when asked about a man named Mackenzie King.

I was astounded to hear on a recent television broadcast that when some young students in Toronto were asked by a C.B.C. interviewer who Mackenzie King was none were able to say.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Where was that?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: In Toronto. They were ignorant of Mackenzie King.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It could not possibly be.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: My honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) of course is excluded.

I continue reading:

We have failed to heed the advice that one of our own Nova Scotia heroes, Joseph Howe, left with us:

"A wise nation ... decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead ... and fosters national pride and love of country by perpetual reference to their sacrifices and glories of the past."

There have been some efforts in this direction; but so often they have been half-hearted and, to apply modern slang, half-baked. Witness the C.B.C. series on Radisson, and the current TV series that was supposed to stir us to a new pride in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Mackenzie, after going through a long list of giants in the political, exploration and other fields of our history, offers in nomination as "The Father of Canada" Samuel de Champlain. It is a good one. It was he who helped to establish at Port Royal the first permanent white settlement on this continent north of Florida, who founded Quebec, who was responsible for the beginnings of the famed band of coureurs de bois who made possible the westward exploration of what is now Canada, who spent thirty years living in this country, planning, promoting and building for its future, and finally dying here in the midst of this endeavor. He was in effect Canada's first permanent white citizen.

And then there are others who are worthy of consideration, men who, although coming later than Champlain, also left sharp imprints on the pages of history. Leaders like Sir John A. Macdonald, father among the Fathers of Confederation, and Alexander Mackenzie, the first to cross this country from sea to sea by land. Any of these, or certain others, could be accepted with special pride and reverence by all Canadians. Why not then a definite national movement to build one into "The Father" of this land, one around whom we in this multi-racial country can weave the pattern of Canadianism so vitally needed? It is something to strive for as we approach our 100th anniversary.

And now, honourable senators, to conclude: If the Senate is true to its mission and fulfils its destiny, before 1967 it will be awarded the Nobel Prize.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, I pay due respect and make obeisance to the erudition of my very learned friend the honourable senator from Rivière du Loup. I am aware that Rivière du Loup is not his proper designation, but as I am not sure of the correct pronunciation of his designation. I hope the name of his city, which I have used, will be accepted.

In my opinion, honourable senators, the British North America Act must now be read in the light of the Statute of Westminister of 1931. The British North America Act exists now, I humbly submit, only as a charter to define the rights of Canada and of the provinces. That is why the Statute of Westminster sets out that the British North America Act cannot be changed or amended. Section 7 (1) of that statute enacts:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

I presume this was done with the consent of the Canadian statesmen present at the imperial conference in order to bring forth the Statute of Westminster.

I presume there is nothing to stop the ten provinces, together with the federal authority from saying that they want the whole of the British North America Act wiped out, and there is no doubt that if they expressed this wish in suitable form it would be complied with. The British North America Act has been amended many times with the consent of all the parties concerned. But unless that is done, the British North America Act will exist for the sole purpose of regulating the relationship between the federal authorities and each of the provinces.

Section 7 (2) of the Statute of Westminster states:

> The provisions of section 2 of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the Legislatures of such provinces.

And section 2 (1):

> The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the Parliament of a dominion.

For more than forty years, I have not seen that particular act which gives the British Parliament the right to declare any act of a colony void and to set it aside. But that has no relation to Canada now.

Section 2 (2) of the Statute of Westminster provides:

> No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the Parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such act, and the powers of the Parliament of a dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the dominion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But those words do not apply to the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, they do.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My friend has read from section 7 of the Statute of Westminster, but I submit those words do not apply to the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I say that the British North America Act has specifically been taken out of the statute. One must presume that, because the British North America Act is the only regulatory act between the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the various provinces. In my humble submission, the B.N.A. Act is purely regulatory.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Let me read subsection 1 of section 7 of the Statute of Westminster:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

What troubles me is that the British North America Act remains in effect and cannot be subject in any way to the wording of the Statute of Westminster.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: But it must be remembered that at the time the British North America Act was passed, the Queen was then the Queen of England. She is now the Queen of Canada. That is the effect of what I say.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For practical purposes, what the honourable gentleman has said may be correct.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: There is nothing to stop the federal authority and the ten provinces from getting together and deciding to annul the British North America Act. As a matter of fact, I say the B.N.A. Act is a nullity now, because if Canada wants to change the act it has only to ask, and consent will be given immediately. That act exists only as a charter for the regulation of matters between the federal authorities and the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question of my honourable and learned friend? If I as a senator of Canada sponsor a motion for the repeal of section 56 of the British North America Act, will my honourable friend support the motion or oppose it?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I thank the honourable learned senator for calling me "learned", but so far as section 56 is concerned I am in a lamentable state of ignorance. Do tell me, what is section 56? I have not read the B.N.A. Act for ages, so I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: With all deference, I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that he adjourn the debate at this time. We shall talk the matter over, and he may be the first to resume the debate when this house convenes again. In the meantime I will show him section 56, and we can discuss it and come to some amicable arrangement.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You hope so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Adjourned sine die.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I quite agree with the suggestion that I adjourn the debate. It will at least give me an opportunity to find out what section 56 is.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Higgins, debate adjourned.

FEEDS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-27, to control and regulate the sale of feeds, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate with one amendment.

Amendment read by the Clerk Assistant:

Page 3, line 4: After the word "any" insert the word "qualified".

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Explain. There was an amendment made to this bill. I can explain the amendment, but as I did not introduce it I do not feel it is my place to give an explanation. Surely some other honourable senator is better qualified than I am to explain it, but if no one else will do so, I will.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is a very simple amendment, but I have not a copy of the bill before me.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, as the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has stated, it is a very simple amendment. Clause 6 (2) of the bill reads:

The minister may designate any person as an inspector or analyst for the purpose of this act.

The honourable senator from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Taylor) proposed the insertion of the word "qualified" after the word "any".

Hon. Mr. Farris: Who would determine the inspector's qualifications?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: The minister. Whenever it is desirable to have an analysis made, instead of sending samples to Ottawa the minister may have the analysis made by a local person whom he appoints as an inspector. This amendment requires that the person so appointed be qualified.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What puzzles me is why the committee would consider that the word "qualified" is necessary. It suggests that otherwise the minister might appoint an unqualified person.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is a point.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I thought it was bad draftsmanship, but we did not consider that much difficulty would be encountered.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As the departmental representative explained in committee, the minister would appoint a person who has been qualified under the Civil Service Act or a provincial act. In any event, the person appointed should be qualified. The committee therefore felt that instead of giving the minister power to appoint anyone, his power should be limited to appointing a qualified person, and for that reason the word "qualified" was inserted in the bill.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 342 to 362, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DRUG ADDICTS

NOTICE OF INQUIRY RE TREATMENT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I give notice of the following inquiry for Thursday next:

1. Following the announcement made by the Honourable the Minister of Justice on his recent visit to the British Columbia Penitentiary suggesting some form of treatment of drug addicts by the provincial Government of British Columbia, has any such proposal been made officially to the British Columbia Government?

2. If so, have the provincial authorities of British Columbia indicated any real interest in the matter or agreed to a proposal of treatment as suggested by the Honourable the Minister of Justice?

May I be permitted to make just one statement? I feel sure that all honourable senators will be very pleased that the announcement as appeared in the press is along the lines of the report of the Senate committee on narcotic drug traffic in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PORT MANN TO ABBOTSFORD AND CHILLIWACK, B.C.

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Has the federal Government entered into any agreement to assist the provincial Government of British Columbia for the construction of a new highway as part of the Trans-Canada Highway from Port Mann to Abbotsford and Chilliwack?

(a) If so, what financial assistance or share of the construction of this new highway has been agreed upon by the federal Government?

2. If any financial assistance for the new portion of the Trans-Canada Highway has been agreed upon, will such assistance be over and above the amounts already granted on the present Trans-Canada Highway from the Pattullo Bridge to Abbotsford?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: The following is the answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry:

1. Yes. The route designated under the Trans-Canada Highway Agreement is in part as follows: "by-passing the city of Chilliwack on the south to the Vedder Canal, thence along the Sumas Prairie through Delair, by-passing Abbotsford to the south, thence westerly on a route to be determined to the south end of the Second Narrows Bridge". The section "on the route to be determined" does cross the Fraser River at Port Mann. Under the terms of the agreement Canada is sharing 50 per cent of the cost of construction for an equivalent two-lane highway.

2. No. Any contributions made on the highway from the Pattullo Bridge to Abbotsford will be refunded to Canada.

CONSTRUCTION

HOUSING UNITS

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, on Tuesday, April 5, 1960, as reported at page 499 of Hansard, the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) asked for further information to that provided in the answer to his question which appears at page 489 of Hansard. The honourable senator's original question was understood to ask for the number of building permits issued for new residential and non-residential construction in Canada. Since the number of permits issued by municipalities is not maintained, the value of the permits issued was substituted.

It appears from the honourable senator's reference to this inquiry, at page 499, that what he desires is the number of dwelling units, or housing units, which have been completed. This information is in the Canada Year Book for 1959, at page 700, under tabulation No. 18. This is more complete than that shown under tabulation No. 15 on page 694 of the Canada Year Book for 1959, because not all municipalities have uniform building permit laws and in some areas permits are not required. I would therefore ask leave of the Senate to have this additional information printed in Hansard as a supplementary answer to the honourable senator's inquiry.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The information requested is:

	Completions of new dwellings*
1946	60,459†
1947	72,218†
1948	76,097†
1949	87,533†

1951	81,310
1952	73,087
1953	96,839
1954	101,965
1955	127,929

PRESIDENT OF FRANCE

ADDRESSES AT STATE LUNCHEON IN HONOUR OF GENERAL DE GAULLE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I wish to make a motion in connection with the visit to Canada, during the Easter recess, of the President of France, General Charles de Gaulle.

Canada was honoured by General de Gaulle's visit, even though he was able to stop over at this time for only some three days. We regret, I am sure, that his visit was not of longer duration, and we hope that he will return in the not too distant future and pay us another visit. I think I am safe in saying that while he was here he made a profound impression on the people of Canada. As honourable senators are aware, there was a State Luncheon in his honour at the Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, on the 19th of April. With leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, P.C.:

That the address delivered by the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, P.C., Q.C., Prime Minister of Canada, at a State luncheon in honour of President de Gaulle, of France, at the Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, April 19, 1960, and the reply by President de Gaulle, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, it affords me great pleasure to join with the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in his motion that the addresses delivered by the Prime Minister and General de Gaulle at the State Luncheon in Ottawa be printed in our Hansard.

I am sure we all regret that General de Gaulle's visit to Ottawa took place during the Easter recess when most members of both houses of Parliament were at their homes—when most of us were hundreds of miles, and some of us thousands of miles, from here. We would all have liked to be present to hear his address. I understand he gave it in a most interesting manner and that on no occasion did he use any notes. He made a profound impression wherever he spoke, not only in Canada but throughout the United States. Although it was impossible for most of us to be in Ottawa at the time of his visit we all had an opportunity, and I am sure we all took advantage of it, of hearing his address by means of television. I am certain that all of us would like to have this address and the address of the Prime Minister in our permanent records, available for reference from time to time in the future. I am very pleased to second the motion.

Motion agreed to.

For text of address by the Prime Minister and reply by General de Gaulle, see appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 520-2.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT RE TENURE OF OFFICE OF JUDGES

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I ask that the motion which appears in my name stand until Tuesday the 17th of May, 1960.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Will it come on then?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We hope so.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The motion stands.

HON. THOMAS V. GRANT

WELCOME ON RETURN TO CHAMBER AFTER ACCIDENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to draw attention to the fact that we have with us again the honourable senator from Montague (Hon. Mr. Grant), who just a few days prior to the opening of this session of Parliament suffered a serious accident. I just want to say how pleased we are to have him back with us and to express the hope that he has fully recovered and will be with us for a long time to come.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. MacDonald: Honourable senators, I think I would be remiss in my duties if I did not support the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in welcoming back our good colleague Doctor Grant. It was back in March 1909 when I first met Senator Grant. He was known then simply as Thomas V. Grant. Some years prior to that he was a railway mail clerk, and of course had a lot of experience in pushing iceboats across the strait, because on many occasions that was the mode of travel between the Island and New Brunswick. However, in 1909 he was a student at Tufts Medical College. At that time neither he or I dreamt of being associated with honourable senators in this house.

Unfortunately, three or four days prior to the opening of the present session of Parliament, when he was about to get into his car he met with a serious accident, and that is why he was delayed in getting here. We are very happy to see him here again and so well.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: Honourable senators, I should like to add a word to what has been said by the two honourable gentlemen who preceded me. We on this side of the chamber also are delighted to have Senator Grant with us again.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-318, for the relief of Mary (Moira) Steel Taylor Maddison-Roberts.

Bill SD-319, for the relief of Marie Evelyn Lindsay Slade.

Bill SD-325, for the relief of Peter Zeppetini.

Bill SD-326, for the relief of Jean Louis Beaudet.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I know it is not customary to discuss bills on third reading, and I shall be brief.

A good many years ago I became a member of the Divorce Committee, more or less by accident, and I served on it for a number of sessions with diligence. I have not done so in recent sessions, although I am still a member of the committee, notwithstanding my request that my name be removed from the list. This morning I was drafted to serve on the committee to make up a quorum. I remarked to the chairman of the committee that, in view of what is taking place in the House of Commons, this work seems to me to be a case of "love's labour lost".

I should like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if he can give us any information as to whether the divorce bills now being held up by the House of Commons will ever be passed. If there is no possibility of their being passed, I see no good reason why the Divorce Committee of this house should continue to hear evidence which is going to be of no use whatsoever.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have had this matter under advisement for some time. It is rather difficult for senators to go to the other house and tell the honourable members there what they should do.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am not saying that should be done.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We just cannot do it. However, I have considered the matter and I have talked it over with responsible people, but at the present time I do not have any solution for the problem.

Hon. John J. MacDonald: Honourable senators, before the Easter recess I had lunch in the cafeteria with Mr. Hazen Argue, and I brought up the question of divorce bills and the filibuster or hold-up which is taking place in the House of Commons. I asked him what was the real problem. He suggested that they wanted to get rid of divorce in that house. He also said—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would point out to the honourable senator that he is out of order in quoting something said by an honourable member of the other place, especially when it was said in confidence.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and bills read third time and passed, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I had fully expected that we would now have before us certain legislation from the other house, namely, the bill to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act, and the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act. I am hopeful that at least one of these bills will be before us for debate on second reading tomorrow. I have, therefore, no alternative but to move that we now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER, PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA, AT A STATE LUNCHEON IN HONOUR OF GENERAL CHARLES DE GAULLE, PRESIDENT OF FRANCE, AT THE CHATEAU LAURIER, OTTAWA, APRIL 19, 1960, AND REPLY OF GENERAL DE GAULLE.

Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker: Mr. President, Madame de Gaulle, distinguished guests, my first words must be to welcome you here as we gather to do honour to the President of France and I want to say to you at once, sir, within the hours that have passed since your arrival here you must have felt the degree of Canada's regard and affection for you as the great leader of one of Canada's mother countries.

And most of what I say will be in the English language because I seem to recall that Sir Winston Churchill on a recent occasion when you conferred upon him the Cross of Lorraine stated that while in the days of war he did speak in French but the days of war were over and therefore he would only speak in English for the benefit of those that were listening to him. However, I do want to welcome you in a few words in the other official language.

Fifteen years ago the Canadian people welcomed the President of the provisional Government of the French Republic. Earlier in the war we had acclaimed the president of the French Committee of National Liberation. Today we welcome the President of the French Republic and community. Now as before, however, it is to General de Gaulle that we offer our respect and admiration. We are happy to welcome you, as well as Madame de Gaulle who represents, in our eyes, the women of France with all their fine qualities of the heart and mind.

During those fifteen years France has recovered her élan; under your direction, France is a vital, dynamic and prosperous country which again holds the position she deserves among the great nations.

(Text)

Mr. President, when you visited London earlier this month Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, who is our Queen, said to you that Britain and France were joined to Canada and the United States by ties of history, culture and language.

May I illustrate how truly and unforgettably Her Majesty's words applied to Canada.

Only a few acres from where you sit now, Mr. President, walked the sons of France, who more than three centuries ago began this nation's days—explorers like Samuel de Champlain, to whose memory stands a monument on a nearby cliff and missionaries like the immortal Jean de Brebeuf, who on his way to martyrdom camped for three days only a few miles from this spot; and those equally heroic souls, Father Gabriel Lalement and Father Jogues.

These were the men, Mr. President—and there were many others—who brought to this land and carried to its farthest frontiers the eternal verities of civilization—the men who in regions of darkness and terror and awful solitude endured for France and their faith—the men of whom the historian Parkman wrote:

> Men steeped in antique learning, pale with the close breath of the cloister, here spent the noon and evening of their lives, ruled savage hordes with a mild parental sway and stood serene before the direct shapes of death.

These were the men—the sons of France, of our first Canadian story—their treasurable contribution in our memories forever.

We remember, and will remember forever, that dread hour in 1940 when you, a lonely and desperate figure of destiny, clarioned the world for France and for freedom—that clarion call which, as Her Majesty said truly to you in London, matched the winged words of Sir Winston Churchill.

And we remember, too, sir, how in the long dark days which followed, those days when liberty was under siege, those days which tried through and through every quality and mystery of the human spirit, you stood as France incarnate, the valiant trustee of her ancient glory.

There is our remembrance that in the soil of France tens of thousands of our sons rest in the quiet of God's acre—our sons who, in two world wars, went out from us into the night for freedom. In many hundreds of plots throughout the hills and valleys of France lie our dead, in resting places dedicated forever to their memory and cared for tenderly by the people of France.

Those are our memories. Those are the thoughts that come to us on this day. You have truly brought a new strength to France at home and abroad. By your compatriots you have been entrusted with the responsibility of restoring the stability of the French state; through the courageous application of your powers, France is firmly embarked on a brilliant renaissance. You have opened the door to an honourable settlement in Algeria; and, in territories where the Tricolor has flown for generations, you have been the builder of the community of independent states joined by a common loyalty to the traditions and ideals of democracy.

This visit is an important one in that it has provided an opportunity for a continuation of the discussions between us which began in Paris in November 1958. The intervening months have been fateful for our civilization. We are approaching a stage of decision, a time when the quality of leadership will be submitted to its sternest test. Personal contacts on the highest level have been multiplying since our last meeting and have been an essential preliminary to the formal meeting of chiefs of state and heads of government which you will attend in Paris a month hence. Although not a participant at the summit, Canada has none the less a vital concern with the outcome. We will be following with intense interest the discussions that take place and the decisions that are made.

Today in our discussions we have examined together the outlook for peace. You have learned something of the elements of our thinking on the great issues of foreign policy. None of them is greater than an end to the arms race with its financial burdens on national economies and all its grave dangers that armaments mean to peace. France and Canada are partners in the search for a disarmament agreement as members of the ten nations committee now meeting in Geneva. Our objective, as is your objective, is peace. I express the hope that if out of the summit comes a new understanding as between west and east and a realization that the insane waste of armaments must end, we may yet see the day when east and west may join together, join together in a major step forward, first in reducing armaments and secondly in raising the standards of men everywhere in a world offensive against poverty.

I can't express to you, sir, what this meeting has meant to my colleagues and myself, as you honoured us today by meeting with us in our cabinet. We will always have those disagreements, even the best families do, misunderstandings take place but above everything else, the leaders of the free world dare not forget that the consistent and continuing consultation at a high level is necessary at all times to assure the most effective cooperation and that unity which has been so apparent during your visit here and meant so much to me, when you honoured Canada in November 1958, when my wife and I were with you in Paris.

Canada honours you as the wartime soul of France and a realistic and idealistic statesman of his country's restored strength and power.

For these reasons, Mr. President, because of what you are, what you have been, and what you represent, and because you come to us as a tried ally and friend, on behalf of the Canadian people I salute you with admiration, and for them say to you with the heart of all Canadians, "Vive la France".

Mr. President, you have our full attention.

General Charles de Gaulle: Mr. Prime Minister, the words which you have addressed to me have moved me deeply. In thanking you on behalf of France, I want to tell you of my own impression on coming in contact with Canada.

The first voice I hear in Canada is that of History. France will always pride herself in having brought to your soil, more than four centuries ago, the germs of civilizing progress and the breadth of the Christian spirit. If, later on, other developments and influences made their mark here, if there were rivalries, battles and dismemberments, nevertheless the seed sown by France in Canada grew strong, even though other harvests have also ripened. Briefly, just as one sees water-plants rise to the surface, so I feel, rising from the depths of the past, all sorts of ties, attractions and similarities which draw the spirit and the heart of my country very close to those of yours.

This was made abundantly clear during the two World Wars. How could we, Frenchmen, ever forget the talents displayed and the prodigious sacrifices of so very many of your soldiers during the First World War on the battlefields of Artois and Flanders, and the heroic ranks of those buried in the soil of France? How could we fail to bear in mind your exemplary participation, during the Second World War, in the great battles of Normandy, of Picardy, of Belgium and Germany, which meant the liberation of Europe? How could I fail to keep alive the memories of the two visits I have previously made to Canada, one in 1944 when I saw you straining in your war effort; the other in 1945 on the morrow of victory; while you were already beginning to recover, and you were holding out the hand of help to a ravaged France? I cannot fail, in this regard, to hail the memory of Mackenzie King who led his country, while I was leading mine, through those glorious trials.

And now, how do you appear to us? Materially, a new country, of vast size, mighty resources, inhabited by a hard-working and enterprising people. Politically, a state which has found the means to unite two societies, very different in origin, language and religion; which exercises independence under the British Crown and forms part of the commonwealth, which is forging a national character even though spread out over three thousand miles alongside a very powerful federation; a solid and stable state, as proven by the fact that, in the last twenty-five years, only three Prime Ministers—my friends, Mackenzie King, St. Laurent and Diefenbaker—have headed its Government; a state which, far from concentrating only on its internal problems, makes its voice heard and plays an active part in the great affairs of the world. Finally, on the moral plane, Canada appears to us as a people very sensitive on the one hand to an orderly society, and on the other hand to the liberty and dignity of men.

Therefore, be well assured that the country, the entity, the people that you are, arouse the highest interest, sympathy and confidence of France. Not only have Canada and France no dispute over claims or ambitions, no difference of fundamentals, but, on the contrary, the French feel in common accord with Canadians, both in their conception and handling of the problems of our times.

Moreover, France, a country with a thousand years behind her, is also a new country, a country finding herself again, reshaping herself, but whose stability and reviving strength underline still further her world-wide responsibilities, illuminate her ideal—that of desiring for others the same self-determination that she wishes for herself, and which fortifies her resolve to form a vital part of what we, the free peoples, represent.

But what is our objective? In truth, it is peace, even though we realize that, to achieve it, we will have to travel a long and difficult road. In this regard, my country welcomes the approaching meeting of the heads of state commonly referred to as "the Big Four". France believes that there should first be introduced among these four states—and hence between the two camps of which they are the leading spirits—a relaxing of tensions. This implies the avoidance, at present, of any debating stalemate, and especially of any threat regarding, for instance, the problems of the German people. The matter also calls for at least a beginning to nuclear disarmament, starting with missiles and aircraft that carry atomic weapons, and over which mutual control is still practicable. Finally, there must be organized a basis of co-operation that will transcend political rivalries in the development of needy peoples.

At all events, France believes that the future of peace—and on this hinges survival—depends essentially upon the whole of Europe and upon America, which cradled modern civilization and are its fountainheads. France believes that the existence of opposing systems—assuming that the course of events does not narrow the gap between them—should not prevent peaceful co-existence, failing which nothing could, in the long run, save mankind. France hopes that, in going to the summit, she will enjoy the direct support of vigorous Canada, so worthy and able, and which she holds so close to her heart.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 4, 1960

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine tabled:

Copy of an exchange of notes dated April 25, 1960, constituting an Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Norway, concerning Canadian wheat flour to be provided for emergency stockpiling in Norway. (French text).

PSYCHIATRISTS EMPLOYED BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Are there any psychiatrists who have been employed by the Government of Canada during each one of the last ten years?

2. If so, (a) by what department?
(b) who were they? and
(c) how much was paid to each one of them?

3. Referring to the information given to the Senate by the Department of Justice on March 15, Senate Hansard, 1960, p. 340, did those psychiatrists recommend clemency for each person sentenced to capital punishment from 1950 inclusive to March 10, 1960?

4. If not, what was the number of such cases for which there was no recommendation from them for clemency?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the answer to this inquiry has been discussed with the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot). He has agreed that rather than providing a list of all psychiatrists employed by the federal Government and the salaries paid them for the past ten years, it would suffice if the information were restricted to psychiatrists of the Department of Justice, which department is most directly concerned with capital cases. The answer, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Fiscal year	Penitentiary	Date of appointment and name	Salary
1950-51	Ottawa (Headquarters)	Dr. L. P. Gendreau, appointed September 1, 1947 (still employed)	$12,500
	Kingston	Dr. M. O'Connor, appointed November 17, 1949 to September 30, 1958	$ 5,520 p.a.
1951-52	British Columbia	Dr. D. C. MacDonald appointed July 18, 1951 to September 30, 1959	$ 5,520 p.a.
	Manitoba	Dr. G. M. Stephens appointed August 4, 1951 to January 8, 1960	$ 5,520 p.a.
1952-53	Saskatchewan	Dr. Geo. F. Nelson appointed March 7, 1953 (still employed)	$25 per day for 2 days a week (only if he attends Pen'ty)
1955-56	St. Vincent de Paul	Dr. B. M. Cormier appointed October 17, 1955 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.
1958-59	Dorchester	Dr. R. R. Prosser appointed September 15, 1958 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.
	Kingston	Dr. D. M. Scott appointed October 29, 1958 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.
	Collin's Bay	Dr. D. M. Scott (same as above)	$ 2,500 p.a.
1959-60	St. Vincent de Paul	Dr. J. Lapointe appointed August 6, 1959 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.
	Kingston (Prison for Women)	Dr. O. Karabanow appointed August 12, 1959 (still employed)	$ 2,500 p.a. (2 one-half days per week)
	Manitoba	Dr. S. D. Schultz appointed January 18, 1960 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.
	British Columbia	Dr. P. M. Middleton appointed March 1, 1960 (still employed)	$ 5,520 p.a.

3 and 4. In preparing capital cases for review by the Governor in Council, the present practice of the Department of Justice is to have any psychiatric examination deemed necessary performed by a practising psychiatrist other than a member of the staff of a department of the Government of Canada. In the provinces other than Quebec, the psychiatrist consulted is Dr. J. P. S. Cathcart. At the beginning of the ten-year period he was a member of the staff of the Department of Veterans Affairs and, as such, made at least one such examination. In the province of Quebec, until early 1960 the psychiatrist consulted was Dr. J. A. Huard, Superintendent of the Bordeaux Psychiatric Hospital; examinations are now conducted by Dr. Fernand Côté, Chief of the Department of Psychiatry at Maisonneuve Hospital, Montreal. It is no part of the function of the psychiatrist to make any recommendation with respect to the exercise of clemency; his function is to make a psychiatric examination and furnish his report and opinion with respect to the mental state of the individual examined.

HON. A. K. HUGESSEN

FELICITATIONS ON ELECTION AS BÂTONNIER OF MONTREAL BAR

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to ask your indulgence and to call your attention to a very important event which occurred on Monday last at Montreal? Every year the Bar Association of Montreal elects its president, whom, in Quebec, we call Monsieur le Bâtonnier. Last Monday we were very pleased—and, I may say, in duty bound—to elect without any opposition as our bâtonnier the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen).

I think it is appropriate to put on record an editorial in today's issue of the Montreal Gazette, which will allow honourable senators to judge of the harmony which exists in Montreal and the unanimity of feeling of the citizens and the members of the bar. I quote:

NEW BÂTONNIER OF THE MONTREAL BAR

One of the highest satisfactions a professional man may experience is to be honoured by his colleagues. For theirs is the informed judgment, the appraisal by professional standards.

Such a satisfaction and such an honour have come to Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Q.C. in his unanimous election as Bâtonnier of the Montreal Bar.

The same talent and character that have won him eminence in his profession, and the regard of his colleagues, have distinguished his career in other fields—in his service in the Canadian Heavy Artillery in the First World War, in his public life as a member of the Senate of Canada, in his devoted work as Chancellor of the Anglican Diocese of Montreal, and his active role in support of the Child Welfare Association, the United Nations Association, McGill University, and many other institutions close to his heart.

And, may I add, as director of many important companies; as a Canadian delegate to the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations in London, in 1945, after World War II, and as Deputy Leader of the Government in this chamber from 1950 to 1952.

Honourable senators, we of the Canadian Bar Association are indeed very hopeful that if the honourable gentleman chooses to accept new responsible functions he will surely be elected as president of that association when the time comes to elect officers.

I think it is good and appropriate to note that if, on the one hand, we of French Canadian descent are proud to declare that we recognize the broadmindedness of our fellow countrymen of English origin in rendering justice to us, it is also appropriate to say publicly that in the province of Quebec, especially in the Montreal Bar Association, we in turn are always proud to elect a bâtonnier of English descent. But it should be said that in this latest election the main reason for our unanimous support of the honourable senator from Inkerman as bâtonnier was his eminent record as a great jurist.

Therefore, honourable senators, I am sure you will grant me the honour of offering to our honourable colleague, in your names as well as in my own, our best wishes for good health and success in his new office.

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, as a member of the Law Society of Upper Canada I should like to extend to the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) the congratulations and good wishes of all members of the bar in Ontario. We are not all acquainted with him, but many of us throughout the province are. We know that the Montreal Bar is indeed very fortunate in having him as president. We are all very pleased at his election and we wish him every success during his term of office.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, now that Quebec and Ontario have spoken, I wish to say a few words from one of the outlying provinces. I join in the congratulations which have already been offered to our honourable friend on his election as Bâtonnier of the Montreal Bar. He is one of the best-known lawyers in Canada. His ability as a lawyer and his great reputation are sufficient warrants for the office for which he has been chosen; but above all, as far as we are concerned—and I speak from only one year of acquaintance—his genial personality, his kindness on all occasions and his suave and pleasant manner are such that we are not only glad but delighted at the high honour that has been conferred upon him.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, as I am, I think, the only Bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada in the Senate, it would be appropriate for me to express the pleasure I felt on hearing of the honour accorded to the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) and to convey to him the best wishes of my Bencher colleagues in Ontario. I join in all the kind remarks that have been made about him. I thoroughly agree with everything that has been said as to his outstanding ability, and his courtesy, kindness and actions as a gentleman at all times.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I must admit that I am rather overwhelmed by the extraordinary kindness of the remarks that have been made by my honourable friends the senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis), the senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt), the senator from St. John's East (Hon. Mr. Higgins) and the senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I did not expect anything of this kind and you will, I hope, excuse me if I am not prepared with anything adequate to say on this occasion.

You have all been extremely kind in supporting the words our honourable friends have spoken.

The position of Bâtonnier of the Montreal Bar is a responsible one in that it entails a good many duties. I can only hope that the members of the Bar of Montreal, and my honourable friends here, will be equally enthusiastic when I leave my office in a year's time as they appear to be now, although I am afraid I do not expect it.

My honourable friend from Rigaud read a part of the very kindly editorial that appears in the Montreal Gazette of this morning. Well, with regard to that editorial, and with regard to the remarks that have been made this afternoon, I feel a little embarrassed because these are the sort of things that are normally said upon an obituary.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You have many years ahead of you.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I can only trust that these kind remarks are not just a foretaste of the fact that I am not to be with you for very much longer.

The honourable senator from Rigaud did mention one thing which I think perhaps should be emphasized here, and that is the extreme friendliness of the lawyers of the different languages who compose the Bar of Montreal, and indeed the Bar of the province of Quebec. We have had for a great number of years an entente cordiale in the Montreal Bar, under which for two successive years the bâtonnier is a lawyer whose native language is French, and in the third year we have a bâtonnier whose native language is English. We have had the same friendly system with regard to the other offices of our Bar Association, a system which has been in effect now for well over 30 years, and which does so much to exemplify the extraordinary happy relations that exist between the members of the bar of all languages in Montreal and generally in the province of Quebec.

Once again, honourable senators, thank you very much.

IMMIGRATION

MOTION TO DIRECT COMMITTEE TO REVIEW DEPARTMENT'S ANNUAL REPORT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the postponed debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Wall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

That the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour be authorized and directed to review the Annual Report of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, excluding that portion of the report which deals with the Indian Affairs Branch; and

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.—(Honourable Senator White).

Hon. George S. White: Stand.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, as the original mover of this motion, and in view of the fact that the motion was last considered on April 4 and since that time has been adjourned four times, I am wondering if it would be in order for me to ask when or at what time it will be under further debate and advisement, so that some decision may be reached in the matter.

Hon. Mr. White: Honourable senators, this motion was moved and debated on March 22. On that day the debate was adjourned by the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson), in whose name the adjourned debate stood on March 23, 24, 29, 30 and 31. The honourable lady spoke on the motion on April 4. As honourable senators know, the Senate adjourned for the Easter recess on the following Wednesday.

I would point out, partly in answer to what the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) has said, that when he spoke to the motion on March 22 he made reference, at page 386 of Hansard, to a discussion which had taken place as to the setting up of a committee on manpower, and he indicated that he would be willing to withdraw his motion if there was an assurance that such a committee would be set up. I am advised by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that negotiations have proceeded with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) as to the setting up of this committee, and that within a day or so a motion for establishment of the committee will be made by the Leader of the Government.

I may say that it was because of the willingness expressed by the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg to withdraw the motion under certain circumstances that I have asked to have the debate stand on more than three occasions. If it develops that the honourable senator who introduced the motion is not going to withdraw it when the manpower study committee is set up, I certainly will proceed with the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT OF DEBATE ON MOTION TO DIRECT COMMITTEE TO REVIEW DEPARTMENT'S ANNUAL REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to have the privilege of making a brief explanation. Yesterday the honourable senator from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) did me the honour of listing the number of times I had adjourned the debate on the motion of the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) that the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour be directed to look into the report of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for the preceding year. I can recall only one occasion on which I asked that the debate be adjourned. On other occasions the order was never reached on the Order Paper. On one date mentioned, the 29th of April, I was called to Toronto because of a death. I did not adjourn the debate on the five dates to which the honourable senator alluded.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLSTATE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA —SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate a Canadian insurance company under the name of Allstate Insurance Company of Canada. This company will, when it is organized, take over all of the business which is now being done in this country by the Allstate Insurance Company, this latter company being a United States company which was incorporated in the state of Illinois on the 9th day of February, 1931.

It might be pointed out that the Allstate Insurance Company which is now doing business in Canada is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Sears, Roebuck & Company, which owns all the stock of the same save and except qualifying shares which have been issued to the directors as required by the laws of the state of Illinois.

During the year 1949 the Allstate Insurance Company applied to the Department of Insurance here in Ottawa for a licence to do business in Canada. This licence was granted on the 30th day of August 1949 and subsequently the company was licensed to do business in each of the provinces of Canada. At the present time Allstate Insurance Company writes the following classes of insurance: fire, public liability, combined accident and sickness, automobile and personal property.

The general methods of doing business that prevail in the United States with respect to the operation of this company also prevail in Canada to the extent that Canadian law and custom permit. The various types of policies are sold only by duly authorized agents of the Allstate Insurance Company, and such agents can represent no other insurance companies. The service functions are provided entirely by full-time company employees.

The Allstate Insurance Company maintains a head office in Toronto, and the business for the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba is supervised from this office. The company also maintains a branch office in Vancouver, which supervises the business done in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The sales activities of the company are carried on by full-time agents. In addition insurance is sold from booths located in the stores of Simpsons Limited at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and London, and also from booths located in Simpsons-Sears stores and mail order offices situated throughout Canada.

The company—and all this refers to the American company which is doing business in Canada—maintains eleven district service offices which provide claim facilities right across Canada. These offices are located in the principal cities of Canada from Halifax to Vancouver.

This company does a very extensive business. For instance, during the year 1959 the value of the net premiums written was well in excess of $14 million. Of this amount the automobile business accounted for almost $14 million of the total premiums written.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is all of the business.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. The total business is well in excess of $14 million. About $400,000 worth of business is done in all other types of policies.

On December 31 last the total number of policies in force was in excess of 223,000. Of this number just over 202,000 were automobile policies.

I am sure that it is of interest to all honourable senators to learn something of the Canadian investments of this company. As of the 31st day of December last the company had Canadian investments having a value in excess of $13 million. Of this amount almost $11 million was invested in Canadian bonds and debentures, and just over $2,400,000 was invested in Canadian stocks.

The above data will give honourable senators some idea of the volume of business done by and the assets of Allstate Insurance Company in this country. In view of the rapid growth of the company, the owners of it have decided that it would be advisable and wise to incorporate a Canadian company to take over all the Canadian assets of the United States company, and also to take over all the business which the United States company is now doing in Canada. The name chosen for the company is a very logical one, Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.

With respect to the bill itself there are just one or two comments that I would like to make, and I will not take up very much of the time of this honourable body in explaining the bill.

This bill is in the usual form for the incorporation of an insurance company which is to carry on the various types of insurance business other than life insurance. If honourable senators will refer to clause 7 of the bill they will see set out there in detail the types of insurance which this company will be allowed to do. At this time I think I should point out to honourable senators that this bill takes cognizance of the amendments which were made by our Banking and Commerce Committee very recently to the bill to incorporate Adanac General Insurance Company.

I have been given to understand that the Superintendent of Insurance has approved of this bill. Like all other companies engaged in the insurance business in this country this particular company will be subject to all the regulatory provisions and clauses contained in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

The incorporators who are named in this bill are members of a well-known and well-regarded Toronto legal firm, and the head office of this company will be located in the city of Toronto.

It is the intention of the company to have nine permanent directors, made up of five Canadians and four citizens of the United States. The five Canadian directors will be chosen from among the executive of Simpsons-Sears Limited and Simpsons Limited. The four United States directors will be chosen from the present directors of Allstate Insurance Company and from the executive of Sears, Roebuck Company, the head office of which is in the city of Chicago in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable gentleman if there will be a provision in the bylaws that five of the directors will be Canadians and that the remaining four will be from the United States?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, there will be.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I follow that up by asking if those five directors will represent a majority of the shareholders, so that the company will not be controlled from the United States?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: With respect to the shareholdings I have no information, but the people who will appear before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce have all that information. I understand they will be able to tell the committee what proportion of the stock is to be owned by Canadian persons and Canadian corporations, and what proportion will be owned by citizens of the United States and corporations in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask if the name "Allstate" is the same name as that of the United States company?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, except that we have added the words "of Canada".

Hon. Mr. Reid: Will there not be some confusion?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, we do not expect there will be any confusion, because the American company will no longer be doing any business here. When this company is incorporated it will take over the entire business and all the assets of the American company which is now in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Euler: When my honourable friend spoke of the suitability of the name "Allstate" what he said did not impress me altogether. "Allstate" would indicate that it is an American company, since in Canada we have provinces, not states.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: But the words "of Canada" are added, so the full name of this company is Allstate Insurance Company of Canada. The incorporators of the company feel that the name "Allstate" has a real value because the American company developed a tremendous business in this country.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is why they are keeping the name.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, that is why they want to keep the name.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I did not want to interrupt the honourable senator, but he said the name was a logical one. What did he mean by that?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: When it was decided to incorporate this company the incorporators wanted to pick a name that would give a Canadian tinge or identification to the company and, at the same time, retain the value of the name of the company that is now doing business here. That is why I said it was a logical name. They get the best of everything, I think, in this name.

Honourable senators will note that the proposed authorized capital will be $1 million, with power to increase the capital to $3 million if the company at some future time finds that such a step is necessary.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I notice that the bill does not say anything about the price of each share.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is never stated in a bill. Of the initial stock issuance of $1 million, each of the nine directors will have a beneficial interest in his qualifying share. However, the remainder of the initial issuance of $1 million will be divided between Allstate Insurance Company and Simpsons-Sears Limited.

Honourable senators will further note that, under clause 4 of the bill, $500,000 must be subscribed before a general meeting can be called for the purpose of electing directors. Further, under clause 5, the company cannot commence business until $1 million of its capital stock has been subscribed and fully paid for.

Upon the bill's receiving second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Arrangements have been made for some of the sponsors whose names appear in the bill, and others, to attend before this committee. In addition, I understand that Mr. K. R. MacGregor, the Superintendent of Insurance, will appear before the committee for the purpose of making certain necessary and pertinent observations with respect to this particular bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, clause 3 of the bill provides that the capital stock of the company shall be $1 million, and I assume that the fees that are paid in connection with the incorporation are based upon the $1 million. But then the clause goes on to say that the capital stock may be increased to $3 million. Before this increase can be made must supplementary letters patent be taken out or must there be an amendment to the act of incorporation? Or does the clause mean that the company can issue another $2 million of capital without coming back to Parliament or obtaining consent of the Department? It is wholly too cryptic, I think.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: As I understand the mechanics of this, the fees that are now paid are based on the $1 million capitalization. When it is desired to increase the capital to $3 million the company will not have to come back to Parliament, because the authority will be in its act of incorporation—provided this clause is not amended—but the Superintendent of Insurance will see that the fees are paid before the company is allowed to increase its capitalization. After all, the Superintendent of Insurance does keep a close check and tight control on all insurance companies in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is this type of incorporation usual?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, this is the usual type of bill which is used to incorporate insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator if the principals of this company would be willing to come back and have the act amended in the event of increased capitalization?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that where one is not positive of the total amount of capital which a company may require, it is customary to use this particular clause, and that for a quite some time the Senate has been passing bills containing exactly the same clause.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: The practice that my honourable friend refers to may apply to insurance companies, but certainly we have many examples of increased capitalization on the part of industrial companies where it was thought necessary to amend legislation.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right, but such companies do not have this power. That is why they come back to us. This provision saves the company the necessity of coming back with a second bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It also prevents us from having the opportunity of receiving a further explanation, and the company will not have to state publicly the progress it has made. Is it not a rather good thing to have progress of this kind made public? If a company is doing so much business that it needs more capital, why should it not come and say so? We would be glad to hear their representatives.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: If that is something that the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee feel should be dealt with let us deal with it there.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity of reading the bill and, of course, the details will be explained and discussed in committee. Allstate Insurance Company of the United States is a very well known company which has made a great deal of progress in Canada. Being more or less in the insurance business myself, I quite appreciate that. I do think, however, that if it is at all possible it would be well for Parliament to assure that Allstate Insurance Company of Canada is to be a really Canadian company. I must disagree with my honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) when he says that "Allstate Insurance Company of Canada" is a logical name. To my way of thinking it is not a logical name at all so far as Canadian business is concerned. My honourable friend knows as well as I do that when the company's agents go out to sell insurance they will never use the words "of Canada"; they will refer simply to "Allstate Insurance Company". Allstate Insurance Company of the United States has created a great deal of goodwill in this country, and quite properly so, because it is in business here or has been up to now.

My submission is that the use of the name "Allstate" gives the impression that this is a United States company, on account of the fact that the United States is composed of states, and not provinces, as is Canada. If possible I would like to have some assurance that this will be a really Canadian company. Honourable senators may be surprised to learn that Canadian companies are pretty well discriminated against—I mean exactly what I say and I will give further information on this when the right time comes—in favour of foreign companies or, I should say, foreign and British companies. Even in fire insurance, Canadian companies have only a small percentage of the business.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When my honourable friend speaks of foreign companies I take it he includes companies from countries other than the United States?

Hon. Mr. Euler: I refer to companies from the United States, Great Britain and Switzerland. There are some Swiss companies doing business in this country. We welcome them all, of course, but I think it should be pointed out that under Canadian law Canadian insurance companies—I am not speaking of life companies—suffer a considerable handicap, to the advantage of foreign and British insurance companies, whereas if an advantage is to be given to any companies it ought, I submit, to be given to Canadian companies.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, the inquiry I made of the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) with regard to section 3 resulted from the fact that on previous occasions when we have had this class of bill before us an explanation has been made of how capital stock is to be divided. I would refer honourable senators to Bill S-7, to incorporate United Canada Insurance Company, and Bill S-18, to incorporate Adanac General Insurance Company of Canada. With reference to both these bills we were told how the capital stock of the companies was to be divided.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 363 to 379, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, I might call attention to the fact that the number of reports runs to 379 at the moment.

COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Hon. George S. White, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Blois and Irvine be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Emerson and Euler on the list of Senators serving on the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words of thanks from the Divorce Committee, and I presume from the house, to the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler). Senator Euler has served for several years as a member of my committee, and he has earned a release from it. He accepted very kindly indeed my suggestion that, as he was not now taking an active part in the work of the committee, he give place to one of the newer senators, who I hope will be in constant attendance and of assistance to us.

I also want to thank the honourable senator from Saint John-Albert (Hon. Mr. Emerson) for the services he has given since he joined our little group, and to say that I regret that other work he has undertaken makes it difficult, if not impossible, for him to continue to give the committee the attention that its work justifies.

Honourable senators, with this acknowledgement of services received and expression of regret at losing two members of my committee, may I say how gladly I will welcome, if you see fit to pass the motion, the two new senators to the sittings of the Divorce Committee.

Motion agreed to.

That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Blois, Bouffard, Brunt, Buchanan, Burchill, Cameron, Choquette, Connolly (Ottawa West), Courtemanche, Croll, Emerson, Haig, Higgins, Hnatyshyn, Horner, Hugessen, Inman, Irvine, Lambert, Leonard, MacDonald, Méthot, Monette, Pratt, Reid, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Thorvaldson, Vaillancourt, Wall, White and Wilson (32);

3. That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

4. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is to obtain the approval of the Senate for the setting up of a special committee of the Senate to study and report on manpower in Canada, in all its aspects.

The advisability of doing something of this nature came up when we were discussing certain supplementary estimates having to do with the winter works program of the Government. Honourable senators will remember that the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), speaking in that debate on the employment situation, stated that he had a proposal he would like to make. After referring to the Senate, and stating that it was composed of men and women of outstanding ability and experience in public matters, he made the following suggestion:

—that the Senate seriously consider referring the whole question of manpower to one of its committees or to a special committee, where impartial and unbiased attention could be given by the members of this house to the general problem of unemployment and its effects upon our national life and the individuals concerned.

Later in the same debate the honourable senators from Colchester-Hants (Hon. Mr. Blois), Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), and Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), made a few remarks in which they endorsed the idea.

Since that time I have given this matter of moving to set up such a committee my very careful attention. I have also discussed the idea on several occasions with the honourable Leader of the Opposition and with a number of other senators on both sides of the house, who think the idea is a good one and well worth following up. In fact, most of those with whom I have spoken were enthusiastic about the setting up of such a committee. It is true that one or two were more or less lukewarm, but all in all I found no one actually opposed to the setting up of such a committee.

Honourable senators also know that the idea has been approved by the press of Canada. Many articles have appeared in the local papers, in the Toronto papers, and in papers throughout Canada endorsing the idea. The thought seems to be that it will be a good thing, and that the Senate is in a position to accomplish a great deal.

I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the Senate, by making a study of and a report on this matter, can perform a very useful service for Canada, and I submit this motion to set up such a special committee, hoping that it will receive unanimous approval.

Quite a number of special committees of the Senate have been set up in recent years to study and report on many matters of public interest. Honourable senators are familiar with these, but it will do no harm to mention some of them briefly. In speaking on this matter the honourable Leader of the Opposition mentioned the investigation made with respect to the Income War Tax Act, and I would like to refer a little more fully to the work of that committee. That committee was set up in 1946 and was authorized to investigate the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act. As a result of the findings of that committee the Government made extensive amendments to those acts, one of which was legislation setting up the Income Tax Appeal Board, which has functioned most satisfactorily since its formation. I believe that committee sat through two full sessions. The chairman of the committee was a distingushed senator, the Honourable W. D. Euler.

There was a special committee of the Senate on salacious and indecent literature, and it dealt with that subject during two sessions. After hearing numerous witnesses and considering many briefs and hundreds of exhibits and other material the committee brought in a report which created wide interest throughout Canada. As a result of the recommendations of that committee a number of important amendments were made later on to the Criminal Code. At the moment I seem to have forgotten who was the chairman of that special committee.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Senator Doone.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And Senator Davis after him.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thank you.

In 1955 a special committee of the Senate was set up to study the problem of traffic in narcotic drugs in Canada. This committee held hearings at Vancouver and other cities of Canada. Numerous witnesses were heard, among whom were drug addicts and medical personnel qualified to give professional testimony on the problems of drug addiction in this country. Recommendations were made which resulted in a revision of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. The chairman of that committee was the Honourable Thomas Reid.

In 1950 a special committee was set up to study and report on human rights and fundamental freedoms. The report of that committee will be found in an appendix to the Senate debates of June 27, 1950. It is a comprehensive report, and covers the situation very fully, indeed. The chairman of that committee was the Honourable Arthur W. Roebuck.

Then there is the special committee on land use in Canada which sat for two sessions, and which was reconstituted and is still sitting. I understand that that committee hopes to bring in a comprehensive report before the end of this session. The chairman of that committee is the Honourable Arthur M. Pearson.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And he was preceded by the Honourable Senator Power.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, for the first session, at any rate, the Honourable Senator Power was the chairman of that committee, and later on the Honourable Senator Pearson became the chairman.

Last year we had a committee which conducted an inquiry into the problem of inflation in Canada. The chairman of that committee was the Honourable Senator Emerson.

In my opinion, honourable senators, all these committees did very valuable work. It was not easy work; it was difficult. Each of the committees spent a good deal of time on the subject referred to it and made a great contribution to the work of the Senate.

These are but a few of the important matters which have been dealt with by Senate committees, and I might mention some others: for example, the Canada Shipping Act, the Pipe Lines Act, the National Defence Act, the Bankruptcy Act and the acts relating to trademarks and unfair competition. There was also the revision of the Criminal Code of Canada, which was mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition when he was speaking on this subject.

Before coming to the conclusion that the best way of having an impartial investigation of this kind was to refer it to a special committee of the Senate I had considered the idea of a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament, but I decided, in my own mind, that a committee of this chamber had the time, the ability and the experience to do a good job, and that we should set up such a committee and give it the opportunity of carrying on an independent investigation.

At this stage, honourable senators, I do not intend to outline the subjects which this committee, if it is set up, might wish to explore in the course of its deliberations. That would be up to the committee members to decide when they meet to organize. The scope is wide, and I think that they will find plenty to do. Honourable senators, I have given the subject a great deal of thought, and it occurs to me that the committee might want to consider and deal with, among other matters, the following subjects:

1. Over-all manpower trends in the Canadian economy over the years, and the incidence thereto.

2. Major influences affecting manpower utilization in the Canadian economy, and the incidence thereto.

3. Under-utilization of manpower resources in the Canadian economy.

4. Examination of possible areas for increasing manpower utilization and maintaining and extending a high level of employment.

If I may be allowed to give an example I would suggest that under item No. 1 this special committee, if and when it is set up, might want to deal with the following:

(a) Population and labour force in Canada and the main regions.

(b) Age and sex distributions.

(c) Occupational trends.

(d) Industrial employment trends.

(e) Contribution of immigration and native population to the growth of the labour force.

(f) Trends in urban and rural population and labour force.

That is the only example I wish to give at this time. As I said, I have given these matters a great deal of thought and I know that, if the committee is set up, it will outline the program it intends to follow.

Honourable senators, as previously stated, I believe that if the motion is accepted and the committee formed it will be able to carry on an impartial and unbiased study of the matters referred to it, and eventually bring down a valuable report.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Honourable senators, this inquiry will be a long one. May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if the committee will have the right and power to sit during two sessions if the work is not completed during this session?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: According to an editorial I read in this morning's edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail we might not be able to finish our work in one session.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is your opinion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would hope that if we are unable to complete the work in one session—and it is a mighty big undertaking —the inquiry would be continued in another session.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would the committee not die at the end of the present session and have to be reconstituted in order to function next session?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, it would have to be reconstituted.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) whether in his opinion trade conditions would be included in an inquiry contemplated by his resolution? I am bound to say that trade, or the lack of trade, has a bearing on employment. This country is very dependent on trade.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think trade would come under the second heading I referred to, major influences affecting manpower utilization in the Canadian economy and the incidence thereto. I have a lot of other information I have been working on but I did not want to take the time of the house to present it, for what I say now will have nothing to do with what the committee may decide to do. I have merely been outlining some of the work I thought the committee might want to undertake. I am quite sure that the matter of trade will come up.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government whether the term "manpower" includes women?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I mentioned in paragraph (b) the matter of "age and sex distributions". I think that would include women.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, naturally I am very pleased to support the motion that has been proposed by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). The committee is to consist of 32 members, and so far as the representation from this side of the house is concerned it is representative of every province in the dominion. The result is that a number of senators who would have been most valuable members of this committee have not been included. It may be that some who have been included would prefer for reasons of their own not to act on the committee. If this is so, I wish they would let the whips know at an early date, for there are a number of experienced senators who would like to serve. Whether or not the name of an honourable senator appears on the membership of the committee, he or she can attend the committee meetings. I feel we should make it abundantly clear that every senator may not only attend the meetings but may ask questions to the same extent as members of the committee. The only difference is that a senator who is not named to the committee would not have the right to vote.

There has been such general interest in the work this committee is to undertake that it might be advisable to send notices of meetings of the committee to all honourable senators. In that way we would all feel we are members of the committee.

As the honourable Leader of the Government has said, I did suggest a committee such as he has proposed now should be set up. I made my suggestion on March 8, and, as the honourable leader has said, the suggestion was favourably received by the press of the country and, I think I can say, by the public generally. From the reaction that greeted my proposal I think I can also say it was received favourably by the senators on each side of this house.

I am therefore pleased that the committee is finally to be set up. I may say to the honourable Leader of the Government that although he gave me some encouragement after my suggestion was made, it seemed to take a long time for it to come to fruition.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We had a long Easter recess.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In fact, I began to lose hope that the committee would ever be set up. But I was patient, and instead of raising the question in the Senate I sat quietly by. Now, on the 10th day of May, following a suggestion I originally made on March 8, we are about to set up the committee.

We have lost a lot of valuable time. It is not that the problem has been lost sight of. In fact, it has been with us very prominently. Not only do we know the numbers of unemployed, but the press and the public generally have kept urging the Senate to proceed with this work. Now it is finally to be proceeded with. I was hopeful that the committee might be a joint committee. Honourable senators may have noticed that such a suggestion was made in the other place, and it was possible for an announcement to that effect to have been made in the other place today. However, it has not been made, and apparently the work has to be left entirely to the Senate.

As I said a moment ago, the problem of unemployment is very much with us. The latest figures show there are today a great many unemployed. The last statement I have is one issued by the National Employment Service on March 17 of this year. At that time there were 830,691 men and women seeking employment. The figure given by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the month of March was 566,000.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: What is the difference, approximately?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The figure for those receiving unemployment insurance benefits as of April 7 was 828,000. So honourable senators must agree that at the present time there are approximately 800,000 men and women out of work. This would be a very large number at any time, but if we are to be encouraged by the words of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we are living in very good times—we are living in a period of a buoyant economy. Yet, in spite of these good times, we have this condition of unemployment in the country.

I have before me a few statements with regard to our economy made by the Prime Minister. Speaking the other day, as reported by a Canadian Press dispatch in the Vancouver Province, he said:

> This year will be a good year without inflationary pressures.

The same newspaper, under date of December 28, 1959, referred to Mr. Churchill, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the following words:

> Current economic expansion without undue inflationary pressures, should continue in force in 1960 . . . The minister in his annual year-end economic review found the international climate 'particularly favourable' for future growth.

The Minister of Finance was a little more cautious. He hoped we would not get into a boom-bust period; but speaking in Toronto on January 12 last he said that Canada is moving into a period of economic expansion. The news item reads:

> Mr. Fleming said indications are that 1960 will set a new record for both private and public investment. Increases in investment for plant and equipment would more than offset the reduction in residential construction, he suggested.

Honourable senators, I quote these statements to remind the house, as I have said, that although we are not in a boom period, we are living under good conditions in a period of buoyant economy; and I ask myself, if in these conditions we have 800,000 people out of work, what would happen if we were in a depression or if times were not quite so good as they are now? That is a problem we must face. I think we must all agree that times are good in Canada, or reasonably good; but in admitting that, we must also admit there are 800,000 people out of work. Then we have to accept as a fact that from nine to twelve per cent of Canada's labour force will be unemployed almost continuously. Are we to be faced with the chronic condition of nine to twelve per cent of our working force unemployed in the best of times? That is the problem confronting us, and which this committee must try to solve.

The Leader of the Government has referred to certain powers of the committee. I am quite pleased with the terms of reference. I think the resolution presented to the house by the leader is a very good resolution. The committee, upon passage of the motion, will be authorized to study trends in manpower requirements—I am quoting almost directly from the resolution—and trends in the utilization of manpower, and will direct itself to an exploration of various methods by which a high level of employment may be reached. It will consider the over-all question of the growth of the economy. It will look into factors relating directly to manpower requirements and specifically will consider what changes have been wrought by technological alterations, and it will consider the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.

Honourable senators, as I have said, the terms of reference are very wide. A question was asked by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) as to whether this committee would be empowered to study the effect of trade on employment or on unemployment. I hope the committee will not be tied too narrowly to the wording of this resolution. Let us make this a wide-open inquiry into the problem. When someone raises a question as to some aspect of our economy or our trade or our way of life which might affect unemployment, let not some member of the committee stand up and say, "Oh, the terms of reference are not wide enough." Let us not narrow the scope of this committee in any way whatsoever.

Honourable senators, a moment ago I referred to the numbers out of work as given by different branches of the Government. We have been getting three sets of figures for some time. The Department of Labour gives out two figures. It gives out the number of those who are seeking employment. The number of Canadians who are registered with the employment bureau seeking employment is always the largest number. Perhaps someone will say that is not the correct number, because some men and women who register with the department for employment have work at the present time and just want to change their jobs. Well, there may be something in that. Then there is the number given by the Bureau of Statistics. How does the bureau arrive at its figure? Well, it has representatives across the country in every town, village and city, who call on different homes, and they get a sample, as we would say, of the employment situation in particular sections of their communities. Their reports are then sent to the head office, and someone sits down and figures out that there are, say, 400,000 or 500,000 unemployed. That number is always less than those seeking employment. Then there is a third figure given out, that of the number of people who are drawing unemployment insurance. That figure seems to be the correct one. How can a man or woman draw unemployment insurance if he or she is employed?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Anyone who did would be guilty of fraud.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, be guilty of fraud.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We have a lot of those cases.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know if we have a large number of those cases. Surely there cannot be a great number of such cases. If there were, it would be a terrible slander on the working people of this country and I am not prepared to be a party to it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is slander to call somebody a fraud, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There may be some such cases, but I would say their numbers are few. However, I am not discussing that point at the moment.

I have given these three sets of figures, and, I repeat, it seems to me that the one nearest to being correct is the one which represents the number drawing unemployment insurance. A short time ago in the other house the Minister of Labour stated that officials from these three departments were going to get together and try to devise a scheme whereby there would be one figure only. I do not think much progress has been made in that respect. It occurs to me that the resolution before us is wide enough to authorize the committee to consider that question and try to devise a plan which would give a true picture of the number of unemployed. I think that would be a very worthwhile task for this committee.

I am glad the committee is to have power to send for persons, papers and records. It seems to me that there is a particularly useful field of inquiry in any rational attempt to bring some order, some certainty, out of the mass of conflicting statements which have been made about unemployment over the past year or so. I am not referring to the figures in this instance, but to the statements that have been made by various organizations and individuals as to the cause of unemployment and as to what solutions can be brought forth. As you know, we have had solutions suggested by a great many individuals and organizations, and I am quite sure that each one, be they businessmen's organizations, labour unions, Government officials, or political parties, would claim that the solution which they are presenting is the best one.

This committee, I submit, should hear any representations which may be made by any organization or any responsible group as to what solution they have for this problem.

We on this committee may not be able to decide which solution is best, but at least we shall then have all the solutions before us. They will not only be before us, but before the Government, and it will be a very worthwhile effort to have the solutions brought together and put in a form which can be easily read.

Honourable senators, I might ask to what extent the Government is responsible for a condition of unemployment. If I did ask, I know there would be many answers and they would not all be in accord. But I think you would all agree that a Government should endeavour to maintain an economic climate in which high employment will be the rule rather than the exception, and to this end consideration should be given to calling representatives before this committee from the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. The committee will also undoubtedly wish to make inquiries of the officials of the Department of Labour who are most directly concerned, and will want to give thought to the continuing difficulties encountered by the unemployment insurance authorities.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: How about labour leaders?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am coming to that in a moment.

May I refer to the suggestion that there is a great deal of fraud in connection with the drawing of unemployment insurance? Statements to that effect have been made quite recently. I will read one from the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, March 8:

> Rightly or wrongly, belief exists that many Canadians are applying for or receiving unemployment insurance without being entitled to it, this resulting not only in unnecessary cost to the treasury but also in distortion of our unemployment figures—something evil in itself.

We read statements like that from time to time. Also we read a statement which was made by the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour the other day, speaking, I believe, in the city of Montreal, where he is reported to have said:

> We—

He is speaking for the Department of Labour.

> —know that fraud exists. To deny its existence would be utter nonsense.

Well, there may be some fraud, but I say that too much emphasis is given to that aspect of the payment of unemployment insurance benefits, and I think this committee should make a careful investigation to find out definitely whether this fraud is as widespread as some people claim it is.

I should not be so heated in saying I do not believe it, because I am judging the case before it is presented to the committee. I am simply expressing my belief and also my hope. In any event, I am not prejudiced against those who are drawing unemployment insurance.

Honourable senators, the whole question of the payment of unemployment insurance is a very difficult one. As honourable senators know, there has been a fund set up and that fund is contributed to by the worker, the employer and the Government. What is the position of that fund? On December 31, 1956 there was to the credit of the Unemployment Insurance Fund nearly $1 billion—to be exact, $926,776,830.22. On December 31, 1959 that amount had decreased to a sum less than half a billion. On that date the amount was $471,094,255.96. And what do we find today? Since December 31, 1959 it has dropped to $359,949,456.11, or, in round figures, to something more than one-third of the total of three and a half years ago. That is the rate at which this fund is dropping. Honourable senators will also recall that the Minister of Finance stated the other day that the Government had made a loan of $19 million to the fund.

Honourable senators, if that fund can drop to that extent, almost two-thirds, in a time of so-called buoyant economy, what is going to happen to it if we have, not bad times, but times not so good as they are today? That also is a question which I think should receive the consideration of this committee.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Just raise the taxes some more.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I said that the committee no doubt would like to hear from representatives of the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada and the Department of Labour and other Government departments. I am also confident that the committee will be just as interested to hear from business and labour. It will want to hear from such organizations as the Canadian Labour Congress, which holds very strong views, not only as to the causes of unemployment, but as to its solution. I may say that the congress has already made searching investigations into this field, and I am sure it can be of great assistance to the committee. The committee will be anxious to have the views of the congress on such questions as seasonal unemployment, structural changes, technological unemployment, and the more general aspects of foreign trade, immigration and economic policies.

Almost as directly concerned as organized labour are the various trade and business associations, such as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The committee will wish to have the benefit of the views of such bodies as well as those of labour organizations.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Do not forget the lumbermen.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My honourable friend reminds us not to forget the lumbermen. Let me add that we should not forget the fishermen nor the farmers. Indeed, there should not be any limit to the representations which this committee can hear.

There are other persons who do not directly represent labour or any of the organizations which I have mentioned. I refer to the economists, some of whom appeared before the Finance Committee last year and were of great assistance to that committee. The committee to be set up should invite before it economists from our universities, especially those who have given lifelong consideration to the problems of manpower and their effect on the country.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to take up any more of the valuable time of this house. I feel that this committee can do very good and helpful work. I hope it will combine careful and thorough consideration with a sense, not of haste, but of urgency, in its deliberations, and that the report it eventually produces, after the scrupulously careful and earnest consideration so frequently given by committees of the Senate in the past to important national problems, will be an instructive and valuable document, directed to the assistance of those who make it their concern to fulfil the object which this committee will share with other responsible bodies in Canada, of maintaining and extending a high level of employment.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am very glad that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) paid tribute to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) as the man who had the inspiration which has resulted in the bringing of this motion before us at the present time. The original suggestion was put forward two months ago, and since that time the Government benches have been somewhat timid, afraid to refuse and fearful to grant.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not correct. I received the list from the honourable Leader of the Opposition only three or four days ago.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I may say it was prepared six or seven weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: This is a long-term problem, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Now that you people have decided that—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Go ahead with the subject.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Finally, the situation has become so desperate that even the Government feels it is forced to recognize that there is some unemployment in this country, despite the statement made by a minister of the Government that this committee is not being set up to deal with unemployment and that the word "unemployment" does not appear in the motion. As a matter of fact, it does not appear in the motion. But I thought I would assure the minister and the members of this house that it will be in everybody's mind, and more particularly in the minds of members of the committee. It is in the minds of the people across Canada who are thinking and talking about this.

Despite the failure of the Government to recognize the seriousness of the situation, the figures given by the honourable Leader of the Opposition were not at all comforting. Take any one of them and see if you can get any satisfaction out of them.

I remember the last time I spoke in this house on unemployment—I think it was in March—when members on the other side in their speeches were saying to me "Cheer up, things can be worse." So I cheered up and, sure enough, things did get worse. Today I am sure they are saying "Things can't be as bad as they are painted." As a matter of fact, at this time they may be even a little worse.

There is one thing that has not been mentioned. This committee in one respect is unique. As presently nominated, it is a political, partisan committee. Half of its members were appointed to the Senate by Liberal governments and the other half by Conservative governments.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: You have the power to change it if you want to.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As a matter of fact, I think we should make a change. Your suggestion will be considered. I will talk that over with some of our own people.

Such a committee has never in my recollection been appointed by this or any other similar body, because it does not reflect the house, as committees always should. It is dressed up to look like something it isn't. It will be unfortunate if the committee gets off on the wrong foot. I hope the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) will have an opportunity to support a motion to amend the resolution.

I said the committee is unique. It is unique because it breaks with tradition, with history, and is contrary to all democratic practices and usages. Never before has such been attempted. In effect, it says that the Government does not trust this house. But, on the other hand, it expects the country to have confidence in the report of the committee. It does say this, though, that the Government of the country feels much safer in the hands of the Senate than of the House of Commons, because it refused that house a committee for the very same purpose. I suggest to the Leader of the Government that the proposed membership of the committee is a mistake that ought to be corrected. Otherwise it will be a bad precedent.

I gather the purpose of the committee will be to survey manpower by having a thorough investigation of every branch of manpower. During the war we had a survey made of manpower with special emphasis on scientific and technical manpower, and it may be that we can locate that report and up-date it, not so much from the point of view of having to find employment for those particular people but from the point of view of their being useful in assisting us to find employment for others.

It is not possible to make a study of manpower without making a study of employment and unemployment, and employment must be studied industry by industry and area by area, because the problems are very different. This time we have to make a study that is thorough and complete. We must know who is available in this country, what these people are doing now, what training they have, how long they have been unemployed, and whether we should bring the industry to the man or the man to the industry.

There are a great many questions that we have not faced up to. We have heard much about statistics—statistics from the National Employment Service, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I do not think it makes much difference which set of statistics is quoted. In so far as I am concerned, none of them give the answers I want to know. If last year in the month of March we had 700,000 unemployed, and this year we have 710,000 unemployed, I want to know whether these are the same people, whether they are in the same area, whether they are in the same trades, how long they have been unemployed, and whether this condition is occurring time and time again. When I know the answers to those questions I can do something with the problem. If as a result of that I come to a conclusion—and I use this merely as an example—that in the mining industry and in the forestry industry there are just not enough jobs available for the people who want to work in those industries, then I will know that something drastic has to be done.

In the course of our investigation we must consider employment and education. Are we training young people for employment, or are we giving them just a smattering of training which inevitably leads them to unemployment? In other words, are we educating people for today's Canada, which is a different Canada from the Canada of twenty years ago when the emphasis was on agriculture? We need to face up to the fact that some people need job re-training in this day and age in order to make it possible for them to continue to be employed. The kind of a job they were doing no longer exists. The machine is doing it. You have to train such men for something else, and the Government has to take the responsibility for that.

We have got to examine very carefully whether the Unemployment Insurance Fund and the National Employment Service are fulfilling their purpose. Is the National Employment Service redirecting people to employment? Do we need a stronger Employment Service? What, if any, are the abuses under the Unemployment Insurance Fund? We have to admit there are some people who always try to beat the fund. How do we stop it? We have to recognize that at best the fund merely prevents a panic by tiding a worker over until such time as he is able to get some kind of employment or assistance. There is something more yet. We must examine what the federal Government can do to supply federal work. I think we should give consideration to the establishment of a public works commission on a continuing basis to take a broad view across this country, to study, investigate, and recommend what public works can be profitably done, and at what time of the year, and what effect they will have upon the local employment situation. Perhaps such undertakings could be integrated with provincial and municipal undertakings to prevent a potential distress area from actually becoming one. In other words, we need a stand-by anti-recession shelf of public works to be available on short notice.

Let me give honourable senators an example. Some time ago we voted this Government $500 million for housing purposes. The Government told us at the time it would be using about $150 million of this sum. It has now $350 million in the till or available. This money is not part of the budget, so it does not affect taxation one way or another. It is money borrowed, lent and repaid at a profit to the Government. Now we have a great need for employment in this country. The construction industry is one of the great employers of labour, yet we find thousands of people who could be working in the construction industry and actually creating and building who are not being given an opportunity to do so because of a lack of mortgage money. It is a Government responsibility to fill a vacuum, whether it be a social, financial or political vacuum. We have here a social and financial responsibility, as was so well expressed by a parliamentary assistant, yet the Government does not do a thing about it except allow the conditions of unemployment in this country to continue.

There are other things which we must consider while we are making this study. We have got to consider some of the side effects. Why do people emigrate from this country? Why do we lose engineers, nurses, electronic experts and radio actors? Why do Canadian nurses go to California? Why do

Canadian actors go to England? Why do electronic engineers go to the west coast of the United States or to New Jersey? This country has been plagued with unemployment, which has been particularly severe in the last three years. In March 1958, 10 per cent of the labour force was unemployed; in March 1959, 8.6 per cent; and in March 1960, 9.1 per cent. A 3 per cent unemployment figure is considered normal. You can allow 4 per cent, but when you run into the sort of percentages I have just given it becomes a horrible show and does not do credit to the country, the Government or the people connected with it.

Everyone regrets this unemployment but no one seems to be able to come up with a solution. It has become so deeply embedded and aggravated that we almost take it for granted as though it were normal. Apart altogether from the loss of productive capacity of the unemployed, there is the loss of their purchasing power, and an even greater loss to the unemployed people themselves—to their pride and self-respect because of inability to work and make their own way.

Whatever problem we have to face at the present time we have to keep in mind there will be a hundred thousand new job seekers each year during the 1960's. And we must not forget that we are now due for the baby bulge. A large number of babies who were born immediately after World War II are now approaching the working age. Then there is the replacement of men by machines, the normal result of automation. Within the next decade industry will further aggravate the unemployment situation by the development of robot machinery.

Throughout the discussion on unemployment, which we have had for some time, the surprising thing to me is that the unemployed have been so quiet. I talk from experience. I was once a Minister of Labour and a Minister of Welfare. There have been no protests, no hunger marches, no parades, no meetings, very few resolutions passed by councils and very few letters to editors. All that I find difficult to understand. I do say that if I were unemployed I would raise hell and I would continue to raise hell. There is not much of it being raised in this country. It is hard for me to know exactly just what is going through the minds of the unemployed. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) referred to a recent statement by one of the ministers that our economy is now buoyant and healthy. If what we have now is prosperity I am for something different.

I hope that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will take to mind what I have said about the composition of the committee. I believe he is making a very grave mistake, one he will regret if not corrected. This is something about which we should not argue. We are faced with a great problem. It is beyond partisanship and beyond politics and the committee ought not to get off on the wrong foot. We want this committee to accomplish something. Whether it does so in one session or in two sessions makes very little difference, so long as it is a platform for those who have some ideas to contribute. I urge the honourable leader to keep in mind what I have said about the composition of the committee, and I hope the house will see fit to endorse the resolution so that we can get to this job as quickly as possible.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I, of course, could not possibly allow a motion such as this to pass without comment.

Let me introduce my remarks with very sincere congratulations to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for his address this evening, but particularly for the courage he has shown in bringing forward this motion. The list that he gave of the various inquiries made in the past by the Senate is a good omen for what may be accomplished by this motion and by the work of this committee. I would remind the leader, however, to add to the list which he gave, which was fairly comprehensive, the accomplishment some years ago of the Committee on Immigration and Labour which made a most notable report after an inquiry extending over three sessions. The activities of that committee were responsible very largely for those changes made in our immigration law after the Great War which have done so much in assisting Canadian citizens to bring their relatives to Canada, and, to some extent, in humanizing our immigration laws.

Honourable senators, all my adult life I have studied and considered and been concerned with this great problem of employment, or its converse, unemployment. As a very young man, before I passed my twenties, I had read a great deal of the classic political economy, and some radical political economy as well, and all my life I have supported the efforts made by fellow citizens to have this subject of unemployment considered on its merits and a solution for its disastrous effects found and adopted.

As I read it, this resolution raises the whole question of the ownership of the earth and the right of mankind to live in it, and to live without paying tribute to others for the privilege of living in it. I have for many, many years been concerned with the raw places in our social system. The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) pointed out that at the present moment we are supposed to be in a period of good times. Well, we are in a period of good times for some people, but very bad times for others. When I consider that our labour force is something in the order of 10 per cent unemployed, with all that this means in suffering, degradation, and loss to the community, I rejoice at a resolution which raises at least by inference the great problem of industry and of full employment.

I remember the words of Goldsmith, when he wrote about conditions in which "wealth accumulates and men decay". That is the situation now, a situation providing great profit to some—to some of the financial institutions and others—and of great hardship to a very large number of our fellow men, where you have the two factors, the accumulation of wealth, on the one hand, and the continuance of poverty, on the other. That is a matter that is raised by this resolution, and I do trust that those of my fellow senators who are on this committee will consider the problem seriously and courageously face the facts; and, above all, that they will not spend their time on secondary factors and considerations and close their eyes to the fundamentals of the situation because privilege might be offended.

One of the great factors in employment is capital. I need not argue that question, for everyone here would agree with me. We need capital to develop our natural resources. We hear from all sides of the house and from all classes about the tremendous natural resources of the dominion of Canada and how blest we are in their ownership. Obviously resources are not of any value unless they are used, and resources cannot be worked without accumulations of capital. Yet we here have maintained a system of taxation which takes from the individual a third to fifty per cent of all he can earn, and from our corporations fifty per cent of their profits. Does that encourage the accumulation of capital, which is needed for the development of natural resources? That is one phase of our problem; that is our responsibility.

Another great factor in employment, and the greatest factor of all, is natural resources —land, both rural and urban, mines and forests, and so forth. These are the gifts of the Creator to all mankind. The development of those resources means employment, and their misuse and neglect means unemployment. There lies the problem.

Honourable senators, it is not the value of our natural resources that counts in this equation, it is the price at which they are held. Let me illustrate. One of the great fields of employment at the moment is the building of houses. Houses that are in much demand; we have never adequately housed our population. The building of houses and the manufacture and sale of furniture is a matter of great concern to a very large number of people. It affects the standard of living of those who inhabit them. Moreover, it provides work for men as perhaps no other single item I could mention. The building industry is a great industry and provides employment for a very large number of men and women, but you cannot build a house unless you have a lot to build it on. May I recall to your minds a notorious example? A very prominent citizen of our province of Ontario sold a farm on the outskirts of the city of Toronto for $2 million. Why? Because that farm was required by the citizens of Toronto for the building of houses. The question now arises whether anyone could pay $2 million just to get somebody else out of the way and still make a profit on the enterprise. Thousands of other examples could be given. It is not the value of our natural resources so much as it is the price at which they are held. These two factors, the accumulation of capital for the using of natural resources and the availability of those resources are the fundamentals of the question of unemployment.

This resolution, in my mind, raises the whole question of ownership versus enterprise. If we are on the side of ownership, and the making of great sums of money without labour and without industrial enterprise, but because of the activities of others, we will not solve this problem. If, on the other hand, we are on the side of men and women, enterprise, capital and progress, then we will do what we can to ease the burden on enterprise and, on the other hand, we will see to it that ownership does not stand in the way of progress, of labour, and of enterprise.

The motion raises the question of taxation. Our system at the present moment—federal, provincial and municipal—penalizes enterprise on every hand. When anyone does anything that employs labour or improves the community we jump on him with both feet, and we allow that great fund, the value of land, which is publicly created, to remain in the hands of private individuals, to whom we give a free hand to charge their fellowmen as much as the traffic will bear without any limitation. This is the basis of the problem of unemployment. The overvaluing for sales purposes and for high rents of our natural resources and our own ill-considered treatment taxwise of enterprise, capital and labour are the fundamentals of this problem.

As I have already said, I hope this committee will consider these problems very seriously, because the lives of a great many of their fellowmen are involved. It is our duty to study the problems wisely, carefully and courageously. I trust that the committee will hear from all sides, and particularly from those who discuss the fundamentals, the political economy of the situation, and that it will recommend to the house real measures that mean something—let the chips fall where they may—real measures for the cure of the disastrous situation which we now face.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, this is a great opportunity for the Senate to prove once more that it can be equal to the occasion in discussing objectively problems of the magnitude of the matter which is referred to in the motion now before this chamber.

We shall not forget that our Lord spoke some words which can be recalled on an occasion like this:

For the poor you have always with you...

He also said:

I have compassion on the people...

The whole question of manpower has been put in a nutshell, in the resolution, summarized in a few words, and the problem is now before the Senate. The resolution is:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes; and

b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force;

And the resolution asks that the committee be composed of 32 distinguished members of the Senate, 11 of whom sit on the Divorce Committee. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker and honourable colleagues, that we are coming to the spiritual reform of the Senate, and this is the best proof that I was right when I said to my honourable colleagues that they could use their talents to much better advantage by doing something else than sitting on the Divorce Committee. You have the proof in the eating of the pudding. I was ridiculed at the time, but it was the interests of the Senate I was defending, and it is because I have a very high opinion of my colleagues that I made a suggestion like that and I never thought that I would so soon have the confirmation of the truth of what I said then.

But leaving this aside, my colleagues will have a tremendous work to accomplish for the public good of Canada, not only to give employment but also to prevent labour troubles. Naturally, it will be a burden on their shoulders, but the Canadian people expect the Senate to make a thorough study of the manpower question and offer a practical solution, make practical suggestions to the Government. The committee is to be composed of members who belong to all political parties, at least in this chamber, and so we are sure the work accomplished by the committee will be praiseworthy. My duty in the first place is to congratulate the sponsor of this resolution (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), to congratulate my honourable colleagues who have spoken so well on the subject, and to congratulate those important senators who will sit on that committee and will sacrifice their leisure in order to serve the public in most trying times. I realize the work that they will have to do.

Now it is my duty and my satisfaction to tell my honourable colleagues and the country that the expectation of the Canadian people at large is that the Senate of Canada will once again be equal to the occasion, as it was when a special committee under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), investigated the problem of narcotic drugs traffic in Canada, and when the Committee on Finance under the chairmanship of the late lamented Senator Hawkins did very fine work. Mention could be made of many other committees, such as the Tourist Traffic Committee and the Special Committee on Land Use, under the chairmanship of two distinguished senators. Indeed, mention can be made of every committee of the Senate, including the Divorce Committee, whose members I have often praised for the work they are doing to meet the exigencies imposed upon us by the British North America Act.

Honourable senators, I am sure nobody will be disappointed. Big business as well as labour will be thankful to the Parliament of Canada, and especially to the Senate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, debate adjourned.

"VISIT TO THE SENATE OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENT MEMBERS OF THE CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. Aiken. Mr. President, the presence today, in the Senate Chamber, of a considerable number of good-looking gentlemen does not mean that recently there have been special elections for the Senate in twenty-four states. Instead, it means that we are privileged, indeed, to welcome twenty-four members of the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. President, as Chairman of the Senate delegation to the third meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, it gives me great pleasure to welcome to the Senate and to introduce to my colleagues here the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament who are delegates to this third meeting.

This is a great occasion. We have had smaller groups of members of the Canadian Parliament in Washington during the several planning meetings which have led to the formation of this interparliamentary group. But today we are happy to welcome the full twenty-four members of the Canadian delegation.

I would remind my colleagues that last June, in connection with the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Canadian Parliament welcomed twenty-four members of the U.S. Congress to Montreal and to Ottawa, for a most successful meeting of the group. On that occasion, the Canadian Parliament not only welcomed the twenty-four members of our Congress who officially attended the dedication of the Seaway and the meetings in Ottawa, but also welcomed and royally entertained about twice as many more members of our Congress—I believe there were approximately seventy of us, in all—who at that time went to Canada.

Our meetings here, today and tomorrow, are concerned principally with three subjects:

First, defense cooperation and disarmament.

Second, boundary problems, such as the development of the Columbia River Basin, and other matters pertaining to the waters of the international boundary.

Third, economic problems which are common to both countries, such as our relations with the European Common Market.

On Saturday and Sunday, as many of the members of the group as possible will visit the Strategic Air Command Base in Nebraska and the Joint Canada-United States Air Defence Command in Colorado.

They will be accompanied by as many of our own legislative body as can find it possible to attend.

Mr. President, I have one concern: I worry a great deal that members of our Senate and House of Representatives will not be able to match the splendid hospitality and the friendliness with which we were received last summer in Canada. I can only say that we shall do our best. We are doing very well so far, in so far as the weather is concerned: and we hope this beautiful weather will last while our visitors are with us.

Mr. President, at this time I shall introduce to the Senate the members of the Canadian delegation:

First, The Honourable Mark R. Drouin, Speaker of the Canadian Senate. (applause)

The Honourable Roland Michener, Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. (applause)

The other members of the Canadian Senate who are with us are:

Senator F. M. Blois (applause)

Senator T. D'Arcy Leonard (applause)

Senator Sydney J. Smith (applause)

Senator Arthur L. Beaubien (applause)

Senator W. R. Brunt (applause)

The members of the Canadian House of Commons, besides Speaker Michener, are:

Mr. Wm. Anderson (applause)

Mr. Armand Dumas (applause)

Mr. G. E. Halpenny (applause)

Mr. Paul T. Hellyer (applause)

Mr. H. W. Herridge (applause)

Mr. H. M. Horner (applause)

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (applause)

Mr. A. J. McGrath (applause)

Mr. McGrath is the first representative to be elected from Newfoundland.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (applause)

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (applause)

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (applause)

Mr. R. D. C. Stewart (applause)

Mr. Reynold Rapp (applause)

Mr. M. Bourbonnais (applause)

Mr. Neil Spencer (applause)

Mr. Erik Nielsen (applause)

Mr. Nielsen's best-known constituent, I think, is Dangerous Dan McGrew. Is not that correct! Is he not from your district? Well, I believe he is almost from that district —from the Northwest.

And, finally, Mr. J. R. Keays. (applause)

Mr. President, I join all my colleagues in welcoming to the Senate these distinguished visitors.

(Prolonged applause—Senators rising)

Mr. Mansfield. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. Aiken. I yield.

Mr. Mansfield. I should like to join my distinguished colleague, the senior senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken), the Chairman of the U.S. Senate Section of the Joint United States-Canadian group, in extending our warmest welcome to the distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament who are honouring us today by their visit here.

Mr. President, this morning we were honoured to have the Secretary of State extend greetings to the joint committee, at the opening of the first session.

I should like to join in extending greetings to the distinguished members of the Canadian parliamentary delegation who honour our Nation and the Senate by this visit. It is a great pleasure and a great privilege to have them call on us.

Let me say that for too many years we have had a paradox in the relations between the people of the United States and the people of Canada. Between us there has been no significant geographic or political barrier. Between us there has been no significant cultural or linguistic barrier. On the contrary, in all these basic matters, the two nations are in every sense neighbours and very close neighbours. In spite of this, our knowledge of each other as people, our awareness of each other's human hopes, human interests, and human problems has been remarkably limited. In short we have been close in the abstract, but rather distant in the specifics.

I do not think the people of the United States have wanted it that way. I do not think the people of Canada have wanted it that way. It has been one of those things which just happens without anyone knowing quite why it happens.

I believe that this paradox may now be drawing to an end. I believe that those of us who, as representatives, are closest to our respective peoples, can do much to bring it to an end. We can do so by not only reaffirming, in these binational meetings, our obvious but abstract closeness, but also by trying to bring about a similar closeness in the specifics.

Once again, I join in bidding you a warm welcome. I hope your stay among us will be pleasant, and that the deliberations of the interparliamentary group will be most fruitful.

Mr. Dirksen. Mr. President, will the distinguished senator from Vermont indulge me for a moment?

Mr. Aiken. I certainly am very happy to yield to the distinguished minority leader, inasmuch as I am occupying his seat at the present time.

Mr. Dirksen. I fully concur in and associate myself with the sentiments expressed by the acting majority leader (Mr. MANSFIELD). I emphasize to our visitors that it is always a delight and always a pleasure to have you come. We have the identity of common traditions and common language which make it easy for us to understand each other.

I doubt whether there exists a paradox in what my distinguished friend from Montana has indicated, namely, that we have not come together more frequently. I think that fact comes about as a result of the deep trust and confidence that we have in you and that you have in us, and out of it there comes a singular affection which requires no cementing in order to keep the felicity and the fire of friendship alive from year to year and from generation to generation.

What a happy thought it is, while the boundaries between countries in other sections of the world are mounted with patrols and there is consternation and anxiety, that no patrols, no impediments, no difficulties stand in the way of the boundaries that separate us, because those boundaries are fairly invisible.

I think it is a testimony to the understanding that we have mutually, you of us and we of you; and I am confident, on the basis of what the past has indicated, that it will always be that way.

So let me join with my distinguished colleague from Vermont in extending to you the hand of fellowship, and to utter the hope, in line with the sentiment expressed by the acting majority leader, that there will come about a greater interplay, a greater and more felicitous relationship, as time goes on; that more of our people will go across the boundary, and more of your people will come here, so that we can say in truth and in fact that there is indeed a durable and abiding and integrated friendship that shall last forever.

So, gentlemen, welcome to this parliamentary sanctum.

Mr. Keating. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. Aiken. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. Keating. As a very close neighbour of Canada, I wish to join in this tribute which has been paid, and the warm welcome which we are extending to our brethren from Canada.

My home is in Rochester, N.Y., and for many years it has been said that from the harbor in Rochester one cannot see Canada, but, for some reason, from the Canadian side, one can see Rochester. I do not know why it is, unless our brethren from Canada have greater perception. But, at least, that story is told.

In any case, we are neighbors, and visit frequently back and forth. We have fine rivalry in yachting, where sometimes we have gotten the short end of the stick.

The University of Rochester, of which I have the honor to be a graduate, has established a special program for Canadian studies, with which many of you may be familiar. I hope this pioneering venture will stimulate other institutions to establish courses and studies on Canada and on Canadian-American relations.

The institution of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, linking legislators from the two countries, is certainly a fine step in the right direction in bringing our two countries closer together. We do have many problems, and this is a fine opportunity for an interchange of views on those problems, in which I am happy to be a participant.

Finally, I want to say to our friends from Canada that we who serve here, and many of us who served in the House of Representatives, are very proud of the representative of our country in your country, the Honorable Richard B. Wigglesworth, who served with great distinction in the Congress of the United States. I know, from talking to my Canadian friends, he has done a fine job there.

Ambassador Wigglesworth understands your problems and aspirations. He loves your people. He is fully cognizant of the interdependence of the two countries. I know he will continue to serve us in noble fashion in your country. I hope he will be as popular with you as he was with us.

It is wonderful to have you with us, and we hope you will soon be back again.

Mr. Morse. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Aiken. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. Morse. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and as a member of the Subcommittee of United States-Canadian Affairs, I wish to join in this Senate welcome to our Canadian colleagues. I say 'Colleagues' Mr. President, because we are engaged in a joint enterprise, it seems to me, at all times, connected with our common heritage.

I want to comment briefly upon that common heritage, because the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States inherited the same system for protecting individual rights, to which we are dedicated, namely the Anglo-Saxon system of justice. That is the system of government by law I speak of when I refer to protecting the freedom of individuals, and the perpetuation of individual rights.

I know I do not need to say this to our Canadian friends, but I think it must be reiterated time and time again in our two countries that freedom for the individual, including civil liberties, would not be in existence in our countries had we not inherited the Anglo-Saxon system of justice. Our mutual system of jurisprudence is based upon fair procedures for settling disputes among litigants. It is based upon a legal truism that the substantive legal rights of the citizens of our two countries can never be any better than their procedural rights.

I would have you remember, as you participate with us as colleagues in these interparliamentary conferences, that we have a dedicated duty to carry that idea of justice to the rest of the world. After all, it is the British Commonwealth of Nations and the United States along with the other nations in the free segment of the world that have in our time a great moral duty to further the cause of winning the peace through a system of internal justice by fair procedures of international law. I think our generation offers the only time mankind will ever have that opportunity, because if we fail in our time, I think it is going to be the end of civilization as we know it in our countries. We have this dedicated duty to extend the basic principles of Anglo-Saxon justice to international justice.

We have a duty as I see it, before it is too late, to join in trying to establish a system of international justice through law, enforced by procedures through such an organization as the United Nations, for the settlement of disputes which threaten the peace of the world. If our two parliaments, acting together, can advance in the slightest degree the cause of a needed system of international justice through law, then our meetings, in my judgment, will truly be historic and we shall make a great contribution to the peace of the world.

The Vice President. The Chair wishes to say it is the custom of the Senate that the Presiding Officer is allowed to speak only when he makes a ruling or breaks a tie vote. In the past seven years there have been only seven occasions when I have been able to break a tie vote.

One exception of the rule regarding the Presiding Officer speaking is when there are distinguished visitors in the Senate Chamber, as there are today.

I know there is little which can be added to the eloquent statements made on both sides of the aisle, but I should like to say that as we consider the good fortune of our own country during the time of our existence, and as we consider our economic progress and our strength today, all Americans should be reminded from time to time, as your visit reminds us, that this has been to a great extent made possible because we have had throughout our history a friendly neighbor along 3,000 miles of our border. We have often thought what would have been the case had we not had a friendly neighbor. The United States would have had to maintain military forces along our northern border, as would have Canada, of course, with the result that neither country could have reached the economic position we both enjoy today.

This is for us a very historic occasion. It is a historic occasion for the Senate and for me personally to be allowed to speak on an occasion in the Senate. (Applause.)"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

1. That Homer E. Facto, Cleaner and Helper, Senate, be retired on August 1, 1960, and be granted an allowance under the provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

2. That Mr. Facto be granted, in lieu of five months' retiring leave with pay, a gratuity equal to the difference between five months' salary and annuity for that period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SEVENTH REPORT

Hon. Mr. Brunt presented the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Report read by the Clerk Assistant:

Your committee recommend that in the present and each subsequent calendar year the Speaker of the Senate be reimbursed from the funds of the Senate for entertainment expenditures necessarily incurred by him in the discharge of the duties of the office of Speaker of the Senate in an amount up to, but not exceeding, the sum of $2,000, upon presentation to the Accountant of the Senate of paid vouchers for such expenditures.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the first two reports that have been tabled speak for themselves. Probably the Deputy Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Brunt) may have a few words of explanation on this report?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I was going to make an explanation tomorrow when the reports are being considered. I did not bring all the data down from my office this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

EIGHTH REPORT

Hon. Mr. Brunt presented the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Report read by the Clerk Assistant:

Your committee recommend that the Plan of Organization of the Senate be amended by adding thereto one additional Parliamentary Reporter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 380 to 392, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PSYCHIATRISTS EMPLOYED BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

COMPLAINT RE ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have reason to complain about the inaccuracy of an answer given by the Department of Justice with regard to psychiatrists employed by the Government of Canada. I refer to Hansard of May 4, at pages 523 and 524 where my inquiry appears as follows:

1. Are there any psychiatrists who have been employed by the Government of Canada during each one of the last ten years?
2. If so, (a) by what department?
(b) who were they? and
(c) how much was paid to each one of them?

The answer to those questions in my inquiry was quite satisfactory.

Questions 3 and 4 were as follows:

3. Referring to the information given to the Senate by the Department of Justice on March 15, Senate Hansard, 1960, p. 340, did those psychiatrists recommend clemency for each person sentenced to capital punishment from 1950 inclusive to March 10, 1960?
4. If not, what was the number of such cases for which there was no recommendation from them for clemency?

The first part of the answer, a statement by the Leader of the Government, was printed in type of the usual size. Then, on page 524, the answer to questions 3 and 4 was printed in the smallest type there is. It is difficult to read, but I will try to read it:

3 and 4. In preparing capital cases for review by the Governor in Council, the present practice of the Department of Justice is to have any psychiatric examination deemed necessary performed by a practising psychiatrist other than a member of the staff of a department of the Government of Canada. In the provinces other than Quebec, the psychiatrist consulted is Dr. J. P. S. Cathcart.

That is all that is said about Dr. Cathcart, and he is precisely the one about whom I want to have information, on account of the fact that he gave an interview to Maclean's magazine which was published in the issue of February 13, 1960. On a question of privilege, honourable senators, I cannot understand how it is that we members of the Senate cannot have information from the department about the doings of that psychiatrist, especially when he himself gives such lengthy interviews to the press. What has been paid to him, and what he has reported to the department, should be told us. We should be informed about it so that we may know whether he tells the truth when he speaks to the press. I am utterly dissatisfied with the answer that has been given by the Department of Justice, and I want it to be completed and exemplified with all the data that goes with it.

MANPOWER AND EMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine:

1. That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:
(a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes; and
(b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.
2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Blois, Bouffard, Brunt, Buchanan, Burchill, Cameron, Choquette, Connolly, (Ottawa West), Courtemanche, Croll, Emerson, Haig, Higgins, Hnatyshyn, Horner, Hugessen, Inman, Irvine, Lambert, Leonard, MacDonald, Méthot, Monette, Pratt, Reid, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Thorvaldson, Vaillancourt, Wall, White and Wilson (32);
3. That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and
4. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I do not see my way clear to join in the enthusiasm of the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) in respect to the degree of good that can be accomplished by inquiring into this question. Stripped of all the verbiage with which it was surrounded by the various proponents, it comes down to the fact that both those honourable gentlemen and others who have supported the idea are alarmed at the growing unemployment in Canada and the strong prospect that it will continue, and continue to a very great degree. Inasmuch as it is bound up with a subject in which I am greatly interested, and in which I have been interested over a long period of years, I will say frankly to this house that it does not surprise me at all to find that this situation is developing. Over the years I have repeatedly drawn to the attention of this house the situation which has been developing, in the hope that someone would take action with respect to it. Rather than invite countless people to come and tell us something we already know, that there is unemployment in this country, I would harness the long experience of the members of the Senate in an effort to propound a solution to the problem of unemployment. Honourable senators might readily reply that this is the object of the resolution, but I have very grave doubts whether any of the witnesses who come before this committee will tell the Senate anything we do not already know.

I do not profess to any superior knowledge in respect to the question, but it does not require any particular ability to realize that employment in this country stems—and this is more true of recent years—from four particular sources. First, employment has sprung from the sale of products developed from our great natural resources. Secondly, employment has come from secondary industries that have been developed for the most part to supply the needs of our domestic market. The third and fourth factors which have resulted in a huge degree of employment in the last ten years have been the extraordinary influx of capital into this country and our own extraordinary expenditures on national defence. I would hazard the guess that in those ten years Canada has spent something between $15 billion and $20 billion on national defence, practically all of which has gone out the window. At the end of World War II investment capital, particularly from the United States of America, flowed into this country to such an extent that you could not keep it out with a Gatling gun. In the last ten years we have had a huge annual expenditure of $1½ billion to $2 billion on national defence, and at the same time our overall annual capital expenditure has been something in the order of $8 billion.

I can quite understand the concern expressed about unemployment by the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate and the honourable Leader of the Opposition, and because of future possibilities both have taken a statesmanlike stand in respect to this problem. This is understandable, because the Department of Trade and Commerce records indicate no apparent diminution in huge capital expenditures in industry. I may say this surprises me a little, but it would not surprise me any less to find sooner or later, and I suspect it may be sooner than later, that this flow of capital expenditure will start to slacken. I was interested to read in the Montreal Gazette this morning a statement by the Montreal Trust Company. That company is responsible for the investment of large pension funds, and so on, and has utilized Canadian equities to a very great extent for that purpose. The company has now announced a change in policy and says that in future a percentage of its funds will be devoted to purchasing equities in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: For diversity purposes.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: For diversity purposes. Nevertheless, the fact remains there is no less diversity now than there was three years ago, and there is certainly no more. This is a natural trend, for no capital comes into this country for love of us, but rather to seek to make a return by way of profit; and if the time should come when there was any question about the possibility of adequate return, naturally the flow of capital to this country would be retarded for the time being. That is one factor affecting employment.

The second factor is our national defence expenditures. In that regard, I am at a loss to know what is going to happen. I have shared and admired the enthusiasm of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that some real disarmament is going to come out of the summit conference, but as time goes on I begin to have grave doubts that there will be any agreed disarmament. That is my personal view, and I do not claim to have any particular knowledge. In my judgment it would involve inspection over Russia, but I may be wrong. However, whether it means disarmament slowly, gradually, or more rapidly, it means a serious increase in unemployment in this country. On the reverse side, supposing no disarmament is agreed to in the spirit of anxiety and mutual recrimination that will surround the summit conference starting next Monday, it may be that we shall be in a position of having to increase our armament expenditure, or at least that public opinion will demand it. That would mean a further demand on our resources, and would have its effect on the cost of doing business.

So far as our national industries are concerned, apparently there is no immediate evidence of any material change, but there is ample evidence that we shall be faced with very grave difficulties in the future. The chief difficulty I see arising is in the lack of secondary industries in this country to compete in keeping abreast of the growing demand resulting from our expanding economy in the past ten years. That is the chief problem. I cannot really understand why we have any unemployment in this country at all.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Where is it?

Hon. Mr. Robertson: I am not speaking of this particular Government, or of any particular time, but in general. About a year ago I was in Scotland, and at the time the newspapers were agitating because of the unfair economic conditions that existed in Scotland as compared with England. I recall figures showing that unemployment was three per cent of the labour force in Scotland, whereas south of the border, in England, it was in the vicinity of only one per cent. Now, in Canada we think we are pretty smart; we have no small opinion of ourselves. However, I wonder what we would do if we were suddenly transferred to an area which has practically no natural resources at all, an area like the United Kingdom, and if we had to import all our raw materials going into production, had to fabricate them and sell them again in competition, and had to maintain a population of 50 million, and save something besides. Yet here we are, sitting on the natural resources of half a continent, and we have a population of only 18 million. Ordinarily, I would think there should be no difficulty whatever in employing every employable person in this country, as well as a reasonable number of immigrants from outside of Canada, which we certainly need.

In my judgment there is no justification for the present situation, or at least there should not be if we were as intelligent as we ought to be. Certainly we have the potential markets and buyers well disposed to consume our products. We are associated as allies in the Western world with members of NATO and others representing 20 nations whose 500 million people have the greatest purchasing power anywhere in the world and are essentially importers of raw materials who want what we have to sell. There is no reason whatever, as far as I can see, why we should not be supplying them. I do not see why our secondary industries are not able to get a larger share of the market we need. Subsidiaries of American firms are in an excellent position to do so. They have all the resources of research of their parent companies. The Gordon Report says that, broad and long, year in and year out, the average pay for labour in this country is 25 per cent less than in the United States. The research of these subsidiaries is inexpensive and they have relatively low labour costs. Why then should they not be able to have a larger share of the market in Canada than they enjoy at present?

I had hoped to read a quotation from a periodical that I do not appear to have before me, a year-end review dealing with the Canadian General Electric Company. It went on to tell how for the last period of years—starting, I think, in 1952, and accelerating in recent years—its labour force had steadily declined from a peak of about 85,000 to, they hoped it would be, 70,000 in 1959. Now I would have thought it would have been in a position to compete with anyone in this country. I looked up the return in Labour Research on the rate of wages for electrical apparatus workers in that type of work and found it averages 25 per cent under the American level. As I say, these subsidiary companies have an advantage in research, so why should they be constantly losing their share of this Canadian business? This is a very important factor in our situation and is going to be a very important factor in future. I do not think there is a single secondary industry in Canada today that is not faced with almost bewildering competition from without.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The textile industry is one.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: It certainly is one, and it has been in that position longer than some.

I was interested in reading a report of Colonel Phillips of the Massey-Ferguson Company in the Financial Times of March 18, referring to the progress of the company. Colonel Phillips, who is chairman of the board, pointed out that the company had added to its overseas facilities those already existing in France and the United States, to give the company a total annual capacity of some 200,000 tractor units. He regretted, he said, that at least some of the company's new facilities could not have been established in Canada. But, he added, it has become quite clear that Canada, as a part of North America, is rapidly becoming one of the highest production-cost areas in the world and those who endeavour to survive commercially cannot ignore this ugly truth.

I think many honourable senators here have much more access to business generally throughout this country than I have, but only a few days ago I went to see a friend of mine in Montreal who is one of the prominent officials in a leading company there, a subsidiary of one in the United States, and he was telling me about his problems from competition. His concern was competition from Britain, where his parent company has a branch plant. He said that in their major line here in Canada he could compete with any Canadian producer but that he simply could not compete with the British, so he had decided to carry on as agent for them, selling their products to his customers.

When I was in Halifax recently one of the few remaining industrialists there told me of the terrific competition he is up against on his particular product. I would like to ask that he be invited to come before this committee. He was inclined to blame his high costs of production on the costs of government at all levels. Others blame it on labour. But the simple truth of the matter is that today we are being priced out of the world market, and not only as far as our export industry is concerned, for our domestic industries are running up against outside competition that they simply cannot meet.

This committee will find out about all that. Honourable members of the committee might as well make up their minds that they will have coming before them a series of people who will be united as respects the seriousness of the problem, but there will be great differences of opinion as to what the solution is. Now, broad and long, I suspect that those who come, most of them representing domestic industry, will say there is only one thing for the Government to do, and that is to put up the tariffs or make quota arrangements. If you counter that by saying that under GATT you cannot do that today except to a limited degree, some will say, "Let us get out of GATT; we have to look after ourselves." Well, that is a fair enough viewpoint, that is a clear-cut viewpoint.

What I would like to see in this country is some group that would make up its mind as to what to do under these circumstances. Strangely enough, the only party that has come out plump and plain as a party on this question is the Canadian Labour Congress, which did so the other day in Montreal. It went holus-bolus for higher tariffs on automobiles and everything else.

The Liberal and Conservative parties between them are dodging around, sticking their toes in the water trying to find out how cold it is, trying to make up their minds what to do about it. But I am saying to you, honourable senators, that no matter how many witnesses come before the committee and what conclusions are arrived at, sooner or later you will have to face the question of what you are going to do about it. Personally, I am tired of procrastination and subterfuges, of postponing indefinitely a real coming to grips with this question. That is my position. Honourable senators, I have ideas as to what the answer is and others may have their views, but let us collect our thoughts and decide what to recommend. That is what we should do at this particular time.

I suppose I am particularly sensitive to these interminable delays because, as honourable senators may know, from a long time back I have been definitely interested in the attitude that Canada took when we signed the North Atlantic Treaty. The Government of the day refused to enter into the far-reaching obligations of that treaty until the partners agreed among themselves to co-operate economically, to limit trade rivalries and to strengthen each economy. I want to pay my tribute here to the farsightedness of the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, who was Prime Minister at that time, and to his associate, the Honourable Lester Pearson. If NATO had implemented their undertakings in that respect we would not have the problems that face us today, so far as Europe is concerned.

However, lest I make it appear to be a political matter, I want to suggest that there was no material division of opinion in the Canadian Parliament on that very point. Indeed, the NATO Parliamentary Association, of which I was the first president, and in which I took a leading part, came into being by way of a protest that NATO was doing so little. Associated with this was the present Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Gordon Churchill. They were as interested in economic co-operation and the necessity of doing something about it as any of us were, and what I cannot understand today is that they seem to have forgotten that stand. They have clear minds and they can see the situation. All through the history of these efforts there were numerous delays, the appointing of a committee to do this and another one to inquire into that. So ten years went by while it was being absolutely ignored and a year ago the alliance was practically split down the centre, between Britain and a group on one side and the Inner Six on the other. This development is so terrifying to the rest of the world which kept aloof from it, particularly the United States and ourselves, that we scurried over to Paris to see what could be done about it in the future. That grand conception to which we solemnly put our signatures under the NATO agreement went out the window. In January of this year a new committee of four was appointed by the twenty nations, fifteen NATO nations and five others, to report on what should be done. That committee's report was tabled in this house by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) only a few days ago. It is a lengthy report, and a good deal of consideration has been given to it. All that is contemplated is that in July of this year we shall again meet in Paris or somewhere else to decide the future course. Everyone knows that the results will not be ratified by the various Parliaments until 1961, at the least, and only then will we start to think about what we are going to do.

All this means delay upon delay. Governments are often blamed for delays, but we perhaps should not forget that Governments are harassed by what takes place from day to day. At all events, it is difficult for me to be enthusiastic about the proposal that a group of experienced men and women, members of the Senate, persons who know the score, should have to spend a further year or more inquiring into the question of a solution to the problem of growing unemployment. Let us rather get down to the basis of considering a solution. We know unemployment exists, and as things stand now it is going to continue. We know that people are not going to operate factories or in due course develop natural resources unless they can make a profit at it.

If honourable senators feel they want to spend a year and a half inquiring into unemployment, very well. Certainly, I cannot argue against the time, because, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) pointed out, this job cannot be done in thirty days or sixty days or whatever time is left between now and prorogation. I say, if we are going to conduct an investigation into manpower and unemployment, let us get down to it. But before we do so, let me warn the committee that it should not accept as gospel all the evidence given before it. I have had considerable experience in this house and I know what is apt to happen in this instance. Witnesses will come before the committee and express individual views and skilled counsel will draft a summary of the report of the committee. By that time the end of the session will be approaching, and unless there is something flagrantly wrong with the report it will be accepted holus-bolus and come to this house when there is a bare quorum left to pass it.

Honourable senators, that should not happen with this committee.

I am prepared to believe, despite my lack of enthusiasm for the committee, that under the circumstances it is perhaps the best we can do to help us to make up our minds. But I repeat my warning that the committee will be up against one of the most serious problems facing the country today and will have to screen carefully the evidence it is to accept.

I am not a member of the proposed committee, and I claim no credit for inspiring the idea of it or drafting its terms of reference. I will say this, however, that I have very definite ideas as to what is the solution of the problem which this committee will find exists. Were it not entirely out of order for me to do so, I would like to appear before that committee and present my views.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Robertson: I may follow another course. In the light of a report which was tabled in this house the other day, I had in mind at that time moving a resolution to ask honourable senators to collect their thoughts as to what we would do when we are called upon to act on that report. Make no mistake, honourable senators, we are going to be called upon to act. The inspiration for this committee came from the United States. The United States was instrumental in calling together the twenty nations and it is already giving a great deal of consideration to the basic problem.

As honourable senators may have noted, the Inner Six have had such tremendous success and growth by reason of progressively removing tariffs among themselves that they have accelerated their program to such an extent as to cause consternation in Great Britain and to cause grave danger of a trade war. But they are going to further accelerate their program for producing a single tariff against the world, which is a serious situation for all outside countries. My general impression from what I have been able to read is that the Inner Six will say to Canada and the United States: You object to the one general tariff, while we at the same time are reducing the tariffs among ourselves. We invite you to join us on a reciprocal basis.

When I was in Washington last fall I gathered that that was exactly what the Americans were working for, and the likelihood was that it would take place. There they have a State Department which for years has been under the domination or direction of a Republican Government, and regardless of what may happen in the presidential election there is likely to be a Democratic-dominated Congress. Consequently, after the election is over they are going to move. In those circumstances, if we in this country are foolish enough to listen to or accede to demands for higher tariffs to protect existing industries we are going to find ourselves isolated and alone, particularly if there is participation on the part of the United States. We must find another solution.

I read the report of the proceedings that took place in Washington over Easter, and I have noted what the Canadian and United States delegates discussed on this very lively topic. Let me say that we in Canada should be considering what position we are going to take in that respect. We do not need people to come before a committee of this house and tell us that unemployment exists and that there is going to be more unemployment because we cannot meet competitive prices. I would like to see us direct our attention to a solution of the problem.

I was pleased to hear the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) say that those of us who are not members of the committee are not precluded from attending its meetings and asking questions and participating in every way, except voting. My suggestion to the committee is that it should make up a timetable so as not to be placed in the position of bringing its report before Parliament in the last days of the session. If that happens I, for one, will protest most strongly. While I have every confidence in this committee, I am not prepared to accept its report without a close look at it. The subject referred to it is not one that can be studied and reported upon in a matter of days. I am glad to hear that the committee will perhaps carry on its inquiry for a year or two, but I regret most sincerely the necessity of further delays. I am convinced that among us we can find the answers, and the sooner we do the better.

Honourable senators, I have already spoken too long. I extend to the committee my hearty support and good wishes.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly in regard to the resolution for the appointment of a special committee of the Senate

> ...to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:
> (a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes...

As has been pointed out by previous speakers, we have vast resources in this country awaiting development, resources that would really support many times our present population. In fact, we own half a continent, and have far more per capita resources than any country in the world. I know that we have the brawn and the brain to do the job. Our national production and economic growth, of course, come from these resources. The instruments of production are labour, power and machinery. We seem to have these, some even beyond our present needs, so I do not think there are any bottlenecks in the production end of our economy.

I believe our troubles are in distribution. Our main instruments of distribution are the wheel, the ship and our monetary system. The wheel and the ship, of course, represent transportation, and the monetary system furnishes our medium of exchange. The latter is where the difficulties lie in getting what we produce marketed. In the east and west we are handicapped by high freight rates. Our shipping services are lagging. The West Indies are right at our door, for instance, and although they are part of the British Empire I find that the Americans are giving them better and faster service both by shipping and what are called box-car aeroplanes, which now carry heavy freight right to the islands. Then, take our monetary system. It is antiquated. Our dollar in foreign markets is unstable, as it fluctuates at the whim of speculators and debt dealers and we do not give as long-term credits to foreign nations on as easy terms as our competitors do, and they are more costly. Commodities are accumulated from our production resources and have to be stored in many parts of our country, and to carry large inventories we pay at least 1 per cent more in interest than other world trading nations do. When a sale is made, to be competitive we have to take either the British pound or the American dollar, as these are by far the main media of exchange by which business is done within the free world. Both are generally at a discount of 4 or 5 per cent, and this takes a great deal of the profit out of the export trade. I am sure our export industries could employ many thousands more people if they were placed on a competitive basis with those of other great trading nations of the free world.

Furthermore, this discount of the British pound and the American dollar is undermining our tariff structure. The fact is, whether in the domestic market or for export sales, our production of Canadian goods means jobs for Canadians, and uncalled-for imports mean jobs for outsiders. It has been stated that cut-price imports may help keep our cost of living down, but if they do they also deprive Canadians of the opportunity of earning a livelihood. It is a mighty dear price to pay.

At the present time our country is greatly worried over the loss of uranium exports, and rightly so. However, the loss to our industries as a whole through our unstable exchange situation, which is going on year after year, is far greater in dollars and cents than the potential loss we are faced with through the expected decrease in uranium exports, and little is being done about it.

If all these things are gone into I am sure the committee can do a good job for the Canadian economy, as there are many valuable sources of information that can be tapped, and many economic problems that are now worrying our country can be brought to the light of day, thus helping toward a constructive solution of such problems as unemployment and our unfavourable trade balance.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it is not my purpose to detain the house at any length in its consideration of this resolution. Before I proceed I should like to say that I found myself very largely in agreement with the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson). When I saw this resolution on my return after the Easter recess a few days ago my first thought was: "Well, why is it necessary?" The more I pondered that the greater was the difficulty presented to me.

I have noted, as you all have, that this motion was proposed in very enthusiastic terms by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and seconded in no less enthusiastic terms by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). And, of course, my good friend and colleague from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) excelled himself, if that is possible, in his appreciation of this resolution—the timeliness of it and the need for gathering all the information possible about this problem.

However, as I say, I was nonplussed when I saw the resolution because, in effect, it covers precisely the same ground that was covered by the Gordon Royal Commission in its inquiry a few years ago, and I want to direct the attention of the house for a moment or two to that fact. It is proposed here that an inquiry be made by a committee into two things:

(a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes;

That is another way of saying, I presume, changes due to automation.

(b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.

Those are the specific matters the house will ask the committee to inquire into if we pass this resolution, as no doubt we shall. The honourable Leader of the Opposition very wisely, I thought, entered a caveat that other matters should not be excluded from the consideration of the committee. I would suggest there is no more important subject the committee could inquire into at this time than that discussed this afternoon by the honourable senator from Shelburne. The most essential thing for Canada today is to find markets. Let us make no mistake about that. If we could find profitable markets for our timber, mineral, agricultural and fisheries products then we would not need to greatly fear unemployment in Canada. The important thing is to find profitable markets. I for one was very happy to see the emphasis put on this fact by our honourable colleague from Shelburne.

But to prosecute an inquiry along the lines I have indicated would seem to me, as I have said, to duplicate the work of the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects under the chairmanship of Mr. Walter Gordon, which made a prolonged study and examination into the economic prospects of this country. Honourable senators will bear in mind that the final report of this royal commission was made in November 1957. First of all I should comment that the commission was composed of these able men: Walter Lockhart Gordon of Toronto, Chairman; Omer Lussier of Quebec City, who is unknown to me personally but I am sure he is distinguished in his field of work; Albert Edward Grauer of Vancouver, a top-flight industrialist; and Andrew Stewart of Edmonton, who was President of the University of Alberta and is now Chairman of the Board of Broadcast Governors for Canada. The final member was Raymond Gushue of St. John's, Newfoundland. Let me comment that these are distinguished men.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. They compare favourably with the members who are to serve on our special committee.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I would concede that to the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Now, what was the Gordon Royal Commission authorized to inquire into? Here is a list of the subjects:

(a) developments in the supply of raw materials and energy sources;

That is the only matter that does not particularly coincide with what we find in the resolution before the house, but it could be included under the umbrella of this resolution.

(b) the growth to be expected in the population of Canada and the changes in its distribution;

That could also be covered by the resolution we are debating.

(c) prospects for growth and change in domestic and external markets for Canadian productions;

If this committee does its work when it calls representatives from the fields of economy, labour and business it will almost inevitably inquire into that matter.

(d) trends in productivity and standards of living;

Finally, and this is important in light of the fervent speech made last evening by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll):

(e) prospective requirements for industrial and social capital.

The commission was authorized to engage the services of technical advisers and so on. What was the scope of operations of the inquiry conducted by this royal commission? The commission extended an open invitation to everyone to make representations to it, with the result that it received and studied 330 representations from businessmen, farmers, labour and every other class in our community. Much of this work came under special assignments the commission gave to qualified people to examine and report on particular phases of our economic development. These included studies into the electronics industry, the shoe industry, the textile industry and, in fact, all our industries. And it will be of interest to honourable senators that there was an inquiry into the probable effects of increasing mechanization in industry. In the resolution before the house we use the term "technological", which is a little more fancy.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It is just a little broader.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes. The inquiry into the probable effects of increasing mechanization in industry included this thing we call automation. This study was made by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Was the Canadian Labour Congress the only organization which made a statement on automation? Did industry make any study?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have not noted that, but no doubt representations were made by industry from a study of the various aspects of industrial development.

There was a study on labour mobility, that is, the movement of labour from surplus-labour areas to areas that have not a labour surplus. There were also special studies on skilled and professional manpower in Canada; and also, which will delight some honourable senators, there was an inquiry into housing and social capital. These were exhaustive inquiries. Other studies were on the financing of economic activity in Canada, consumption expenditure in Canada and the Nova Scotia coal industry. There is scarcely a single aspect of our economy that was not covered in the surveys that were made under the direction of the commission.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask what was the date of the surveys?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The commission started its work in 1956 and continued in 1957. Its final report was made, as I recall, toward the end of that year. It is up to date, because basic conditions have not changed at all in that time.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I should have thought they had, after all we heard last evening.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I suggest to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), that instead of calling all these business people, labour people, and economists to tell the committee what was already told before the royal commission of inquiry a few years ago, they should study the recommendations of the royal commission of inquiry and see what changes, if any, they would propose. Of course, I think Canadians are a good deal like Americans—we love to have committees and commissions of inquiry. If we have a problem, the first thing someone wants to do is to call a meeting to consider it, and to pass a resolution about it, and when the resolution is passed we think we have solved the problem. Honourable senators, I would be very loath indeed to see any further growth of that tendency. What I suggest to the house is that we already have available for study data and information from which we can draw intelligent conclusions. We may not agree with the conclusions of the Gordon Commission, but at any rate we can study the data, the facts, which it analysed and form our own opinions. But let us not deceive ourselves that through this committee we are going to make any important contribution to the knowledge of the Canadian people on economic affairs.

Honourable senators, I have not very much more to say. It seems quite apparent that while the language of the resolution is general in character, this inquiry by a special committee of the Senate arises largely from the problem of unemployment and its possible growth, and from the problems of the Unemployment Insurance Fund. May I make another interjection here? Last evening the Leader of the Opposition gave figures showing the decline in the resources of this fund. The fund today is about one-third of what it was two and a half years ago. That is a very serious matter. The Leader of the Opposition very wisely and soundly pointed out that this decline has occurred in a period when we have been boasting about the buoyancy in our economy and all the activities the Canadian Government is engaged in, and at a time when the Government is spending more money annually than ever before in any year of the history of our country.

Honourable senators, if we are serious about our affairs, and I think we are, it is a prime factor for consideration that during this period of expansion, boom or buoyancy, our unemployment insurance resources have steadily dwindled month by month to such a point that the other day the Government had to transfer, or did transfer, by way of loan to the insurance fund a very substantial amount of money—I believe something in the neighbourhood of $19 million or $20 million. Let us face it honestly. Are we coming to the time when this fund will run out, dry up? Shall we have to face the prospect that the treasury will have to supplement the fund? Sometimes I think that in this house and in Parliament as a whole we live in a sort of "never, never land". When old age security was inaugurated, some ten or eleven years ago, the Government of the day came up with what was known as the 2-2-2 formula, meaning two per cent of corporation tax, two per cent of personal income tax, and two per cent of sales tax, earmarked for the Old Age Security Fund. We were assured at the time that until it got organized and going there might be need for some assistance from the treasury to keep the fund solvent. Well, anyone who has followed the experience of this fund knows that it has never been solvent in any single year—unless perhaps this year, owing to some changes made in the rates of contribution to it. We have paid tens of millions of dollars directly from the treasury into the Old Age Security Fund. I am not arguing for a moment that it should not have been done, although I have some reservations on that point. What I am trying to emphasize to the house is that we are apparently starting the same thing today with the Unemployment Insurance Fund. I contend that it was a mistake last year to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to the degree we did, in extending the benefits from 36 to 52 weeks and increasing them. I said so at the time. Now, the future of the fund might well form the sum of an inquiry by a committee of this house, when we could approach the matter in a non-partisan way, as we almost invariably do when studying a problem in committee.

There is another matter that I should like to refer to. I listened last evening, as I always do, with very great interest to my honourable colleague from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). The honourable senator advanced a suggestion which is well worth the consideration of this house. I think I know what was in his mind when he spoke. The principle he enunciated is that values created by the community should be retained by the community, and if a formula can be found to do that I am for it. We proceed today by a hodge-podge method. For example, in the city of Winnipeg, if I want to put some improvements on my house, maybe to the extent of $1,000 or $2,000, and give employment to labour and buy materials, what happens to me? The first thing that happens to me is that my municipal taxes are increased. In other words, by this method we tax industry and thrift, if you like.

Then I must say a word or two about the address of my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), for whom I have a very considerable respect indeed. If I understood his speech aright, and I read it again today, I think it adds up to only one thing, that Government in some of its forms must accept the responsibility to relieve and cure unemployment. My honourable friend nods his head. I listened with interest, as we all did, to what he said he would do if he found himself out of work. He would raise hell, and he would continue to raise hell until someone did something about it. May I suggest to him that fifty years ago his forefathers and mine would have gone out to look for a job, and if they were hungry they would have taken the first job that turned up. When out of work they would not have turned their eyes to some Government and said "You must rescue us."

There is one other matter that is very important, and it is implicit in my honourable friend's speech. I hope my colleagues will give close attention to this. Is Parliament to accept the principle that it is the responsibility of Government to find jobs for people who may be out of work? That is a very far-reaching question. If every person who is out of a job and whose unemployment insurance runs out looks only to Government for relief, where does that leave us all?

Hon. Mr. Horner: And he must be offered just the kind of a job he wants, too.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, of course, that is important.

The last thing I want to do is to criticize the Prime Minister, but I thought at the time and I think so now that when he stated publicly on more than one occasion that so long as he was Prime Minister of Canada no person would ever suffer from lack of a job he made an unfortunate statement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What did he say?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: That no one would suffer from unemployment and hunger.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He said that so long as he was Prime Minister no one would suffer from lack of any necessities of life.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Well, what is the difference? That is, in effect, what I said.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You said he promised that he would furnish a job for everybody. That was not what he said at all.

Hon. Mr. Farris: How is anyone going to get the necessities of life without a job?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is it to be the responsibility of Government to find jobs, to provide work at all times for the unemployed? Let us face it frankly and honestly. I would like to see that problem discussed. I would like to see that principle argued back and forth in both houses of Parliament and in the country. If the answer is in the affirmative, if we conclude that it is the responsibility of Government to see that unemployment is banished from the land, then we must go the further step and consider how we can place our governing authorities in the position where they can discharge that responsibility. I think that is fundamental.

It is possible to cure unemployment. It is possible to bring about a condition of affairs, even in this country, whereby we would have no unemployment. But, if we do this we do it at the expense of liberty and freedom. The choice must come, sooner or later, on that fundamental question. As far as I am concerned, there is nothing I prize more in a democratic society than my freedom and liberty, because I am conscious of the fact that it has been secured to me by struggles down over the centuries. Am I to surrender that?

I do think these things cannot be separated.

I am pretty definitely coming to the conclusion that we have extended the area of governmental activities in this country in far too broad a fashion; that we are creating conditions which in the end, if they continue to develop as they have over the past fifteen years, will make democratic government an impossibility.

I think that country is best governed which has the least government necessary to maintain law and order, to maintain defence, and to see that equity and justice is done between man and man, industrially and in every other way. In order to achieve that kind of government it is not necessary to build a huge bureaucracy higher and higher, and dig ever deeper into the taxpayers' pockets. Eventually such a system will bring about a condition of confusion and even chaos that will find a solution only in some strong-armed intervention.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

WESTERN SURETY COMPANY— SECOND READING

Hon. John Hnatyshyn moved the second reading of Bill S-30, to incorporate Western Surety Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is for the incorporation of Western Surety Company, as proposed by Western Surety Company Limited, which is a company registered under the provincial laws of the province of Saskatchewan. The history of this company goes back to 1909, when Saskatchewan Fidelity and Guarantee Company was incorporated in that province. In the year 1949, when the provincial Government went into the insurance business, Saskatchewan Fidelity and Guarantee Company was taken over, with the result that in that year the former managers of the company incorporated Western Surety Company Limited, and have for over ten years carried on business in Saskatchewan under that name.

The business of the company so far has been limited to fidelity and guarantee insurance, and the name of the company well illustrates the objects and types of business in which it is engaged. The company's main operations have been in the province of Saskatchewan, but it is also licensed to carry on business in Alberta and does some business in that province. As its business has grown it has become desirable to incorporate the company federally to enable it to give more complete service to its clients.

I know from personal knowledge that the company has been well and conservatively managed so far, and if it is incorporated federally it will have no difficulty in meeting the operating requirements established by the Department of Insurance.

I shall not now go into details of the bill, because I intend, if it receives second reading, to move that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I would, however, like to draw the attention of honourable senators to section 3 of the bill, which states that the capital stock of the company shall be $1 million, divided into shares of $100 each.

I would also point out that section 7 (1) requires that before the company can commence any business it must have a subscribed capital of $500,000 and a paid-up capital of $240,000. In such event it can only transact the business of guarantee insurance and theft insurance. Subsection 2 of section 7 provides for additional amounts by which the surplus will have to be increased if the company is to carry on the classes of business mentioned in section 6 of the bill.

Until recently Western Surety Company Limited was controlled by McCallum Hill and Company of the city of Regina. That group has a very good name in our province. At the present time some 50 per cent of the interests in the company have been taken up by British interests representing established Lloyds underwriters, but the management is still vested in the Regina group.

With that explanation, honourable senators, I ask that the bill be given second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of Standing Committee of Divorce Nos. 363 to 379, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, reports adopted.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to require lenders and vendors to tell the truth about interest rates and finance charges. In too many instances the consumer who signs a document which places him in debt would have to be a lawyer to understand the fine print that spells out his rights and liabilities, and he would have to be an accountant or an expert in higher mathematics to compute the cost of credit in simple annual terms. Too often he is deceived into paying a higher cost for credit than he has been led to expect.

The borrower's initial interest lies in the clear-cut statement of the total obligation contained in the loan contract, and much of the abuse has arisen from the incapacity of the borrower to decipher the arithmetic of credit contracts. The confusion has been confounded by specious advertising with a combination of charges so intricate that even mathematicians have trouble in arriving at the actual burden on the borrower.

Whatever the interest rate may be, this bill requires that it should be specified on an annual basis. True annual rates run as high as 30 per cent or 40 per cent and are camouflaged in terms of rates which appear modest because they are stated mostly as monthly rather than annual rates. They are further disguised in the form of fees, charges, discounts and the like, all of which make up the true cost of credit to the consumer.

The average consumer cannot make rational choices in a free competitive economy unless he is an informed consumer. The Bank of Canada, in its most recent annual report, speaking of consumer credit, indicates that there was a sharp upswing in consumer credit last year, the largest since 1955. Total consumer credit is now approximately $3 billion, made up in personal loans from banks, credit from finance companies and retail stores. This was an increase of $329 million in 1959, compared with the credit expansion of $205 million in 1958. It was the largest gain since 1955, when the credit increase was $351 million.

Personal loans by chartered banks rose by $168 million and now stand at $779 million. Loans from small loan companies rose by $78 millions and now stand at $479 million. Credit from instalment finance companies, mainly on automobile purchases, increased by $28 million and now stands at $796 million. Credit from department stores rose by $33 million and now stands at $315 million. Credit from other retail dealers rose by $22 million and now stands at $601 million. I have already indicated that the total consumer credit now stands at $3 billion.

The consumer has every right to know what he is getting into. This measure will simply help millions of Canadians who buy on time, borrow from loan companies or use revolving credit, to shop for the kind of credit they want, and to know exactly what the total cost of the article or the new car is going to be. This bill would require that the consumer to whom credit is extended be given in writing two vital pieces of information—the total amount of the finance charges he is contracting to pay, and the percentage that such amount bears to the outstanding balance expressed in simple annual interest. Let me indicate to you what I have in mind by example. On the purchase of a car, let us say, the consumer borrows $1,800 to finance the car. Under the present practice he might be told he would have to pay $59.22 a month for 36 months, including interest at 6 per cent a year. Under this bill he would be told that an investigation fee would be $8 and the interest would be $324, making a total of $332, or a 12 per cent annual rate of interest on the declining balance.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: If life insurance was mentioned would the cost of it be set out separately under the provisions of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am giving some examples. I am suggesting what would happen, as I interpret this bill. Take the purchaser of a television set who borrows $180 to finance it. Under the present practice he would be told he would have to pay $11.30 for 18 months, including carrying charges. Under this bill he would be told he would have to pay $23.40 interest, or a rate of 16.4 per cent annually on the declining balance.

On a personal loan of, say, $600, under the present practice the lender might deduct $10 for life insurance premium, and the borrower would likely get $590, and repay $37.53 a month for 20 months. Under this bill he would be told he would have to pay $160.60 in interest, or 31.1 per cent annual rate on the declining balance.

When the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce of the House of Commons sat in 1956 the firm of Deloitte, Plender, Haskins and Sells, chartered accountants of Toronto, who are known to many members here, made a study for the committee which appears at pages 767 and 768 of the committee's proceedings under date of Thursday, July 26, 1956. I ask permission of the house to file these figures as part of the record rather than reading them, so that the committee will have an opportunity of looking at the record. I have them as Schedules I and II.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What are these tables?

Hon. Mr. Croll: They are tables of computation of interest. They take the sum of $100 at 2 per cent per month and, depending on how it is repaid, the amount of interest is indicated. The tables speak for themselves. My purpose in placing them on the record is to indicate to the committee that computation of interest is an intricate process. However, honourable senators will be able to draw their own conclusions from the tables.

SCHEDULE I

Interest and principal repayments of a loan of $100 bearing a rate of 2% per month and repayable in twelve monthly instalments.

	Monthly payment	Interest portion of payment	Principal portion of payment	Principal outstanding
Amount of loan—				$100.00
First month	$ 9.46	$ 2.00	$ 7.46	92.54
Second month	9.46	1.85	7.61	84.93
Third month	9.46	1.70	7.76	77.17
Fourth month	9.46	1.54	7.92	69.25
Fifth month	9.46	1.39	8.07	61.18
Sixth month	9.46	1.22	8.24	52.94
Seventh month	9.46	1.06	8.40	44.54
Eighth month	9.46	.89	8.57	35.97
Ninth month	9.46	.72	8.74	27.23
Tenth month	9.46	.54	8.92	18.31
Eleventh month	9.46	.37	9.09	9.22
Twelfth month	9.46	.18	9.22	—
Totals	$113.46	$13.46	$100.00	$673.28

Average principal outstanding during the year = $673.28 ÷ 12 = $56.11

Charge paid for use of $56.11 for one year $13.46

Therefore charge paid for use of funds — $\frac{$13.46}{$56.11} \times 100 = 24$ per cent per annum

SCHEDULE II

Interest and principal repayment of a loan of $100.00 bearing a charge of 2% per month compounded monthly repayable at the end of twelve months.

	Monthly charge	Balance of principal and interest
Amount of loan—		$100.00
First month	$ 2.00	102.00
Second month	2.04	104.04
Third month	2.08	106.12
Fourth month	2.12	108.24
Fifth month	2.16	110.40
Sixth month	2.21	112.61
Seventh month	2.25	114.86
Eighth month	2.30	117.16
Ninth month	2.34	119.50
Tenth month	2.39	121.89
Eleventh month	2.44	124.33
Twelfth month	2.49	126.82
Total of monthly charges	$26.82

Average principal outstanding during the year $100.00

Charge for use of $100.00 for one year $ 26.82

Therefore charge for use of funds:

$\frac{$ 26.82}{$100.00} \times 100 = 26.82$ per cent per annum

This bill would have the effect of restoring consumer sovereignty to the market place, where consumer credit will not be a merchandising tool but a financing mechanism, and where loans are not disguised as sales.

It is not the purpose of this bill to control consumer credit. The consumer is his own best credit manager, provided he has all the facts about the cost of credit. The bill will protect the innocent and the unsuspecting.

The bill rests on three principles:

(1) Because of the widespread use of misleading and deceptive methods of stating the price of credit ordinary citizens find it difficult to make meaningful comparisons and, therefore, intelligent choices of the various credit terms offered to them. Every borrower should have the right to full knowledge of the terms and contents of credit contracts, stated in a uniform and truthful manner. The purpose is not to regulate the level of rates, but that the consumer should know what the rates and charges come to. Surely he is entitled to the truth. Basically, it is as simple as that.

(2) The benefits of effective competition cannot be realized if the buyers, in this case the borrowers, do not have adequate knowledge of the alternatives available to them. This bill would help to invigorate competition in the consumer credit market by requiring a return to price competition.

(3) The rapid growth of personal debt can be excessive because of consumer ignorance of the full cost involved. Consumers are usually their own best credit managers, provided they have a clear understanding of all the costs involved.

I have here a document entitled Caveat Emptor, written by Bruce MacInnes. It has a note on it which reads:

It is the purchaser's own business to make sure that he gets what he is paying for. The onus is on him alone. Let the buyer beware!

This is a reprint from Habitat published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I want to read part of it. I could read it all so that it may be on the record. I propose to read one paragraph, and I will ask permission of the house to put the remainder in Hansard without being read. Second mortgages are dealt with, and I suggest this should go on the record so that it may be considered.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It should be read.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Very well, I will read it:

Instalment credit includes all consumer buying and borrowing for which payment is made in instalments. If used wisely it is a tremendous service and is the life-blood of a great industrial system. Without consumer credit, factories all over the country would close tomorrow. But if it is abused on a national scale it has a tendency to inflate prices throughout the whole economy.

A shopper buying on credit has a smaller scope in which to manoeuver. The cost of credit and where his credit is acceptable must be a prime concern. A man with cash in his pocket is interested in only two things—the best quality for the lowest price. Perhaps more important, a man buying for cash will think twice before exhausting that cash.

As a cash purchase, a large portion of the consumer buying for small items can be done at a considerable saving. For the larger purchases such as automobiles and homes most people are not in a position to pay the entire amount in a lump sum. But with a substantial downpayment they can still retain the preferred buyers' position and save thousands of dollars in interest over the long term.

I gather that the house wants me to read this rather than put it on record.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does the honourable senator feel that he should read the entire article?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The article deals with second mortgages in the housing field and is very important. I want it as part of my speech. I am prepared to leave it for your consideration but I want it to appear in Hansard. If the house will give me permission I will put it on record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps the honourable gentleman might again explain just what this document is.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation published it in Habitat, their house journal, and circulated it to all members of Parliament. This is an article which deals with second mortgages and is of political concern with respect to charges that are made for such things.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not objecting to it but I am wondering about the practice that may be established. I do not want to prevent the honourable gentlemen from putting this article on record, but it is quite unusual for a member to place in Hansard as part of his speech an article written by someone else. I am wondering to what length we might go if we develop such a practice. An honourable senator might take a twenty-page magazine article and say, "I would like to place this on record as part of my speech." I am merely drawing this to the attention of the house.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As a matter of fact, I am not putting the whole article in, but just a few paragraphs that are of interest.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps the honourable gentleman should read the paragraphs so as to avoid any problem.

Hon. Mr. Reid: How many paragraphs are there to be read?

Hon. Mr. Croll: A couple of pages.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think the honourable senator should go ahead and read them.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Very well. I quote:

There is a definite place for second mortgages in the housing field. A good many people are happily living in their own homes today, who would not have those homes but for a second mortgage. Like every other field of human endeavor, however, there is a fringe element in the second mortgage business which is ready, willing and able to exploit human weakness no matter what the cost to the individual.

When a man applies for a mortgage, a lending institution appraises the value of the house in question. They naturally check his credit rating and ascertain by his income and outstanding obligations if he is in a position to meet the monthly mortgage and tax payments. It is generally accepted that a man can apply up to 27% of his income for this purpose without impairing his ability to meet other normal obligations. A few case histories are perhaps the best method to describe the existing situation in the fringe second mortgage market.

In case number one a man wishes to purchase a house for $16,000. With land values being what they are, this would be a realistic average purchase in a large metropolitan area. He applies for a mortgage and the lender is willing to advance him $12,800 on a first mortgage. This leaves $3,200 outstanding which is normally the down payment. The purchaser like most Canadians has been living up his salary and can produce only $1,200. Somewhere he must dig up $2,000 and a second mortgage is often his only solution.

There is a greater variance in the rate for second than for first mortgages, but in the market today the going price is generally an immediate 25% discount plus a nominal rate of 7%, for a three year period. By the term discount it is meant that although he received $2,000 in cash he agrees to repay $2,667 and to pay interest on that amount. In other words, he is paying a real interest rate of approximately 32% on a non-renewable mortgage that must be paid off in three years.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would the honourable senator permit me to interrupt to ask a question? Does not the Canadian Interest Act at the present time require that a true rate of interest be set out in a mortgage such as this?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I think so. My reference is to a discount transaction on second mortgages.

I continue reading:

His payments on the first mortgage would amount to $81.90 plus taxes and on the second mortgage $83.25. If he is able to maintain these payments, at the end of three lean years he has a substantial equity in a house, although he has paid a very high rate of interest for that privilege. It must be remembered that in order to raise the $1,200 downpayment this man scraped the bottom of the barrel. He has taken on added financial responsibilities and he has no emergency fund. He is skating on such thin ice there is the possibility that with any financial reverse he will lose everything.

There is another type of deal which involves a little misrepresentation. In this transaction the purchaser and the holder of the second mortgage, in collusion, suppress the fact that a second mortgage exists at all until the first mortgage has been fully advanced and registered. The reason for withholding the information from the first mortgage lender is the combination of the two mortgage payments would be well over the 27% of his income which would keep him within his ability to pay. Or perhaps the lending institution feels he has too little equity in the house to be a good mortgage risk.

The unfortunate part of this arrangement, apart from its unethical aspects, is the partners in this sub rosa deal are not in the same league. On one side is a shrewd operator in the second mortgage business and on the other a complete novice.

Once again the house sells for $16,000 and carries a first mortgage of $12,800. Ostensibly the purchaser has a downpayment of $3,200. In reality it amounts to $500. To work out this arrangement there is a verbal agreement between the partners. The purchaser signs a blanket second mortgage which will be filled in and registered after the first mortgage funds have been fully advanced. The chicken is ready for the plucking.

At this point in the transaction it is very difficult to imagine what goes on in the mind of the purchaser. Either he is so naïve, he enters into the transaction without understanding the contract or he is contemplating winning a sweepstake within the three year payment period.

With a $500 downpayment he requires $2,700 to complete the deal. This will be immediately discounted the usual 25% and the second mortgage is written for $3,600. The purchaser has explained to the second mortgagee that he is not in a position to make large monthly payments. His partner in the deal, being the good fellow that he is, makes the payments $50.90 per month. His total monthly payments then amount to $81.90 plus taxes for the first mortgage and $50.90 for the second mortgage.

Possibly he is congratulating himself on making a pretty good deal, even though he is paying a very high rate of interest, but he is in for a very rude awakening. His payments on the second mortgage are being consumed entirely by interest and discount and none of the original principal is being reduced. At the end of the three year period he receives a notice that the term of the second mortgage has expired and the principal amounting to $2,700 is now due and payable in a lump sum.

This man did not have savings to give himself an adequate downpayment when he took over the house and with his added commitments there is no reason to believe he can raise the $2,700 now due.

He will no doubt find that his partner is not quite so affable when it comes to making a new offer. He will do business but the purchaser is now in a position where he must meet the terms or face foreclosure proceedings. To obtain a new mortgage he will perhaps be charged a 40% discount which means the reduced amount of $2,700 will now rise beyond the original second mortgage to $4,500. In other words, instead of a reducing second mortgage he has a ballooning type. This man does not own a home. He is the possessor of a bottomless pit.

In addition to this article, I make reference to a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 28. I quote:

Reports of bonus payments for second mortgages in the Oakville-Trafalgar area brought to light yesterday the case of an Oakville man who was forced to pay effective costs of 87 per cent on a second mortgage for a three-year period.

Then I would quote from an article appearing in the Globe and Mail of April 30 and datelined from Peterborough:

Officials of Peterborough real estate, finance and trust companies said today interest rates of up to 81 per cent for three-year second mortgages are common in the area.

Under the bill before the house the consumer would get the greatest protection by the enactment of a simple law which would require that all forms of agreement for consumer credit for amounts charged either as interest or as finance charges must be stated in terms of simple interest on an annual basis.

Consumers should expect to pay a fair price for credit, just as they should pay a fair price for goods they buy. But, just as they are entitled to know the exact nature and price of merchandise they purchase, they are entitled to know the price they pay for credit, in terms they understand. In a high proportion of cases the individual securing credit does not know the actual amount or percentage he is paying. Nor does he realize that our competitive system applies to this field of enterprise as well as to others, and that by knowing all the available sources and their true, comparative interest rates, he might be able to secure credit more advantageously from one source than another.

Under present laws and practices there is much confusion about actual rates and charges, which are expressed in such varying terms that only the most experienced are likely to know exactly how much they are paying for credit. It is reasonable and fair that different kinds and amounts of credit, with varying degrees of risk to the lender, should vary in cost, and we know that it is sometimes extremely difficult to determine exactly what rate is both adequate to the lender and fair to the consumer. Yet it is traditional under our laws and practices that we fix the maximum rates and charges that can be made by credit agencies. These legal maximums are now the major protection that exists against exploitation of the borrower.

The enactment of this simple requirement for a statement of true simple interest rates would, however, offer such an additional degree of protection that the exact determination of maximum rates and charges would be of less critical importance.

The statement of charges and interest in terms of their equivalent in true simple interest rates, and thus in clearly understandable terms, would make possible effective freedom of choice among competitors, a principle that is traditional in our free enterprise economy.

We depend upon competition to protect consumers against exploitation in many fields of goods and services, but competition can perform this function only when all factors are expressed in clear and comparable terms.

This bill does not tread in unchartered territory. We have legislation today that requires the manufacturer of clothing to show us the kind of materials that are in the piece of goods. We are entitled to know the percentage of wool. We are entitled to know the percentage of the garment that is cotton, Dacron or some other fibre. A similar situation exists under the Food and Drugs Act. Whether we are buying vitamins or cornflakes, the label must tell the buyer just what is in the package or bottle. We now label the products both of animals and the field. This bill requires the labelling of a human product—credit.

There is authority under a dozen acts to label meat, poultry, eggs, dairy products and canned goods. These measures exist for the protection of the buyer to correct abuses that must have existed.

People suffering from the credit virus can no more resist the institutional salesman than the gambling and liquor addict can resist his habit of addiction.

It is too much to expect honest and ethical lenders to self-impose strict rules of full disclosure and use of simple finance rates when competitors are eroding away their business through a multitude of more alluring but misleading methods of stating charges.

This is a labelling bill—it provides for the labelling of consumer credit. Throughout our country glib salesmen are pitted in unfair contests against people of limited means, with little or no sophistication in contract matters, and, in fact, no real defence against unscrupulous dealers. True, these are in the minority—but it is also true they are there.

The contract stands as the only evidence of an agreement. No oral statement of any agent or seller is binding.

The super-salesmen operate because of what the law allows, and this results in garnishment, bankruptcy, seizures, broken homes and debt enslavement. Credit contracts are so complex as to leave the buyer completely in the dark about the annual rate which he is paying on his loan. Very few buyers know or realize the rate of interest they are required to pay; misleading terminology is used and most people are unable to translate the finance charges in terms of actual interest.

Most of us are aware that the cost of instalment buying is pushed up by rebates paid by finance companies to automobile dealers when the dealers place customers' automobile loans with these companies.

There is urgent need for credit labelling legislation in order to contribute to price and production stability, to promote fair competition and to establish grounds for the exercise of consumer sovereignty in the field of credit.

Before taking up the points above, it is necessary to review briefly some of the profound changes that have taken place in the practice of debt financing of consumption in the past decade.

In the first place, the concept of collateral has evaporated. Even in regard to automobiles, long terms and rapid new car obsolescence have rendered the goods small surety for the loan. The resale value of other durables—white goods, TV sets, furniture, etc.—is so low in today's market that no lender considers them as collateral. Their repossession on delinquency is almost universally accompanied by a deficiency balance charge which becomes, of course, a lien on any income or property of the debtor. Hence, credit contracts for these goods constitute little more than an unrecognized wage, chattels or mortgage lien.

I have before me a clipping from the Toronto Star of April 6 last, which reads:

> An attack on the "constant barrage of propaganda" urging people to live beyond their means was launched yesterday by Vice-Admiral H. T. W. Grant (ret.), president of the Royal Canadian Naval Benevolent fund.
> Admiral Grant, re-elected president at the annual meeting, said this propaganda contributes to many present-day family financial problems.
> The fund's claims register showed at one end genuine distress born of unforeseen tragedy and at the other "outrageous financial difficulties attributable to human errors of the stupidest kind".

"And in between ... we glimpse the modern version of the debtors' prison."

He said that many families with reasonable incomes are "hopelessly in debt through purchases made in the first instance on credit and later financed by a series of loans at truly majestic interest rates."

On May 10 the Globe and Mail reported that the same man, speaking here in Ottawa, said:

Vice-Admiral H. T. W. Grant, president of the Royal Canadian Navy Benevolent Fund, said sailors are subjected to a constant barrage of propaganda urging them to live beyond their means.

One army spokesman said these soldiers aren't going into debt over luxuries. Most debts to private loan companies were on household furniture and appliances.

The dispatch goes on to say that hundreds of soldiers are moonlighting, that is, holding extra jobs to make ends meet.

As for moonlighting, one officer said that in Halifax many servicemen work long hours as taxi drivers. In Ottawa, passersby can see uniformed troops working nights as cleaning staff in private offices.

That I have not seen, but the dispatch says it is being done.

In short, consumer credit extensions today are made singly and solely against the lenders' expectations of (1) the consumer's ability to maintain current income, or (2) the lender's ability to exercise command over the borrower's assets via the courts.

To put it another way, in their extensions of credit for consumption lenders are looking first, to the Government's ability to maintain near full employment for surety; and, secondly, are depending on the legal power at their command to tap existing assets in whatever form.

A second concept of consumer credit that has evaporated, except in the case of a few of the very largest retailers, is the seller's responsibility for the loans disguised as sales. The retailer today generally acts as agent for a lender. Typically, the forms filled out by the consumer for the instalment purchase of goods have been furnished the retailer by a lender. All the conditions attending the loan, including a commission or rebate for the retailer, have been set by the financing institution.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What do you mean by retailer?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I mean the ordinary merchant who sells, say, furniture, takes a contract and turns it over to a finance company.

No longer does the retailer carry the consumer over a period of time as the general store once carried the farmer between seeding and harvesting. As soon as the paper is signed it is turned over to the lending agency. Only the old-style 30-day charge account offered by department stores can in any sense be called a retailer-carrying service, and this is the only form of consumer credit which has not failed to increase.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am glad you said that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am only relating the facts.

The retail trade press has been using a term for a number of years that best expresses the meaning of consumer credit in our times. They speak repeatedly of "credit selling". Credit selling means two things: selling goods on credit and selling credit as well as goods.

Credit selling is generally recognized as the core of present-day profitable retailing operations for four reasons:

(1) The consumer buying on credit tends to buy higher-priced merchandise—he is easy to "trade-up"—to buy more in volume and to buy more frequently than the cash customer.

(2) The credit consumer does not shop around; he "marries" his seller-lender.

(3) The amount of purchase per credit sale is larger than the cash sale, to more than compensate for the extra overhead of credit selling.

(4) Earnings on credit extensions frequently equal or better the net return from mark-ups on merchandise.

The National Automobile Dealers' Association, for example, reported one year, 1955, that the net profit from most dealers' operations was exactly equal to the small percentage return as a financing rebate to the dealers from the lending agencies to whom they transferred their consumer paper.

Thus, the advertising of debt as a way of life has extended into a national propaganda effort of great proportions. In light of the many-faceted, continuous and mounting sales pressures on consumers to use credit, the rapid expansion of consumer debt is not so surprising.

I have here a cutting from the Globe and Mail of May 5 dealing with advertising. This is from a speech delivered by Dr. Emlyn Davies, minister of Yorkminster Baptist Church. on the occasion of the third and final day of the Association of the Canadian Advertisers' convention. Dr. Davies, who is a member of the Board of Broadcast Governors, declared that advertisers are under a dark cloud of suspicion and doubt. He said:

Something of the phony, deceptive, and the false has spilled over into the realm of advertising, and the claims which once were acceptable are no longer heeded, because the essential element of trust has been spoiled.

He went on to say:

> Such values as truth and accuracy are relegated to the background.

Under those circumstances it is a little difficult to resist some of these advertisements about which this house knows full well.

Until a generation or so ago, the vast majority of our urban population had only limited experience with loans disguised as sales. For the most part, their familiarity with short-term indebtedness was limited to automobile financing and personal loans. Furthermore, there was and there still is a stubbornly held folk myth about 6 per cent as a legal limit on interest rates. Sellers of debts are well aware of the existence of this popular delusion about our usury laws. In their statements of finance charges for consumer loans the lenders almost always keep their percentage figures below 6 per cent. They describe their loan charges in such terms as 1½ per cent or 2 per cent a month.

Then, to make matters even more difficult, the time extensions on contracts are running increasingly to odd limits, such as five or eight months, 17 months, 26 months and so on. Under these circumstances, the exercise of consumer sovereignty in the purchase of the service of credit is practically impossible.

I close by saying this, that not since the days of Solon, in the seventh century B.C., has an untutored population been faced with a new medium of exchange in the hands of promoters. In Solon's time it was the introduction of coinage into a barter economy. In our time it is the creation of a deficit-financed purchasing power by signature on a debt contract. Unless and until we provide the means whereby intelligent control can be exercised by the debtor-buyer, the combination of heavy promotion to sell debt, plus the rising cost of debt-financed consumption, poses a perpetual threat to our economy. All this bill asks is that all the cards be put on the table, face up. I hope the Senate will endorse the bill in principle and send it to the appropriate committee for study—I suggest the Banking and Commerce Committee—where we can hear witnesses and have the opportunity of dealing with it at a very early date.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say. I consider it an honour to second the motion moved by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) and I congratulate him on what I regard as a masterly presentation of the subject now before us.

It is in the public interest that people do not rush into debt, at least debt that they do not understand. It is laying the foundation of disaster when people sign mortgages and other debt documents which they later will not be able to fulfil. A welter of mortgage foreclosures will do more to precipitate a recession than anything else I know. If my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina has contributed in any way to a greater reliability and stability of our finances, he will have done a great service.

When my friend asked me to second his motion my mind flew at once to something I hear every morning on the radio, when a honeyed voice invites the unsuspecting listener to the office for the solution of what is called his financial problems. It always reminds me of the spider that invited the fly into its beautiful parlour.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Can you quote "The Spider and the Fly"?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I could make an attempt at it:

> "Will you walk into my parlour?" said the spider to the fly;
> "'Tis the prettiest little parlour that ever you did spy."

Then the fly goes up the winding stairs, a stairs that some go up but none come down.

Honourable senators, I will vote enthusiastically for the adoption of this motion.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, until the past few moments I had no thought of expressing my views on this subject. May I say that there is some merit to the bill as it applies to certain types of business, but I disagree most strongly with the last speaker in his compliments to the sponsor of this bill (Hon. M. Croll) on the manner in which he presented the subject. I think it was most unfair to a large number of honest and reliable retailers who treat their customers as honestly as it is possible to do. I feel that he has discredited the merchant who is trying to carry on business in a manner in which we all would like to see business conducted.

True, there are certain finance companies which make contracts—perhaps automobile finance companies are a case in point—and immediately pass those contracts over to certain lenders in the manner described by the sponsor of this bill. But I feel safe in saying that at least 75 per cent of the retailers do not handle their trade agreements in that manner.

Honourable senators, I certainly wish to discuss this subject further, and I will do so if it is referred to the appropriate committee. However, I wanted to express these few thoughts at this time so that they would appear on the record as soon as possible after the remarks made by the honourable senator who sponsored the bill.

Hon. Mr. White: May I ask the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) a question? He referred to certain reports in the newspapers about exorbitant mortgage charges in a township near Toronto and one near Peterborough. I seem to recall reading in the newspapers at that time that through the Attorney General of Ontario something was going to be done by that province. I wonder if the honourable senator had considered whether his motion is perhaps encroaching on something that should be dealt with in the province.

Hon. Mr. Croll: All I know in that regard is that the Attorney General's department for the province of Ontario asked me for twenty-five copies of the bill. I could locate only fifteen copies, which I forwarded. I understand that the province, rather than doing very much itself with respect to people who are getting very high interest rates on second mortgages, is looking to us to do something of a concrete nature.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it was the intention of another honourable senator to adjourn the debate, but he is not at present in the chamber. I feel the debate should be adjourned and I move accordingly.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

REQUEST FOR REPORTS OF MEETINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with might I invoke the good offices of the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and, indeed, those of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) as well, to the end that the report of the Senate representatives of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group which visited Washington during the Easter recess be presented to this house at as early a date as is convenient.

I was particularly interested to read the extract from the Congressional Record which was tabled in this house recently. It indicates that matters were discussed which would, I am sure, be of great interest to all honourable senators.

Might I again urge that when the reports which we all await with interest are presented an opportunity be given for any interested honourable senators to discuss matters arising out of the reports. If my recollection is correct, the report of the meeting held last summer has still not been presented. I would ask the two honourable leaders to do what they can to facilitate its presentation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Speaking for myself, I may say I am in complete accord with the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson).

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I concur.

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONDUCT STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine:

1. That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes; and

(b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.

2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Blois, Bouffard, Brunt, Buchanan, Burchill, Cameron, Choquette, Connolly, (Ottawa West), Courtemanche, Croll, Emerson, Haig, Higgins, Hnatyshyn, Horner, Hugessen, Inman, Irvine, Lambert, Leonard, MacDonald, Méthot, Monette, Pratt, Reid, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Thorvaldson, Vaillancourt, Wall, White and Wilson (32);

3. That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

4. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I am rising at this time not because I am particularly enamoured of the motion, but because of the many speeches that have been delivered so far in this debate. I might suggest to the honourable senators from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) that they consider what a fix we would have been in had we adopted a proposal they once made to the effect that senators be retired at a certain age. We would have missed one of the finest speeches ever delivered in this chamber, the speech made yesterday by the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). I might also point out that had that proposal been adopted, I would not have been here to bother you with this small effort on my part.

The debate on this resolution has developed into one of moaning about the deplorable unemployment situation in Canada. Without accusing anyone of graft in connection with unemployment insurance, the very fact we have such a thing and the further fact that the benefits under the scheme were extended last year to cover a period of 52 weeks instead of 32, make the whole thing questionable. As the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said, the fund is being depleted. I have in mind a man who was endeavouring to employ help. One prospective employee, who was very ambitious, explained that he could earn a certain amount and then draw unemployment insurance. He said "I really could not go to work for you, because I would be losing money, and I enjoy myself this way."

I personally have asked men from all over Canada about the unemployment situation, particularly in Saskatchewan, which is supposed to be a poor province, and I don't know of any real unemployment at all. There are people who always have the desire to loaf. They feel they do not need to work and can manage without doing so, and God bless them if they can get away with it. During this debate the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) asked how anyone could obtain the necessities of life without having a job. I wonder where he has been these last few years. I know men in my own little town who are living far better than fellows who work hard. "They toil not, neither do they spin." They are on social aid, supposedly not able to work; yet they enjoy themselves, drive good cars, and all that sort of thing.

Honourable senators, among a number of things that bother me is an implied reference in the resolution to a high standard of living. Would someone define that for me? When I was in Germany I asked people if the railroads were busy, and the trucking companies as well, because from appearances they were. I was told that everybody was working, men, women and children, and that everything was going at full capacity. I suppose someone will say, "Oh, but that is not a high standard of living." Well, what is? Is a high standard of living to be gauged by the number of people killed on the highways every weekend? Is it to be gauged by the number of people who go out on the lakes in their boats, some of which are apparently not in very good condition, judging by the frequent reports of casualties? Is the standard of living in Saskatchewan, for instance, to be measured by the increase in liquor sales and the profits that accrue to the province therefrom, which are greater than the total provincial revenue was some years ago? And what about the increase in liquor sales in the province of Ontario? Is that how we gauge a high standard of living?

On Tuesday evening the honourable senator for Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) stated that Goldsmith had written about conditions in which "wealth accumulates and men decay". Allow me to quote the full passage from Goldsmith:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
> A bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That is what I am concerned with, the calibre of our people, and what our so-called standard of living does to them. Our most valuable asset is the men and women who make up the population of this country. That is of prime importance, and anything which tends to lower and weaken the character and standard of our people is certainly not in keeping with what is in the best interests of Canada. All this ties in with what we hear so much talk about, the man leaning on the Government. The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll)—I am sorry he is not in the chamber at present—made what I think was an uncalled-for and a very dangerous remark for an honourable senator to make in this house. I can well believe that he, too, might start in to encourage delegations to march on Ottawa. He declared that if he were out of a job he would raise hell. Apparently he wouldn't go out to look for work but would feel that the Government ought to find him a job. I deplore that whole attitude. Honourable senators will recall the closing down of the Elliott Lake project, and the assistance which people from there received from the Government. Why, bless you, all my life out west I have seen people move into large lumber towns and later on find themselves out of work there because all the timber in a certain area had been cut. But did they ever think of appealing to the Government to move them out? No. They made their own arrangements, went out on farms and homesteads and made their living without appealing to the Government. It was people of that type who built this country.

For a long time now I have been talking about the position that we are in. It is nothing new to me. In fact, I have been talking about it for more than ten years, and all the while I have been fearful of what was coming after the devastation caused by the last war, devastation that Canada escaped. When the war ended I thought we would soon be in for a difficult time because of our high cost of production in this country.

Everybody is talking about money, interest on money, mortgages, taxes, but no one will come out and say just exactly what the real trouble is. Eighty per cent of the real trouble is due to labour costs, not so much in wages, but in loss of production per man through shortening of hours, coffee breaks, and so on. That is the great difficulty.

Money is not sent into this country for love. No, it is sent in the hope that it will earn a profit. In spite of the labour and materials that we have here, what is taking place today? Many American companies, and no doubt Canadian companies also, are thinking strongly of establishing plants in Europe and Japan, manufacturing their products there and shipping them back to Canada. Why? Because people in Japan and Germany, for instance, are willing to work more hours per day than our people do.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity said that the increase in land values should go to the community. I would ask how the owners of land acquired it in the first place other than by saving money to invest in its purchase. I often think about a statement that the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen made when he was in this chamber. He said that we had got to the place, even in those days, where if a man was successful and made money he was denounced and perhaps looked upon as a shady character, but let him steal and get sent to jail and he had the sympathy of the entire community. We are developing that kind of attitude.

Now, so far as I personally am concerned, this debate, whether it has been entirely in order or not, has wandered far afield and covered a great deal of territory. The Leader of the Opposition remarked that the press was encouraging the Senate to proceed with the work proposed to be assigned to this committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That was true until yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, the Ottawa Journal gives little encouragement to us. In fact, I think it was rather harsh in its reference to this motion.

But the fact does remain that we know pretty well what is causing our high cost of production. If in other countries they are paying higher wages, they are getting higher production. They have a set-up through which each man performs or produces more per hour than we do in Canada. The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina referred to the lumber industry. Let me say that a man working in that industry a few hours a day, cutting logs for pulpwood, can make $24 to $30.

I think of this whole question in terms of what we are going to do with further immigrants. Well, this country is only half settled. I say let us bring them in by the hundreds of thousands, let us bring in people who will be willing to make their homes on farms that have been vacated by those who want an easier life, a five-day week and so on; let us turn these farms over to people who are willing to come and make their living on the land. There are a large number of vacant farms in Canada, and it might so happen that we would be able to interest immigrants to take over many of these farms and work them. As I have mentioned before, there is at a place called Hinton, not more than forty miles from where we are at the moment, a great iron ore mine, and working there are a large number of farmers who abandoned good farms on which they were making a nice living. As workers in the mine they have Saturday free for golf, and no cows to milk on Sunday.

I wonder what we might accomplish through the work of this committee. We already know about the manpower problem. Perhaps we might consider it in relation to the standard of living in this country and conclude that there would be a higher standard of living if many women who are now working stayed at home with their families. It would be better for their families and all concerned. More and more women are taking the place of men in industry.

The thing we have to consider seriously of course is how to lower production costs in every way possible. One important fact to find out would be what amount strikes are costing this country. I think of an instance that occurred about three years ago in Vancouver harbour. There the dockers refused to load grain ships and grain was lying in piles in Alberta. As ships cannot remain idle long, they went to Seattle and loaded American wheat, so Canada lost the sale of 25 million bushels of wheat as a result of that strike. I have suspected that that strike and others were possibly engineered from across the border, or by labour leaders who were not Canadians.

Honourable senators, this debate could be terminated by withdrawal of the motion. After all, it is late in the session now to proceed very far with the proposed inquiry, and so far as I personally am concerned withdrawal of the motion would be satisfactory.

That is all I have to say at the moment.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Kinley, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

NORTHERN PIPE LINE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. John Hnatyshyn moved the second reading of Bill S-31, to incorporate Northern Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, intituled "An Act to incorporate Northern Pipe Line Company", is designed to create a corporate entity to apply to the National Energy Board for a permit or permits to construct, own and operate pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas, oil and other liquid hydrocarbons within and outside of Canada.

While the plan of organization is not yet in definite form, it is contemplated that the company will have Canadian and United States shareholders of financial and business responsibility as and when it is ready to proceed with a program for financing and constructing pipe line facilities. In the interim, the principal beneficial shareholder is Minnesota Pipe Line Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Delaware, with its principal office located at Saint Paul, Minnesota. However, the extent of the equity interest, if any, which Minnesota Pipe Line Company may own in Northern Pipe Line Company when the plan of organization is put into definitive form has not been determined, and it will remain an open question until such time as the Northern Pipe Line Company is ready to proceed with its application to the National Energy Board.

Minnesota Pipe Line Company owns and operates a 16-inch crude oil pipe line system extending from a take-off point on the Interprovincial Pipe Line system at Clearbrook, Minnesota, to Pine Bend, Minnesota, a distance of 256 miles. The Minnesota Pipe Line system is currently transporting about 40,000 barrels per day of Canadian crude oil to United States markets. This pipe line system was constructed at an original cost of approximately $12,800,000. The replacement cost as of today would be approximately $16 million.

As and when Northern Pipe Line Company has been incorporated by act of Parliament, it is contemplated that an application will be made to the National Energy Board for a permit to construct a 16-inch, or larger, crude oil pipe line system from a take-off point on the South Saskatchewan Pipe Line system near Regina, Saskatchewan, to a point on the international boundary line between the United States and Canada near Portal, North Dakota, a distance of approximately 153 miles. A rough estimate of the cost of this crude oil pipe line system is $10,500,000.

It is contemplated that the Northern Pipe Line Company would connect with and deliver crude oil and other liquid hydrocarbons to a 16-inch, or larger, crude oil pipe line system to be constructed from a point near Portal, North Dakota, to connect with the Minnesota Pipe Line system at Clearbrook, Minnesota, a distance of approximately 340 miles. This, of course, is all in the United States.

The Northern Pipe Line system would transport and deliver to the United States pipe line system initially approximately 26,000 barrels per day of Fosterton type crude oil now being transported by the South Saskatchewan Pipe Line system from the Fosterton, Dollard and other fields in southwestern Saskatchewan by way of Regina, and initially approximately 12,000 barrels per day of Midale type crude and other types of crude oil now being or to be produced in the fields of southeastern Saskatchewan.

It is further contemplated that the United States pipe line system would also transport initially approximately 20,000 barrels per day of crude oil from fields in the Williston Basin area of the United States for delivery into the Minnesota Pipe Line system. Lateral or branch pipe lines will be constructed to connect the Tioga, Rival, and Lignite fields to the United States pipe line system.

The whole purpose of this bill is to provide more economical transportation for Canadian crude oils to the United States markets and to expand markets for Canadian oil. It is designed mainly for the oil fields in the southwestern and southeastern parts of Saskatchewan, which fields are now quite substantial. We do not talk as much about oil in Saskatchewan as we do about oil in Alberta, but may I say that within the past few years Saskatchewan has been producing more than half as much oil as is produced in Alberta, which is known to be one of the great oil provinces of Canada.

In conclusion may I state that if the bill receives second reading I will propose that it will go to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, where all details can be discussed and questions answered. As I stated previously, before any oil is transported by this company, the approval of the National Energy Board must be received.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn, bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

FIFTH REPORT

Hon. William R. Brunt, Chairman of the committee, moved adoption of the fifth report.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving adoption of this report I would like to say a few words about Mr. Edward Jennings, the chief of the cleaning staff, to whom the report relates.

Mr. Jennings, who is now 70 years of age, has been advised by his doctor that owing to the state of his health he should retire from the public service. As all honourable senators know, Mr. Jennings has at all times proved to be a most competent chief, devoted to his duty, industrious, reliable and very trustworthy, and he has displayed those qualities required by a person heading the cleaning staff of the Senate.

As of April 1 last Mr. Jennings had 39 years and 109 days of service on the staff of the Senate. He has agreed to carry on his duties until the end of the present session and will at that time be entitled to his annual leave. The date of his retirement has been fixed at the first day of September next.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Do you mean that that is the date when the present session will end?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. After the present session he will take his vacation, and then he will continue on the staff until September 1.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Supposing the session lasts until November, what then?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Let us be reasonable about this session even though they are running into difficulties about it in the other place.

At the present time Mr. Jennings is receiving a salary of $4,170. His retirement allowance will be $2,530 a year, and as is customary he will receive a gratuity at the time of his retirement. This gratuity will amount to approximately $800.

Report adopted.

SIXTH REPORT

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved adoption of the sixth report.

He said: Honourable senators, this report relates to Mr. Homer E. Facto, a cleaner and helper on the Senate staff. On September 9, 1959 Mr. Facto was 72 years of age. He submitted his resignation on medical grounds, and it is to take effect on August 1 next. Mr. Facto's accumulated years of service as of April 1 last amounted to 22 years and 393 days. He has been an excellent employee, loyal, dependable and industrious. His accumulated sick leave for the period of his employment is 383 days. During all the time that he has been on the Senate staff he has been absent from work only 48 days.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Three hundred and eighty-three days is more than a year. Why not give it in years instead of days?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It sounds a little longer when you say "383 days" instead of "a little over a year."

At the time of his retirement his salary will be $2,964. His retiring allowance will be only $800, and I will say a word about that in a minute. At the time of his retirement he will receive a gratuity of approximately $900.

The apparent disparity in his annuity is due to the fact that during the early part of his service he did not make a contribution to the superannuation fund, and this part of his service does not count for pension purposes.

Report adopted.

SEVENTH REPORT

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved adoption of the seventh report.

He said: I am sure all honourable senators are going to approve of this particular report, because it relates to someone in this chamber whom we all like very much, our Speaker. In 1956 the allowance to the Speaker of the Senate for entertainment expenses necessarily incurred by him in the discharge of the duties of his office was fixed at $1,500.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: How much was it before then?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I have no information as to how much it was prior to 1956.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand there was no allowance prior to 1956.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The honourable senator may be quite correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was wondering if it was going to be made retroactive.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I would like to have it made retroactive, but I do not think that is possible.

This amount used to be one-half of the amount allowed for the same purpose to the Speaker of the House of Commons. Quite some time ago that allowance was increased to $4,000, and it is proposed to raise the allowance of our Speaker to $2,000 so that it will again be one-half of the amount allowed to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

For the further information of honourable senators I might point out that even though the Speaker has an allowance of $2,000 he is still required to produce vouchers.

Report adopted.

EIGHTH REPORT

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved adoption of the eighth report.

He said: Honourable senators, this report relates to the reporting of Senate Debates and committee proceedings. I would like to point out that during recent years the volume of reporting in the Senate and its committees has increased to such an extent that the Senate staff has had to be assisted from time to time by the employment of temporary reporters. The Chief of the Reporting Branch states that with five reporters it is impossible to avoid considerable delay in transcribing the debates. He has, therefore, requested that his staff be enlarged by the addition of one more full-time reporter.

The addition of one reporter will enable the Debates Branch to give a more expeditious service to honourable senators, and to furnish copy to the Printing Bureau promptly so that printers assigned to printing the Senate Debates will be working steadily.

It will also enable the Debates Branch to furnish the Bureau of Translations with transcripts in time to permit simultaneous publication of the English and French versions of the debates. Under the present circumstances it is almost impossible to have the two versions printed and distributed on the same day, and the debates are printed in French the day after the English text appears.

The work of reporting committees has been increasing for some years. At times, especially when a number of committees is sitting, it is very difficult to supply reporters for them from the present staff. This difficulty will be overcome with the addition of one reporter to the reporting staff.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to make a comment on this matter, and probably this is the time at which to make it. If we have anything like the number of divorces next session as we have this session we shall have to have four courts daily instead of three. In that way we shall be able to dispose of this burden more expeditiously than we are disposing of it during this session, and even though this report is adopted now it may be that next session I shall ask for more assistance in regard to reporting than I am asking for at present.

Here we are, after several months of sitting, well into the month of May and hoping to prorogue at the end of June, and at the present moment we have approximately 100 cases ready for trial.

When we get through these we shall still have about 140, some of which will be proceeded with this session. Perhaps quite a proportion of them will be heard, in which event the Divorce Committee will have been tied to this labour through almost the entire session, which is rather more, I think, than should be required of us. If we can run four courts instead of three we shall handle something like 20 cases a day, whereas now we are handling up to 15. I am just giving notice, as it were, so that it may be thought about in the meantime and not come as a surprise if, as chairman, I ask for provision of a further court at the next session.

I would like to say something by way of compliment to the reporters who have been doing our work. I believe every honourable senator will agree that the reporting work has been done exceptionally well.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That includes the reporting done in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It certainly does. The reporting in this chamber and in committee is exceedingly well done. Since I have sat as chairman of the Divorce Committee I cannot remember any litigant, lawyer or member of the committee requesting that a correction be made in the transcript of the hearing of a petition. Not one. That is remarkable. I would add that the devotion of the reporting staff to the making of a first-class report of our speeches is very commendable indeed.

Report adopted.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 380 to 392, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, reports adopted.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 6, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Cameron, who called attention to Canada's Centennial Year 1967 and suggested "that appropriate steps be taken to mobilize the resources of governmental and non-governmental agencies in making this celebration an occasion to mark the achievements of the past and to plot a course for the future".

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, on the 6th of April, when my learned and revered friend the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) spoke on the matter introduced by the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), the celebration of the Centennial of Canada, I was not aware, and probably none of us was aware, that he was going to raise the question of the sovereignty of Canada to show that Canada is in no way sovereign because she is subject to an act of the British Parliament, particularly because by section 56 of the British North America Act, which was kept in force by the Statute of Westminster, 1931, any act of the Canadian Parliament could be disallowed by the Queen in Council in Great Britain. When I rose to speak immediately after my honourable friend had finished I was therefore without preparation on this question. I said that the British North America Act, in my opinion, was kept outside the ambit of the Statute of Westminster at the request of Canadian statesmen. I could not see how this could be otherwise, because keeping the act in force seemed to be a direct antithesis of the purport and the real meaning of the Statute of Westminster. I find I was right in that statement. Dawson, in his book The Government of Canada, at page 61, writes:

> A special clause stated that the provisions of the Statute of Westminster were not to affect the position of the British North America Act and its amendments, a reservation inserted at the request of Canada in order that the British North America Act should not be amendable by an ordinary act of the Canadian Parliament.

I must confess that after I had finished speaking on April 6 I was somewhat perturbed by doubt as to whether I had depended too much on my memory and should have waited to study the matter in issue before speaking on it, particularly as I was attempting to reply to a learned and erudite scholar and one who is always very thorough in every matter on which he speaks. I had not read through the British North America Act for a long time and while the honourable gentleman was speaking I just managed to glance through the Statute of Westminster. After having read in Hansard what I said on that occasion, all I can say is Quod dixi, dixi. What I have said, I have said.

It must not be forgotten that convention plays a large part in the constitution of a country, and convention has in a very large degree amended and added to the British North America Act. Canada has a written constitution in the British North America Act, but we must not forget there are other constitutional principles which lie outside the act itself. The act is, of course, of most vital importance, because it joined together the four original provinces and the provinces that came in later, binding the ten provinces, which today compose the Union, in a common tie. Above all, it lays down the division of power between the dominion and the provinces.

The British North America Act is by no means a comprehensive document. Many important matters concerning the government of Canada are not stated or implied in the act and one cannot discover how Canada is run by looking at the act alone. For instance, the council that is mentioned in the British North America Act is not the council as we understand it now. The Governor in Council now means the cabinet, and there is no mention of the cabinet in the British North America Act. Neither is there mention of the highest political figure in Canada, namely, the Prime Minister. Nor does the act say that the Prime Minister and his cabinet must have the support of the House of Commons and that all members of the cabinet, not excluding the Prime Minister himself, must have seats in that body or in the Senate. These are conventions, and nobody can deny that they have what amounts to the power of law. All these are very major omissions dealing with the executive power. One must conclude that Canada is ruled by the act and by convention, and in the running of affairs each is as important as the other. And so it is that the development of the constitution of Canada has been brought about partly by the British North America Act and amendments thereto, but mostly by custom and convention.

When speaking before on this subject I said that the British North America Act should be read in the light of the Statute of Westminster of 1931; and that, as a result of this, the word "Queen" which, in the British North America Act meant the Queen of England, was changed by the Statute of Westminster to mean the Queen of Canada.

There is one exception to this statement, and I must admit that my honourable and learned friend the senator from De la Durantaye is correct when he claims that, according to section 56 of the British North America Act—if that section is in force, I may add—acts of the Canadian Parliament, in strict law, should be sent to the Queen in Council in Great Britain. The words in this section must mean the Queen in Council in Great Britain. He is right in that. But convention comes in again, and I hold that this section is of no effect at the present day. The power of the Queen in Council in Great Britain to disallow acts of the Parliament of Canada still exists as a matter of strict law, but I respectfully submit that this section is now a dead letter.

Dawson, on page 153, under the section "The Development of the Constitution in fields covered by the written Constitution" says:

> Here convention has virtually amended the British North America Act, sometimes changing the nominal operation of the act, on rarer occasions actually rendering the act completely obsolete. A number of illustrations have already been given; but one which has been touched on above may be somewhat elaborated.
> In 1867 the act gave the Governor General the power (which, unlike some of the other powers, he was supposed to exercise himself) to reserve certain classes of bills (indicated in his Instructions) for the "signification of the Queen's Pleasure," that is, the assent of the British Government. From 1867 to 1878 some twenty-one bills were so reserved. The result of the Blake correspondence was a change in the Governor's Instructions and the occasions for reservation became very rare, for any difficulties of this kind became a matter of discussion and adjustment between the British and Canadian Governments. Thus those Canadian acts which involved matters of Imperial concern and were now the only ones to be considered would frequently not come into effect until proclaimed, and such proclamation would not be made if no solution of the difficulty could be found. The Imperial Conference of 1926 and the Conference of 1929 went a step further and declared that any interference of the Imperial Government with the legislation of a dominion was no longer in accordance with constitutional practice, and the latter meeting proposed facilities for deleting the offending clause from the British North America Act. The clause, however, has now by convention become so completely inoperative that no one even bothers about its continued presence in the Act. Thus one practice built upon another has gradually rendered obsolete the legal power and procedure which is laid down in the British North America Act. The clause still remains in the act; but its shining letters have become dull and tarnished like some forgotten name-plate on a door long closed.

The relationship between England and the colonies or dominions was settled from time to time by Imperial Conferences. The position of Canada in its relation with the one-time mother country changed throughout the years, and during and after the First World War the feeling had come over Canada that it had attained such importance and proportions as to be regarded as an independent country, and the other dominions felt likewise. The dominions had determined to become their own masters and finally the matter was brought to a decision at the Imperial Conference of 1926. This Conference issued a formal statement proclaiming the complete equality in status of the United Kingdom and the dominions. The position of Great Britain and the dominions was laid down in these words:

that they are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The Conference discussed a number of rights implied in the above statements, and one of them was that disallowance of dominion legislation by the British authorities and reservation by the Governor General were declared to be obsolete. A number of legal inequalities were left untouched and the Imperial Conference of 1930 formally re-requested that all these matters should be settled by an act of the British Parliament in accordance with the recommendations made by a body of experts which had been set up by the Conference of 1926. Accordingly, in 1931 the British Parliament passed the Statute of Westminster, which was based on these recommendations.

The Statute of Westminister provided that the Colonial Laws Validity Act, which declared that dominion statutes were void if they conflicted with statutes of the Imperial Parliament, was no longer to apply to the dominions; and that in the future no statute of any dominion was to be declared void because it was repugnant to an act of the United Kingdom; and that no act of the Imperial Parliament was to extend to a dominion unless it declared that the dominion had requested and consented to its enactment.

The Imperial Conference of 1930 resolved that:

the present constitutional position is that the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to dominion legislation.

Disallowance is therefore no longer of importance. It has ceased to have any effect.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable gentleman mind repeating what he just said? Did I understand him to say that the end of disallowance was an event that took place at the Imperial Conference of 1930?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That was prior to the enactment of the Statute of Westminster as well?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Yes; but the first step was taken by the Imperial Conferences. It became a convention which has practically the force and power of law, because the dominions could leave the empire if it was not carried out.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): But if I understand my honourable friend correctly, specific reference was made there to the power of disallowance?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: That is right, sir. The Imperial Conference of 1930 resolved that:

the present constitutional position is that the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to dominion legislation.

Disallowance is therefore no longer of importance. It has ceased to have any effect.

Now I refer to a dictum in the judgment of Lord Sankey, Lord Chancellor, in the British Coal Corporation and others vs. The King (1935) Appeal Cases, 500:

But it is well known that section 7,...

That is the section of the Statute of Westminster which keeps the British North America Act outside the statute.

was inserted at the request of Canada and for reasons which are familiar. It is doubtless true that the power of the Imperial Parliament to pass on its own initiative any legislation that it thought fit extending to Canada remains in theory unimpaired; indeed the Imperial Parliament could, as a matter of abstract law, repeal or disregard section 4 of the statute but that is theory and has no relation to realities. In truth Canada is in enjoyment of the full scope of self government. Its legislature was invested with all necessary powers for that purpose by the act and all the statute did was to remove the two fetters which have already been discussed.

I shall now turn to another great constitutional writer, one of the best-known constitutional writers of this day, Mr. Kenneth Wheare. In his book The Statute of Westminster and Dominion Status, on pages 122 and 123, he says:

The task before the Conferences of 1926 and 1930 has been made clear. It can be seen what was meant by the Conference of 1926 when, having declared that "equality of status, so far as Britain and the dominions are concerned, is thus the root principle governing our inter-imperial relations", it declared immediately thereafter that in practice "existing administrative, legislative, and judicial forms are admittedly not wholly in accord" with this position. The reason for this disconformity between the declaration of 1926 and certain existing forms of law and convention is also now apparent. It results from the historical fact that, in the words of the Conference of 1926, "most of these forms date back to a time well antecedent to the present stage of constitutional development". At the same time it has been seen that there existed by 1926 considerably less constitutional inequality than a study of the mere legal forms would suggest. Usage and convention had operated, in some cases, to modify or nullify the workings of strict law. Thus the power of disallowance had been rendered inoperative, the refusal of assent to reserved bills had been made conditional upon consultation and consent of the dominion concerned, the exercise of the supreme legislative power of the United Kingdom Parliament in respect of a dominion had been made conditional upon request or consent of that dominion, and the exercise of the Crown's prerogative in foreign affairs in respect of a dominion had become subject to consultation and consent of the dominion concerned. And so on. There was, therefore, nothing catastrophic in the declaration of the Conference of 1926 that Great Britain and the Dominions were "equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs". To a large extent this declaration represented a generalization from the practice which usage and convention had established in the years which had succeeded the establishment of responsible government in the colonies. The declaration was in great measure a recognition and definition of the existing position. But it was more than that. It was itself a statement not merely of a usage but of a convention; not merely, that is to say, of a usual practice, but of an obligatory rule. It laid down not merely that the powers of strict law had, on the whole, been exercised in accordance with a convention of equality, but that the powers of strict law henceforth must be exercised only in accordance with that convention.

Now, let us note how he deals with section 56 of the B.N.A. Act. On pages 126 and 127 he says:

The inequalities which arose from disallowance and reservation, on the other hand, were dealt with by the Conferences of 1926 and 1930 in recommendations which combined the declaration of constitutional conventions with the envisagement of legislative action by the dominions or by the United Kingdom if and when it was considered advisable. The Conference of 1926 began by laying down a general convention in relation to disallowance and reservation in these words:

"... Apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the Government of each dominion to advise the Crown in all matters relating to its own affairs. Consequently, it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's Government in Great Britain in any matter appertaining to the affairs of a dominion against the views of the Government of that dominion."

The Conference of 1929 studied the nature and extent of the powers of disallowance and reservation in the dominion Constitutions and made recommendations upon them in the light of this declaration adopted by the Conference of 1926. These recommendations were adopted by the Conference of 1930.

On pages 127 and 128—

I regret, honourable senators, that my quotations are long but I think they are very important and I would sooner give them as they are in their real vigour rather than emasculate them by trying to give them in my own words.

On pages 127 and 128. Wheare says:

In respect of disallowance the convention was recognized in 1930 that "the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to Dominion legislation". This was clearly in accordance with the above proposition that no advice should be tendered to the King by the United Kingdom Government against the views of the Government of the dominion concerned. To adopt this convention was to nullify the power of disallowance, but it was not to abolish it. It was agreed, therefore, that those dominions which possessed the power to delete disallowance from their Constitutions were at liberty to do so, by following the prescribed procedure, while in the case of those dominions which did not possess this power "it would be in accordance with constitutional practice that, if so requested by the dominion concerned, the Government of the United Kingdom should ask Parliament to pass the necessary legislation." There was one qualification to be added to this conclusion. Where a dominion had taken advantage of the provisions of the Colonial Stock Act, 1900, and had placed on record, in accordance with the third of the rules of the United Kingdom Treasury, a formal expression of its opinion that its legislation in certain circumstances might properly be disallowed, "the right of disallowance in respect of such legislation must remain and can properly be exercised."

I understand that is to protect investments which were made under the Colonial Stock Act.

On page 194 and 195 he says:

Consider next the inequalities which arose from the existence of the powers of disallowance and reservation. The power of the Sovereign to disallow legislation by the Dominion Parliament was found in section 56 of the British North America Act, 1867. Before the passing of the statute that power had been nullified by the declaration of a constitutional convention in 1930, but it had not been abolished. Nor had the Dominion Parliament power to abolish it. At the same time it had been agreed in 1930 that, if so requested by the dominion, the Government of the United Kingdom would ask Parliament to pass the legislation necessary to abolish the legal power. What effect had the statute? It made no alteration in the legal position, for the increased powers which it conferred on the Parliament of Canada did not extend to an alteration of the British North America Act, 1867. Nor did it alter the conventional position, for the terms of the preamble similarly did not extend to the alteration of the British North America Act, 1867. The legal power of disallowance remained, therefore, as strong after the passing of the statute as it was before. The position was governed by convention alone. By convention the power could not be exercised; and by convention the United Kingdom Government would ask Parliament to abolish the power, if the dominion so requested. To this it must be added that, when the power of disallowance was abolished, Canada could take advantage of the alternative arrangement in respect of dominion securities made possible by the Colonial Stock Act, 1934.

Now we turn from convention to strict law. If Canada desired to abolish section 56 there would be no necessity of going to the Imperial Parliament. By the British North America Act of 1949 (2) the Parliament of Canada was given power to repeal the disallowance clause in the British North America Act. At any time Canada can pass an act doing away with section 56. I submit therefore that the disallowance clause, this section 56, has no effect at the present time and it is entirely nugatory, and that the British North America Act was kept in existence merely for the purpose of regulating the rights and the duties between the provinces and the federal authorities.

In view of what I have said, I am astounded to learn from the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) that the statute book of Canada is sent every year to Great Britain in accordance with section 56.

On page 507 of Hansard of April 6 the honourable senator said, in answer to a question of mine:

> I thank the honourable senator for his interruption, and I agree that Her Majesty the Queen is designated or described as the Queen of Canada at the present time. But section 56 of the British North America Act has not been changed since Confederation, as my honourable friend knows very well. The only difference now is that the statute book for each session is not, as formerly, sent to the British Government by the Clerk of the Parliaments, who is the Clerk of the Senate, but by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The same procedure is followed, the only difference being that it is another gentleman than the Clerk of the Parliaments who sends our statute book to the Colonial Secretary in England. The fact that it is sent by Canada to the United Kingdom remains the same, and as long as that is done, whether Her Majesty the Queen is called the Queen of Great Britain, Ireland and her other possessions beyond the seas, or the Queen of the United Kingdom and of Canada, makes no difference at all. Our statute book is sent by one of our cabinet ministers to the British Government, and my honourable friend knows it very well.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask one question? Does my honourable friend's argument apply to section 99, having to do with judges? In the preamble to the notice of motion standing in the name of the leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) it is stated that the matter will be placed before the British Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: I do not think it would apply to that section. Under the act of 1949 Parliament can pass an act to annul section 56 of the British North America Act. But the act still stands.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: You mean the Canadian Parliament can do that?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Yes, the Canadian Parliament can annul section 56. But up to the present time the British North America Act has been kept intact, because it is still a charter between the federal authorities and the provinces, and that charter cannot be interfered with. The question of application to the British North America Act as a whole is a difficult one to answer, but I am sure the Canadian Parliament, under the act of 1949, can repeal section 56. As to how the British North America Act can be repealed, I am not sure. The reason why the British North America Act was kept out of the ambit of the Statute of Westminster was that the British North America Act is the only charter which lays down the relations between the dominion and the provinces.

My honourable friend from De la Durantaye in his remarks on April 6 last suggested that I knew all about section 56. I had not the slightest idea that the procedure required by that section was being carried out, and I may tell you that I was surprised, shocked and outraged to learn that such was the case. This is an extraordinary state of affairs. Someone seems to have blundered. What reason is there for sending our statute book to the British Government? Because of the conventions made by various Imperial Conferences, the British Cabinet cannot disallow any act of the Canadian Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the procedure do any harm?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: No, it does no harm. I am wondering if the sending of these statutes to Great Britain is done to inform her of acts passed here, and whether the British Parliament sends its statutes to us.

I am wondering if our statute book is sent over there in accordance with section 56. If that is so, then some individual or some department is attempting to negative the sovereignty of Canada. Such procedure is a denial of the sovereignty of Canada. Indeed, the individual who adopts this procedure is committing an act of treason against the sovereignty of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is it not just a free exchange of statutes?

Hon. Mr. Higgins: That is my point. If it is just a free exchange of statutes, then it is not a procedure under section 56. If it is done under section 56, it is done under compulsion and the matter should be inquired into. By what authority or by what tradition is it done? If it is by compulsion, that is wiped out by the convention of 1930, and certainly by the Statute of Westminster.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps we are sending them a sample of our wisdom and are showing them how a country ought to be run.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: Yes, but what about section 56?

When we refer to the sovereignty of Canada, and we say sovereignty is vested in the Dominion Parliament and the various provincial legislatures, we begin to wonder which is the sovereign power, considering that each acts within its own limit. The federal Parliament cannot be the sovereign authority, because it cannot pass any law it wishes. The various provinces have their rights, and I do not think my learned friend would even suggest that these rights should be curtailed so that the Parliament of Canada might be supreme. Of course the provincial legislatures cannot be sovereign because they can only deal with certain matters, but these matters the federal authorities cannot touch.

If the B.N.A. Act does not exist, what method is there that would settle the rights between the federal authorities and the provinces? Who will decide this method or charter, call it what you will? Will it be the Parliament of Canada acting alone? Will it be the Parliament of Canada with the consent of the provinces? And if one province objects, what will be the result? Can nine provinces tell the federal Parliament to abrogate certain provincial rights? And must the remaining province which objects sit back and say nothing? On the other hand, can one province refuse to abide by the wishes of the other nine? I am afraid that if the British North America Act is taken away Canada may find it difficult to provide another charter to take its place.

There is not the slightest doubt that if Canada wants the repeal of the British North America Act carried out, or any amendment made, this will be done as a matter of course.

Dawson, in his book, The Government of Canada, at page 148, explained the position clearly. In speaking of the situation brought about by the attempt at a Dominion-Provincial Conference in 1935 to provide a remedy for some change in the act, which was dropped because of the opposition of New Brunswick, he says:

> The scheme came to grief over the apportionment of clauses among the different amending authorities, which was, of course, the crux of the matter. It need scarcely be added that if a solution is found, the most relieved body will be the British Parliament. The present system imposes on it a thankless task, one in which it has no responsibility, but which may at any time expose it to criticism and attack from a dissatisfied province. "As a matter of mere legal machinery" said the British Solicitor-General with weary resignation, "it is still necessary, until some better method is evolved for amendment of the British North America Act, for the extension of the Canadian powers to be passed by this Parliament. But our Parliament, in passing such legislation, is merely carrying out the wishes of the Dominion Parliament and in that way the legal position is made to square with the constitutional position... We must operate the old machinery which has been left over at their request in accordance with their wishes."

If anyone wishes to explore this position further I would suggest that he read the interesting brochure How Parliament Functions, by E. Russell Hopkins, Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate.

Let me sum up the situation:

(1) The power of the Queen in Council to disallow acts of the Parliament of Canada still exists as a matter of strict law.

(2) The Imperial Conference of 1930 resolved: "That the present constitutional position is that the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to dominion legislation". By this convention disallowance became a dead letter.

(3) Discussion regarding disallowance as affected by convention is now really only a matter of academic interest because by the British North America Act 1949 (2) the Parliament of Canada can repeal section 56 of the British North America Act. It can therefore be annulled or got rid of without asking the British Parliament to act.

(4) As the Parliament of Canada can get rid of this so-called inequality whenever it wishes to do so, and there is the very strongest convention against its exercise as long as it exists, there is no possible ground for the view that in this matter Canada is subordinate to the United Kingdom.

As section 56 is now ineffective and useless there is no reason why it should not be done away with. There is no necessity of having it on the statute books.

When one goes to the trouble of perusing the British North America Act he there finds staring him in the face that anomalous and innocuous section 56, dead as a dodo but, apparently, still full of life and vigour, shining forth today in print as bright and clear as a statute of today. It is a reminder of the time when Canada was subservient and not, as today, free, independent and sovereign. It may be that the honourable senator from De la Durantaye is right. Perhaps it should be cut off from the body politic and thrust into the limbo of dead and forgotten things where it belongs.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 17, at 8 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators will remember that this is one of the bills that we expected to be ready for consideration by us when we returned from the Easter recess. My understanding was that when it reached this house we would, without further delay, commence the debate on second reading. The honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is sponsoring this bill, and he is ready to go ahead with second reading this evening, with leave of the Senate.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I, personally, have no objection to proceeding with the motion for second reading of this bill this evening, but that does not mean that the discussion on second reading must necessarily be brought to a conclusion this evening. As the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has said, this is a bill which we came back to discuss on May 3. I do not know who is responsible for our getting it two weeks late. However, the bill has arrived, and so far as I am concerned I am prepared to allow the discussion on second reading to commence this evening.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is this to be a precedent?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: With the leave of the Senate, I move the second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Before the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) commences with the discussion of this bill may I ask the Leader of the Government if copies of the bill have been distributed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand that copies have been distributed, although I do not appear to have one on my file.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A number of honourable senators have intimated they are not prepared to discuss the bill without having seen a copy of it. I wonder if there is sufficient urgency to require us to proceed with the explanation on second reading tonight?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: This bill was passed by the other house on Friday last.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is why I thought copies of the bill would have been distributed in this house by now.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They should have been. What would be wrong with having the honourable senator from Ottawa East explain the bill at this time? It consists of only two or three sections, and after his explanation the debate could be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am afraid it might establish a precedent if we were to proceed with the second reading tonight, particularly when there is no urgency. If there were some urgency about this legislation I would not hesitate for one minute to recommend that consideration on second reading be proceeded with now.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: One procedure is according to our rules and the other is not.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A number of honourable senators have intimated they are not prepared to proceed with the second reading of the bill without having seen a copy of it. If they insist on this point of view I do not know what we can do except postpone consideration on second reading until the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Under these circumstances, if that is the will of honourable members, I would ask that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is better.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Does that satisfy honourable senators? Or perhaps now I could ask that we begin debate on second reading later this day, because I believe the bill is ready to be distributed.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I for one definitely object to the procedure proposed by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). We were told before the Easter recess that we had to hasten back in order to deal with this measure. Personally, I strongly suspected it would not be here when the Senate's sittings were resumed, and therefore I postponed my return for a week. The bill received third reading and was passed in the Commons last Friday and has not yet been distributed in this house. Even if the bill were received by us this evening, since it is an important matter I think honourable senators would like to study it a bit. At least, I should like to do so. After all, what is the urgency? After the bill has received third reading and been passed, the chances are it will not be given the royal assent until the end of the month.

There is no urgency about it. I suggest to my honourable friend the Leader of the Government that we should at least show some respect for the rules of the house. It is asking quite a bit of members of this house to expect us to listen to an explanation of a bill that is not even before us, when no reason for urgency has been given.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I doubt if any time would be lost if we considered the bill tomorrow. If all members of this house have an opportunity to peruse the bill tomorrow morning it is possible the bill might receive second reading in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-57, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-61, to amend an act to amend the Railway Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Wednesday, May 25.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine tabled the following:

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 393 to 417, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to call attention to report No. 417. I do not wish to debate it now, but will do so on my motion for concurrence.

Report No. 417 is a petition by Dorothy Nora Alice Hurst Earle. I call attention to it for two reasons. On a number of occasions I have referred to the really remarkable unanimity of the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman. At the moment I do not remember a single report that we have ever made since I have been chairman of that committee—and that is six years now —which was not a unanimous report. So I call attention to this petition because it was not passed unanimously by our committee.

The second reason why I call attention to it is that the petition was based, not on the usual ground of adultery, but on the ground of desertion.

Now that is all I wish to say tonight, because I would like all honourable senators to know that that particular petition is on the table at the moment and may be read by anyone who is interested.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Did the committee recommend a divorce?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The committee recommended against a divorce, recommended that it be not granted.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Why was the petition accepted for filing in the first place?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Because from time immemorial, and I think you will find it mentioned in the Bill of Rights of William and Mary, a citizen of the country has the right to petition Parliament for anything he likes on any ground he pleases. That does not mean that Parliament must grant the petition, but anybody has a right to petition the Crown. It is fundamental constitutional law that any citizen can file a petition asking for a divorce on any grounds he pleases or no grounds at all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the petition to which you are referring the only one which is based on grounds other than adultery?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You mean the only one among those now before us?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I believe another petition has been filed more recently. I know nothing of its particulars as yet.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Has the honourable senator knowledge of any petition filed prior to the present session for divorce on the ground of desertion only?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You mean at any session?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have knowledge of only one such petition. I recall one petition which was made by a wife on the ground that her husband was incurably insane. That would be about three sessions ago.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It was a petition by the husband.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am corrected. It was a petition by the husband on the ground that his wife was incurably insane. I understand that doctors were called to prove her incurable insanity, but when they heard about it they discharged her as cured. That ended the petition. To add to the interest in the story, the wife, having gained her freedom, applied to the Senate for a divorce against her husband, and it was granted.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: On the ground of adultery?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On the ground of adultery.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In what province does the petitioner in the present case reside?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In the province of Quebec.

The report will be open for discussion tomorrow. As I said in opening, I have no desire to debate it at the moment. I shall move for the adoption of the report which denies the petition. As chairman of the committee I am a good enough democrat and loyal enough to my committee to stand by its decision, but I am not going to hide my light under a bushel when the subject comes up for discussion.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Which side are you going to be on tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My honourable friend will have to wait until he hears what I have to say.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I feel there are some other things that should be said in regard to the statement just made by the honourable Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I think there is another side to this question which should be given to the house at this time.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Would the honourable gentleman leave something for the debate tomorrow, when the matter comes up in the ordinary way?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I think this ought to be said now, and I will be brief.

I was a member of the committee to which the chairman referred, consisting of 15 persons, and the vote in committee, as I recall it, was 12 to 3. This was not a matter of considering a petition for divorce and deciding that it should not be recommended. Instead, this was an instance in which we were merely asked to consider the form of a petition. And as I understand it, the committee decided, by the majority which I indicated a moment ago, that inasmuch as the petition disclosed no cause of action for divorce, the petition should not be heard.

Consequently, I disagree entirely with the view that the committee decided against granting a divorce, because the petition and the facts alleged in the petition were never heard. In my view at least it was a case where the committee decided not to hear the petition because, as we thought, it disclosed no cause of action.

Hon. J. W. deB. Farris: Honourable senators, I appreciate what my friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has suggested about not discussing this petition tonight. However, I ask the indulgence of the house because I hope to be in Vancouver at this time tomorrow night. With the consent of the house I would like to say a few words.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Farris: When the proposed extension of grounds for divorce was before us under a bill sponsored by the present Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) I supported it, and I would support such a bill now if one were brought in again for the purpose of determining a policy for the country. But it seems to me that this is a very different thing. As long as we have in this country the accepted rule that adultery is the only ground for divorce, I do not think there should ever be any breach of that rule piecemeal, such as would be done in a case of this kind. I think some day a bill like the one to which I referred will be placed before us again. When that happens, let us fight it out on the broad principle and lay down a policy for the country; but let us not do it piecemeal.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTES OF CANADA

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, may I revert to Notices of Inquiry?

I am not to read questions and answers which appeared in the Hansard of the House of Commons of December 5, 1940, nine years after the Statute of Westminster, but I would refer to them and to the five answers given by the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister of Canada and Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would like to know if after each session the Statute Book is sent by anyone in the Government of Canada—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will the honourable senator place his inquiry on the Order Paper for the next sitting or for some time later on?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I will gladly do so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will take this as notice of his intention to do that.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

UKRAINIAN PROTEST AGAINST PROGRAM

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, and with the unanimous consent of the honourable members of this house, I would like to speak briefly about events connected with the television program L'Affaire Schwartzbard, which is currently being televised by our public agency, the C.B.C., on its French network, in a series entitled En Votre Ame et Conscience.

I make this explanatory statement with a feeling of deep and sincere regret, but the matter has received extensive press coverage and it has been raised in the other house on two successive days in the form of questions to the responsible minister. I will try to make this statement in a reasonable and dispassionate manner so that you may understand better the events which led to a protest being telegraphed to the President of the C.B.C. by the National Executive of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee on May 9th, and why this and other protests were made, and why some 800 Canadians of Ukrainian extraction were so deeply touched, offended and hurt that they were prompted to stage a protest march in Montreal on Sunday, May 15.

L'affaire Schwartzbard is a film presentation of four instalments of a famous court trial held in France in 1927. It is claimed that this dramatic presentation reproduces authentically, and without any bias, the events in the trial of the man who assassinated Simon Petlura, the President of the Ukrainian Republic in exile, who is, to the Ukrainians, a national hero whose memory they hold in very high esteem.

Rightly or wrongly, and I appreciate the fact that we are dealing with a dramatic presentation, the Ukrainians feel that this presentation distorts historical facts because all of the proceedings of this trial were not given equal treatment in the dramatic presentation in question, with the result that Simon Petlura, his Government and the Ukrainian armies under his command are made to appear, directly or indirectly, responsible for the unfortunate anti-Semitic pogroms which took place in Ukraine and in Byelo-Russia during those tragic and chaotic years of 1919 to 1920, the years when the Ukrainian Republic was being systematically liquidated by the armed attacks of her many enemies, and especially by the Bolshevik armies from the north.

In other words, honourable senators, Canadians of Ukrainian descent feel that the basic content of this particular program is painfully distressing, offensive, and repugnant to them because of the unfair bias or slant in its content, for, as honourable senators will readily understand, although the presentation may be authentic to the extent that it is based upon actual court records, as R.T.F. and the C.B.C. contend, it may also be biased or slanted if equal or adequate prominence is not given to all of the court records. This is the point at issue, and this has led to what may be legitimately interpreted as an unfortunate affront to a large group of Canadian citizens. I saw personally the second instalment, and its very evident bias perturbed me a great deal.

I accept in good faith the explanation of the C.B.C. that when this series En Votre Ame et Conscience was purchased from Radiodiffusion-Television Française the management was not aware of the fact that this particular program had raised a storm of protest in France in 1958. I do not know how or why this particular problem was overlooked during the negotiations for these films, or during the C.B.C.'s acceptance of them on delivery. However, I make no other comment in this regard. But, with almost 500,000 Ukrainians in Canada I fail to see why in the previewing of these films by competent and knowledgeable C.B.C. officials this one should not have been appraised more carefully in the light of what must be a C.B.C. tenet of basic policy, namely, that a public agency, which is also supported by Canadians of Ukrainian extraction, must not be used to damage in any way the feelings of security and belongingness on the part of any minority, no matter how small.

Surely somebody should have asked himself the question: "Might this film damage in any way the ideological and spiritual unity we are all striving so anxiously to achieve and to extend?" Whoever previewed and released this film should have known that this kind of program might have unfortunate repercussions. If those persons did not know, they could have asked people who did know. Of course, the C.B.C. did not deliberately want to offend or to insult the Ukrainians in Canada, but the hurt is there even though it came through what one might excuse as a technical default, an oversight or plain bungling.

Protests were lodged after the showing of the first episode of this particular program, and the C.B.C. chose to continue the series, with the addition of an explanatory note at the beginning and conclusion of each episode. The C.B.C. has also offered to put its microphones at the disposal of impartial observers for the purpose of establishing the true historical facts in which this affair took place.

Personally, I hope that the representatives of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee or other impartial observers who might be expected to avail themselves of this invitation will treat it with dignified neutrality. Whatever damage has been done is done, and I see no point in probing any further into this whole problem area, especially through the facilities of a public agency such as the C.B.C.

After the conclusion of the episodes in this particular court drama, let us hope that the distress and the indignation that have been aroused will soon quieten down, and let us further hope that the C.B.C. will benefit from this instructional experience and check most carefully in the future into the content of all its programs to prevent the recurrence of incidents which I have reluctantly and regretfully brought to your attention this evening.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE

POSTPONEMENT OF MEETING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with may I inform the house, particularly the members of the Standing Committee on External Relations, that the meeting of the committee which was scheduled for tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, as announced under the heading "Meetings of Committees" in our Minutes of Proceedings, has been postponed to a later date. It was intended that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would appear before the committee to review the present role of Canada in international affairs. I am sure honourable members appreciate how difficult it would be for the minister to do so under present circumstances, and consequently the meeting has been postponed.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 12, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine:

1. That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes; and

(b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.

2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Blois, Bouffard, Brunt, Buchanan, Burchill, Cameron, Choquette, Connolly, (Ottawa West), Courtemanche, Croll, Emerson, Haig, Higgins, Hnatyshyn, Horner, Hugessen, Inman, Irvine, Lambert, Leonard, MacDonald, Méthot, Monette, Pratt, Reid, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Thorvaldson, Vaillancourt, Wall, White and Wilson (32);

3. That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

4. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate may I say at the outset I favour the resolution now before the house. It is timely and will give rise to interesting discussions and provide worth-while information. It is to be hoped that after the committee has concluded its deliberations it will be able to bring forth beneficial conclusions with respect to this very important subject of the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada.

The resolution deals principally with unemployment and all its implications. An undertaking of this broad subject is a big order indeed. As I recall it, special committees in Parliament have usually dealt with single issues concerning income tax, narcotics, land use and so on. This resolution, however, deals with every feature of our economic and industrial life. It seems to me that it is a subject that can well be left to a committee of the Senate. A study and inquiry of this magnitude could almost reach the proportions of a royal commission. I think this is all right, for I remember years ago when setting up similar committees it was said to be unwise to have royal commissions appointed to investigate these matters when they could be successfully investigated by the Senate, and much more cheaply and perhaps more intelligently and with greater effect.

I understand that the resolution before the house was conceived by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and introduced by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). This being so I believe we can take it that the study will be on a non-partisan basis. I think that is salutary. I have no doubt that it will be a full inquiry, that witnesses will speak the truth and that we will get a full picture of a subject about which there is a great difference of opinion and a great deal of concern.

Some honourable senators have expressed the thought that this special committee will not prove beneficial, that a royal commission has dealt with this subject and that we are not in a position to bring forth anything of real advantage. In the May 14th edition of the Financial Post I find this statement:

"Ottawa has finally made up its mind to make one serious effort to discover where the Canadian economy is heading. A Senate committee is to examine the outlook for employment in Canada. This is the sort of thing the Senate does best."

I take that as a compliment to the Senate. It indicates what we are capable of in our committee work. Incidentally, when I was a comparatively young fellow in the other house I always had great respect for what Senate committees were able to achieve. The article continues:

"The new inquiry should follow the same sober and serious path as last summer's Senate committee study of inflation. Indeed, it may become Part II of the post-mortem on the boom.

"It is not by chance that employment and unemployment have been picked for the inquiry. This is always the aspect of business affairs to which governments are most sensitive."

The big problem is to find out whether we can create more jobs, especially the kind that create more wealth. I think we can take it at the outset that there is no one action or thing that can cure unemployment in this or any other free country. The cure will have to come from team effort such as that which produces winning football teams or something of that kind where all the participants combine their efforts and energies to bring about a worth-while conclusion in every respect. I think we have to approach this enquiry in a tenacious manner, with strength and vigour, and I have confidence that our committee will do a good job.

The bigness of our country and all our natural resources and everyday achievements are to Canada's credit. The vast resources of our country were dramatically brought to our attention in the Banking and Commerce Committee only a few days ago, when men of experience and ability appeared before us with the idea that they were going to supplement the mining interests in Labrador and northern Quebec and to spend $200 million on that project. They did not come especially on account of their mining interests, but to get a common right over a railway so that they could efficiently carry their product to the seaboard. I felt that was a lesson to us on the future of our natural resources.

I recall that last session one of our committees met to discuss water power in British Columbia. The representatives who came here did not do so to gain any privileges with regard to the immense water power project, but rather in order to bring before us a feature of taxation. However, it was an enormous project involving millions and millions of dollars. Such a project must surely give us confidence in our great country, because we realize that it is a country with a wonderful future, and that the problem of unemployment, even if it cannot be cured, can be helped by the consideration of intelligent men.

We all remember the pipe line debate. Our committee did not take so long to decide about the matter. However, it became a dazzling matter and somewhat disturbed the people of Canada, who no doubt wanted to take a second look at it. An election took place and the Government was defeated. It went down in action, as a good government should do. I believe everybody is fairly satisfied now. The storm has subsided, and I think considerable employment will result. Also, we shall be able not only to use oil and gas from the pipe line in Canada, but to export it to the United States. Surely this will be beneficial to Canada.

When I was in the House of Commons some years ago, a period which was not so affluent as the past decade has been, we talked of these matters in committee and we said that if we produced more oil and iron Canada's economy would be so balanced that our country would be very prosperous. Now we have oil and iron in abundance. I recall that in those days Alberta defaulted on its bond issue for a time, but in the past ten years employment has increased in that part of the country where more oil is produced than in any other part of Canada.

Honourable senators, may I put forward two ideas on how increased employment can be achieved, so that they will appear in Hansard for consideration if this resolution is adopted? Anyone who, like myself, is interested in industry and hires employees will tell you that his trouble is never with the skilled man, but always with the unskilled man, who comes in and goes out with the tide and has to get a job wherever he can. The unskilled man is the one who is always in trouble and unemployed. I think the first step toward curing unemployment is proper education for our youth so that when they are employed in industry they will have a know-how and be able to perform the job they are hired to do. The old system of apprenticeship was good. It came down to us from Britain. Before the war there was quite a good system of apprenticeship in this country, but with the hurry and dislocation of things generally it has largely died out. I think there should be apprenticeships and technical training. In some countries boys are sent to school for a week and work in a factory for a week, alternately, and in that way they learn how to do things. We should have night schools and more schools of training throughout Canada that will prepare young men for jobs in industry. I do not consider it is important for such students to learn Greek and Latin. Of course, knowledge of these languages is an adornment which goes with higher education and is very nice to have. But I do believe that every boy in this country should learn the two languages of Canada. The world is getting smaller, and as one travels he learns to appreciate the advantages of knowing at least two languages, and if he can add other languages it will be to his further advantage.

The matter of being efficient in industry brings to my mind something of local interest. Some months ago, M-G-M of Hollywood were looking in Canada, the United States and Europe for a place to build a replica of the Bounty, the famous British ship on which there was a mutiny in the South Seas. They want the boat for use in a moving picture, they decided to build it at Lunenburg, my native town. Work on the boat is going ahead there and I understand she is to be finished in August. There are two shifts working, one in the evening and one throughout the day. She is to be a square-rigged sailing ship, luxuriously fitted, and will have bathrooms. She will be equipped with twin engines of good power. The rigging will be done in Lunenburg, where her sails also will be made. I might add that the crew will be recruited down there to take the vessel to the rendezvous in the South Seas where she will start to perform the work for which she is intended.

When industry comes to your door in this manner, employment is created, and one has something to be proud of. Long years ago, since Lunenburg is a centre in the forefront of the fishing and marine industry in Nova Scotia, our men learned the skills that are necessary for shipbuilding which is hard to get done in any other part of the country. I am saying this, honourable senators, because I think the first step for a man to take toward avoiding unemployment is preparation for a certain kind of work. In that way he will have self confidence and knowledge, without which he will not find opportunities and will be in a somewhat helpless position.

There is one feature about the employment situation in this country that might give us some concern, and that is that although production is increasing the number of people employed is not increasing to the same extent. Another feature is that any increase in employment is not taking place in the industrial production groups but rather in associated industries. For instance, the gains in employment that were made during the past ten years were made in finance, insurance and real estate—the service group. Construction, mining and manufacturing figures of employment are away down. We are told that one man in four in Canada today is employed in manufacturing. On the base of 1949 equals 100, statistics show that the province of Alberta leads Canada with an employment index of 155, while Nova Scotia is at the bottom with an index of 96.

In this country today there is a decided trend toward an increase in the number of women employed in industry. At the end of the Second World War 85 men out of 100—excluding the Services and boys under 16 years of age—were employed in industry, and 25 women out of 100. Today there are 81 men and 27 women out of 100 respectively. I think it is a splendid thing that women are being employed in industry. Of course, they cannot be employed in heavy industry and their employment therefore runs to light industry. They do a job well and they are loyal. A female worker is not as permanent as a male worker, and with women there is not the trouble that is experienced with male workers when they become old in their employment and the problem arises of how to deal with them. I am told that today fewer men are applying for work and many cannot get it. On the other hand, more women are seeking work and can always get a job. That speaks well for the women.

But there is one question about all this: How far should we carry the idea of married women being a permanent part of industry in this country?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why should they not be?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Well, it seems to me that a woman's function is to raise a family. She is responsible for the upbringing of youth, and if a child is neglected in its home during its infancy and youthful years—well, I do not think I have to say anything further than that. A married woman has one of the biggest jobs in the country right in her own home. We are often told that women do not have the same chance as men in business and industry, and yet they can do the work that men can do. Well, I am reminded of the old saying, "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world."

In dealing with the problem of unemployment, consideration must be taken of the Canadian winter. It is quite a detriment to employment. Our lakes and rivers freeze over; indeed, the whole country freezes over. There has always been a lag in employment in the wintertime in Canada. However, attempts are being made these days to try to create more employment in winter, and these efforts are succeeding to some extent.

In February of this year there were 10.7 per cent of the labour force unemployed, generally, in Canada. I am told that 5 per cent is about normal. But a free country cannot expect to have total employment. There are some men who do not want to work, and there are frictional features that cause men to shift from one place to another. Besides, there is the interest of the workman himself. All this shows that we cannot have full employment the year round.

We are told that unemployment insurance claims should be a good barometer of the number unemployed in a country. We are all thankful for unemployment insurance. Do not forget it is paid for by the worker and the employer, and to a certain extent by the Government, and it is very important that the interests of all three be guarded. It seems to me that the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and its amendments have made it rather vulnerable to the idea that it is a good act when you do not want to work. In order for a man to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits he must be out of work and be employable. I fear that under that provision you will find some people who should not be drawing insurance are perfectly within the law in doing so. It appears to me that unless there is some new taxation or a new way of stabilizing the fund we shall be getting to the point where there won't be money to satisfy the demands on the Unemployment Insurance Fund, even in a normal period.

It may be that unemployment insurance is a little too attractive and it is probably used in cases—I won't mention any here tonight—which the committee could investigate. I do think that the committee should give attention to the uses and the benefits of unemployment insurance in this country.

A lot of people tell us that the premium on the Canadian dollar is a great hardship to industry in this country and that we could have much more external trade if Canada's dollar was on a par with the American dollar and other currencies. Well, it is comforting to have one's own dollar the highest dollar value in the world. However, the value of the Canadian dollar is coming down. The premium is now about 2.75 per cent, whereas a few months ago it was around 5 per cent or 6 per cent. I think it would be a good thing to have our dollar in balance with the American dollar, but I would not like to have it come about by reason of some weakness in our dollar; I would rather see it come through a strengthening of the value of the American dollar.

Canadians who work for a salary or a wage know that the dollar they receive is worth more than any other dollar in the world. What they do with the money is another matter. If they choose to buy goods outside the country they get the benefit of the premium on the dollar. We are told that the premium on our currency is detrimental to export trade. Well, it may be to a certain extent, but I think our larger companies are strong enough to set their own price in Canada before they ship their goods. For instance, the newsprint and pulp and paper people claim they are at a disadvantage at the present time. However, it will be remembered that a few years ago there was a great clamour in the United States about the prices Canadians were charging for their paper. While some companies may lose when the dollar is at a premium, others benefit by it.

We hear a great deal said about the losses of the manufacturer in this country. Let me remind you that the Canadian manufacturer buys so many component parts in the United States, and so much of what he sells in Canada comes from the United States, I am sure he is bound to benefit to a degree when our dollar is at a premium. I think it works both ways. We should not worry much about whether or not the dollar is at par, so long as it stands in the open and is a free dollar. Let us not forget that one reason why our dollar is now at a premium is that there are big investments in this country by American interests. While the Americans are developing resources in this country and bringing equipment into it, they are at the same time importing many articles here and paying for them with their own money. It seems to me that is the best kind of import we can have.

Honourable senators, we hear a good deal also about tight money. Consumer credit has obviously increased very rapidly in this country. Last year I believe it advanced some 20 per cent. The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has before the house a bill which shows—I won't say inequities—the way in which lenders use some citizens who make small loans for consumer purposes. The interest rate is high. I commend to honourable senators the reading of the bill, because it explains better than I can what is involved in the problems of credit today.

It may be that this country is expanding and going ahead so fast that we have not capital enough to keep apace and we should call a halt. As you know, it is always well to hold your position and not get into deep water. It is well to be independent of your banker, if you can, and control your own interests. When you do that you lead a better and a safer life.

Honourable senators, I do wish to say a few words about the Atlantic provinces. I have in my hand a copy of Labour Research containing a graph of the unemployment situation in Canada as of February 1, 1960. It shows Ontario as the finest province.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I am glad to hear my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity say "Hear, hear."

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You are just finding out?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: My honourable friend is a distinguished member of this house, with a vast amount of experience. He comes from the city of Toronto, that wonderful city whose progress is like a romance in industrial expansion. He lives on the Niagara peninsula, which I have been told is the finest spot in all the world.

However, I was much surprised to hear the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, while speaking in this debate the other day, quote some words from Goldsmith's The Deserted Village and refer to present conditions of great hardship and poverty. I am sure he does not wish us to associate the province of Ontario with The Deserted Village. Ontario is a splendid example of the progress of democracy; it is an area that has gone ahead rapidly and it demonstrates what can be done by intelligent people. We in the Maritimes admire Ontario, but we also envy her. Our envy springs from the fact that she is so good. Rather than quote the words of Goldsmith, "wealth accumulates and men decay," I think my honourable friend should look to these words of the Psalmist: "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage."

Let me point out that the graph to which I referred earlier shows the unemployed as a percentage of labour supply. In the Atlantic provinces it is 18.3 per cent; Quebec, 15.6 per cent, and Ontario, 6.7. These figures rather surprise me. I did not realize the unemployment situation in the Atlantic provinces was as bad as the graph would indicate. We are in an area where there is no freeze-up, where our great harbours at Saint John, Halifax and St. John's are free from ice and the waterfronts appear busy. As I say, I thought the employment situation in the Maritimes was good, but evidently we are worse than anywhere else in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Maybe there is something wrong with the figures.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The figures come from a reliable source.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): The situation is even worse than the figures indicate.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It couldn't be.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Come down and see it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I hope that when the question of unemployment is before the special committee of the Senate on manpower some attention will be given to the problem in the Maritime provinces. True, it costs money to create employment, but we are a large country and we are sending money far afield. We have plans for development here and there, and I don't object to all this, if we can afford it.

Let me give you an illustration of the problem the Maritimes have in competition with Ontario. I am a manufacturer in Nova Scotia, and I know that as soon as they get an over supply of an article in Toronto it is dumped on the Maritime market. Our freight rates from the east are very high. For some years I was a member of a committee in the other house in which we discussed freight rates. There we heard about an arrangement in the United States whereby a company which was manufacturing in a remote area was given a special freight rate, on an equalized basis, to compensate him for his long haul from the source of supply. Under such an arrangement all the manufacturers in such a remote place were given an equalized freight rate until they were strong enough to compete with factories near their source of supply.

It occurs to me that if we could arrange with the Canadian National Railways system that it would make Ste. Rosalie Junction, in Quebec, the equalization point for freight rates, the Maritimes would then be in a position to meet competition.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask my honourable friend a question? He refers to the equalization of freight rates in the United States. Was that arrangement extended to the manufacturing industry in order to regulate cost of manufacture, or was it an arrangement that extended right across the line, to the benefit of the consumer?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It was made with a view to giving the manufacturers an equal opportunity to compete.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: It applied only to factories?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It applied only to articles used as component parts in the manufacturing industry.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable senator if it is not a fact that the Maritimes have special freight rates?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Yes, but they are so complicated and there are so many of them. They should be simplified so that the ordinary man can understand them. As they are now it is only the man who is in a special business who can invoke the lowest rates. It would be so much better if they were simplified.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But are they not of some assistance?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Well, they are not of much assistance to me, except when I get a trucker who will compete with them, and in that case when I tell them the rate that I am quoted I sometimes prevail.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: If they were of assistance in the same way as the Crowsnest Pass rates are of assistance in the west, then they would count for something.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that these subventions apply to all rates, including agreed rates and special rates. They apply across the board.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I think you will find them rather complicated.

However, there is another matter which I think should be taken up by this committee, and that is the merchant marine. That is one industry in this country which must go out and face the world on a competitive basis, and we have given the coastwise trade of our merchant marine away to other countries. We offer it absolutely no protection. In other countries the merchant marine has protection and is subsidized. The United States gives its coastwise trade to its own nationals, and in Europe that trade is subsidized. The men who work on foreign ships get only half as much as the Canadian sailor. You might say that the Canadian gets too much, but should not a man who goes to sea in a ship get as much as a man who works on the shore? The St. Lawrence Waterway has been built and it is now possible to go to the head of the lakes by ship. There are many people who are interested in this matter, and it is now a big question with us in Nova Scotia. It seems to me that there will be a greater opportunity for the merchant marine if it can be put on a basis which will enable it to operate in competition with the shipping of other countries.

Nova Scotia was great in the days of seagoing. All the greatness that Nova Scotia had was due to her operations on the sea, but that has gone. I think that the coastal service of the merchant marine is a matter which must be taken up by Parliament and I will endeavour to have representation made to this committee in the interests of the merchant marine of the Maritime provinces.

Honourable senators, I have taken up more time than I intended, but may I just mention that we have talked about different reports that have been made. There are some features of those reports to which I do not subscribe, and I do not think anybody else does, but I would like to mention the report of the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission. I regard that report as one of the finest reports made up to the time of its publication, and I recommend the reading of it to the members of this committee. It gives a picture of industry in every section of Canada.

I am happy to be able to support this resolution, and I hope that the committee will be as successful in its endeavours as have other committees in the past.

Hon. Donald Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak on this resolution tonight. As most of you know, I have not been in close touch with what has been going on in this chamber for the last several weeks, but since my return today I have had a chance to make a rather quick skimming of the debate that has taken place on this resolution, and some questions have been raised in my mind about certain aspects of the motion. Also, some suggestions have arisen in my mind to which, in this early stage and before the committee is set up, I think some thought should be given by those who may form that committee.

In the first place, I want to join with the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) in wondering—if that is the proper word—why the committee should include practically all the Conservative members of this body and omit the wisdom and the great judgment which has been gained over many years by such a person as the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), and I could mention many more. It does seem to me that we who sit here as Liberals are accused of being political in our attitude toward such committees as this. On the surface, at least, it has that effect on my thinking, and, of course, nothing can be further from the truth.

There was considerable concern last session when the Standing Committee on Finance was instructed to examine the subject of inflation, and I know that the main concern was centred on the fear that the Liberal members of that committee would make, or attempt to make, political capital out of the inquiry and the report. I do not think any member of this chamber can say that any such thing was done by any member of that committee.

If, when we get into committee, our terms of reference, and eventually our report, are going to be restricted in such a way as to cause us to fail to bring about the kind of discussion and produce the kind of report that this house must bring forth once in a while, and which the country needs so badly once in a while, then I think it would be a very tragic thing.

I am making no special protest against the composition of the committee. I have great respect for the judgment of the members who support the Leader of the Government in this chamber, the names of all of whom I read on the list of proposed members. I know that they as individuals will not be anything but fair-minded, and I hope that my judgment will be supported by all other members of the Senate when the committee gets its work under way and when it makes its report.

I am glad that my colleague from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) has made some reference to the Atlantic region. After he started to speak and had reached a certain point on this topic I sent to my office and had brought down to me some notes which I had sketched out with respect to this subject, and which contain some information on the regional aspect of unemployment and employment, to which I believe the committee should give almost a priority.

I am not one of those who go around pointing out how serious the unemployment position is in my province, or in any other province, but for the record I want to say that in February, in the Atlantic provinces, there were 132,000 people drawing unemployment insurance. Those honourable senators who know what our population is will realize that that is not 10 per cent of the labour force; it is getting close to 10 per cent of the population of the Atlantic provinces.

The honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) asked the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg whether these figures were exaggerated. Let me tell him that a great many people who come from my part of the country do not have the kind of employment which qualifies them for unemployment insurance, and therefore they do not even claim unemployment insurance. For instance, a farmer has a little wood lot and he and his two sons and perhaps an uncle cut a little pulpwood during the winter months. They never can qualify for unemployment insurance. As a matter of fact, I don't think they would want to. All they really want is a chance to get in there during the winter and cut the pulpwood, with the knowledge that there will be a market for it. You might say that this is seasonal employment. We have what I think is generally recognized as a rather early spring in that part of the country, particularly in the southern part of the province from which I come. It is spring down there in early April, and about the time of year when I go to my home golf club to play a little golf. As a general rule the snow has disappeared. This year, on April 7, there were still 116,000 people in the Atlantic provinces drawing unemployment insurance.

I am not emphasizing the unemployment factor but I am disturbed about the lack of employment opportunities. Our people may be considered old-fashioned and my honourable friend from Queens-Lunenburg has made some reference to that fact here tonight—but I do not think our people are the kind who want to draw unemployment insurance benefits as a means of support for their families. I am proud to say they are the kind of people who are happier when they have a chance to earn an honest dollar.

What are the employment opportunities in the Atlantic region? What are the employment opportunities in my own province of Nova Scotia? They have never been of the same standard as those of other provinces, a fact that has been recognized by people generally and by governments as they have come and gone. The point I want to establish is that our position, relative to the other provinces, is rapidly worsening. I have no figures at hand to support what I am contending now, but I have made mention in this chamber before of the effect of disarmament on our economy. I would just like to make some mention of this again in passing.

You may recall that my honourable colleague from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) produced some figures on Hansard which indicated that the economy, particularly that of Nova Scotia, depended on defence expenditures for its income. I have made a further inquiry of my own, and in a moment or two I shall place certain figures on the record. The point I wish to make is that the regional aspects of the economic prospects of this country should take priority in the studies by this committee. Perhaps this is the time for honourable senators, and for a great many people outside this chamber, to read some of the documents that were published as ancillary to the final report of the Gordon Commission, a report which was sneered at in some quarters. I think some honourable senators are aware that because of political considerations the merits of the Gordon Report have never been appreciated by many people. I would urge honourable senators to read the ancillary report entitled "Some Regional Aspects of Canada's Economic Prospects". It sets down some basic information with regard to comparative positions and in some detail goes into what may have to be done at some future time to rectify the inequity of the position in which the Atlantic region finds itself. This topic should occupy the attention of the committee.

But I believe there is another and perhaps more important aspect in regard to employment opportunities, and it is related to the attendant economic effects of disarmament on the Atlantic provinces, especially, as I say, in my own province. A particularly close examination should be made of this. When we consider that even if we do not adopt a policy of disarmament—and many of us are quite disturbed to read about the turn of events in Paris at the present time—we have certainly passed into the nuclear age of missiles and anti-missiles, and of course the transition from a policy of defence, such as we have had up to this time, to that which any Government of this country, with its commonsense approach, is going to have to pursue in the very near future, will have the same effect on the economy of some of our Atlantic provinces as though we had total disarmament.

Let me give the house some idea of the importance of direct defence expenditures on the economy of Nova Scotia. The effect of the annual direct defence expenditure of approximately $135 million on the economy of my province should be self-evident. If this tremendous purchasing power in the markets of Nova Scotia's enterprises is in due course removed, the resultant effect on our economy will verge on the catastrophic. Of this amount of $135 million, perhaps the most significant withdrawal would be that of the annual civil salaries and wages of $22½ million, and pay and allowances of $56 million, a total withdrawal of direct purchasing power of $78½ million.

I know figures are not interesting but I want to put these in some perspective, and in doing so I want to draw to your attention that this total amount of $78½ million is $53½ million higher than the total value of fish landings in Nova Scotia, and $61 million higher than the total value of woods operations in Nova Scotia, including sawn lumber and pulpwood production. It is $36½ million higher than the gross income from farm operations in my province. Furthermore, it is just $6 million less than the total value of production in all three primary industries.

Although the eventual withdrawal of these defence expenditures would have a very serious effect on the province of Nova Scotia as a whole, it is in the Halifax area, where the defence installations are concentrated, that the effect could be described as catastrophic. Those of you who have visited the Annapolis area, and the "Valley" area, as we call it, will realize how serious this withdrawal of defence expenditures would be on the military installations at Greenwood and Cornwallis. The Senate committee should give full consideration to this problem.

I have particularly mentioned our future economic prospects with the thought that when this report is written it will contain something which will give hope to us in the Atlantic region, and that some other way will be found to solve our economic problems than that of being dependent on coal subventions, freight rate subventions and hand-outs all down along the line, so that a man will be able to work and support his family by the sweat of his brow and not by such hand-outs.

There is one more problem which I think should be examined by the committee, and my honourable colleague mentioned the subject. We have large families in Nova Scotia. Our schools are almost bursting at the seams with young people. The local taxpayers are having a very difficult time in paying for the new school construction and for the other costs of education. What is going to happen to these young people now in the lower grades and in high school? Before we know it they will be parading to the employment office looking for employment. I think some consideration should be given to a national training scheme. I do not want to get tangled up in any constitutional argument about how it should be done, but I think the federal Government can do a great deal more in providing vocational training for these thousands and thousands of young people who are coming out of the schools of all our provinces. The federal Government has done a great deal, and is still doing so. However, young men and women coming out of high school are likely to require on-job training, because they are not pre-trained for the jobs that are open. Before leaving for the Easter recess I telephoned the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and was quite surprised to learn that in this tiny province of Nova Scotia, where the total population is little more than half a million, during the next ten years, from 1960 to 1970, no less than 75,000 of our youth will be entering the age group of 19 to 28 years. In other words, 75,000 young people will be coming out of the schools into the labour stream, graduating from university, if they have the opportunity to do so, and will be looking for jobs. How can they find a job unless employment opportunities are found for them? In looking through Hansard quickly I noticed that someone complained that some people expect the Government to provide them with a job. I do not think that is the thinking of anyone in this chamber. However, I do think the young people of this country expect the Government to enlist the services of all public-spirited men and women of this country to come up with a solution which will get them away from the idea that the Government owes them a living, and instead that policies will be adopted, even if they are bold and new, to provide the young people of this country with opportunities for employment, and then we shall have a much better country for them to live in.

Thank you, honourable senators, for your attention.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

FIRST AND FINAL COMMUNIQUÉS

First Communiqué

The first plenary sessions of the meeting of commonwealth Prime Ministers were held at 10 Downing street, today.

In opening the meeting, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom expressed, on behalf of his commonwealth colleagues, their deep sorrow at the circumstances which had prevented Dr. Verwoerd, the Prime Minister of South Africa, from carrying out his intention of attending this meeting. He also expressed his regret that the Prime Minister of Ceylon was prevented, owing to the impending election, from coming to London at this time.

Mr. Macmillan welcomed the Prime Minister of Malaya, Tunku Abdul Rahman, as the first representative of Malaya to attend a commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting since Malaya attained full membership of the commonwealth.

The reply to Mr. Macmillan's opening statement was made by Tunku Abdul Rahman. In the course of his reply he raised the problem of racial discrimination in South Africa, and its effects on relations between South Africa and other commonwealth countries, and he expressed the hope that opportunity would be found for the commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss this while they were in London.

The representative of the South African Government, Mr. Eric Louw, emphasized that sole responsibility for domestic policies within South Africa rested with the Union Government.

The meeting reaffirmed the traditional practice that commonwealth conferences do not discuss the internal affairs of member countries. Mr. Louw expressed his readiness to meet other heads of delegations informally for discussion of this problem. Arrangements are being made accordingly.

After these procedural questions had been settled Mr. Macmillan opened a general discussion on the world political situation. The Prime Minister of India and the President of Pakistan continued this discussion at the afternoon session. It will be resumed at a further plenary session tomorrow morning.

3rd May, 1960.

Final Communiqué

The meeting of commonwealth Prime Ministers ended today. Pakistan was represented by its President. The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, Ghana, the Federation of Malaya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland were represented by their Prime Ministers. South Africa was represented by the Minister of External Affairs, and Ceylon by the Minister of Justice.

2. This was the tenth of these meetings to have been held since the war. It has taken place at a time of great significance to the commonwealth and to the world.

3. The continuing growth of the membership of the commonwealth was marked by the attendance at this meeting of the Prime Minister of the Federation of Malaya, which achieved independence in August, 1957. The representatives of the other commonwealth countries welcomed the presence of the federation at the conference.

4. The commonwealth is an association of independent sovereign states, each responsible for its own policies; but the primary objective of all is world peace and security. It is their declared purpose to do everything in their power to achieve that objective, and to continue to co-operate to that end with all the peace-loving nations of the world.

5. In this spirit the commonwealth ministers have reviewed the major international problems of the day, on the eve of the impending summit conference which is to be attended by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. They expressed their sincere hopes for a successful outcome of that conference as a further step in the relaxation of international tension. They discussed, in particular, the problem of disarmament; and they welcomed the progress made at the Geneva conference on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests. They hoped that, on the basis of the preliminary work already done, the summit conference would be able to make some significant progress toward an eventual settlement, under international control, of the problem of disarmament. An advance toward a solution of that problem, linked with a progressive lessening of political tensions, would afford a firm basis for strengthening confidence between nations and promoting world security.

6. The commonwealth ministers also discussed the problems of Africa, the Middle East, the Far East and Southeast Asia. They recognized that economic and social progress are essential for political stability. They welcomed the continuing contribution which mutual assistance under the Colombo Plan affords throughout southeast Asia to these aims; and they agreed that there and elsewhere throughout the less developed areas of the world the best hope of peace, stability and political freedom lies in practical international co-operation of this kind.

7. The ministers reviewed the world economic situation. They noted that, while in general the outlook was favourable, the economic expansion which had taken place since their last meeting had been greater in the industrialized countries of the commonwealth than in the primary producing countries. They agreed that an important condition of the prosperity of these countries was their ability to develop their export trade. They also recognized the urgent need to maintain and, where possible, increase the flow of economic assistance to the less developed countries. They welcomed the decision to establish an international development association.

8. The ministers discussed European trade problems. They expressed concern at the prospect of any economic division in Europe and its possible political implications. The countries of Europe form an important market for commonwealth exports. The ministers expressed their hope that these countries would follow trade policies in accordance with the principles of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and thus avoid damage to the economies of the primary producing countries and those that are also developing exports of manufactured goods. In addition, European countries have an important contribution to make in assisting the economic development of the less advanced countries. The ministers hoped that these problems could be speedily and satisfactorily resolved, with due regard to the interests of countries outside Europe.

9. The commonwealth ministers reviewed the economic development of commonwealth countries in Africa which have recently attained or are approaching independence. They agreed that consideration should be given to the possibility of co-operative action among members of the commonwealth in assisting the economic development of these countries. This possibility will be studied in the first instance by officials of commonwealth Governments, and the commonwealth economic consultative council will examine it at its next meeting.

10. The ministers also reaffirmed their belief in the value of exchanges between commonwealth countries of persons with specialized skills and experience. They agreed that further efforts should be made to foster and encourage these exchanges, whether on a regional or other basis, and that the commonwealth economic consultative council should take this question into urgent consideration. They trusted that employers in commonwealth countries—whether governments, statutory bodies or private companies—would be ready, wherever possible, to encourage members of their staffs to undertake a period of public service abroad and would do their best to ensure that their prospects in their home countries would not thereby be prejudiced.

11. The ministers considered various questions of constitutional development within the commonwealth. They noted that the Federation of Nigeria would attain independence on 1st October, 1960. They extended to the federation their good wishes for its future and looked forward to welcoming an independent Nigeria as a member of the commonwealth on the completion of the necessary constitutional processes.

12. The meeting was informed that, in pursuance of the recent plebiscite, the constituent assembly in Ghana had resolved that the necessary constitutional steps should be taken to introduce a republican form of constitution in Ghana by 1st July, 1960. In notifying this forthcoming constitutional change, the Prime Minister of Ghana assured the meeting of his country's desire to continue her membership of the commonwealth and her acceptance of the Queen as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations and as such the head of the commonwealth. The heads of delegations of the other member countries of the commonwealth assured the Prime Minister of Ghana that the present relations between their countries and Ghana would remain unaffected by this constitutional change and they declared that their Governments would accept and recognize Ghana's continued membership of the commonwealth.

13. The meeting noted a statement by the South African Minister of External Affairs that the Union Government intended to hold a referendum on the subject of South Africa becoming a republic. The meeting affirmed the view that the choice between a monarchy and a republic was entirely the responsibility of the country concerned. In the event of South Africa deciding to become a republic and if the desire was subsequently expressed to remain a member of the commonwealth, the meeting suggested that the South African Government should then ask for the consent of the other commonwealth Governments either at a meeting of commonwealth Prime Ministers or, if this were not practicable, by correspondence.

14. The ministers reviewed the constitutional development of the commonwealth, with particular reference to the future of the smaller dependent territories. They agreed that a detailed study of this subject should be made for consideration by commonwealth Governments.

15. Whilst reaffirming the traditional practice that commonwealth conferences do not discuss the internal affairs of member countries ministers availed themselves of Mr. Louw's presence in London to have informal discussions with him about the racial situation in South Africa. During these informal discussions Mr. Louw gave information and answered questions on the Union's policies, and the other ministers conveyed to him their views on the South African problem. The ministers emphasized that the commonwealth itself is a multiracial association and expressed the need to ensure good relations between all member states and peoples of the commonwealth.

PRIVATE BILL

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF CANADA —REPORT OF COMMITTEE—BILL REFERRED BACK

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-19, to incorporate The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate with the following amendments:

1. Page 1, lines 19 and 20: Strike out "town of Provost, in the province of Alberta" and substitute therefor "city of Prince Rupert, in the province of British Columbia".
2. Page 2, line 1: Strike out "Alger" and substitute therefor "Algar".

10. Page 6, line 18: Strike out "directors" and substitute therefor "trustees".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I would like to move, in amendment to the motion, that this report be not now adopted, but that the bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

Perhaps a word in explanation of the amendment would be in order for honourable senators who were not at the meeting of the Private Bills Committee this morning. This is a bill with the general objects of which I think the whole committee were entirely in sympathy. It is a bill submitted by four separate groups of Lutherans, all in the western provinces, who desire to join together for all practical purposes to unite their respective efforts, and with that object we were entirely in sympathy. The trouble was about the name which these people propose to adopt, namely, The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada.

Now, strong objection was taken to so broad a name by a number of other Lutherans who attended the meeting of the committee. We were told, and it was not contested, that the proponents of this bill represent all together approximately 31 per cent of all Canadian Lutherans, and objection was made by the other Lutheran bodies that if you give this body the wide general name of The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada it will be a misnomer and misleading because it will not include the remaining 69 per cent of Lutherans. The objection to this wide general name was supported by clergymen and members of the Lutheran Church who were in Ottawa and by no less than four members of the House of Commons, all of whom are themselves members of different branches of the Lutheran Church.

A resolution was moved in the committee that the name was unacceptable on those grounds. That resolution resulted in a tie vote, five members of the committee in favour and five against, including the chairman, who exercised his right to vote.

A suggestion was made to the committee that the objection could very well be met if the proponents of the bill would be willing simply to strike out the word "The" and the word "of" so as to call themselves Evangelical Lutheran Church Canada.

I think, honourable senators, you will realize that if the bill goes forward in its present form it has very little chance of passing in either this house or the House of Commons. The object of my amendment is to send the bill back to the committee for further consideration in the hope that the proponents of the bill will modify the very rigid attitude which they took before the committee. They wanted the name which is in the bill, that whole name, and nothing but that name, and refused to accept any amendment, an attitude which struck us as being rather unreasonable.

I think all of us in the committee are very anxious to have the basic purpose of this bill carried into effect by seeing these four bodies joined together, but we do not believe there is any possibility of the bill's passing in the form in which it is now, with this wide general name which it proposes.

In a few words, honourable senators, that is the reason I have taken the opportunity of moving this amendment.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I second the motion of the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). My entitlement to second it is that I seconded such a motion in the committee this morning.

There was unanimity in the committee as to the desirability of approving the substantial purpose of this bill, and the real question turned on the name. I had the feeling in committee, and it has been intensified since, that if the proponents of the bill, who were so adamant in their attitude this morning, have a chance for reflection they may come to the conclusion that there is some modification in the name which they could get along with and which would assure uninterrupted passage of the bill through both houses.

I think the stumbling block in this matter is the fact that in 1951 Parliament passed a private bill giving one of the four groups now seeking incorporation the very name which is now sought under this bill, namely, The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada. It was indicated to us in committee that the people who now oppose the name desired to oppose it in 1951 and had requested information as to when the private bill of that time was to be brought in, but somehow the signals got crossed and their representations were never heard.

Be that as it may, the proponents of the bill feel that, since one of them has the name now and it is highly desirable to them, why should they change it? The answer to that question as given by some of the members of the committee was simply this. If the request for this name were being made for the first time now it does not appear that it would be granted, in view of the circumstances, namely, that the body which would acquire this name as a result of the passage of this bill would represent a minority of the Lutheran Church membership in Canada, yet the connotation of the name would imply that that minority was The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada.

If the proponents of the bill wish to retain the name which they got in 1951 they will have to keep it by virtue of the existing statute, and they will have to do the best they can to work their present merger into that name. If they seek to do that I think they will encounter many difficulties.

I was particularly impressed this morning by the fact that not only did four members of the House of Commons who are Lutherans appear before the committee and express their points of view, but one of them acknowledged that he is a member of one of the four groups that are seeking this merger or amalgamation, yet he felt it was undesirable at this time that a name should be given implying that the amalgamation comprised the entire Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada.

As I said, honourable senators, in my view it is most desirable that a little time be taken for meditation and thought here. That can be gained by referring the bill back to the committee for further consideration. If the bill goes on in its present form I feel that ultimately it will fail to pass. We are all in favour of the purpose of the bill and therefore it seems highly desirable that we send the bill back to committee for hearing, possibly on an occasion when we can have a larger representation. In the meantime the proponents will have had an opportunity to reflect further on the situation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, all I wish to say is this. After listening to the very eloquent representations that have been made in the chamber this afternoon I am amazed that the bill carried in committee this morning.

Amendment agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce presented the committee's reports Nos. 418 to 422, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "CLOSE-UP"

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate an article by Dr. Charlotte Whitton which appears in today's issue of the Ottawa Citizen in her column "On Thinking it Over". This article refers to the C.B.C.'s television program "Close-Up" which, according to Dr. Whitton, is scheduled to be broadcast tomorrow.

According to Dr. Whitton, who says she obtained her information from a précis of this week's program "Close-Up", the person who is going to be interviewed tomorrow is a secretary who made $70 a week in her legitimate occupation and $100 a night by acting as co-respondent in evidence to be used in divorce proceedings.

In her article Dr. Whitton says that this seems to be a very sordid and unsavoury subject for a television program, and I agree that it is. It is a very sordid subject for a program that will be going into thousands of Canadian homes on Thursday night. Dr. Whitton says that the program must be either phoney or open to prosecution under the criminal law. If it is phoney, then it is misleading, and it seems to me that if that is the case it belongs in the same class as the quiz programs which raised such trouble in the United States not so very long ago. If it is not phoney, then, as Dr. Whitton points out, the person interviewed must be selling false evidence and guilty of an offence.

Dr. Whitton says that the place of such a person "certainly is not parading before the nation by grace and favour of the tax-endowed C.B.C.-TV." I continue quoting:

> If, as the forecast suggests, she is in the business of selling false witness, then she and those associated with her are open to the offence, both of conspiracy and perjury under our laws and so should be so charged and prosecuted.

Many people feel, as I do, that the glorification of crime and violence in movies and on the TV is certainly a contributing factor to our juvenile deliquency which, we have to admit, is not improving. Could not such a program lead some young women, many of whom find it hard to live on the small salaries they earn, to make easy money in a similar way? In any case, I consider this subject a most inappropriate one for a television program.

I would like to know if the Government is aware of this, and if it is sponsoring such a program which gives publicity—and that is something highly valued by many people—to a person who has, by her own admission, successfully flouted the laws of Canada regarding perjury and conspiracy for the avowed purpose of misleading our courts of justice, and who, according to Dr. Whitton, is going to tell us on this television program how she did this so successfully. In case the Government is not aware of the proposed program will the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Minister of Justice and our law enforcement officers?

LA SALLE-CAUGHNAWAGA BRIDGE BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order for the second reading of Bill S-32, to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near the town of La Salle, in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, I would ask permission of the house to postpone until later this day the remarks that I intend to make on moving second reading of this bill.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lionel Choquette moved the second reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill contains two amendments to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. One amendment provides an alternative whereby the grants now paid by the federal Government to the universities can, if a province so desires, be replaced by direct provincial grants to these institutions of higher learning.

The second amendment increases the share of personal income tax paid to the provinces. This second amendment continues for the two remaining years covered by the act the increased share first granted in 1958. In other words, in 1958 there was an increase from 10 to 13 per cent in the provincial share of personal income tax, and what is requested in the bill before the house is a continuation of that increase for another two-year period. There should be no difficulty encountered with respect to this point.

Under the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act the tax rental and equalization payments are based on certain standard rates of tax as follows: corporation tax, 9 per cent; individual income tax, 10 per cent; succession duties, 50 per cent. These were the standard rates originally specified in the act. As already stated, in 1958 Parliament amended the act so that the provincial share of personal income tax was raised from 10 per cent to 13 per cent for the 1958 taxation year. In 1959 a similar amendment was passed with respect to the 1959 taxation year.

As honourable senators are aware, the tax-sharing arrangements took place in 1942 as a sort of war measure and they were to last a full fiscal year after the end of hostilities Then in 1947 there was a renegotiation and the arrangements were renewed for another five years until 1952, when they were renegotiated again for another five years to 1957, then for a further five years from 1957 to March 31, 1962, at which time the provinces are to meet with the federal Government to make new arrangements.

The additional revenue which the provinces received as a result of all these amendments has been quite important in provincial finances. In 1958-59 payments and abatements to the provinces were $55.9 million higher as a result of the increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the share of personal income tax received. In 1959-60 payments and abatements were $65 million higher as a result of the change, and it is estimated that for 1960-61 the provinces will benefit by more than $68 million. Such sums of money are obviously important both as additional costs to the federal treasury and as additional revenue to the provicnes.

The amendments with respect to university grants involve no additional cost to the federal treasury. However, these amendments do provide important alternative arrangements which permit a province to replace the present federal grants to universities by a system of direct provincial grants on an equal scale without increasing the burden on its taxpayers.

In theory other provinces could accept this. In practice the province of Quebec is the only one up until now to take advantage of this measure.

The federal grants to universities were begun in 1951-52 and have been paid in each year since. They were first paid on the basis of 50 cents per capita for the total population of each province, but in 1956-57 the rate was raised to $1 per capita, and in 1958-59 to $1.50 per capita. From the beginning of the program until the end of the fiscal year 1959-60 the total amount paid by the federal Government was $112,509,238. For the year 1959-60 the grants amounted to $26,112,000.

In the first years of the program the grants were made by the federal Government directly to the universities. The allocation for each province was based on the provincial population and the amount so allocated was distributed among the universities of a province on the basis of the number of full-time intramural student enrolment in courses leading to degrees. That formula still applies and is followed at the present time.

Since 1956-57 the Government has paid the money to the National Conference of Canadian Universities, and the actual distribution of grants has been undertaken by that body or its successor, the Canadian Universities Foundation.

Up to the present time the amounts paid have been authorized by an annual vote, but the present amendment will place these grants on a statutory basis for the two remaining years of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

University grants have met with a wide measure of approval in nine provinces. In Quebec, however, the grants were regarded as an interference with the province's exclusive jurisdiction over education. The grants were accepted in 1951-52 by Quebec universities, but from that year up until 1959-60 only two colleges applied annually for the grants.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he could tell us the names of those two colleges?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The College Marie de France and the Presbyterian College of Montreal. I understand that this year some colleges which claimed before are not claiming now under the new system. I know that the College de Rouyn and the Presbyterian College have not applied this year.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does the bill provide for retroactive payments of grants?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am coming to retroactive payments. The province of Quebec for many years refused gifts of money and the grants lapsed.

I have here the figures for grants available to universities of the province of Quebec. The first grant, for the fiscal year 1951-52, amounted to $2,027,800. The amount available for 1952-53 is unknown to me at present, but it has lapsed. The same applies to 1953-54, 1954-55 and 1955-56. For the years 1956-57 the Government said it would place the grant in the hands of what at that time was known as the National Conference of Canadian Universities, and that universities which decided to claim the grants might do so. None of them claimed, with the result that there is now available to the province of Quebec $25 million.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Could the honourable gentleman tell us what amount was placed at the disposal of the universities each year between the years 1951 and 1956?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That would be a matter for the actuaries. Those figures will be available in committee.

In 1956-57, for the first time since 1951-52, we see that a grant was available to universities of the province of Quebec. That year it was $4,628,378. In the following year, 1957-58, it was $4,758,000; in 1958-59, $7,326,000; and in 1959-60, $7,498,500.

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I interrupt my honourable friend? I assume the table of figures which the honourable senator is using was prepared by the department. It is hard to follow those figures. Would we not benefit if the table was put on Hansard after some of the highlights have been given to us?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I will place it on Hansard.

See table on page 603.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I ask my honourable friend a question for clarification? I think he said that some of the grants prior to 1956 to the Quebec universities lapsed. Is that really the case? I thought that they all were put ultimately in the control of the National Council of Canadian Universities.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No. That system of putting grants in the control of that organization started, I understand, in 1956-57. If the universities did not avail themselves of the money offered to them in any of those years the grants lapsed at the end of the year.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Is my honourable friend not mistaken? I think the grants have accumulated regularly from the beginning.

Hon. Mr. Croll: How much was put in in 1956-57?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have the amounts, requested a moment ago, which were available in the years I mentioned and lapsed. In 1952-53 the amount made available to Quebec universities but not accepted was $2,087,000; in 1953-54, $2,134,500; in 1954-55, $2,194,000; and in 1955-56, $2,260,000. These figures total $8,675,500.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Will those lapses be revived under the bill?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I understand not.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What is the $25 million for?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The $25 million is the amount deposited from 1956-57 when the Government got tired of seeing these grants lapsing, and said, "We will find a new system. We will place that money with the foundation, and those universities that want to collect it may do so."

Hon. Mr. Euler: Anything prior to that?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, except the grant of $2,027,800 made in 1951-52, which was accepted.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I think the figures my friend gave for 1957 were about double these earlier figures. Were they in the range of $4 million?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: $4,628,378.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is there any basis of calculation for arriving at this amount?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes; $1 per capita, instead of 50 cents per capita. Up until 1956-57 it had been 50 cents per capita. It was $1 per capita in 1957-58; and in 1958-59 it was raised to $1.50 per capita.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable gentleman mind a further interruption?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would love it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understood him to say that at the present time there is approximately $25 million in this fund which is being held by the Canadian Universities Foundation for Quebec universities. The honourable gentleman did not mention that there was a lapse in any one of the years referred to by him for which he gave firm figures. The figures for those years were approximately $4 million in two years and $7 million in two years. I would like to know Commencing in fiscal year 1956–57, the National Conference of Canadian Universities undertook the distribution of the grants.

The amounts made available to the universities of Quebec but not accepted amounted in 1952–53 to $2,087,000; in 1953–4 $2,134,500; in 1954–5 $2,194,000 and in 1955–6 $2,260,000. These amounts lapsed at the conclusion of the relevant fiscal year. Subsequent to 1955–6 the amounts for Quebec universities have been held in trust by the National Conference of Canadian Universities.

if the figure of $25 million is approximately the amount now being held for Quebec universities or does it represent an amount which was held back for a number of years?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, that is the total of the amounts that were placed in the hands of the Canadian Universities Foundation since 1956-57 after these lapses of four years. If we add $2,027,800, the first grants that were accepted, we have a grand total of $26,238,678.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is what is now available?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is now available. I am including in that the first grant that was accepted by the universities of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: But if you added the grants that lapsed to the ones that were provided in the manner in which you mentioned, the figure would approximate about $25 million, would it not?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think the statement made by the honourable gentleman is very clear. Probably we can get the correct information in committee. I will have to ask the house to refer the bill to committee for consideration.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, it was not a happy situation, as you realize, for the universities of the province of Quebec at the time of the refusal of grants. No workable formula had been reached for university grants to Quebec, so the universities were delving into endowment funds, using money earlier raised for building funds or borrowing money to meet deficits. The alternative arrangements provided in the bill offer a solution to the problem of university grants in Quebec. A province which collects its own corporation taxes can, if it chooses to do so, pay additional grants to its universities on the basis of student enrolment on a scale equivalent to $1.50 per capita of its total population.

If it makes provision to pay such additional amounts to its universities the corporate taxpayers of that province will receive an additional abatement of one per cent under the Income Tax Act. If this increase of one per cent payable by the corporations is accepted, the Income Tax Act will have to be amended accordingly so that there will be an abatement authorized. The value of this abatement of one per cent in the rate of corporate income tax will be adjusted to $1.50 per capita by a deduction from or an addition to other payments made under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. It can be seen that this alternative involves no additional cost to the federal treasury.

If the federal university grants are replaced by provincial university grants in a province, there is a saving to the federal treasury of $1.50 per capita in that province, and this saving is matched exactly by the value of the additional abatement given and the adjusting payments or deductions.

The bill, by providing an acceptable alternative for the payment of university grants, makes a major contribution to federal-provincial understanding and good relations.

Honourable senators, I have endeavoured to give you a general idea of the bill. There are many figures and there are technical points that should be dealt with by experts in committee. But if there are any questions that I am able to answer, I will do so.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I want to ask a question without making a speech. In the event that the abatement does not result in producing sufficient moneys to equal $1.50 multiplied by the population of Quebec, what will the situation be? On the other hand, if it exceeds that amount, what will the situation then be?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I think I have the answer to that: The situation will be that the equalization payment—and this would be ex gratia from the Consolidated Revenue Fund—might represent 10 cents or 15 cents per capita at times, and it is anticipated that this increase of one per cent will more than cover what will be required.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): So if it is less the federal Government will make up the deficiency?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, the federal Government will pay it out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And if it is more?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I suppose it will be taken off the grants.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): What is the answer to that question?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: If it is more, I assume that it would be taken off the grants.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If the grant is made they bill them for any difference?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would think so.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Might I ask the honourable senator if the figures that he has been dealing with will appear in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, the figures that I have been mentioning will be in Hansard. I have figures for all the universities which I think will be interesting and they might be included in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I would think so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the one per cent does not raise sufficient money to equal $1.50 per capita the federal Government is to make up the difference. Is that what I understand?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is right, and as a matter of fact in Quebec they have raised it to $1.75.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, if the one per cent does not produce $1.50 and the federal Government has to make up the difference, will there not still be the same objection to receiving the difference as there was in the instance of receiving the whole amount?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would not be prepared to answer that. I cannot place myself in my good friend's shoes, for instance, nor in the shoes of the people of the province of Quebec, who have made great steps toward reaching an agreement.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would my friend go so far as to say that if it does not produce $1.50, or not more than $1.50, the problem will not have been solved?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I am not prepared to say.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Honourable senators, I would like to state a question in the light of the British North America Act. According to the British North America Act education is within the exclusive jurisdiction of each province. If education was left as it should be left, under the jurisdiction of each province, I would like to know what amount each province, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, would collect under a system whereby it would impose taxes—corporation taxes or any other taxes or levies—to supply sufficient money to meet its obligation for the education of its children. I would like to have the information very clear. For instance, let us take the province of Prince Edward Island. Supposing that province is left to itself and collects its own taxes for the purpose of education. How much would they yield to the province and would that amount be sufficient to meet its obligations for educational purposes?

I do not want the honourable gentleman to answer now. I would like him to ascertain the exact figure that would be collected by each province if education was left under the jurisdiction of each province, and how the provinces can meet their obligation for the education of their children.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The honourable senator's question is on Hansard and it is unanswered, but it will be answered, I take it, in committee. I do not quite grasp it, because if there are corporate taxes they can amount to 15 per cent and only a certain percentage of that would go to education. When corporations are taxed they are not taxed especially for education.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable gentleman two simple questions? I notice in section 1 of the bill the words "varying a tax rental agreement to provide . . .". I do not understand the meaning or the exact context of a "tax rental agreement", but I understand that Quebec now has no tax rental agreement with Canada.

Secondly, am I correct in understanding that the formula for distribution of money to the universities and colleges on the basis of full-time intramural students is going to be continued under the new alternative arrangement? I note on page 2 of the bill, at lines 16 and 17, the words "satisfactory arrangements exist in the opinion of the Minister . . ." Am I correct that the formula of distribution to colleges and universities on the basis of full-time intramural students is to be continued?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is the system that will be followed, especially in cases where a province decides to become a prescribed province, such as is explained at the top of page 2 of the bill. If a province decides to collect its own taxes and to look after its own university costs, it will as far as possible follow the plan that is followed throughout Canada. It could be at variance, but the plan would have to be acceptable to the federal authorities.

Hon. Mr. Wall: The point I am raising is simply whether the prescribed province has to follow a plan of distribution which has been arranged by the federal authorities.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: With the consent of the newly prescribed province.

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I be permitted one question? Two tables appear in the Hansard of the other place under date of March 18, dealing with grants to universities. Do I understand my honourable friend will supply similar tables for our use here?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, they will be supplied in committee.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We require the information to be placed on our Hansard, before the bill gets to committee.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Has my honourable friend seen the table I just passed around?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not see it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I requested that that table be placed on Hansard. It contains all the figures with respect to grants made since the inception of the system. That is the table which appears at page 2226 of the Hansard of the other house, and it will appear in our record as part of my remarks today.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I would call attention to another table which appears at page 2224 of Hansard of the other place. It is headed "Effect on tax-sharing arrangements with the provinces of the 3% increase in the standard individual income tax including tax abatements". I suggest that this table also should be placed on our Hansard, so that when honourable senators read what the honourable sponsor of the bill has said they can relate it to the facts given in these tables. When the honourable senator said that grants for certain years have lapsed, it took us a bit by surprise. But that is exactly what the tables show. Therefore, I ask that this additional table be included in our record.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: With the permission of the house, I now place on Hansard the table requested by my honourable friend.

See table on page 607.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a supplementary question? According to the record of the House of Commons the bill now before us received second reading unanimously in that house on May 10, and on May 13 it received third reading and was passed unanimously. Therefore, what is the objection to the bill? There appears to be no objection.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Some amendment was offered in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have heard nothing but intelligent questions. I have heard no objection.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, this is an important bill, and may have far-reaching effects in the future, more particularly in the province of Quebec. The bill came to us late yesterday, and has been explained only today. I feel that I am in a rather difficult position, because the legislations is quite complicated. Therefore, I would prefer to speak in French in order that what I have to say may not be misinterpreted. I can more easily improve in French than in English.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, I think that in the matter of federal provincial arrangements with regard to university grants, a bit of the background would not be amiss.

Before 1951-52, there was undeniably never any mention of federal grants to Canadian universities, any more than to classical colleges and other educational institutions in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Of federal grants.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes. There have been grants in favour of technical schools and complete payment by the federal Government of all expenses incurred by military colleges. Formerly, there was only one of them, in Kingston, but since then another one has been established in St. Johns, the maintenance of which has also been taken over by the federal Government.

With the end of the war, our universities were faced with increasing financial difficulties resulting from the necessity of providing new buildings, expanding the old ones, looking after a much greater number of students, setting up new faculties and fitting them out completely. They found out they could not meet these expenses.

At first, they quite naturally called upon the governments of the various provinces in which they were located to obtain the necessary grants for their development. But the provinces were then no longer in a position to meet such considerable demands because the field of taxation had been by then fully occupied by the federal taxes, which had remained just about the same ever since 1942. The universities, having no other sources of revenue, then called upon the federal Government in order to obtain the necessary grants for their development and to allow them to offer our youth an education comparable to that given in other countries like the United States and European countries.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? When he says that the universities asked the federal Government for grants, is he in a position to produce letters or other documents to that effect?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No, I cannot, but I do know that during the discussions that took place in the province of Quebec in 1951-52, when the first grants were given, everybody said that the universities had not the necessary means for their development. Mr. St. Laurent said so in 1951-52 and he repeated it in 1955-56 and in 1956-57. Later on, the present Government mentioned the fact whenever there was a question of increasing the

The calculations for 1958–59 are based on the Final Calculation of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization Payments for the fiscal year 1958–59 dated Dec. 24, 1959; for 1959–60 on the Fourth Estimate of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization for fiscal year 1959–60 dated Jan. Jan. 8, 1960 and for 1960–61 on the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961. The Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grant and the deduction on account of Quebec special corporations taxes are excluded.

The figures in brackets exclude the amount of the abatements.

grants from 50 cents to $1.00 per capita and also when they were increased from $1.00 to $1.50 per capita.

The federal Government realized the need of additional grants to universities and, in 1951-52, it agreed to pay grants on a 50-cent per capita basis, no other mention being made but that the grants were being given directly to the universities according to a formula which has remained unchanged. So, that first year, all the universities of the dominion accepted the grants, including Quebec universities. But in 1952-53, the Government of Quebec protested that federal grants were nothing but federal interference in the field of education.

On that constitutional question, I would rather not go too far. It is a moot point. Some people claim that the federal Government should not even, through grants, interfere with education, even though it refrains from giving any order, from meddling with educational details and does nothing else but hand out to the universities the grants they need for their normal development. Others claim that it is quite legal and constitutional for the federal Government to give grants to Canadian universities.

At any rate, there was at that time in the province of Quebec an objection or obstacle which prevented Quebec universities from receiving, or rather from claiming the grants which the federal Government had offered them. In this regard, the universities of Quebec lost more than $2 million in 1952-53, in 1953-54, in 1954-55 and as much in 1955-56, so that over those years the universities were deprived of nearly $9 million. I am not blaming Quebec universities because, had they accepted those grants, they would have lost all rights to any provincial grants.

In 1956-57, the question was raised anew before the federal Government for two reasons, the first of which was the situation existing in Quebec and which prevented the universities from accepting federal grants; and second, the increase from 50 cents to $1 per capita that the federal Government was about to make in its university grants. Then the Government, in order to settle the matter, announced the establishment of the Canadian Universities Foundation, a federal body, under federal control, to whom the grants would henceforth be paid. As the universities had been prevented in the past from accepting the grants offered them, the amounts in question would remain in the hands of the foundation so that, when the difficulty disappeared, Quebec universities could receive the same grants as the universities outside their province and which, for reasons beyond their own control, they had been unable to accept. And that is still being done today.

The grants which have accumulated in favour of Quebec universities because they were not in a position to accept them as long as the obstacle had not been removed now amount to $25 million.

Well, this year, a formula seems to have been found which is both more constitutional and more favourable to Quebec and which allows its universities to accept, through the Canadian Universities Foundation, the grants enjoyed by all the other universities. It is all very simple. Up till now, Canadian universities outside Quebec have been receiving grants paid to the Canadian Universities Foundation and distributed according to the standards and formulas agreed upon between the foundation and the federal Government. The province of Quebec refused them, but the money is still there.

In order to settle the problem constitutionally, and as the Government of Quebec had formally objected to the grants, a new formula was devised. Quebec was told: "Now, you are going to collect a 1 per cent tax from your own corporations and pay, yourself, to Quebec universities the grants we pay through the Canadian Universities Foundation. In Quebec, you will set the tax, collect it and pay the money directly to the universities; it will thus be a tax set, collected and distributed by the province".

If that were truly the case, I would have nothing to say. It would be a good way of concluding an agreement between federal and provincial authorities in order to calm the constitutional scruples lingering in the minds of some people. But the solution suggested, like the bill before us, not only solves nothing but it makes matters worse and produces a situation which is even less constitutional than the present one. In what way? This is how I understand it: In the first place if education really is a question coming under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, as I am convinced beyond a doubt that it is, then each province must be free to set, to collect and to distribute educational taxes as it sees fit. Now, what happens under the bill before us? First, the province collects only as much as it is told to by the federal Government, that is 1 per cent, from its corporations, which amount is deductible under federal law. That situation will last only as long as the federal Government so desires. In one, two or three years, conditions could change overnight.

Secondly, the money collected with the permission of the federal Government is distributed to Quebec universities by the provincial Government under conditions set by the federal Government. Very well, but how? In accordance with the rules set by the federal Government for the Canadian Universities Foundation. Therefore, should the provincial Government, instead of distributing the money on a per capita per college basis, desire, because of the creation of a new faculty in some university, to give greater help to that university in order that it may meet necessary expenses, it is prohibited from doing so because conditions governing the distribution of grants are set by the federal Government under the terms of the agreements entered into with the Canadian Universities Foundation. What becomes, then, of the autonomy claimed by the provincial Government in the matter of setting, collecting and, what is especially important, distributing the funds collected with the permission of the federal Government?

Thirdly, I submit that the situation is worse today than it has ever been because, even though the federal Government pays university grants, nothing in the act prevents the provincial Government from imposing the tax it wants to in favour of universities, from collecting and then from doing with the proceeds just what it wants to do.

Now, under the terms of the legislation before us, the amount of the tax to be imposed by the provincial Government is limited to 1 per cent; that is specified, 1 per cent corporation income tax but no personal income tax, which is the only one that could be deductible. Moreover, if the education tax imposed by the province should produce an amount which exceeds $1.50 per capita in the province, well the surplus on that tax set by the province, collected by the province and to be distributed by the province would have to be paid back to the federal Government.

It would therefore seem that, although it is the Quebec Government's duty, for its own educational purposes, to set, collect and distribute this tax, it must still pay back a part of it to the federal Government, to be transferred to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

On principle, I am unable to accept such a formula. I understand that the universities are going to receive the amounts presently held for them by the Canadian Universities Foundation, that the provincial Government is going to be authorized to collect seven or eight millions more to be distributed in accordance with the standards and conditions imposed by the federal Government. I understand that we cannot object to such a measure and I, personally, can do nothing but vote in favour of the bill, rather than see it thrown out but, as far as autonomy is concerned this act is more dangerous than any other. I say it is more dangerous from the point of view of autonomy in the field of education, from the point of view of construction and development of our institutions of higher learning.

I would like to warn senators and the Government against these extremely dangerous measures which may lead us into a situation where the federal Government will have to impose heavy taxes to help out the universities instead of letting the provincial Government set, collect and distribute them. Furthermore, the province of Quebec is being allowed to impose taxes for educational purposes—which come under its exclusive jurisdiction—but part of the proceeds of such a tax may be considered as a debt owed the federal Government. So that the federal Government will be collecting from a field which is not its own and the province will have to reimburse to the federal Government part of the taxes which were legally imposed, as they come within its exclusive domain.

I am quite sure that if an effort had been made in the past to impose federal taxes to pay for university construction, it would have been opposed on the ground that the matter did not concern the federal authority, that it was ultra vires.

Is there no solution to the problem? Because when all is said and done, our universities need help. It would seem that Quebec approves this bill, or at least that Quebec is ready to act on it as soon as it is passed, in accordance with the terms of the present act.

Is there no way to prevent the control of education passing from provincial into federal hands or to safeguard all the provinces' autonomy in that field?

Well, I should say at the outset that if the English-speaking provinces are satisfied that the Canadian Universities Foundation should be under federal control, in the case of Quebec, that foundation, to whom the grants will be paid, should come under the province and the terms of distribution be dictated by the provincial government rather than by federal authority.

The best way to safeguard our autonomy would be to be entitled to say to that body: "You are going to receive the money and you will distribute it in such and such a way."

I find the bill unfair for another reason, namely, that it does not allow for repayment to Quebec universities of the sums collected by the Government during the years 1952-53, 1953-54, 1954-55 and 1955-56. Those amounts were offered them, but could not be accepted because of insuperable obstacles. It was decided in 1956-57 that these amounts would be kept in reserve by the Canadian Universities Foundation until such time as the obstacles having disappeared they could be accepted. I wonder why the amounts collected under the 50-cent per capita basis cannot be paid back to Quebec universities, who would thereby enjoy the same advantages as the universities of other provinces.

Finally, has the time not come to allow the provinces to collect their own taxes?

The province of Quebec is in a rather peculiar position. It differs from the other provinces in that it has its own traditions, its laws, its language, and that the religion of the majority is not the same as in other provinces; that is why you will find fears in the province of Quebec that do not exist in the other provinces. The present Government no more than any former Government, does not or will not interfere with education in Quebec, in a manner that would cause the province to lose one of its dearest rights. There is no danger now, but what will happen in fifty years? Let us suppose that some future Government composed of people whose principles differ from those of past and present Governments should come into power, that it should adopt other methods and decide to take over the control of universities by placing conditions upon the money paid to the Canadian Universities Foundation. Would that not constitute a direct violation of provincial autonomy? No one knows whether forty years hence some future Government may not decide to instil into Canada's youth, those of Quebec included, principles that differ from those prevailing today. That is what the province of Quebec is afraid of. That is the reason for which the provinces of Canada were granted in a special privilege the exclusive jurisdiction over education. Why not respect that autonomy? And what is the best way of doing so? The only way to safeguard Quebec's and the other provinces' exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education would be to allow them to impose themselves the taxes required to develop and maintain the educational system in each province. Let us forget about the kind of measures which prevent the provinces from imposing the necessary taxes without, at the same time, imposing double taxation upon the taxpayer. Double taxation is no way of helping our universities, it is no way of allowing our provinces to set up their educational system. All Quebec wants is the right to develop its own educational system through provincial taxes, but without double taxation.

I am convinced that if the other provinces claimed the same right and if there existed more co-operation between the provinces, they would all keep the autonomy granted them by the British North America Act.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make and the conclusions that must be drawn from them. The federal Government should now be persuaded to relinquish taxation for the purpose of giving educational grants to the provinces and to allow the latter to collect and distribute their own taxes as they see fit, without any strings attached and without their being subjected to the control of the Governor in Council.

To my mind, that system would be acceptable to all concerned and no province would have to fear any violation of the British North America Act of 1867; their autonomy in that field would remain intact and would not be infringed upon, and the federal Government would have no authority to impose upon the provinces an educational system they did not want.

(Text):

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, to a layman not trained in the technicalities of constitutional law this bill presents a dilemma. To be against it, in principle, means to be accused of doing something which would prevent one of the ten Canadian provinces from sharing in funds now being collected also from Canadian citizens in Quebec. These federal funds are being allocated to universities on the basis of a formula—which I have criticized in this house—through the instrumentality of the new Canadian Universities Foundation, under an agreement we are approving in this bill. However, to be in favour of this supposedly more workable arrangement with its fine theoretical or philosophical distinctions raises problems in my mind regarding some aspects which I shall briefly describe. In other words, this new formula, alternative to the one currently in use since the beginning of federal grants to universities and colleges, cannot be regarded as a very happy, very fortuitous or very workable innovation, and it may well raise problems in the future.

In his brilliant remarks the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) raises one of these problems, and that is, simply, this: There is presently a backlog of $26 million. It is going to be accepted, if I understood him correctly, by Quebec, and if it is, does that not in itself constitute an invasion of the rights which have been so zealously guarded in the past eight or nine years? More competent people would have to judge these aspects as I see them.

I raise the question of the interpretation in the bill of the alternative arrangement, which says something about a "tax rental agreement", and, as I understand it, Quebec has not rented its taxing powers to the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, yes it has. Quebec has done so, because it has given up the right to collect full income taxes in that province. There is a definite agreement, which expires in 1962.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: There is no tax rental agreement in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understood there was.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No. It expired in 1948 or 1949, and there has been no further rental agreement since then.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I apologize to the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall). I understood there was a tax rental agreement in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I did not think there was. I understood, too, that this province, as we have been told, has also refused to accept university grants through the National Council of Canadian Universities on the ground that such acceptance would be an invasion of exclusive educational jurisdiction given to the provinces by the British North America Act. Yet this bill, in its essence, raises this very same problem of invasion.

In cases where not enough money is raised, suppose that happens—it may not happen now, but suppose it does happen four or five years from now—and suppose the one per cent formula does not raise enough money, then the federal Government has to contribute additional money, and that contribution of additional money by it directly to the provincial Government or to the provincial institution that is going to distribute it can be interpreted as the same kind of invasion that Quebec has been arguing against for so many years. And, of course, the problem is made more delicate if the one per cent raises more money than the formula allows and then some money ostensibly has to be given back in some way or another.

Personally I have never agreed with the validity of the contention—although I respect it—I have never agreed with the contention that by accepting grants through the instrumentality of the Canadian University Foundation there was an invasion of exclusive educational jurisdiction. I would like to mention other acts that Parliament has passed, going back many years.

Hon. Mr. Monette: May I ask a question of the honourable gentleman?

Hon. Mr. Wall: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Monette: If I understood the honourable senator correctly, he said that the acceptance of grants from the federal authority created no infringement or attack on the rights of the provinces. But we are here dealing with grants earmarked for educational purposes within a province. If there is acceptance of such grants from the federal authority—grants of moneys collected from the citizens of Canada and which are above the ordinary needs of Canada—and if the grants are made under federal direction that they be applied to education, is not that, in the opinion of the honourable senator, contrary to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, which provides that education is a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces? Especially is it not so when such grants are expressly directed to be used for university purposes?

Is it the opinion of the honourable senator that the provinces are not exclusively entitled, under section 93 of the British North America Act, to legislate fully in regard to education and all branches of education according to their own conception on matters of learning?

Does the honourable senator claim that the federal authority could direct the kind of educational institution for which the surplus accumulated from federal taxes is to be utilized?

I do not deny for a moment that we are living in times when universities occupy, if not the first rank, a very important position in our society.

I ask the honourable senator to let us know whether he is of the opinion that the direction of funds for education and the direction of education through funds are, according to section 93 of the B.N.A. Act, matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

The Hon. the Speaker: That was more than a question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With permission of the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) may I ask the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) a question: How does he regard the acceptance of the $26 million by the province of Quebec in view of the statement he has just made?

Hon. Mr. Monette: That is another question. I cannot touch the issue, nor was I a party to that so-called acceptance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The Honourable Senator Monette put a long question to the Honourable Senator Wall. If questions are to be put to other senators who intervene it may not be possible for the Honourable Senator Wall to complete his speech. I think he should continue with his speech now and questions, if any, should be directed to him.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, with respect, may I say that I understand there are people, and they constitute a large segment of the Canadian population, who feel that that kind of acceptance of grants is an infringement. I accept that. Personally I do not feel that it is an intrusion, and I would like to point out that for many years, in fact as far back in 1911 and 1919, the federal Government passed agricultural and technical education acts authorizing grants which have been going out to all the provinces for many years, and there has been no really serious criticism of that kind of assistance by the federal Government for special educational purposes.

Now we have before us Bill C-56, which in my opinion is more open to the contention of invasion—and this time, also, of taxing rights—through a qualification inherent in this bill of the conjoint and unqualified right that provinces can use their constitutional tax incomes as they see fit. But the Ottawa bill is really qualifying that right by making Ottawa provisions which stipulate that the money so collected be used for educational grants. I refer honourable senators to lines 16 and 20, on page 2 of the bill, which set out certain conditions under which these grants will be permitted through provincial sources.

The only difference, and this position I find contradictory from Quebec's point of view, is that the provincial Government of Quebec by previous legislative enactment has agreed to what amounts to an amendment of the Constitution, because, for better or for worse, this bill is nothing less than a back-door method of changing the Constitution in regard to provincial rights—true, with the prior consent of the province involved—to which agreement other provinces may wish to subscribe at a later date. That remains to be seen.

If Parliament can do this, then this question arises in my mind: Can Parliament make this arrangement compulsory instead of optional? In other words, can Parliament in fact amend the Constitution to change the taxing powers of the provinces at the present time, with their consent, and later without their consent? Is it not a fact that it has been established that Parliament cannot delegate its taxing authorities either with or without provincial consent? If that is so, Parliament has no constitutional right to withdraw its taxing authority.

Honourable senators, as I read the bill in my simple and humble way, that is the problem that perturbs me a great deal. We are ostensibly finding a practical solution for a problem, and yet to me there is a serious doubt about the fact that perhaps we really are making a constitutional change. Upon that aspect of the question I would welcome the advice of anyone, either now or when the bill is in committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Monette, debate adjourned.

MANPOWER AND EMPLOYMENT

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONDUCT STUDY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine:

1. That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, with the object of exploring the possibilities of maintaining and extending a high level of employment and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to inquire into and report upon the following:

(a) the growth of the economy and of other factors influencing employment opportunities, including particularly technological changes; and

(b) the growth and characteristics of the Canadian labour force.

2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Blois, Bouffard, Brunt, Buchanan, Burchill, Cameron, Choquette, Connolly, (Ottawa West), Courtemanche, Croll, Emerson, Haig, Higgins, Hnatyshyn, Horner, Hugessen, Inman, Irvine, Lambert, Leonard, MacDonald, Méthot, Monette, Pratt, Reid, Roebuck, Smith (Queens-Shelburne), Thorvaldson, Vaillancourt, Wall, White and Wilson (32);

3. That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

4. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words on this resolution before the committee gets to work, and I was spurred in my desire to speak by reason of some of the views expressed in the debate thus far.

I start out by saying—and I don't think it will be difficult for me to be brief—that there is a very useful job of work to be done by this committee. I think the public expects us to deal with this job and to devote the best ability we have to work out the answers which we think best offer a solution for correcting the situation which exists in Canada.

We may very well call this a resolution dealing with manpower in Canada. But the public has already given a different name to it and to the work of the committee. They have attached to it the word "unemployment". In considering manpower the questions of employment and unemployment become very necessary adjuncts to such consideration. However, I cannot go to the extent to which some previous speakers went when they asserted that there was an obligation on the Government to find a job for every person. That philosophy may be supported in some countries of the world, but in my view it has no application in Canada. By that I do not mean that the Government has not a very serious responsibility in this regard, but certainly it has not the responsibility to back the payroll so that every person is assured of a job for the whole of his employable life.

As I say, the Government has a very serious responsibility. That responsibility has developed in an increasing way since the war period when Canada started to move from being essentially an agricultural country to becoming an industrial country. In this transition the character of our economy changed, as did the requirements of government and of private enterprise. The report of the Gordon Commission contains a statement which indicates succinctly the scope and the function of governments in this connection. When I refer to "governments", I speak not only of the federal authority but of the provincial authorities, and even of the municipal governments. The report says:

The objective of governments is to even out, or at least to moderate the peaks and valleys of the business cycle; to restrain the level of economic activity to some extent in periods of boom and to stimulate activity in times of recession or depression.

In the change that has taken place in the economic life of Canada to which I referred a moment ago, employment, and therefore unemployment, became a national problem. In my view it became a problem in the same way as wheat became a national problem in Canada, and as did livestock, butter, eggs, and even sugar beets.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You mention sugar beets for my benefit?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, for the benefit of the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt). I mention also health insurance and family allowances. Those are items which at some stage or other were regional or local problems and which, in the course of the changing character of our economy, came to acquire a national significance; and anything that disturbs a particular item is a reflection in a national way upon the economy of Canada. I say that unemployment belongs in the category of the items I have enumerated, and many others could be included.

The question to determine is: What is the role of private initiative and what is the role of Government? It is nothing new for me to say that the roles of private initiative and Government are complementary. Throughout the whole history of Canada—certainly for a long period of time—that association did not acquire the importance which it has acquired since the war, and which must continue developing, because in our economy we have a changing situation. Our approach to it, and the policies that we adopt from time to time to deal with it, must be as flexible as the changing situation itself, and must be adaptable to meeting those situations.

I see the complementary roles of government and private initiative manifested in the operations of government since the war. We have in many phases the Government moving in to take its position so as to complement the role of private initiative. Might I just mention, for instance, the Export Credits Insurance Act, under which within the last year the Government gave authority to the body that is administering operations under that statute to provide direct and unconditional guarantees to banks and other financial organizations, and in addition to buy, sell and make loans on guaranteed export paper. The purpose of this was to make available sources of financing for the export of capital goods. That is one of the more recent phases or activities of government in this field.

We have many others. Tariffs are used for that purpose. Negotiations under GATT are used for the purpose of assisting Canadian industry in its domestic market and in the export markets, and the bargaining that goes on there is solely in recognition of the function of Government and the part it must play in the economy of Canada.

There are many aspects of the role which Government must play at the present time. I have enumerated just two of them, and there are many more. I could say, for instance, that the function of Government is to sit in a supervisory sort of way, possibly to the extent of having a ministry which would deal with these problems in an overall way. The Government must be in tune with the Canadian economy, its domestic and foreign markets, at every moment throughout the year, with the object in mind that we in Canada must maintain as high a level of employment as we can. That is essential to the maintenance of the standard of living to which we have become accustomed.

At the same time we must keep in mind that the Government must direct itself actively to protecting this situation; that while we stimulate the economy, at times it appears to be dragging because of factors in either the domestic market or the export market. It must also be ready to restrain by appropriate action any inflationary trend which may be developing.

At the present time I think it must be conceded that unemployment has reached the stage where it is a national problem. In the report of the Gordon Royal Commission I note this suggestion is made in the form of a question:

> . . . what is the maximum percentage of the total working force which should be idle or in process of changing jobs when we say that the Canadian economy has full employment in a practical sense?

The commission's conclusion, based on a study of statistics for the years 1951 to 1955, was that it was 3 per cent of the gross national product. The commission did, however, move up to 4 per cent, and then concluded with the figure of 5 per cent, which is the figure which actually influences the United States in its concern about this problem.

I would say again it is clear that that position has been reached in Canada, and that on the basis of these factors we are at a stage of less than full employment in a practical sense and, therefore, the time has come, if it has not already passed, when the Government should move into action in many directions in order to stimulate the economy.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is not the figure 4 per cent of the working force?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, I am sorry; I should have said "working force".

May I just move on from that point for a moment, and say that I was very interested last night to hear the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) outline the problems of the Atlantic provinces. What struck me in that connection was that the Atlantic provinces not only have a problem which is common to other parts of Canada at the present time, namely, a substantial amount of unemployment, but also an aggravation of the problem by reason of their geographic location in relation to the substantial market in Canada in the central provinces. They have the added difficulty, even in times that might be regarded as normal, of trying to maintain close to as high, if not as high, a standard of living as is achieved elsewhere in Canada. So in the Atlantic provinces there are two problems, that of unemployment as it exists elsewhere in Canada, and their own basic problem that arises from the circumstances which I have just related.

These are problems which this committee should consider and analyse carefully, as to what is the role of Government. How is the Government going to complement private initiative so as to stimulate our economy to the extent that this lag in employment is overcome? It is in so many fields that you find problems which have led to unemployment that the Government might have to take many different steps in order to provide machinery which will correct this situation.

Let me state my proposition in this way: I say that the Government in its role in relation to a healthy economy and the maintenance of a high level of employment, which functions are complementary, must be flexible. It must be fully informed at all times so as to be able to move in and deal with particular circumstances that are disturbing the economy and leading to unemployment.

On the other hand we must recognize that due to conditions of geography and climate, we have in Canada what is called seasonal unemployment. In my submission this problem requires separate and direct treatment at a level influential enough to assure that the things which should be done would be done. If we were able to organize most of our operations on a twelve-month basis rather than a ten-month basis it would reduce the amount of seasonal unemployment. As an illustration, take Government purchasing requirements. If a complete study were made of the causes, locations, nature and extent of seasonal unemployment—and surely by now we should be able to chart those factors—the purchasing requirements of the Government could be geared to ensure employment on a twelve-month basis rather than having gaps which result in seasonal unemployment of anywhere from two to four months a year. If we could organize our major industries on the same basis we would effect a substantial reduction in seasonal unemployment. I am not attempting at this time to propound a solution for these problems. I am merely trying to place my finger on some of the difficulties and indicate the direction in which I think the committee should proceed in its inquiry.

Seasonal unemployment has been a part of our labour and employment picture for many years now, therefore statistics should be readily available as to when and in what parts of Canada we find it. Comparative studies could be made with conditions existing when there is no seasonal unemployment, and in this way perhaps we could find a solution. But that is only one facet of the overall problem.

We have the main problem of unemployment itself, and I think Governments at all levels must forever be alert to it. That is why I suggest that possibly we should have a department headed by a minister which would be kept fully informed on this problem at all times. Because of the flexible nature of our economy both in respect to our domestic market, owing to the influence of imports, and in our foreign markets, owing to the larger share of these markets which we must get if we are to achieve and maintain a high volume of employment, we must have some highly-placed person in a position of authority who is able to surround himself with the necessary force to gather and analyse information and come up with appropriate answers.

It has been suggested during this debate that the solution to unemployment is an easy one. I do not share that view at all. I think it is a very complex problem with many contributing factors. I do not feel that private initiative by itself can cope with the problem unless times become so buoyant that we cease to have any concern for money except as something to get and spend without regard to the future.

I say that the pre-World War II philosophy is not going to see us through our present difficulties, nor will it be of any value in years to come, for not only are we living in a changing domestic economy but we are influenced by changing economies all over the world. We have to be adaptable and adjustable, but first of all we have to gather and analyse information from other parts of the world. That may be a major undertaking for the committee, but if the committee is to do a good job at all it must determine the sources of present unemployment and analyse why this unemployment has come about in specific areas. What are the reasons? In some cases the answer may simply be that markets have dried up. If you cannot restore a market or find a new one and an industry fails, then, of course, you have to encourage the development of new industries.

Reverting for a moment to the situation in Nova Scotia—and then all I shall speak about is the Unemployment Insurance Fund —we were told that at the present time there may be 115,000 to 120,000 persons receiving unemployment insurance in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): In the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, in the Atlantic provinces. I am not prepared to assume that Canadians are basically dishonest and are fraudulently qualifying for unemployment insurance, resulting in a rapid depletion of the fund. Until such evidence is adduced and that conclusion can be fairly drawn I must accept the situation as it appears to be, which is that the number of unemployed must at least equal the number of persons who have qualified for and are drawing unemployment insurance benefits. That is a major problem.

How are we going to deal with this basic problem in the Atlantic provinces? If I had time I could quote numerous excerpts from speeches made by responsible ministers of the present Government and of former Governments suggesting an answer to the chronic situation in the Atlantic region. They have said it is the inability to move at competitive rates the products of the Maritime provinces to central markets. So I would say, this being well known and well recognized, no matter how sturdy and self-reliant are the people of the Maritimes, until this basic and continuing problem of moving these products at a competitive rate is solved, the standard of business and employment generally in the Atlantic provinces will remain considerably below that enjoyed elsewhere in Canada. When you add to all this the unemployment factor on a national basis you aggravate an already distressing condition in the Maritime provinces. In that region of Canada difficulties are being created that are much greater than unemployment itself.

So far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, I say the Government's role is two-fold. There is still the basic problem to be dealt with, which is known and acknowledged to have existed for years. As I see it, we should stop talking about what the basic problem is in the Maritimes and instead try to work out some answer to it. Certainly we must have the Atlantic provinces as part of Canada. Can anyone imagine Canada without them? Yet if the penalty to those provinces for being part of Canada is distance from substantial markets, with resulting inability to gain a standard of industrial operation which the rest of Canada enjoys, and if that is recognized as being the problem, then the time for us to deal with that problem is overdue.

To the extent that there is unemployment in the Maritimes by reason of the general unemployment situation in Canada, anything that is done to relieve that general situation should reduce the incidence of unemployment in the Maritimes.

Having discussed this problem, not too theoretically, I hope, though perhaps too briefly, because of the lateness of the hour and my desire not to weary my honourable friends, I should like to make some observations about the Unemployment Insurance Fund. Before doing so, however, I should like to throw out one or two suggestions to the committee on how I think the Government might step in to relieve unemployment generally, and also to relieve seasonal unemployment. At other times in our history, especially since the end of the war, we have made use of depreciation and depletion allowances by shortening the time in which a business may write off depreciation and depletion, as an encouragement to industry to undertake capital expenditures at one time rather than later. I suggest to the committee that there is a field which might be explored as a sort of standby weapon of the Government when its sensitivity meter tells it that the bloom is coming off the boom, or the bloom is coming off the employment situation in Canada, and that this is the time to move in with some projects so as to take up the slack.

For instance, the mining industry is granted an exemption period or a tax holiday of up to three years. We might possibly give consideration to extending exemption periods in relation to other natural resources and their development. We might give thought to the creation of a tax holiday period so as to encourage development under circumstances that would be less costly and therefore more encouraging for private enterprise to go into. Let us remember that in the end the Government benefits, because to the extent that a tax holiday is granted it is of benefit if the operation develops and produces income and profit, and if it produces income and profit the general wealth and employment of the country increase. This would create more spending power, and to that extent create a buoyancy in the economy.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: May I ask, purely for information, what other natural resources my honourable friend has in mind?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In mining, the exemption period is three years. Some mining operations, particularly the more marginal ones, might be encouraged to operate if the exemption period were extended to five years. And I am thinking now, for instance, of the development of timber resources. Perhaps it could have a tax holiday. It is true that operations in that field have a depletion allowance, and in the beginning it may be that such an allowance is enough to eat up any amount of earnings.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: What about farming?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, I thought the farmer was supposed to be depleted all the time.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Let us give the farmers a tax holiday for a change.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? The Government has to have a certain amount of revenue, and it obtains it by way of taxation. If certain so-called seasonal employers are given further concessions in the matter of taxation, will those businesses which go along on an even keel year after year not have to make good any deficit?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. I tried to explain a moment ago that this is something that feeds on itself. That was proven during a period since the war, when the Government, in order to get capital projects under way, allowed companies certain write-offs by way of depreciation and depletion. The Government revenues did not suffer. The particular taxpayer was able to get back faster the capital dollars that he spent, and more employment was provided. Therefore, in the whole field more income was generated and more people paid taxes. In my submission that more than compensates for the effort to provide incentive to get these things done faster.

I wish to make clear at this time that I am not making a pronouncement, but I am putting to the committee the suggestion that this is a field for very serious consideration by it. If I may, I will pose the question for consideration along this line: To what extent should adjustments and allowances be granted for depreciation and depletion as incentives in order to deal effectively with seasonal unemployment, and in order to reduce the incidence of unemployment generally as it may arise in our economy? To what extent would such adjustments and allowances be a factor if properly made and if the symptoms of the disease were recognized in time?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: What is the good of adjustment and allowances without profits?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Let me put it this way. Every company that plans a capital project expects to make money. If it does not succeed in doing so, the employees suffer and the Government loses tax revenues it would otherwise obtain. The company itself suffers because its property may be sold at a fraction of its values, and somebody else starts all over at a lower cost. But there has not been too much of that in the history of Canada since the end of the war. People who plan capital projects plan them by making projections of what the economy of the country is going to develop to over a period of years. At times they can be encouraged to undertake projects sooner if there are compensating advantages for so doing. However, modern business is alert every day to what its costs are and to what its cash flow is, so that the possibility of incurring substantial capital expenditures and not making any money afterwards is reduced to, let us say, as low a calculated risk as possible.

I come now to the subject of unemployment insurance, and I may shock honourable senators with some of the things I am going to say.

First of all, under the unemployment insurance scheme, the employer and the employee were required to contribute definite percentages of 40 per cent each and the Government contributed 20 per cent, and there was an upper limit of the salaries which would be subject to the contributions and whose recipients would get benefits under the plan. It was at a most desirable time—early in the war period—when this fund was created and brought into operation. I had the privilege, I think in the first year that I was a senator, of sitting in as a sort of unofficial observer on the meetings of the Commons committee that was considering the bill and I feel I know something of origin of the act. I have watched it fairly closely since, and certain changes that have been made—the extension of the availability of this fund to those who are seasonally unemployed, the increase in the contributions required from employers and employees, and the extension of the period of benefit—have given me some concern. The fund has been contributed to in very substantial measure by many people who have never had occasion to participate in its benefits, and the recent very substantial reduction in the fund should be cause for worry by those people. I say it was unfair, and I think unreasonably so, that the fund should have been called on to bear the load of seasonal unemployment. I think that should have been dealt with as a charge on the general revenues of Canada and not as a charge on this special fund that was contributed to in such substantial measure by employers and employees in Canada.

If there has been any raiding of this fund by employees—I am not saying that there has been—it may very well be that the people who have contributed for years to this fund, seeing the fund going down so materially, are now getting disturbed to the point where they might say they have so much money in the fund now that it is time they were getting something out of it before the fund disappears in smoke.

There is no guarantee of any kind that I can find from any source of the solvency of this fund. Unless we either arrest the rate at which it is going down, by changing the rules for access to the fund, or very quickly solve the question of unemployment, the fund will fall to a level where it may very well be insolvent and have to be supported by increased levies or loans or contributions from the Government. I say that the fund, having regard to its origin, should be regarded as sacrosanct, in the sense that it is composed of trust moneys and they must be protected for the people who have made the contributions and who may run into some temporary misfortune. My concept of the Unemployment Insurance Fund is that it was not intended to cover a man who is out of work for a year. I do not think that was the intention originally. This fund was supposed to tide people over for periods of temporary unemployment.

Now I think there may well be certain abuses in the fund. I would call them abuses but possibly they are perfectly legal, having regard to the rules for access to the fund as they presently are. I am sure that a number of people who have earned a pension from their employment and are now receiving their pension payments have sought employment here, there and elsewhere for temporary periods and then have gone on to the fund for a period to supplement their pensions. In my view that was not an intention of the Unemployment Insurance Fund at all. I do not think that those whose period of employment is ended and who are on pension should be able to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. It will be very interesting to know the extent to which that has obtained over the last few years.

Hon. M. Brunt: That is, regardless of the amount of the pension received?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Regardless of the size of the pension, yes.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Do you say that no one in receipt of an old age pension should be able to draw any benefits from the fund?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am talking about every conceivable kind of pension. When the Unemployment Insurance Fund was set up I do not think it was intended to be abused in this way, to provide benefits to people to whom the Government has already provided a pension.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: According to that argument, everybody over seventy and in receipt of an old age pension should be ineligible for benefits from the Unemployment Insurance Fund, no matter what he contributed to it, even though he is legitimately out of employment. I presume that is what you mean.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. My friend is trying to box it into a narrower concept than I did. I was referring to the person who is on pension after his period of employment.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: And I am asking whether your remarks applied to all pensions.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: What I was referring to a little while ago was a person on pension after having completed his required service of employment.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I did not hear those words.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Even though he unsuccessfully seeks employment he should not be able to have recourse to the Unemployment Insurance Fund. That fund is there as a protection to a man during the period of his useful employment up until the time he retires and goes on pension.

Hon. Mr. Davies: You are speaking now, I understand, of industrial pensioners?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, or Government pensioners, after they have served their period of employment. If I said anything that would suggest I was including the old age security pension, I want to make a correction.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understood from your previous remarks you included everybody getting a pension.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. I added the qualification, "when his period of employment has ended," and now I have reaffirmed it. The old age security is something entirely different. In the ordinary way, having regard to pension plans at the present time I do not think very many people would still be fully employed at 70 and contributing to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, so the period in which they would be eligible to draw on it would have ended before they reached age 70.

Hon. Mr. Davies: If a man or a woman employed at age 70 and receiving an old age pension is entitled to unemployment insurance, for how long could the benefits be drawn?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Under the present arrangement, up to 52 weeks, a whole year.

Hon. Mr. Reid: A whole year. What about the fishermen in British Columbia earning $14,000 a year? They are on it too.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I have heard of one earning $50,000 a year being on it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, may I just summarize? I am not trying to lay down policy for the committee. I am trying to indicate, and I hope I have succeeded in doing so, that the committee has a very useful purpose to perform. No matter how we feel about it, I think the committee has to devote itself seriously to that purpose and it must have the necessary help. First of all, it will have to lay down a plan of procedure, and, secondly, apply itself to the gathering and analysis of the necessary materials and try to find an answer to all these questions. And I should think the committee would fail in its task if it does not include in its study a very wide and complete survey of the relationship of the Government in all its various aspects to the economy of Canada and to the changing situation that is developing in that economy.

Further, I say that the attention of the committee should be directed to the end that there be some machinery which would be alert to the onset of trouble. In this case mechanisms would not do, nor would barometers, or thermometers. What is needed is an organization sufficiently intelligent and educated, and with adequate authority to act, to be on top of the play all the time. In that way we would be alert to the problem.

In business we get projections, as we do in Government; we even get projections a year ahead as to surpluses or deficits. Therefore, in the field of economics and its possible effect on employment we can surely get projections which may be so sound and reasonable as to form a base for plans of a standby nature, so that governments could move in with private industry to stimulate a lagging or sagging market, and in boom times to exercise some restraint in buying and spending.

Honourable senators, I have one other thing to say, and though it may sound a little political, it is not intended to be such. I do not like the composition of the committee, with an even division of members from each side of the house. When I looked at the membership, and counted 16 members from each side, I asked myself, what political consideration entered into this question? Because if the setting up of the committee were politically designed, it would not have been set up in any different way. Its set-up is against any precedent in the Senate, where we select the personnel on the basis of the number of senators on each side of the house. Never in my twenty years in this house have I run into the problem of what might be called a political play in any committee, and certainly not in the constitution of any of our special committees. That is the reason I asked myself, what is the political consideration for so constituting this committee? Is this question so full of political dynamite that the committee had to be organized in such a way that its function could be stymied or frustrated at any time it appeared to be getting out of hand in a political sense? These are questions which concern me.

After twenty years in the Senate I have come to like this house and the people in it. I don't want to be misunderstood in my remarks, because there is no honourable senator who is named to that committee whom I would not myself select to serve on it or any other committee. But when I see the membership divided between the Government and the Opposition on a 50-50 basis, as far as I am concerned we start off with the situation that somewhere along the line some individual or some group of persons has the idea that there should be an even split as between sides so that the operations of the committee can be controlled.

Honourable senators, I have talked to you very frankly on that point, because that is the feeling I have.

My next question, honourable senators, and I may be just as frank in my views about it, is this: Was the agreement to have on the committee an even number of members from each side of the house actuated by the view that the only way we could get the co-operation of the Government was by so constituting the committee?

I would prefer to see the committee set up in such a manner as to be independent in its consideration of the problem before it. Indeed, the Senate should be independent in choosing what problems it is going to consider. When it decides it is going to study a problem, it should proceed independently of any consideration other than the good of the country and the ability of the Senate to deal with it.

LASALLE-CAUGHNAWAGA BRIDGE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Gustave Monette moved the second reading of Bill S-32, to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near the town of LaSalle, in the province of Quebec.

He said: Honourable senators, the hour is late, but there is good reason why it is necessary to explain this bill on second reading today. If the bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the appropriate standing committee for further consideration.

The bill before us authorizes the construction of a bridge and its approaches over the St Lawrence River near the town of LaSalle, close to the city of Lachine, to the village of Caughnawaga, all in the province of Quebec.

At this point I should like to quote section 2 of the bill, as follows:

> Subject to this act, the Province of Quebec (hereinafter referred to as "the Province") is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a bridge and its approaches, for the use and passage of persons, vehicles and goods, across the St. Lawrence River from a point at or near the Town of LaSalle, Quebec, to a point at or near the Village of Caughnawaga, Quebec.

The town of LaSalle, bordering on the St. Lawrence River, is adjacent to the city of Lachine, from which it is separated by the Lachine Canal, which commences at Lake St. Louis about a mile above the proposed location of the new bridge. Between the proposed bridge location and the commencement of the canal is the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge, which carries a railway line going south to St. Johns, Farnham, and on to the United States. Along the south shore, at Caughnawaga, is the St. Lawrence Seaway canal, having left Lake St. Louis a little farther upstream, and which runs for the most part within the St. Lawrence River, passes by the cities of Laprairie and St. Lambert, and continues on past the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, where shipping leaves the canal and passes into the open river, and on down to the sea.

Honourable senators will remember a visit they made to this area at the time of the opening of the seaway. I gathered the impression that all our visitors were very enthusiastic about the ceremony on that great occasion.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask my honourable friend one question? Is the bridge which this bill proposes to authorize to be independent of the Honoré Mercier Bridge?

Hon. Mr. Monette: I am coming to that point shortly.

As honourable senators are aware, there are two bridges across the St. Lawrence River from Montreal to the south shore, namely, Victoria Bridge and Jacques Cartier Bridge. A third bridge is in process of being constructed from a point at the city of Verdun, over Nuns Island, to a point in the county of Laprairie. The proposed new bridge will be somewhat adjacent to the Honoré Mercier Bridge, which was built some years ago.

If honourable senators will allow me, I should like to give some information as to the importance of the Honoré Mercier Bridge, and of this proposed adjacent bridge. Apart from serving the ever-increasing requirements of traffic, the bridge is a great convenience to tourists. All honourable senators, I am sure, and many Canadians from Ontario and the western provinces as well, know that the main interprovincial road from Ottawa to Montreal goes through Ontario south of the Ottawa River, and then through Quebec to Vaudreuil where it crosses the Ottawa River to Ste. Anne de Bellevue, and follows the north shore, through the city of Lachine, to a point above the city of St. Pierre aux Liens situated close to the Lachine Canal, and only a mile and a half from the Mercier Bridge with which we are dealing, and from there the bridge crosses over the St. Lawrence River to Caughnawaga, which is on the south shore. Just after leaving the bridge the road divides, one section going in a southerly direction through the counties of Chateauguay, Beauharnois and Valleyfield to the border, and the other in an easterly direction through the counties of Laprairie, the city of St. Johns and on through the Eastern Townships to the border. Both are well-travelled highways to Lake Champlain and the State of New York and surroundings. The Richelieu River takes the waters from Lake Champlain through St. Johns and Sorel. And, honourable senators, there is a great expectation that from the Richelieu Seaway, as it is sometimes referred to, there could be built, from St. Johns, a branch canal directly to the port of Montreal.

In the opinion of many, including myself, an adequate enlargement of the Mercier Bridge at Caughnawaga is of paramount importance to the province of Quebec in particular, as well as to Canada as a whole in view of our social, political and economic relations with the United States of America

I would like to give a short general outline of the legal aspects of the bill.

Chapter 193 of the Revised Statutes of Canada (1952) as amended by Chapter 41 of the Statutes of 1956 provides general legislation for the protection of navigable waters. Section 4 reads:

(1) No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless

(a) the site and plans thereof have been approved by the Minister; and

(b) the work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with the plans and the regulations.

The Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Choquette): Honourable senators, I must remind you that it is now 6 o'clock, and that it is only with leave of the Senate that the honourable senator may continue his speech. Has the honourable senator leave to continue?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I thank you, honourable senators.

I would point out, however, that section 11 of the statute provides:

No approval shall be given under this Part of the site or plans of any bridge over the River St. Lawrence.

So, the Governor in Council is not authorized to approve this undertaking. That is the reason why this bill is before Parliament.

It must be realized that the measure before us is a public, rather than a private, bill. As I explained, the bridge is in the interests not only of the local area but of a large section of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, as well as of western Canada, generally. The bridge will be built by the provincial Government of Quebec at an estimated cost of $6 million, and the approaches on the island side are estimated at $4 million. Of course, there is much work to be done there.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Did the honourable senator say who was going to pay the cost? Is the province of Quebec going to bear the whole expense?

Hon. Mr. Monette: The honourable senator's mind is quicker than my perusal of my notes; I am just coming to that point. The cost of the bridge is to be borne by the province of Quebec.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, upon the request of the province, when raising the span of the approach to the existing bridge to a higher elevation over the Seaway Canal on the south shore, built a four-lane approach to the two-lane Mercier Bridge. This request by the province was made with a view to improving the movement of motor traffic at the end of Montreal Island by building two additional lanes.

On the north side of Montreal Island is situated Ville La Salle, an industrial district, where there are more than 75 large industrial plants in operation, 20 of which are quite near the bridge site. I refer to such companies as General Foods Limited, Labatt's Breweries Limited, Distillers Corporation Seagrams Limited, Burroughs Welcome and Company (Canada) Limited, and others. An improved access to the south shore in that area will certainly constitute a major asset to the economy of those industries, and of the country in general.

The Government of the province of Quebec has included in this year's estimates an amount of $5 million allocated to bridge improvements. Because of the serious traffic congestion over the three bridges the provincial authorities feel that this project is of great urgency. Also, the fact that the four-lane approach built by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority converges on to the two-lane bridge makes this the scene of many accidents, including one fatality last winter.

The province is ready to start work on this project as soon as permission is granted and plans are approved. I mention that to explain the huge amount of money required for the approaches on the island side. I would like to draw to your attention, honourable senators, that the Mercier Bridge is not a toll bridge, and I am informed that it will not be one in the future.

May I here give some respective elevations? All the elevations I shall now mention are referred to as geodetic bench marks, and are in relation to mean sea level elevation. The elevation of the floor of the bridge is 129.3 feet. The elevation of the water level of the St. Lawrence River at the site of the bridge is 62.6 feet. This means that during flood water the clearance under the bridge will be 55 feet. The floor of the bridge at the island end is 15 feet, more or less, above ground elevation. At the south end of the bridge the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority built the approach to their own specifications. I have not the figures, but the elevation there is quite high above the ground.

For the convenience of future navigation on the St. Lawrence River, which will be made possible by the construction of a dam at the end of the Lachine Rapids by the Quebec Hydro-Electric Commission the clearance under the new bridge will be the same as under the existing Mercier Bridge and the Canadian Pacific Railway Bridge. All three bridges over the river there will have the same clearance. The approximate distance between the dam and the Mercier Bridge is about 4 miles. The bridge will be 2,960 feet long, having two 13-foot lanes. It will consist of thirteen spans, ten of which will be 235 feet long and one of which will be 400 feet long. This is to accommodate the contemplated navigation on the river. The two bridges will use the same approach on the south shore. However, the new structure will be a few hundred feet downstream from the existing bridge on the island end. The new bridge will be built at the same elevation as the existing one.

I have spoken of the 400-foot span to accommodate navigation. The reason for this long span is that the Lachine rapids are about four miles below the bridge, and it has been planned by experts to build a dam below the rapids in the vicinity of Heron Island. This will have the effect of considerably raising the water level under the proposed bridge.

There has been great industrial development below the bridge site at Ville La Salle and also above the bridge site at Lachine, and these centres will now be open to commercial navigation. Ships will be able to come from below Jacques Cartier Bridge and pass through the locks of the new dam near Heron Island. After unloading and perhaps taking on new cargo the ships could either sail down the open river beyond the Jacques Cartier Bridge or re-enter the Seaway canal at that point and sail inland up the St. Lawrence River.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Will the construction be wholly of steel?

Hon. Mr. Monette: I am not able to say.

I want to give honourable senators this brief picture of the proposals, and if the bill is given second reading I propose to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is it proposed that this will be a toll bridge?

Hon. Mr. Monette: No, it is not to be a toll bridge.

May I conclude with a few remarks in which I am sure the honourable senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Dupuis) will concur? Up until lately the town of Caughnawaga was in the county of Laprairie, which my honourable friend from Rigaud served so well in the House of Commons at one time. Caughnawaga is an Iroquois reserve, and during the early days of French possession bands of Iroquois would set out by canoe from far up the St. Lawrence River and stop off at the point which is now Caughnawaga, though there was no settlement there at the time. There the Indians would make preparations to shoot the rapids in their canoes. One band that stopped there decided to remain, and they became the first Iroquois to be converted to the Christian faith. They gradually became friendly with the white people in that district.

So I would suggest to honourable senators that when they tour this part of the country and cross over the new bridge they should visit Caughnawaga. There they will find one of the most interesting and friendly Indian reserves in all of Canada.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, this is a very necessary and welcome bill as I think anybody who has had to travel over the Mercier Bridge will readily testify. The Mercier Bridge crosses the St. Lawrence River at Lachine. It was built some thirty years ago and has served as a communication link between the Island of Montreal and a very large and important area to the south. It is a two-lane highway and has become grossly insufficient for the continually increasing amount of traffic it is called upon to bear. That is particularly so because on the south side of the present Mercier Bridge the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has constructed extensive four-lane approaches, while on the north side there are equally extensive multiple-lane highways leading from the town of LaSalle toward the Mercier Bridge. As a result, this bridge has become a bottleneck, and conditions there have become deplorable, particularly on weekends.

The province of Quebec wishes to construct a bridge parallel to and relatively close to the present Mercier Bridge, with each bridge being used as one-way highways running in opposite directions. Thus there will be a four-lane traffic system across the bridge, connecting, as my honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) said, the increasingly important industrial area comprising that part of the Island of Montreal on the north side and the area close to Caughnawaga on the south side, which is becoming equally important industrially.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When the bill goes to committee I hope there will be maps of the district available so that those of us who are not familiar with the immediate geography around Montreal will have some idea just where this bridge is to be located.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Monette) has a very detailed map, but as it would not be feasible for him to show it in the Senate chamber I suggested that he make it available in committee.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I have a map to display in committee and there will be an engineer present to answer questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

PRIVATE BILLS

NORTHERN PIPE LINE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-21, to incorporate Northern Pipe Line Company, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, as I shall be away next week, may I ask that, with leave of the Senate, this bill be read the third time now?

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is surely rushing things to pass a bill of this kind immediately.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Harold Connolly (Halifax North), Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate with the following amendments:

1. Page 2, line 4: Strike out "herein contained" and substitute therefor "in this act".
2. Page 2: After clause 5, add clause 6, as follows:

"6. Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North) moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

LASALLE-CAUGHNAWAGA BRIDGE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-32, to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near the Town of LaSalle, in the province of Quebec, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, with leave, I move the third reading of the bill now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why the hurry?

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, I might explain that after the second reading yesterday the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and this morning there was a hearing on the bill at which there was a large attendance. Questions were put to the officers who were there and they gave what I thought were full answers and explanations. However, as to the third reading, I am in the hands of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think there is any great urgency requiring the passing of this bill forthwith. If there were I would not object to the third reading today. As it appears to be a more or less routine bill of this type I think it should stand over for third reading until next Tuesday. I do not know how there would be any advantage to anyone in our giving the bill third reading today, and I suggest it stand over until next Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, I do not feel I can resist that. Unanimous consent is of course necessary in order to have third reading of a bill on the day it is reported from committee, and such consent is frequently given. I now move that this bill be placed on the Order Paper for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DRUG ADDICTS

TREATMENT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Following the announcement made by the Honourable the Minister of Justice on his recent visit to the British Columbia Penitentiary suggesting some form of treatment of Drug Addicts by the provincial Government of British Columbia, has any such proposal been made officially to the British Columbia Government?

2. If so, have the provincial authorities of British Columbia indicated any real interest in the matter or agreed to a proposal of treatment as suggested by the Honourable the Minister of Justice?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, the answer to this inquiry is as follows:

1. A letter dated May 13 was sent to the Honourable R. W. Bonner, Attorney General of British Columbia, proposing early discussions between officials of the two Governments on this matter.

2. No official comment has been received yet.

PSYCHIATRISTS EMPLOYED BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I now have a supplementary answer to the inquiry of the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), which was inquiry No. 2 of March 29, 1960, regarding psychiatrists employed by the Government. In so far as the answers given at page 524 of Hansard are concerned and with reference to the complaint of the honourable senator as reported at page 550, the following should be noted:

1. The first two parts of the question related to psychiatrists "employed by the Government of Canada" and the answers were given with respect to those who are employed in the usual sense of that word—that is on a full-time basis.

2. The further two parts of the question related to recommendations for clemency in capital cases, "that might have been made by those psychiatrists".

Therefore, since the full-time psychiatrists do not make reports in this connection, no specific answer could be given, but a general reference was made to our practice of retaining Drs. Cathcart, Huard and Côté in respect to individual cases.

Since it now appears that the honourable senator, when he said that the Senate should be informed with respect to a particular psychiatrist as to what has been paid to him and what he has reported to the department, desired information not only with respect to psychiatrists employed by the Government in the sense in which those words were first understood, but also with respect to those who were retained by the department on an individual case basis, the following supplementary information is supplied:

With respect to what has been reported to the department by the psychiatrist retained for a specific examination, it should be emphasized that in preparing capital cases for review by the Governor in Council, the present practice of the Department of Justice is to have any psychiatric examination deemed necessary performed by a practising psychiatrist other than a member of the staff of a department of the Government of Canada. It is no part of the function of the psychiatrist to make any recommendation with respect to the exercise of clemency; his function is to make a psychiatric examination and furnish his report and opinion with respect to the mental state of the individual examined only. Therefore, the psychiatrist in any of those cases has no authority whatever to make any specific recommendation for or against clemency.

CANADA COUNCIL

REPORT REFERRED TO FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved, pursuant to notice:

That the report of the Canada Council for the year ended March 31, 1959, laid before the House on July 14, 1959, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance in order to provide a review thereof, pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act.

He said: Honourable senators, may I make a brief explanation of the necessity for this motion?

On March 18, 1959 I introduced a similar motion, which was passed, and the report of the Canada Council and the Auditor General's report on the balance sheet for the Canada Council were later considered at two very satisfactory meetings of the Finance Committee. Section 23 of the Canada Council Act, which I placed on the record in my remarks last year, requires that the reports of the council and the Auditor General be considered each year by Parliament, which of course includes the Senate. I also placed on record section 22, which requires the auditing of the council's accounts.

The Finance Committee's meetings of last session were attended by the Auditor General and the Honourable Brooke Claxton, Chairman of the Canada Council. I hope that the motion now before the house will be approved, and that the matter will be considered by the committee in the near future.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "CLOSE-UP"

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I should like to refer to the remarks made yesterday by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). Immediately after the honourable senator spoke I had copies of the transcript of her remarks delivered at once to the offices of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Revenue, who reports to Parliament for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am advised that the matter was immediately brought to the attention of the president of the corporation, Mr. J. Alphonse Ouimet.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With what result?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think I know the result, honourable senators. I understand the program has either been cancelled completely or has been changed. In any event, there is a new program for "Close-Up" this evening which will be a discussion of the Summit Conference. It will be participated in by Mr. James Reston, the eminent correspondent of the New York Times, Mr. Justice Douglas of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Leader of the Opposition in the other house, Mr. L. B. Pearson.

Having regard to this fact, I think that the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) has rendered a great service.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE

NOTICE STANDS

On the notice of Hon. Mr. Pratt:

That he will draw the attention of the Senate to the Twentieth Congress of the Federation of Commonwealth and British Empire Chambers of Commerce, held recently in Canberra, Australia, and that he will bring forward for consideration information and suggestions arising from the Congress discussions relative to the promotion of trade within the Commonwealth.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Honourable senators, I am agreeable to having this stand until after the second order of the day has been proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I might say, honourable senators, that in order to get ahead as far as possible with orders Nos. 1 and 2 I suggested to the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) that he make his speech later this day, after we have considered those two orders. I hope the Senate will agree to that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What about the third order? That was on the Order Paper for yesterday and was talked out. Why should it be talked out again today?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then, would it be agreeable to the honourable senator from St. John's West to postpone his speech until after the third order has been disposed of?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette for the second reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Hon. Gustave Monette: Honourable senators, yesterday I moved adjournment of the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill. At that time I had intended to make some remarks of a rather general nature about this bill, its relation to the Constitution, and so on. It has so happened that since then I was kept busy with the La-Salle-Caughnawaga Bridge Bill, which I sponsored in this chamber yesterday and also before the Transport Committee this morning, so I am not prepared to speak at length on the Tax-Sharing Arrangements Bill today. In the circumstances I have decided not to move further adjournment of the debate, as I should like the bill to go to committee as soon as possible. After the second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks respecting this bill.

I think that the first thing I should say is that we are very much indebted to the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) for his lucid explanation of the bill.

Together with the honourable senator from Alma (Hon. Mr. Molson), who unfortunately is ill at the present time, I have had a certain amount to do with the position which this bill is designed to cure, both of us being Governors of McGill University, one of the Quebec universities which have been very seriously affected by the situation which has existed in our province during the last seven years with respect to university grants.

We of the Quebec universities were put in the rather impossible position, on the one hand, of being offered substantial grants from the federal treasury, grants of which we were very urgently in need both for additional facilities which were badly required and for increases in salaries of our professors, which were even more urgently required; and, on the other hand, of being in effect told by the then Premier of our province that these grants to Quebec universities were an infringement by the federal authority on the exclusive rights of the province in the matter of education; and perforce we could not accept these grants in such circumstances, particularly by reason of the fact that to some extent all Quebec universities depend upon substantial grants which they get from the provincial Government.

I want for a moment to discuss this very question which put the universities in Quebec in this most unfortunate position, the question whether federal grants to universities out of federal taxation constitute federal interference with education. I suppose the question might be put in an even broader way: If one government body contributes money to the support of another government body or some other organization for reasons which seem good to the contributing body from the point of view of public policy, does it mean that the Government which makes the grant exercises any measure of legislative or administrative control over the body in whose favour the contribution is made?

The former Premier of the province of Quebec answered that question very emphatically in the affirmative. I frankly disagree with that view. I think we have got to make a very clear distinction between voting money by some Government authority for some particular object out of taxes collected from the taxpayers, and exercising control over the object for which those moneys are granted. The basis of the objection made by the Premier of Quebec to these federal grants depends upon the statement contained in the British North America Act with respect to education. Section 93 of this act starts out:

> In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Education, . . .

I would be disposed to question very strongly the statement that the federal Parliament voting moneys for the support of universities throughout the country constitutes a law in relation to education. Basically it is a law in relation to the way in which this Parliament desires public moneys to be spent, and if you are going to say that the federal Parliament cannot vote any amount of money for any purposes except those over which it has exclusive control, then you are going very far indeeed.

Let me give one other example of this. Under section 92 of the British North America Act the Legislatures of the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction to make laws in relation to the establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals. As honourable senators know, for quite a number of years the federal Parliament has been making extensive grants to hospitals all over the country. If you take the view that grants to universities are outside the power of the federal Parliament, then you would also have to take the view that these grants to hospitals are outside the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. You would have to go further than that.

Under the British North America Act local works and undertakings within a province are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial Legislatures, and you would have to say on the same basis that the federal Parliament was completely incapable of voting moneys for the Trans-Canada Highway which, within each province, is a local work subject to the control of the province.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The Trans-Canada Highways connects one province with another.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The general principle that one Government may collect moneys by way of taxation and may apply them or hand them over to another Government is a principle which is enshrined in the British North America Act itself. Under this act the federal Parliament collects taxes and is obligated to pay amounts to the provinces. Perhaps it would be rather interesting to honourable senators, in view of the developments that have taken place since 1867, and the change in the value of the dollar, to know how much the federal authority had to pay in 1867 to the various provinces. These original amounts appear in section 118 of the British North America Act, as follows:

	Dollars
Ontario	Eighty thousand
Quebec	Seventy thousand
Nova Scotia	Sixty thousand
New Brunswick	Fifty thousand
	Two hundred and sixty thousand

In the British North America Act there is the principle that one government may collect taxes and pay them over for the benefit of another government. The federal Government has been making contributions to the various provincial governments in increasing measure for many years past, contributions which now amount to many hundreds of millions of dollars a year, and anyone who tells me that that means the federal Government is interfering with the affairs of the provincial Governments is saying something which I think is patently untrue.

Now, since the federal Parliament makes contributions to the provincial Governments, and if, as I think everybody will admit, there is no possible element of argument that those payments constitute control of the provincial Governments, then how can you argue that payments made under legislation passed by Parliament for the benefit of higher education generally, resulting in payments being made to the various universities throughout the country, constitute an interference with the management or control of those institutions?

I want to deal for a moment with the suggestion that was made by the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) in his very eloquent and interesting speech of yesterday afternoon, in which he suggested that the settlement of this problem of support of university education should be effected by the federal Parliament's withdrawing entirely from the support of universities throughout the country and leaving it to each province to levy for itself the moneys needed for the support of universities in that province, and then, having levied those moneys, to distribute them to universities in that province. At first sight, that seems to be a rather logical proposition. But if you look at the practical effect which such a step would have, I think you would immediately perceive the objections to it. You know, honourable senators, and I know, that we have in this country rich provinces with very broad fields of taxation available to them, and poor provinces which find it very difficult to raise revenues. If you were to follow the principle suggested by my honourable friend from Grandville, you would ultimately have a few first-class provinces with first-class universities and some second-class provinces with second-class universities. That is a result which I think would be deplorable in the extreme.

I have felt for some years past that the federal Government, with its broad taxing powers throughout the country, should and does to some extent act as what one might call a balance wheel to equalize the differences that exist between the different parts of this country, so that the poorer provinces of the country do not fall far behind the richer provinces of the country in their general development. That is a principle which has been recognized in the equalization payments to the provinces, and I think the principle is equally applicable to our universities. So with regard to the suggestion from the honourable senator from Grandville, I can only say that I totally disagree with it. I think it would be a most unfortunate reversion to a provincial, or I might even say a parochial, point of view in this country which is entirely out of line with the modern trend of development that we have here.

Honourable senators, I think that we must recognize this legislation for what it is, and also for what it is not. First of all, what it is: It really represents an attempt by the provincial Government of Quebec, with the help of the present federal Government, to escape from the lamentable, indeed, from the impossible position in which the universities of Quebec have been placed during the past seven years owing to what I might call, I hope without offence, the intransigeance—if I may use a French word—of the former Premier of the province, an intransigeance which extended not only through five years of Liberal administration of this country, but also for the following two years of Conservative administration. Now, as such, this attempt to escape by the province of Quebec is entirely welcome, particularly to those of us who are interested in and concerned with the affairs of Quebec universities. We are pleased to see it, and I personally am very glad indeed to support the present bill. My only comment on it, perhaps, might be that I think it is long overdue.

We must also recognize, honourable senators, what this bill is not. It is not a triumphant vindication of the sacred rights of the province of Quebec in the field of education. As I have already said, my view is that what I might call the St. Laurent system of grants to universities directly through the Canadian Universities Foundation was in no way an infringement upon the constitutional rights of the province. An attempt is made by the Government of the province of Quebec to tell us that this way out that has been found is a vindication of the rights of the province and of the terms of the British North America Act. But as my honourable friend from Grandville explained very clearly yesterday afternoon, the alternative system that this bill now sets up for making these grants is open to considerably graver constitutional doubts than the original system set up under the St. Laurent administration of direct grants through the Canadian Universities Foundation. I do not need to traverse that ground. All I need to say is that if you look at the bill you will find that the prescribed province, that is, in effect, the province of Quebec, in order to enter into this new system must, first of all, undertake to pay to the universities in the province each year an amount equal to $1.50 per inhabitant of the province, in addition to anything it pays to those universities, and then if it does so corporations paying federal income tax in that province are given a one per cent reduction in the amount of their federal tax, which the province can then take up and impose on its own. And not only that, but the arrangements which the province makes to pay this $1.50 per head of population to its universities have got to be consistent with the agreement entered into under the other system of direct grants which are subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Furthermore, any amount which the province of Quebec may collect out of this additional one per cent corporation tax in excess of the $1.50 per head which it pays to the universities in any year becomes a debt of the province to the federal Government and may be deducted from any payment that the federal Government thereafter makes to the province.

I think that short description shows that this system, this famous new system, certainly can be regarded as constituting a good deal more of an interference with the taxation powers of the province of Quebec than was the former system.

I want to draw attention to another part of section 92 of the British North America Act dealing with the right of the province to raise taxation. Under that section the province has exclusive jurisdiction in "direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes". I emphasize those last words, "for provincial purposes".

Now if under this bill the province of Quebec gets from its one per cent tax on corporations in any year more money than it pays to the universities at the rate of $1.50 per head, it has got to pay the surplus amount over to the federal Government. So in effect, to the extent of that surplus, the province is not raising money for provincial purposes at all, it is raising money for federal purposes. Personally I do not pay very much attention to that. I do not think it matters very much which system you adopt if you agree with the general statement that the federal authority does have the right, without infringing on provincial jurisdiction, to make payments to universities in the provinces, but I did want to deal with the suggestion that is being made at the moment in my province, in connection with a certain electoral campaign that is going on there, that this bill represents a tremendous victory for the constitutional rights of the province of Quebec.

I have very little more to say about this bill, honourable senators. I welcome it. I think everybody having anything to do with education in the province of Quebec welcomes it, and welcomes it very warmly, because now for the first time in seven years we of the universities in the province of Quebec feel that they are in the same position as the universities in the other provinces of Canada, in that for the first time in all those years we shall be able to take our part in improving the education of our citizens, in increasing the salaries of our professors, and generally in taking our part in the progress and development of the higher education of our country.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Fred M. Blois moved the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill which we are considering today will be the third amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act since it came into operation on December 10, 1949.

As there are probably some honourable senators present who are not familiar with the Trans-Canada Highway Act and its subsequent amendments I would like to review very briefly the legislation and the agreements pertaining to the Trans-Canada Highway from 1949 up until the present time.

The Trans-Canada Highway Act, which as I say became law on December 10, 1949, was enacted to encourage and to assist in construction of a Trans-Canada Highway. As all honourable senators know, previous to that time it was impossible for anyone to drive across Canada coast to coast without on occasions having to pass through United States territory, and while this did not cause any great trouble it was felt that a country such as Canada, which has two of the greatest railway companies in the world operating from coast to coast, should have a highway which would serve the same purpose for those people who wished to drive over it.

The original act provided that the federal Government may make contributions to a provincial Government of 50 per cent of the construction cost of the highway over a seven-year period, which in effect contemplated completion by the end of December 1956. It further provided that the federal Government's share would not exceed $150 million. Subsequent to this enactment, nine of the ten provinces entered into agreements for participating in the project, as follows: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Prince Edward Island on April 24, 1950; New Brunswick, on May 27, 1950; Newfoundland, on June 23, 1950, and Nova Scotia not until May 15, 1952.

In 1950-51 most of the participating provinces initiated a fairly heavy construction program. At the same time, however, all or nearly all provinces had to meet particularly heavy demands for construction on all portions of their own highway systems. I think this can be quite readily understood, because there was very little highway construction work done during the war years and afterwards, and whilst the people in the provinces felt that there was a great need for the Trans-Canada Highway the fact was that when this would be constructed many good-sized towns and villages in some, but not all, of the provinces would find themselves quite a good many miles from the paved highway, so these people objected, and strenuously, to the province's money being used to construct the Trans-Canada Highway when they themselves could not have a permanent road to connect with the said highway. And if the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway was started, it was felt that to get it completed by the end of 1960 a lot of additional work had to be done, and it was quite apparent that the cost would be considerably more than what was originally estimated, and that the $150 million provided for payment to the provinces under the act would not be sufficient. In view of these facts an amendment was introduced in Parliament in 1956. This amendment, which received the royal assent on June 7 of that year, provided that the federal Government would contribute 90 per cent of the cost of construction on 10 per cent of the mileage within each province, extended the completion date to December 31, 1960 and increased the funds which Canada could contribute to the provinces from $150 million to $250 million. Naturally, the effect of this amendment was to accelerate the rate of construction of the highway.

In 1956 when that first amendment to the act was passed, increasing the maximum amount from $150 million to $250 million, final location surveys and quantity estimates along the whole of the highway had not been completed. The fact of the matter was that, while generally the provinces had a fairly good idea of where the Trans-Canada Highway should go, few of them had done engineering work or were in a position to estimate at all closely the cost of a specific piece of road. Of course this made it particularly difficult for the federal Government to arrive at a realistic estimate of the total cost of same in order to determine what the federal share would be. There was also the fact that in a number of provinces the easier work had been done during the earlier period of the act, leaving the more difficult and expensive sections, many of which were subsequently included under the 90 per cent formula. Included in this late work, with heavier payments by the federal Government, were some sections of the Fraser Canyon, the Rogers Pass route and the Ottawa Queensway. These were not started until after the act was amended. I also know that in my own province of Nova Scotia some expensive work, such as the portion in the Cape Breton district, particularly over what we call Kelly Mountain and Seal Island where a big new bridge was to be built, was not started because it was considered too expensive to be entertained on a 50-50 basis. Once the proposition on the 90-10 formula was brought forward, the province felt it could not turn down such an offer.

In 1958 it became quite apparent that $250 million would not be sufficient to cover the federal Government's share; and during the last session of Parliament a further amendment to the act was passed increasing the amount by an additional $100 million, thus bringing the total up to $350 million.

Perhaps I may be permitted to review the financial record of the work approved for the construction and the overall physical progress of the highway. During the first six years after the act was proclaimed, about $225 million-worth of work had been approved for construction, and since that time up to the present, a period of approximately four years, an additional $337 million-worth of work has been approved. I might mention here that a large part of the increased construction was for the gap sections of Rogers Pass in British Columbia, and the Northern Ontario section from north of Sault Ste. Marie to Marathon, and the Newfoundland section from Port Blandford to Traytown. All the gap sections are now under contract, with work progressing favourably on them.

The total mileage of highway in the nine participating provinces and including the sections of the highway in the National Parks is 4,491. Grading contracts have been approved on 3,317 miles, with approximately 3,068 miles completed. The mileage of paving approved for construction is 2,617, of which 2,373 have been completed. In addition to this completed pavement, there are on the designated route of the highway approximately 800 miles of pavement which were constructed prior to the date of the original act in 1949. I would like to emphasize that this latter mileage is not necessarily to the standards set out in the Trans-Canada Highway agreements for new construction and it is felt that much of it should be reconstructed. Reconstruction of these 800 miles will, of course, depend on provincial planning during the next few years.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if I were to mention that these agreements specified that the highway conform to the general specifications for Trans-Canada Highway, or else constitute a good standard of paved highway; and when the original plans were drawn up, and where good sections of road existed, it formed the basis on which the provincial engineers, in conjunction with federal engineers, felt they were capable of carrying the present traffic, and where in their opinion sound engineering and practice dictated that it be left until its normal life was exhausted. However, where any new highway was built everything had to be up to the full standard.

In connection with the 800 miles which have been paved and are not altogether up to the standard, I may say that in many cases, owing to the fact that there is a good base course, they have a good pavement. It may not be fully up to the Trans-Canada Highway's width standard; in most cases it is not quite up to the curve allowed by the act; in some cases the grade is steeper than is allowed, and in a great many cases the five-foot shoulder required by the act is not up to standard width, many of the shoulders being only three feet wide.

I mentioned a moment or two ago that the Trans-Canada Highway runs through five National Parks. The mileage in the parks is as follows: Terra Nova 25 miles, Banff 51, Yoho 29, Glacier 27, Revelstoke 8, a total of 140 miles. I think we should make it perfectly clear that the federal Government is solely responsible for the location and construction of the highway through these parks. The mileage through Revelstoke, Glacier and Terra Nova, where the route was not determined until 1956 and 1957, was considered as part of the gap sections, and contracts have been let for these. In Terra Nova and Revelstoke it is planned to place a pavement this coming summer, and grading operations are continuing in Glacier National Park. A bituminous surface has been placed over the total mileage in Banff and Yoho, and all structures within these two parks have been completed.

I think I have said this already, but for emphasis I repeat, that the federal Government is solely responsible for the location and construction of the Trans-Canada Highway through the National Parks, and the money mentioned in the bill now before us has nothing to do with this.

Some of the highways have already been completed. For instance, the portion in the province of Saskatchewan was completed very early in 1957. With respect to the portions in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, it is expected that construction will be virtually completed by the end of the coming construction season.

Possibly some honourable senators may feel that these provinces in which the work has been completed will be penalized and that they will receive no further moneys from the federal Government. I hardly think this will be the case, because in the original planning of the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway it was envisaged that those provinces that had the money should go ahead with it and would receive the money later, together with the other provinces, when the road was completed. Therefore, I think that the federal Government has met its obligations.

Some of the provinces, however, now feel it would be advisable to undertake the additional work of re-paving and re-grading on substandard sections of the highway. To make this possible and also to complete sections which are not already paved, this bill proposes to extend the provisions of the Trans-Canada Highway Act for three years. This means that the construction period will be set as of December 31, 1963, and the period in which contributions may be made to the provinces will terminate on May 31, 1964.

As can be seen from the mileage of new pavement completed since the original act, namely, 2,373 miles, or approximately 53 per cent of the total, a large amount of work yet remains to be done on the highway, most of which will have to be done during the proposed extension period. To accomplish this, additional funds will have to be provided under the act. At the present time $562.6 million-worth of work has been approved, on which the estimated amount of the federal Government's share is $335.3 million, although at the present time only $260 million has been paid to the provinces. The present legislation provides $350 million, and it is estimated that a further $50 million will be required during the extended period. Consequently, the bill before the house today proposes an increase of this amount, bringing the total under the act to $400 million.

Honourable senators, I have here six tables which I believe you would find of interest, fully covering the figures I have briefly referred to. Table 1 shows the length of the highway in each province; table 2 shows the grading construction of each province from December 10, 1949 to March 31, 1960; the third table shows the paving construction from December 10, 1949 to March 31, 1960; table 4 shows the structures which have been completed or which have been placed under contract from December 10, 1949 to March 31, 1960; table 5 is a summary of the contractual commitments from December 10, 1949 up to April 23 of this year; and table 6 is a summary of Canada's commitments for additional 40 per cent contributions and payments made from December 10, 1949 to April 23, 1960. I would ask consent of this house to having these tables printed in Hansard.

Some hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Blois: Honourable senators, I do not know whether it is your wish to have this bill referred to a committee. Personally, I see very little in it to warrant that procedure, but if any honourable senator wishes it to go before the committee I will be glad to so move; if not, I would, with leave, move the third reading.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wonder if the honourable senator will allow a question, but first may I say that I would like to see this bill go to a committee because there is much information I would like to obtain before the bill is passed. Did I understand the honourable senator to say that since the 90-10 per cent formula was put into effect, besides the help given to British Columbia in going through the mountains the federal Government also made a grant of 90 per cent toward the cost of the Queensway? If that is so, why was that grant of 90 per cent made?

Hon. Mr. Blois: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. The contribution of 90 per cent is to the province's choice of any 10 per cent of the mileage in that province. The province had the right to select the 10 per cent. By looking up the figures for British Columbia I see that it had 568 miles under the Trans-Canada Highway Act. Now, out of that total the federal Government would pay 90 per cent of the cost of construction of 56.8 miles.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The province could select the 10 per cent of the mileage wherever it wished—in the mountains or on level ground, for instance.

Hon. Mr. Blois: Yes. I think the only stipulation was that the individual stretches should not be less than 5 miles. That is reasonable, because it is pretty hard to let a contract and have satisfactory work done on a shorter distance. I do not know whether that answers your question, or not.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes, for the time being.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I wonder if I may be permitted a question. I understand that of the $400 million that is envisaged in this bill, $335 million has already been committed, and that leaves a balance of $65 million. My question pertains to the one province which is not mentioned in the explanation of this bill. Would that amount of $65 million cover the commitments to the other provinces and any demands that may be made by this last remaining province should it see fit to enter into this agreement?

Hon. Mr. Blois: I am not sure that I am the person to answer that. Certainly this bill does not cover any province except those which have already signed, and, therefore, I think the question would be quite out of order.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith (Kamloops): Honourable senators, I want to say first that the honourable senator from Colchester-Hants (Hon. Mr. Blois) has given us a very detailed and factual review of what we have heard here in the past. In spite of the fact that it has been necessary to extend the time periodically during the last eleven or twelve years, I regard this bill granting a further extension with very mixed feelings. In fact, the most encouraging thing in the bill is the hope that is expressed again that the national highway eventually is going to be completed. It has been necessary to extend the time to a total period of eleven years since the first act was passed, instead of the seven originally anticipated as necessary, and the proposed extension of another three years means, even if no further extensions are necessary, that this is a fifteen-year project.

The tragic part of the thing is that during these eleven or twelve years, the highway has cost us a lot of money in every part of Canada. Every year that construction is postponed the highway costs us more per mile, and we have a tremendous amount of money invested in this.

The honourable senator from Colchester-Hants told in detail how British Columbia and Alberta are particularly favoured in having portions of the Trans-Canada Highway, for which the federal Government contributed 100 per cent of the cost, pass within their national parks. However, I think it is only fair to call attention to the fact that during the long period this highway has been under construction it has often become necessary for provinces to supply more extensive highway facilities than were originally planned for the Trans-Canada Highway. I know that in British Columbia it has cost the provincial Government a tremendous amount of extra money to construct four lanes of highway in some places instead of the original standard of two. The route has been changed, necessitating acquisition of new rights of way, and all these items have added up to a total cost far in excess of the estimated original cost.

I believe the honourable senator from Colchester-Hants said that so far the total commitments have reached $522 million. With the additional expenditures made by the provinces there is no doubt that the total investment in this project amounts to at least three-quarters of a billion dollars, from which there is no hope of getting a 100 per cent return until the highway is completed.

Another sad thing is that we have not kept up with construction. Let me say that the poky program that has been followed is not really the fault of the federal Government. We know that under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act and its amendments the responsibility for construction lies with the provinces. They have been the slowpokes.

During all this time of construction we have also been lax in our tourist promotion program, which has to be effective in order that we may gain the kind of return we expect from our heavy investment in the Trans-Canada Highway. We do a lot of talking and gloating about our superior tourist attractions while other countries with inferior attractions are out-selling us. In the international tourist trade we have been outstripped by Hawaii, the West Indies, Europe, Mexico and, in fact, every other part of the world that is interested in promoting travel. Actual figures disclose that we are still spending in the neighbourhood of $1 per tourist compared to $10 to $15 per tourist spent by other countries competing for tourist revenue. Mexico is probably the outstanding example of what has been done in recent years by some countries to turn a deficit tourist trade into a surplus one.

Canada has become miserably ineffective in her tourist promotion efforts in the United States. That country is our natural and cheapest tourist market to exploit. We are a next-door neighbour to the United States, the same as Mexico. Today Canada has two tourist information centres in the United States, one in New York and one in Chicago. During the last few years Mexico has stepped up its promotional activities in the United States and now has a chain of eighteen tourist information centres spreading across that country. The latest figures, which I believe are for 1958, show that Canada had a deficit of over $100 million in its tourist trade with the United States, whereas Mexico enjoyed a surplus of $300 million to $400 million in its trade with that country. Mexico has to be given a great deal of credit for its tourist promotion campaign which has resulted in building up this huge surplus. As I say, Canada has been dawdling along, and in the last five years has shown a deficit of over half a billion dollars in its tourist trade with the United States.

That is not the worst of it. We are not only losing out in the international tourist market but we are also losing out in our own domestic market. Canadians are not spending a reasonable proportion of their vacation money in Canada. People in the east find good roads leading to Florida and other eastern states, and I know that a large percentage of the people of British Columbia and Alberta spend their holidays in the western states. This situation should be corrected.

Canadians are advised by tourist information centres all across this country to travel to the west coast of British Columbia via roads in the United States. We have heard so much about the unfinished Trans-Canada Highway that we have the impression there is no decent highway across Canada.

I feel that an expansion of the budget for tourist promotion would pay dividends, and I am not alone in this opinion. The Committee on Mines, Forests and Waters of the other house is awake to the situation. Last year that committee, which deals with activities of the Canadian Travel Bureau, strongly recommended to the Government that Canada should immediately open some additional tourist information centres across the United States, putting particular emphasis on the great need for one in San Francisco. That is easily understood when it is considered that California is the winter playground for a great many retired people of means who have nothing else to do but travel all the year round and spend their winters in California. They are our best prospects as tourists for British Columbia, Alberta and the other western provinces throughout the summer months. We are getting no assistance from any travel bureau west of Chicago.

I want to commend the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and those in his department responsible for doing a good job in the two lone centres in New York City and Chicago. It was my privilege to be at Times Square, in New York City, last week, to witness the lighting of a unique sign advertising Canada, sponsored by the Canadian Travel Bureau. It is a portion of the operations and activities of the information centre at New York City. It is going to be seen by an estimated one million people every day for a period of 13 weeks. It is costing a lot of money, but I do not think it is costing too much, and I have no doubt that it is going to pay off by luring heat-stricken people in New York City to hurry up to that cool place, Canada, which they see displayed on that sign. However, that does not hold much promise for an improved condition in British Columbia, Alberta and the other western provinces, because we are too far removed from either New York City or Chicago. I would urge the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to bring all the pressure and influence he can to bear on the Government that it at least adhere to the wishes of the committee which made a thorough study of this matter and recommended an office in San Francisco. This office could be opened as a starter, and other offices opened later. The committee estimated that an office in San Francisco would cost about $40,000 a year. That is a lot of money, but I cannot help comparing it with the promise of a grant by the Government of $20 million for a World's Fair project. I do not quarrel with or criticize that gesture, and I regret that it was not successful, but I do not think it shows an attitude consistent with a program of tourist promotion. In the other place, last week, the Government was asked if this recommendation was going to be acted on this year, and it came as a surprise to learn that it was not the intention of the Government to do so.

There is another situation in the United States travel picture that calls for special attention in Canada this year. The number of Americans travelling to Europe, the West Indies, Mexico, and so on, is on the increase. The United States has embarked on a special program, at a cost of $50 million this year, to tell its own people that they should stay at home and enjoy themselves in the United States. We have that to contend with. It seems to me that we are too prone to honour the old-fashioned concept that advertising is an expense instead of considering it as an investment. Present-day experienced advertisers realize that well-placed advertising and publicity is an investment at all times, and that principle in our tourist business holds good if we will just give it a fair trial.

Now we have about three-quarters of a billion dollars tied up in an unfinished highway project, and I do hope that we can bring it to completion; but there should be negotiations, possibly with a view to further consideration of cost-sharing with some of the provinces which are so far behind and might need special attention in that direction. It was not too expensive for the Prairie provinces to finance their sections, with the result that Saskatchewan completed her section first, closely followed by Manitoba and Alberta. British Columbia had the toughest and most expensive job of all. Our road construction there runs as high as $1 million a mile. There are many expensive bridges required in that province. In spite of all the difficulties, I am proud to say our province has made very satisfactory progress. It was expected that the unfinished mileage would have been finished this year. The provincial Government had committed itself to finish it this year before the expiry of the old act, and it was announced just recently that contracts had been let for all unfinished gaps. As I have said, it is not a completed project until it is complete in every detail across all the provinces. The fact is that the completion has been delayed for at least three years. I hope to goodness this will be the last time we shall have a bill of this kind suggesting a further extension, and that the completion will be accomplished within three years. In the meantime, however, the provinces which have invested a lot of money in this project are not getting their fair share of return because of the lack of a finished product. It is something like a bridge with the approaches to it uncompleted.

Honourable senators, in spite of these suggestions or observations with regard to this bill—they are not exactly criticisms—I am in favour of the bill and propose to support it. I think it should be referred to a committee, where it can be given a more detailed study. And let me repeat, I hope this will be our last tussle with a Trans-Canada Highway bill for extending the time for completion.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, most of us will heartily agree with the last observation made by the honourable senator from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Smith). We may all harbour the hope, although it may be a vain hope, that this will be the last occasion on which we shall be voting money for the Trans-Canada Highway.

I quite unashamedly say that I was never a great proponent of the Trans-Canada Highway at this particular stage of Canadian development, and especially in the circumstances under which it was inaugurated. When we undertook to build the highway many people expected that the federal expenditure would be limited to the amount first voted, $150 million. We undertook that project at a time when we had placed a heavy burden on our financial resources through the introduction of old age security, and at a time when it had become very obvious that our defence expenditures, which had dwindled very greatly, had to be sharply stepped up. We had vastly increased defence expenditures plus the increased burden on the Treasury—I am not complaining about it—for old age security and the Trans-Canada Highway. Of course, the result of this combination of expenditures has been that our taxes have steadily gone up and with apparently a sort of fatalistic acceptance by everyone that they will never go down.

This I do hope is the last vote we shall have for the Trans-Canada Highway. We started out in the easy optimism ten or eleven years ago that if we put up $150 million we would, with the assistance of the provinces, have a highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have been putting up money ever since, and we are to put up more under this bill. The total amount, when this money we are voting today is utilized—and I think we may rest assured that it will all be utilized—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Let us be optimistic. It might not.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —the total amount will be $400 million.

I have had some experience in government. I was not very long in that experience until I mentally increased by anywhere from 15 to 25 per cent any estimate a government engineer gave me on a work. That is not a criticism of engineers, because I want the house to realize the circumstances under which engineers work. An engineer is a government servant, and you say to him, "Make a survey, give us an estimate of the cost," and when the estimate gets to the minister or the Treasury Board, they say, "Surely it won't cost that amount. Can't you cut that amount down?" And very often it is cut down. I remember my old friend the Honourable Charles Dunning, who was Minister of Finance, said after one of these episodes: "You can never depend on the estimate of a Government engineer. I have never seen one yet that was not exceeded." Now, that may be too sweeping an assertion, but the circumstances under which government engineers work are very difficult circumstances. Certainly the first estimates of what this Trans-Canada Highway would cost have been wholly belied by events.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Have you the figures?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Costs have gone up. The original figures I have forgotten. The honourable senator who is sponsoring the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois) may have them. We were putting up 50 per cent and $150 million was the first vote. But the question is, what was the estimate of the total cost of the highway at that time? Has my honourable friend that figure?

Hon. Mr. Blois: No, I have not that figure but I presume it was to be on a 50-50 basis, and the estimate of the Government expenditure was $150 million.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: And now, as it happens, the cost will be well over $800 million. We are putting up $400 million, plus the whole expense of any mileage through national parks, which is quite a substantial mileage.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the province of Newfoundland was not included in the first estimate. Is that not correct?

Hon. Mr. Blois: I am unable to answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Newfoundland was not in Confederation at that time.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My recollection is that it came in later, but that is subject to verification.

Anyway, as I said at the beginning, we can all hope that this is the last occasion upon which Parliament will be asked to vote money for this highway.

Now, more for sentimentality than for any other reason, the Trans-Canada Highway is regarded as a desirable thing, but I cannot quite agree with the optimism of the honourable senator from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Smith) who apparently thinks that when this highway is completed it will give a tremendous impetus to tourist traffic across Canada. I have reservations upon that point. Our tourist traffic comes mainly from the United States and by the nature of things will continue to do so. One of our American friends—a banker, for instance, in New York, Dakota, or Minnesota—who has two or three weeks' holiday at the outside in a year, and who budgets $300 or $400 for his holiday and takes his car and drives into Canada, is not going to travel across this country but will go to some of our northern resorts. He may come up to fish in northern Canada, because Americans are great fishermen, or he may come to play golf.

I recall that on one occasion, when the national parks administration happened to be in the department for which at the time I was minister, I visited the national park in Manitoba. I was struck by the fact that in that park, about 100 miles from the international border, a substantial number of cabins were occupied by Americans. Bank managers, school teachers and other people who had $400 or $500 to spend on a holiday had packed their families into cars and struck northward to the park, with its evergreen surroundings and clear water, there to have the time of their lives. But people of that class will not take the long journey across Canada as a holiday. The parks in the Maritime provinces have similar attractions for Americans. If one goes today to Cape Breton Highlands Park, for instance, he will see Americans whose ancestors came originally from that area and who each year come back for a visit. I have been there on a few occasions and have seen quite a number of them. It is tourists in this class to whom we in Canada can make the best appeal.

Honourable senators, I should apologize for intervening in this debate. I am sure the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is anxious to get ahead with the business of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Blois bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

LASALLE-CAUGHNAWAGA BRIDGE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Gustave Monette: Honourable senators, may I ask for leave of the house to move that Bill S-32, to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near the town of LaSalle, in the province of Quebec, be now read a third time?

By way of explanation, I may say that earlier this afternoon when the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) suggested there was no urgency in regard to this bill, I felt there was not the unanimous consent that was necessary in order to have third reading of the bill today and in the circumstances I omitted to point out that in fact the passage of this bill is a matter of great urgency. As I explained on second reading yesterday, there is serious traffic congestion in the area where the bridge is to be built and the provincial authorities are unable to do anything toward implementation of plans to construct the proposed bridge until this bill has been passed by Parliament.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, as one who raised his voice in objection to third reading being given to Bill S-32 today, may I now say, after having heard the explanation of the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette), that I am prepared to withdraw my objection. I feel that to delay this project would be to interfere with employment, and I would not wish to do that. My main reason for objecting was to maintain the traditions and rules of Parliament, and to prevent acceptance of a practice of giving third reading to a bill on the same day it is reported out of committee.

In view of the explanation of the honourable senator, I am quite prepared to withdraw my protest and to consent to the third reading of this bill now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Choquette): Honourable senators, I feel I must rule against the request of the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) in view of the fact that the house has already ordered that this bill be set down for third reading at the next sitting.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent of the house, I would respectfully suggest that it would be possible to rescind the earlier order and to allow the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) to move the third reading at this time.

It seems to me there is some question of urgency with respect to this measure, and as the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) has said, its delay might hold up employment. In these circumstances I am sure the house will do its best to see that the bill is not unnecessarily delayed.

Therefore, with unanimous consent, I would move that the order that Bill S-32 be placed on the Order Paper for third reading at the next sitting be rescinded, and that the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) be allowed to move third reading of the bill now.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, with leave of the house, I move that Bill S-32 be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED—EARLE PETITION

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 393 to 417, which were presented on Tuesday, May 17.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators will recollect that when I presented these reports the day before yesterday I called attention to report No. 417 on two grounds; first, that the members of the committee were not unanimously agreed in connection with it and, secondly, that it has substance which is unusual and therefore should be considered and not passed ipso facto.

I feel that a short statement should be made by me as to what actually took place in connection with this particular petition and the report that the committee made regarding it. Our report is as follows:

1. With respect to the petition of Dorothy Nora Alice Hurst Earle, of Ville Lafleche, in the province of Quebec, for an Act to dissolve her marriage with William Francis Earle, the committee find that the requirements of the Rules of the Senate have been complied with in all material respects, except Rule 140 respecting payment of the parliamentary fees.

2. The committee recommend that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

3. The committee recommend that the parliamentary fees payable under Rule 140 be remitted.

That was the action taken by the committee, and since all honourable senators, I have no doubt, have not read the petition, let me give you the substance of the request made to Parliament by this petitioner. Mrs. Earle was married on November 27, 1954. There were two children born of the marriage, one on March 3, 1955 and the other on January 18, 1956. I should explain here that all we know about this matter is that which the petitioner has told us in her petition. There was no evidence taken, so that the information before us is this which is alleged by the petitioner. The respondent drank to excess. He stayed out to all hours of the night. He came home in an intoxicated condition and he insulted his wife on many occasions and created terrible scenes. The family lost its furniture for non-payment of rent. In June 1956 the respondent deserted the petitioner and his two minor children. He was arrested for non-support, and then he was charged with armed robbery and was sentenced to Kingston Penitentiary. He was released in April 1959, at which time he disappeared and has not been heard from since and nobody knows of his whereabouts. His parents do not know where he is. In July 1959, there was a judgment issued by the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, giving the wife separation as to bed and board and custody of the children. The wife has been, and is now, supported by the Needy Mothers Allowances Commission, which is a department of the Quebec Government. She is given $70 a month, and of course she draws the family allowance of $12 per month. She lives with her married sister, to whom she makes no payment.

That is the substance of the petition before us, and the request is that she be relieved of the responsibilities, burdens and so forth of her marriage to this man. As Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, I have presented this recommendation that her prayer be not granted.

I know that at times I am accused of being too sympathetic. It is not difficult to appeal to my sense of sympathy for a woman of this kind who is married to a bum such as this, who has violated one of the pledges he made on his marriage to love, cherish and keep his wife. That is one of the very serious pledges that a man makes when he marries, and it is one of the pledges upon which a woman is entitled to rely when she accepts someone as her husband. I admit that I am sympathetic.

This petition was published, of course, in the Canada Gazette, and from that it came to the attention of the newspapers and there was some publicity given to it. I became aware of the details that I have placed before you now, and I admit to you that I welcomed the petition. I welcomed it because, honourable senators, we have not discussed this matter of deserted women for the last five years. It was in 1955 that the present Leader of the Government, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), brought before this house a bill to extend the grounds for divorce in the provinces where there are divorce courts. I do not look upon this subject of divorce as political. I do not think there are any politics at all in connection with it, and I am not very much concerned about where the chips may fall. You may remember that when the honourable senator from Rosetown introduced his bill a Liberal Government was in office, and I not only voted for the measure but I supported it. Yesterday I read the speech that I made on that occasion, and I have not changed my mind in regard to the substance of the discussion that we had on that occasion. I will also read, if you will permit me, from the magnificent presentation made by the honourable senator from Rosetown on that occasion. I will select just two sentences from it:

> In a great many cases brought before the Divorce Committee desertion is the true ground for the break-up of the marriage; but since desertion is not a ground for divorce the petitioner has in some manner or other to try to produce evidence showing that adultery probably has been committed. In my opinion, in a large number of cases in which there has been a long separation, desertion could easily be proved and there would be no necessity for one party to commit adultery or to bring false evidence indicating that adultery has been committed.

The situation has not changed since the honourable senator made that statement five years ago, and I have been obliged, as is my duty and that of the other members of this committee, to sit day after day listening to applications for divorce based upon this one ground of adultery, knowing very well in many cases that adultery is not the real cause of the difficulties between the men and their wives.

If a man beats his wife and deserts her, she has every cause for complaint, but as the law now stands we will do nothing. As the action we are taking in connection with this particular bill shows, we will do nothing. So, we of the committee sit there, knowing full well that the one ground that is being pleaded before us is not the real trouble between the parties. We conduct an emasculated trial, the parties knowing that it is only by their discovering or simulating adultery that we can be induced to grant relief.

It was said five years ago that there were 50,000 deserted women in the dominion of Canada. That was one of the arguments used as to why we should not act in a case of this kind, because there were 50,000 others that might follow. The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) said then that he thought the number exaggerated, and so do I now. I do not think there are 50,000 deserted women in all of Canada. But if a substantial number of our women, Canadian citizens, are in distress, then that is a good reason why we should go to their assistance. We are here for that purpose, and the more there are the more pressing it is that we really consider the circumstances of the situation and do what is in our power to assist these unfortunate women.

I believe I am generally sympathetic and I hope you do not hold this too much against me. I am not one who is ready to sit complacently in our ivory tower here and shut the gates of mercy on mankind. So, irrespective of how much trouble it might be or how much it might disturb our comfort and complacency, I would be prepared to deal with cases of this kind on their merits, individually or collectively.

My honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) stated in the chamber Tuesday night that he thought this was not the proper way to handle this subject, that cases should not be dealt with piecemeal but that a resolution should be brought in or a bill, as was done by the honourable senator from Rosetown five years ago. Perhaps he is right. I am not sure that he is right and I do not see any resolution or bill before us. Since the defeat of the bill five years ago nobody has taken any action at all. I am somewhat differently placed from the rest of honourable senators. You no doubt hear about these cases, but, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, I am the focal point to which appeals of this kind are made, over and over again. I receive letters that stir my sympathy and which, I think, would stir yours.

As I have said, the honourable senator from Vancouver South suggested that we should not deal with these matters in a piecemeal way, but I would ask you to remember that most reform of law in British communities has come about in that way. Take the reform of the criminal law, for instance. That was not done by parliaments. The initiative was not taken in parliaments but came from judges and juries who had the victims themselves before them. Juries refused to convict when the punishments were unnecessarily severe. I have seen that work out myself in my own practice where juries have refused to convict when a brutal judge was too severe with his sentences. Those juries reformed the law, not as a matter of theory but because they had the actual parties before them, human beings, whose sufferings they could see as well as imagine. A legislative assembly, as has been proven over the years, can be brutally cruel, but courts are not nearly so likely to be without sympathy. We see that over and over again in sentences passed by our judges.

As I have said, the press made some publication of this matter because it is a subject of very wide interest all over Canada. Some members of the committee became disturbed about this and one of them saw me in my room, as was his right—they are always welcome—and he expressed his disturbance about it and voiced the opinion we should not hear the evidence. I was not in sympathy with that. I would have preferred to hear what the petitioner had to say rather than base my judgment entirely on the petition. I told the honourable member of the committee, as I thought was my duty, what his course could be—that he could follow the usual procedure in the courts. We follow the courts as closely as we can in our committee. In the courts, when someone issues a writ or statement of claim asking for a remedy that is not remedial at law, the opposition moves to dismiss the action on the ground that the pleadings show no cause of action. I told the honourable senator that if he cared to follow that procedure and move in full committee to dismiss the petition—or, as is our procedure, to recommend that the petition be not granted—on the ground that it exhibits no such cause of action as we have always recognized, he was at perfect liberty to do so, and that the committee would undoubtedly pass upon his resolution. My honourable friend in consequence did move this resolution:

That the petition of Dorothy Nora Alice Hurst Earle, now on file asking for a divorce solely on the grounds of desertion be rejected, since this committee has no present intentions of recommending a divorce on any grounds other than that which has been traditionally accepted as proper grounds for such action by the Parliament of Canada.

There was a full meeting of the committee and the resolution was carried. In consequence I have presented the recommendation that the divorce be not granted. There is therefore no action to be discussed among us unless there may be some who disagree and say that the petition should be granted. I am not holding out in any way against it. The thought I had in mind when the petition first came to my notice was that it would bring public discussion and a consideration by our committee and perhaps by the house. I thought that was salutary and I still think so. I am not pressing for the granting of this petition. The committee of which I am chairman has decided against hearing it and I am loyal enough and a good enough democrat to abide by the decision of the committee. I am not prepared, however, to overlook my own thoughts in connection with it, or the sympathy which I possess for the poor woman who has made this appeal to us for assistance.

Hon. William H. Golding: Honourable senators, the first information I had about this petition was when I heard about it over the radio. The petition was drafted in Montreal on February 23 and presented to Parliament on, I think, March 8, and was set down for hearing by the Senate Committee on Divorce on May 20. As I say, the first intimation I had that a petition of that sort had been presented was when I heard about it over the radio. That was on May 2. Naturally, I was deeply disturbed and worried about a case of this sort being brought before our committee on the sole ground of desertion. So far as I know, in the 93 years since Confederation never before has a case been set down for hearing on a ground other than the one traditionally accepted by Parliament. Parliament's attitude on grounds for divorce has not changed.

It has been pointed out by the honourable chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that this whole matter was discussed thoroughly and a vote taken. The Senate is on record in having refused to enlarge the grounds for divorce. The House of Commons has taken the same position. The question before the house at the present time is simply the adoption of these reports, and as far as I am concerned, I would not consider that I was in order at all to deal with the merits of enlarging or not enlarging the grounds for divorce. That is not the question before the house at the present time.

Honourable senators, in committee we felt that for very good reasons we should not even hear this petition at all. In the first place, we naturally wished to be loyal to the Senate and the attitude it takes, and we had full knowledge that the Senate did not approve of enlarging the grounds for divorce. Secondly, we also felt that there was no good reason, after all these years, why we should consider a case which in our opinion does not meet with the requirements of Parliament. Our third reason was that we had no intention and no desire of establishing a precedent by hearing the evidence in this case.

My honourable friend referred to the statement that there are some 50,000 deserted women in the dominion of Canada. I have heard the same figure quoted, but whether it is correct or not I do not know. In any case, if we set a precedent by hearing this case, other cases of the kind will follow. The courts will not grant a divorce on the grounds of desertion alone, although the province of Nova Scotia, I understand, accepts cruelty as a ground. If we heard the evidence in this particular case there would be no reason in the world why every person in the same position as this woman, whose case might be just as deserving, should not file a similar petition. It is not that we are unsympathetic toward these people, but we must be governed by law and order, and if we were placed in the position that people were flocking here—

Hon. Mr. Choquette: From all provinces.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Yes, from all provinces—the position would be impossible.

I think there is a song that runs something like this:

Look down, look down the road before you start.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Lonesome Road!

Hon. Mr. Golding: We do not need to get into these situations at all. We can take the position which we did take in this case. In my humble opinion the position we have taken in this case will have a salutary effect on those who think that they are going to use the members of this committee as guinea pigs to satisfy their curiosity, by bringing some test case which has no chance of being recommended for divorce. We have no intention at all of being open to that possibility.

In this particular case the petition was filed before we knew anything about it. Perhaps there is nothing wrong about that. On the other hand, I contend that any radical departure from the normal policy we have followed year after year should have been known to the members of the committee, and I think my contention is sound.

When we were confronted with this problem we had to consider what we should do. I am speaking not only for myself but for the overwhelming majority of the committee when I say that we were firmly convinced in our own minds that we would have nothing whatsoever to do with the case. However, the petition is in. The honourable chairman of the committee referred to a motion, which I will now read. It was moved by myself, and seconded by the Honourable Senator Barbour:

That the petition of Dorothy Nora Alice Hurst Earle, now on file, asking for a divorce solely on the grounds of desertion be rejected, since this committee has no present intentions of recommending a divorce on any grounds other than that which has been traditionally accepted as proper grounds for such action by the Parliament of Canada.

I do not want to take up the time of the house by going over all that was said with regard to this case, but I wish to say that what we did we believed to be the sound and sensible thing. The petition is before the committee now, and if honourable senators pass the motion they will endorse the stand which we took in this particular case.

I want to say a word about our chairman. We were disturbed, and another senator and I went to him and told him we were worried about the situation and he was very fair about the whole matter. He said if I felt as keenly about this petition as he was sure I did feel I had a perfect right to have the matter brought to the attention of the full committee on the following Monday. The consensus indicated that the committee was strongly against having anything to do with the petition other than to dismiss it.

Well, after some discussion the chairman suggested that we have, and it was my thought that we should have, a full meeting of the Divorce Committee so that every member would be present and have a voice in what was being done. The chairman agreed to notify all members of the holding of a special meeting, and he agreed that I had a perfect right to give at that time notice of a resolution and to bring it in to be considered at the special meeting. This was done, and as was pointed out by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) the committee carried that resolution by a vote of 12 to 3.

At that meeting the chairman told us, and I repeat what he said then, that he was a good enough democrat to abide by the decision of the committee. That he has done in moving adoption of the committee's report.

We want to continue to get along in harmony and peace with each other, and there is no reason why we should not do that and continue our work. My hope is that the Senate will endorse what we have done.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say. I have served on the Divorce Committee of this house for a long time and I worked very hard at it up until the last few years. I was present at the specially called committee meeting the other day when this particular petition was discussed.

I am not in favour of hearing evidence on divorce petitions based on desertion. No question about that. However, that is not the question raised by the honourable chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If I remember rightly, you supported the Honourable Senator Aseltine's bill on this subject a few years ago.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I voted for it, yes, and I am not saying that I didn't.

Honourable senators, why in the world does a committee of this house have to spend hours and hours each week hearing evidence in connection with divorce petitions, evidence that should be heard in another place? Such evidence should be heard by a judge in a court designated for that purpose, a man of experience, one who can form a true opinion as to whether a witness, be it man or woman, is telling the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

I want to say that as a member of this chamber I will never vote for a measure that does not give a woman a fair deal in life. At the present time, I think, we have no provision for giving a wife a release when she is tied to a man who makes it impossible for her to live with him, and those of us who practise law know what that problem is, how serious it is for the family whose breadwinner has deserted it. Understand me, I am not suggesting that this house should grant divorces on the ground of desertion. What I am suggesting is that this house recommend to the Government and the people of this country that legislation be put on the statute book requiring that petitions of that kind be handled outside of Parliament, handled by courts of law. And it should be made clear that a man shall not be allowed to desert his wife and family and get away with it. That is the position I take, and that is the position I want my women friends in Canada to understand that I am taking. I hope all of us in this chamber, men and women, will take that stand.

I may say that I do not always agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), but when he is right I like to agree with him, for when he is right he is so right that I do not see how anybody can be against him. I admit he is not always right, in fact I think he is wrong more times than he is right, but when he does get right he gets awfully right, and on the question that is before us he is awfully right, if I may use that language.

The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) made a wonderful speech, some five years ago, a speech on which he spent many hours in preparation. Every time he met any of us he always wanted to talk about his bill, to find out if he should cover certain points and to see how other points would be received, and I must say that I appreciated that attitude of his very much.

This afternoon is the first occasion on which the question of desertion as a ground for divorce has been raised in this house, in my experience, and now that it has been raised we should meet the problem that it has brought on. This house is getting the reputation all over Canada of being a divorce mill; we are notable for the divorces we grant. We hear criticisms of the Divorce Committee from the other place and I do not know whether they are right or wrong. But what I am interested in is that the press makes it appear that we are divorce merchants, and that that is our business. I may say that many many people have asked me, especially young people, "What do you do, Mr. Senator, at Ottawa, besides granting divorces?" I said, "We deal with the legislation that is referred to in the Speech from the Throne and any other legislation that is brought before the house." Their reply is that the only thing they hear about as regards the Senate is the granting of divorces. And when, if I may use the term, a spicy divorce comes before us, that really gets prominence. Now, we should stop that. We should insist that some other organization be set up to deal with divorce matters.

The petition we are discussing is a petition for a divorce on the ground of desertion. The sole ground for divorce is adultery, but I never was sure—and maybe I should go no further than that—I never was sure about these charges of adultery. I often wondered how, after being in each other's company for months, a man is suddenly found in a hotel room in company of a woman at a particular time. I used to inquire of the detectives, "Do you know that woman?" and the answer I got was that it was not my business. Personally I think she was sent there to make the case. However, the courts of my province have held that where these circumstances happen to exist adultery is presumed, and our courts are governed in that by a decision of the provincial Appeal Court.

I want this house to spend a little time on this particular demand. We have a number of able women in this chamber, women who are a credit not only to the Senate but to all of Canada, and we ought to ask them to help us see what can be done to meet the problem of desertion of a wife by her husband. As one gets older he can see the havoc that is wrought on a family through desertion of the husband and father. When parents reach the age when their children are leaving home, getting married and making a life for themselves, they realize what a responsibility they have had in raising those children. I urge that we in this house give some consideration to serious domestic problems, so that we shall not be accused by members of the other place of failing to do our full duty.

I say that divorce petitions should be heard by the courts. I also believe that the law should be clear that a man cannot desert his wife and forget about her; if he can be brought back to justice, he should be brought back. I agree with the remarks of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, but I would not grant a divorce on the ground of desertion. My point is, I agree with the idea behind the placing of this petition before us. Such circumstances as desertion may well exist in many homes in Canada, and the problem should be recognized and handled by some authority.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, in view of what has been said I feel I should make a few remarks in this debate. It does seem that the discussion has gone far wider than the resolution should permit. So, perhaps under the circumstances I may be allowed to get away from the motion, which is for adoption of these reports.

The honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said in no uncertain terms that matters of divorce should be tried by the courts of our land and not by the Senate. It is all right to make that statement, but in doing so it is tantamount to saying that divorce petitions from the province of Quebec should not come to Parliament, but that that province should have a court for dealing with them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No! The Exchequer Court could hear them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is tantamount to saying that Parliament should force the province of Quebec to have its applications for divorce heard by courts.

Honourable senators, I think I should bring to the attention of this house the fact that the province of Ontario, which now has a population of perhaps five million, came to Parliament and asked that courts in that province be given jurisdiction to hear applications for divorce upon the issuing of writs of summons. Had we refused that request of the province of Ontario, what would have happened? I doubt if we would have considered refusing it. But the province of Quebec does not want a court with divorce jurisdiction, and to suggest that Parliament should say to that province, with its approximately four million people, that it must have a divorce court, seems to me to be going entirely too far.

Well, honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, as long as I sit in this house as a senator I will oppose any effort on the part of anyone to force the province of Quebec to establish courts as the forum for hearing applications for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Nobody wants to do that.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And I did not suggest it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That suggestion was made here today.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I absolutely deny it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then, I don't know to what the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) was referring.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I said the Exchequer Court could hear the divorce petitions.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator said that these matters should be heard by courts, plural.

Hon. Mr. Haig: By a court.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the applications must be heard by courts, then the courts must be established in the province.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then I don't know where the courts would be. In any event, if the applications were to be heard by courts, it would mean that Parliament would no longer hear petitions.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In effect, my honourable friend is saying that we should not hear petitions from the province of Quebec for divorce. When has Parliament ever decided that it would not hear petitions?

It is the right of every citizen to come to Parliament with a petition. True, there is a minority in the province of Quebec in favour of divorce. There is no court in that province with jurisdicition to hear divorce petitions, and in my opinion there should be no such court until the province wants one. At the same time, we must not deny those people the right to come to Parliament with their petitions for divorce.

Honourable senators, as I said at the outset, this discussion has gone rather wide of the motion before the house. But in view of what has been said, and in view of the stand which I have taken over the years, I felt I should let it be known that I stand today where I stood when the bill of the present honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) was before the house, that I am opposed to forcing divorce courts on the province of Quebec.

Reports adopted.

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-62, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1961.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: With leave of the Senate, I move the second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if the bill has been distributed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. A copy was put in every honourable senator's post office box and there is a copy also on every honourable senator's file.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think it has been the custom to proceed with second reading of a bill like this on the day the bill is received in this house, and I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is getting close to the end of the month and I think it is hoped we shall have royal assent some time this week, possibly tomorrow. For that reason I should like to go ahead with second reading this evening.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators will remember that when I introduced the first interim supply bill for the current year 1960-61 I stated that the total amount of the main estimates required to be voted for the fiscal year 1960-61 was $3,561,353,870. We dealt with that bill and voted one-sixth generally of the main estimates plus an additional proportion of 11 special estimates which were required for the months of April and May. The total amount voted by that Supply Bill was $603,488,902.52.

This bill, which is the second interim supply bill for the fiscal year, proposes to vote one-sixth of all of the items to be voted in those estimates, which would amount to $593,558,-978.34. That is exactly the same amount we voted on March 30 last.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a question? He mentioned at the outset a figure of $603 million, but in the bill I see the figure of $600,946 odd.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We voted the amount I have just mentioned, plus additional proportions of eleven special items which were required for the early months of the year, April and May, because the work had to be done at that time. That made the total $603 million-odd.

In addition to the one-sixth of the items to be voted, there is required an additional seven-twelfths of Votes 64 and 95. Those two votes are shown in schedule A to the bill, and the seven-twelfths proportion amounts to $350,000.

There is required an additional one-third of two other votes, namely 137 and 267, the particulars of which are shown in schedule B to the bill, and the amount being $565,070.

There is required an additional one-twelfth of Votes 193, 194, 195, 197, 199, 203, 207, 208, 213 and 303. Particulars of these votes are given in schedule C to the bill. The one-twelfth amounts to $1,472,592.58.

There is also required one-third of the total of the item set forth in the Supplementary Estimates for 1960-61, $5 million. This makes the total amount voted by this bill $600,946,640.92.

None of these votes of which an additional amount is required have had more than one-sixth voted previously, and the reason why these additional portions of these votes are required is that the work covered by the votes has to be done principally during the months of June and July.

I should like to inform honourable senators that the proportions requested in this bill are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the public service up to the end of July. In no instance is the total amount of an item being released by this bill.

Honourable senators will also notice that the form of this bill is the same as that of interim supply bills passed last year and of the one passed at the end of March, to which I have already referred. The form of these bills met with the approval of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and other honourable senators because it gave more particulars than used to be given and in a way that made them more easily understood.

I give the usual assurance, also, that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable senators to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration later, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

That, honourable senators, is a brief explanation of the bill which is now before us for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I am rather interested in Vote 213, Polar Continental Shelf Project, on page 5 of the bill. I wonder if the honourable leader can give me an explanation of that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: All the first nine items in Schedule C, votes 193 to 213 inclusive, have to do with the Surveys and Mapping Branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Geological Survey of Canada, the Geographical Branch of the Department and the Dominion Observatories. Vote 213 concerns an aerial survey, or something of that sort, which is going on in connection with the Polar Continental Shelf Project. I assure my honourable friend it has nothing to do with spying on any of our neighbours. It will be conducted entirely over the Canadian north.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, this is the customary sort of bill we expect at this period of the session. The first observation I wish to make has to do with procedure. It is difficult for the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to give the full explanation I think honourable members of this house are reasonably entitled to receive concerning a bill of this type, for it is beyond the capacity of any individual to familiarize himself with the purpose and nature of the votes contained in it. I would therefore suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government and to the house generally that it might be desirable to consider adopting a new procedure in dealing with appropriation bills. Instead of discussing them on second reading with His Honour the Speaker in the Chair, I would suggest that the house be moved into Committee of the Whole. That would enable the honourable Leader of the Government to have someone present in the house to advise him on matters connected with each of these items.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have the information with respect to every one of the votes for which additional appropriation is required, if honourable senators wish to have every one dealt with.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not see what effect that has on the suggestion I have just made.

I was about to remark also that I had noted the point raised by my honourable colleague from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) about Vote 213, in Schedule C to the bill, dealing with the Polar Continental Shelf Project, for which we are asked to vote $1,134,400. The honourable leader stated he suspected or thought this item might have something to do with an aerial reconnaissance in the Polar regions, but that is only speculation on his part. If, for instance, someone from the Treasury Board were present in the house he could supply the answers to such questions to the honourable leader, who in turn could pass on the information to us.

This is the customary interim supply bill wherein we vote one-sixth of all the estimates. This supply will carry us through until the end of July. A previous one-sixth was voted prior to the Easter recess, and that is to carry us through until the end of this month. One might gather from this that we shall be sitting here in July, and probably at the end of July may have to vote another sixth to carry us through until the end of September.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I hope not.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In that connection, I think it would be a very useful and desirable consideration to this house if the honourable Leader of the Government could find out from the powers that be whether we are likely to have to vote another interim supply measure; in other words, if he could give us some idea of the course of events over the next few years so far as the work of Parliament is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Months.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We will forgive you.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators will realize at once how fortunate I am in having beside me a mentor so efficient as the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler).

I wish to make only a few observations on these estimates. It should be noted, however, that honourable senators have the same right, and I would say the same obligation, to consider these items of expenditures in the same manner that the members of the other house do, before we approve this measure. It is true that we cannot initiate spending ourselves, although I think it is quite within our province to reduce spending if we wish to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: At any rate, I submit to the house that we should have information available to us so that we can intelligently consider these expenditures.

There are several criticisms of spending that I could offer. The first criticism would be that the Government, instead of adding to the main estimates as compared to a year ago, would have been doing its duty to the country more effectively if it had cut off, say, $100 million from the total. Spending is increasing every year, and it makes one wonder what would be the position of this country if, unfortunately, we should run into a period of recession. These are matters that should engage the attention of this house, and certainly should engage the attention of the Government.

There are a few items here to which I should like to draw attention. In the main there is, as I have said, a lack of knowledge about the items. For instance, I notice that the expenditures in the Northern Affairs and National Resources department have been surging up. That is one department where I think we could have afforded to exercise some economies, as, for instance, the item that the honourable senator from New Westminster referred to, involving an expenditure of almost $1¼ million. Is that vital or necessary? Is that not the kind of expenditure that we could postpone for five years without any injury to the public interest? And can certain other items be considered vital, such as these surveys extensively conducted in the Arctic regions? The search for oil! Why search for oil in our northern Arctic at a time when we cannot sell the oil we already have available?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think that in a time of stress, when our social expenditures are mounting, our defence expenditures are very heavy, and other expenditures are up, it is important to economize in all the things that are not necessary at the moment. In that connection I wish to draw attention to item 267, appearing on page 4 of the bill, in schedule B. Here we are voting an amount of $800,000 to assist the provinces in providing camp grounds and picnic area developments. Now, is it reasonable or within the boundaries of common sense, at a time when our taxation is higher than it has ever been before, when the future may have some uncertainties for us, that we should be spending this amount on camp grounds and picnic area developments?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is social welfare.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It seems to me that Parliament is certainly getting the father and mother complex to quite an extraordinary degree, and we seem to be taking upon ourselves the obligation of caring for everyone and everything. We care for farmers who are growing wheat, and we care for people in a multitude of ways—social welfare, medicine, hospitalization, and everything else. I am not particularly criticizing these things, but I would point out that here we are also asked to care for the pleasures of our population. Well, there was a time not so very long ago when our citizens found their own camping grounds and their own picnic grounds, and they did not need to spend what we are voting here, namely, $800,000 to do it. The question I pose to the house is this: How in the world are we ever going to find it possible to reduce taxes if we go on spending in this free and easy manner? That is, on broad lines, the criticism I have to offer of the whole program of Government spending. Most of these expenditures are necessary, and the reason additional amounts are voted on some items is that the work has to be done in the summer months, like geological surveys and matters of that kind, and it is entirely reasonable and, in fact, quite in accord with past practice to vote these additional sums at this particular period in the session. However, I cannot for the life of me see the necessity for spending on many of the other items.

I dislike talking in a way that might lead some of my friends opposite to accuse me of being a prophet of doom and gloom.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, we have never called you that.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am not; but I do try to exercise ordinary common sense in a consideration of these matters, and I lay it down as a fundamental principle that the Parliament of Canada today, and the Government of this country, should not be spending one dollar where spending could be postponed. Let us first try to get taxation reduced, because taxation in this country today is punitive. We have reached the point where the amount of money that is being taken out of the taxpayers' pockets at all levels of government is positively dangerous to our future economy. We should never forget that the federal spending is only part of a vast complex of spending in this country. We spend here and we do not think of the hundreds of millions Ontario spends, and Quebec, and the vast sums that are spent by the smaller provinces and the obligations taken on by the municipalities. That is all a burden on our economy and we may well reach the point where our welfare is going to be endangered by all this business.

Therefore I hope that the honourable Leader of the Government in this house will use the influence he has, and we all know it is considerable, with the Leader of the other house—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —to impress upon his Government the need of economizing in every direction where they can economize without injury to the country. It would not injure the country if we postponed spending money on, for example, camp sites and picnic grounds. That postponement would not hurt any interest in this country. All it might do would be to create the possibility that our taxes may not be increased even though they cannot be reduced. And I am quite sure that the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) would have the enthusiastic support of the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) if he attempted to use some influence on the higher authorities to achieve this very desirable end.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Why bring me in?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

COMMONWEALTH TRADE

TWENTIETH CONGRESS OF FEDERATION OF COMMONWEALTH AND BRITISH EMPIRE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE AT CANBERRA

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt rose pursuant to notice that he would "draw the attention of the Senate to the Twentieth Congress of the Federation of Commonwealth and British Empire Chambers of Commerce, held recently in Canberra, Australia," and would "bring forward for consideration information and suggestions arising from the Congress discussions relative to the promotion of trade within the Commonwealth".

He said: Honourable senators, I feel it will be of interest to bring to your attention the proceedings of the Twentieth Congress of the Federation of Commonwealth and British Empire Chambers of Commerce which was held recently at Canberra, Australia. It was my privilege to attend as one of the delegates from Canada to what the Australian press termed "The Commerce Parliament of the Commonwealth".

Organizations that function internationally in relation to industry, labour, education, science and all other fields of social progress have a rapidly growing responsibility of world-wide importance. It is well to avail ourselves of the opportunities of keeping up to date on the thinking and planning of such organizations which exist for cultivating international relationships. In the field of government, one of very great significance to us is the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. At this session we have had the opportunity of hearing in the Senate from our colleagues the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) and the honourable senator from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) about the recent meetings of that association, held also in Australia. I feel that it is quite appropriate and timely that the two such bodies should have had their deliberations in the same area, when on both occasions issues of world-wide significance in human affairs came under review.

Government and business relationships have a close interlocking in these days. Governments, of course, must necessarily have regard to the policy of broadening the avenues of trade in local communities and countries, as well as internationally. One of the leading figures of the federation put it this way, however, and I consider rightly so: "No political policy or program can of itself provide a nation's bread, but that can only come from the proceeds of healthy and prosperous industry." While industry has its responsibility for building its structure by enterprise and research within its immediate environments, it also has a very definite responsibility to create the atmosphere for spreading throughout the world the benefits of its enterprise. I can say that the Federation of the Commonwealth and British Empire Chambers of Commerce is out to do just that.

The federation came into being in 1886. Meetings have been held in different parts of the commonwealth every three years, except for breaks caused by the two World Wars. There are 32 different countries and areas of the commonwealth and British Empire represented on the Council of the Federation. Three times have these Congress meetings been held in Canada—in 1903, 1920 and 1954. The proceedings at Canberra were under the very able presidency of Lord Balfour of Inchrye, who, as you know, was a minister of the British Government during the period of the last war. In association with Lord Balfour in the leadership was Mr. Charles D. Gill, the Chairman of the Council of the Federation.

The Conference Hall was decorated with the flags of many of the countries represented. Among those I shall mention, for the purpose of illustrating the geographical diversity, Australia, the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Malta, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya, Hong Kong, the West Indies and New Guinea. In the row of flags displayed in the Conference Hall it was an inspiration to see the Union Jack as part of most of them. I hope Canada will never adopt a national flag without the Union Jack being a predominant feature of it. Apart from what it has meant in the history of Canada, we must continue to value it for what it has meant in world history and still means in world affairs. Without Great Britain, which I hope will continue for centuries to wave the Union Jack, there would be no commonwealth. I think it would be a betrayal of the commonwealth to drop the symbol of the Union Jack from our flag, as is sometimes advocated.

In Canada business has progressively and broadly become organized within the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Exporters' Association and many others. These organizations take an active part in promoting international trade and in lessening the difficulties in foreign trading. Some of these difficulties are natural to the various enterprises, but others are often imposed by legislation arising out of too close a local view without regard to the broader and more vital world-wide implications.

Canada's participation in the deliberations, which I shall very briefly review, came under the auspices of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which body has a background of 800 Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade throughout Canada. The delegation from Canada was made up of 36 representatives of industry and finance. It was very efficiently led by the Chairman, Mr. H. G. Love, President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and the Deputy Chairman, Mr. Henry G. Birks, the Canadian Vice-President of the Federation of Commonwealth Chambers of Commerce.

One may ask, why should there be a union of Chambers of Commerce particularly within the commonwealth, and what is the special significance of that union? I shall answer that briefly in words spoken by Lord Balfour at the opening session:

"As the political ties become less defined within the many commonwealth areas, the commercial ties become that much more important. The new commonwealth which is developing will still hold what the old one has forged so firmly. It will remain the greatest single world force for freedom against restriction, for peace against aggression, for the things not always definable but which we know are basically right against the things we know are basically evil. We have the chance in this Congress of advancing the true interests of the new commonwealth, by our authoritative study of important economic issues and by our considered recommendations to commonwealth Governments on issues all must face and none can ignore."

While the basic principles involved in the consideration of a program for lessening the difficulties of international trade ran somewhat to a uniform pattern, the divergence of interests among the countries represented was most revealing as well as perplexing.

The fact in itself throws out a healthy challenge which must be accepted as such. No one with a reasonable outlook could, however, come away from such a gathering representing countries, each with its own problems, with any lessening of determination to build up what is of value to his own particular country. Any other attitude would be visionary and unpractical. What one could take away was a view of the value to each country of the cumulative effect of greater progress within the whole group of countries.

At this point I think it will be of interest for me to mention something of the relation of Canada's trade to that of the commonwealth. Last year about 17.7 per cent of the total of Canadian imports and exports was done within the commonwealth. The proportion done with United States was 65 per cent and with other countries of the world 17.3 per cent. In relation to the total foreign trade of Canada the commonwealth volume has had a declining percentage. In the years 1935-39 the average amount done by Canada within the commonwealth was about 41 per cent; in 1949 it was about 26.2, and in 1959, 17.7 per cent. The dropping off in percentage, however, is not the full significance, because while the total trade done with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries in the years 1935 to 1939 averaged about $642 million, in 1949 it was $1,608 million, and in 1959 it ran up to $1,910 million.

I do not wish to burden honourable senators with too many figures, but I have here a table showing the value of the exports from Canada in 1949, as compared with 1959, to the various parts of the commonwealth, and other countries and the imports into Canada. With permission of the house I will have this table printed in Hansard so that it may be the more easily followed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed

Hon Mr. Pratt: Thank you.

	1949 (millions of dollars)	1959 (millions of dollars)
Total exports	$2,993	$5,179
Exports to United Kingdom	704	797	(Increase of about $93 million)
Exports to other commonwealth countries	310	277	(Decrease of about $33 million)
Exports to United States	1,519	3,207
Exports to all other countries	460	898
Total imports	2,761	5,654
From United Kingdom	307	596
From other commonwealth countries	187	239
From United States	1,954	3,832
From all other countries	313	986

In gathering my facts for this review of the congress proceedings, I found it very difficult to differentiate between what is of particular Canadian interest and what is of general interest to all countries. That is very different from what the situation was only a few years ago. The winds of change are blowing over the whole world. Without due care and considered policy these winds can blow some countries back, and others can be, and will be, blown ahead. The application of that general statement may be of greater importance and concern to what we consider the developed countries than those we term the underdeveloped countries of today.

I shall mention some of the issues which were considered at the congress. First, I shall refer to the problems which are rising from areas where closer economic co-operation is developing in Europe and elsewhere. The congress supported the principle of regional groupings which can help in the expansion of world trade, but said that any tendency towards discriminatory practices in relation to other countries should be excluded. It was felt that the first stages toward a common tariff by the European Economic Community of six countries should not be at the accelerated pace which is now in evidence. The seven countries of Europe working toward a European Free Trade Area, or E.F.T.A., as it is known, may be shaping up to trade wars on the outside which could result in a reduction of the volume of international trade. The opinion was placed on record that if the proposals of E.E.C. now under consideration, and which are not consistent with the GATT, were implemented they might lead to unreasonably high protection for European agricultural and other primary products. That would result in serious discrimination against primary producing countries outside the common market and retard the policy of spreading more general prosperity throughout the world.

It will be urged by many representatives at the congress to their respective Governments that all avenues be explored for drawing the Inner Six into closer and more cordial relations with the Outer Seven. In short, a logical and promising movement can be of disadvantage to the extension of world trade if a too narrow and local policy view is taken by the countries concerned. Arising from that movement, however, which may become a pattern of international trading relations, the thought is indelibly impressed on all that mutual trading relationships, which are made up of give-and-take policies between groups of countries, are showing up very strongly. No country, no matter how strong economically, can afford to stand aside from this world trend.

A subject which was emphasized very strongly in discussions at the congress was that business leadership in advancing education generally was essential, and was entirely feasible through concentrated attention by chambers of commerce and such organizations, particularly in areas where the need is greatest.

It was thought that more facilities for the use of the English language within the commonwealth should be inaugurated and supported by governments. Commercial education should be made more easily available to those in areas where the need is greatest, and chambers of commerce were urged to take a part in such a program.

The congress expressed approval of a more general policy for the exchange of young people between commonwealth and empire countries. It was recommended that the federation should encourage the interchange of young business people between companies in the membership of chambers and the association. It was also felt that the Commonwealth Scholarship Scheme and its further extension should be far more widely encouraged than it is.

Adoption of a decimal system of currency throughout the commonwealth came in for consideration. It was definitely felt that a gradual change to the decimal system was entirely practical and should be promoted.

In no association of persons anywhere could one gather stronger impressions of differences between the standards of living and the need for the creation of a better balance of economy than in such a world-wide assembly. The need for increased capital investment in the underdeveloped areas was stressed not only for the mutual advantage of expanding world trade but because the alternative would be a greater movement toward communism. It is, however, of first importance that there be a readiness of people to meet the responsibilities that go with establishment of industry and investment of outside capital. Anyone who thinks that the great disparity in standards of living can be substantially relieved by just throwing in funds for investment, simply does not know the facts of life. To facilitate a greater and more consistent flow of investment capital within the commonwealth, and particularly to the underdeveloped areas, the fear of nationalization has to be lessened by intergovernmental understandings.

The congress has decided to recommend the establishment of a commonwealth investment guarantee scheme which will provide adequate insurance cover against risks associated with any political instability. Somewhat similar to this in concept is the existing United States and German investment guarantee program. It seems obvious that if the idea of development of commonwealth relationship in trade and industry has to grow along practical lines, with use of industrial capital, that the commonwealth governments must have an underwriting commitment based on intergovernmental agreements. It was thought, too, that some reasonable insurance to business investment along these lines would result in a broader program of a commonwealth development fund to facilitate loans and aid policies.

In listening to the expression of views of men engaged in the top level of industry, who know by experience the difficulties involved in widespread foreign investment, one could not but be impressed with the great need for a more definite and more declared policy of governments than now exists in many areas. Unquestionably, intergovernmental understandings to carry out decided policies and obligations are required on a wider basis than is now in evidence. It was gratifying to learn that, in one of the issues of that character, Canada is well in the forefront. I refer to the elimination of double taxation which in many countries is still a great deterrent to international investment.

Representatives of some countries came out strongly for the revaluation of gold. No decision was made to recommend that policy at this time, as it was felt a primary consideration had to be the effect on the internal economies of the individual countries concerned.

The need for freer convertibility of currency than now exists in many countries was strongly emphasized.

In the broader issue of low standards of living and insufficient nutrition in the underdeveloped areas of the world, it was considered that a useful approach to the problem would be the establishment of a food bank under the auspices of the United Nations. The congress passed a recommendation that a commonwealth committee of experts be set up to formulate ways and means of dealing with surplus food accumulation in producing countries, and to get the foundation of such a policy firmly established within the commonwealth. It was recommended that the inauguration of such a movement be given consideration at the conference of Prime Ministers which was then shortly to take place and, of course, has since been held.

There was a general awareness revealed of the need for countries to keep their tariff protection policy under constant review.

It was recommended that chambers of commerce in all commonwealth countries urge their Governments to undertake periodic reviews of the levels of tariff protection and their consequences. Artificial barriers, such as unduly high tariffs, impede the free movement of trade. They act as a shelter for high costs and are highly dangerous in these changing times. I feel there is no more important lesson than that for Canada to learn. We should learn it and act on it before it is too late. If we close our eyes to the constantly increasing production costs of industry within this country we shall at some time be wakened out of our slumbers by a terrific jolt from world-wide competition. With industrialization springing up so fast on a world-wide scale and in the most unexpected places, it would be just suicide to isolate ourselves from the progress of others. When I say that, I am not unmindful of the stimulating figures I gave just now of Canada's trade progress in the recent past. I certainly am not pessimistic about Canada's future, but none of us must allow our optimism to overshadow the realities involved in meeting economic changes that are taking place around us. The pace of economic changes has greatly accelerated in recent times and is likely to become even more rapid in the years just ahead.

The people of the Western world who are in the great industrial areas, have no inherent qualities of invention and enterprise which do not belong to those of many other parts of the world. Evidence of that has already been revealed in Japan and other sections of the East. With the great upsurge the world over for educational and social advancement, which can only come with more widespread employment through industry, the industrialized countries have to meet the new situation co-operatively, and not through aloofness. If we in Canada, and, I might add, our neighbours in the United States also, try to throw shields of protection around ourselves rather than open our arms to join in these world-wide economic changes, we shall go down by ourselves as others go up together in this changing world. Do not let us forget either that Canada's greater dependence on foreign trade makes us far more vulnerable in these matters than is the United States. Canada could slip faster and further than the United States could.

Before finishing this talk on the congress I would like to refer to our host country. We were wonderfully well received socially and helped officially in Australia, as well as in New Zealand, where we visited for a few days. At every turn we found the Canadian Government representatives most useful and they gave us every evidence that they are doing a very efficient job in the interests of Canada.

Australia is the third largest commonwealth market for Canada and the seventh largest market in the world for Canadian goods. In 1959 Canada's exports to Australia amounted to $54 million, which was an increase of $2 million over 1958. Canada's imports from Australia in that year amounted to about $33 million. It was interesting that just prior to the congress meetings Canada and Australia had entered into a trade agreement which provides for mutual concessions. The previous agreement was made in 1931, which, of course, was outdated. The new agreement provides for greater facilities for importing and exporting, which I trust will result in increasing the volume of trade with that country. At this time there is a delegation of 36 leading Australian businessmen in Toronto for the purpose of promoting trade between their country and ours. I hope as they extend their visit throughout the dominion they will receive the same warm hospitality and co-operation as we received in their country.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Léon Méthot moved the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to extend the effective date of the Export and Import Permits Act beyond July 31, 1960 to July 31, 1963, and at the same time amend references in the act which have been superseded by other legislation since the act was last before Parliament.

The present act was passed originally in 1954 and was extended in 1957 to the present expiry date. Control over exports of arms and ammunition and other strategic materials has been in force continuously since the war.

The necessity for continuing this legislation is a matter of regret. However, in the present world situation the Government must retain powers of control over exports from Canada of arms, ammunition, implements of war, atomic energy materials and other strategic materials. Retention of these powers of control is essential for the protection of Canada's security interests and those of our allies and other friendly governments.

The Export and Import Permits Act provides authority to the Governor in Council to control exports of strategic materials and military equipment by establishing an export control list. Export of any item on this list requires an export permit. These controls cover shipments to all destinations, including the United States of America, when specified in the export control list. When not so specified, permits are required for all destinations other than the United States of America with whom mutual arrangements exist to respect each other's export control policies and to prevent evasion of export controls by unauthorized shipments.

Under the act, authority also exists to control the export of any commodity where this is deemed necessary to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment or to ensure the adequate supply and distribution of commodities within Canada for defence or other needs.

The act also provides authorities to establish an area control list. Exports to any country named in this list may only be made under permit. This area control list includes all countries of the Sino-Soviet bloc.

Section 26 of the act provides that a report of the operations under this legislation must be prepared and tabled as soon as possible after December 31. The report for the calendar year 1959 has been tabled and is available to honourable senators.

The act also provides for control of imports for certain specified purposes. Commodities so affected are those which involve the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act and the Agricultural Products Board Act.

The act also provides for control of imports when a commodity is subject to an intergovernmental arrangement aimed at ensuring the best possible supply and distribution of such commodities in accordance with the needs of Canada. This control was of importance when exports of tin from the U.S.S.R. were threatening the International Tin Agreement. This control was removed on March 12, 1959, when an understanding was reached between the International Tin Council and the U.S.S.R., under which the U.S.S.R. undertook to limit shipments to Western markets to acceptable quotas.

Every effort is made to minimize inconveniences for exporters and importers under this act. Administrative procedures are simplified from time to time through the issuance of general export permits and general import permits, which eliminate the necessity of making individual applications for each shipment. The closest attention is given to suggestions received from businessmen and trade associations which seek to simplify procedures. All details regarding individual transactions are treated as strictly confidential between exporters and the control authorities.

The list of strategic materials is revised as conditions permit. Over the years this list has been substantially reduced. The objective is always to keep the export control list to the minimum commensurate with the needs of Canada's security. Machinery for consultation among the nations of the free world has been devised to define what is to be regarded as strategic, and therefore subject to control. Regular intergovernmental consultations are held with our allies to ensure that there are no differences in control policies and that our fundamental security interests are protected.

Honourable senators, I presume this bill will be referred to a committee, perhaps the Canadian Trade Relations Committee, where further explanations can be given.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask what are the main items that are now under control?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: I have not the list of what is controlled. All these matters can be explained in committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I draw to the attention of the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Méthot) the fact that previous bills to amend this act have been referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. It occurs to me that it might be preferable to refer this bill to the same committee, since it is familiar with the act.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that there is no control over exports to the United States, but that there is control over exports to every other country, including commonwealth countries?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: In the list the United States is included.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: That applies to strategic goods?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: But as to arms, did the honourable gentleman say that the United States is the only country as regards which no export control is exercised?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: I understand it is already settled by mutual agreement.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: For instance, is there export control in regard to Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: But not to the United States? Is that new?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: No. I think there was a mutual agreement with the United States, and it is not new.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: It may always have been in the legislation, I do not know, but it seems rather strange to me that in regard to arms we should require control over export to the commonwealth but not over export to the United States, and I was wondering if that was a new development.

Hon. Mr. Méthot: No, it is not new.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Méthot) if the features he outlined this evening were not all in the old measure?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: Yes, they were.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Are there any new features introduced in the new measure that were not passed in 1957?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: No. The bill extends the date of expiring of the act from 1960 to 1963.

Hon. Mr. Wall: May I ask one minor question? There seems to be an anomaly to this bill. Probably there is an explanation for it. According to section 1, dealing with import controls, we are now giving statutory power to the Governor in Council to implement any action taken under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, which replaced the Agricultural Prices Support Act that was referred to in the 1957 amendment. My question is this: In the meantime has there been any control of imports under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and if so under what statutory authority did that take place?

Hon. Mr. Méthot: I must admit that I connot answer that question. I think there was. I suppose this bill is intended to regularize the situation. However, the explanation can be given in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Méthot, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 11 the adjourned debate on motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), who adjourned the debate on this motion, has graciously permitted me to speak in his place.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But not in his name.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, not in his name.

Honourable senators, there are some things that I want to direct your attention to in connection with the provisions of this bill. The bill defines and deals with the question of finance charges, and then goes on to provide that every person who carries on the business of extending credit—that is, any person who makes a practice of lending money—is guilty of an offence under this proposed legislation unless he furnishes in writing to the borrower before the transaction becomes binding a statement showing in dollars the finance charges in connection with the contemplated loan, and, as well, the lender must give on a percentage basis, expressed in terms of simple interest per annum, the relationship of those finance charges to the money advanced or to the unpaid balance.

According to the definition of "finance charges", the expression includes interest, fees, bonuses, service charges, discounts and any similar type of charge. I want to point out that the definition is a very broad one. The definition of "credit" which is proposed to be covered by the provisions of this bill is also very broad in its application. It covers, I would say, any credit transaction entered into by a person who makes it his business to engage in extending credit.

In this list of finance charges I must first point out that interest is only one of the elements that enter into that description of finance charges. Then we have fees. Now, fees, I would take it, would include legal fees for services rendered, if the loan is a mortgage transaction, in connection with the search of title, the preparation of the mortgage and of the proceedings that surround the carrying through of a mortgage transaction; and I would take it that they would include anything else that comes within the category of fees, such as valuation fees if a valuation is necessary, and things of that kind.

If you stop there for a moment and look at the scope of this bill and what is brought into it by including the word "fees" in the definition of finance charges you have the situation that every mortgage company, every lending institution, every insurance company, every pension fund that lends money, would be required to include in a statement to the borrower the amount of the legal fees and disbursements and any other fees that may be incurred, and also to give a percentage relationship of finance charges which would include those fees and disbursements expressed in terms of simple interest on an annual basis.

First of all, may I suggest to the lawyers who are members of the Senate that when a mortgage transaction is concluded one of the things that the lawyer does is to render a statement of the accounting and remit a cheque for the balance of the moneys to the borrower, so that at the time of the closing of the transaction the borrower is furnished by the solicitor in the transaction with a statement accounting for how the dollars which have been deducted from the amount of the loan which he had negotiated have been disbursed.

But be that as it may, there is a serious question in my mind as to whether legal fees, which are the obligation of the borrower, and the disbursements in connection with perfecting title in recording a mortgage, which also are obligations of the borrower—if he wishes to borrow money on security of land or improved property—as to whether those charges enter at all into a description of finance charges, if the purpose of this bill is to tell the truth in lending. I think that is a description that has been given to a bill that proceeds somewhat along the same lines and is at present standing in the United States Congress. It has been dubbed the "truth-in-lending bill", and it provides for this expression of the charges on a percentage basis by way of simple interest.

First, my objection to the inclusion of the word "fees" is that it is not necessary; it serves no useful purpose to bring within the scope of this proposed legislation every lending institution in Canada at the present time which would come under this bill. To the extent that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation makes loans, notwithstanding the statement which is furnished showing how the moneys have been expended, it would be required to sit down and try to make a percentage calculation.

Now, it may seem an easy thing to make a percentage calculation expressed in terms of simple interest. I would have thought that if a borrower is told how many dollars the loan is going to cost him he has enough information for his purposes. If the cost in dollars is substantial, then he knows that the percentage rate expressed in terms of simple interest is going to be a very high figure too.

In this connection an interesting article appeared in the May 19 issue of the New York Times, with respect to the truth-in-lending bill in the United States, and is addressed solely to this question of trying to translate into terms of simple interest on an annual basis the facts in relation to a particular transaction. This article is based on a speech made by Senator Bennett from Utah to a public gathering, against the bill. The senator said he presented the following problem to a number of experts:

> A man buys a $20 battery on a Monday and begins payments the following Friday, his payday. He is paid every other week, so he makes four bi-weekly payments of $5 each, with payment of the $2 carrying charge two weeks later. How much simple interest does the $2 represent?
> "I asked a member of my staff, an economist, to compute it", Senator Bennett related. "He spent half an hour on it, but didn't have the formula he needed, so he referred it to the Library of Congress. After an hour's delay, the Library came up with 129.5 per cent. A professor of marketing worked on the problem and came up with 118.9 per cent. The man who posed the problem in the first place couldn't figure closer than between 110 and 130 per cent."

The article continues:

> An article in a magazine on the Douglas bill brought three additional solutions by mail, one 117.7 per cent and one 80 per cent, Senator Bennett said. A third, by a statistical expert for the Beneficial Management Corporation brought a two-page solution of 125.33 per cent.

That is to say, the problems posed in trying to translate borrowing costs into terms of simple interest are very difficult. I feel very strongly that if the borrower is told the cost in dollars he has enough information. And to strengthen that, may I point out that at the present time there is in the Revised Statutes of Alberta a statute called An Act respecting agreements relating to sales on time and to cash loans. In that act there are the two requirements which are in the bill before us, but instead of being joined by "and", making it compulsory that you should tell not only the cost in dollars but also the percentage relationship expressed in terms of simple interest, they are joined by "or". In other words, the statute of the province of Alberta, which in a more detailed way resembles the bill which my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has proposed, indicates that the authorities in that province, in their experience, have seen fit to say you must furnish either the cost in dollars or the percentage basis of the cost expressed in terms of simple interest.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is the reference to the statute?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The Credit and Loan Agreements Act, Revised Statutes of Alberta, chapter 66.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the Alberta act there are many exceptions which my friend has not seen fit to include in his bill. In the main the act deals with two types of transactions, one called "Time Sale Agreements", and the other called "Loan Agreements". The Loan Agreements part in the statute deals with loan transactions from which are excluded a whole variety of transactions. Section 6 thereof excludes the following:

(a) loans made by banks incorporated under the Bank Act (Canada),
(b) loans made to a manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler or retailer in the course of his business and upon the security of his stock or inventory or any part thereof,
(c) loans repayable in one or more payments on which the whole cost of the loan to the borrower is expressed as a rate per centum per annum on the amount actually advanced to the borrower and declining balances thereof from time to time outstanding, if no other charges of any kind are to be paid by the borrower,
(d) loans made under or subject to the Small Loans Act (Canada),
(e) loans made by treasury branches established under The Treasury Branches Act,
(f) loans made by credit unions incorporated by or under statutory authority,
(g) loans made solely upon the security of real property,
(h) loans made by pawnbrokers in the ordinary course of their business, or
(i) loans made on the security of commercial property.

Then it goes on to stipulate the requirements to be furnished in connection with any loan agreement. There you have the provision in the alternative for furnishing either the dollars cost of loan or the cost on a percentage basis.

The Time Sale Agreements part has many exclusions as well. "Time Sale" means,

...a sale or an agreement to sell whereby the purchase price and charges in addition to the purchase price, if any, are to be paid within a fixed period by three or more payments any one of which does not equal the full amount first owing by the buyer on the sale or the agreement to sell...

And there are a number of exclusions in the Time Sale Agreements part, in the field of manufacturer, distributor and wholesaler. Also, the Time Sale Agreements do not apply to sales for an amount less than $100.

I cite the Alberta legislation to indicate first the approach to the matter in Alberta; secondly, that it is provincial legislation which has not been challenged by federal authority; and thirdly, that Alberta has seen fit to restrict in a very practical sort of way the application of the statute to an area, which would be a relatively small area when one considers all the exclusions, where there might be something less than the "truth in lending" told by a lender to a borrower under certain conditions.

Some other provinces of Canada have similar legislation. Ontario has what is called The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, R.S.O., 1950, chapter 402. Under that act there is machinery for questioning the reasonableness of any transaction, and the language is quite broad. Section 2 of that act provides:

2. Where in respect of money lent, the court finds that having regard to the risk and to all the circumstances the cost of the loan is excessive and that the transaction is harsh and unconscionable the court may,
(a) re-open the transaction and take an account between the creditor and the debtor;
(b) notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account or any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and create a new obligation, re-open any account already taken and relieve the debtor from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of the principal and the cost of the loan;
(c) order the creditor to repay any such excess if the same has been paid or allowed on account by the debtor;
(d) set aside either wholly or in part or revise or alter any security given or agreement made in respect of the money lent, and, if the creditor has parted with the security, order him to indemnify the debtor...

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does the honourable gentleman know when that act was passed?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, as a separate statute in the province of Ontario, was enacted, I think, in the year 1938. Prior to that time it had been included in a larger statute of Ontario called the Money-Lenders Act. At or about the time when the small loans legislation was brought in by the federal Parliament the provisions which formed Part II of the Money-Lenders Act in Ontario, which is quite an old statute, were lifted and put into a separate statute called the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, and many of the provisions in the Money-Lenders Act were dropped.

Recently another statute was passed in Ontario which becomes operative on July 1 of this year, which is entitled An Act to provide for the registration of mortgage brokers. Under that statute there are provisions for licensing. It contains this provision:

Where upon a statement made under oath it appears probable to the superintendent...

that is, the Superintendent of Insurance in Ontario.

...that any person has
(a) contravened this act or the Criminal Code (Canada) in connection with his business as a mortgage broker; or...

And this is significant.

... (b) by any false, misleading or deceptive statement or advertisement, representation or promise, or by any dishonest concealment of material facts induced or attempted to induce any person to borrow money or to be responsible for the repayment thereof or to agree to the terms of any transaction with respect to money lent on the security of a mortgage ...

the superintendent is armed with the authority to conduct an investigation, and he has all the usual powers pertinent thereto, such as for summoning witnesses and taking their testimony.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Do not money lenders get around all those acts today by charging a bonus of 25 per cent and adding a clause to the mortgage to the effect that the property is such that the risk is greater than it would be in an ordinary case, in which event the borrower or the mortgagor agrees to pay a bonus of 25 per cent? How could such lenders be prosecuted under these acts?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: First of all, my friend has posed a question to me which I propose to deal with shortly anyway. I assume my friend was following me when I read the provisions of the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act to the effect that no matter what is written into a mortgage, or any other document evidencing a loan, there is still power for the courts to review the transaction. If the transaction appears to be unreasonable, harsh and unconscionable the court can set the transaction aside.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What power has the superintendent?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The superintendent can, first of all, suspend or cancel a licence of the broker so that he is out of business.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I have not seen the act. Can he deal with the transaction itself?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, his power is with respect to licensing.

It is significant, too, that there are provisions in this Ontario statute excluding corporations registered under the Insurance Act, the Loan and Trust Corporations Act or the Investment Contracts Act, the banks under the Bank Act, credit unions, non-resident insurance companies lending on the security of first mortgages or acquiring first mortgages of Ontario real estate by virtue of a licence in mortmain.

May I continue to show how the field is covered by the present legislation, and then I propose to make the point which I intend to make in relation to this bill.

We have two acts of the federal Parliament which deal with this exact situation in various ways. We have the Interest Act, which is Chapter 156 of the Revised Statutes of Canada (1952). Section 4 of that statute deals with all sorts of lending transactions other than transactions where a loan is made on real estate. It reads:

Except as to mortgages on real estate, whenever any interest is, by the terms of any written or printed contract, whether under seal or not, made payable at a rate or percentage per day, week, month, or at any rate or percentage for any period less than a year, no interest exceeding the rate or percentage of five per cent per annum shall be chargeable, payable or recoverable on any part of the principal money unless the contract contains an express statement of the yearly rate or percentage of interest to which such other rate or percentage is equivalent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That does not take into account bonuses or fees.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Or service charges.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is what we are talking about.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend, the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Croll) in his description or definition of finance charges has included interest, fees and bonuses. Let me make a progression. My friend took more than five minutes to explain it. Surely I may move along progressively.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, take all evening.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not need to.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: This is a good speech.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Section 6 of the Interest Act contains the provisions dealing with mortgage transactions. It reads:

Whenever any principal money or interest secured by mortgage of real estate is, by the same, made payable on the sinking fund plan, or on any plan under which the payments of principal money and interest are blended, or on any plan that involves an allowance of interest on stipulated repayments, no interest whatever shall be chargeable, payable or recoverable, on any part of the principal money advanced, unless the mortgage contains a statement showing the amount of such principal money and the rate of interest chargeable thereon, calculated yearly or half-yearly, not in advance.

So that in the Interest Act you have provisions covering both kinds of transactions. That is, you have a section which deals with interest in relation to mortgage transactions, and another section which deals with interest in relation to all other borrowing transactions. It will be noted that section 6 of the Interest Act deals with one circumstance where there are blended payments of principal and interest. That is a situation which occurs where you have mortgages drawn up for a principal amount and a lesser amount is advanced, and a rate of interest of 6 or 6½ per cent is stated. In those circumstances, when repayments are being made, there are blended payments of principal and interest, because, I think my friend would agree with me, even a bonus in those circumstances would have the characteristics of being a payment for the use of that money and would take on the broad character of interest.

In Ontario, and I would expect elsewhere in Canada, bonuses are becoming more the style of the day than they have been for a great many years, certainly since 1940. In the period from 1920 to about 1930 bonuses were quite a common thing. And you will find in mortgages which are drawn in Ontario today by those who have any familiarity with the provisions of the Interest Act that there is a clause added at the end of the mortgage which stipulates the amount of money actually advanced and the rate of interest.

What the courts do is another thing, of course. We have had a lot of such cases in Canada, and many of them go back to the twenties when bonuses were quite common. We have the Supreme Court of Canada drawing a line and, in effect, saying this: If a mortgage is drawn for $15,000 with interest at 7 per cent, the lender advances to the borrower $15,000 and the borrower immediately pays to the lender $3,000, that transaction is outside the prohibition contained in section 6. It does not matter whether you agree with the reasoning or not. It is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and the basis on which the judgment proceeded seemed to be along this line. Since the full amount of money was advanced, there was no security taken in relation to that bonus of $3,000 which was subsequently paid, and therefore it is outside the scope of section 6. It is an agreement to pay that $3,000 and it exists separate and apart from any mortgage on real estate, and would be enforceable as such separate and apart from any mortgage on real estate. I have explained the decision as best I can for you, and in the circumstances my own view would not be important.

We have another federal statute which deals with this subject. It certainly covers the field up to $1,500. I refer to the Small Loans Act. The proceeding here is a little different.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Before the honourable senator proceeds on this point would he give the house the reference to the decision of the Supreme Court that he has just mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. It is London Loan v. Meagher (1930) S.C.R. p. 378. That was followed by another case in the Supreme Court of Canada, Asconi Building Corporation v. Vocisano (1947) S.C.R., p. 358. So it is not too long ago that the court again expressed its opinion.

The Small Loans Act will be found in the latest consolidation of the federal statutes, R.S.C. 1952, chapter 251. The statute was amended in 1956 and certain provisions were tightened. The range of the maximum loan was extended under the provisions dealing with the limitation on cost of loans. There the whole substance of the Small Loans Act was one of dealing with what was called the cost of the loan. Section 3 provided:

> No money-lender shall, in respect of any loan, directly or indirectly charge, exact or receive, or stipulate for the payment by the borrower of, a sum of money as a result of the payment of which the cost of the loan exceeds an amount equivalent to the amount or rate prescribed by this section . . .

Just to illustrate how it operates, one of the provisions is that the cost of a loan shall not exceed the aggregate of 2 per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance not exceeding $300.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What does the cost include?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Everything.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, my honourable friend has a right of reply.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I may as well correct my honourable friend while the time is ripe.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: While it is still fresh.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The cost of the loan includes more than what we ordinarily describe as interest.

As a matter of fact, coming to the next point, since my honourable friend has made the interruption, when the Small Loans Act was being considered, in 1938, and when it became law, doubts were expressed as to the constitutionality or authority of the federal Parliament to enact legislation of this kind. In the course of committee hearings before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce of the House of Commons in June 1938, Mr. F. P. Varcoe, K.C., of the Department of Justice, gave his opinion. If I may I would like to quote that opinion, which indicated that the cost of a loan extends to include more than what is encompassed by the simple word "interest". I quote from the committee report:

> With a view of determining the matter of jurisdiction, the committee asked for an expression of opinion from the Department of Justice and were advised by Mr. F. P. Varcoe, K. C., as follows:
> First: That a project for the regulation of money lenders which would fall short of complete control would probably be inadequate and almost useless.
> Secondly: That the department concluded to advise the committee as to the powers of Parliament by reference to a feasible project as follows:—
> No sum in excess of X per cent of the principal sum loaned shall be exacted from the borrower as:—

1. Interest, that is to say, compensation for the use of money and for the risk of its total or partial loss; and
2. Service charges, whether genuine or interest disguised as such; and
3. Disbursements, real or fictitious; and any sum exacted in excess of such per cent shall be deemed oppressive and usurious, exposing the lender to criminal proceedings and invalidating the contract.

The opinion proceeds on this basis:

Dealing with items of charge mentioned in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3,—

—I have just read them: interest, service charges, disbursements, real or fictitious—Mr. Varcoe says:

The differentiation between true interest charges and service charges is so difficult (they are in many cases probably indistinguishable) and the possibility of disguising interest as other charges is so great that it becomes indispensably or reasonably necessary to regulate or fix these charges in order to make good the interest restriction and there appears to be no reason why the ancillary doctrine may not be relied on notwithstanding that the restriction of the rate of interest and the ancillary restriction of the service charges are contained in one and the same restrictive regulation.

Further, the principal ingredients in the gross sum charged the borrower is interest and if parliament fixes a maximum gross charge, it must be presumed that if the sum is exceeded an excessive interest charge is being made; therefore, the fixing of a gross maximum charge constitutes a limitation of the rate of interest.

The imposition of a gross maximum charge would have this effect, that in each case the interest ingredient therein would be fixed by reference to the other ingredients. It is arguable that by this means there would be a fixing of the interest charged in each case.

Then again, it is to be borne in mind that interest is not only compensation for the use of money but also compensation for accepting the risk of loss. The service charges, for example chattel mortgage expenses, are, theoretically at any rate, made to protect the lender against loss. Parliament, therefore, in restricting certain of the charges which the lender can make against the borrower is limiting the compensation for accepting the risk of loss and so is legislating in relation to interest or at the worst is enacting legislation necessarily ancillary to interest legislation.

He goes on to deal with other aspects, but that is the one aspect I am concerned with at the moment. The Small Loans Act became law, and we have the limitation contained in the Small Loans Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Was it constitutional?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: His opinion was that it was constitutional, because it rested upon the substantial basis that interest was the matter of substance that was being dealt with in the legislation, and interest belonged exclusively to the federal authority under the provisions of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This bill will be constitutional also?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I thank my friend for the interruption, and I will depart from my order of presentation to make the answer that in my opinion this bill is not constitutional, for the very reason that it does not deal in any substantial way at all with the subject of interest. Interest is one item in an enumeration of many items. The bill is wholly procedural. I would say that the bill would not be constitutional even on the basis that it is good criminal law. If there is any substance in this proposed bill at all it is simply to require the furnishing of certain information in writing according to a certain form. It does not affect or deal with interest, or the limitation or conditions under which interest may be charged and the conditions you have to satisfy in the charging of interest. The bill simply says that before the transaction becomes effective you must report in writing what is the cost in borrowing and express it in simple interest.

May I come back to where I was proceeding when the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) interrupted? He knows that as far as I am concerned he is perfectly free to interrupt. We had that agreement a long time ago. I exercise that privilege from time to time. He may exercise it a little more than I do, because he clashes with my constitutional feelings more often than I do with his.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: More openings!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, put it this way, that my friend thinks he sees more openings. I can assure him that I hope that in any statement I present he will find it terribly hard to make any openings.

In this field, then, we have a variety of legislation at the provincial level, as I have indicated. In the federal field there is the general law relating to interest, and there is the special act dealing with small loans.

Another submission I make to honourable senators is this, that so far as this bill is concerned, in my view of the law it has no application to the Small Loans Act at all, because the Small Loans Act is special legislation. This is a general bit of procedural legislation and would not in any way affect those who would be operating under and governed by the Small Loans Act. Also, in my view of the law, it would have no application to banks, because the charter of banks is found in the Bank Act, which is special legislation. Therefore, you would start by excluding from the purview of this bill any transactions which are provided for under the Bank Act and any transactions that are provided for under the Small Loans Act. When you go that far you really remove a lot of territory from the scope of this bill, but there still remains in the bill a scope—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: What about the trust companies and the mortgage companies? Do you think they are included?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In my view, the bill would extend to include a large class of operation in the first mortgage field, including reputable trust companies, life insurance companies, pension fund plans, and others in that field, where there can be no question of the borrower not being furnished with every detail of the cost of his loan. As a matter of fact, my friend made a very strong argument, when he was presenting his bill, in support of what I am contending, because a large portion of his remarks, even to the extent of quoting brief extracts from a magazine, or a house organ presented by Central Mortgage, all dealt with the field of second mortgages. Now, if my friend is satisfied with the practice in the field of trust company operation and life insurance operation, and other first mortgage lending institutions, as well as of credit unions, then the scope of the bill should be cut down so as to exclude them. In Alberta, as I have said, they have made very substantial exclusions. I pointed out that my friend has included in his bill one of the requirements of the Canada Interest Act, that is, expressing interest in a percentage per year, in relation to borrowing, other than borrowing on real estate. Therefore, that is covered by existing law. And if the answer is that, well, people don't know about it, or the lenders are not doing what they should be doing, and the borrowers are not doing anything about it, in my submission it does not do any good to pile upon a perfectly constitutional piece of legislation like the Canada Interest Act a bit of legislation such as this bill, which in my view of the law is not constitutionally sound.

Having given a résumé—and maybe of greater length than I should have done, but I felt that if I was going to deal with the subject I should do so in a broad way—may I just express my views? First of all, I think if my friend's bill were to have any acceptance at all the requirement should be in the alternative. I cannot conceive how it can possibly be said that a borrower who is told that his loan is going to cost him $150, if it is a mortage transaction of a certain type, would not have an appreciation of what that means in dollars; and when expressed in dollars I am sure he would have a better appreciation of it than when it is expressed as a percentage in terms of simple interest. Furthermore, I am also of the view that those who have recourse to borrowing of the type that we are discussing for their immediate and consumer needs are so fixed in their purpose to get those goods that they would get them in any event, even if the interest percentage was expressed at 150 per cent. I think that in a great many of these cases the philosophy is that if it is possible for us to find the means by borrowing what we desire to acquire in the way of consumer goods and to enjoy them, we are going to do it; and it may well be that when the time comes to pay for these things something will have happened so that we will be able to deal with it, and if it has not happened, well, the goods will be repossessed, but at least we have had present enjoyment rather than postponement to some future date which may never come. I think that is the philosophy you find in a lot of this type of buying to which my friend was directing his speech, to the extent that it might cover what I would call time sale transactions.

On loan transactions, mortgage loans, you have the requirements of the Canada Interest Act, under which you can collect no interest if you do not state properly the relationship of interest to the money advanced. I have indicated that there are ways of avoiding that, but there seem to be ways of avoiding any law within certain limits, I suppose, on the theory that human ingenuity devised the law and there must be equally acute human ingenuity to tackle it after it has been enacted and find ways of getting around it. The only explanation I can offer in support of what I have said is the fact that we sit here from year to year amending legislation which by experience has been found not to do the things it was intended to do, or to provide loopholes that were not intended to be provided.

Summarizing, I would say that the bill in the form in which it is, in my view, is not sufficiently thought out, that the scope is not within proper limits defined in relation to conditions as we have them. Surely it is not intended that a bill of this kind should pass into legislation under which every trust company, insurance company, lending institution and every credit union in Canada enjoying the highest standing in the community, even Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, would be required to meet the conditions of this measure. I do not think my honourable friend is suggesting that all along the line the lenders are one hundred per cent fraudulent.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You know I did not suggest that. If you had read my speech you would have noticed that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That struck fire. What I said was that I do not think my friend is suggesting that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Your tone indicated you did not mean it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend has his own private dictionary for interpreting tones, but let me say what is in my mind rather than have my friend say what he thought I meant. I say that I conclude that my honourable friend, in the course of the rather extensive way in which he developed his views of the matter in his presentation, was not suggesting that it was even a majority in the field of lending that was confusing and leading borrowers astray. I would go further, though, and say that there may well be some, but that the numbers would be very small. And if I take my friend and his protestations as seriously as he wants me to—because he rose and interrupted me—he must intend seriously to register the fact that he believes the number who impose upon borrowers is certainly substantially less, may I say, than one hundred per cent. If I may make that assumption, then I think my friend should have recognized it in his bill and made it apply to the field where abuses occur. But instead of that we have this broad bill which covers classes of lenders that should not be under legislation of this kind at all, classes of lenders who are subject to and realize they are subject to and observe the requirements of the Interest Act.

Secondly, I feel, so far as constitutionality is concerned, that accepting the opinion that Mr. Varcoe gave on the Small Loans Act as being the basic approach to constitutionality—that is, that the Small Loans Act was dealing substantially with interest, that the substance of the legislation was interest—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The pith and substance was interest.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, the pith and substance was interest. I would like to be stronger, but my innate training tells me to limit my words to my view of the law.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is the understatement of the evening.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Now, my view of the law is that it cannot be said of this bill, as Mr. Varcoe said of the Small Loans Bill, that it deals with interest, that the pith and substance of the legislation is interest. Now, the pith and substance of this legislation, whatever it is, is not interest. There is a wide enumeration of the charges, and the pith and substance of the legislation, in my submission, is simply this, that a lender must give a statement in writing to the borrower as to the cost in dollars, and the percentage relationship of that cost in dollars to the money borrowed, expressed in terms of simple interest. All you have to do is to set down the two pieces of legislation, the Small Loans Act, with Mr. Varcoe's opinion of that point, and this bill, and you will realize that Mr. Varcoe's opinion would not in any way, in my view, support the constitutionality of this bill.

Further, I say that in my view it is not good criminal law. It is an attempt to enlist the covering or the ceiling of criminal law by saying if you do not give this information you are guilty of an offence. It is an attempt to gain a purpose which is not criminal and which is not stated to be criminal, and that purpose is to have a statement in writing furnished to the borrower as to the cost. The Privy Council, in the days when it was the court of last resort, and our own Supreme Court of Canada, time after time, have refused to uphold the constitutionality of legislation which purported to be criminal law, for the very reason that this was a guise, an attempt, to bring under the ceiling of criminal law something that was entirely different. One of the leading expressions of that was in the famous oleomargarine reference to the Supreme Court of Canada in 1951 or 1952. In the minority judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada the dissenting judges based their finding on the constitutionality of that oleomargarine legislation, which prohibited the manufacture, sale and importation of margarine into Canada, on the ground that it was criminal law. The majority of the judges said it was not, and gave their reasons exactly as I have been trying to paraphrase the law. And when the matter was argued in the Privy Council their lordships gave a unanimous decision, as they do, finding that there was no basis in criminal law at all for this, that it was simply an attempt to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of this article of food which they found to be nutritious.

Let us assume that this bill becomes law, and this written information is furnished. The lenders in those cases may be giving the information, without the requirement of this statute, as to the cost in dollars, but they may not be giving it as a percentage, depending on the complications. Therefore, basically you cannot assume for the purpose of this bill that there are lenders who must be forced, under the threat of criminal law, to do the thing which not to do becomes an offence under this measure. I suggest to you it is a very small percentage of those operating in the field as money lenders who take advantage of the borrower and either mislead him or state other than what the facts are, and for those few cases I would say there is, in the variety of legislation to which I have referred this evening, ample scope for the borrower who has been "done in", if I may use that popular expression, to get redress.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY— REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, I was called out of the house at the time this order was called for consideration, and therefore was unable to proceed with it. I would ask for permission of the house to move that the report be now adopted. It will take only a few minutes to explain the amendments, and honourable senators who wish to speak on third reading of the bill will be given the opportunity to do so tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Honourable senators, the translation of the evidence taken before the committee reached our hands only late today and I would like to suggest that we be given an opportunity to study it. With the understanding that we be given the opportunity to discuss the bill, section by section on the motion for third reading, I have no objection to the report being considered now.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am quite agreeable to that suggestion.

I formally move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Vien: On division.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I wish to make one or two remarks on the motion for adoption of this report.

The committee made two amendments to the bill. The first was:

The purpose of this amendment was to make perfectly clear and certain that the proviso in section 3 of the bill applied to the whole of the act, and not to section 3 only. The amendment was made simply for greater clarification.

The second amendment read:

Page 2: After clause 5, add clause 6, as follows: "6. Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations."

When this bill was considered by the committee it was pointed out that both of the companies concerned had entered into certain contractual obligations long before this bill was ever introduced in this honourable chamber. All honourable senators who were members of the committee and present at the hearings wanted to make sure that the contractual obligations which had been entered into by the two companies, prior to the introduction of this bill in this chamber, should be preserved, and clause 6 was added so that the bill would not in any way interfere with any contractual obligations heretofore entered into by the two railway companies referred to in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would there be interference in any event?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: There might not be. Some of the witnesses contended that the bill would not interfere with the obligations, but in order that there might be no doubt whatsoever clause 6 was added.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I regret somewhat that we are dealing with this report in the way we are tonight. I am not a member of the committee which considered the bill, but I was in the house when second reading was moved and the bill was debated. I also read the evidence taken before the committee.

While I think I have a fair understanding of what goes on, in this instance I am very confused, and I had difficulty understanding what the real problem was. I had hoped that the honourable acting chairman of the committee (Hon. Harold Connolly) would be in the house, and I would have the opportunity of asking him to make a statement as to the background and to deal with the evidence. That is not possible at this time.

However, before we are asked to deal with this bill finally on third reading, I think the acting chairman of the committee should make a statement to the house in connection with the hearings before the committee, so that we may reach some reasonable conclusion.

True, I did not understand too much about the $20 million we voted on the appropriation bill tonight, but I have got in the habit of voting for such a measure anyway. I do not want to fall into the bad habit of voting for bills, other than those of a monetary nature, which I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Is money not important?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am thankful that a record was taken of the evidence before the committee and is available. As I say, I have read it, but I still have difficulty in reaching a conclusion that satisfies me. Therefore, I repeat, I think the honourable acting chairman of the committee (Hon. Harold Connolly) should make a statement before we proceed with the final step in considering the bill. I have no objection to the proposal that we adopt the report tonight.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, to be perfectly fair to the acting chairman of the committee, he may be able to add something to what has been said, but I do not know what he can say that has not already been said on second reading and was given in evidence before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You don't know the acting chairman.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am not presuming to speak for him. I know, as sponsor of the bill, there is nothing more I can add.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Brunt moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—PROPOSED AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the third reading of Bill S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I thought we were to hear from the Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications (Hon. Harold Connolly) before the bill was read the third time.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I believe it was indicated that the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) would make certain comments.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, I do not think there is much I can add to what I have already said with respect to this bill. Briefly, the bill concerns two railways, the Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited, which is a railway incorporated under the laws of the province of Newfoundland, and the Arnaud Railway Company, which is a railway incorporated under the laws of the province of Quebec. Both of these companies have to use the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway in order to transport iron ore from Wabush Lake to a wharf situated on the north shore of the St. Lawrence River, just west of Seven Islands. A rate must be fixed for the transportation of this iron ore before the Wabush Lake Railway Company can do its financing. The rate can be fixed either by negotiation or by some public body after it has heard evidence from all interested parties. The only body in Canada competent to fix a rate in a situation such as this is the Board of Transport Commissioners. However, this board cannot hear an application until the two railway companies which are referred to in the bill are brought under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, the Railway Act and the Board of Transport Commissioners. These two companies, the Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and the Arnaud Railway Company, are therefore asking in the bill to be placed under this jurisdiction, so that the Board of Transport Commissioners will be able to deal with the matter of rates.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I have had the opportunity to read the minutes of the deliberations of the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on this bill and to consider the amendment made in committee. It is obvious that a majority of the committee's members was of opinion that nothing in this act should relieve either of the companies from any of its obligations. In its present form, however, this bill does not provide what the committee had in mind, because it does not ensure that either of the companies may not be released from its obligations. There is a conflict between sections 4 and 6 of the bill. Section 4 states:

> Notwithstanding section 3, each of the companies and any corporate successor or successors thereof, in respect of their respective tolls and tariffs, and of the operation, construction, improvement, maintenance and control of all railways and railway undertakings which either of them may own or operate in Canada, shall hereafter have all the powers, rights and immunities and be subject to all the obligations provided for in the Railway Act in respect of railways and railway undertakings subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

In the copy of the section which I shall hand to Hansard I have underlined certain words.

If, under the provisions of the Railway Act, the Transport Commissioners can set aside an agreement, or change its tenor, then section 6 becomes inoperative, or in conflict with section 4. In my opinion this bill should be referred back to the committee—

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Vien: —with instructions to amend it by adding the following words at the end of section 6:

> , the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

Section 6 would then read as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations, the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

That would make it clear that, although these companies are now brought under federal jurisdiction, neither of them can be released from their contractual obligations. That was clearly the intent of the committee, as appears from a glance at section 6. Section 35 of the Railway Act gives the board jurisdiction to deal freely with complaints concerning the violation of agreements. That section reads as follows:

> Where it is complained by or on behalf of the Crown or any municipal or other corporation or any other person aggrieved, that the company has violated or committed a breach of an agreement between the complainant and the company—or by the company that any such corporation or person has violated or committed a breach of an agreement between the company and such corporation or person—for the provision, construction, reconstruction, alteration, installation, operation, use or maintenance by the company, of by such corporation or person, of the railway or of any line of railway intended to be operated in connection with or as part of the railway, or of any structure, appliance, equipment, works, renewals or repairs upon or in connection with the railway, the board shall hear all matters relating to such alleged violation or breach, and shall make such order as to the board may seem reasonable and expedient, and in such order may, in its discretion, direct the company, or such corporation or person, to do such things as are necessary for the proper fulfilment of such agreement, or to refrain from doing such acts as constitute a violation or a breach thereof.

Therefore, unless we add the words I have suggested, section 6 as recommended by the committee would be meaningless.

Honourable senators, I therefore move, seconded by the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert), that section 6 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

> , the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The clause which the honourable senator has just read from the Railway Act seems to give to the Board of Transport Commissioners power to make a reasonable decision in the case of a dispute between parties with respect to contractual obligations. This amendment takes from the Board of Transport Commissioners the power that Parliament has given it in that respect. The amendment provides that no contractual obligations shall be interfered with, notwithstanding what the Railway Act has done in giving certain powers to the board. Now, would this amendment go so far as to alter that situation and prevent interference with contractual obligations, irrespective of any order of the Board of Transport Commissioners?

Hon. Mr. Vien: I think so, and it was for that purpose that I moved the amendment. There was a strong suspicion in committee that these two companies were coming to Parliament to relieve themselves of contractual obligations. If we pass this legislation these companies could go to the Board of Transport Commissioners and obtain orders relieving them of their contractual obligations. The committee was emphatic against that. Contractual obligations should be respected. We should not provide any method for interfering with them. Under the guise of declaring these railways "works for the general advantage of Canada" the promoters of this bill are asking us to enact legislation which would have the effect of relieving them of obligations which they have willingly assumed. The purpose of the amendment, which the committee made by adding section 6, was clearly to prevent that.

My contention is that the committee's amendment does not accomplish what the committee intended to do; it does not go far enough, and it causes sections 3, 4 and 6 to conflict. A subcommittee was appointed to consider this bill; I was a member thereof. We struck out of section 3 the words "herein contained", because they might be construed as meaning "nothing in section 3 contained". The subcommittee agreed that section 3 should be amended to read, "Nothing in this act", but section 4 says, "Notwithstanding section 3". So there is a contradiction between section 3 and 4, and another contradiction in section 6, which has been added, and which reads:

Nothing in this act shall relieve either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations.

If, under section 4, we make the Railway Act applicable, then the Board of Transport Commissioners will not be bound to take contractual obligations into account. The commissioners have discretionary powers to take them into account or to brush them aside, and they may make in the premises any order that may commend itself to their good judgment. But if we add the words that I have suggested, "the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding", it becomes abundantly clear that neither the Board of Transport Commissioners nor any other body could relieve the companies from their obligations.

Hon. Mr. Monette: From their contractual obligations.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Yes, from their obligations contracted under any agreements with respect to through rates or running rights, etc. Some of these agreements have not yet been drafted in legal form, but they have been agreed to, in principle and in writing.

Under section 333 of the Railway Act the board has full power to prescribe tariffs and rates. Well, if under signed agreements there is a contractual obligation to accept certain through rates or certain stipulations with respect to running rights, upon application or of its own motion the board could set them aside and, as the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) said a minute ago, could prescribe rates which in its opinion are fair and reasonable.

Let us be careful before we enact legislation which might in effect set aside contractual obligations. My amendment would simply make this abundantly clear.

Hon. Mr. White: Honourable senators, I move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Monette: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to put a question to the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien)? Are the contractual obligations that are referred to existing obligations, or obligations of the past that may have already been discharged by an act of Parliament? The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) mentioned, if I am not mistaken, that this suggested amendment to section 6 might affect contractual obligations of the past which by prior acts of Parliament had been released. I should like to ask if the amendment would not meet the honourable senator's point if it read:

Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations existing at the time of the enactment of this bill.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the honourable gentleman who moved adjournment of the debate (Hon. Mr. White) to say just a word?

We in this chamber are deeply concerned with regard to contractual obligations. We support the enforcement of law in that regard, but it is one thing to be concerned about contractual obligations, and another thing to bow down to them as a fetish. English law has never done that. English law has always held the principles of equity to be superior to those of common law. Our mortgage law came into being by an equitable modification of the strict construction of a common law contract. All through the ages we have been careful that a contractual obligation be not excessively oppressive on anyone. We have set aside contractual obligations when they have been oppressive. For instance, we will not enforce a contract of employment that is unreasonable, excessive or oppressive. There are many illustrations which I might give had I time to think of them.

As the honourable senator has said, the very purpose of this amendment is to take from the Board of Transport Commissioners the powers that apply in all other cases, under all circumstances, to enforce the principles of equity with regard to contractual obligations. The same argument might be made with regard to every railway and every contractual obligation that has been entered into either prior or subsequent to our giving to the Board of Transport Commissioners the powers that we have given it.

I agree with the honourable senator that this bill might well be referred back to the committee for further study, but in doing so I would say that one should hold clearly in mind the balance between the desirability of upholding contractual obligations and the equal desirability of not pulling the teeth of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The general powers which we have given to that board were for salutary purposes and good reason, and we should be careful not to take away those powers.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before putting the motion for adjournment of the debate I shall put the question on the amendment.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Vien, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lambert, that section 6 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

, the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No.

On motion of Hon. Mr. White, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, I propose to speak very briefly on this bill today. Last evening the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) gave us a very able and informative speech on the bill, in which he covered a great deal of the legislation dealing with this particular subject. However, he did overlook reference to one act, to which I shall refer at the commencement of my remarks. It is known as the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, R.S.O. (1950), chapter 402.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my friend permit me to draw his attention to the fact that I not only referred to the act, but I gave the citation and read some sections from it?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am sorry. I apparently overlooked it. You dealt with section 2?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As a matter of fact, I asked when the act was passed.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I overlooked that completely.

I understand that some recent amendments have been made to the act. Did my honourable friend cover those?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Unfortunately, I have not been able to get hold of the amendments.

Section 3(a) of the bill before us requires that the lender of money shall furnish to the borrower a clear statement in writing setting forth the total amount of the finance charges to be borne by the borrower in connection with the transaction. I think everyone will agree that this is a simple thing to do, and can be done. It is with respect to paragraph (b) of that section that disputes may arise, on the calculation to be made as to the true rate of interest. However, for the purpose of my remarks this afternoon I am willing to concede that it is a simple thing to work out the actual and true rate of interest, taking into consideration all the items enumerated in the bill. That being the case, I would like to look at an actual transaction that might take place if this bill became law.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Did the honourable senator say it is a simple thing to comply with this paragraph?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I said let us assume that it can be done quite easily and simply without arguing about this particular paragraph, let us assume that it is not going to be difficult to deal with its provisions. Let us take an example of a borrower who goes to a lender and obtains a loan on which there are finance charges, discount insurance, bonuses and everything else included in this category; the loan is made, the borrower signs an agreement to repay it, takes his money, and leaves. But the lender, through an oversight, or perhaps because he is busy, neglects to give the borrower the two statements referred to in this bill. What happens then?

The first payment becomes due, the borrower cannot meet it and he consults a solicitor. The solicitor looks at this act and advises that in his opinion the lender is guilty of an offence. The borrower then goes to a Justice of the Peace and lays a charge. Now, I do not know what the penalty will be under this section. It will be either a fine or a jail term. Let us assume the lender is fined for not having complied with the provisions of section 3. That is the first penalty to which he is subject.

The solicitor then looks at section 4 and advises the borrower that he does not have to pay any of the finance charges. He looks still further at section 4 and asks the borrower, "You owe considerable money under this agreement?" The borrower agrees that he does. The solicitor then advises him that he is relieved from paying the balance owing.

In my opinion this proposed legislation is loaded against the lenders of this country, and I do not think they should be treated in this manner. If the bill provided that a borrower must pay back the actual sum that was advanced, there would be some equity to it; but I fail to see either equity or fairness if, because of failure to provide the statements to the borrower, the lender is fined, is then prevented from collecting any of the finance and other charges, and is also unable to collect any balance owing of the moneys actually advanced.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. Surely it is only the finance charges that he cannot collect. He can collect the principal.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: What about the words, " . . . shall not be entitled to recover . . . any finance charges whatsoever on the outstanding principal or unpaid balance under the transaction"?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is, finance charges on the unpaid balance.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The bill uses the words —"or unpaid balance".

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I was reading it differently from my honourable friend. I thought it was conjunctive and to the effect that the person in the business of extending credit cannot recover any finance charges whatsoever on the outstanding principal obligation or on the unpaid balance.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, he cannot recover the unpaid balance. That is my interpretation of section 4. I may be wrong in my interpretation, but on that interpretation I think the bill is altogether too severe.

There is another feature of the bill which I do not like. Many arguments could arise as to whether or not the lender gave to the borrower the statements required by section 3. If the bill complied with the provincial legislation and had required a statement to be filed in the county or district courts in a manner similar to that in which conditional sales agreements or chattel mortgages and bills of sale are filed, then no argument could arise, since the filing would be notice. Any person obtaining a loan would know that the statements required by section 3 were filed with the clerk of the county or the district court and could go there and see the statements. Under this bill there will be no end of arguments and litigation.

In view of all of this, I regret that I shall not be able to support my honourable friend's bill.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 423 to 433, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, reports adopted.

IMMIGRATION

WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION TO DIRECT COMMITTEE TO REVIEW DEPARTMENT'S ANNUAL REPORT

On the Order:

Resuming the postponed debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Wall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

That the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour be authorized and directed to review the Annual Report of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, excluding that portion of the Report which deals with the Indian Affairs Branch; and

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.—(Honourable Senator White).

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, it is my intention to ask for the consent of the honourable members of this house to my withdrawal of the motion standing in my name, but before I commit myself formally to this request I feel I should make a few remarks, if I may be permitted that privilege.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Without going into any lengthy explanation of the sequence of events which began with my giving notice of this motion on March 1, and proceeding with its formal introduction on March 22, I feel I should say that I was ready to proceed with it at a much earlier date, but in a spirit of friendly co-operation I waited for action to be taken on the manpower study suggestion which was made on March 8, and supported on March 9 by various members of this house. In other words, I voluntarily withheld the presentation of my motion in anticipation of a reasonably speedy introduction of a Government-sponsored resolution calling for a manpower study.

On March 22 I decided to introduce my motion, and at that time I made reference to the fact that I had heard that the matter of a manpower study was under advisement. It was at this point, honourable senators, that the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) interjected with the first recorded commitment that such a study was under advisement, but no more than that.

Reference has been made to the fact that I had indicated my willingness to withdraw my motion if there was assurance that the manpower study would be set up. This is substantially correct, but my assurance was really couched in more cautious terms. I would refer honourable senators to page 386 of Hansard, and especially to the words:

> ... and if there were additional assurances that the terms of reference for this study would be broad and flexible enough to include some consideration of our present immigration policy, together with its administrative practices and procedures.

However—and we must remember that this was on March 22—I observed further that I felt my motion merited our attention and support even if the manpower study was to be organized. And at that time I explained that a study specifically directed to the problem areas in immigration and citizenship would give these matters more thorough attention than might be possible in a general manpower study. I still believe this to be so, and I am not so naïve as to think that immigration problems will play much part in the manpower study which we are undertaking. However, time will tell, and I am willing to learn.

We have now adopted the resolution for a manpower and employment study. Although I regret very much what I consider to be an unnecessary and an unfortunate lapse of time in bringing this motion forward, I recognize that a well-organized study of manpower will be, for us, a major undertaking to which we must bend our very best efforts, because the subject-matter is of tremendous importance to all Canadians. I have already expressed in general terms my advance support of a motion to get a manpower study underway, and I should not like to be held responsible for anything which might interfere with its success. I must confess that I, for one, feel that the best we can do during the present session is to make a reasonably good beginning, for its projected scope must be adjudicated in the context of the legislative work that still awaits us in the next couple of months, and in the context of the work of the Special Committee on Land Use, the Joint Committee on Indian Affairs, the Standing Committee on Divorce, and the Standing Committee on External Affairs, which is still to deal with a very comprehensive reference presented by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) and agreed to by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit me to ask a question.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would he not agree that any worth-while study of Canada's manpower employment situation would have to embrace the subject of immigration?

Hon. Mr. Wall: I would agree with the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) that immigration, in terms of manpower and its relationship to the labour force, will play a part in the study that the special committee on manpower and employment will undertake, but I do not think—and I stand to be corrected—that the manpower and employment study can enter into many of the problem areas of immigration that are bothering people at the present time.

I want to bring to the attention of the house a newspaper report which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Friday, May 20, under the heading "Shelve Immigration Act Changes". The story says that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the department are now ostensibly ready to present a complete revision of the Immigration Act, as was pledged by the Prime Minister in the 1957 election campaign, but that the decision to present this new legislation, which has been ready and awaiting enactment for several months, has been shelved temporarily by what the newspaper story describes as a cabinet decision. I do not know whether this story is accurate but if it is, then it means that much of the departmental thinking has jelled into what are really legislative amendments, and in this context it appears that a study of immigration problems would have been a very fortuitous thing.

I would also point out that the honourable Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, speaking in Toronto on April 30 of this year, said that she had many suggestions to make concerning the Immigration Act. She went on to say:

> I know that many have been pressing for a revision of this legislation and that such revision is indeed imperative.
> All I can say at the moment, however, is that the whole immigration policy is being studied most exhaustively and I hope before too long to be in a position to recommend changes in the Immigration Act and Regulations.

I am drawing these two matters to the attention of honourable senators because, although I am going to withdraw the motion, I do feel there is a very important service that can be provided by a Senate committee through a study of various immigration problems—not as a departmental study but as the kind of study that is best undertaken by a Senate committee. As I pointed out when I introduced the motion, this kind of review was very well performed several years ago by our Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour. I want to suggest that this same committee be asked to perform this task once again. Under present circumstances, however, perhaps we should wait until after the commencement of the next session of Parliament. At that time we may have the benefits of the departmental study I referred to and about which the minister spoke. At that time, too, the new Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will have had an opportunity to become better acquainted with the problems upon which we may wish to seek his advice.

Honourable senators, in conclusion may I say that I continue to believe in the importance and the value of a separate Senate review of the problems connected with immigration and citizenship; and although I am prepared to yield and withdraw my motion at this time, for the reasons I have indicated, I hope to be able to submit a motion of a similar substantive content at the beginning of the next session of Parliament, unless, of course, some other honourable member or the Government wishes to undertake this very worth-while task.

Honourable senators, with the consent of the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) and with the approval of the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson), who supported me so generously in this whole idea, I ask for leave to withdraw the motion now standing in my name.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 12, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Cameron, who called attention to Canada's Centennial Year 1967 and suggested "that appropriate steps be taken to mobilize the resources of governmental and non-governmental agencies in making this celebration an occasion to mark the achievements of the past and to plot a course for the future".

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I rise with some hesitation because what I have to say deals with principles, rather than with the organization being set up for the celebration of the Centenary of Confederation.

I listened with great interest to the speech of my friend from Alberta (Hon. Mr. Cameron), and I agree with the idea that the centenary of the Canadian Confederation should be commemorated in some tangible fashion. However, after the developments which have taken place during the last few weeks all over the world I wondered if we were not forgetting something. We want to hold impressive celebrations, we want to build in each province universities and institutions of higher learning, we want to give scholarships to our students and bursaries to our professors, our scientists and many other things. But of what use will all those advantages be if there does not exist within our Canadian Confederation a spirit of true co-operation between all its citizens and, especially, between the two communities forming the greater majority of the Canadian people—I mean the English-speaking Canadians and the French-speaking Canadians?

Unfortunately, such co-operation is entirely lacking in some sectors; not only does it not exist, but steps are taken in some quarters to prevent it from ever existing. In those sectors, there is an ostentatious determination to dominate on the part of the majority who say to the minority: "You must submit"! At the other end, we find among the minority certain fanatical individuals trying to promote a spirit of division, I would even go so far as to call it a spirit of hatred, based on the arrogance of a few.

Now, what is the use of all these preparations and demonstrations, if, in seven years' time, we discover that the nation is suffering from a division that can only be harmful to our country and prevent it from developing and growing as it should?

Some people imagine that the province of Quebec would like to dominate the whole country. Nothing could be further removed from the truth and the facts are there to prove it.

If that were so, how is it that in the city of Quebec, for instance, where more than 90 per cent of the population is French-speaking, companies directed by English-speaking Canadians or by Americans can do so well and expand as they do? And if you take the province as a whole, how could the large corporations established therein grow, develop and prosper?

Tell me, is there any province in Canada where the allotment of tax proceeds, from the point of view of schools, is handled with as much justice and fairness? If the other provinces did likewise, a great step would be taken to promote harmonious relations in our country.

The province of Quebec has no monopoly on fanaticism. I wonder if I should give a few examples. Here are a few which have come to my knowledge.

I sent my young daughters to complete their studies in a convent, in Toronto, not only to enable them to learn English but also to give them an opportunity of knowing English-speaking Canadians of another province. I did the same thing with my sons. One day, while one of my daughters and I were in a street-car, in Toronto, we were speaking French and a lady took the trouble of getting up from her seat to tell me: "You are in Toronto, here; you must speak English." A few weeks ago, as I was going to lunch, I was walking down a hall in the Parliament Building and I heard two gentlemen saying to each other, in English: "Those blasted French Canadians!" I will not repeat the rest of the sentence, but I realize that certain things which happened during the last few weeks confirm only too well what those gentlemen had in mind.

That is not the way we will achieve understanding in Canada.

I could also add: Why are newspapers allowed to make offensive and malicious insinuations concerning Quebec, in their headlines? For instance the headline of a newspaper of May 7, 1960 reads as follows: "Ottawa Studies Tax File Racket—Charity Donations Cut Income Revenues". It goes without saying that all the examples given are from the province of Quebec, which leads people to jump to conclusions and to say: "Charitable donations constitute a racket in the province of Quebec."

I do not deny that there are abuses. Some great financiers pass off as company expenses their own personal expenses for entertainment, for their fishing clubs, for servants' wages, for administration. However, because a few act that way, we must not conclude that all financiers are trying to evade payment of income tax.

In regard to charitable donations, let us consider the facts. There are close to two hundred and fifty Catholic churches in Montreal and not more than fifty Protestant churches. Churches of the Catholic faith fill up five, six or seven times and even more every Sunday, while Protestant churches hold one or two services per Sunday. The facts of history are there to remind us that in 1760, when the new régime took over, all those with any means returned to France. Only the landed population remained here, poor in everything but good will, love for the soil and courage. Consequently, millionaires are few and far between in our midst and when a French Canadian dies, unlike English-speaking millionaires, he cannot make a bequest of one, two or three million to some university, or leave any worthwhile sum to his church or cultural institutions. If our objectives are to be met, our donations must be divided and multiplied no end. So you have families donating $1, $2 or $5 every week or $52, $104 or $260 a year. Lump-sum donations of that order being quite unthinkable we have to resort to small instalments. This makes it possible for the thousands of people who fill our churches every Sunday to donate to their churches, convents or other institutions sums of money amounting to relatively large totals by the end of the year. When, two years ago for instance, the Archbishop of Quebec City requested a voluntary subscription in order to build a seminary for the education of future priests, 35,000 canvassers set forth on a fund-raising campaign on a given day and time and at five p.m. on that same day they had gathered pledges totalling more than 7 million dollars. Of course, the 7 millions were not collected in full there and then, but payments were spread over the next twelve months. Therefore, the so-called "charitable racket" is no racket at all.

It is true that most people do not read through articles appearing under such flamboyant titles; belittling a province is no way to attain the unity we seek.

However, I do not think that all English-speaking Canadians share this feeling of contempt toward Quebec. As a matter of fact, we have in Parliament striking examples to the contrary: the Speaker of the other Chamber and my own leader in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), who was formerly Speaker of the House of Commons. Both of them are men of distinction and high culture and they did not fear to come to Quebec to follow courses in French, not only in order to learn our language, but also to become acquainted with us and to learn to understand French Canadians. I might also mention the Speaker of the Senate, who speaks French and English with equal fluency. We also have our two colleagues from Ottawa, the Hon. Senator Choquette and the Hon. Senator Connolly, who speak both languages fluently.

Recently, a conference was held in Ottawa under the auspices of the Canadian Citizenship Council in order to set up a committee to provide the foundations of a National Council to organize the celebration of the Centenary of Confederation. The committee met for the first time on May 6, 1959, in Toronto and a second time, in Montreal, on the 11th and 12th of February 1960. At the outset, it included one French Canadian member, Rev. Father André Renaud, a member of a Commission for the Eskimos. When the committee met in Montreal, the name of Mr. André Bachand, of the University of Montreal, was added. It seems to me that, at the last meeting which took place in Ottawa about ten days ago, invitations should have been extended to the representatives of the main organizations of all denominations from all over Canada. As far as French Canadian bodies are concerned, I do not know that any group of any importance received an invitation, although more than 275 questionnaires were apparently addressed to certain individuals, who were invited to join the Centenary Committee. I know for a fact that the Conseil de la vie française, the Association canadienne des éducateurs and the Fédération des Sociétés Saint-Jean-Baptiste received no such invitation. On the other hand, large corporations like Imperial Oil, Canadair, etc., were invited.

How can we possibly celebrate the Centenary of Confederation in such a spirit of division? How can there possibly be any solidarity among the various groups if at the outset a certain consideration, a certain procedure, is completely ignored in this country which we claim is bilingual?

Last year I met a delegation of Europeans, who were Belgians, Swiss or Italians. I told them that Ottawa was a bilingual city, but the next day they asked me: "Where is your bilingualism?"

There are certain small things which we are not obliged to do but which we do through courtesy and to show that we recognize greatness in a man when we see it. We have here in this Chamber, for example, the gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), who has just been elected Bâtonnier of the Montreal Bar. As you know, most of the lawyers in Montreal are French speaking, but that did not prevent them from recognizing in our colleague a man of distinction, experience and wisdom, and thus establishing the rule that every second year the Bâtonnier will be an English-speaking lawyer. He is just as much of a Canadian as we are and we are as Canadian as he is. I remember hearing this same colleague say in this chamber that in Quebec no group tries to dominate the other, that we walk shoulder to shoulder—that is how he put it—and that attitude is essential if Canada is to grow and prosper in unity.

Last Sunday, l'Alliance canadienne met for the third time. The convention took place in Ottawa and Mgr. Maheux, its outgoing president had this to say:

> The main difficulty in Canada lies in education. We, Canadians, have to live together, although we have two languages and two cultures. There should be no question of a majority or a minority. Our criteria should be based on values, not on statistics. It would be a shame to be divided into two separate reserves. Every Canadian, in any part of Canada, must have access to the sources of his cultural heritage.
> In 1769, it would have been inconceivable to deprive of their language the 60,000 Frenchmen who had become Canadians. The thought would not have come to any English officer or any other man of culture. Some fanatics, with a colonial turn of mind, obtained the recall of Murray who was replaced as governor by Carlton, but the latter finally had to come back to Murray's system, which favoured bilingualism and friendship with the French Canadians.

I submit that everywhere in Canada we should, in deeds as well as in words, practise this friendship and further such co-operation.

A movement seems to be taking shape which would seem to embody the true spirit which should preside over our Centenary festivities. An effort is being made in that organization to raise the iron curtain which seems to separate the province of Quebec from some other parts of Canada.

We still have seven years to go before the Canadian Confederation has reached its centennial. Instead of trying to find faults with one another, of criticizing one another, each one of us—professors, educators, public officials, etc.—should strive during those seven years to understand one another, to get along with one another, to develop that spirit of co-operation, of justice and of equity which must exist between Canadian citizens. That some of us are Latin and others, Saxon, that is all for the best! Each group contributes the value of its culture to the wealth of the country. During a concert, there is not only one type of instrument which plays; on the contrary, there are several types, and the whole orchestra creates that harmony which charms us; yet, that does not prevent each instrument from creating individually its beauty, its song, its music. The same thing could be said of a choir; tenors, sopranos and basses unite their voices to give the choir its range, its power, its beauty.

All this is very nice in theory, but is it possible in practice? It is impossible to convert those words into deeds if no one wants to be convinced of their truth. However, this ideal is possible if we, the leaders, do the utmost towards the implementation of our beliefs.

Some people say "You people from Quebec must vanish." Why should we? If we did, would Canada be a better country? Of course not; it would have lost one of its necessary components. Indeed, let us take a look at our history. Some young professors who have not read our history, think that they have a monopoly of wisdom and that only those who think along the same lines as they do, are right. Yet, when our enemies succeeded in bringing their army to the foot of Cape Diamond, in Quebec City, when the newcomers who knew nothing of our history and who had no roots in this country were taken with fear, the Governor of the time, who came from England, issued a proclamation in which he said: "If you do not wish to defend your new country, at least try not to be a nuisance, go and take shelter on the island of Orleans". That is a historical fact. Monsignor Plessis, who was then bishop of Quebec City, issued another proclamation in which he thus enjoined all French Canadians: "You must defend your country so that it may remain a possession of the country to which you have sworn allegiance and loyalty." Canada was saved for England on that occasion. At Châteauguay, who again saved the country from the invaders if not our compatriots? If the province of Quebec had not existed at the time and did not continue to exist now, Canada would not be what it is now and what it will be tomorrow.

Let the fanatics shout and rant, that is their business; but let all people of good will act in such a way as to silence those destructive outcries!

From now until 1967 let all men of good will strive together toward this unity, this spirit of co-operation and harmony. Then, when the Centenary of Confederation arrives, we can all sing from the bottom of our hearts: "O Canada, my country which I love!"

Hon. Senators: Hear! Hear!

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: That is my fondest hope: harmony, not only in words, but in deeds. Let us at all times speak and act in that spirit. Let us realize that our neighbour is as good as we are and that we, likewise, are his equal. Let us use all the media at our disposal, television, radio, press, to promote such co-operation. All my life I have preached co-operation, it has been my whole endeavour; I have found that it is the only way of doing anything durable, constructive, because co-operation unites all men of good will instead of pitting them one against the other.

I say we must develop Canada further, working in this spirit of co-operation, of solidarity; that would be infinitely more valuable than all the monuments that could be erected, but which would remain lifeless.

For the Centenary of the Canadian Confederation, let us erect a monument with the will, heart and aspirations of each one of us, so that Canada may become a magnificent temple of peace, harmony and concord.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

REPORT OF MEETINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am pleased to table the report of the second and third meetings of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), that the report of the second and third meetings of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, tabled today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Motion agreed to.

For text of report see appendix "A" to today's Hansard, pp. 695 to 702.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, is it permissible to ask a question regarding the meetings held in Washington by the Canadian-United States Interparliamentary Group? My question, which is addressed to whoever can answer it, is whether when the Canadian delegation was in Washington there was any discussion regarding the Columbia River. If so, I would like to know what information was obtained. It was mentioned in the previous report that the Columbia River was one of the subjects discussed. That is of particular interest to the people of British Columbia—it is a very hot issue, I might say—and I want to know if it was discussed with the senators of the United States.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was not a member of the delegation. I understand that there is a senator present who was a member, but whether he can answer the question or not I am unable to say.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith (Kamloops): Honourable senators, as a member of the subcommittee on Boundary Waters I can tell you that the matter of the Columbia River development was discussed. I would suggest that the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) review the report which has been tabled, and then if he has any questions I, for one, would be very glad to endeavour to answer them, as well as those of any other honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Thank you.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Mr. Aseltine tabled the following:

"Roads to Resources" agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan, dated March 11, 1960.

Ordinances of the Yukon Territory, passed by the Yukon Council, First Session, 1960.

General Order of the Supreme Court of Canada providing for amendments to the Rules of the Supreme Court, which shall come into force on July 2nd, 1960, pursuant to section 103 of the Supreme Court Act, being Chapter 259, R.S. 1952. (English and French texts).

MANPOWER AND EMPLOYMENT

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald Smith (Queens-Shelburne), for Hon. Léon Méthot, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to study and report upon the trends in manpower requirements and utilization in Canada, presented the first report of the committee.

Report read by the Clerk Assistant:

Your committee recommend:

1. That their quorum be reduced to nine members.
2. That they be authorized to print 1,500 copies in English and 400 copies in French of their day-to-day proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLSTATE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA —REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the honourable senator if, when he said the next sitting, he meant Tuesday next?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That was the intention. I understood that the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) had some words to say on the third reading, and I believed that the Senate was going to adjourn this afternoon until Tuesday evening next. Perhaps, if it is agreeable to all honourable senators, it would be better if I were to withdraw my motion. I now move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 434 to 448, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 31, 1960 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

Motion rescinded. See p. 689.

STANDING COMMITTEES

SUBJECT-MATTERS REFERRED FOR REPORT IN LAST TEN YEARS

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

What subject-matters other than bills have been referred to the Standing Committees of the Senate for report during each one of the last ten years?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I present herewith the answer to this inquiry.

For text of answer, see appendix "B" to today's Hansard, pp. 703-7.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, as I must leave in a hurry this afternoon, I would crave the indulgence of the Senate to agree that, when the Orders of the Day are called, order No. 6 be called first and considered. That is the order for resuming the debate on the proposed amendment to the bill respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILL

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY—PROPOSED AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Vien to amend clause 6 of Bill S-24 respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White), in whose name this order stands, is unavoidably absent this afternoon and has asked me to advise the Senate that he does not intend to speak on this bill. The sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt), who also is unavoidably absent, has requested me to advise the Senate that he has no objection to the proposed amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Vien, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lambert, that clause 6 of the Bill S-24, intituled an Act respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

, the Railway Act and any other act notwithstanding.

Is it your pleasure to adopt this motion?

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the house for a moment? The first suggestion made by the honourable senator who has moved this amendment (Hon. Mr. Vien) was that we refer the bill back to the committee for further study, and to that suggestion I expressed agreement. I have no reason at all for objecting to a further study of the bill, but I do have serious objection to an amendment of this kind being snapped through this house without our knowing just what the amendment would involve.

It is perfectly obvious to me that there are conflicting interests involved, of which I know nothing. I know that railroad situation. I was a member of a conciliation board that reported on the agreement under which the staff is now working. So I am fairly familiar with the circumstances, but I have no knowledge whatsoever as to what contracts are involved on which we seem to be deciding in some respects between the parties. I think it would be altogether wrong if, without a further study by the committee, we should pass this amendment at this time. There are, obviously, contesting parties, and there are contractual rights of some kind involved, of which I know nothing, and I think most of my fellow senators are in much the same position.

I am ready to agree that this bill be referred back to the committee for further study. I certainly would not vote for this amendment, with the knowledge that we have of it at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Why not adjourn the debate?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why adjourn the debate? Why not send the bill back for further consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The sponsor of the bill is not present.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All right, then, let us adjourn the debate. I will move adjournment of the debate until the sponsor is here and can state some reason why we should not refer it back for further study or perhaps give us some explanation that will remove the doubts that are now in my mind.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, debate adjourned.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Lionel Choquette, for Hon. Léon Méthot, moved the third reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

WESTERN SURETY COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. John G. Higgins, for Hon. John Hnatyshyn, moved the third reading of Bill S-30, to incorporate Western Surety Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Lionel Choquette moved the third reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

He said: Honourable senators, with the permission of the house may I be allowed to place on Hansard a table showing a comparison of grants of $1.50 per capita with yield of 1 per cent corporation income tax for the fiscal year 1960-61? This table was requested by several members of the committee to which the bill was referred, and an undertaking was given that it would be placed on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Thank you.

See page 679 for table.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the third reading of this bill.

Since 1919 I have had the privilege of being a university professor, and thus I have personal knowledge of the urgent need for funds which has been felt by all our universities during that time. All persons who are aware of those difficulties have been trying to settle this problem. The present bill offers what I consider to be a temporary solution, by way of a reasonable compromise.

I do not rise for the purpose of criticizing any government or individual, but as a citizen of the province of Quebec I consider it my duty to state my views on the matter as briefly as possible, with frankness and also with moderation.

First, I wish to say a few words about the constitutional aspects of the question. We all know that section 93 of the British North America Act gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provincial Legislatures to make laws in relation to education. I do not have to discuss here the provisions which in certain cases entitle the federal authorities to adopt some remedial enactments. The Canadian Parliament is made, so to speak, the protector of religious minorities in educational matters.

We also know that the introductory clause to section 91 of the B.N.A. Act gives jurisdiction to the Canadian Parliament to make laws for the > ... Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces ...

I admit at once that education is precisely a matter assigned to the provincial Legislatures with the special provisions which I have just mentioned.

I come now to paragraph 3 of section 91, which says that ...

> The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation

... is explicitly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

The question which I have often put to myself is the following: Does the granting of money for the support of universities throughout the country constitute a law in relation to education? The Batonnier of the bar of my province, the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), expressed a contrary view when speaking in the debate on this bill on May 19. The question is really this: Is the federal Parliament limited to the appropriation of money only for the purposes over which it has exclusive control? I am of opinion that in themselves federal grants are valid when no strings are unduly attached. Nobody has contested the validity of the grants which have existed for many years in favour of vocational training in technical schools, and for promoting, building and improving of hospitals.

However, section 92, paragraph 7, of the British North America Act gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provincial legislatures concerning that matter. That paragraph reads:

> The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Hospitals, Asylums, Charities, and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.

Personally, I would define jurisdiction in relation to education or laws on education as any act which provides for a certain course of studies, which sets down the conditions of admission to a university, fixes the number of years to be spent there before undergoing certain final examinations, the questions to be put to the candidates, the correction of their papers and so on.

Of course, if each province were in a position to levy the taxes necessary for its own education requirements, matters would be much simpler, and I say at once that I would feel much happier. But such is not the case. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario, for instance, would be able, if they had certain fields of taxation left vacant to them, to provide for their universities and other institutions of learning. But it would be a different matter for certain other provinces, which I would not like to call the poorer provinces, because if their natural resources are not as great as those of the two central provinces to which I have referred, or if they are not as highly industrialized, it does not mean in any way that intellectually speaking the population of those provinces is inferior to anybody—quite the contrary. I believe we all agree that it is highly desirable that all Canadians should have a certain minimum standard of living, including what I would call education costs.

In 1951-52 I voted for the system which was then inaugurated as a practical necessity. I was satisfied that the act then adopted was intra vires. The opinion of some people differs from mine, but only the courts can settle the discussion.

I do not intend to prolong my remarks on that subject, but I want to say that during the first year, through what I would call the good offices of well-meaning citizens, the Quebec Government accepted the federal grants, but during the next four years it refused to do so and it prevented our universities from accepting those grants and even larger amounts which would have been given to our institutions of higher learning simply lapsed. The Government denounced such grants as encroaching upon provincial rights in the matter of education, and the universities had to choose between the federal grants and the provincial subsidies. If they accepted the federal grants they would not receive the provincial subsidies.

In 1956, I think, a new system was introduced. The grants became payable, not to the universities but to the Canadian Universities Foundation. The grants had been raised, by the way, from 50 cents to $1 per capita and later to $1.50 per capita of the popuation of each province. They were then distributed between the universities and between our classical colleges for the last four years, which length of time corresponds to the duration of the arts course, and they were distributed in proportion to the number of students at each one of those institutions. However, the system introduced by Mr. St. Laurent was much fairer than what had existed during the four previous years, because the funds which were not accepted by the Quebec universities were accumulating in trust, and sooner or later we were convinced that a solution would be found which would enable our universities to receive those very large amounts of money without which they could barely survive.

The Quebec Government maintained its opposition to the new plan during the remainder of the Liberal régime, and also during the first two years of the Conservative administration, and now, at last, we are called upon to vote for a scheme acceptable to our provincial authorities.

From a constitutional point of view, honourable senators, what legal distinction can we draw between the provisions of the present bill and the provisions of the previous acts? There are differences, I know, but do they settle in any better way the constitutional problem which I have been trying to outline before you as fairly as possible?

The first point to be considered is that Quebec will collect a one per cent tax on its corporations and pay it to its universities. I must remark at once that Quebec, or any other province, does not, under the terms of the British North America Act, require any authorization from this Parliament to collect, for such a purpose, a tax on a corporation. Section 92 (2) of our Constitution gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provincial Legislatures to make laws in the matter of direct taxation within the respective provinces for the raising of revenue for provincial purposes. The intervention of the federal authorities in this case is required only from what I would call a fiscal point of view. It is not made necessary under any section of our Constitution. The advantage granted by Ottawa—and I admit quite willingly it is an important advantage—consists in the fact that the one per cent will be deductible from federal taxes. I might say that since the First World War such taxes have become sky high, and the taxing field left free to our provinces has become, so to speak, narrower and narrower all the time. I need not repeat that even under the present circumstances it might be possible for some provinces to provide for their universities, but for some other provinces that would be impossible, so we must find what I would call an all-Canadian solution applicable from coast to coast.

My second point is that the present bill provides that Quebec, or any other province availing itself of this new act, will distribute the grants on the basis of $1.50 per capita to each college or university. There is no change, honourable senators, in what I would call the principle of the per capita federal rule already in force. Each university and college will receive its proportion of the amount represented by $1.50 per capita of the population of the whole province. The difference introduced by the new legislation is that the distribution is to be made by the provincial authorities. I have no objection whatever to this, but I ask myself: Is the sovereignty of the province in the matter of education better recognized now than before? The federal authorities provide for this deduction of one per cent of the corporation taxes levied by the provinces, but if the amount is less than $1.50 per capita of the provincial population section 9A, subsection 3(a), provides that the minister may pay the difference to the province. In such a case we have again a federal grant, and I do not believe that it is more constitutional or less constitutional than the federal grants were before.

My last point is that if the one per cent collected by the province exceeds the $1.50 per capita the excess may be deducted by the federal authorities from any payment to the province under this act, or otherwise recovered as a debt due to Canada. From the table which the sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Choquette) placed before this house a few minutes ago we see that the refund which would have to be made by Quebec in such a case would be $2,350,500. I cannot agree with this feature. The province has exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of education. It also has full jurisdiction to levy direct tax on its corporations and because Ottawa grants a deduction of one per cent the province becomes obliged to pay to Ottawa any surplus fund which constitutionally belongs in toto to the province. Why should Quebec be obliged, so to speak, to make such a grant to Ottawa? From a constitutional point of view I certainly think this point is open to doubt.

I come now to the results achieved to date. Yesterday we were told in committee that the funds accumulated in the hands of the Canadian Universities Foundation, amounting to about $25 million, have been paid to Quebec universities, which in turn have handed them over to the educational fund of the Government of Quebec. Grants will now be made by our provincial authority. Whatever may be the merits of this transaction, it solves the problem of the accumulated funds. I rejoice that a solution has been found, even though it may present complications and even though it is not as logical as I would wish it to be.

I deplore, however, that for the four years of darkness, so to speak, which I have referred to, the sum of approximately $8 million was lost by the province of Quebec even though our taxpayers shouldered their full share of taxation for grants paid to universities of other provinces.

In my opinion all settlements made either by the present administration or by the former administration have only been temporary compromises. I said ten years ago, and I repeat it now, that sooner or later the federal and provincial authorities will have to reconfederate to some extent and agree upon leaving to the provinces a sufficient field of taxation so that they themselves may be able to levy taxes which they need for provincial purposes and, in particular, for education.

Education is a subject to which we attach the greatest importance in Quebec. We consider it as being absolutely essential to our survival. I have no inferiority complex and I trust that the present bill will enable us to have what I would call a temporary settlement, but sooner or later a definite solution will have to be found for the greatest advantage of our country at large and of my province in particular.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I expressed my views on this measure on second reading and I rather hesitate about inflicting anything further upon the house this afternoon. I just want to say, however, how very strongly I agree with everything that has just been said by the honourable senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Gouin). But the real reason I have risen this afternoon is to refer to something I said upon second reading in opposition to the suggestion which had been made that each province should be left to levy its own taxes for the support of its universities.

Perhaps those honourable senators who heard my comments on second reading will recall that I said this suggestion, owing to extreme divergence in the taxing capacities of the various provinces, would result in some provinces being able to raise all the money they wanted for universities and in other provinces not being able to do so, and that we might find ourselves in the position where we would have some rich provinces with first-class universities and some poor provinces with second-class universities.

In support of the statement I made on that occasion may I refer the house to the very striking table which the honourable gentleman from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) placed on Hansard just this afternoon. This table estimates the one per cent corporation tax which each province could levy under this bill for the support of its universities. I refer to paragraph 4 of this table, which shows what a one per cent corporation tax means in terms of the population of each province. It is really very striking. In the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan it means, respectively, 79 cents, 54 cents, $1.02, 88 cents and $1.13 per inhabitant. The other end of the scale shows what the tax means in the rich provinces. In Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta and Quebec it means, respectively, $2.64, $2.18, $2.05 and $1.97 per inhabitant.

So we see the extraordinary variation between the provinces as to the amounts they are able to raise by corporation taxes. I think that is rather a strong reinforcement of the view I expressed on the second reading of this bill, that it is necessary for the dominion, by some sort of system of equalization of grants covering all provinces, to act as a balance wheel and level out the extreme difference we find between the taxing capacities of the various provinces so that, as my honourable friend who spoke so well a few minutes ago said, we can at least have a basic minimum standard of university education throughout the country.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I think you will all agree that we have had a very fine debate on this subject. It has been a frank discussion, and what has impressed me most has been the fact that those who have participated in it have been pretty generally in accord. The arguments put forth have not been opposed to each other to any great extent. I believe I am safe in saying that everyone who has spoken has been in favour of the passing of this bill.

The province of Quebec will now be receiving grants for educational purposes in its universities on the same basis that grants are being paid to universities in other parts of Canada, and I think we are all very happy and relieved that that has been accomplished.

Honourable senators will remember that when this legislation was first introduced in the House of Commons representations had been made to the Government prior to 1950 by the universities across Canada, including the universities in Quebec, for dominion grants. In 1950 the Massey Commission, brought in a recommendation that the grants should be made to universities across the dominion by the federal Government. In 1951 the Government, under the leadership of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, brought in a provision whereby 50 cents per head would be paid to the provinces to assist in education in universities. Honourable senators will recall that that was done by an item in the estimates. In 1951-52 all the provinces, including Quebec, accepted that grant. I think it came as quite a surprise in the following year, 1952-53, when the province of Quebec did not accept the grant. Of course, at the end of the fiscal year the grant lapsed, for, as honourable senators know, any amount that is put in the estimates which is not paid during the fiscal year lapses. The same thing occurred the following year, and the following year also.

Well, the Government of the day thought it was unfortunate that the province of Quebec was not taking advantage of this money which had been set aside each year for these universities. Honourable senators will recall that at about that time the Canada Council was set up and Parliament voted it some $50 million to be used for erection of buildings by the universities throughout Canada. I do not know what provinces have taken advantage of that, or whether any of the universities in Quebec have taken advantage of it or not. In any event, the Government of the day set up $50 million, and the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister at that time, took a great interest in that feature of the administration of the dominion Government. I hope this bill will go to a committee so that we may obtain more information as to the distribution of this money in the various provinces.

Probably I am getting a little confused at the moment in mentioning the amount voted for the Canada Council. When the annual report of the Canada Council is being considered by the Committee on Finance we can then procure information as to the distribution of the $50 million. Still, I feel there is certain information which we might have received, but did not receive, when the Banking and Commerce Committee met the other day on this bill, as to what universities have received sums of money and how much each university has received. Probably we can get that another year. However, I come to the year 1956, when it was felt that a grant of 50 cents per head of the population to each province was not sufficient. I know that at that time the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, was still quite disturbed over the fact that Quebec was not receiving its share of this money, and I think all of us in Parliament were disturbed. So at that time Parliament, under the leadership of Mr. St. Laurent, provided that, if a province did not accept the money which was transferred over to the Canadian Universities Foundation, the amount of money set aside for that province would not be paid back to the Government at the end of each year but would be retained by the Canadian Universities Foundation.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That was after 1956?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That was after 1956. At the meeting of the committee the other day I asked the gentleman who was explaining the details of the bill what had happened to that money which Quebec had not used. He informed us that it had been invested and that the interest received from the investment had been retained, and that not only the share of the money which the Government gave to the Canadian Universities Foundation for Quebec, but also the accrued interest over the years, had been by this time paid to the universities of the province of Quebec. I hope, therefore, honourable senators, that we have come to the end of this dispute as to what universities should and what universities should not get assistance from the federal Government. The amount was increased to $1 per head by the former administration; it was increased by an additional 50 cents by the present administration. I think we can take credit from the fact that we have all done our best to advance the cause of education in the universities across Canada.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am very glad to join in this love fest, and I am glad that we are smoking the pipe of peace as between the province of Quebec and the other provinces.

I am sorry if I introduce a sour note at the end of this most delightful love fest which we have been enjoying, but I think it would be salutary if I say that on previous occasions, somewhat similar to this one, I expressed, as did others, the hope that the time will come when each province and the dominion raises the taxes necessary to discharge the obligations placed on the shoulders of each respective administration under the British North America Act.

My friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Gouin) says that, notwithstanding the beautiful splitting of hairs that we have had in connection with this bill, before very long there will have to be reconsiderations. Well, I can assure honourable senators that there will be reconsiderations on top of reconsiderations so long as we continue the cockeyed system of the dominion Parliament raising taxes for provincial expenditure. That is uneconomic and unsound; it is not wise in any way. It is too bad that when Canada was formed in 1867 the most unsalutary arrangement was made of the dominion raising taxes and paying them over to the provinces. It is not as though the dominion Government has a source of revenue not available to the provinces. We all raise the taxes from the same taxpayers. We may do it on different principles. The methods of the dominion Government may be better than those of the provinces. The provincial methods may be better than those of the dominion. However, the fact remains that all the money that either expends comes from the same general source, and it is not as though the universities were finding money because we undertook to pay part of their expenses. The burden is just as heavy on the taxpayer whether the provinces raise the money as it is when we do.

Now, in partial justification of this type of legislation, we always hear about equalization as between provinces—some provinces are wealthy, we are told, and some are poor. But there is no such element in this or other bills of a similar character, or practically none. I do not object at all to a grant by the dominion Government to a province that is poor and finds more difficulty in discharging its obligations than do more wealthy provinces. But we are not doing that at all: we give very large sums to all the provinces, money which is raised by the dominion and spent by the provinces.

So, pardon me, honourable senators, if I sound a rather sour note on this most delightful occasion, and if I express the hope that the time will come when we in the dominion Parliament will attend to our own business, raise our own taxes, discharge our own responsibilities and leave the provinces to do the same with their responsibilities.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I be permitted, honourable senators, to ask the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Choquette) if these tables which he has handed to me already appear in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I asked the honourable gentleman for details of the amounts paid to different universities over the years, and he has handed me a series of tables. I think other senators might also be interested in them and I suggest they be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I was going to suggest that, but I wanted first to submit the tables to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald).

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

For tables see Appendix "C" to today's Hansard, pp. 708-11.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I rise to make just a simple observation to support what the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) said this afternoon in reference to the fact, which I think we must face, that our universities in Canada are no longer provincial universities but they are national universities, and that the burden on some of the poorer provinces of maintaining the standard of education which is being demanded today by university graduates is a very heavy one, and assistance must come from the federal authorities notwithstanding what my honourable friend has just said.

I was present last week at the graduation exercises of a class from the University of New Brunswick. Now, the University of New Brunswick has grown so rapidly in the last few years that it has the largest student personnel—I want honourable senators from Halifax to listen to this—the largest student personnel in the Atlantic provinces, even larger than that at the great Dalhousie University. But the burden of maintaining the university has become an increasingly difficult one for the little province of New Brunswick. Last year, in spite of quite generous grants from the provincial Government, an expenditure of nearly $3 million landed the university about $250,000 behind on its operations, and next year the projected budget will cause it to have an operating deficit of $350,000. In addition to that there are all sorts of new building projects which will have to be carried on, at a cost of millions and millions of dollars.

The present student enrolment of the university is, I think, 1,560. It is estimated—I believe this is true of all universities across Canada—that in ten years' time the present enrolment will be doubled, and one can see what facilities will be required in order to take care of future requirements. So I say it is absolutely necessary that we have some national scheme whereby these universities will receive support from our national Government.

Having said that, I want to add one word more. I am delighted that this matter of grants to the Quebec universities has been arranged and that everybody is happy. However, I cannot help asking this. If it was quite all right, if it was constitutional—if I may use that word—to pay over this $25 million which my honourable friend has referred to this afternoon, and which has already been paid, I understand, to Quebec universities, if it was constitutional to take that unrighteous money, then why is this legislation necessary? That is what I cannot get through my head.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it certainly was not my intention to speak on third reading of this bill, even if I had some reservations in my thinking about it. I find myself wholly in agreement with the views expressed by our colleague from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I do not always agree with him, but on this occasion my thoughts march with his.

It may be well to look back for a short period of perhaps 25 years following the great depression, as it is now called. There were certain provinces which had suffered through the effects of that depression to a much greater degree than other provinces, and honourable senators will recall that the Government of that day set up what was known as the Rowell-Sirois royal commission. The report of that commission, I feel confident in saying, will rank in the future as one of the great state papers of Canada. The commission found, and stated in detail, the discrepancies in wealth as between different provinces, and it sought a solution, not by way of equalized hand-outs from Ottawa to all the provinces irrespective of their individual financial position, but along the lines of assisting what might be described as the poorer provinces.

I shall not sketch the history of the developments since that time, but after the war we did arrive ultimately at a position where fiscal arrangements were made with the provinces. It should be clearly kept in mind that the fiscal arrangements made with the provinces after the war did not implement the principles put forward in the Rowell-Sirois report. The basis of the Rowell-Sirois report was that the federal Government would assist the less rich provinces, but not the rich provinces. In our constitutional position nothing is more important than the understanding and working of the provincial jurisdiction vis-à-vis the federal jurisdiction. We are today getting these matters involved and mixed up in a way that may create trouble for us in the future.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It already has.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Certainly the effect is already evident.

Every few years the provincial authorities meet the federal authorities in Ottawa, and they sit down to reconsider the fiscal arrangements. It then becomes a contest between the federal authority and the various provincial governments, because it goes without saying that they all want more money, and the federal treasury, conscious of the enormous burden it has to carry, and disliking to consider the imposition of further taxation, endeavours to hold the provinces down. That, of course, is a wholly undesirable situation.

I said a moment ago that the principle of the Rowell-Sirois Commission report was not carried out, and it is not being carried out in this system of university grants. That principle was that the poorer provinces, those with lesser resources, would be assisted by the federal treasury, but it was not contemplated that that assistance would go to the central provinces, which of course are the wealthy provinces in Canada. That principle has been wholly violated. In order for the federal treasury to give grants to the needy provincial administrations, it had to apply the same formula to the richer provinces. That is done under this system of university grants.

I do think this is a question that sooner or later must receive very serious consideration from Parliament. I am not by any means confident that we have found the answer in the present procedure we follow. I merely mention this because of my very lively recollection of the events of twenty-five or so years ago when the Rowell-Sirois Commission was set up. At that time, as my colleagues in the house are aware, I was a member of the administration. It would be infinitely better if a way could be found to let the provinces find their own sources of revenue for the things they require to do. The federal Government has taken over in large measure the responsibility of the provinces. It has taken it over, for instance, in the field of unemployment, and in many other directions. This federal assumption of provincial responsibility is also a matter that needs some consideration. As I say, we have taken it over in the whole field of unemployment, and now we are going into the field of education. Where will it end?

In my view we should have left the responsibilities of the provinces where they were, and let the authorities at Ottawa give up some of their sources of revenue and earmark them for the provinces. That was a contention that was advanced in the abortive meeting of Ottawa with the provinces following the Rowell-Sirois Commission report, when some of the provinces urged that the federal Government get out of the income tax field altogether and leave that as a direct source of revenue for the provinces. I am not certain whether that is practicable or not, but I am certain that there is no matter to which the members of this house and of Parliament as a whole should devote more serious consideration than the problem of fiscal relations between the provinces and the federal Government.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, as a representative of one of the have-not provinces I have always had a great deal of sympathy with the viewpoint expressed by the province of Quebec in its jealous regard of its prerogatives in respect of education.

I am at the moment in agreement with the arguments advanced by the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) in respect of the situation as it now exists. Any other arrangement that I could think of would not possibly give equalization or anything approaching it. However, I must confess to a good deal of agreement with the views expressed by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). For some reason or other this Government, like the Government that preceded it, seems to have an ununderstandable desire to collect even more taxes than are necessary for its own purposes. As the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity said, the idea of one government collecting millions of dollars to hand over to other governments to spend is, to use the senator's expression, a cockeyed system. It is basically wrong. The problem has always been a difficult one, and the question now is what to do about it.

I suggest to honourable senators that not enough attention has been paid to the question of what to do about it. I doubt very much that in a country such as Canada the time will ever come when the ability of certain provinces to respond to taxation will be as great as that of other provinces. But I am convinced that there could be an arrangement which would give much more equality than exists at the present time. I would like to see Parliament and the Government address themselves to the matter of equality on the basis of earning power and the ability of provinces to respond to taxation. If we cannot entirely eliminate the necessity for federal assistance of areas which, for one reason or another beyond their control, are not able to respond to taxation as well as other areas, we could at least reduce the great disparity which now exists. As the honourable senator from Churchill has said, the present system of the federal Government meeting with the provincial Governments every two or three years and entering into a horse-trading deal is basically wrong. It is ultimately going to lead to—I was going to say "bankruptcy", but that is too strong a term—great financial difficulties for future administrations, because the inevitable thing under the present system is for the municipalities to turn to the provinces, and for the provinces to turn to the federal Government. At some time we have got to get back as near as we possibly can to the idea of a particular government spending what it collects in taxation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And assuming the responsibility for it.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Sooner or later those in authority must turn their attention to that, and arrive at a solution.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, I would like to say a word with respect to educational grants to the provinces. Talking specifically about the province of Newfoundland, we have there a university which has come along splendidly, and which is doing a remarkably good job. The enrolment is about 1,300, which is treble what it was a few years ago.

With its many other pressing needs, Newfoundland is unable without outside aid to raise the money to provide adequate university services for the province. Out there we are a great distance from other universities, which in most cases have applications beyond their capacity. It is difficult to get admittance into many of them. It is only by having a university in a centralized area which people can reach that they can have the opportunity of getting university education. The cost of obtaining an education is far greater for each individual student who has to travel a long distance to attend university than it is for the person who is able to attend a university in his own immediate neighbourhood.

It has been said that it is wrong to have federal grants for education distributed throughout the provinces. Also it has been said right here that the money for provincial needs generally should be raised by the provinces and not by the central Government. Honourable senators, I must say that I do not agree with that at all. If we discard the present system we shall have to make many changes in the whole economy of Canada, changes which will greatly affect all the provinces. Such changes would in course of time lead to one result, namely, that we would have ten countries in the area now called the Dominion of Canada. If we are going to substitute provincial taxation for federal taxation on corporations, personal incomes and so forth, then we have got to rewrite the whole economic situation of the dominion in every part.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Why shouldn't we?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes, why shouldn't we? Let us say, for example, to British Columbia: "We will take off all tariffs on merchandise and goods coming into Canada, and let British Columbia take all the goods it can get more cheaply from Japan, China, Hong Kong and elsewhere. Why take them from Quebec and Ontario?" When you say that you get right down to the fundamental feature whereby you are going to change the whole economy of Canada.

As far as Newfoundland is concerned—and I say this only by way of example, because it applies to the other provinces in varying degrees—we are entirely dependent upon export trade in our economy. Largely because of our geographical position we do not sell anything worth while to the other provinces. We purchase from the other provinces, primarily from the two central provinces. I am absolutely sure that we are spending in the other provinces up to $250 million a year, if not more, and we are not selling to the extent of 5 per cent of that amount to the other provinces.

That is an example of how earnings are brought into the federal Government by taxation in some provinces through trade with other provinces. We have throughout Canada public works expenditures and social service distribution which simply cannot be localized if stability in distribution is to be maintained. I repeat: the economic condition is that if we put the taxation on each province for these major requirements we shall break the country down into ten different countries and there will no longer be a Dominion of Canada with ten provinces.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, may I say a word or two? I would like to separate the discussion of universities from the discussion about Canada and finances, because these two subjects do not go together at all.

The universities are in a different category from that of other institutions which require financing in Canada. Our young men and women are as ambitious as those of any other country in the world. I have been connected with a branch of the University of Manitoba, in my home city, for some 37 years, and I know what has happened in it. I know what has happened because I have been chairman of its Board of Management for about 15 years. I know that if we cannot give the students the instruction they need, instruction by able men and women, they do not sit down on the street corner and cry; they just get on a train and go down to Ontario or Quebec and attend the University of Toronto or McGill University, and they say they will get jobs down there easier than at home.

When I was about 15 or 16 years of age my father took me into Brandon to see a very good lawyer, and he said to him: "This boy wants to be a lawyer". The lawyer said to my father: "Send him to the university and give him a chance in life. Don't put him in my office, where he will stay for five years, after which time he will be only a law student and nothing else". My father asked where the university was, and the lawyer stated it was in Winnipeg. My father then said: "I haven't got the money. What am I going to do?" The other man replied: "Joe, send him to Winnipeg. If he has any brains he will get along, and if he hasn't he won't get along anyway, so what's the difference?" Sometimes a boy comes into my office and says: "Mr. Haig, I want to find out about college. I know you are one of the officers up there. Can you give me a course on this and that?" I have to say, "No, we have no experts in that department. You will have to go to the university and register there, because that part of the training is given by the university alone." Others want a different course, and I send them to McGill; others I send to Toronto, and others to British Columbia—these perhaps on account of the health of their parents. This is personal, but it is what happens in life. So, there is a difference between government money spent in the management of the country and that spent in the maintenance of universities.

Once or twice in this house I have heard speeches that have disturbed me about what is needed to be spent on the universities. I want all our boys and girls in Canada to be given equal opportunities for education. We are one nation and one people and we can only be united if we are educated on the same basis so that we understand each other. It is fundamental. I speak with great reverence about education. Those of us who learned our A B C's in Manitoba schools and obtained our higher education in Manitoba have always had a good word to say about the schools from which we graduated. There are always great professors, men who can really teach. The great man at my university was Kilpatrick. There were fifteen in my graduating class and the principles of life taught to us by Kilpatrick have stayed with us all through life.

I have no quarrel with the province of Quebec nor with any other province, but education is a subject which has disturbed many a country. Canada has pretty well solved its problems in this regard and when this legislation goes through and all universities are put on the same basis, I am sure the universities in Quebec will find a happiness in their educational life that they have not known for many years. You have only to read the daily newspapers to learn that the funds which have already been advanced to Quebec universities have made for a better spirit in those institutions of learning.

As to the federal Government cutting down expenses, I agree with the ideas expressed by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), but I want to emphasize most emphatically that as far as nationhood is concerned we are living in the most desperate times in the history of mankind. You only had to listen to a speech made over the air last night to be proud you were born on the continent of North America and that we have a man who would get up and say what he did to the world. World affairs are in a desperate state and we in Canada have got to stick together.

I have to give the late Right Honourable Mackenzie King credit for certain things. He has been given a lot of knocks and he has not always been given the credit he deserves. At any rate, some of us were in Parliament at the time of the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission and we know there was a desperate try by the Government of that day, under the same Mr. King, to adopt a method whereby each province would have a reasonable chance to share in the profits the central provinces were making from their business dealings with the rest of Canada. For instance, if a man out west or down east wanted to buy a Ford truck or a General Motors truck he had to get it from Ontario, where it was made; or if he wanted to buy some electrical equipment he would have to get it from Quebec, where it was made. Naturally, the province that is producing goods makes the profit on them.

But, honourable senators, I do not want to mix this aspect of our national economy with the problem of education. I agree with those who feel that education should be dealt with separate and apart. I think the best legislation ever enacted by the former administration was enacted under the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent when it introduced the formula of 50 cents per head of population for university grants across the Dominion of Canada.

Let me tell you what we did with the grant made to United College, in Winnipeg, which had about thirty teachers and professors on its staff. We figured we would get approximately $54,000 but, as a matter of fact, we received $68,000. Anyway, the money came through in November and, while this may sound strange, the members of our board unanimously agreed to use the money to increase the salaries of the staff members.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The teachers were underpaid and we knew it. We didn't feel they could be expected to teach with a spirit of enthusiasm when they were having such a desperate struggle to exist on their earnings. Every member of the board realized this, so we used the money to increase the teachers' salaries. Incidentally, in January, just two months later, they came back to us with a request for more money, and we explained how we had used up the full grant to give them the increase they already had received. Two or three years later the grant was increased to $1 per head of population and now it stands at $1.50 per head, which is not a cent too much.

We are continually improving conditions for our teachers, and it is the students who ultimately reap the benefits. The money being expended by the federal Government on education is making better citizens out of our boys and girls, and I am all for that.

I am not going to become involved in any argument about the distribution of federal grants generally. The country will go on if we do not discuss that now, but I don't want anything to happen to the practice of making these grants to universities. I think it is a grand thing. I want to be united with the province of Quebec and I want to feel just as friendly toward the people of that province as I do toward the people of Manitoba; I want to feel just as friendly toward the people of Ontario as I feel toward the people of Saskatchewan, and I want to feel just as friendly toward the people of the Maritime provinces as I do toward the people of Alberta and British Columbia. I want to feel we are united as Canadians and that all our boys and girls are being given the same educational opportunities. Don't let us have a situation where one province does something the rest are not doing. The point I want to make is that it is not really money that is being given but opportunity for education, an opportunity that is being given to all our boys and girls so that they will become better Canadian citizens.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, it is very unfortunate for anyone not to be able to share all the contradictory views expressed by various persons. In this case I wholeheartedly agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), a former Attorney General of Ontario, who represented the Government of Ontario at the interprovincial conference of 1935; the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), who is a Privy Councillor and former cabinet minister, and the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson), also a Privy Councillor and former Liberal Leader of the Government in the Senate.

How many times have I repeated in the House of Commons and elsewhere, and especially in the press, that each Government should collect its own taxes? And it is the doctrine of the Fathers of Confederation that each Government should be self-supporting. This is why the word "exclusively" is so often repeated in our Constitution. I am quite familiar with the Rowell-Sirois Commission report and I studied it. I read the original summary of that 8 cubic feet enormity of printed matter. I know more about it because one day the manager of a Quebec daily asked me if he could get some contracts, and I told him, "See the minister—you may get the Rowell reports"; and he got them, not on my recommendation, but on my tip. Besides that, I telephoned one of the cabinet ministers that there would be a revolution among the Liberal members if So-and-so were not appointed secretary of the commission. He was appointed, and there was no revolution. I have known them well and have seen how they worked. I have the full pedigree of the late Newton Rowell, who was chairman of that commission. And once, shortly before the interprovincial conference of 1941, one of the colleagues of the late Mr. Godbout, who was then Premier of Quebec, came to me and made arrangements with the director of L'Action Catholique, a Quebec daily, to ask me to write three full-page articles in that paper to warn Mr. Godbout about the danger of that interprovincial conference. I did so, and the conference came to no conclusion; it was adjourned until later on. What happened was summarized by a former provincial treasurer of Quebec, a Liberal who was in the cabinet of Alexandre Taschereau, the Honourable Mr. Nicol. It was the late Honourable Senator Nicol who, on June 26, 1952, in this chamber, spoke thus:

> There was no agreement under the British North America Act to do what it is now proposed to do. The power that the federal Government is using to collect the money is borrowed. When you borrow a thing you generally return it. It was borrowed first by Borden, then by King, and it has never been returned. If you borrow a thing and keep it permanently it is not borrowing, it is stealing; and the right of taxation is being stolen from the provinces.

This language was used by the Honourable Mr. Nicol, a former colleague of ours, and a well known Liberal of the province of Quebec.

I have just one word to say in answer to what the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) said about Canada being one country instead of ten. He was not the first one to say that. It was said in 1941, nineteen years ago, by a professor of Queen's University, over the radio. After his broadcast we were told that we could get a copy of his broadcast by writing to CBL Toronto. I wrote and I never got it. However, I heard him say the same thing, that Canada is not nine countries—at the time there were only nine provinces, and now there are ten—it was one large country. We may love our province, and we may love our country, just as we love our family and we love our neighbours, our municipal community. But what is important is to have a definite control of taxation, and it is absurd that all the money should be collected by the Government of Canada to be distributed as gifts to the various provinces. Very often the provinces enjoy it. They do not have the trouble of collecting the money. They are happier. They receive it from the Ottawa heaven, and they don't have to render any account about it. I was very particular about it yesterday at the Banking and Commerce committee when the bill was studied by our colleagues. We had a very good witness from the Department of Finance, and I asked him if any questions were put by the Government with regard to the expenditure of a university subsidy. He said, "No, it is distributed according to a certain ratio and no questions are asked." It is very, very easy to accept money under those circumstances, except when we take the trouble to read the Constitution to try to understand the intention of the lawmakers, of those who came together to build this country. They wanted every province to be independent, not to be the debtor of Ottawa.

Now, I am not opposed to this bill, because it is a step in the right direction. I am all for it, but the step is not long. It must necessarily be longer, and time will tell. The people will realize what it is, and they will realize what it is inasmuch as they have a sound teaching in the universities. Here we take for granted that all the teachings of the universities are above reproach. There are many things that are missing, and I do not think that the Government at Ottawa would interfere in the program; but every citizen who is the father of a family, whether he sits in the Parliament of Canada or outside of it, in the Legislatures or anywhere else, has the right to express his opinion about the teaching of sciences and arts in universities. And let us hope that there will be some improvement.

Now I come to my last point. When a thing is stolen from anyone and it is given back, it is not a gift, but a restitution, and the restitution should be unconditional. Therefore I hope that sooner or later the day will come when there will be nothing attached to such distribution of money, and the provinces will be free to collect their own taxes to meet all their needs. And it is my hope that we may convince those who do not think like us. It may take long, but they are open-minded and I do not despair for the future.

Hon. Gustave Monette: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I beg the pardon of the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette). I wonder if I may interrupt for a moment. I have a very important announcement to make. A short while ago this afternoon Mr. Gordon Fraser, member of Parliament for Peterborough, passed away very suddenly, and the House of Commons has adjourned for the day. That means we cannot possibly have royal assent this afternoon. I left the Senate chamber after speaking to His Honour the Speaker and the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and I find it is absolutely necessary that we have royal assent some time tomorrow. On that account I am forced to ask the Senate to allow me to revert to motions, so that I may move to rescind the motion I made early this afternoon, that when we adjourn today we stand adjourned until Tuesday evening next at 8 o'clock. With leave, I now move to rescind that motion.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, now that the motion has been carried I would suggest that senators who have already gone home be notified, or at any rate those who are within reasonable distance of Ottawa.

Hon. Gustave Monette: Honourable senators, I do not feel secure in my position this afternoon. I intended to make some remarks on the bill under discusion but I was detained in the Supreme Court of Canada the whole of this week and could not prepare proper notes to present to this honourable house on such a very important matter.

I do not know if it would be in order for me to move adjournment of the debate until next week.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You could adjourn it until tomorrow and we could get royal assent to this bill then.

Hon. Mr. Monette: I would be willing to adjourn it until tomorrow, but in any event I would not be prepared by then, and in view of that I beg the indulgence of the Senate to excuse me if my expressions in English are not sufficiently fluent and correct to do honour to the position I hold here in common with all of us.

I am going to vote for the bill, but I would make these remarks first. Honourable senators who preceded me in the debate spoke eloquently and ably on this very difficult matter. I regard it as a difficult matter because of the fact that we are a nation in the form of a confederation. As was stated by the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), our country consists of ten provinces—provinces which are more or less of different origin, of different temperament, and maybe of different mentality, but there is good faith on all sides. The matter is difficult also because the Constitution itself is not to clear on the subject-matter of this debate; and it is difficult also because among those provinces, which are distinct units—not nations, but within the nation—the resources and facilities for higher education may not be equal.

I am willing to partake to some extent of the opinion advanced to the effect that each province should definitely exercise its power of taxation without having to receive grants for education from the federal authority, or without having to contribute from its own taxation revenues, when taxation is at the hands of the federal authority, to other provinces. There is something technical about that. I can hardly follow the idea too far because since we are one country, and the provinces are united with a view of making one country, we should do everything reasonably possible to enhance and develop the brotherhood among us and the feeling that we are all co-citizens of one country.

It is a fact that there are some provinces whose present means—these may be changed later on—do not correspond to the means for other provinces. I cannot say that I am opposed to a system by which the central authority would come to the rescue of some provinces in matters that appear so important.

Apart from that, there is the Constitution. The Fathers of Confederation did their best, and they did a good job, since they had to anticipate so much of the future, in expressing what would be the legislative powers and the administrative powers of the different units, of the different provinces. They did a wonderful job, so wonderful that in spite of the new developments in economics and politics over the years this Constitution still stands. This does not mean that it should not receive some further consideration from the central authority, which has jurisdiction over amendments to the constitution.

In that thought I do not refer to any particular arrangement under the Constitution, and especially I do not refer to education. I am not well informed as to what arrangement could be made for a revision of the present system. Perhaps a committee of the Senate, which is composed of older and wiser citizens, might be able to deal adequately with the problem. But I am not in possession of sufficient information to suggest an arrangement by which there could be a more equitable apportionment of the resources of this country to meet the needs of the provinces.

Honourable senators, I listened closely to the speeches made on this subject, and I am intensely moved by the sincerity of the opinions expressed with a view to finding a solution to the problem before us. The good faith of all honourable senators appears so clear that I feel that from this body of wise and honest men and women we might be given a satisfactory solution of the problem of providing a little more just and equitable treatment for the provinces.

Having said that, I now turn to express my views on the Constitution in its present form with respect to the problem before us. I shall not attempt to make an exhaustive survey of the Constitution. Some of my opinions may be wrong, but on a difficult subject on which the Supreme Court of Canada has divided many times, how can one be certain that he has the correct answer?

Section 91 of the British North America Act sets out the legislative powers of the federal authority. It states first in general terms that the Parliament of Canada may legislate for the good government of Canada, as a whole. Then the section lays down some 29 classes of subjects over which the central Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction.

Paragraph 3 of the enumeration reads:

> The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation.

I cannot contend that those words do not mean what they say. Indeed, the federal authority has exclusive legislative jurisdiction for raising money by any mode or system of taxation. May I say, however, that this naturally involves indirect as well as direct modes of taxation.

On the other hand, section 92 of the B.N.A. Act, entitled "Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures", commences with these words:

> In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

Then follows the enumeration of 16 classes of subjects.

I have long held the view that the designation of jurisdiction to the provinces would be an exception to the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament, if in sections 91 and 92 there appeared the same or a similar class of subject-matters. However, I do not insist on that view. Section 92 provides that the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction to legislate with respect to direct taxation within the provinces in order to raise revenue for provincial purposes. That is to say, when the revenue to be raised is to be directed for provincial purposes, the provinces have the exclusive right of legislating for the raising of that money by direct taxation, not by indirect taxation.

Under the general principle of interpretation, the more particular direction is an exception to the general provision. Under that principle, when a province proceeds to legislate for direct taxation for the purpose of raising revenue for a provincial purpose, it proceeds within its exclusive power. Such a power is an exception to the general power assigned to the federal authority by section 91 to raise money by any mode or system of taxation.

There are here two conditions: first, the province should proceed by direct taxation; and second, the money should be raised for provincial purposes. To do that would be not only within the provincial power, but clearly within the exclusive provincial power. Section 91 grants to the federal authority the general power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. But the provinces when proceeding by direct taxation are within their exclusive right.

Then, it is not said for what purpose that federal taxation should be made. Therefore, it seems that the federal authority has the power to legislate for any kind of object by any mode whatsoever, save that exception in section 92.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Government announced either today or yesterday that it was giving $10,000 to Chile. I suppose it would have the authority to give $10,000 to Chile under the section the honourable senator mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Monette: I do not deny that. I am not formulating a proposition; I am analysing at the moment.

Surely there is a contradiction between those two sections, unless we accept the rule that the more restricted power given to the provinces to tax by direct taxation should for the purposes of the province override the more general power in section 91. However, that is not so clearly the case, because the last paragraph of section 91 reads:

> And any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

So, there are two classes of enumerated powers—provincial and federal—and they are enumerated in exclusive terms, but it was in an attempt to reconcile them that that last paragraph of section 91 was added. Many have claimed that under that last paragraph of section 91 all the powers of the provinces coming in conflict with any of the powers enumerated in section 91 are overruled. Yet that last paragraph of section 91 says only:

> ...shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature... assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

It is not all the matters assigned to the provinces, but only the matters of a local and private nature, assigned exclusively to the provinces, which cannot interfere with the enumerated matters in section 91 assigned exclusively to the federal authority. So, apart from the matters of a local and private nature mentioned in section 92, the other matters therein mentioned are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial Governments, notwithstanding the last paragraph of section 91.

I want here only to indicate the great difficulty that exists under the Constitution with respect to the arrangement of those powers.

Section 93 says that the Legislatures of the provinces may exclusively make laws in relation to education. It has been said, and I agree, that matters of education are not restricted to teaching; the term extends to all of the needs of education, including buildings and other necessities, and here we include higher education as well as primary and secondary education. Here we are faced with these other exclusive powers which belong to the provinces. Perhaps the section was put there because the thinking and the background of the culture, or the cultural ambitions, of each of the components of Confederation at the time produced a variety of views. That may be the explanation of why power to legislate as to education was given exclusively to the provinces.

That is why I suggest, honourable senators, that the Senate, a body of which I have had the honour of being a member for three years, and where I have been impressed by the broadmindedness of all its members, might do well to appoint a committee to consider and review this question. Perhaps such a committee would make some recommendations with the thought in mind that it was surely the intention of the Fathers of Confederation to respect as much as possible the honest views of all the citizens of Canada. In that way we might find a solution to this problem.

I shall now say why I intend to vote for this bill. It offers a solution, though a temporary one, to the problem. Many solutions adopted during the war were temporary. During the war, when it was felt that this and other countries were in danger, some things which are very important in times of peace were not discussed. Under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act the provinces have always had the right to levy moneys by direct taxation, but they renounced that power to a considerable extent, as a temporary measure only, and transferred it to the federal authority. After the war it was discovered that the federal authority had become accustomed to receiving the proceeds from very high taxation, and, contrary to the expectation of many provinces, not only of Quebec, the federal authority did not abandon the amounts it was used to receiving from the high taxation imposed on the country during the war. There came a time when it was necessary to know whether the power surrendered by the provinces would be handed back to them. If I am wrong in this, I wish to be corrected.

That power was not handed back because, in a way, the federal authority could claim that under item 3 of section 91 it had the power to raise money by any mode of taxation, while the provinces had the exclusive power to levy money by direct taxation. However, the taxation field was not abandoned by the federal Government, but sometime later the Government of the day did make the arrangements that have been referred to by honourable senators who have spoken before me. In my opinion those arrangements were not fully satisfactory, in view of the understandings that had been reached during the war. The provinces found it too difficult and costly to the population to duplicate the collection of these taxes to which they had exclusive right. So the province of Quebec, as well as the other provinces, were faced with the situation of having to receive the grants or to refuse them. These grants were made with our own money. During the war we had abstained from exercising our full power of taxation, and now we could not resume this right because it would be too burdensome to duplicate the same tax. There were grounds for questioning the constitutionality of this procedure, and even those who justified the move have to admit it was debatable.

Now we have a new arrangement in the bill before the house. It is a great improvement over the previous arrangements, and I congratulate all honourable senators on this new desire for conciliation. However, the question is not finally settled. I for one would refrain from admitting directly or indirectly that this remedy is a final solution of the situation in relation to the spirit of our Constitution and the rights of the provinces. With that reservation I am going to vote for the bill.

Let me make it clear that if under the actual circumstances we are forced to accept a solution like this, it shall not be interpreted as an amendment to the Constitution, by way of precedent. We have a written Constitution, enacted by law, and that could not be amended by a mere remedial bill on a very particular and exceptional issue.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

WAWANESA MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Olive L. Irvine moved the second reading of Bill S-33, to incorporate The Wawanesa Mutual Life Insurance Company.

She said: Honourable senators, it is my responsibility today to move the second reading of two private bills which are complementary to each other. I propose, therefore, in moving the second reading of Bill S-33, entitled An Act to incorporate The Wawanesa Mutual Life Insurance Company, to discuss the principle of that bill and also the principle of the complementary legislation, Bill S-34, entitled An Act respecting The Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company. These bills cannot be dealt with intelligently unless they are dealt with together.

The Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company was first incorporated under the Mutual Fire Insurance Act of the province of Manitoba in 1896. This was followed by incorporation under special act of the Parliament of Canada assented to on May 1, 1929. It has been in active operation for some 64 years.

Although the head office of the company is, and always has been, in the comparatively small town of Wawanesa, Manitoba, the company which writes fire and casualty insurance has been conspicuously successful and operates throughout Canada. It is one of the largest mutual fire insurance companies in Canada and, as at December 31, 1959, had admitted assets of nearly $30 million, a surplus of over $8 million, Government deposits of more than $12 million and insurance in force of more than $1,200 million.

The company has taken a leading part in many developments in the field of insurance. For some time the directors and officers of the company have been considering organizing a mutual life insurance company with the object of utilizing further its extensive network of branches and agencies throughout Canada. The project was acted upon by the directors early this year. At the suggestion of the Department of Insurance, the principle was submitted to a special general meeting of the members, that is, the policyholders, of the parent company, since that company will provide, if these bills are passed, the guarantee fund for the new life company. The proposal was unanimously approved by the members at the meeting held on April 29 last. To give effect to this decision, the act incorporating the parent company requires amendment, giving specific authority for contributing the guarantee fund.

The bills have been under careful study and review by the Superintendent of Insurance and his officers. Should the Senate refer the bills to a standing committee, not only the Superintendent but the senior officers of the company will be available to supply further information that may be desired.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I thought I had everything arranged so that we could have royal assent tomorrow morning, or tomorrow at 12.45 p.m., and I was about to move that when the Senate adjourns it stand adjourned until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. However, another message arrived a moment or two later stating that it was impossible for Government House to arrange matters at that time on account of the arrival of the King of Nepal, and I have been asked to hold the matter in abeyance for a short time in the hope that before 6 o'clock we shall be able to decide definitely whether to adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning or until 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. Therefore I move that we now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell in about fifteen minutes time.

May 26 - 1960

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.55 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

The second plenary session, held in Ottawa on June 27, was convened in order to hear the reports that had been prepared by each of the committees. It was agreed that these reports should not be made public in the form presented but that their substance might be embodied in the reports which the delegations might wish to present to their respective legislative bodies. After hearing the reports the delegates made suggestions for suitable agenda topics for consideration at future meetings of the Group. Included amongst these suggestions were the following:

(1) Obstacles to International Trade.

(2) Problems of Agricultural Surpluses (especially wheat).

(3) The Tourist Trade and ways to increase it.

(4) The Canada-United States Air Agreement.

(5) United States Investments in Canada.

(6) Corridor through the Alaska Panhandle.

(7) Canada-United States Development of the Yukon River.

(8) The Alaska International Rail and Highway Commission.

It was generally agreed that the three committees on Defence, Trade and Economic Affairs and Boundary Waters should be retained for such future meetings.

Following are digests of the three reports:

Committee 1:—Defence and Defence Production

A broad measure of agreement was reached between the Canadian and United States delegations on basic defence policies and on measures for implementation. It was conceded, however, that because of the unique degree of interdependence between Canada and the United States in the defence field, there was a likelihood that bilateral problems not shared by other members of the free world alliance would arise and would require special solutions. The special nature of these defence relationships also led the delegations to conclude that there was a need for Canadian and United States legislators to exchange views regularly on problems of common concern in this field so as to be able to discharge more effectively their respective responsibilities relating to continental defence; the forum provided by the Interparliamentary Group was considered as eminently suited to accomplish this purpose.

The desirability of using Canadian engineering skills in industrial capacity in defence production to the greatest degree practicable was emphasized by the Canadian delegation. The suggestion was made that visits by the Interparliamentary Group to defence production facilities in Canada might be considered as a worthwhile project for the future. The Canadian delegation also emphasized that the plans for integrating the defence forces must be accompanied by a comparable sharing of the related industrial effort. While recognizing the validity of this point, the United States delegation intimated that the implementation of such a policy must of necessity be subject to numerous practical considerations.

The Committee also considered matters relating to the storage of nuclear war-heads, the stationing of U.S. troops in Canada and the development of communications between Alaska and continental United States.

The Committee agreed that because of the special nature of the Canada-United States defence effort, the continuation of an Interparliamentary Group Committee to consider these matters was of the utmost importance and that at least some continuity of membership should, if at all possible, be preserved.

Committee 2:—Trade and Economic Affairs

Canadian-United States trade problems were considered against the background of Canada's current trade deficit with the United States, the offsetting inflow of capital, the pattern of United States Investment in Canada (largely in basic resource industries), Canada's high degree of dependence on foreign trade, and the economic implications of the concept of an integrated North American defence policy, all of which were considered as having a special bearing on internationally accepted trade rules and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Oil

The Canadian delegation expressed satisfaction at the United States decision, announced on April 30, 1959, to exempt Canada from mandatory controls on the import of oil effective June 1, 1959. Concern was nonetheless felt by the Canadian group that the controls on Canadian oil imports might be reimposed; it was emphasized that in the interest of continental economic stability, Canadian crude must be free to move in the United States market wherever it is able to compete on the basis of price and other economic considerations. It was generally agreed that the oil problem should be considered on a continental basis.

Natural Gas

Administrative delays in processing applications were considered as worthy of special attention. A suggestion was made that, in promoting co-operation between the Federal Power Commission and the newly established National Energy Board, consideration be given to admitting as evidence before the FPC briefs already presented to and accepted by the NEB.

Uranium

Current over-production of uranium was recognized as a basic problem for this commodity. The importance of maintaining the productive capacity of economically efficient Canadian mines was particularly stressed and, in this connection, the Canadian delegation expressed the hope that the United States would continue to buy substantial quantities of Canadian uranium once the present long-term contracts had expired in 1962-63. The United States delegation offered the counter suggestion that a solution to this serious problem might be found in sealing down deliveries under present contracts so as to extend the productive life of existing mines. It was recognized that uranium marketing presented very serious problems.

Lead and Zinc

The difficulties facing the producers of lead and zinc in both Canada and the United States were discussed in considerable detail. The Canadian delegation represented that United States restrictions on the importation of lead and zinc were contrary to the obligations set down in GATT. On the United States side, the suggestion was made that an alternative method of dealing with this important sector of the economy might be a combination of production subsidies and a mandatory increase in tariff.

The Committee agreed that problems connected with the production and marketing of lead and zinc deserved to be considered on a continental basis and from a long-term point of view.

Copper

The Canadian delegation expressed concern at the possibility that United States import controls might be introduced and also that the copper market might be adversely affected by sales from the United States strategic stock piles. The United States delegation indicated that there was little likelihood that copper would be released from the strategic stock pile since there would be no substantial economic advantage to the United States in doing so.

Nickel, Iron Ore and Aluminum

Canadian members expressed concern at the effects on the nickel market of the entry into production of United States nickel mines in Cuba mentioning in particular the discrimination resulting from free entry of unrefined Cuban metal into the United States and the difficulty which this would present to the refined product processed in Canada which was subject to duty.

It was pointed out by the United States delegation that the opening of the St.

Lawrence Seaway would place Canadian iron ore in a favoured position in the U.S. market and that this would have beneficial effects on the development of industrial production on both sides of the border. It was recognized that the opening of the Seaway was likely to have an adverse effect on the development of low-grade properties particularly in Minnesota.

Canadian members mentioned that Canada's aluminum industry was at present operating at 55% of installed capacity whereas United States production was being maintained at between 85-90%. It was suggested that the situation might be eased to some extent if the United States would buy fabricated Canadian aluminum products.

General Considerations

It was recognized that Canada and the United States faced somewhat similar problems in the production and marketing of many minerals and that for a number of reasons these problems should be considered on a continental basis and from a long-term point of view. Some consideration was given to the problem of effects on the world trading situation and developments such as the European Economic Community. Marketing procedures adopted by the EEC could conceivably point the way to dealing with marketing problems in North America. Some consideration was given to the possibilities of dealing with basic minerals on a hemispheric basic to include both North and South America.

Committee 3—Boundary Waters

The Committee considered that the term "Boundary Waters" was not sufficiently broad to cover the matters which could usefully be discussed in this Committee. It was therefore suggested that the terms of reference for Committee 3 be broadened so as to include all boundary matters such as communications, utilization and conservation of water resources, recreation, wilderness areas, etc. Arising out of the discussion in this Committee, it was agreed that the resources represented by boundary waters should be conserved and utilized on a basis which would be fair to both countries and in such a manner as to confer maximum benefit on both countries.

In recognition of the power needs of the Columbia River Basin, the Committee expressed the hope that an early start could be made on developing the resources which the Columbia River has to offer so as to extend maximum benefits to the peoples of the two countries.

In considering the matter of pilotage on the Great Lakes, reference was made to the conflicting legislative proposals which had been introduced into the United States Congress and the Canadian Parliament. Concern was expressed at the prospect of unilateral legislative action being taken before discussions aimed at reconciling the divergent views had been concluded by the interested agencies of the two governments.

The Committee noted that consultations had been proposed between Canada and the United States to consider the question of the effect of additional extractions of water from the Great Lakes Basin and expressed the hope that these consultations would have beneficial results.

In view of the growing number of and perplexity of problems arising in the Great Lakes region as a result of the rapid growth in population, industrial development and Seaway traffic, the Committee suggested that the Steering Committee of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group collect all existing reports, studies and other data relating to the problems of pollution, recreation, conservation, power utilization, industrial location, port facilities and navigation and examine and evaluate the means available for assuring adequate coordination between the two countries in dealing with such problems.

It was recognized that the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes are likely to give rise to a number of issues and problems. It was considered desirable therefore that the means be available for defining issues, collecting relevant data and formulating opinions and constructive suggestions related to these matters. The Steering Committee was therefore urged to explore the adequacy of existing institutions and procedures established for dealing with these matters.

The Committee expressed interest in the economic feasibility study of the Passamaquoddy Tidal Power project which was due to be made public before the end of the year and expressed the hope that this study would indicate that mutual benefits would accrue to areas in both countries if the power could be made available. Mention was also made of the desirability of preserving a Minnesota wilderness area and of developing mutually beneficial power grids along the international border.

The Committee recognized that some of the irritations that arise between Canada and the United States stem from fundamental differences between the two systems of government. Legislators were therefore urged to consult and seek advice from colleagues who had had the opportunity of participating in the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group meetings.

The group continued its procedures of having informal, off-the-record discussions and refrained from making recommendations, leaving it to each national delegation to make such reports and recommendations to its respective authorizing institutions as it determines.

The Group met in plenary sessions on Thursday morning and Friday afternoon and held two sets of Committee meetings on Thursday afternoon and Friday morning. At the first plenary session United States Secretary of State, the Honourable Christian Herter, welcomed the Canadian delegates and wished the meetings success. In the plenary sessions delegates from both countries laid stress on the necessity for the people of each country to learn more about the other. The suggestion was made that the education systems in the United States and Canada might well take account of this need.

Following are the reports of the three Committees to the plenary meeting on Friday afternoon. The text of these reports were embodied in a communiqué released to the Press on April 22.

The Committee on Defence and Disarmament discussed certain aspects of defence policy, and the use of North American productive facilities for defence purposes, which have implications of mutual importance to the United States and Canada. The Committee also discussed the prospects for disarmament and the need for planning that will facilitate an orderly transition from military production to production for peaceful purposes, including public works.

There was general agreement that while seeking with all vigor for an understanding with the Communist bloc based on mutual trust and confidence, the West must maintain adequate defences until the Soviet camp accepts an inspection and control system of sufficient scope and efficiency to justify the commencement of active measures of disarmament.

The committee considered the changing character of the threat to North America and the effect of this on the operations of the North American Air Defense Command (NORAD). It was recognized that in addition to the military problems which will have to be faced during the next few years, the adoption of new weapons systems and concepts of defence will cause local economic readjustments which in some areas may be severe.

The Committee noted that during the last year there had been considerable progress in the program of defence production sharing between the United States and Canada. This was reflected in the fact that Canadian industry in 1959 received United States defence contracts valued at 96.3 million dollars; it was noted, however, that Canadian defence equipment purchases in the United States in the same period amounted to 116.6 million dollars. The Canadian members of the Committe expressed the view that the progress achieved to date was in no small measure due to the consideration given to the problem by the Interparliamentary Group at its meeting in June 1959. There was general agreement that a continuing effort was needed in both countries to achieve and maintain an adequate balance in defence purchasing between Canada and the United States.

The Committee on Trade and Economic Problems approved the following summary of its discussions—

1. COMMON TRADE PROBLEMS Especially With Western Europe

The Committee agreed that economic progress abroad and the changing pattern of trading relations in Europe were creating new opportunities and serious problems for Canada and the United States. It was recognized that the interests of our two countries diverged to some extent in the face of these developments, partly because of political considerations and partly because of the greater dependence of Canada on international trade and the narrower range of its exports.

The merits and demerits of solutions based on different methods of computing tariffs and of tax relief were briefly explored. No firm agreement was reached concerning the respective cases for the "Inner Six" and "Outer Seven" but a consensus did appear on the need for the United States and Canada to co-operate closely and to work toward new arrangements with their European allies on a North Atlantic basis.

2. BILATERAL PROBLEMS

(a) The Canadian Oil Problem

Attention was drawn to the difficulties being experienced in the Canadian oil industry (particularly in Alberta) due to lack of markets for increasing oil supplies. Canadian delegates described various possible solutions, notably that of increasing domestic consumption, recognizing that some of these have foreign policy implications. Reference was also made to recently issued Canadian regulations governing oil and gas exploration in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

(b) Metals and Minerals

The Committee recognized the intimate and important relationship between United States and Canadian production and markets for such commodities as lead and zinc, aluminum, copper, nickel and uranium. A United States delegate described the depressed lead and zinc condition in his country and foresaw no significant change in conditions over the near future in respect of either production or importation.

The delegates then considered the uranium and aluminum situations. In view of recent developments, the discussion on uranium was mainly in terms of the prospects which might emerge in a few years time, which did not now appear very auspicious for producers. On the other hand, the outlook for aluminum was regarded as more promising.

A United States delegate drew general attention to the increasing significance of Latin American markets for both Canada and the United States, and to the implications of prospective competition from expanding Latin American production of commodities such as oil, gas, and iron ore.

(c) Wheat

There was considerable detailed discussion of the surplus wheat problem confronting both the United States and Canada. No new approach was advanced for the problem, and there was general agreement that current arrangements, unsatisfactory though they might be, were still the best available in the existing situation. Both delegations were anxious to ensure continuing close bilateral consultations in order to avoid damage to established foreign commercial markets; Canadian delegates expressed their gratification at the way in which this consultation had developed.

The Committee on Boundary Problems.

The Committee on Boundary Problems came to the following conclusions which were reported to the plenary session:

1. Passamaquoddy Tidal Power Project

It is important to determine whether the Passamaquoddy Project is economically feasible. Meanwhile, judgment should be reserved awaiting further studies by the International Joint Commission. The Committee feels that this topic should be retained on its agenda.

2. Hudson-Champlain-Richelieu Waterway

Now that the St. Lawrence Seaway is in operation the two Governments should consider referring to the International Joint Commission the question of the economic feasibility of further development of this Waterway, taking into account the possible increase in trade between Canada and the United States which might result.

3. Columbia River Basin Development

The Canadians welcomed statements by United States delegates that no particular project of interest to the United States delegates should be allowed to stand in the way of a treaty on this subject based on the principle of optimum development of the Columbia River Basin with mutual sharing of the benefits. Once this principle has been adopted by the two Governments particular projects will fall into their appropriate order.

4. Chicago Diversion

This subject was again thoroughly and vigourously discussed and no change of the positions of the respective delegates emerged. The Canadian delegation appreciates the waste disposal problem facing Chicago.

5. Pollution in the Great Lakes

Both delegations expressed concern about increasing pollution both from lake cities and shipping. It was agreed that it would be useful for the two Governments to study remedial measures.

6. Yukon-Alaska Problems

Canadian delegates expressed concern that a proposed high dam at Rampart, Alaska, may prejudice maximum development for the benefit of both countries of the Yukon River power potential. Canadian delegates raised the question of some form of free port facilities for Canada in the Alaska panhandle and corridors across it. United States delegates suggested that additional information about these matters be furnished to them before the next meeting of the Group and that they be placed on the agenda for the next meeting.

Following the meetings in Washington, the Group toured the Strategic Air Command Headquarters in Omaha, Nebraska, and NORAD Headquarters in Colorado Springs. This tour enabled the Canadian delegates to obtain a fuller appreciation of the role being played by the two countries in the defence of North America and the free world.

The United States Section of the Group has been invited to Canada in August, 1960, for which time visits to certain industrial and mining areas are being planned.

In presenting these reports which are mainly factual, the members of the Canadian delegation would like to express their conviction that these interparliamentary exchanges have been of great value, not only to those participating, but to both countries in supplying a direct channel of communication and understanding between Parliament and Congress and an opportunity of developing personal friendships between members of the legislatures of the two countries. We are confident that the exchange is well worth continuing. We feel that it will be even more effective if the following recommendations are implemented:

(1) That continuity be preserved from one meeting to the next by ensuring that in a delegation of twenty-four, from nine to twelve of the members attending one meeting be appointed on the delegation to the next;

(2) That the personnel of the Canadian Delegation be settled as early as possible in each Session of Paliament so that members may have ample opportunity to prepare themselves for the forthcoming meeting of the Group;

(3) That a Secretary be designated from an appropriate staff to work with the Joint Chairmen, to assist in planning of and preparation for the meetings and to give continuity to our proceedings;

(4) That the delegation favours a meeting in Ottawa while the Canadian Parliament is in Session.

We conclude by expressing our appreciation of the excellent assistance and staff work which the Canadian Delegation has had from a number of senior officials in various departments of the Canadian Government.

Dated at Ottawa the 24th day of May, 1960.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,

(Translation):

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to say a few words on this subject? What I want to say is that the Honourable the Chief Justice of Canada has come several times in succession to give the royal sanction to certain bills. Today I am very glad that it should be the turn of the Honourable Mr. Justice Robert Taschereau.

(Text):

I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if he would be kind enough to convey a wish to His Excellency. It is that all the judges of the Supreme Court should be appointed in turn to give the royal sanction in order that we may have the privilege of seeing each one of them successively.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 31, 1960 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

[1] Preliminary

RUMOURED VISIT OF PARLIAMENTARIANS TO SOVIET UNION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators, before the orders of day are proceeded with I should like to invoke the good offices of the Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in regard to two specific matters. First, there has been a very persistent rumour that a delegation of parliamentarians has been arranged for to visit the Soviet Union in the near future. If that is within the knowledge of the honourable leader, I ask that he take the house into his confidence and tell us something more in regard to it.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Hon. Mr. Robertson: The second matter I wish to mention is this. Yesterday there was published in the Senate Hansard a comprehensive report of the activities of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, including a report of the second and third meetings—the second having taken place about a year ago, and the third more recently. There are, I am sure, matters of great interest in that report, and therefore I would suggest to the honourable leader that whoever presented it might move that it be adopted by the Senate, in order to afford an opportunity to anyone who wishes to discuss it or matters pertaining thereto.

I might remind the honourable leader that in response to a question some time ago, the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt), who is one of the active members of the Interparliamentary Group, suggested that when a report was published an opportunity might be then available to obtain additional information or make comment; but I see no way in which, under ordinary circumstances, we can participate in any discussion unless there is a motion for adoption of the report before the Senate.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT AS TO TENURE OF OFFICE OF JUDGES

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I notice from the Order Paper that the first order of business for Tuesday next will be consideration of a motion with respect to the tenure of office of judges. May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if it is his intention to proceed with that motion on Tuesday?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I intend to ask that it stand for another two weeks.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

On the Order:

Resuming the postponed debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, for second reading of Bill S-25, intituled: "An Act to make Provision for the Disclosure of Information in respect of Finance Charges".—(Honourable Senator Connolly, Ottawa West).

Hon. John J. Connolly (West Ottawa): Honourable senators, at the outset perhaps I should say that I had thought I would speak for approximately twenty minutes, but I would not want to interfere with the royal assent which I understand is to be given at approximately a quarter to four. If I have not finished at an appropriate time, it could be called to my attention and I will gladly stop and continue at another time convenient to honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The sponsor of the bill, the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), is not present, so why not let it stand and make one address on it on Tuesday next when all interested are here?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is perfectly agreeable to me to speak at this time or to let it stand.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I suggest that the honourable senator go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As has been pointed out, the sponsor of the bill is not present. Probably he would like to hear what is said. However, we will leave it up to the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is a question whether the sponsor would want to reply to what the honourable senator from Ottawa West says.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

RAILWAY BILL

On the order for the second reading of Bill C-61, intituled "An Act to amend An Act to amend the Railway Act".

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, if I had known that the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) was not going to proceed this afternoon with his remarks on the Finance Charges (Disclosure) Bill, I would have been ready to go on with this order, but under the circumstances I will have to ask that it stand also.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: You are excused.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Agreed.

GUESTS IN SENATE GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a very friendly visitor from Australia, Senator the Honourable Sir Walter Cooper, a member of the Senate of Australia and Minister for Repatriation. Sir Walter is accompanied by his Private Secretary, Mr. McGregor.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I would like to add a word or two to the greeting extended by His Honour the Speaker. A very short time ago my colleague from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) and I were privileged to attend the meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Australia. Most of the success of that gathering was due to the present President of the Senate of Australia, Sir Alister McMullin, who is now head of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

It will interest honourable senators to know that our distinguished visitor has a most outstanding war record, and that in the Australian cabinet he holds the portfolio that equals that of the Minister of Veterans Affairs in our cabinet. I am sure all honourable senators extend every greeting to our distinguished visitor, and we trust that his visit in Canada will be very successful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 449 to 463, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, you will no doubt be pleased when I tell you we are nearing the completion of the lengthy list of divorce cases for this session. It seems a long time since the committee commenced its work, and you will have noted that we have now presented 463 reports. During the session 609 petitions have been presented, which is perhaps our record of all time.

The following table shows the situation to date:

Petitions presented		609
Petitions recommended	457
Petitions withdrawn	14
Petitions rejected	7
Petitions pending	131
	609	609

Of the 131 petitions pending, 17 have been listed for hearing, leaving a balance of 114. We propose to deal with the 17 petitions as follows: On Friday, June 3, there will be 10 cases on the docket for hearing; on Tuesday, June 7, 4 cases, and on Tuesday, June 14, 3 cases. We shall list no cases for trial after June 14. I have mentioned the number of cases now ready for trial. Other petitioners may wish to be heard at this session, but if they are to be heard they must have their cases ready for hearing prior to June 14 or they will go over to the next session.

The work of the committee is about the same now as it has been at this stage of previous sessions. Usually about 20 per cent of the cases listed for hearing at a session are not proceeded with and go over to the next session. The number of cases pending, namely, 114, is 18.7 per cent, which would be less than the usual number of cases to go over.

I wish to emphasize the point, so that all those who are interested may take note, that cases that are not ready by June 14 and placed on the docket for hearing will not be heard at this session, unless very special circumstances occur and are advanced to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable chairman a question? Perhaps this is not a question I should address to him, but I will do so any way. Can he tell us how many of the divorce bills passed by the Senate have been passed by the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have only a hazy and inaccurate knowledge of that matter. The other house passed one bill today. I call your attention to the fact that I have said nothing with regard to this situation in the reports which I have made from time to time during the present session. The delay is not our responsibility.

I am hoping that the House of Commons is not entirely ineffective, inept and impotent, that in due season the rights of these parties will be observed in that house, and that the bills we have sent there will be properly adjudicated. Anything else is unthinkable. I point out to my fellow senators that each of these divorce petitioners has paid us, the Parliament of Canada, $210, on the understanding that we are honest and will adjudicate their cases. To do anything else would be highly improper, altogether wrong, dishonest, and very unkind. I do not expect such a thing to take place in the Parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 25, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure there are many of us who agree that we are indebted to the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) for having brought before Parliament and the country notice of a situation which has caused much concern. I refer to the practice prevalent throughout Canada on the part of some operators—and I expressly call them by that name—of exacting exorbitant charges and discounts from people who, usually, are poor or who are in distress because of sickness or perhaps because of business reverses. I am sure all of us know of examples where unconscionable amounts of money have been exacted on so-called loans, where usurious practices have been adopted and where discounts and other charges have created an intolerable situation for such people. We all know there are advertising practices which induce people to extravagance, to purchase things at a cost beyond their capacity to pay. I suppose we will always have such people in the community, and I think we should do everything we can within the power of Parliament to remedy this whole situation.

In studying this bill I have been torn between two extremes, one of considering the point of view I have just expressed, and the second of considering the question of whether Parliament has the power to do what the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina has proposed. Perhaps he knows more about the constitutional position than I do, and I do not intend to dwell on it at any great length tonight. Because of the view I hold as to our capacity to deal with matters such as are contained in this bill, I think I would have preferred, had I introduced this subject, to have used the device we employ here, and I think to very good effect, of drawing the attention of the Senate to a certain situation and allowing a debate to proceed upon that basis. It is somewhat similar to the procedure followed in the House of Lords in moving for papers, and in that way starting a debate and later, with permission, withdrawing the motion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There are no teeth in that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am coming to that point. What I think the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina may have had in mind in presenting a concrete bill was that each individual senator would then have to take his responsibility on the question of whether the bill should pass.

"Finance charges" are described in the bill as "interest, fees, bonuses, service charges, discounts and any similar type of charge". The bill requires that a percentage relationship should be worked out between the finance charge and the principal obligation in terms of interest at so much per annum.

The first point I feel I would consider is the fact that if this bill is to be justified in the sense of being valid and constitutional, it must find its justification in one of three subsections of section 91 of the British North America Act. Those three subsections are 19, which deals with interest; 2, which deals with trade and commerce, and 27, which deals with the criminal law.

Interest is mentioned in the bill, but so too are fees, bonuses, and service charges. In my view, merely to call them interest, or to assimilate them to interest, does not make them interest. It is not my intention to burden the house with a lengthy and heavy dissertation on the legal position. If I were in court I would have to be a good deal more tedious than I propose to be on this point.

The Dairy Industry Reference Case in the Supreme Court of Canada, which is popularly known as the "Margarine case", which is reported in 1949 S.C.R., page 1, for my purpose seems to collect most of the views of the courts both in this country and in England which bear upon this point. I should like to refer briefly to a few extracts from this case. First of all, I should like to quote Mr. Justice Estey at page 70 of that case, where he says:

> The prohibition of the manufacture and sale in section 5 (2) directly interferes with the freedom of individuals and corporate bodies to engage in the business of manufacturing or selling the specified food products, including oleomargarine and margarine. As such it is legislation in relation to property and civil rights within the meaning of section 92 (13), with respect to which the provinces have the exclusive right to legislate, unless the legislation in question may be held to be competent Dominion legislation within the other provisions of the B.N.A. Act.

I should like also to refer to a statement by Mr. Justice Kellock, at page 60 of the same report, where he says:

> ... the interference by the Dominion in the way of prohibiting the carrying on of a particular business by the inhabitants of a province, except upon terms laid down by the Dominion is an interference with civil rights in the province, a subject committed to the provincial legislatures under section 92(13).

A little further on he says this:

> ... the regulation of trade and commerce within the meaning of section 91 (2). In the Insurance case (1916 1 A.C. 588 at 596), Viscount Haldane said: Their Lordships think that as the result of these decisions it must now be taken that the authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not extend to the regulation by a licensing system of a particular trade in which Canadians would otherwise be free to engage in the provinces ...

If I may make one more reference, Mr. Justice Kellock says this:

> What was said by Duff, J., as he then was, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in the Reciprocal Insurers' case (1924) A.C. 328, at 342, approved of in the Insurance Reference (1932) A.C. 41, at 53, is appropriate.

And this was what Duff, J. said there, speaking for the Privy Council:

> In accordance with the principle inherent in these decisions their Lordships think it is no longer open to dispute that the Parliament of Canada cannot, by purporting to create penal sanctions under s. 91, head 27, appropriate to itself exclusively a field of jurisdiction in which, apart from such a procedure it could exert no legal authority, ...

Honourable senators, as I see it—and I say this as strictly my own interpretation—I think that the measure before us this evening for consideration contravenes the provisions of section 92, subsection (13), which deals with property and civil rights and gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction in that domain. Perhaps it may be oversimplifying it to say so, but if honourable senators will look at this bill they will see the word "interest" used, and Parliament has authority to deal with interest, but they will also see the words "fees, bonuses, service charges, discounts and any similar type of charge". These are all matters which we know are dealt with by contract within the provinces and which normally fall within provincial jurisdiction. To call them interest or assimilate them to interest, or to require them to be reduced to interest, in my humble opinion does not make them interest.

May I come to another branch of the bill? I approach it with some trepidation, because it is an economic discussion and I am not a professional economist. According to the report produced by the Bank of Canada statistical summary for March 1960, the amount of credit outstanding in Canada and extended to consumers by finance companies and retail dealers, as at December 31, 1959, was roughly $2,187,000,000. According to the budget papers which were presented in the other place the day before the budget was brought down, in the table showing the gross national expenditures—and the total was $34,593,000,000—the largest item in that table was for personal expenditures on consumer goods and services, and that item was $22,261,000,000. Now, I realize these figures do not fit the way a glove should fit a hand, but I think the two used in juxtaposition in this way will give honourable senators at least this idea, that of the $22 billion expended by Canadians for consumer goods and services in 1959, at the end of the year over $2 billion of that was still outstanding on credit. This is about 9 or 10 per cent of the total expenditure on consumer goods and services. I think it points up this, that credit is a very important item in the economy of this country. Whether this much credit is a wise situation to obtain in the economy is another thing, but that it is wanted I think there can be no doubt at all. If the credit is required and if it is wanted, then there will be charges imposed by the people who are going to supply it. They have services to perform, they have overhead, they have a business to run.

Now, I ask myself, who has arranged this credit? The answer to that, I think, lies mainly in the fact that it is arranged by the customers who go to make these purchases of consumer goods from the retail merchants of this country. I have tried to get an accurate estimate of the number of retail merchants today. The census of 1951 shows that there were 151,626 operating in Canada. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics officials, to whom I directed my inquiry, told me that they expect the number will be closer to 180,000 at the time of the census in 1961. These are the people, whether they be department stores, corner grocery stores, appliance stores, —the people who do the retail business of this country—who extend the credit. Perhaps honourable senators will be interested to know the distribution of these retailers. The food and beverage industry, over 65,000; general merchandising, 16,000; automotive dealers, 18,000; apparel and accessory dealers, 16,000; furniture and appliance dealers, 5,000; building materials, 7,000; drugs and health appliances, nearly 5,000. I am using round figures. According to that census there are 8,700 retail merchants in Toronto, 11,000 in Montreal, 1,400 in Edmonton, 4,000 in Vancouver. There are various ways in which you can count these people and indicate their distribution. These are the people who extend the credit to the purchasing public.

How is this credit distributed? Well, I find that of the $2,187,000,000 worth of credit outstanding at the end of 1959, $729 million was held by instalment finance companies, $479 million was held by small loan companies, $315 million was held by department stores, and the other retailers of the country held $601 million.

The banks are not specifically mentioned in this particular table, and I think I need not deal specifically with them here except to say this, that if bank credit is too broadly extended, presumably the provisions of the Bank Act are available for amendment. I do not propose to deal with the small loan companies either, because presumably they should be controlled by the Small Loan Companies Act. There are four small loan companies, and there are 75 licensed money lenders, all licensed under that act, and presumably the control, if this Parliament can exercise it, should be provided for in the legislation which affects this type of institution.

I come back to the three remaining organizations which hold the balance of this credit. The retailers hold $601 million of it: Of this, $273 million is instalment credit and $328 million is on their ordinary charge accounts. The department stores hold $315 million of this credit; their charge accounts represent $64 million, instalment credit $251 million. Then, the instalment finance companies hold $792 million.

The point that I wish to make at this juncture of my remarks is this, that the instalment finance companies do not deal directly with the purchaser. The purchaser goes to the retailer to make his purchase of consumer goods and it may be that he will finance it. If he does, his dealer first of all takes his contract, and if the finance company agrees to come into it, he in turn will assign to the finance company.

The point I desire to make particularly, honourable senators, is the fact that this measure is not going to reach the finance companies. This bill is going to affect the man who deals with the public, the man who deals with the buyer. It is going to affect the retailer primarily.

I say this bill is going to impose a burden upon the retailer to make the computation required by the bill. Honourable senators will remember that a few nights ago the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) referred to an example which was presented to a U.S. Senate committee, similar to committees we have in this house. It was the case of a transaction in which a man desired to buy a $20 battery on time at 4½ months, and the charge was $2 for the period. Economists, men in the senators' offices and specialists were asked to compute the interest rate per annum on this. Apparently none of these people could do it with any precision. The results varied from somewhere in the neighbourhood of 90 per cent to 135 per cent. I say that if a measure of this kind should be imposed on the retail dealers of this country, the thousands and thousands, the 180,000 almost, small businessmen of this country, they would require a book about the size of the Montreal telephone directory to work out the annual interest rate as required by this bill. Such a requirement imposed upon these people would create a burden which they should not be asked to assume. I think I speak on behalf of these thousands, these hundreds of thousands of small retailers when I say this.

Now I have spoken about the position of instalment finance companies. I must say that I now know very little about these conditional sales contracts. I had a lot to do with them when I studied law, but that was a great many years ago. But I have looked at a few recently and I have found that the disclosure, certainly in dollars, required to be made by the dealer when he sells on time and uses one of these contracts, is a pretty full disclosure of the kind of thing that the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina would require to be given through this bill. Of course, they do not require the reduction of the full amount payable on charges to interest at so much per annum. The amount paid down, the value of the turn-in, the amount of the monthly payments or the payments at other times if they are not monthly instalments, are all provided, and by and large the retail dealers in this country use these forms, and use them as required by the finance companies because they may have to turn these contracts into the finance companies, assign them to them in order to get the money to finance their continuing operations.

There is another point that I would make and then I would stop. The honourable senator from Toronto said the other night that this field of legislation has been occupied in part in some of the provinces. He gave a specific example of Alberta. I am not too familiar with the Alberta legislation. I know in a general way what it provides and I say that legislation has not been challenged successfully in the courts of that province. I have looked up the province of Quebec Civil Code, article 1561 (a), which deals with these matters. It occupies this field, and requires rather full disclosure on loans of less than $800. I think most of these loans—other than these exorbitant second mortgage problems I mentioned earlier—most of these time purchases are probably in the area of $800. The Quebec legislation occupies that field, and I think occupies it quite effectively.

I am not, frankly, too enamoured with the kind of legislation we have in Ontario, because that legislation requires the person who feels that he has been "done in" by one of these loan sharks to go to the courts on his own initiative to have the transaction set aside.

Now if the unconscionable transaction were prohibited by provincial law, where I think it belongs, the public would be more reassured and, I think, better protected.

Honourable senators, I hope I have not wandered too much. I think, however, for the reasons I have given, I should not be able to vote in support of this measure.

Hon. John G. Higgins: Honourable senators, I am not conversant enough with this subject to discuss the constitutional aspect of this bill, but it is my opinion that some effective law should be passed to protect the ordinary individual, who is short of money, from heavy usury.

If we read the accounts of cases in various cities in Canada as set out in newspapers and magazines we must come to the conclusion that there must be a large number of poor individuals who have been victimized by what we call in these days loan sharks.

The worst part of all in this business of lending money, as was mentioned by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), is that the public are encouraged to waste money and not to be thrifty. It is a bit nauseating to hear over the public instruments of communication—the television and radio—advice being given to the public that if they want to pay their debts they should borrow money to do it. The public is so gullible they do not realize that after they borrow the money they are heavier in debt. They fail to appreciate that when they accept the invitation to borrow any amount of from $150 to $2,500, and to take three years to repay it, they do not pay back the amount they borrowed, but rather that amount plus interest. The result is that they are worse off when the day of reckoning comes.

I was very much surprised to hear mention made by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) of a recent judgment in the Supreme Court of Canada about this subject. I have not read that judgment yet, and perhaps if I did so I would see the reasoning behind it. The honourable senator said that the kickback of a certain amount of money on a loan does not come under the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, because in such a case there are two separate transactions, not allied with each other. He gave an instance of a man who borrowed the sum of $15,000. The lender would loan $15,000 and the borrower would hand back to him $3,000. In strict law that might be said to be two transactions, but in reality it is only one transaction. The fact is the borrower gets $12,000. I am told the usual kickback is 25 per cent. If a lender is to get 25 per cent interest in advance, he is going to see to it that that money is paid to him, and he does not hand over the full $15,000 to the borrower on the chance that he is going to be handed back $3,000. So, I say, there is really only one transaction.

I must say it is most surprising to me to hear that a lender usually gets a bonus of 25 per cent, and 7 per cent interest on a second mortgage. Where a loan is repaid on instalments and interest on the full loan is charged until repayment, the 7 per cent becomes more like 12 per cent by the time it is repaid. If a person wants to get hold of a nice piece of property or some real estate, let him get a second mortgage and it will not be long until he owns the building.

The bill does not seem to me to be exactly proper. I feel it goes too far in some cases and not far enough in others. For instance, it seems to involve too many companies and associations. I do not think that trust companies, insurance companies and such dealers who advance money at ordinary interest rates should come within the purview of the bill. Moreover, the bill should set out the parties who should be put to the trouble of supplying the required information. It should not include the small traders. I shall not enlarge further on that aspect of the matter, because it has been fully covered by the remarks of the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). I believe the payment of a kickback or a bonus should be made amenable to the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, and that the interest charges should be on the unpaid balance, made up every six months or every twelve months, and the borrower should have the right to pay off the loan at any time. If the borrower has to continue his payments over three years and pay interest on the full loan for that period, he may never pay the loan off. If he is to be encouraged to borrow money he should also be encouraged to pay it back.

Much has been said about provincial legislation such as the Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act and other acts. This legislation must be very ineffective if the cases about which we read in newspapers and magazines really happen. If these acts are as described, why do such cases take place? I have read of many such cases in Liberty and other publications.

Since Confederation of Canada and Newfoundland I have learned much about the financial structure of this country and the manner in which loans are made. In the light of what I have learned, I am amazed that Newfoundland was able to carry on at all. In past years the merchants of that province have been called crooks, robbers and loan sharks, but, compared with the moneylenders of other areas, the merchants of Newfoundland appear to be archangels. They did not go in for moneylending; true they may charge 6 per cent on an overdue account, but that is just what the bank charges them on their borrowing. I say our merchants were amateur gentlemen on the broad highway of commerce. Nevertheless, we existed and we appear to have had a happy life in that country. We had a usury law down there, but we rarely got involved with it. When bills became twelve months overdue, usually a dunning letter was sent out, and the customer was warned that he would be charged 6 per cent interest on the amount owed. Therefore, I think the merchants of Newfoundland have been treated much too harshly. Certainly, they could not be regarded as robbers or loan sharks. We may have been babes in the financial woods down there, but we were happy babes to have been free from the sinister procedures of loans and borrowings as exist here today.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Wall, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, may I ask that Order No. 4, second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be placed first on the Orders of the Day tomorrow; and that Order No. 5, second reading of Bill C-59, to amend the Yukon Act, be placed second.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILL

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY—AMENDMENT NEGATIVED—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Vien to amend clause 6 of Bill S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to waive my present right to proceed with the debate to the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt), the sponsor of the bill, whom we wish to hear, and may I relinquish my position without sacrificing the right to say something later?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. William R. Brunt: Honourable senators, first I want to thank the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) for moving adjournment of the debate on Thursday last, when, by reason of circumstances beyond my control, I found it impossible to be present in the chamber. The circumstances related to a wedding, and, as honourable senators know, weddings wait for no man or time.

I should like to review very briefly the history of the bill and to outline exactly what has taken place in connection with the bill from its second reading on. After the bill received second reading, on the 17th day of March last, it was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. One week later, on the 24th day of March, the bill came before the committee, and that entire morning was taken up in hearing, first those who supported the bill and, secondly, those who opposed it.

Finally, the hearing before the committee was adjourned, to reassemble at the call of the Acting Chairman of the committee when further evidence was to be made available to the committee. In the meantime it was felt that all members of the committee, and others who were particularly interested in the bill, would have an opportunity of studying the proceedings which had taken place that day, which were taken down in shorthand and which were, in due course, to be printed and distributed to all honourable senators.

What I say now is not said in any critical manner, but I just want to get all the facts before this honourable body. Owing to the fact that counsel who opposed this bill had made an arrangement to take an extensive holiday, the next hearing before the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications did not take place until May 12.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Easter vacation intervened.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The Easter vacation came in there, but the first postponement was caused by this holiday that had been arranged. I am not criticizing this in any way, but that is what took place.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, but there were four weeks in which the Senate did not sit.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: But, it is almost eight weeks from March 29 until May 12.

On May 12 a number of witnesses were heard, and a subcommittee was appointed, composed of the Honourable Senators Hugessen, Euler, Vien, Farris and myself to deal with the matter of amendments and to bring in a report with respect to amendments.

The committee met later the same day and Honourable Senator Hugessen was chosen chairman. It was agreed unanimously that two amendments should be made to the bill. The first amendment was on page 2, in line 4, where the subcommittee recommended that the words "herein contained" be struck out and that there be substituted in their place the words "in this act". The second amendment which was recommended by the subcommittee was to clause 4, on page 2, in line 38, and this amendment was as follows:

Strike out the period and add the words: "provided that nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations".

The bill then, for a third time, came before the committee on May 19. The subcommittee's report was presented by its chairman, the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). Considerable discussion took place, and a great many honourable senators felt it would be better draftsmanship to place the second amendment in a new and separate clause in the bill which would be known as clause 6. Accordingly, it was moved that the second amendment proposed by the subcommittee should be added to the bill as a new clause, clause 6, and to read as follows:

Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations.

All honourable senators will realize that from March 24 to May 31 is an exceptionally long time to spend considering a bill of this type. Further, I think it should be pointed out—and I think I am being quite fair when I say this—that a major portion of the time was used up in order to hear the representations and submissions which were made by those who opposed the bill.

Honourable senators, on its face this bill would appear to be a simple and proper one. These two provincial railways—

Hon. Thomas Reid: There is nothing simple about it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: —are requesting that they be brought under the jurisdiction of the Railway Act and the Board of Transport Commissioners of Canada in order that the freight rates to be charged for the movement of ore from a large development in the province of Newfoundland be fixed by the board. To me this is a very simple request, and I am sure that all honourable senators will agree that it is a proper request and that jurisdiction should be given to the Board of Transport Commissioners to fix proper rates in a situation such as this.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Having regard to the fact that one of those companies is incorporated by act of the Legislature of Newfoundland, has any information as to the attitude of the Newfoundland Government in relation to it been obtained?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will deal with that later, if the honourable senator does not mind.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I wonder if the honourable senator will permit a question before he gets into his argument. With respect to the report made by the subcommittee, would the honourable senator be good enough to advise this house whether these agreements that are referred to were before the subcommittee when it made its recommendation?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I do not recall whether we had before us the act passed by the Legislature of Newfoundland to which the agreement was attached, but I can say to the honourable senator that the act and the agreement were referred to very extensively at the hearings which took place before the subcommittee met.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I quite agree, but my question is whether those agreements were before the subcommittee or before the committee as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: They were before the committee as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes, the agreement that was attached to the act passed by the Legislature of Newfoundland was before the committee as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At what page does it appear in the evidence?

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is news to me.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I saw the agreement, our Law Clerk saw the agreement, and several members of the committee saw the agreement. That is all I can tell you on that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If it was presented to the committee it would appear in the evidence. I am asking the honourable gentleman at what page it appears.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The answer is that it is not part of the record.

Now, to continue, a logical question to ask is: Who is opposing the bill? I have been advised by the sponsors of the bill that the province of Newfoundland is not opposing the bill and, further, that the province of Quebec, which is the second province concerned with this bill, is not opposing it either.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask whether any information has come directly from the province of Newfoundland with respect to this bill?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: To me, no.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Or to anyone on the committee?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I just have the statement of the sponsors of the bill.

The bill is also being opposed by a competitor of the sponsors which is now engaged in the production of iron ore in the same vicinity, and a competitor which is the owner of the only logical and federal railway which will be used partly to move these ores from this development which is now taking place in the province of Newfoundland. I think it is fair to state that this competitor raised every possible objection to the bill when it was before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and to me the only objection which had any possible substance was the one to the effect that this bill might relieve the two railway applicants from their present contractual obligations.

May I point out to honourable senators that counsel for the two railways applying for the passing of this bill said, in their statements, that this was the furthest thing from their minds, and that if any contractual obligations actually existed at the time this bill was being passed there was no desire on their part to avoid any of them, or to be relieved from carrying out all their contractual obligations. I think nothing can be clearer than a statement which is to be found in the printed proceedings at page 68. This statement was made during the hearing which took place on May 12 by Mr. DeRoche, one of the counsel appearing for the applicants, and it is as follows:

> ...we don't intend to be relieved of anything, and we feel confident we have not relieved ourselves of anything.

The sponsors of this bill instantly consented to all the amendments which have been suggested which would make it clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that they were not to be relieved of any of their contractual obligations, despite the fact that in their view they are liable for all their contractual obligations that are now existing, whether or not the bill is amended.

On the other hand, let us for a moment look at the position taken by those who opposed the passing of this bill. From the very beginning they opposed the principle of the bill. They did not want these two railways to have the right to go before the Board of Transport Commissioners in order to have rates fixed. I am not critical of Mr. O'Brien for taking the position he did, for he was instructed to do so by his clients, the objecting companies. He was completely frank in stating that no amendment to this bill would satisfy his clients.

In this regard I would like to refer honourable senators to the bottom of page 57 of the printed proceedings of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, at the hearing of May 12, where I stated:

> As it is proposed. Let me put it this way: Mr. O'Brien is opposed to these railways being brought under federal jurisdiction. These railways have asked to be brought under federal jurisdiction. No amendment by a subcommittee can get around that situation.
> Mr. O'Brien: That is a very fair statement of my position, and I do not want to detract from it by one comma.

Under these circumstances I think it is abundantly clear that the opposition to this bill from a competitor is opposition of a type which is directed to prevent these applicants from being able to go before the Board of Transport Commissioners in order to have rates set that will be fair and equitable and just for all concerned.

I humbly suggest to honourable senators that one of the ways to prevent this bill from passing is by delay. I do think there has been a great deal of delay in connection with it, and I do not feel that the passing of the bill should be delayed further.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has suggested, and quite properly, that this bill ought not to limit the rights and powers of the Board of Transport Commissioners—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: —as exercised under the provisions of the Railway Act. I suggest to honourable senators that there is no real danger of any such limitation occurring even if the bill is amended. Counsel for the sponsors of the bill have pointed out that there is no agreement now existing between the parties with respect to rates and I want to assure all honourable senators present this evening that positive assurance has been given to me by the sponsors of this bill that there is no agreement in existence at the present time with respect to the fixing of rates.

In regard to the suggestion made on Wednesday last by the honourable senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette) that the provisions of section 6 should be limited to actual, contractual obligations in existence at the time of the enactment of this bill, I might state that the sponsors have no objections to this particular amendment. The sponsors have asked me to make it very, very clear that under no circumstances do they want to do anything that would in any way relieve them of any of their present obligations. That is the furthest thing from their minds.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the honourable gentleman suggesting an additional amendment at this time?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I am just stating that if this house feels these words which were suggested by the honourable senator from Mille Isles should be added to the bill in order to make it even more clear that the sponsors of the bill cannot avoid their present contractual obligations, then the sponsors have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You will have to send the bill back to committee in order to have that dealt with. You cannot do it here.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I have an authority to the effect that it can be done here.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You cannot deal with it on the floor of this chamber. If there are further amendments they have to be dealt with in committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In October of 1957 we dealt with a similar situation in this house. I can give honourable senators the precedent for it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You probably could deal with it in the chamber if it were a simple amendment, but not when there is a complicated amendment such as this.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I cannot recall any occasion when we have adopted a controversial amendment on third reading of a bill. It is usually just some correction of a typographical or drafting error.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think we have adopted similar amendments in this house many times. The motion is "that the bill be not now read the third time but be amended as follows" and so on. This procedure has been followed time and time again in the 25 years that I have been in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably with the consent of the house, but surely it is not provided for in the rules of this house.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Honourable senators, you will have an opportunity to vote on the amendments which have been put forth.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You are suggesting that there should be other amendments?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I am saying that if the house wants to amend this bill the sponsors will agree to all reasonable amendments.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You have talked yourself into an amendment, I think.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What is the objection to having the bill referred back to committee?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The objection is to the delay. We hope to get the bill over to the other place by Friday of this week. We have been on this bill now since March 17. I would just like to say that the sponsors of the bill are prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien), if the chamber decides in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And any other amendments we would like to make.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, I did not say any other amendments. I said that if the house desires to add the suggested words so that the amendment applies to only the contractual obligations that exist at the present time on the part of the sponsors of the bill, the sponsors are prepared to accept them. If the amendments are not acceptable to this house, the sponsors of the bill are quite prepared to take the bill as it was reported to this house by the committee.

I am hopeful that this honourable body will deal with the amendments tonight and dispose of them so that we may have an opportunity of proceeding to the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I would like to ask a question with regard to these agreements. I might appear over-persistent, but I am anxious to clear up a point. Are there any agreements signed at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The only signed agreement I know of is the one that is attached to the act passed by the Legislature of Newfoundland, and that agreement has nothing whatsoever to do with rates.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: My honourable friend from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) has continually referred to agreements, and agreements are mentioned in the bill. I will repeat my question. I think it is rather simple. Are there any agreements existing at the present time which have been signed?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The only agreement I know of is the one that has been referred to.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That is part of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That is not an agreement between the two parties.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, yes, it is made an appendix to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I only want to say that during the entire discussion very few members of the committee fully understood what it was all about. I am speaking for myself. It was a very complicated bill. However, I am rising in reply to the honourable senator from Hanover (Mr. Mr. Brunt). I would like to know the customs of Parliament as to whether we can substantially amend a bill on third reading without sending it back to committee. My recollection is that in the other place it cannot be done. We should be very careful not to set a precedent. I think the Senate is entitled to know if the procedure is officially correct.

The Hon. the Speaker: According to my interpretation of the rules of the Senate, I believe this chamber has full power to amend any bill at any time, on either second or third reading.

Hon. John T. Haig: Yes, at any time. The point is that in committee we appointed a subcommittee of five members, as able as any members of this house, to deal with this whole problem, and they brought back a unanimous report. The matter was discussed in committee, and we agreed to it. I admit that legally this matter can be brought up here, but what can be the object unless it is to delay the bill? Personally, I do not want to delay the bill. As I said in committee, I want these companies to spend these millions of dollars in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This won't hold up the bill for one minute.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There were on the subcommittee three very able lawyers, one from Vancouver and two from Montreal. The subcommittee dealt with this whole thing and not only brought back a unanimous report but urged that it be put through. I admired the able manner in which the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) handled the matter.

Honourable senators, I do not think we should delay the bill. The other house is fighting to get through. I also want to point out that we from the west, as well as others from the east, often sit around here day after day when we would like to be working in this house, but we cannot do so because we give senators from Montreal and Toronto, and other parts of Quebec and Ontario, holidays on Fridays and Saturdays, and sometimes Mondays and Tuesdays as well. I think this bill should go through, because I trust the three lawyers I have mentioned. They went into the whole matter legally, and we are satisfied. I know I am satisfied. I honestly think we should give the bill a chance. If you do not want to pass the bill, well, vote against it; that is done easily enough.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. The honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) spoke of giving those of us from Toronto and Montreal a holiday on certain days. I think it only fair to let him know, and to let the country know, that when there is business to be done we are here to do the business.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: When there is business to be done the members from Toronto and Montreal are here to do the business, and too often we also sit around without having anything to do.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I recall the days when we had no Thursday adjournments at all. We sat for a straight five days, and adjourned for two weeks.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is the point—adjourn for two weeks.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, perhaps I ought to say a few words on this matter, since my name has been mentioned as chairman of the subcommittee. The amendment which the subcommittee unanimously suggested to the bill, and which was concurred in by the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien) who moved a further amendment on third reading, contained this phrase, which was finally incorporated as a sixth clause in the bill:

> Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations.

The reason we suggested that amendment was that representations were made to us by counsel for the opponents of the bill to the effect that the bill in its original form might conceivably release these companies from certain obligations that they had undertaken under the Newfoundland legislation. That was an argument put forward by the very able counsel for the opponents of the bill, an argument with which personally I did not agree, for I did not think that the bill could be so interpreted; but the committee felt, that, if there was any doubt about it, let us put a clause in to the effect that nothing in the bill shall affect these contractual obligations; and that is what we did.

Now, the further amendment proposed by the honourable senator who moved the amendment on third reading last week simply adds to our suggestion the following words:

, the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

So the new clause would read as follows:

Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations, the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

Now, frankly, I do not think that the subamendment adds anything to the amendment, nor do I think it takes anything away from the amendment. It may conceivably make it a little clearer than it was before, but it is not of a controversial type, in the sense that the sponsors of the bill have not objected to it.

If you refer the bill back to the Committee on Transport and Communications, of which I happen to be chairman, I can tell you at once what is going to happen. The committee will report back to you and they will say, "Well, we don't object to this subamendment. We don't mind whether it is passed or not, but we support this bill with the amendment and either with or without the subamendment". That is all that will happen.

It is perfectly clear, honourable senators, and it was quite clear to us in committee, that there were two opposing interests in this whole matter. One was in favour of the bill for its own reasons, and the other was against the bill for its own reasons. I am not concerned, and I do not think the Senate need be concerned, with the reasons in the minds of the proponents of the bill or of the opponents to the bill, provided we can find some matter of public policy which should lead us either to pass the bill or to throw it out. I think there is a very distinct matter of public policy which, in my judgment, and I may be wrong, leads me to support this bill. Here you have a situation where in the province of Newfoundland, away up in the backwoods, is a 40-mile line of railway which connects with the main line of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway. There at the other end of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway near the St. Lawrence you have a short 20-mile line to be owned by the other proponent of this bill, the Arnaud Railway, entirely in the province of Quebec. You are going to have an extremely important railway operation carried on over that line. It will start at the end of the Wabush line where the mine is to be. It will take heavy mineral trains over that 40-mile line to the railway of the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway. It will carry it down over that second railway for about 200 miles. Then it will switch off for 20 miles to the Arnaud Railway to the new port which these proponents propose to build on the St. Lawrence River.

As matters stand today, you have three separate railways, each of them under separate control so far as regulation is concerned. The Wabush Railway is in the province of Newfoundland entirely, and it is subject completely to the jurisdiction of the province of Newfoundland, which incidentally we were told in committee has no legislation with regard to any provincial railway board or any other body of that nature. The middle railway, the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway, which runs between Schefferville and Seven Islands, is a federal railway, and is subject to the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The little railway down to the St. Lawrence, though, the Arnaud Railway Company, is under the control of the province of Quebec, which has a provincial board of railway commissioners.

Now, this is the absurd position that is going to be set up: there will be one railway operation, and an important railway operation, that will be subject to no less than three separate regulatory authorities, unless this bill is passed. All that is done by passing this bill, by declaring these two provincial railways to be works for the advantage of Canada, is to bring them under the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners, and I suggest that there is a public interest in that being done from the point of view of safety of the employees, from the point of view of working regulations, and from the point of view of signals and everything else. It should be under the control of one board. That, I think, is really a matter of considerable public interest and that is why I think the bill should pass.

The honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) asked a few minutes ago whether the province of Newfoundland had any objection to the bill, and of course the question might arise in the minds of other honourable senators as to whether the province of Quebec had any objection to the bill. We were told in committee that neither province had any objection whatever. As honourable senators have heard, the hearings on this bill have extended over more than two months, and I can assure you that if the opponents of this bill had been able to get either the province of Newfoundland or the province of Quebec to oppose this bill they certainly would have done so.

I do not want to interfere in any way with the private fight that is going on between these two companies. As a matter of fact, some of you may recall that eleven years ago—I think it was at the request of the opponents of this bill—I introduced and explained to the Senate on second reading the bill to incorporate the existing railway, the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What happened to that bill?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It went through unanimously.

So all I can say is that while I have no interest in the dispute between these two parties, I do think there is a very real public interest in the passage of the bill which the Senate ought to take very seriously into consideration.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I feel that I should say a few words in connection with this bill. I am in the very strange predicament that when this bill was first presented to the committee, and the applicants explained their case, I said: "Well, what is wrong with the bill? It is a good bill, let us pass it." But when I heard the opposing side I thought: There is something wrong; we have not got all the information; we will have to look into this very carefully. I was quite satisfied, honourable senators, that we did not have all the information at the end of the first sitting, and I was quite satisfied that we did not have all the information at the last sitting. I said—I do not know if I used these exact words—"I do not want to defeat this bill but I feel we should have more information," and I suggested that the committee should adjourn for two weeks in order to give these two companies another chance to get together. They are two large companies. I understand the amount of money involved comes to about half a billion dollars —I have been told that, but I may be wrong.

These two companies have to live together for many years. They are developing part of our country, in the same district. Why should they not get together now and start off rightly? They are going to be working side by side, and I understand from what I heard in committee that they did start out as friends —if my memory serves me correctly—that the opposing interests were about to apply for a federal charter and someone approached them, I do not know who it was, and said—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The province of Newfoundland, my honourable friend advises me, approached the opposing parties of today and said to them: "Do not apply for a federal charter. Come with this other company and apply for a provincial charter under the province of Newfoundland." So the opposing parties of today went along, withdrew their application, if it had been filed—in any event they did not proceed with it—entered into an agreement with the railways named in this bill, and took out a charter in the province of Newfoundland, and attached to that charter there is an agreement between these two companies. Now, honourable senators, I was not persuaded in committee, and I have not been persuaded since, that there was no understanding at that time between all these companies that they would not make an application for a federal charter. And what do we find ourselves faced with now?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: May I ask the honourable senator just one question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: If there was any agreement such as that, don't you think it would have been brought forward by the people who were opposing this bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That agreement was not in writing, but it was not denied in committee. If it was denied, I ask my friend to show me the words in the written report. It was not denied in committee that there was not an understanding that there would not be an application for a federal charter.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What was the consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know what the consideration was.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Was it a statement, then, of intention?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A statement of intention. Well, it was a verbal understanding. One company pulled out and said, "We will apply for a federal charter in spite of the agreement that no one of us will apply for a federal charter," and as soon as they got their provincial charter one of the companies goes along and applies for a federal charter. Do you wonder, honourable senators, that I am a little suspicious?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I do not think there was any written agreement.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, that was my impression and that was my impression to the very end. Another thing that bothered me was, why was not the agreement produced? The agreement is a part of the charter that was granted by the province of Newfoundland. Why is it not on the record? Why are we in such a rush to put this through without knowing all the facts?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Is it a rush, after spending over nine weeks on this bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then why has there been a delay of over nine weeks in bringing this forward? This house is entitled to know what is in that agreement, or are we not entitled to know it?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: If that agreement was important and was the reason for not passing this bill, why in the world did the opponents of this bill not bring that agreement to the attention of the committee? I know Mr. O'Brien, he is a very able lawyer, and certainly he would have brought such an agreement to the attention of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no interest in either of these companies, but I would like to know from both of them what they are hiding from us, what they are keeping back.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You should not be worried about that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But I am worried about it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think that a committee of this Senate should know what the facts are in connection with this matter before we pass the bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I think all parties have made a full disclosure.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The parties have not been open with us.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In other words, you are saying that all the parties who appeared before this committee did not make a full disclosure, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I say we did not get from the parties the whole story, and I want it before I shall be prepared to vote for this bill. I would not like to vote against the bill, but I want to get the full story. I do not want to be either for or against it, but I want to know everything, so that I can make up my mind.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Question!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My friend says, "Question." Honourable senators, we can wait a little while. I think I should have the opportunity of saying what I think about the bill. I want to know all the facts, so that I can make up my mind. Other honourable senators have spoken on it, and I do not think my honourable friend wants to close me off.

Another matter that bothers me is, why did we not get the views of the province of Newfoundland and the province of Quebec? My honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) says that if Newfoundland was against the bill, why did somebody not come forward and prove it? I say, if Newfoundland is for the bill why did somebody not come forward and prove that?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would it not be possible that both provinces decided to take a position of neutrality and stay out of the quarrel?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be what is happening, but that is what we don't know. We don't know whether Newfoundland is for it or against it; we don't know whether Quebec is for it or against it. In fact, we are completely in the dark in that respect.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Is there any way in which we can force the province of Newfoundland or the province of Quebec to come forward and express an opinion?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think we could get an opinion from those provinces, and that is one more reason why I think the bill should go back to committee. To send it back would not hold the bill up for very long.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: In committee you suggested it be held up for two weeks.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Here we are, at the last day of May; it is suggested that Parliament may prorogue in the middle of July, and we have six weeks to go. Yet, we are asked to vote now on this bill on which we do not have all the information—information which I say we could get in a very short time.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: How?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: By sending the bill back to committee.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: But how do we go about getting it when we send the bill back to committee?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In the first place, we can bring these people here and find out what is in the agreement. That is the first thing to do, and it is a simple matter. Secondly, we can get in touch with Quebec and Newfoundland and find out what their feelings are with respect to our difficulties.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: What will happen if they express no opinion?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If they express no opinion we will at least know that much.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: And we will be back in exactly the same position we are now in.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We can at least make up our minds. If they express no opinion we will know that they are not interested. As matters now stand, we don't know whether they are interested or not.

I would not want to vote against this bill at the present time, with the limited information that I have, and I am sure honourable senators would hesitate to vote against it with their limited information. But I do not see that we have any alternative, if it is insisted that we vote on third reading. If we get the information, we can come back to the house and vote intelligently on the bill.

The amendment proposed is a detailed one. While I never question the rulings of His Honour the Speaker, I do not think it is in keeping with the practice of this house to discuss a detailed amendment when His Honour is in the chair. I am sure His Honour the Speaker and all other honourable senators will agree that such a discussion is primarily the work of a committee. That is why a bill of this nature is sent to committee. We in this house do not follow the practice of the other house, in which a debate of this kind could not take place with His Honour the Speaker in the chair. Apparently, the rule here—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not the rule here.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My point is, it would be much better either to deal with this matter in committee of the whole or to refer the bill back to the standing committee where witnesses could be heard.

Let us look at the wording of the proposed amendment. The new section 6 reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall release either of the companies from any of its contractual obligations.

Now, I do not know what those contractual obligations are. It was said in the house that certain rights were to prevail for ninety-nine years. Am I right in that? Whereas, the Board of Transport Commissioners has power to grant rights for only a limited number of years. That is another point on which we are in the dark. The proposed amendment to Section 6 reads:

> , the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

I do not know what the Railway Act has to say with regard to contractual obligations. That is something we can only find out in committee.

My honourable friend who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) has suggested there may be another amendment that would be advisable.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I did not say it would be advisable.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My honourable friend said there might be another amendment. Let us send the bill back to committee and find out. My honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Monette), who is a very distinguished constitutional lawyer, may have a very good point.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: This has nothing to do with constitutional law.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so, but the honourable gentleman can still speak with distinction. If he has a suggestion to make, that is one more reason why the bill should go back to committee. From what has been said here this evening I am more convinced than ever that we cannot vote intelligently on the bill without sending it back to committee to get information which we did not receive, and should have received, when the committee considered the bill.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) a question. Unfortunately, I was indisposed and did not attend the meetings of the committee, but I have listened with much interest to the clear and lucid explanation by the chairman of the subcommittee (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). What I find difficult to understand is why the opinions of the provinces concerned were not sought when the bill was before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I quite agree with my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Did the honourable Leader of the Opposition ask for their opinions?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, he did not.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I did not ask, and I shall have to take the blame, as we all must, for failing to do so. I recall that we were in much the same predicament with respect to a private bill for the incorporation of a church, recently reported back from committee. In that instance most of the members of the committee voted for the bill, and when the report was read to the house they asked, "Why did we do that?" Everyone agreed that the bill should go back to committee, and it did go back.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I attempt to answer the question asked by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson)?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this is what I object to. My honourable friend has already spoken in this debate, and it is against the rules of the house to make this into a committee discussion.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: My honourable friend has already spoken two or three times.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am speaking to a point of order at the moment. I have suggested that the better practice is to discuss questions such as this in committee, and that it is impossible to follow the rules of the house in discussing such a matter when His Honour the Speaker is in the Chair. His Honour enforces the rule that an honourable senator may speak only once in a debate. We cannot discuss a bill such as this and speak only once.

The Hon. the Speaker: We are actually discussing an amendment, which was moved by the Honourable Senator Vien, to amend clause 6 of the bill by adding at the end thereof the following words:

, the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding.

I understand that an honourable senator may speak only once—except, of course, that the mover of a motion has the right to close the debate—but we have generally accepted the practice that to elucidate a point an honourable senator may speak a second time. I ask honourable senators to restrict themselves to this amendment, and not discuss in advance another amendment which may or may not be made at a later date.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I want to say just a few words about this bill. I was satisfied in the committee as to what the bill meant, and I was also satisfied as to the agreement that was annexed to the Newfoundland act. Should we go back to the committee and examine the amendment which has been proposed by the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien)? It seems to me that the amendment does not add anything to what has been said already in committee. It merely makes it more clear that notwithstanding any legislation whatsoever, including the Railway Act, the contractual obligations will be respected. That is all that the amendment does.

Are we going to be in any better position if we send the bill back to the committee? So far as the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec are concerned, it seems to me that they have had every possible opportunity to make representations, because notice was published in the Canada Gazette and they would know that the bill is before the Senate of Canada. If they do not know that, they should know it, and I am sure that if either of these provinces had anything to say against the bill they would have sent representatives to appear before the committee. I am satisfied of that. It is my opinion that it would be a waste of time to send this bill back to the committee. We have been told all we need to know in order to reach a decision to accept the bill or reject it.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I still have rights, I think, because I waived my right to speak to allow my friend to make his statement, and I am very glad I did.

The Hon. the Speaker: Did the honourable senator waive or yield?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, he reserved his right to speak.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I think I did waive. In any event, my remarks are not going to be long. I am glad I did waive, because by doing so I have heard what the honourable senator had to say. It was illuminating and satisfying.

It has been said that these words "the Railway Act and any other act notwithstanding" do not add to or take away from the amendment already before us. If that is so, may I ask those who are opposed to it, and those who are in favour of it: Why clutter up the record with unnecessary words? To me, those words mean a very great deal. There are more people involved in this situation with which we are dealing than the parties who are before us opposing it and defending it. There is the public to be considered—the public which is often forgotten. Let us never forget the public.

The Board of Transport Commissioners protects the public. It makes such rates as may be reasonable, and so on, but its main purpose, and the reason for its existence, is to protect the public interest and to assure public safety. So, I am strongly opposed to these words. I see no reason why these two or three companies should be in any different position with regard to the Board of Transport Commissioners from that of any other railroad in Canada. If we say that nothing in the act relieves these companies from any of their contractual obligations we have said all that we are required to say, and we will be asserting our confidence in the men who compose that board. I am quite sure that the board will consider contractual obligations and respect them even if that clause is not there at all. I think the clause itself is unnecessary, because both courts and boards will enforce contractual obligations unless some public interest is involved, and if a public interest is involved I want the authorities that we constitute for that purpose to have a free hand in dealing with the matter. I have sufficient confidence in them.

May I say something with respect to the proposal to refer the bill back to committee? I am unfortunate in that I cannot attend meetings of this kind and do the other work that you ask me to do. I have not the knowledge that the five men who formed this subcommittee have. They have met and made a report. I have every confidence in them, and I do not see that we are going to gain a thing by sending the bill back to them. I disagree very seldom with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). I do not like to disagree with him at any time, but I do not see that we will gain a single thing by doing as he suggests. He says that we ought to know what the agreement between the parties is. I do not see how that is a factor in our consideration at all. Whatever the agreement is, we have provided in the bill that the contractual obligations shall be observed. Why should we go further?

Is not the picture this? Some people come to us and ask not for a licence to operate, but simply for the power to combine two railroads and to operate as a railroad. They must still get consent from the Board of Transport Commissioners, and they must find the money. Then, somebody else, who is apparently a competitor, says: "No, we are opposed to it." We have been incorporating pipe lines until it is a joke. What would we do if, when somebody came here asking for the incorporation of a pipe line company, somebody else said: "No, I am afraid these fellows are going to compete with us"? We would laugh at that. We would give the power to any bona fide applicant for such purpose, and let it go ahead according to the law of the land and the rights it might obtain. I am ready to do that for these companies unless I see very good grounds for not doing so, and so far such grounds have never been advanced in my hearing. There may be good grounds, but I have not heard them yet.

On the other hand, I can see very large public interest involved. The people who are applying for this legislation are proposing to spend very large sums of money on the development of an important Canadian natural resource and to make vast deposits of iron ore available to the service of mankind. I, for one, am not prepared to stand in their way and deny them, on any fanciful excuse, the usual rights that we accord to other citizens.

I think we should reject this amendment. I am strong on that. I am not going to vote for anything that sets aside the powers, or pulls the teeth, of the Board of Transport Commissioners. We should defeat this motion that is before us and then, honourable senators, I am prepared to vote for the passage of the bill.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: I remind honourable senators that if the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien) speaks the second time it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Honourable senators, I moved this amendment only for greater clarification of section 6, which the subcommittee recommended and which was adopted by the standing committee. Before proposing this amendment I consulted the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). He is an eminent constitutional lawyer and a prominent counsel from the province of Ontario. He stated that, in his opinion, the words I proposed as an addition to section 6 were necessary and made the decision of the committee unmistakable. The honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), another eminent counsel and Batonnier of the Bar of Montreal, very fairly stated the case a minute ago. He said that, in his opinion, the words I suggested did not add anything to the section but rendered its meaning clearer. The sponsors of the bill themselves have accepted these words as adding some degree of clarity to the text. The decision of the standing committee was unanimous but, after further study, I found that the language proposed was not an adequate expression of the intention of the committee, namely, that this legislation should never release the companies from their contractual obligations. With that in mind, I felt that it was necessary to add to section 6 the words "the Railway Act or any other act notwithstanding."

This proposed amendment means that under no circumstances shall this legislation be invoked to release the companies from their obligations—even if, under the Railway Act or any other act, the Board of Transport Commissioners had the power to do so. If, in the opinion of some honourable senators, it does not add to or detract from the words found in section 6 and if, as the honourable senator from Inkerman has stated, it clarifies their meaning, I submit my amendment should be accepted. The sponsors of the bill have accepted it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will say "Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those opposed will say "Non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the Contents have it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There are two of us standing in our places. Let us have a recorded vote.

Amendment of Hon. Mr. Vien negatived on the following division:

NOTICES OF INQUIRIES

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I would like to ask three questions that I asked on July 16 last session. This year I am asking them a month and a half earlier, in the hope that they will be answered before the end of the session:

No. 1.

Each year since 1947, how many applications have been made in Canada for passports by
(a) British subjects?
(b) Canadian citizens?
(c) Citizens of the commonwealth?

No. 2.

1. Are there any categories of British subjects who are presently living in Canada and who are neither Canadian citizens nor citizens of the commonwealth?
2. If so, what are they?

No. 3.

What is the amount of each of the fellowships for nationals of foreign countries enumerated in the categories described as 8*a* and 8*b* of the Second Annual Report of the Canada Council?

What is the particular object of each of these fellowships?

YUKON BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George S. White moved the second reading of Bill C-59, to amend the Yukon Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-59 is an act to amend the Yukon Act. Bill C-60, the first order on the Order Paper today, is an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, and will be proceeded with tomorrow. The amendments proposed by these two bills are practically identical. The changes being made to the Yukon Act are to meet the developing needs in this territory. The changes deal with the constitution of the Yukon Council, the administration of justice and the application of the territorial ordinances. The legislation contained in this bill will lead in the future toward the Yukon's becoming a separate Canadian province.

The populations in both territories are small at the present time when compared with the population of any of the provinces, and I think honourable senators will agree that provincial status is still some considerable distance away. However, the residents of each of these territories are already aware from the reports of their elected representatives on their councils that the attitude of the federal Government is to encourage any development which will lead ultimately to the transition to provincial status.

The history of the government of the Yukon may be of some interest to honourable senators. Prior to 1895 the Yukon was part of the unorganized Northwest Territories. In 1898 it was created the Yukon Territory by act of Parliament. Provision was made at that time for a local government composed of a commissioner and a legislative council of six appointed members. Some changes were made over the next ten years, and in 1908 the elected council was reduced to five members. From this it will be seen that the Yukon has had some control over its government for well over 50 years.

In 1919 the council was reduced to three. That was because of the somewhat serious decrease in population. The total population in 1901 was the peak of 27,000, and by 1919 it had declined to about 4,000. I am advised that the population of the Yukon in 1958, according to the last estimate which was made at the end of that year, was approximately 13,000. Owing to the increase in population it has now been decided that the number of members of the council should be increased from five to seven.

At the present time the Yukon Act provides that the council shall sit separately from the commissioner. I am unable to give you any reason why that provision is there, but it had apparently something to do with some circumstances which existed when that provision was enacted. At any rate, that provision now serves no useful purpose, and the council has asked that this restriction be removed. I should make it clear that the repeal of this restriction will not in any way change the responsibilities of the commissioner or of the council. It will simply make it possible under the act for the Commissioner to attend Council meetings and to contribute to the discussion of the council if the council invites him to do so.

Perhaps the most important change is the establishment of an advisory committee on finance. At the present time the administrative and legislative aspects of government in the Yukon are wholly separate. There is no formal provision for consultation between the commissioner, who is responsible for preparing the budget and carrying on the administration, and the council, which controls the purse. The appointment of the advisory committee under the new act is designed to meet this situation, and in the preparation of the budget the commissioner will have available to him the advice of a committee of elected representatives. I should make it clear also that the establishment of the committee implies no change in the functions or responsibilities of the commissioner or of the council. The committee is purely advisory. It is not empowered to commit the council, and the commissioner is not required to follow its advice.

The second broad subject with which the bill deals is the application of territorial ordinances. Here the primary purpose is to clarify the intentions of Parliament with respect to the game resources of the Yukon Territory. The Yukon administration has had the control of game for over 60 years, and this control is the same as that which applies in the various other provinces which have the prime responsibility for wildlife resources.

Since 1900 these resources have been administered under Territory legislation, which until recently was taken as applying to all residents without regard to racial origin. However, owing to a court case in the Territories last year an interpretation was given which caused some doubt as to whether or not the Yukon administration had the necessary power to deal with game.

The balance of the bill deals with the administration of justice. The bill provides that a judge of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories is ex officio a judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon. In the Northwest Territories Bill there is the same provision that a judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon is also ex officio a judge of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories.

Present legislation provides for the appointment of deputy judges under certain circumstances by the Governor in Council. It has frequently been found convenient to appoint the judge from the Northwest Territories to serve in the Yukon in this capacity. This amendment will make it unnecessary to have this order in council procedure every time it is desired to make such an appointment. This proposal may be viewed as a step toward the independence of the courts. In the past, trial judges from British Columbia and Alberta have been appointed to conduct trials in the Territories. With this amendment such an appointment would normally occur when neither Territorial judge was able to act. While this provision will reduce the occasions when deputy judges are required, it may still occasionally be necessary to make such appointments if both Territorial judges are unable to act, or in other special circumstances. The bill accordingly provides for the appointment and remuneration of deputy judges when in the opinion of the Governor in Council this is desirable. Its implementation will give greater flexibility resulting in better service to litigants and accused persons.

Perhaps the most important provision of this part of the bill is that establishing a separate Court of Appeal for the Yukon. This will be accomplished by creating a new court to consist of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia together with the judges of the two Territorial Superior Courts. This new Court of Appeal will be authorized to sit in the Yukon, and the local court office in Whitehorse will assume the position of a branch office of the Registrar of the Court of Appeal in Victoria.

The only other immediate change that this legislation brings about is that for the first time a Court of Appeal will actually sit in the Territory. This will make it unnecessary for litigants to travel south in connection with court business, and should substantially decrease inconvenience and expense caused to litigants, accused persons, and the Crown.

Finally, honourable senators, the bill provides that payment may be made to justices of the peace—whether civil servants or not—in special circumstances and by authority of the Governor in Council. Justices of the peace provide an essential element in the administration of justice in the Yukon. Their jurisdiction covers a large area and it is fair to say that they dispose of the bulk of cases. In northern circumstances, some justices of the peace must at present spend a considerable portion of their time on this work without remuneration. The new provision will make it possible to remedy this inequity.

Honourable senators, when the bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where competent witnesses from the Department of Northern Affairs and from the Department of Justice will be available to answer in detail any points raised by honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wonder if the honourable senator would answer two questions regarding section 3? My first question is this: Will the members of the advisory committee, which, I take it, is separate and distinct from the council, be resident in the Yukon Territory? Secondly: Will they receive any remuneration other than that outlined in subsection 4, for attendance at meetings?

Hon. Mr. White: Section 3 says that the members of the advisory committee shall be members of the council. In addition to the pay they normally get as members of the council, I take it that for attendance in their capacity as members of the advisory committee they would receive the remuneration set out under section 4.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. White) has said, this part of Canada is undergoing great development at the present time. In listening to the news on television last night I learned that it is proposed to build a new railway through the interior of British Columbia, and it was suggested in that newscast that probably the railway would eventually go up into the Yukon. We have heard a great deal of the mining and oil and other developments in the Yukon. It seems to me, therefore, natural that there should be a change in the legislation to meet changing conditions in that part of the country. I am sure we are all happy to know that great development is taking place in the Yukon. Our minds go back to the days of 1898. Some of us may not remember the facts, but we have all read of the heroism and determination of those who went up into that country to find gold. Now it is very interesting to note that, 62 years later, developments of a different kind are pioneered by men just as energetic and courageous as those who opened up the trail known as "the Trail of '98".

As the sponsor has said, the bill refers to the council of the Yukon. I think the bill can be divided into three parts. The first part refers to the council. It proposes to increase the number of members of the council from 5 to 7, and also provides for the creation of an advisory committee on finance. I am sure honourable senators will approve of the increase in the number of the members of the council, and also the creation of an advisory committee. I notice that, as was pointed out in reply to a question by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), that the advisory committee is to be selected from the council. However, his question as to whether any additional remuneration would be paid to the members of the advisory committee was not answered.

Hon. Mr. White: Subsection 4 would cover that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In any event, I am glad that the bill is going to committee so that details of that sort can be considered and the information given to the house.

The second portion of the bill, I would say, provides for a Court of Appeal for the Yukon Territory. It also authorizes the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory to sit in the Northwest Territories, so far as civil matters are concerned. I do not think the sponsor of the bill mentioned that feature. That also could be explained in committee.

I was also interested to note that the bill provides for deputy judges of the Territorial Court.

One other interesting provision in the bill is contained in clause 4. The explanatory note on the fly-leaf of the bill says that the commissioner will be authorized to pass game legislation applicable to Indians and Eskimos in the Yukon Territories. The note says also it is desirable that such legislation should be general in application, and I agree with this. For some time the game ordinances of the Northwest Territories have been considered as having effect throughout all of the Northwest Territories, but not long ago there was a decision given which cast some doubt upon whether the general provision with regard to game ordinances applies in the district covered by this bill. I think it is advisable to establish beyond the shadow of a doubt, as this bill does, that the ordinances regarding game do apply to Indians and Eskimos in that district, unless the contrary intention appears therein. That is a point which can be gone into when the bill is in committee.

I join with the sponsor of the bill in saying that this legislation is advisable and necessary, and I hope with him that the Yukon district of the Northwest Territories will continue to progress.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly on this bill. First of all, I would like to say how glad we are that the honourable senators from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) and Toronto (Hon. Mr. Campbell) are back with us on this occasion.

The vast area known as Yukon and the Northwest Territories extends all the way from the Rocky Mountains to the St. Lawrence River basin. That great area was roamed over by the Indians for twenty or thirty thousand years. The Eskimos settled along the river and the waterfronts where their food could be obtained. The Eskimos were not considered to be Indians, although their ancestors were probably the same and came from the heart of Asia across the Bering Strait to this land. This great area was under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company for some 200 years. The company had control of all the lands drained by streams flowing into the Hudson Bay. In 1870 it relinquished its charter and the land was ceded to Canada. In return, the company received £300,000, and was allowed to keep one-third of the land. In 1870 Manitoba was taken out of the Northwest Territories. In 1905 four of the Northwest Territory districts were surveyed into the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. In 1912 the boundaries of all three provinces were extended up to the 60th parallel of north latitude.

So what is now spoken of as the Northwest Territories extends from Baffinland on the east to Alaska on the west and from the 60th parallel right up to the North Pole. This land is partly a treeless country, especially in the north, but there are rolling elevations of rock and slate, the earth having been brushed off and forced off by glaciers in times long ago. In the wintertime the ice on the Great Bear and Great Slave Lakes is seven to eight feet thick. However, there are grassy areas which provide range lands for the cariboo and the musk-ox. Vegetables grow very rapidly there on account of the long days, that being the land of the midnight sun.

This area includes the Great Northern or Cambrian Shield, so rich in mineral. It also includes Wood Buffalo National Park, the largest park in the world for the protection of buffalo.

Some 2,370 reindeer were driven from Alaska to the Mackenzie delta in 1912 and by 1940 they had increased to over 5,000. They are a source of food supply for the natives of that country.

Now, people have gone up into that country in quite large numbers for various reasons. As has been mentioned, many went during the gold rush of '98. Few found gold and many endured great privations and met with disaster. Then there was the ill-starred expedition of Franklin, who was lost with his ships and all his men. Searchers who went afterwards to try to find some remnant of that expedition learned a great deal about conditions in the country.

Since then oil has been discovered at Norman Wells, gold at Yellowknife, and pitchblende and radium in the Great Bear area. There has been extensive exploration for gas and oil there in recent years, and cobalt, lead, silver and zinc are found in the area of the Great Shield, so that the whole character of the country has changed.

The Eskimos take part in the mining activities. They have been employed by the people who are building the distant early warning lines and other defence structures in that country. The Catholics and Anglicans sent missionaries up there and there were great difficulties because of the original mode of transportation by sleigh and water. Now, of course, people travel by the Alaska highway up into that country and also by aeroplane.

Honourable senators, this is about the fourth or fifth bill which has come into the Senate in recent years for the purpose of streamlining and otherwise improving the administration of justice, but though there have been many new discoveries in the medical world we have not had an opportunity of seeing to it that modern medical services are extended to the people in the very remote districts. Of course, there are a few criminals, a few underprivileged misguided people, and it is necessary to apprehend them and try to reform them, but it is also necessary to extend to the greater number of people who are sick and disabled the very best of medical treatment that the age affords. Quite recently the Minister of Justice visited that country, but we have had no reports of visits there by medical officers, and I am under the impression that the services of the Department of Justice are being extended out of proportion to the medical services and the school services of this country. I might suggest one reason: I read lately that a certain jurist had advised a graduating class of lawyers to get into public life and become legislators.

With very great respect, I might submit that the legislative halls have their full quota of legal talent and that what we need are businessmen and representatives from other lines of endeavour. We should give all honour to judges and lawyers who take long, dangerous and difficult trips to these remote areas to administer justice, but I wish they would take along with them a team of medical officers equipped to diagnose obscure diseases and to prescribe the best medical care that can be given. I hope that, when the time comes for building courthouses in that country, hospitals and schools will receive equal consideration.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck, for second reading of Bill S-25, intituled: "An Act to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges".—(Honourable Senator Wall).

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed next with Order No. 4, for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the third reading of Bill S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada. The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), who adjourned the debate yesterday, wishes to speak and he thought that this matter, which was No. 1 on the Order Paper yesterday, would be No. 3 on the Order Paper today. The honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) is quite willing to have Order No. 3, on which he is speaking, come after Order No. 4.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLSTATE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA —THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt for the third reading of Bill S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, may I first extend my thanks to the junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) for his courtesy in yielding priority to me.

During the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada I made the statement and the criticism that there was discrimination in favour of foreign insurance companies as against Canadian insurance companies in the matter of taxation. It would be fitting if today, even though we are on the motion for third reading, I were more specific as to the nature of that discrimination.

The sources of income of the insurance companies are almost entirely receipts from underwriting premiums, which may or may not be profitable, dividends from joint stock companies, interest on bonds and debentures, and interest on mortgages.

May I digress for a moment, because it is an interesting feature, to refer to the matter of dividends payable to corporations. Dividends paid to corporations are not taxable under the Income Tax Act for the reason that the issuing company has already paid 52 per cent corporation tax; therefore, it would be a duplication of taxation for the receiving corporation to pay tax on the dividends. But it occurs to me as strange that when dividends from the same companies, which have already paid corporation tax of some 50 per cent, are paid to an individual shareholder he is not allowed complete exemption on those amounts. The individual shareholder is allowed an exemption of only 20 per cent. The reason for this, I am told, is that there is in the act a provision that companies which earn $25,000 or less pay corporation tax of only 20 per cent. Therefore, if the full exemption were allowed an individual shareholder, the allowance might be too great. My answer to that would be that I imagine about 5 per cent of corporations have profits of $25,000 or less, and these would be small bodies or family corporations. Thus the law discriminates in favour of the corporation and against the individual.

Now I come to my cause for complaint in the matter of discrimination in favour of foreign insurance companies. While Canadian companies pay income tax—corporation tax, if you like—on all profits, including underwriting profits and profits on investments, foreign companies, including those from the United States, Great Britain and European countries, pay no tax on their investment income.

Let me give a few examples. I shall mention no names, because that is not necessary. The figures I shall give are taken from the Blue Book report of the Department of Insurance. The first company I would mention is a big company with assets in the United States of $3 billion. In four years its underwriting profits were $2,200,000, on which it paid income tax, or corporation tax. It had, besides that, investment income of $1,572,000 on which it paid no income tax. The second company I would mention is a very large European company, one of the largest in the world, with an annual premium income of $20 million. I mention that figure to indicate what a big company it is. In four years it had an investment income of $2 million, of which $600,000 was received in the last year, and it had underwriting profits of $741,000. But on the $2 million, as in the other case of investment income, it paid no income tax.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Was that Canadian income or European income?

Hon. Mr. Euler: This is all on Canadian business. I gave the assets of one company in the United States, but so far as income is concerned I am referring entirely to its Canadian business.

Some companies, of course, have very heavy losses. For instance, I think the Allstate Insurance Company, with which we are dealing today, had losses for some years, until very recently, but of late I believe it is making profits. These very large companies, large in comparison with our smaller Canadian companies, can afford to take losses for some years. In the past two or three years the losses on underwriting fire insurance, and especially automobile insurance, have been extremely heavy. But the big companies stay with it because they feel that in the future—as in the case of the Allstate Insurance Company—especially with the new methods of writing insurance—they will be able to reimburse themselves. But in the meantime they are making things mighty difficult for the small Canadian companies. I am not saying that Canadian companies must not accept all reasonable and fair competition.

The British companies do not make much money in Canada; in fact, they are nearly always in the red. In four years they suffered losses in underwriting in Canada of $50 million; and they paid no tax, except the comparatively small sum of $285,000, an amount which some single Canadian companies pay in one year. These huge companies can afford to take the losses in the meantime, but, as I said earlier, it is pretty hard on the small Canadian companies.

I spoke of fair competition. Some of the competition, in my opinion, is not fair at all. I am not going to give names, but some companies do cut rates, they take the choice risks, and in many instances when losses occur they cancel the policy and leave the reinsurance to the small Canadian companies. It may surprise some honourable senators to know that only about 17 per cent of the fire insurance business in Canada is done by purely Canadian corporations.

I come back to the matter of discrimination, and I should make one qualification to what I have already said. It is only fair to say that the American and the British companies, and foreign companies in general, are not permitted to charge against their profits what may be called head office expenses in the home country, for a certain amount of office work, research and advertising, a percentage of which might fairly be charged to their Canadian operation. The reason given for not permitting them to charge these expenses against profits is the assumption and I cannot for a moment agree with it—that it establishes a fair balance and justifies exempting them from taxation on investment income.

Let us take, for example, a company that has an investment income of $2 million. If that amount were added to its profits it would pay a tax of about $1 million into the national treasury. True, some would be offset by the expenses, if they were allowed, for head office. But I think honourable senators will agree that this arrangement is very largely in favour of the foreign companies in being exempted from tax on investments.

My remedy for the thing about which I complain is this: Put the companies on an even basis, which I am sure would be a more businesslike arrangement than trying to balance one item against another, matters which cannot be fairly balanced. Let the American or British company operating in Canada make a fair appraisal of its head office expenses chargeable to the Canadian operation, charge that against its profits, and while as a result it might pay a little less in corporation tax, its investment income would be taxed in the same way as Canadian corporations are being taxed, the treasury would benefit and the discrimination be removed. That seems to me the commonsense and businesslike way of doing things.

May I say also that the method of doing business in the insurance world is changing very rapidly. Some reference was made to it in the committee the other day by the Superintendent of Insurance. The company being incorporated inaugurated this new method and it has met with great success in Canada. Insurance companies which deal in fire, casualty and automobile insurance have been doing their business through agents who get pretty large commissions, and this is one of the heavy costs of the insurance companies. Another very heavy expense, and one which is very difficult to control, is the adjustment expense. It is astounding to see how much this amounts to. When a man has an accident to his automobile and when it is known that he is fully covered by insurance you may be quite sure that the amount charged for the repairs is unduly exorbitant.

These American companies, such as Allstate and one or two others, have adopted the plan of direct insurance. They do not do business through agents. My friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Brunt) looks askance at me.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I think the insurance is originated through agents, but after the first year a considerable amount is saved in the commissions that are paid.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That may be the case in the company my friend speaks of, but I happen to know that a great deal of insurance goes directly to the head office on which practically no commission is paid, and that is so in the case of this company.

This company, by the way, although it is being incorporated in Canada, will be completely controlled by the United States company. The Allstate Insurance Company of the United States—my friend can correct me if I am wrong, for he is the sponsor of the bill—will hold 50 per cent of the stock of the Canadian company. The other 50 per cent is to be owned, as I understand it, by the Simpsons-Sears Company—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: And Sears, Roebuck.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes. Part of it may be Canadian capital, and I suppose it is, but in any case not more than 25 per cent of it will be so held, so in any event the company will be controlled by United States capital. While it is true that every Canadian insurance company must have at least a majority of Canadian directors on its board, that in effect does not mean a thing, because he who pays the piper calls the tune, and this company will be entirely under American control.

In addition to placing some direct insurance, which I am speaking of, this particular company will write insurance through these many stores that Simpsons-Sears have throughout Canada. They are agents, I suppose. Representatives of the company will be in those stores, and they will be able to write insurance at a good deal less cost than our Canadian companies can do it, unless they too adopt a similar system. I am not saying that we should not recognize any competition that is fair, and I do not say that this competition is unfair, but I do say that in many instances foreign companies cut rates, take the choice business, and then cancel the policies when all the cream has been taken off that particular kind of business. So the whole situation is changing and Canadian companies must adapt themselves to it. By the way, the company with which I am associated will be able to take care of itself.

Why is this company asking for Canadian incorporation? I asked that question in the committee, and the answer I received was that the company thought incorporation would give it a little better standing in Canada. I believe the correct answer is that this company recognizes that there is a growing resentment—perhaps that is too strong a word —toward United States capital taking control of so much of the business of Canada. I am not one of those who object to American capital coming into this country. If we had not had American capital we would not have had the extent of development which we have had. But there may come a time when it may seriously interfere with not only the industrial integrity of the nation but, perhaps, with the political integrity as well, and that is what we do not want to see.

I think this company is taking out a Canadian charter with the idea of conveying the impression that it is a Canadian company, and in an endeavour to remove some of the prejudices of which I have just spoken. However, I do not think that this will mislead anybody. As I have stated, it is strictly a United States-controlled insurance company. The other day when I was speaking on this bill I made a remark to the effect that I did not consider the name "Allstate" suitable for a Canadian company, seeing that we have provinces, not states, in this country.

Perhaps I am intruding on the time of my honourable friend, but I want to deal briefly with another matter of insurance taxation which I think is even more important than the one of which I have spoken, and that is the tax that is imposed on the premium income of insurance companies. A company which has insurance premiums of, say, $10 million is charged a tax of 2 per cent on that amount, which is $200,000. I have never heard any reason given for that tax, except the one that it is an easy way to get the money. Let me give you a history of the tax. It was brought in during the First World War as a war measure. It was then 3 per cent. The insurance companies did not object particularly to it, although they did not think it was the right form of taxation, and neither do I. They were not charged corporation tax, so they did not object to the premium income tax because they felt that the one pretty well balanced the other. Then about ten years ago Parliament made a drastic change. It reduced the 3 per cent premium tax to 2 per cent, but made the insurance companies subject to the corporation income tax. My contention is that when the corporation tax was imposed the premium income tax should have been done away with.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Is not the premium income tax a provincial tax?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes, it is now, but it was not at the time it was brought in. That has been the case only since 1956. It is not imposed in all the provinces, but the provinces may avail themselves of it.

At the time the bill was going through this house it was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and some senators will remember that we had a good standup fight on that very point. I recall that my good friend the senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Gouin) championed the contention I was trying to make. As a matter of fact, we were able to have that clause with respect to the 2 per cent tax taken out of the bill, but when the bill came back to the Senate that clause was promptly replaced and the tax was approved.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You had a good try at it.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes, but I did not get very far, and this is not an isolated case.

I think that tax is unfair. In fact, it becomes a tax on losses. I know of an insurance company—it is not a very big company—whose underwriting losses in the last two years were so heavy that they not only wiped out its investment income but the company had to dig into its surplus to the extent of about a million dollars.

I have a report here involving a company that is over 100 years old. I am not going to give its name, but its directors are very reputable citizens of Canada, known to practically everyone. The admitted assets of the company at the end of 1958, the latest year for which records are available, totalled nearly $8 million. It had a surplus of slightly over $2½ million, and its premiums written in that year amounted to only $3 million. The premium tax paid at the rate of 2 per cent was a little less than $60,000. The company's underwriting loss for the year was $1,409,382 and its net loss amounted to $1,143,018. That reduced the company's surplus—and it becomes a serious matter when a company find its surplus reduced—from $3,779,882 to $2,636,864. It amounted to a reduction in surplus in one year of over $1 million.

I do not hope to influence the Government to have the law changed, but it should be changed. With apologies to my friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), I say this tax is just about as unfair as the 11 per cent tax that is imposed on margarine while most other foods, including butter and peanut butter, are exempt. Peanut butter is a competitor of butter and my friend should have it removed from the exempt list. Even spaghetti is on the exempt list, yet the tax remains at the rate of 11 per cent on margarine. You will agree with me that it is just about as absurd and unreasonable and unfair as the tax on senators' expense allowances.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I knew you would all agree with me. We spend the money and then we are taxed on money we have not got.

I do not object to the bill. It brings this company under the same obligation to pay tax on investment income as other Canadian companies do. In the meantime it will develop a large volume of business which, may I say with all respect, will be done at the expense of the truly Canadian companies.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: And other foreign companies.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, at the outset I wish to express my sympathy for and my support of the general principle of this very interesting and significant bill. The case which has been presented by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has been argued vigorously and with sincerity, and the bill's technical and other difficulties have been presented with equal brilliance, vigour and sincerity. I must admit that I have tried to be a good pupil, for I respect the judgment of honourable senators who have spoken in this debate, and I have tried to understand and to appreciate the force of the arguments that have been presented.

However, I continue to believe there is real value and significance in what may be termed the germ of the idea in this bill, and my support indicates my agreement with its general purposes. Please note that the bill is not aimed at putting any statutory limitations upon the total charges that may be fixed upon loans as defined in the bill, but it is directed to a statutory prescription which would make it mandatory for the lenders to disclose to the borrowers two essential pieces of information. I hope that our attention will not be distracted away from and that it will be concentrated upon this basic purpose or principle of the bill.

I am supporting the bill on second reading so that we may explore, study and discuss it further in committee. I contend that what we should be concerned with and what we must be concentrating upon is the principle or the concept contained in the bill. Is this not the purpose of our discussion on second reading, and is it not in the committee stage that the terminology and the specific provisions are to be subjected to more careful scrutiny? Is it not in the committee review that evidence may be heard which would enable us to assess more carefully the potential problem areas? Is it not in the committee stage that we may explore further the doubts raised about the constitutionality of some aspects of this bill?

If the difficulties in the bill have to do with the more technical problems of wording and procedures, can these not be considered, studied and attended to by the appropriate committee—and I hope it will be the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce—with the assistance of our Law Clerk and other available experts whom we may call? Is not this what our committees do so well subsequently to the Senate's agreeing to the basic principle of the bill which, in this case, is so important to the consumers of credit, the many thousands upon thousands of little borrowers? Basically I am in favour of what the bill proposes to do, and I feel that we should do nothing less than to permit it to get this further assessment and study in committee. I see in this bill an opportunity for the Senate to perform yet another valuable service to the Canadian public, and I hope we shall not refuse ourselves this interesting opportunity.

You will see, as I develop my argument, that I am approaching this whole problem area as a layman and not as an expert trained in law or in business. I see this problem of giving additional protection to the thousands of small borrowers in its wider and perhaps more idealistic aspects, and for me the important thing is the basic idea or basic purpose contained in the bill. I see the bill for what it is trying to do, and this is simply to give some additional—and, I believe, needed—statutory protection to the borrowers or consumers of credit by making it an offence not to give to each big borrower basic information about loan charges. And I ask honourable senators: What is basically wrong with this proposition?

I believe that Parliament should take what one may call a paternalistic or a protective attitude to the ordinary Canadian, and therefore to the small borrowers. In view of the complexity of modern loan transactions in our complicated society, in view of the very large increase in consumer credit, which means that there are more and more borrowers to protect, and in view of the rapid growth and needed proliferation of all kinds and calibres of lending agencies, I want to believe that additional protection will come to the borrowers if they get the kind of readily understandable and easily interpretable information which this bill envisages. In the present and steadily increasing complexity of our economic system I believe that it is the function of Government and the function of Parliament to protect the weak, and I make no apology for my earnest and very sincere plea that this bill will be given second reading, so that it may go to committee for further review and study.

Now, will the bill do what those who support it in principle hope? That is difficult to say, but I believe that it will be of assistance to the little man who must borrow. As the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina has indicated, he hopes that when each and every borrower has knowledge of the terms and the contents of credit contracts stated in uniform and readily understandable terms, there may result (a) better price competition in the consumer credit market, and (b) better credit management by each individual borrower. I have asked myself the same question, and I should like to put my answer to the question in this way: Firstly, I believe it will be salutary to many lenders, and I believe it will be eminently fair to all lenders, if each of them knows that he will be subjected to the same statutory prescription regarding basic information about loan charges. Secondly, I believe it will be educational to the borrowers, enabling each of them to make better judgments if the sum-total of all the charges is first set apart and then expressed in a percentage relationship to the outstanding balance in simple interest terms. I have examined quite a few of the documents which are used to make loan agreements, and as an ordinary lay person I have reason to believe, too, that there are great variations in the forms being used and in the amount of information being given to borrowers, even by large lending institutions. What this bill aims to do is simply to put all lenders and all borrowers on an equal informational footing with respect to total charges and their percentage relationship on a simple interest basis.

Perhaps we should ask ourselves this question: From our every day experiences and knowledge, do we have need of this kind of protective legislation? The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina indicated, as appears on page 560 of the Senate Hansard, that:

> True annual rates run as high as 30 per cent or 40 per cent, and are camouflaged in terms of rates which appear modest because they are stated mostly as monthly rather than annual rates. They are further disguised in the form of fees, charges, discounts and the like, all of which make up the true cost of credit to the consumer.

Honourable senators, if Parliament can do something, if it can do anything, to mitigate and to alleviate this burden of charges—and some of these I regard personally as deplorably onerous—let us by all means do something. I am sure honourable senators have all received a very interesting letter from the Canadian Association of Consumers, strongly urging that there be steps taken to secure this kind of protection for these small borrowers. If I may, I will quote from this letter, which was sent by Miss Isabel Atkinson, the National President. Among other things, she says:

> This is a matter of great concern to many consumers, and also to other groups in the community.

Further on she says:

> We endorse strongly the principle of this bill. We feel that legislation adopting this principle will enable consumers to know the cost of borrowing involved in credit purchases.

To me, honourable senators, and I believe to all thoughtful Canadians, the second mortgage business, with all its bonuses and discounts, or whatever you may call them, is very distressing and disturbing, because it has been aggravated by the so-called tight money situation and the lack of rental accommodation for families of modest means. I want to make only two minor references to this second mortgage business. I have in my hand a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of May 26, 1960, in which there are advertisements for second mortgages which have already been entered into and are apparently being sold to other people. An advertisement reads:

> 2ND MTGE. $3,400 BUYS $4,500. 8%, $45 mo., 5 yr. term, . . .

Further down the column I read:

> 2ND MORTGAGE, $1,600 FOR $1,200. $16 a mo. 8%, 5 yrs. . . .

A very quick calculation will show that the discount or the bonus, or what have you, even on this sale is over 30 per cent; and if you want to calculate the amount of interest being collected on the money being invested you will see it is well over 10 per cent, and five years later each of these mortgagees will hav to float another second mortgage with another bonus, and so on.

Honourable senators, if this bill can help with this second mortgage situation, and I believe it can, Canadians generally will be grateful to Parliament.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina referred also to the great increases in the sum-total of consumer credit now approximating well over $2 billion. In this connection, I think honourable senators would be interested in knowing that during the past year there has been a tremendous acceleration in the amount of credit buying done by Canadians. I have in my hand the March 1960 credit statistics report issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It shows that the increases in retail instalment credits over last year were 10.5 per cent; increases in cash loans and instalment credits under the Small Loans Act, 19.9 per cent; increases in retail instalment financing by sales finance companies, 13.7 per cent; balances outstanding in those sales finance companies has increased by 36.8 per cent in one year. It is not for me to say whether this increase is alarming, because it indicates that consumers' credit lenders are meeting a need which is apparently very real, although I have a feeling that astute wooing of potential borrowers is also a factor in this situation.

Now, whatever the problems connected with this rapid increase in consumer credit, I feel strongly that there is great merit in the basic intent of this bill, which is directed at providing all these many additional borrowers with the necessary informational data so that they can make valid comparisons and more responsible judgments, and I ask again the question: Do we seem to need this kind of legislation?—Is this not an important question to ask in this context, for what we are dealing with here, honourable senators, is a national problem to which a national and not a parochial solution must be found.

In view of the debate that has taken place I have also asked myself this question: "With existing protective legislation presently on federal and some provincial statute books, is there evidence that many borrowers are now being subjected to high finance charges that they cannot readily assess and which may be termed usurious or unconscionable". In other words, is present protective legislation really working in actual practice?

It would be important for us, I believe, to get additional evidence about this in committee, for is it not a fact that in such cases, and especially in Ontario and under the federal Interest Act, the borrower—if he knows the law, and if he knows that it may apply in his case, and if he has the money to make the necessary applications through the legal counsel—has to institute a legal suit with all its attendant difficulties and costs?

This question then arises to plague me: What really effective day to day protection is there in these existing statutes if they involve taking court proceedings which I feel are hardly likely to be initiated by the ordinary little borrower under ordinary circumstances, and especially when the borrower may not really know what the total financial charges are, and when he is hardly likely to be able to translate these charges into simple interest relationships?

In other words, honourable senators, I am not over-impressed by the fact that some statutory provisions have been enacted by some provinces in order to give the borrower protection, either by the disclosure of total financial charges or by permitting persons wronged to institute court proceedings against the large and more powerfully equipped lenders.

And even if some provinces have some form of protective legislation, what about the other provinces, and the Northwest Territories, where many thousands upon thousands of borrowers are daily borrowing money for a variety of purposes important to them?

To me, honourable senators, the most serious objection to this bill is the doubt cast upon its constitutionality. As I see it in my simple way, the problem resolves around a satisfactory answer to this question which I shall state very bluntly indeed: If it is not constitutional for the federal Parliament to extend the definition of interest, over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, to include the many ancillary charges directly and intimately connected with a loan, then the converse perturbs me much more, namely, is it more constitutional for provincial legislatures to extend the interpretation or the definition of property and civil rights to include interest, which is a federal matter? For, if the provinces can pass legislation dealing substantially with interest and its ancillary charges, is not this some kind of invasion of the jurisdiction assigned exclusively to Parliament with respect to interest and criminal law?

We have been told that the Alberta legislation and perhaps the provisions of the Quebec Civil Code have not been challenged, but that does not mean that the constitutionality of this bill can be challenged; nor does it necessarily mean that the constitutionality of the provincial legislation has been definitely established. Perhaps, and here I need guidance, the principle of concurrent jurisdiction applies in this whole problem area, somewhat like the federal legislation which governs both the voluntary and involuntary bankruptcies or liquidations, whereas provinces, I believe, restrict themselves to voluntary liquidations. As I understand it, voluntary liquidations are within the competence of both jurisdictions, federal and provincial, and it may well be that this same concurrent legislative competence is true of this apparently overlapping problem of financial charges on loans.

I am mentioning this in the form of an honest query, because I would hate to feel that the little borrower is being left forgotten and unassisted in the apparently undecided no man's land between these two jurisdictions—to be effectively protected by neither.

I confess that I am not competent to judge the constitutionality of this bill, but surely, honourable senators, there is no doubt about the fact that under heading 19 of section 91 of the B. N. A. Act Parliament has jurisdiction over interest, and I find it difficult to understand how anyone can deal with interest and not deal incidentally thereto with ancillary or additional financial charges which are incidental to or attributes of interest, whatever they may be called. How else can Parliament make comprehensive and true legislation on the subject of interest other than by including with interest all financial charges connected with loans? I presume that one must ask whether these other charges are reasonably ancillary and related to interest, and quite frankly, as I understand the ruling or the explanations of Mr. F. P. Varcoe, which were given to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce respecting small loan companies, back in 1938, his statement argues more for the constitutionality of the bill before us—that is the Finance Charges (Disclosure) Bill—than it does against it, for that is how, as a layman, I judge the constitutionality of the Small Loans Act and its 1956 amendments.

I should like in this connection to bring to your attention a statement of the then Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. F. P. Varcoe, given before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on July 19, 1956, when amendments to the Small Loans Act were being considered. In answer to a question about the constitutionality of the Small Loans legislation and the changes that were being made, he said this:

> In 1939 the device was resorted to of fixing the over-all cost of a loan. The idea behind that was, first of all, that everything that is paid to the lender by the borrower, apart, of course, from the principal, is interest. What the lender does with that, and how he disposes of it, does not make the sum which he receives any the less interest. Now interest is, as you know, the return made to the lender for accepting the risk of the loan and for compensating him for the use of the money lent. That was the first basis we had in mind when we prepared this legislation in 1939—everything which the borrower pays is interest, no matter how the lender may break it down, and suggest that it is for this and that, chattel mortgage charges, and so on. In case that did not cover the whole field of these charges we said, secondly, that when you fix the cost of the loan, accepting the view that there might be some items in there which are not interest, then you are nevertheless regulating the interest because you fix the maximum of 12 per cent, or whatever it is, and if any part of that is something other than interest you are nevertheless regulating interest by reference to that.

Furthermore, honourable senators, what interpretation do you and I get from the Small Loans Act itself? I want to read to you from the Revised Statutes of Canada (1952), Chapter 251, section 2, the interpretation of "cost" of a loan, and please note the words:

"Cost" of a loan means the whole of the cost of the loan to the borrower whether the same is called interest or is claimed as discount, deduction from an advance, commission, brokerage, chattel mortgage and recording fees, fines, penalties or charges for inquiries, defaults or renewals or otherwise, and whether paid to or charged by the lender or paid to or charged by any other person, and whether fixed and determined by the loan contract itself, or in whole or in part by any other collateral contract or document by which the charges, if any, imposed under the loan contract or the terms of the repayment of the loan are effectively varied.

Then in 1956, without varying the definition of the interpretation of cost of loan, Parliament made some amendments to the act. I read from the Statutes of Canada (1956), chapter 46, section 1(c), the definition of "loan":

"Loan" means a loan made by a money-lender of not more than fifteen hundred dollars—

That was the maximum with respect to which the law was to be enforced.

—and includes the consideration for a wage assignment; and if, after deducting all payments, whether on account of interest, expenses or principal, made by the borrower to the money-lender at or about the same time as a loan is made ...

I refer to section 3, chapter 46, dealing with the limitations on the cost of loans, and in order to make the problem abundantly clear may I read subsection (1).

No money-lender shall, in respect of any loan, directly or indirectly, charge, exact or receive, or stipulate for the payment by the borrower of, a sum of money as a result of the payment of which the cost of the loan exceeds an amount equivalent to the amount or rate prescribed by this section ...

It is to be remembered that the act was prescribing the maximum amount of charges that could be laid against small loans.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator, has that act ever been challenged in the courts as being unconstitutional?

Hon. Mr. Wall: I do not think so, but I stand to be corrected.

In any event, honourable senators, I respectfully urge that this problem of constitutionality be pursued further in committee, because I have the feeling that perhaps the balance will be found to rest on the side of the constitutionality of Bill S-25. On this aspect of the debate the matter resolves itself into a choice, and I put it in the form of a question: Do we refuse to explore further this important and helpful legislation and discard it out of hand, or do we permit it to proceed to the committee stage where the matter can be considered in all its aspects?

Further, honourable senators, under head 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act, Parliament has jurisdiction over criminal matters. I know that what is criminal in one period in our historical development may not be criminal in another, and vice versa; yet, to me it seems that, living in a highly complicated and mechanized society, there may be something akin to fraudulence and criminality in not disclosing clearly and unequivocably all information to borrowers when they are entering into their loan obligations, if—and I emphasize the word "if"—this is in fact being done by some lenders in one form or another. I believe that there are judgments of the Privy Council and of the Supreme Court which interpret criminal law in a reasonably broad sense, always subject to what Parliament clearly declares to be a criminal act at a given point in our overall societal development.

For example, back in the 1890's Parliament declared certain commercial transactions to be prejudicial and harmful to the public interest, and therefore criminal in nature and punishable by court proceedings. I am thinking of the Combines Investigation Act and certain sections related thereto in the Criminal Code. In fact, at this very moment the other house is debating suggested changes or alterations to the Combines Investigation Act. I mention this fact only to underscore that these changes are clearly within the competence of Parliament, because it has exclusive jurisdiction over criminal matters. I am sure that others more learned than I would be able to document this ordinary layman's contention, namely, that this bill may be regarded as constitutional because it deals with certain aspects of commercial transactions that may be judged harmful or prejudicial to the public good, and therefore definable by Parliament as aspects of our economic life subject to criminal law jurisdiction.

I am not attempting to becloud the issue, but I want to insist that this issue of constitutionality is not clear and that it merits further exploration in committee.

If this bill is constitutional, and if it meets with approval of Parliament in this or in an amended form, then I believe it would modify pre-existing provincial and federal legislation to the extent of what the new act would say. In other words, the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act would remain law, but this subsequent act relating to the disclosure of finance charges on loans would have to be complied with.

I wish to stress again the qualification I made in one of my preceding statements when I dealt with non-disclosure of information regarding finance charges on loans. I said, "if this is in fact being done by some lenders . . .". Honourable senators, I have no wish and no reason to be unfair or unjust to honest and reliable lenders who do give to their borrowers the kind of information and in the kind of way that this bill envisages. In this connection, I wish to stress that I fail to see how this bill can be construed as an attack upon reputable lenders, who are undoubtedly now giving to each of their clients the kind of information we are talking about. To me, the significant thing in the bill is that it proposes to put all lenders on the same informational footing, so to speak, and I see nothing wrong with this basic proposition. However, I am inclined to agree that the definition of "lenders" is very broad, and that we should consider this definition carefully in committee to see if some lending institutions like banks and credit unions, trust and insurance companies, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other approved lenders should be specifically excluded from this prescription, mainly because I believe they do furnish their clients with this kind of needed information.

Honourable senators, the problem of calculation difficulties has been brought up and partially documented. My comment simply is this, that if—with their trained staffs, with their interest tables and with their mechanical calculators—it is indeed so difficult for the lenders to make these simple interest relationship calculations with reasonable facility and reasonable accuracy, then what about the poor borrower?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Did you say "simple calculations"?

Hon. Mr. Wall: What about the poor borrower? The plea was made for the thousands of retail dealers in regard to the burden connected with the computation of these charges. I may be wrong, but I believe that in most cases the small dealers act as agents, in a way, for instalment finance companies. That is, they use their forms and they use their calculations, and in this aspect I believe that these finance companies would be reached and would be responsible indirectly. However, I would like additional evidence regarding the applicability of this bill to these instalment finance companies, which is a contention which has been advanced and which perturbs me a great deal.

The honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) referred to the fact that the penalty section may be so interpreted that in the event of non-disclosure of information the borrower may legally refuse to pay even the loan that was made. I do not believe that this was, or is, the intent of the bill, and I agree with the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) that what is referred to is the balance of the finance charges. However, this matter, too, can be given further adjudication in committee.

What is interesting to me is that the bill is giving the borrower double protection, namely—and here I am subject to correction —(1) the aggrieved borrower may lay a charge, or (2) he may refuse to pay the outstanding finance charges.

In closing, honourable senators, I may say that I have tried to understand and to appreciate the criticisms which have been advanced about the constitutionality, the practicability, the applicability and the effectiveness of this proposed statutory instrument concerning the mandatory disclosure of finance charges levied against loans, and I have learned much from the debate. I appreciate that the subject-matter and the terminology in this bill are new and, apparently, controversial, even on constitutional grounds, but I want again to express my personal hope that we may think of the many thousands of little borrowers who are in need of additional protection, and that we may accept this bill in principle so that this legislation may be given further consideration and study in committee. I believe that the bill is important, although it may need amending to make it a better and more effective statutory instrument to do the kind of work it is intended to do. Whatever the problems are that this bill may raise, they can be adjudicated, studied and debated further either here or in committee.

I am persuaded by the converse to the proposition contained in this bill, namely: Why should we not have a statutory provision enacted by the Parliament of Canada to obligate all lenders to tell each of their borrowers in straightforward and easily understandable terms the sum total of all debt or loan charges, whatever their form or purpose, and the relationship of these debt charges to the outstanding balances, expressed in terms of simple annual interest? Why should the law not entitle every borrower to this basic information about finance charges expressed by each lender in the same simple and easily understandable terms?

My approach to this legislation may be termed idealistic, but I am convinced that this extension of protection to small borrowers, in the form of this kind of essential information so that the borrower may make better value judgments, and by which there may be more effective competition, will prove to be beneficial and will be welcomed by all thoughtful Canadians.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, my contribution to this debate will be very brief, and it will be neither brilliant nor learned, as have been the speeches which have preceded mine. It seems to me that the bill that has been introduced by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges is an attempt to deal with what I believe to be one of the most serious social problems of our time, and I congratulate him upon bringing this problem to the attention of the Senate and of the country.

This is a matter in which the Canadian Association of Consumers—which, I may tell you, is dedicated to the protection of the consumers of Canada—has been greatly interested for a long time. The honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) referred to a letter he has received, and which I presume you all have received, from the association on this matter. I should like to mention briefly one part of that letter. It says that for years the members and local branches of the association throughout Canada have forwarded representations and resolutions urging that steps be taken to secure legislation which will require all loan or sales contracts involving credit to state clearly the full cost of the loan to the borrower; that is, that all the charges, both service and interest, be clearly explained to show the effective annual interest rate. That is really the object of the bill before us.

There are other people in Canada, such as those persons requiring mortgages, particularly second mortgages, who are not organized and are not so articulate as the Canadian Association of Consumers, but who, as many of us know, suffer greatly because of the system under which they are now required to pay for credit extended to them.

Unquestionably, under our present system of instalment buying and of securing money on second mortgages many abuses of credulous, naïve, ignorant and unthinking people are taking place. Welfare workers have found that the reason why many families and individuals apply for financial assistance and other help, and also the cause of much family discord and distress, can be traced to financial difficulties which have come about through instalment buying by those families. Some solution to this cause of social ills must be found, and the sooner the better.

I am impressed, however, by the arguments of the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) and the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), and realize there is difficulty involved in setting a rate of simple annual interest, when in the finance charges there must be included fees, bonuses, service charges and discounts. Although I do not claim to have any expert knowledge of constitutional law, I too can see that there may be difficulties due to constitutional problems, particularly as to what Government has authority in this field.

Despite these difficulties, we cannot let time pass while we argue about them, when at the same time large numbers of Canadian people continue to suffer under existing abuses. To me this would savour too much of "fiddling while Rome burns".

As in the case of so many social problems, one of the most satisfactory ways to find a solution is to make sure that the public is well and truly informed about the facts of the situation. The honourable senator from Ottawa West suggested that this might be accomplished through a debate on a motion which, after it had served its purpose of drawing the attention of the public to the problem, could be withdrawn. This might draw sufficient attention to the problem, although sometimes very excellent debates in the Senate get little attention from the press and so do not ever reach the public. In my opinion this problem could serve as the subject of a thorough study by a committee of the Senate, similar to the study on inflation undertaken so efficiently last year by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Such a committee could delve into the causes and effects of this problem and could call expert witnesses. Because such a committee would in all probability receive more attention from the press than any Senate debate, it would serve to acquaint the public with the actual state of affairs. Many people, when actually made aware of the situation, might be guided to spend their money more wisely. Also, if knowledge of this problem and the actual situation were known more widely throughout this country Canadians would demand that legislation be passed in whatever field it is necessary to pass it.

However, honourable senators, there is no such study in progress and this is an urgent matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would the honourable senator permit me to interrupt to ask a question?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would she be in favour of making a motion to the effect that the subject-matter of this bill be referred to a committee, say the Banking and Commerce Committee, before the bill is read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no, no. That is an old trick.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has only asked a simple question.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That would be like giving it the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I would not be in favour of such a move, but I did have in mind that if the bill does not pass as I hope it will, the subject might be brought up on another occasion.

I am entirely in sympathy with the principle of this bill, and although I know there would be difficulties in putting it into effect, I am certainly not convinced that these difficulties could not be overcome. I will support the bill.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, as the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) covered this subject so extensively, and was followed so ably by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), there is practically nothing left for me to say. I should like to support both those speakers, and hope that the bill will be sent to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for study.

I have continued to marvel at the increasing number of loan companies. I recall that several sittings of the Banking and Commerce Committee during one session of Parliament were devoted to a discussion of the application of the Household Finance Corporation for incorporation in Canada. At that time the question was taken to the Russell Sage Foundation. We thought the company's rate was unduly high, for it amounted to 2 per cent a month, but we were told by the Russell Sage Foundation that it was better to have a corporation which felt responsible and did its best to enlighten its borrowers and assist them with their budgeting than to allow a multitude of smaller lenders to exact whatever toll they desired.

I wholeheartedly support the principle of the bill and hope that the constitutional difficulties may be overcome.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I will be only a minute or two. During this debate someone mentioned the possibility of excluding the banks from the provisions of the bill. I would not go that far, but it annoys me to find that the man in the poorest circumstances pays the highest rate of interest, even to the banks. I used to have many an argument 50 years ago in the west on this subject. I said, "That's your idea of helping to equalize the wealth, to charge the poor man the highest rate of interest." So I cannot do much other than support the principle contained in this bill.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, with great respect for those who have already spoken on behalf of the bill so enthusiastically and ardently presented by my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), I must say that I have some definite doubts about it. For one thing, apart from the area that is already covered by the Small Loans Act, which has been discussed in our committees before this time, an area exists in which the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina thinks there are abuses and difficulties of sufficient volume to justify further legislative restrictions in connection with the extension of credit.

I must say I feel that the prospect he has suggested requires a good deal more authentic outline and specification than I can appreciate at the present time. For that reason I should like to see more evidence given to support the claims he has made here about the plight of the poor people who place themselves so helplessly in the hands of lenders rather than determine their own business without so-called protective influences from the State. I should like to have that picture made clearer to me than it is now. I can say that, based on the figures quoted by my honourable colleague from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), the business of extending credit in this country, as well as in the United States, has become a very, very formidable factor in our mode of life. I do not think it can be written off or changed materially at the present time by legislation of this kind. There is an economic basis of existence, especially for the younger generation who were thrown back on society following World War II, which necessitates their having to borrow money or get credit in order to establish themselves in life and to support their homes and families. Now, if they want to start out in life again as civilians, to engage in business or in some kind of profession, in our society they are entitled to live, and to live in a decent way. The only way open to them is to get credit in order to provide themselves with what they consider to be the necessaries of life. Whether that standard is too high or too low is not, in my opinion, for the state to say. That brings one back to what is the role of the state in determining whether or not individuals are capable of running their own affairs. I find it distasteful—possibly my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina

(Hon. Mr. Croll) would call my attitude one of laissez faire—to employ the state as an agency to intervene between the borrower and the lender in relation to any project they want to undertake. If any progress is to be made in this country in the way of responsible management or ownership, surely it must be done as the result of the development of a maturity of mind so that people will realize the values involved. We all know of the precautions that were taken years ago to defend the western farmers from overloading themselves with farm machinery through lien notes, and how provincial legislation was introduced against that. I doubt very much if it worked out very satisfactorily for all concerned, because a reaction from interference of that kind is bound to occur against the promotion or extension of business on that basis.

Honourable senators, I simply come back to the principle of the bill, which is definitely the employment of government and legislation to interfere with what should be the ordinary, normal relationship between a buyer and a seller. I think there is good ground also, apart from the principle of the bill, to regard seriously the citations made by the honourable senator from Ottawa West yesterday, to the effect that proposed legislation of this kind is ultra vires of the federal jurisdiction. For that reason I must oppose the bill in principle, but at the same time I should like to see further light shed on it and more information given regarding the representations made by my honourable colleague from Toronto-Spadina.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Mr. Aseltine tabled:

Copy of the estimates of expenditure and budget of the National Battlefields Commission for the year ending March 31, 1961, approved by Order in Council P.C. 1960-502 of April 13, 1960, as required by section 80(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter 2, Statutes of Canada, 1951. (English text).

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen reported that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications had considered Bill C-57, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, as I expect to be absent from the chamber next week when this bill will likely be before the house for third reading, may I have permission of the house to say a few words at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Honourable senators, in the debate on the second reading of this bill there was considerable comment with regard to the extensions of time for highway construction and the period to be covered by the appropriations. One or two honourable senators remarked that they hoped this would be the last occasion on which Parliament would be asked to vote money for this highway. I do not agree with that view. If the provinces are to have the opportunity to participate in and spend their relative share of the national highway cost, federal money must be made available under the present agreement and any amended agreement that may be extended into the future.

Money appropriated for the building of the Trans-Canada Highway must not be regarded as a throw-away fund, as some seem to view it. It is an appropriation for the financing of an essential public service in Canada. Indeed, this national highway is a vital factor in the present development of Canada, and is one of our great national projects.

While I am not making any comparison of their relative importance, I think the Trans-Canada Highway can be placed in a class with the railways, telegraphs, air services and other great national undertakings.

The sharing of the costs, federal and provincial, on a 50-50 basis right across the country was a weak arrangement and not properly applicable to Canada as a whole. One pattern of payment for all provinces is wrong. There are many factors to be considered with respect to the amount involved and the percentage of payment, in relation to each province. No two provinces are similar in the way in which they can meet their requirements in this respect. The nature of the terrain over which the road must pass differs in different provinces, and mileage construction costs vary a great deal as between one province and another. Then, provincial income has to be considered, and just how much money is available in each province to meet its particular share of the cost, and in this connection regard must be had to the per capita income of the various provinces. All these factors have a direct relationship to each province's obligation to pay its share that has been fixed on an across-the-board pattern for the whole of Canada.

Newfoundland has some very special circumstances and needs. It is not so many years ago that the people there generally moved from place to place by boat. The one primary industry, fishing, has given place to diversified industries, and the pulp and paper industry is now at the top of the list. At the present time more revenue comes into Newfoundland from that industry than from any other. Mining also has become a big industry. The discovery of mines and mineral development does not follow roads and highways, and whenever there is a mining development, as there is in many parts of Newfoundland today, access roads have to be constructed in order to service the areas concerned.

Manufacturing industries are becoming more and more diversified in Newfoundland and new roads are needed to service them. We need in these times local roads to service our fishing industry. It is only feasible to have cold storage plants and freezing depots in comparatively few fishing communities, so roads have to be developed to transport the fish to the freezing plants and bait from the bait depots.

There is one outstanding prospect for Newfoundland for which the Trans-Canada Highway is absolutely essential. I refer to the tourist industry. Until Newfoundland has good through roads comparable to those in other provinces it will remain unknown to the rest of the people of Canada except for what they may read about it in advertising literature. The natural scenic tourist attractions of Newfoundland are unexcelled in Canada. I am not saying they are better than can be found anywhere else, but I would certainly say the general impression of people coming to our province is that they are just as good. Our bays and inlets as well as our rivers and country scenes equal those of any part of the dominion. We must have good roads. Otherwise we shall not be able to build the hotels, motels and other facilities that are needed to attract tourists. You cannot develop a resort unless there is a good road leading to it. In this respect the Trans-Canada Highway is of special importance to Newfoundland. Without it we simply cannot provide the facilities to build up a worthwhile tourist trade.

I think we were a bit off the track in having to pay for the Trans-Canada Highway. It is my absolute conviction that when Newfoundland became a province of Canada a standard gauge line for our railroad should have been an essential factor and made a condition of Union or, as an alternative, the federal Government should have provided a highway throughout the province. I think, therefore, that the Government of Canada should now give special consideration to Newfoundland in the financing of this very essential project. The people of Newfoundland got none of the public services of Canada whose costs were part of the public debt at the time of Union, although by becoming Canadian citizens they automatically assumed their share of the outstanding national obligations.

The total length of the Trans-Canada Highway laid out for Newfoundland is 554 miles, and it cannot be any less because it has to go through the area where most of the people live and where they have their occupations.

Honourable senators, I mention these few facts now because I want to stress the need for special consideration for Newfoundland in this matter. As I said before, we should be able to avoid having to follow a pattern which is not properly applicable to our province.

The average number of miles of the Trans-Canada Highway in relation to population is an important matter. Taking the nine provinces that are participating, the average is 2.9 miles per 10,000 people. In Newfoundland there are 12.2 miles per 10,000 people. Taking the Atlantic provinces as a unit, Newfoundland has 24 per cent of the total population, but requires 42 per cent of the total Trans-Canada Highway mileage. To put it another way. The population of Newfoundland is 32 per cent of the total population of the other three Atlantic provinces, but is obliged to build as much as 72 per cent of the total Trans-Canada Highway mileage in those three provinces. Recently it was officially stated that of a total of 4,491 miles throughout Canada, 2,373 miles had been paved according to Trans-Canada Highway standards, and about 800 miles are practically ready for paving. More than half of the total mileage throughout Canada has been completely finished. In Newfoundland, of 554 miles only 63 miles have been completely finished, roughly about 11 per cent, as compared with over 50 per cent finished of the total in the other provinces. Newfoundland has yet to build by far the largest proportion of any of the provinces.

Payments recently reported as made to all the participating provinces amount, in round figures, to $260 million, and Newfoundland has been paid $19,700,000. Had the same percentage of mileage been built in Newfoundland as in the other provinces, Newfoundland would have received over $14 million more by this time. On so big a project as this, and considering the expense involved, the province of Newfoundland has not the funds to keep pace with the other provinces, or most of them, in paying 50 per cent of the cost of building this highway. Opinion has been publicly expressed that $60 million more will have to be paid by Newfoundland for the completion of the highway. That would mean that the completion of the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland would have to be spread over—I don't know how many years, but let us say ten years or maybe longer.

I will not go into any more detail in this matter. I just want to bring to the attention of honourable senators that our province has a very great need for this highway project and also that it has a case, and a very definite and good one, for special consideration for a revision of the percentage of cost to be borne by the federal government.

In the past ten years Newfoundland has had to build a tremendous number of local roads, totalling altogether about 1,600 miles. They are mostly gravel roads, which were necessary to meet changing conditions, industrial and otherwise in our province.

I certainly hope that very special consideration will be given to the ability of Newfoundland to pay, as well as to the need for getting this highway completed without undue delay. The time has come for the federal and provincial Governments to get together and work out a plan whereby the federal participation of cost will be such as to enable Newfoundland to go ahead and finish the project. I hope that some formula will be worked out.

My remarks this afternoon are directed to the bringing of this matter to the attention of honourable senators and the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Would the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) permit a question? Would he tell me whether his remarks should apply also to the other provinces of the Atlantic region?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I would say they would apply in respect to any special circumstances existing in each province. I thought I made that point clear. I was speaking particularly on behalf of the province of Newfoundland and the very extraordinary circumstances that exist there, but it may be that there are factors in the other Atlantic provinces which should be taken into consideration and that some adjustment should be made.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, I would like to compliment the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) for bringing this question and problem before us, and I quite agree with him that consideration should be given to the extension of time, if necessary, in the case of Newfoundland. Nova Scotia's situation is a little different. I may say, in reference to the question asked by the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith), that many years ago Nova Scotia started out to build good roads and it has done an exceptionally fine job. Because of that perhaps it does not require the same assistance as some of the other provinces may. I am thinking particularly now of the Prairie provinces, which did not have good roads when this legislation was introduced, in 1949, and therefore they went into the scheme wholeheartedly. On the other hand, in Nova Scotia we had a system of good roads but we still require assistance on the widening of certain roads, particularly. And I was rather surprised that the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois) did not bring out this point, coming as he does from Truro, that for years it has been advocated that there be a cross-country Trans-Canada Highway connection from Truro to Yarmouth. I would urge the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Public Works with a view to having that portion from Truro to Yarmouth linked up for the greater convenience especially of United States tourists entering this country by the Yarmouth-Bar Harbour ferry.

It is not generally recognized, although it is known to the members of the Committee on Transport and Communications, that in nearly every province in Canada the Trans-Canada Highway has a connecting link with the provincial capital. But in Nova Scotia, from the nearest point of the Trans-Canada Highway to Halifax is 62 miles. Now I think that is a great mistake, a mistake on the part of either the federal or the provincial department, it does not matter which. There happened to be a Liberal Government in power in the province when this legislation was brought into effect—and a good scheme it was—by the Hon. R. H. Winters. He put it through, but for some reason or other they did not connect the highway with the capital, Halifax.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They by-passed Halifax?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Yes, which was a great mistake. And this year we have heard, and I hate to mention this—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Oh, no, you don't, you just love to mention it.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: This year I notice that the Conservative party in Nova Scotia says it is going to spend $200 million on our highways. Just think of that, $200 million placed before the people of Nova Scotia! It sounds good, but I am wondering where it is going to spend that amount of money. I inquired of the officials who appeared at this morning's meeting of the committee dealing with this bill, and I was assured that there were no such representations made, nor would the amount be greater, by my figuring, than $800,000 to be spent by the federal Government in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia.

I just wanted to make these few remarks to compliment the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) upon placing the problem before the house, and to urge the honourable Leader of the Government to endeavour to have special consideration given to the Maritime provinces, the Atlantic provinces, in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Honourable senators, may I just say a further word in answer to my friend from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith), who asked a question a moment ago. I do not want to be misunderstood. The circumstances in the other Atlantic provinces may be such as to warrant special consideration, and I do not look begrudgingly on any effort of those provinces to get something to meet their particular needs.

I want to emphasize, however, that the circumstances of the province of Newfoundland in some respects are different from those of any other province. Indeed, they are unique. To a great extent, but not entirely, that situation is due to the fact that it is a new province and some of its public services are so far in arrears that very special conderation by the federal Government is essential.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I should like to make a few remarks to clarify my question.

Had my honourable friend from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) answered my question in the affirmative, I would have adopted everything he said for my own province of Nova Scotia. We too face difficulties in meeting the cost of building highways, though perhaps not to the same degree as Newfoundland does.

I do not know whether honourable senators appreciate it or not, but in my province we have a gasoline tax that is one of the highest, if not the highest, in the country; we have an automobile and truck registration fee that is one of the highest, if not the highest, in all Canada; and we have a sales tax that is one of the highest, if not the highest, of any Canadian province. On top of that, we in the Atlantic provinces have the lowest per capita income and the lowest base from which to derive additional funds through taxation of any part of Canada.

I should like to repeat what I said in committee this morning. I did not expect the representative of the Department of Public Works to make any comment on what I said, but I believe it is necessary that that department be authorized some time to take a closer look at the situation in those provinces which have not been able to complete their sections of the Trans-Canada Highway, with a view to having these links in the system completed before many years pass. In this rapidly moving economic age, if we are ever going to catch up with this national project we must give full recognition to the taxing abilities of those provinces now struggling with transportation costs.

Honourable senators, that is all I intend to say at this time.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I have a great deal of hesitation in intervening in this discussion, since I do not come from the Maritime provinces. All I wish to do is say to the house that when the honourable senator from Colchester-Hants (Hon. Mr. Blois) explained this measure on May 19 he submitted a series of tables which appear in Hansard for that day. At the top of page 634, in Table 5, headed "Summary of Contractual Commitments", figures for each of the provinces are given in three different categories: first, total commitment approved in the province; secondly, the dominion's share of that commitment; and thirdly, the dominion's share paid to date. Those figures cover operations from the inception of this legislation in 1949 to April 23, 1960. At the meeting of the committee this morning some honourable senators wished to have those figures brought up to date, and we were informed that they would be made available for the period between April 23, 1960 and May 28. A comparison of the figures given in Hansard of May 19 with the new figures would enable honourable senators very quickly to determine how many additional commitments have been made in the intervening period. I wonder if honourable senators would be good enough to allow this table to be printed in today's Hansard, so that when the bill comes up for third reading, which I expect will be at the next sitting, my honourable friends will have the additional information in their hands.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George S. White moved the second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act is similar in nearly every respect to the bill amending the Yukon Act which received second reading yesterday.

The first clause of this bill is with respect to Territorial ordinances in regard to game. As I explained yesterday, the game in the Territories is under their own jurisdiction, but in a court decision of a year ago this jurisdiction was questioned for the first time, and this amendment is to make it perfectly clear that the Territorial authorities have power to deal with game.

The second change provides that a judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon is ex officio a judge of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories. The same provision is in the Yukon Bill.

The third change also is in the Yukon Bill. It authorizes the Governor in Council to appoint a deputy judge, and to fix his remuneration and allowances.

Clause 5 provides that the Court of the Northwest Territories may sit in the Yukon, and clause 6 provides for a Court of Appeal consisting of the Chief Justice of Alberta, the justices of appeal of Alberta and the judges of Territorial Courts of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

There is one change that does not appear in the Yukon Bill, and it is to be found in clause 7. This has to do with the question of probate in the Territories. Up to the present time the courts in all the provinces have jurisdiction concurrently with the Territorial Court in matters of probate. This amendment will limit this concurrent jurisdiction to the area outside the Mackenzie district. Within the Mackenzie district the jurisdiction of the Territorial Court in probate matters will be absolute.

I would like to point out that serious consideration has been given to extending this absolute jurisdiction in probate matters to the whole of the Territories, but it was concluded that unreasonable inconvenience and expense would be caused to executors and heirs if they had to go to Yellowknife and involve themselves in probate proceedings with respect to property situate beyond the Mackenzie district.

The final provision in the bill is the same as in the Yukon Bill, that the Governor in Council may in special circumstances authorize payment to a justice of the peace of remuneration and of travelling and other expenses incurred by him in the performance of his duties.

Honourable senators, when the bill receives second reading I will move to have it referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Officials from both the Department of Justice and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be present to give any details required by honourable senators.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, after the clear explanation of this bill that we have received from the honourable senator from Hastings-Frontenac (Hon. Mr. White) I do not think there is anything that needs to be added. Apparently there are two principal provisions of the bill. The first authorizes the commissioner to make regulations in respect of game in the Northwest Territories that are to be applicable to Indians and Eskimos. I assume that there is very good reason for that provision, but I trust that when the bill goes before the committee it will be ascertained that there is no interference with any of the treaty or other rights of the Indian and Eskimo population in respect to that particular matter.

The second provision calls for the establishment of a Court of Appeal for the Northwest Territories, and, as the mover said, this is substantially similar to a provision to the same end in the Yukon Bill that was given second reading yesterday.

This house has always looked with a very friendly eye upon legislation which has come to it from time to time relating to the Northwest Territories. We have always been greatly interested in development there. Only a year or two ago, I recall, there was a bill which provided for further direct representation by election of members to the Northwest Territorial Council, and I think we all heard with a great deal of appreciation the very interesting remarks by the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) yesterday afternoon as to the progress in that district in general.

I am glad my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. White) intends to send the bill to committee, because when the committee meets I would like to have one question clarified in my own mind. It is with respect to clause 2 of the bill, which is similar to a clause in the Yukon Bill, and which reads:

> All laws of general application in force in the Territories are, except where otherwise provided, applicable to and in respect of Eskimos in the Territories.

I wonder why it is necessary to say that. There is probably some very reasonable explanation for it. Looking at it offhand, however, it seems to be a rather strange provision to be inserted in this bill, and similarly in the Yukon Bill. Perhaps the explanation can be obtained in committee.

Hon. Mr. White: The only reply I can give the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) in reference to section 2 is that in reading excerpts from the judgment which brought about these changes I find the court gave the opinion that the game laws did not apply to Eskimos; and, despite the fact that in the Northwest Territories Act there is a list of things over which the Commissioner in Council has jurisdiction, the act especially provides for the preservation of game. This also applies to the legislation respecting the Yukon.

I quite appreciate what the honourable senator has said. He has raised a technical-legal question and I would prefer, if he is agreeable, to have someone from the Department of Justice answer it. Reference is made in the judgment to the Eskimo Treaty. I do not hold myself an expert in that, but I am sure a satisfactory explanation can be given in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That points up what I said a few minutes ago. There may be some treaty rights being interfered with here and we should be very careful that we are not taking them away without compensation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-63, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 5

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-67, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1961.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I would move the second reading of this bill now. It is of considerable importance on account of the fact that the money covered by the bill is being voted for the purpose of giving relief to the people of Chile.

Hon. David A. Croll: They want relief; they don't want money.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In the circumstances, I would ask leave to go ahead with the second reading now so that on Thursday next we may possibly have the royal assent.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, this will be known as Appropriation Bill No. 5. As I have just stated briefly, its purpose is to give relief to the people of the Republic of Chile who a very short time ago suffered a great disaster. According to a telegram received by the Department of External Affairs from our Ambassador in Chile, the situation in that country is such that if Canada is to give any assistance it should be given immediately. Many thousands of people are homeless, with thousands of homes having been wiped out. The people are without medical and food supplies. I am told that no earthquake in modern history has caused so much damage to any country at one time. It was followed by huge tidal waves which wiped out harbours and roared up onto the land, destroying entire cities and towns.

In addition to the money which we are voting by this bill, I understand that a cheque for $10,000 has already been sent to the Government of the Republic of Chile for the purchase of necessary supplies. The Canadian Red Cross has come to the rescue and forwarded much needed relief.

Of the total of $1,600,000 being voted by this bill, $1 million is for the purchase and transportation to Chile of Canadian flour. I understand that the Government has arranged to purchase this flour, and that it will be forwarded to Chile without delay after the bill is passed. The remaining $600,000 is for the purchase and transportation to Chile of pork. That will buy one million pounds of pork at 60 cents a pound, which is the price the Agricultural Commodities Stabilization Board paid for it. Particulars of the vote will be found in the schedule to the bill. I understand that a copy of the bill was placed in each honourable senator's mail box, and another copy on each senator's file in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I am happy to be able to say that we are coming to the rescue of these very deserving people, and I hope the house will unanimously agree to our providing this relief.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure all members of this house will be anxious to concur in this gift, and to have this produce sent to Chile, if it has not already been sent, as soon as possible. When the bill was presented in the other house it met with immediate approval. As the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has said, Chile has suffered a great disaster, first, from the earthquake, and afterwards from the tidal waves. Honourable senators probably saw on television last night some of the scenes of the disaster which is rampant in Chile at this time. Canada has representatives in Chile, and it is on their advice that this gift of pork and flour is being made.

I cannot add anything to what the Leader of the Government has said. Not only do we extend our sympathy in words, but we also make this gift, hoping that we may relieve to some extent the suffering of the people in the disaster area.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: With leave of the Senate, I would move the third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO WASHINGTON

TEXT OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald):

That the communiqué on the meeting of the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States of America held in Washington, D.C., U.S.A., on June 3 and 4, 1960, tabled today, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I notice that the communiqué was published as an appendix to the Hansard of the other place. I have read the communiqué. I must say that it is comprehensive, perhaps, but not very informative. I am seconding the motion because I feel that we should have the communiqué on our records, as some honourable senator might like to refer to it at some time. I want to make it clear that it is just for that reason that I am seconding the motion.

Motion agreed to.

For text of communiqué see appendix to today's Hansard, p. 765.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "CLOSE-UP"

Hon. William H. Golding inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. What amount was paid to the self-confessed co-respondent in divorce cases for her appearance and interview on the program "Close-Up" last Thursday evening, May 26?
2. If this is the sort of program we may expect from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in their effort to build up what Canadians generally expected from radio and television, namely, a fine distinctive Canadian culture in Canada?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: I have the following answer to the honourable senator's inquiry:

1. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that statements of payments to individuals have been held not to be in the public interest as being detrimental to the position of the corporation in negotiating for such services for broadcasting.

2. Reporting on matters of public interest and concern is a basic responsibility of the corporation. In so doing the corporation is guided by the right of the public to be informed and by a policy which requires this to be done in a responsible manner. The corporation cannot forecast trends in matters of public interest which may be the subject of broadcasts in the future.

HON. CAIRINE R. WILSON

FELICITATIONS ON AWARD OF HONORARY DEGREE FROM GALLAUDET COLLEGE

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I want to draw your attention to the fact that the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson) has just returned from Washington, D.C. where she received, at Gallaudet College, located just outside that city, the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters.

Honourable senators will be interested to learn that Gallaudet College was founded in 1864 by a decree of President Abraham Lincoln. It is the only college in the world for deaf mutes. The Honourable Senator Wilson's family, the Mackays, through the Mackay Institution for Deaf-Mutes, have been associated with the education of deaf mutes in Canada for the past 84 years.

Honorary degrees from Gallaudet College are very limited, and only those who have given outstanding services are chosen to receive them. In this instance I am sure we all agree that the honour is well merited.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I wish to support my honourable friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) in her reference to the degree conferred on the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson). We all know that the honourable senator has given of both time and energy throughout her life to the promotion of any cause worthy of attention. We feel this honour is well deserved, and it gives much pleasure to all her friends.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators these felicitations are most gratifying. I appreciate them all the more because they come from two members of my own sex. I feel that perhaps in this instance the honour was due not to me, but rather to the members of my family who, as the citation read, have given service to the deaf for four generations.

In a recent study of the history of the activity of my family in this field, I learned that my granduncle, Joseph Mackay, in 1876 came to the rescue of the struggling school for the deaf, which at that time feared it would be obliged to close. He offered to construct a building, and to furnish it to accommodate fifty deaf boys and girls. As far as I was able to read from his letter, the gift was quite unsolicited. Since that time there have never been less than two, and often there have been more, members of my family associated with this school. The present head is my nephew, Dr. Donald Mackay, who I am glad to say is taking a very active interest in the pupils and their education. Our immediate need is for a new building; the structure erected 84 years ago has to be replaced.

I hope that some honourable senators may at some future time have an opportunity to visit Gallaudet College. What impressed me most was that the land was granted and the enabling act passed in April 1864, during the stress of the American Civil War. The act was signed by Abraham Lincoln. The college was granted about 90 acres of very valuable property in the vicinity of Washington, and I understand that today it holds about 64 acres.

I was quite impressed with the graduation ceremonies at the college. As graduate students are called to receive their degrees, if there is a Congressman present he gives the degree to the recipient from his own state. Our own Ambassador to that country told me that when in Washington he had always been present at the commencement exercises at the college. He presented degrees to two Canadians, one from Oakville, Ontario and, I am pleased to say, one from Dalhousie, New Brunswick, a graduate student from the Mackay School for the Deaf in Montreal.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 1, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I first want to thank the house for allowing this order to stand in my name until tonight. I probably am not as well qualified to speak on this subject as I might be, but I am interested in the problem behind the bill more than in the bill itself. The problems of obtaining small loans is common to all parts of the country, and I presume it is no more acute in Manitoba than elsewhere.

In my discussion of this bill I am going to ask a favour of my honourable friends, which you need not grant if you do not wish to. I did a little study of the present legislation in this field, because I thought it might help us in a general understanding of the measure if it is considered in committee. I took the liberty of asking our own Law Clerk to draft me a memorandum in short legal terms setting out the general provisions of the Small Loans Act passed in 1939. His memorandum, which I have here, has nothing to do with this bill, except that it tells us what the present legislation is. I gave no instructions in regard to composition of the memorandum. I simply said that I would like to know what the provisions of the Small Loans Act are, and our Law Clerk very kindly gave me this. I thank him on behalf of myself and all of you for having done this work so efficiently. With the consent of the house I would like this memorandum to be printed with my remarks in Hansard.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

Memorandum for the Honourable J. T. Haig.

Re: The Small Loans Act.

You have asked me to analyse the provisions of the Small Loans Act, first enacted in 1939, as it now appears in chapter 251 of the Revised Statutes.

It is an act to regulate and supervise the lending of money by all money-lenders as defined and small loan companies, and to control the cost of the loan to the borrower, under the general jurisdiction of the Superintendent of Insurance and the Minister of Finance. These are licensing provisions and control of the rates that may be charged and the disclosure that must be made in respect of money-lending.

The preamble to the act recites as follows:—

"Whereas it has become the common practice for money-lenders to make charges against borrowers claimed as discount, deduction from an advance, commission, brokerage, chattel mortgage and recording fees, fines and penalties, or for inquiries, defaults or renewals, which, in truth and substance are, in whole or in part, compensation for the use of money loaned or for the acceptance of the risk of loss or are so mixed with such compensation as to be indistinguishable therefrom and are, in some cases, charges primarily payable by the lender but required by the lender to be paid by the borrowers; and whereas the result of these practices is to add to the cost of the loan without increasing the nominal rate of interest charged so that the provisions of the law relating to interest and usury have been rendered ineffective . . ."

The following definitions, appearing in section 2 are of special importance:

"2. (a) "cost" of a loan means the whole of the cost of the loan to the borrower whether the same is called interest or is claimed as discount, deduction from an advance, commission, brokerage, chattel mortgage and recording fees, fines, penalties or charges for inquiries, defaults or renewals or otherwise, and whether paid to or charged by the lender or paid to or charged by any other person, and whether fixed and determined by the loan contract itself, or in whole or in part by any other collateral contract or document by which the charges, if any, imposed under the loan contract or the terms of the repayment of the loan are effectively varied;"

"(e) "money-lender" means any person other than a chartered bank who carries on the business of money-lending or advertises himself, or holds himself or itself out in any way, as carrying on that business, but does not include a registered pawnbroker as such;"

"(f) "small loans company" means a company incorporated by special Act of Parliament and authorized to lend money on promissory notes or other personal security and on chattel mortgages;"

It is thus apparent that the Act intends to cover all money-lenders, which are provincially incorporated and a comparatively few small loans companies, which are incorporated by Act of Parliament. All of these, as defined, are licensed and controlled as aforesaid. Everything depends on the "cost of the loan" as above defined.

Under the amendments made by the Parliament of Canada by chapter 46 of the statutes of 1956, the maximum loan which is controlled as to rates is $1500, and the provisions as to the "cost of the loan" which may be charged are substantially as follows:—

"3. (2) The cost of a loan shall not exceed the aggregate of

(a) two per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance not exceeding three hundred dollars,

(b) one per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance exceeding three hundred dollars but not exceeding one thousand dollars, and

(c) one-half of one per cent per month on any remainder of the unpaid principal balance exceeding one thousand dollars.

(3) Where a loan of five hundred dollars or less is made for a period greater than twenty months or where a loan exceeding five hundred dollars is made for a period greater than thirty months, the cost of the loan shall not exceed one per cent per month on the unpaid principal balance thereof."

E. R. Hopkins,

Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel.

Ottawa, June 6, 1960.

I would like to say something about small debts, because I know something about them. I live in a city where there are people who owe money. Those of us who are lawyers—maybe not the leading lawyers of Canada, but certainly lawyers—know something of this problem. We meet it every day. When you have been a politician in my country everybody knows who you are, and thinks he can consult you even though it may be twenty-five years since you were a politician. I have known a person to come in and say: "Mr. Haig, how are you today? I voted for you in 1924." I sometimes suspect that he voted against me, but somebody must have voted for me, because I did get the votes.

Up until 1939, when the Small Loans Act was passed, small debts were a difficult problem. The regular loan companies would not touch them, and I do not blame them for that. Let me give you an illustration. There was a man who worked for the Canadian Pacific Railway in a minor position at the station in Winnipeg. He bought a house, gave a mortgage to the builder, and then gave a second mortgage to another party. He had a fair salary and he had saved a little money, but maybe his wife got a little extravagant and money was spent. Things were not going so well and they needed money. He tried to get money in order to pay off that second mortgage, and after several attempts to borrow the money he finally went to a small loan company. That company lent him the money. Then his wife, driving the car on the street, was severely injured in an accident and went to hospital. There was no money to pay the bill.

What was that man going to do? He had four children, if I remember correctly. I knew all about the case when I sent him to one of the small loan companies. I was asked if I would guarantee the loan, but I said I could not do that. I said that I knew the man, I knew he was honest, I knew he had not got the money because of all the sickness, I knew he had four children, I knew where he lived and I knew he could not get any more money on his house. The company said "Send him down", so I did. He got the much-needed money, his wife went to the hospital, and after a couple of months she was better and back at home.

That man later got into other difficulties. I don't remember just now what they were, but he needed money again and he came back to me. I said, "No, you are through." I am not sure what happened to him after that. Now, I don't know what that man would have done without help from that small loan company. Charitable organizations would not have given him any money, because he was earning about $150 a month, and also it would have been thought that he should not have had a car. Those are the facts of that case, and that kind of thing happens every day. These people wanting small loans would come into our office, and they would break down and cry. I did not blame them because they were in a situation where they had to have some money or perhaps they would be put out of the house. The small loan companies have moved in to fill the need of that class of people.

There were also the farmers who had bought new machines that cost $4,000 or $5,000. They ran them for three or four years and then found they needed repairs at a time when the crops were bad and the money was not available. Two or three years ago a case came to my attention. I was the solicitor for the executor of the estate of a farmer who left a machine on which $800 or $900 was owed to a small loan company. The machine was of no use to this man. He did not have the money to buy oil for the machine, or to make repairs to it, in order to work it. He had to sell the land in parcels because the heirs could not handle it. I sent a man down to value the machine and he said that it should sell for $2,000, but if anybody would offer $800 for it he would take it. The machine was sold for $800 and the debt was repaid. A small loan company was the only lender who would take such a machine as security for a loan.

There are young women living away from home on their salaries. The cost of living has gone up in every regard. Apartments cost more, and everything they buy costs more, and they have gone to the store and bought goods on time, or on "tick," as we used to call it. They have come in and told me about their troubles. I do not know what we would have done without the small loan companies which have advanced money in order to enable these people to overcome their difficulties.

What I do not like about this bill is that it challenges the security of the man who advances the money. I do not know very much about business, I admit, but I do know that two and two make four, and I do know that without security the money is very hard to get, if not impossible to get. I can never understand why anybody would put his money into a small loan company, because when everything is balanced up it is often seen that the company has not obtained more than an average rate of interest on the money invested. For those reasons I do not like to see a bill which sets up nothing more or less than a detective agency to try to catch the small loan companies doing something wrong. If the present law does not cover the matter, then change the law, but do not set up agencies that can tell a company it did not do this or did not do that, and threaten it with legal proceedings. That would create a monster which would drive away a much-needed source of money. The banks, with the exception of one, will not handle these loans, and I do not know what interest that one charges. Big retail companies such as Eaton's, the Hudson's Bay Company and Simpsons-Sears do give this accommodation, but they would ruin themselves if they did anything suspicious in their business. I can see no defence for a law that tries to catch a person who risks his money and is liable to lose a lot of it.

I presume some honourable senators would like to see this bill go to committee. I can see no use in that, although I am not opposed to it. I am quite willing for the bill to go to committee, where we can hear what people have to say about it, but I intend to vote against passage of the bill.

I am not going to discuss the question raised by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) and the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) as to whether the bill is ultra vires of Parliament. Basically what I do not like about the bill is that it only adds to the uncertainty of making money available to the little fellow who is having financial difficulties. If a man is willing to go into a business where he risks his money by lending it to people on very doubtful security, or none at all, then I am going to do my best to see that this person stays in business. I do not see how these lenders can hurt anybody, and there will always be people who need money.

Let me give one more illustration. It is rather personal and perhaps it is not proper to give personal illustrations. In any event, in 1898 a certain young man was teaching in a country school near Winnipeg, drawing a salary of $35 a month out of which he paid for his room and board and washing and mending. The seven-month school year ran out on October 31. He wanted to go to university and had scraped and saved for two years for this purpose. The university term started in October, but in order to put an extra $25 in his pocket he decided to finish his teaching year. In November he reported to the university where he continued his studies until the spring, at which time he volunteered for service with the Canadian contingent going to the South African War. Before a student could be accepted for this duty the principal of the university had to certify that he would pass his spring examination. In the case of this particular young man the principal felt that as he had not reported to school in October he could not possibly pass his examinations. The young man pointed out that, apart from two weeks' holidays at Christmas, he had spent every night except Sundays studying in his room from the 1st of November until the 28th of May, which marked the finish of the examinations. Would it not have been a fine thing had that young man been able to borrow $100 from some lender—and he would have been a good risk, being a qualified school teacher—so that he could have started university on time? What happened in the examinations? Well, he placed second in the whole university, and the professor told him that he would have placed first and won the scholarship had he been able to report to school on time. There is a case where a loan would have done a lot of good. That sort of thing happens all the time. I know it does, for young people come to me about the same sort of thing. As I have said before, when you are in politics people get to know you and they come to see you, and because you are a university graduate they feel you can do something to help them.

I do not like to see any interference with the present provisions regarding short-term loans. If the provisions of the act, of which I have given the house a memorandum, are not sufficient to protect the borrower and the lender, then amend the act to make it do so. Do not proceed in the way my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) suggests, for that would lead to one lawsuit after another. There would be nasty attacks and threats on people if they did not comply. I don't think the Senate ought to pass this kind of legislation. I don't think we are supposed to. Surely the men and women in the Senate know there are people who, when they have bad luck, need money immediately but have no security to offer. What are they to do? They cannot get the money from the banks, because the banks have to protect their depositors. So these people go to the small loan companies. I admit the companies charge quite a bit of interest, but how much of a profit do they make? I have never seen anybody who wants to buy their stock—and I know something about the stock market.

For these reasons, I am opposed to this bill. I do not want to be a party to passing legislation which I think hurts people who just want to get on in life and need to borrow a little money. This class of people is often badly in need of help. Maybe there are some mean people in the world who would take advantage of them, but these are not as numerous as one would think.

I am not going to ask the house to vote against the bill on second reading, for there are certain questions honourable senators might like to ask in committee. I am not too anxious to give people the right to earn 12 per cent interest, and I do not like to see deals involving loans on which the interest rate is too high going through the office of the law firm in which I am a partner. I think they are unfair, and no doubt most of us are of the same opinion. At the same time, we would like to see the little fellow have his chance just the same as the big fellow. It seems to me we are given the duty to protect both the borrower and the lender.

I repeat, although I will ultimately vote against the bill I am willing that it go to committee. If we consider it necessary we should amend the Small Loans Act, and not enact a separate piece of legislation dealing with the same thing.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt, debate adjourned.

CANADA'S CENTENNIAL

ORDER STANDS

On the Order for resuming the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Cameron, who called attention to Canada's Centennial Year 1967, and suggested "that appropriate steps be taken to mobilize the resources of governmental and non-governmental agencies in making this celebration an occasion to mark the achievements of the past and to plot a course for the future".

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am grateful to the house for the applause. I regret I was unable to be present last Wednesday to speak to this motion, as I had intended to do. I feel under the necessity of asking the indulgence of the house to let the order stand until a week from tomorrow, June 15. I shall be grateful if the house will agree to this. In the meantime, if anyone else desires to speak to the motion, that will be quite agreeable to me, provided that I may reserve the right to speak later.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

VISIT OF THE PRIME MINISTER TO WASHINGTON

Text of Final Communiqué at Conclusion of the Visit of Canadian Prime Minister Diefenbaker

THE WHITE HOUSE

The Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, and the President of the United States have consulted on a wide range of subjects of both an international and bilateral nature. The Canadian Ambassador at Washington and the secretary to the Canadian cabinet assisted in the discussions, together with the United States Secretary of State and the United States Ambassador at Ottawa.

The Prime Minister and the President were in agreement on measures which should be taken to maintain the security of the free world. They reaffirmed their determination to continue to work for peace with justice. Particular attention was paid to the importance of achieving, with effective international control, an end to nuclear testing and progress toward general disarmament.

The Prime Minister and the President reviewed the course of relations between their countries during recent years and noted with pleasure the extent to which the problems arising in such relations have yielded to the process of friendly and continuing consultation. They considered that satisfactory means of carrying on such consultation have been established in personal exchanges as well as by regular diplomatic arrangements and the various joint committees that have been created. They expressed their belief that there has been established between the two countries a model for the relationship between neighbours.

YUKON BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-59, to amend the Yukon Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What's the hurry?

Hon. Mr. White: I might say, in explanation, that a short time later this afternoon the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) will introduce a motion with reference to the procedure to be followed tomorrow when it is expected to have royal assent in the presence of the Prime Minister of Australia. We would like to have this bill and the Northwest Territories Bill included among the bills to receive the royal assent tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You want to put on a good show.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the bill is read the third time I feel I should explain to the house what took place in committee this morning. It will be recalled that about ten days ago the royal assent was given in this chamber to a bill which enfranchised all Indians in Canada. I think I can say that all the members present in committee this morning were amazed to learn that the Indians have not the franchise so far as election of members to the councils of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories is concerned. Honourable senators probably know that the acts establishing these councils empower them to determine whether the Indians will have the vote in the election of council members. I do not know whether the councils can say to Canadian citizens other than Indians that they have not the vote. But, as I say, each council has power to say whether or not the Indians shall have the right to vote in the election of members to the council, and so far the councils have not passed a resolution dealing with this matter. To be fair to the councils, I must say that the bill granting the vote to all Indians in Canada was passed only ten days ago and the councils have not met since that time. What amazed the members of the committee was that we now have an act whereby all Indians in Canada can vote for members to the federal Parliament, yet they cannot vote for members to sit on their own councils. The committee was so impressed with this unusual situation that it suggested to the representative of the department who was present that he should bring to the attention of the councils at their next meetings representations made in the committee to the effect that the councils should without further delay give consideration to the question of whether the Indians should receive the vote. I felt the house was entitled to that information.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The Eskimos too should have the vote.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would rather like to know why a council should be able to say who shall vote for or against them and who shall not.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is provided for in the Yukon Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not care what act it is in, it is wrong in principle. Parliament should decide that.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I think the explanation is that in the Yukon Act there is a provision which permits the council to issue rules saying who may qualify as voters. It is a very old provision.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-60, to amend the Northwest Territories Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. White: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be now read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, seconded by the honourable senior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

The reason for this motion, which is more or less unusual, on account of the fact that we customarily meet at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, is that it is the intention to have royal assent at 2.45 tomorrow.

In view of the fact that one of the bills to be assented to implements Canada's trade treaty with Australia, I thought it would be a nice gesture on our part if we could have the royal assent at a time when it would be convenient to the Right Honourable Mr. Menzies, Prime Minister of Australia, who is now in Ottawa, to be present.

If this motion is passed, I propose to move, with leave of the Senate, that the Right Honourable Mr. Menzies be invited to be present tomorrow during the royal assent to bills.

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all pleased to give unanimous consent to the meeting of this house tomorrow at 2.30 p.m. in order that the Right Honourable Mr. Menzies may be with us at that time.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

INVITED TO TAKE SEAT ON FLOOR OF SENATE CHAMBER

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I now move, with leave, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), that the Right Honourable Robert G. Menzies, Prime Minister of Australia, be invited to take a seat on the floor of the Senate chamber during the royal assent tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we all will welcome Mr. Menzies and that we will give unanimous consent to the motion that he be invited to take a seat on the floor of this chamber.

I have one suggestion to make. In view of the fact that Mr. Menzies is and has been for many years a distinguished leader in the commonwealth, and is so well known throughout this country, and as we understand he is not going to speak to the members of the House of Commons, would it be possible to have him address this chamber? We would all be glad to hear a few remarks by this outstanding commonwealth leader.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In reply to the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), I may say that our time tomorrow will be very limited unless we meet at 2.30 p.m. sharp. I am investigating the possibility of having Mr. Menzies speak to us, and if that proves to be convenient to him I think we should invite him into the chamber immediately after prayers. Then I would say a few words, the Leader of the Opposition would say a few words, and we would have a short speech by Mr. Menzies. We would then have the royal assent, and Mr. Menzies would depart before the Senate resumed its business. That is the arrangement I have in contemplation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask why we propose to invite our guest to come in after prayers? I raised a similar question on an earlier occasion. I do not know what is secret about our prayers, or why this old, sanctified absurdity of closing doors while we have prayers is carried on in this chamber. I suggest we invite Mr. Menzies in to have prayers with us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have always understood that this tradition of excluding strangers from the galleries at that time was for the purpose of allowing honourable senators to concentrate on their prayers.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTES OF CANADA

SENDING OF COPIES TO BRITISH GOVERNMENT —PRACTICE DISCONTINUED

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Since July 1, 1927, what has been the practice in accordance with the British North America Act, 1867, section 56, for the sending of the Statutes of Canada by the Canadian Government to the British Government,—in other words, by which one of the cabinet ministers of Canada have they been sent each year to one of Her Majesty's Principal British Secretaries of State and, if so, to which one and on what dates?

2. Were the said statutes bound in full buff buckram and lettered in black or bound in half-calf and gilt-lettered, in conformity with R.S.C., 1952. c. 230, s. 11?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

1. From July 1, 1927 to April 1942 the Secretary of State for External Affairs, upon receipt from the Clerk of the Parliaments, sent a certified copy of the Statutes of Canada to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in the United Kingdom. The practice was then discontinued and has not been resumed.

The dates on which the statutes were actually transferred to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs previous to 1942 are not available, but the statutes were delivered by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Governor General, who in turn passed them to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for transmission on: November 4, 1927, December 12, 1928, October 15, 1929, October 16, 1930, December 31, 1931, October 4, 1932, September 14, 1933, December 28, 1935, December 9, 1936, October 8, 1937, January 7, 1939, January 15, 1940, May 8, 1941, April 15, 1942. Presumably the statutes were transmitted shortly thereafter.

2. Buff buckram lettered in black.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

DESIRABILITY OF RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS WITH TWENTY-NATION GROUP— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson rose in accordance with notice that he would draw to the attention of the Senate:

1. The desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group who are presently examining ways and means of achieving closer economic co-operation, and in particular with the U.S.A., and the two European trade blocs, the Inner Six and the Outer Seven, for the progressive removal over a period of years of trade obstructions in order that our ability to trade profitably will be maintained and increased through

(a) the progressive reduction of our costs of living and production; and

(b) the progressive reduction of specific obstacles to our exports that may presently exist, and to guard against the creation of new ones.

2. That by becoming closely associated economically with their 500 million peoples, we will remove the tragic possibility of Canada's becoming isolated from the great modern currents of trade and commerce. By our precept and example we will contribute to removing the possibility of a trade war developing between the two sides of the Atlantic, a development that the Soviet Union fervently hopes for and which might well enable the communist world to accomplish economically what they have failed to do militarily.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding with my argument I wish to make one or two general observations. In October 1959 Mr. Fleming, the Minister of Finance, made what I thought was a most accurate and timely statement. He said that if our costs of production did not come down while our competitors were decreasing theirs, it could mean a catastrophe for Canada. Parliament was not then in session, but I wrote a letter to the press supporting his stand. I was severely criticized by some of my political friends for my action, and the irony of it was that, as far as I know, not one of the minister's colleagues in the Government publicly supported him, and neither did any of his nominal supporters in this house.

On this occasion, honourable senators, my object in speaking is to support an attitude taken by one of the members of my own party. I wish to support a resolution moved in the House of Commons on March 21 last by the Honourable L. B. Pearson, Leader of the Opposition. After drawing the attention of the house to a rapidly deteriorating trading position, and the danger of Canada's becoming isolated by the emergence of large trading blocks, he urged the Government to take effective action, including "the working out of proposals for the establishment of a gradual and progressive basis of an Atlantic free trade area".

Mr. Pearson, in his argument, did not attach to his proposals the importance I do of their being the only practical means that I know of for getting our production costs down short of the catastrophe to which the minister referred. I agree with Mr. Pearson in what he said about the danger of Canada's becoming isolated. I agree it is desirable to seek to have the obstacles of our exporting reduced as rapidly as possible, but certainly the all-important question is how we can get our costs of production down in an orderly manner and remove ourselves from the unenviable position of the highest-cost producers in the Western world.

Were I not leaving Canada in 48 hours for an absence of at least three weeks, I might have presented a motion and asked the Senate to vote for or against it. Under the circumstances, however, I have contented myself with drawing the attention of the Senate to what I personally believe the situation to be. No one need register his approval or disapproval. If no one follows me in the debate, it will die in its tracks. I do not ask support. I would welcome criticism or some alternative proposal. I trust that, out of the experience and knowledge of members of this house, comment will be forthcoming. I can only hope that my remarks will not be ignored.

It is generally agreed now that the United States and Canada are on a high-cost plateau, particularly as compared with our European allies,. and largely, I believe, because of the fantastic defence expenditures which we are presently making.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Only a few days ago a Canadian-American group of businessmen who have been studying the matter issued a statement in which they said:

> The average cost of manufacturing in Canada is perhaps 35 per cent to 40 per cent higher than in the United States. Despite the tariff U. S. goods can compete effectively with Canadian products over a wide range of manufactures because U. S. industry can obtain much greater economies of scale.

It is hard to escape the conclusion that, of all the countries of the Twenty-Nation group with whom we are presently seeking economic co-operation, Canada is the highest-cost producer.

Not only are our costs the highest, but they are steadily climbing. In the first half of the eight year post-Korean War period, that is, between January 1, 1952 and January 1, 1956, there was a slight drop in the cost of living. In the second half, from January 1, 1956 to January 1, 1960, the cost of living has been steadily climbing. The costs have not been reduced since the minister spoke. Indeed, they are slightly higher. Recently the rate of increase has slowed down, and what the future holds remains to be seen, but we are tied to the economic chariot of the United States, where costs are steadily increasing. Whatever benefits the recent evidence of depreciation in the value of our currency may bring to some who are in a position to benefit immediately, it is almost certain to result in higher costs of servicing the huge amounts that we owe outside of Canada, and it could well increase the costs of what we import. All in all, we will be lucky if the cost of living does not resume its upward climb. In the meantime, the production costs of our European competitors are steadily decreasing.

In every industry in Canada, in every geographical part of Canada, Governments at all levels, and individuals, are in varying degrees becoming the victims of the cost-price squeeze. Agriculture was the first casualty, and great efforts are being made, and rightly made, to ease their ever-increasing difficulties. The second, and the immediate casualty, is secondary industry, almost wholly dependent for its existence on the domestic market. Every day the newspapers give further evidence that this problem is on the doorstep of the authorities in Canada, and a decision as to what to do about it cannot be delayed indefinitely. Secondary industries rank high as an employer of labour. They are said to employ one out of every four employed people in Canada. One after the other of our secondary industries is feeling the effects of high production costs in relation to outside competition. Some are curtailing their operation. Some are announcing plans for closing down their undertakings. In a steady procession they are becoming more and more vehement in their demands that the Government come to their aid. There are only two ways I can think of that this aid can be given—either by increasing the tariff to whatever height is necessary to keep competition out or by following the example of the European manufacturers who are joining larger trading areas to get the advantage of scale production.

As an instance of the representations that are being made by responsible people in Canada, I want to quote from an editorial appearing in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 24. Such a responsible person as Mr. Stuart Armour, Economic Adviser of the Steel Company of Canada, was discussing with the members of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association in Toronto the very serious problem in which they found themselves. After it had been pointed out that the employment level in the automotive parts industry had dropped from 76,490 in 1953 to slightly over 51,000 in 1959, and complaining, I suspect, of the failure of the previous Government and of the present Government to give adequate consideration to this industry's vehement demands for additional protection, Mr. Armour made what in my opinion is a most amazing statement. I think it is indicative of his intensity of feeling. He said:

> Most frustrating of the results of our worship of the sacred cow of international prestige is our adherence to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—the notorious GATT. Amongst the oldest of our sacred cows is the comomnwealth preference. Is it perhaps not time that our adherence to GATT and commonwealth preferences be sent, like other worn-out bovines, to the slaughter house?

I have never met Mr. Armour, but I have a great respect for his reputation. While I do not share his viewpoint, we would be foolish indeed to fail to realize that he represents a very considerable public opinion in Canada at this moment. Personally, I do not think that this Government, or any other Government, can scrap the commonwealth preferences—although the right to make a choice in this matter may be taken away from us sooner than we realize—or withdraw from our membership in GATT, but the serious consequences of our high-cost production are being brought home to us and they simply cannot be ignored. Mr. Pearson's argument is—and with this I thoroughly agree—that the only solution for Canada is to follow the example of the smaller countries in Europe and join a larger economic group. There is, I believe, no practical alternative.

We must join a larger economic group so that our manufacturers themselves can get the advantage of scale economies. The question immediately arises: With whom would we join? There are some who say that because of relatively high costs in the United States and Canada and our already close economic ties we should seek to make further arrangements with the United States of America alone and let it go at that. Personally, I don't agree. I haven't an anti-American bone in my body. My earliest recollection of active interest in public affairs is of my support of the proposed Reciprocity Agreement with the United States in 1911, almost fifty years ago. I realize that the logic of events is drawing us closer and closer to the U.S.A. and, unless we act, and act effectively, at an early date, no one can predict how close that association might have to become in the not far distant future. But I must confess to an uncomfortable feeling. I am reluctant to have us cast in our lot with the U.S.A. and the U.S.A. alone, and I suspect there are many who feel as I do. I want Canada to enter into far closer relations with the U.S.A. than presently exist, particularly in having the Americans provide us with greater opportunities to share in their market; but, while we are doing that, I believe it is the very essence of common sense that we seek to enter into similar arrangements with our European allies and, in particular, with the Outer Seven and the Inner Six. Rightly or wrongly we are tied to them for defence purposes by solemn treaty, and on our combined economic strength our whole future may depend. If this were done, I would feel much happier and I suspect most Canadians would as well.

I find it very difficult to understand why Canadian manufacturers, who are very able men, can seem to offer no other solution than that of higher tariffs. It is entirely at variance with the viewpoint of European manufacturers who spearheaded the campaign for larger trading areas to get the advantage of mass production. I am beginning to think that it results from the influence of the viewpoint of the wholly-owned American subsidiaries who are not too clear as to where they would sit with regard to what Mr. Pearson is proposing. Wholly-owned Canadian companies, particularly those located in the strategic area of the St. Lawrence Valley, could easily see advantages in an opportunity to get into the huge market immediately adjacent, but the American wholly-owned subsidiaries might well be seriously concerned as to where they would fit in such a picture. Undoubtedly that would be one of the immediate problems that would be bound to arise, as problems have arisen in Europe. I do not believe, however, that they are insurmountable. Some arrangements for rationalization of their production for the people of both areas could undoubtedly be worked out. The Americans are, after all, reasonable people. We are their best customers and probably will be in the future. They have a huge financial stake in Canada. I do not believe they would turn a deaf ear to reasonable proposals. In any event, I suggest there is no practical alternative to what Mr. Pearson has suggested.

I would like to devote some time to the consideration of the effects of what Mr. Pearson is proposing on the various sections of Canada. Time will not permit. I leave it to the various members of this house to assess its possible effects on their individual areas, but I do want to say this as regards the Atlantic provinces in general, and my own province of Nova Scotia in particular. There is no area in Canada, I believe, that is as completely the victim of the cost-price squeeze as is the province of Nova Scotia. The last federal Government was very generous in its financial assistance to Nova Scotia, and the present Government has continued this and extended it. This has enabled our provincial Governments to maintain services on a basis which would otherwise not have been possible, but slowly and inexorably the cost-price squeeze has been crushing the life out of our primary industries and what is left of our secondary industries. Without a doubt, some of our secondary industries in Nova Scotia are slowly dying, and they would die more rapidly if their labour were not content to take a much lower standard of remuneration than the Canadian average. They were probably well advised to do so under present conditions, but this certainly does not contribute much to a growing or expanding economy. Moreover, I suggest to them that the hope we have all held that someone, somehow, would start more industry in Nova Scotia which would be able to take advantage of the rich Upper Canadian market is rapidly going up in smoke, because the industries already located in the Upper Canadian market can only maintain something in the order of 50 per cent of the market, and that percentage is steadily decreasing.

On this very point of lower wages, I want to draw the attention of the Senate to a frequently expressed view that the only solution of our cost-price squeeze is for organized labour to agree to a lower scale of wages. May I point out to this house that one of the reasons why our secondary industries in Canada have in the past been able to meet American competition is that, broad and long, organized labour is paid on the average only between 70 and 75 per cent of the American wage level. Some feel that it should be reduced to something lower than this—say to 65 or 60 per cent, probably much the same as the Nova Scotia rate. Apart from the fact that there is no power in Canada, that I know of, to force labour to take a lower rate of wages, even if that were done, I would remind this house of a speech made by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), the first time he spoke in this house, drawing attention to the ever present magnet of the United States of America in matters of this kind. He said that between the first of the century and the time when he was speaking Canada had lost almost as many people to the United States by emigration as had come into Canada during that period by immigration. Even if you could force labour to take a further reduction in wages vis-à-vis the United States, there is no one that could make them work, and the only thing that would prevent them from going to the United States, where living costs are certainly lower, would be refusal of that country to accept them. We might as well forget that proposal as a solution for our cost-price squeeze.

Honourable senators, I said earlier that I was only asking you to consider my arguments. I am not asking you to vote on them, but it may well be that you will have to vote on the principle, nevertheless. We have set up a manpower committee, which is almost sure to be faced with the question of maximum employment. It is quite possible that before it is through the committee may become a glorified tariff commission. You may well have large employers of labour in the secondary industries putting this proposition to the committee: We will provide more employment if you will recommend to the Government a drastic increase in tariff production, even if you have to scrap the commonwealth preferences and our adherence to the principle of GATT in the process. Should such a situation develop, you will have to decide what report you will make to the Senate. The manpower committee consists, I think, of 32 members, many of them among the best brains in this house. I suspect that such a proposal would certainly not meet with unanimous approval and it would be bound to be voted on before it was presented to the Senate as a report.

Early this year the United States, alarmed at the prospect that the North Atlantic alliance would be torn asunder by the growing trade rivalries between two important groups of our European allies, hurriedly called a conference in Paris to decide what to do about it. What greater evidence is needed to show what an incredible blunder was made by NATO in refusing to act on Canada's advice of ten years ago, designed to prevent this very kind of thing from happening? The decision of the conference was to make a second attempt to eliminate trade rivalries. NATO was shorn of all authority and responsibility and a new organization is to be set up entirely outside of NATO. Whether this second attempt will be more successful than the first, remains to be seen, but of this I am certain, the success or failure of the second attempt will rest squarely on the shoulders of the United States and Canada. Curiously enough, this new organization is not likely to concern itself with the growing gulf between the two groups. The problem will be that an even greater gulf may develop between the two sides of the Atlantic. Even now there are signs that the rival groups in Europe are getting together. Recently there was a statement by a member of the British Government that if they were invited to join the steel and coal community they would accept the invitation. Honourable senators may recall that it was Britain's refusal to join that organization originally that precipitated the difficulties between the Inner Six and the Outer Seven. There are many other indications of an approach. Actually they are meeting tomorrow in Paris for that very purpose, and while of course I have no information I have not the slightest doubt that the presence of the Right Honourable Mr. Maudling, President of the United Kingdom Board of Trade, in Ottawa today is to give notice to the Canadian Government that Britain is about to join the Inner Six, with whatever consequences to commonwealth preferences may ensue. If it does, we in North America will be confronted with what in effect will be a United States of Europe, economically, having a common market of 300 million people and an attendant scale of economies. Unlike North America, their defence costs are relatively small, something like $15 billion as against approximately $50 billion in North America. The stage is being set for trade rivalries between the two sides of the Atlantic, eclipsing in intensity anything that has existed between the two European groups.

When I was in Washington last fall I attended a meeting of NATO at which Walter Hallstein, Chairman of the Economic Committee of the Inner Six, spoke. He was on the defensive, because he had been charged with being primarily responsible, because of his unco-operative attitude, for the growing trade gulf between the Outer Seven and the Inner Six. He said at that time—and it was almost prophetic—

> We think that in due course, despite the difficulties, the gulf between the two will be closed.

but what we have to be careful of is that in closing that gulf we do not open an even wider one between the two sides of the Atlantic.

Right here in the midst of the actual and possible differences of opinion in regard to trade rivalries I want to pay my personal tribute to the judgment and farsightedness of the joint architects of Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson. Mr. St. Laurent is no longer in public life, but from the shades of his retirement he is entitled to some satisfaction in seeing how soon there has been a complete vindication of his judgment and farsightedness. Mr. Pearson is no longer in a position of authority, but he is in public life and, in my opinion, he is the most farsighted of any of the leaders, or future leaders, of the North Atlantic Alliance.

There is only one way for the United States and Canada to prevent a trade war from developing between the two sides of the Atlantic, and that is for us to become associated with our European allies in some way or other. How long it will take the United States to make up its mind, and whether it will make up its mind at all before Khrushchev forces it to do so, remains to be seen. I speculated in my own mind what the possible consequences would be of an all-out trade war between the two sides of the Atlantic. Mind you, 300 million people in Europe, with low defence costs and dedicated to the idea of building and matching North America's great prosperity, will present a formidable picture to this side of the Atlantic.

On the other hand, our great neighbour to the south has remarkable resiliency and vast productive powers, and more particularly would this be so if she were able to get clear of some of the strangling costs of armaments to today, which must be paid for by industry and individuals—and payment by individuals probably means payment by industry indirectly. The United States might accomplish wonders even in meeting competition. She has a common market of 185 million herself, and it is a very rich market, and even if the worst came to the worst, she could, if desirable, as she has done in the past on occasions, entire to the refuge of isolation. She is probably as able to do it as any area would be. What a great shout of glee would go up in the Kremlin at this latest development, which would be far more important than anything that has taken place so far!

And what on earth would happen to Canada under those circumstances? Supposing that as a result of the difficult position Great Britain is in, or as a result of action by this country, the commonwealth preferences disappeared, and supposing that we had no more connection with the United States than we have today—and remember, there are isolationists and high protectionists in the United States as there are in this country—to whom could we turn? That situation should not develop, and certainly not by default.

It is here that Mr. Pearson suggests that, whatever we may do to try to influence the United States to act, and to act promptly, there is no reason whatever in economic matters why we should be tied to its leadership or lack of leadership in that respect. There is no reason why we in Canada should not, by precept and example, give leadership on this very important question. He says, in effect, we should go to the United States and say to them, "We can't continue to buy from you unless you give us, progressively, a better chance to sell to you, not only primary products but secondary products as well." We should say to the United Kingdom that when she offered us a program of economic co-operation a year or two ago we did not then see fit to consider it, but we would now like to open negotiations, not only with the United Kingdom but with her associates in the Outer Seven. We should also approach the Inner Six and if, before we do that, the Outer Seven and Inner Six may have resolved their difficulties, we should seek to become associated with their new larger organization. I cannot say, of course, what our reception would be but, with all the built-up reservoir of goodwill from the past I am convinced that none of them would say us nay.

To the leaders of the North Atlantic community in general, and to Canada in particular, may I say that they should think twice before they again turn down Mr. Pearson's advice.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I did not come prepared to speak on this motion, but I feel impelled to make a few observations.

The contention of my friend from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that Canadian industry is in a very serious position because of certain factors is true. He spoke of high wages in Canada. I do not propose to discuss that point. The remedy he suggests for the situation is that Canada and the United States should seek to make an agreement with countries of Europe, namely, the Inner Six and Outer Seven, with the ultimate intention that there should be free trade between all the Western countries. He says, unfortunately that would have to be a gradual accomplishment. That is self-evident.

We have built up in this country a great many secondary industries. We are now a large industrialized nation instead of the agricultural nation we once were. While I am not in any sense a high protectionist, though I used to be accused of being one, I do recognize the difficulty that would ensue if we were immediately to wipe out tariffs and allow the low-cost production countries to send their goods into Canada. Our industries simply could not compete. Fortunately, there is now no great difference between the two main political parties with regard to tariffs.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Unfortunately!

Hon. Mr. Euler: I recall a little experience I had when I was a member of the Government at a time when we were discussing the principles of Liberalism and Conservatism. I said the difference between the two parties was that the Conservatives talked high tariffs and practised moderate tariffs, whereas the Liberals talked low tariffs or free trade and practised moderate tariffs. In that I think I was almost correct, although I offended the sensibilities of certain people in the Government at that time.

I referred to difficulties that would face our secondary industries if we immediately introduced free trade among the nations of the world. Some of the industries would cease to exist. I can give two examples in my own city of Kitchener. The first one—and I don't think the head of that concern would mind my mentioning his name—is that of a rubber company whose employees recently threatened to strike for higher wages. The head of the company issued notices to the employees in the departments concerned to the effect that if they took strike action he would close up the departments. He is the kind of man—perhaps because he was at one time a pupil of mine—who will do what he says he will do. Another case is that of one of our large industries which I had always thought was prosperous, but which recently announced that it was going to quit business entirely. That is a serious situation.

I mention these things because I do not think it would be possible—and my friend does not suggest it would be—to remove all tariff walls immediately. Tariffs are necessary, I suppose, because industries have gone where they should not be. I used to contend in the House of Commons that industry ought to go where its raw materials were to be found, where its labour was available, and where power and transportation were to be had. I do not think industry is observing those rules. Our industries have been built up in certain places in Canada, and perhaps also in the United States, where they do not properly belong because they do not meet the requirements I have just outlined. But that is the condition today, and the problem is how to deal with it. I admit that I do not know.

My friend mentioned other things that bedevil the situation. He talked about high wages, which I do not propose to discuss. However, I do say that the high cost of government is as contributory a factor to the problem as anything is. I am not speaking of the waste that is going on and has gone on under all Governments nor am I criticizing the present Government, but I do say that expenditures in some departments are entirely too high. I wish to speak about one item in particular, and I know I am right, though many honourable senators will not agree with me. I made the statement last session that we are wasting literally hundreds of millions of dollars on what we call defence because, as I said then, the money we spend on so-called defence does not serve the purpose for which it is intended. We have no defence against the missile. Last year I complimented the Prime Minister because he scrapped the Arrow. And, by the way, I think he could just as well scrap the Bomarc, because it is about as useless as the Arrow might have been for the purpose of defence. In fact, I believe the Prime Minister and the present Government would rather like to do just that. He could make a tremendous hit, if I may use that term, with the Canadian people if he took an axe to the defence estimates. Certainly, he could substantially cut down the taxes in this country, and at the same time extend relief to our industries.

I am aware that a good many people in this country will not agree with me on that point but, as I say, I am certain I am right. What is the use of wasting millions of dollars for a purpose which is not being served? Does anyone stop to consider what we have spent on defence since the end of the last war? We have paid out some $25,000 million on getting ready for another war, or preparing our defence, if you like, and what have we got for it? The estimates for defence this year are something like $1,600 million.

I do not intend to pursue this subject further, but it is one on which I hold very strong views. I have mentioned repeatedly, and it is something the Government might take under serious consideration, my belief that if the Prime Minister moved in the direction which I suggest and cut our defence expenditures it would meet with the approval of the majority of the Canadian people. It most certainly would accomplish that end, if the people were not constantly being misled by newspaper talk about the necessity of expenditure for defence.

I have another suggestion, which may be equally unpopular in some quarters. Despite what took place at the so-called Summit meeting, which was not truly a Summit meeting at all, I think we should work toward getting together with the Russians in a state of what is called co-existence, lest we have no existence at all. I believe that the Russians do not want a war any more than anyone else, and in these circumstances I ask, why in the world should all that money be wasted as it is now?

Let me proceed with one or two items about which, perhaps, you will agree more readily. My friend (Hon. Mr. Robertson) suggests that we should get together with the United States and try to join up with the twenty European nations in what would ultimately become, I suppose, a condition of free trade between the two sides of the ocean. There is an alternative. I think he mentioned that we might get together with the United States, as opposed to the Western European countries, namely, the Inner Six and the Outer Seven which will, perhaps, ultimately merge, anyway. That might not altogether be an impossible situation, for the simple reason that the United States is almost self-sufficient. At least, it is more self-sufficient than any other country in the world, with the exception of Russia. There is very little that the United States is obliged to import. It produces almost everything, and if our two countries were united—I am not speaking of political union, although that would probably come out of it—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: We hope not.

Hon. Mr. Euler: If we were united with the United States so that there was free trade between our two countries, we would have the same facilities for obtaining the goods we need as the United States has now. The southern states are almost semi-tropical. The United States produces almost everything it needs, and could exist if ever there happened to be a war between the European countries and the American countries.

However, there might be the situation—and my friend has not mentioned it—in which you would have the world divided into three great trading groups—North America, which would include the United States and Canada; the Western European countries and the countries behind what we call the Iron Curtain. That is something to be considered.

It is not going to be very long, unless I miss my guess, before we shall have greater competition from Russia, and the countries associated with Russia, than from Western Europe. Those countries have practically the same natural resources as we have. As an example, I would not be surprised if not so very far in the future we faced very serious competition in regard to newsprint. So, there might be three great divisions—the Soviets, who are getting stronger all the time, with China thrown in, the Western Europeans, and the Americans and Canadians.

I am in sympathy with what my friend suggests, and I think that we should take some steps to see what can be done to bring about some economic union in order to remove the competition that is now becoming very serious.

My friend mentioned the British preference—at least, he called it the commonwealth preference—

Hon. Mr. Robertson: That is the modern name.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes. We used to call it the British preference. Personally, I never was in favour of it when I was a member of the House of Commons. I could not see that a Canadian manufacturer or producer would feel any better if he were put out of business by a Britisher instead of by a competitor from the United States or any other country.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: He would suffer in the same way.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I mentioned this at one time to a manufacturer of shirts and collars in my own town. He has gone now, but I do not think he would have objected to my referring to it, anyway. I said to him that I did not think he should care if the British preference was not maintained. He said: "Oh, yes, I want it maintained. I buy from Great Britain the cotton goods from which I make my shirts. British competition protects me from the Canadian textile manufacturer." He wanted protection for his shirts and collars, but at the same time he wanted to have his raw material, the finished product of some other country, enter Canada free.

My friend thinks that if we made approaches to the United States it would receive us kindly. This morning, while reading the paper, my attention was drawn to a speech made in Toronto yesterday by the American Ambassador, who rather suggested that our two countries should get together. I think he was reported as saying in regard to tariffs that there should be a reduction. I do not know whether that has any significance or not, but the Ambassador of the United States must speak with a certain amount of authority, and what he had to say in that connection might be worth exploring.

It is a rather remarkable thing that the one organization which has been created in Europe for the purpose of reducing tariffs, namely, GATT, was inaugurated at the suggestion of the United States itself, which is one of the highest tariff countries in the world. Of course, it has left to itself an escape clause which it does not hesitate to use, and which to some extent vitiates or negates the whole proposition.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is why GATT is so useful to the United States. It started out as a high tariff country.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes. The United States could afford to reduce its tariffs. And it would all be to the good if other countries with lower tariffs were to bring them down still further, for then the United States could very well make some worth-while reduction in its high tariffs.

Honourable senators, as I said, I was not prepared to make any remarks.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You are doing wonderfully well.

Hon. Mr. Euler: These are just passing observations.

I think there is merit in this debate introduced by the senator from Shelburne, because it is always well if people can get together and agree not to fight, and that goes not only for industrial and trading matters but for military affairs as well.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lambert, debate adjourned.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, the problem raised by the bill before us is not new. Christ himself, while he was on earth, is said to have let loose his wrath on three occasions and it was against the vendors who plied their trade in the Temple, against the usurers of that time. So that the problem is, indeed, nothing new.

One might wonder how Alphonse Desjardins, of Levis, the founder of the caisses populaires and of credit unions got the idea of establishing such organizations. It was precisely to fight usury and to prevent small wage earners from being exploited. Year after year Mr. Desjardins, who was a House of Commons reporter, used to hear the members speaking in the house against usury and complain that the poor people were being ruthlessly strangled by usurious interests rates. In 1897, a labour member for the constituency of Maisonneuve in Montreal quoted numerous examples of small wage earners who had had to pay usurers an interest ranging from 1,000 to 2,000 per cent. Faced with a situation of that kind, Mr. Desjardins conceived the idea of his caisses populaires, in order to protect the small wage earner.

The object of the bill before us is not to prevent finance companies from lending money; nor is it concerned with interest rates. It simply provides that those who borrow money shall know what capital is being advanced to them and what they will have to pay in interest.

We find the same thing in several European countries, such as France, Belgium and England. When a store advertises merchandise payable on the instalment plan, it states the price that the client will pay, if he pays cash, and, alongside that, the instalments he will have to meet if he chooses to buy under the deferred payment plan.

We have been told that even experts cannot agree on a way to figure out simple interest.

It seems rather strange to me that it should be so easy to calculate any interest providing it is accumulating and so difficult to figure out a reasonable rate on the most logical basis.

It has been pointed out that under this bill all companies, trust companies, banks, Caisses populaires and credit unions will have to report every loan which they make and that this represents an enormous task. So it does. But the bill is not aimed at the companies, or rather the intention is not to interfere with them. The bill will have to be amended somewhat. Some distinguished lawyers have claimed, these last few days, that the bill is ultra vires. As I am no lawyer, I am not in a position to pass judgment on the constitutional aspect of the bill, but it seems to me that there should be some way of making the act constitutional and workable without having to pester those who respect the law and who operate with equity and justice towards their borrowers.

What struck Mr. Desjardins was that the low-income group, the less favoured, the very class that should enjoy the most protection, was the most vulnehable and the hardest hit.

One might say that, after all, these people are free. If they choose to pay such rates, they have to meet the payment. But to my mind this is not a sound reasoning.

All the means of propaganda at our disposal today are being used to convince people who are not very reasonable that they owe it to themselves to buy the most useless gadgets, provided they do not have to make a down payment. Those people do not stop to think; they are overgrown children and should, as such, be protected against their own whims.

Yesterday, our friend from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) told us of someone who had been saved from ruin by one of these finance companies, but I could give endless examples of people who are reduced to want because of the money they have borrowed at exorbitant rates.

In 1956, when the small loans act was consolidated, I made an investigation at home among the unemployed for whom the St. Vincent de Paul Society had to provide food, clothing and fuel. As I remember, out of 17 families, 13 were paying $5 to $92 a month to a certain finance company.

Those people were drawing unemployment insurance benefits, but nevertheless we had to provide food, clothing and heat for them because the finance companies demand their money, or else they seize everything they can lay their hands on in the house. And in the cases I have in mind, it was public charity that was keeping the finance companies in business.

A while ago I was discussing a case with the senator from L'Acadie (Hon. Mr. Savoie). A widow had borrowed $5,000 from a finance company and had been paying back $100 a month for the last three years. At the end of that time she still owed $5,000. I asked her to tell me what had happened. She replied: "I wanted to get $5,000 and was charged $2,000 commission for it". For three years she had paid 2 per cent per month interest.

Prior to 1939, there was no control whatever. That year, the act was amended so that it was forbidden to charge more than 2 per cent per month on a $500 loan, and a report was required. In 1956, the act was again amended so that it became legal to charge 2 per cent per month up to $300; 1 per cent, from $300 to $1,000; and ½ of 1 per cent from $1,000 to $1,500 and a report was again required. There was a general outcry; all finance companies would be bankrupt! But nothing of the kind happened; I will come back to that in a moment. The point I want to make now is that we have to educate the people. It seems to me that the bill before us would contribute to this work of education, because it would help our people to understand that they should not spend thoughtlessly. We have a slogan at home: "Think before spending".

For instances, in our caisses populaires, we have a table of loans, showing the people what they will have to pay in interest and what capital they will obtain.

The caisse populaire lends $100, at 6 per cent repayable in one year at the rate of $8.34 monthly. Here is the interest the member will pay:

January	$100.00 at 6% for one month	$0.50
February	91.66 " " " " "	0.46
March	83.33 " " " " "	0.42
April	74.98 " " " " "	0.38
May	66.64 " " " " "	0.34
June	58.31 " " " " "	0.30
July	49.38 " " " " "	0.25
August	41.65 " " " " "	0.21
September	33.33 " " " " "	0.17
October	29.99 " " " " "	0.13
November	16.66 " " " " "	0.09
December	8.33 " " " " "	0.05
Total		$3.30

By that time, he will have received $100 from his caisse populaire and paid $3.30 in interest. The caisse populaire did not give him only $94 instead of $100, as do other lending companies on their so-called "popular" loans when they say to the client: "We have deducted 6 per cent interest from your loan; here is $94 and your interest is paid". Therefore the borrower receives only $94 out of a $100 loan. The caisse populaire gives the borrower $100 and saves him $2.70 in interest.

Do you realize the added purchasing power which our members have gained through the economies effected thanks to our caisses populaires—which have loaned to date over one billion dollars to small wage earners—while receiving on their savings an interest rate which in itself represents a substantial sum? All these advantages we owe to co-operation and, naturally, to the efficient operation of our Caisses populaires Desjardins.

The interest saved on a loan from the Caisse populaire Desjardins stands out more strikingly if you compare it with the interest charged by a finance company or small loans company, which may reach 24 per cent.

Take, for instance, a loan made to a low income earner to the amount of $296, repayable in twelve monthly instalments of $28. The interest charged by a small loans company on a loan of $296 to be repaid in twelve equal monthly instalments of $28 is $30 higher than the interest charged on a similar loan of $296 by a Caisse populaire Desjardins and repayable in $25.48 monthly instalments over the same 12-month period. In the first case, the interest charged is $39.86, and in the second, $9.71. The money saved on a loan of $296 is therefore $30.24, or more than $10 for every $100 borrowed.

In the light of the above, who can claim that savings restrict economic activity? Savings help to stimulate economic activity, by making possible the purchase of consumer goods which encourage production, whereas easy credit, of which there is an abuse, can produce inflation which is always harmful and which prevents economic stability. In borrowing at excessive interest rates, the borrowers reduce their purchasing power, whereas by building up their savings they increase their purchasing power, thus contributing to the economic development and stability of the country. Moreover, savings offer another tremendous advantage from the double standpoint of the individual and of the national economy, in that the man who buys with money he has saved will purchase useful things and not useless ones and will not commit himself beyond his means. And if sometimes he may have to borrow, he will do it wisely and carefully and he will put his credit to good use. Is there any better borrower than the one who knows how to save money? Thrift comes before credit and it teaches one how to use credit wisely. Thrift therefore has a good influence on the economy because it guides production and stabilizes consumption through an increased and firmer purchasing power.

I hardly need give you the history of the small loans act, but I just want to remind you that in 1956, when the act was amended anew, the Canadian association of small loan companies endeavoured to show that the passing of such a measure by Parliament would eventually put many small loan companies out of business, to the detriment of consumers and of the country's economy.

Nothing of the sort happened. The plea was pointless. Authorized small loans companies and money lenders have continued, notwithstanding the amendments made to the small loans act in 1956, to make money hand over fist and to accumulate enormous, not to say exorbitant, profits. The reports published by the Superintendent of insurance in Canada on authorized small loans companies and money lenders indicate the considerable increase in their loans and in their net profits during the years 1956, 1957 and 1958. The 1959 report is not yet available.

Outstanding loans increased from $225,680,222 on December 31, 1956 to $364,554,385 on December 31, 1958. The volume of loans of $1,500 or less went up from $368,000,000 in 1957 to $477,000,000 in 1958. Authorized small loans companies and money lenders in 1957 made 1,075,322 loans of $1,500 or less, to the amount of $368,392,107; and, in 1958, 1,107,500 loans, to the amount of $477,705,515.

Net profits, after income tax, reached $7,739,351 in 1956; $9,503,000 in 1957; and $12,129,000 in 1958.

From 1956 to 1958, authorized small loans companies and money lenders saw their assets increase from $262,386,415 to $408,581,861; and their paid-up capital, from $12,204,010 to $19,562,736.

The dividends paid to capital holders and the amounts collected by the shareholders of authorized small loans companies and money lenders have reached $10,703,469 in 1958, while paid-up capital, according to the consolidated statement was $19,562,736.

Investors as a group have reaped a 50 per cent income from their investment. Household Finance, by far the most powerful of the small loans companies, with assets of $159,120,544 and paid-up capital of $3,072,000 on December 31, 1958, made net profits in 1958 which amounted to $5,476,432 with regard to loans of $1,500 or less and paid out $4,762,375 in dividends to its shareholders and in benefits or monetary compensation to its partners. This means that investors in this loan company have derived income of more than 100 per cent on their investment.

The four small loans companies in operation had a paid-up capital of $5,322,500 on December 31, 1958 and it has not varied for several years. In 1958, the dividends paid on capital and benefits distributed to partners amounted to $4,832,375, which is more than twice what they were in 1956 and just about the equivalent of paid-up capital.

From 1956 to 1958, authorized money lenders increased their paid-up capital from $8,608,233 to $14,240,236, while dividends on paid-up capital and benefits to associates or individual owners have increased from $154,039 to $5,871,094. Authorized finance companies and money lenders would therefore seem, these last few years, to have enjoyed considerable development and have paid their investors enormous, not to say exorbitant, revenues, which have reached 100 per cent in the case of Household Finance.

So much so that we could rightly ask ourselves if we should not reconsider the problem of small loans to Canadian consumers with a view to making additional amendments to the Small Loans Act so as to bring down further the cost of small loans and to ensure that the consumers are properly protected. The excessive interest rates that people have to pay on consumer loans reduce to a large extent their purchasing power and consequently consumption and production, that is to say, economic activity.

Savings, which are the source of credit, and low cost, controlled and sound credit are essential because they are the basis of a healthy and progressive economy. When properly used, savings and credit encourage economic expansion and contribute to a steadily growing production, thus making it possible for consumption to keep pace with the increase in savings if it is controlled and directed towards lending institutions which promote its safe use.

The more a person earns, the more he spends and the more he is liable to act irrationally and get bogged down in debts. Over the past twenty years, income has increased 300 per cent in Canada and yet consumer credit rose from $400 million to $2½ billion.

The time has now come for people to make a sensible choice as far as their needs are concerned. If so many families cannot make both ends meet, as we say, and if they are deeply in debt, is it not frequently because they have failed to foresee their expenses and to choose wisely which expenses they should incur to fulfill their needs?

The income of most people is not high enough to satisfy all the needs which have been created by our present way of life. We must think first, and then choose between our needs. Certain needs have to be satisfied since they are basic; others can be ignored advantageously. There is a hierarchy in needs. Food, clothing and lodging are basic needs and, as such, must have priority.

To save money, you have to make up your mind not to spend more than you earn and to try to spend a bit less than your income.

Our people should get into the habit of foreseeing their expenses, giving priority to essentials and allowing for savings in their budget; they should not be led astray by salesmen who offer goods on the easy payment plan. A family budget has become a necessity to protect those who are an easy prey to easy credit. One of the first advantages of a budget is that it imposes a moral restriction on those who find it hard to practise moderation. A budget forces them to think, to foresee and to submit to necessary control.

Therefore, lending money is not synonymous with rendering service. Any loan involves an interest to be paid as well as the capital to be reimbursed. A perusal of the licensed small loan companies and money lenders over the last few years shows that our borrowers are going deeper and deeper into debt and that their number is constantly increasing.

To make people think before spending, that is the object of this bill. Let us send it to a committee where we can try to amend it so that it will be constitutional. Let us live within our means if we want to have the means to live.

TELEVISION PROGRAM "CLOSE-UP"

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. William H. Golding: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for his efforts to get answers to the two questions which appeared on the Order Paper in my name last week. I did not get answers to my questions, but just a couple of replies which were a polite brush-off, and which in essence told me, and everybody else, that actually we have nothing to say about the C.B.C., their conduct of the programs, or the fees they pay to the people they have on their programs. However, I know the Leader of the Goverment did his best to obtain answers, and I thank him most sincerely for that.

I now give notice of this further inquiry:

1. If at any time in the past the C.B.C. has given a scale of fees paid to those taking part in their programs. If so, when?
2. The name or names of those responsible for the C.B.C. programs on "Close-Up" on the evening of May 26 and June 2, 1960.

OLD AGE SECURITY BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Olive L. Irvine moved the second reading of Bill C-63, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

She said: Honourable senators, it is an honour for me to have the opportunity of introducing this important piece of social legislation.

As honourable senators will note, the bill now before this house is designed to amend the Old Age Security Act for the purpose of enabling the large majority of pensioners to carry their pensions with them outside of Canada if they so desire.

Before dealing with the bill in detail, it might be well for me to provide some background on the development of this legislation. The Old Age Security Act was introduced in 1951 with the unanimous approval of Parliament. Under this legislation pensions are charged to the Old Age Security Fund, which at the outset was financed from three earmarked taxes: a 2 per cent personal income tax with a ceiling of $60, a 2 per cent corporation tax, and a 2 per cent sales tax. In other words, this program has contained a certain contributory element in the sense that every person living in Canada has contributed through sales tax or through personal income tax. In the initial years, it is obvious that these contributions would be very small, but as the years have gone on the amounts of individual contributions have been steadily increasing. I mention this point because it has a bearing on the matter of out-of-country benefits which we are now considering.

When the legislation was first introduced no one had made any contributions to the Old Age Security Fund, and it was possible to argue under these circumstances that there was little justification in permitting payments to pensioners who might wish to leave Canada permanently. Such persons would no longer be contributing to taxes supporting the Old Age Security Fund and at the same time their benefits would be spent outside the country. At that stage, to do otherwise seemed a little unfair to Canadians living at home and supporting the fund. This prompted the approach laid down at that time, that whenever a pensioner left the country his benefit was automatically suspended until he returned.

Special provision was made, however, for those pensioners who left the country for brief periods—for example, those who for health or for other reasons wanted to go south for the winter, or those who wanted to make brief visits outside the country. To meet this type of situation the legislation stipulated that on his return to Canada a pensioner could receive his benefits covering a period of three months' absence in any calendar year, provided he returned to Canada within six months of his date of departure.

In November 1957, after the new Government had taken office, and at a time when the Old Age Security program was in its sixth year of operation, the length of the period of temporary absence was extended. By that time many of the people coming on pension had contributed taxes to the Old Age Security Fund and it seemed only fair that there should be some relaxation of this provision. Accordingly, the Government, in addition to raising the pension level to $55 a month, also extended the out-of-country provisions to permit absences for a period of six months.

That was almost three years ago. In the interval, contributions to the Old Age Security Fund have been continued, and in 1959 the taxes levied under the 2-2-2 formula were increased to the present level of 3-3-3. For example, in the case of the personal income tax contribution, it was raised from 2 per cent to 3 per cent and the annual ceiling was increased from $60 to $90.

Each additional year that the program has been in operation the provision for not paying benefits to persons who wish to leave the country has been progressively more difficult to justify. Since the program is now in its ninth year of operation, and since the taxes supporting the program have been increased, it seems reasonable at this stage that a further step should be taken with respect to payment of benefits outside of Canada.

The bill currently before us proposes three basic changes. First, under existing legislation benefits are automatically suspended when a pensioner leaves the country. It is now proposed that pensioners will continue to receive their pension cheques when they leave the country—that cheques will be mailed outside the country. It will no longer be necessary for people staying abroad to wait until they get back to Canada to pick up their cheques.

Secondly, for those pensioners who have lived in Canada for 25 years or more after their twenty-first birthday there will be no limit on how long they can stay away from Canada and still continue to draw their pension. This means, in effect, that pensioners with these residence qualifications can actually live out of the country permanently and still qualify for and receive old age security payments.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Do you think that will be a good thing?

Hon. Mrs. Irvine: I do.

The third change has to do with those pensioners who have not lived in Canada for 25 years or more after their twenty-first birthday. It will be possible for such persons to receive benefits for their month of departure, plus six additional months of absence. If they have not returned to Canada by that time, benefits will be suspended until they do return. By allowing the month of departure and the month of return as well as these six months for purpose of qualification for benefit, it is possible for a pensioner to be away from Canada for eight months less two days without loss of benefits. A pensioner could, for example, leave on October 1 and return as late as the following May 31.

One of the first questions which come to mind is why any difference has been made between pensioners on the basis of length of residence in Canada. Why are we not treating everyone alike?

An effort has been made in the legislation to reach a balance between, on the one hand, those people who have spent all, or at least a considerable portion, of their working life in Canada contributing to the development of this country, and who also have been making contributions to the Old Age Security Fund, and, on the other hand, those who have been in the country for only a part of their productive life. In the case of this latter group, it would hardly seem fair for the taxpayers of the country to pay the cost of a pension to persons who spent, say, ten or fifteen years of their working life in the country and then decided to return to their country of origin. The pension which these persons will receive will be out of all proportion to the contributions they had made to the Old Age Security Fund and it would seem only reasonable that if, at age 70, they plan to participate in the benefits of these Old Age Security provisions, they should continue to reside in Canada. However, in the case of the former group, those who have spent at least 25 or more of their productive working years in this country will be entitled to receive their pensions abroad without restriction.

Having regard to the nature of the Canadian Old Age Security program, the principle of the division is surely sound even though it is difficult to decide just where to draw the line. Since taxation for the financing of Old Age Security payments began less than nine years ago, a period of 25 years after age 21 is surely a most generous residence requirement.

A pertinent consideration at this point is an estimate of the numbers of persons who may be affected by the 25-year provision. An analysis from data on individual files was made of 2,696 pensioners who, in February of this year, were known to be permanently absent from Canada. It revealed that only 3.7 per cent, or 100 pensioners, on the basis of their residence history already on file had less than 25 years residence in Canada after the age of 21. In 18.7 per cent, or 501 cases, the information available was not precise enough to determine residence status. In 77.7 per cent, or 2,095 cases, the pensioners possessed the required number of years of residence after the age of 21 to qualify permanently for a pension outside the country. On the basis of this evidence it would appear that certainly 80 per cent, and probably 90 per cent, of all pensioners will have no difficulty in establishing that they have 25 years or more of residence in Canada following their twenty-first birthday. It can be seen, therefore, that in the great majority of cases persons will be able to qualify under these provisions. In the small proportion of cases where this is not so, it should be pointed out that this does not affect in any way entitlement to benefit, but only the question of receipt of benefit outside the country. Coupled with this is the fact that even in these instances generous provision is already available for absences of at least six months of the year to take care of special circumstances requiring temporary absence for health or other reasons.

It is difficult to assess the cost of this amendment with absolute accuracy. But if we are to assume that departure from Canada, both temporary and permanent, will follow essentially the same pattern under the new amendments as they have followed in the first eight years of experience to date, the estimated cost of paying pensioners outside of Canada will be something of the order of $2 million to $3 million annually. This represents the estimated net additional cost in the initial years.

Section 1 of the bill before us sets out the main purpose of the amendment which I have discussed and which is achieved by repealing subsection 1 of section 5 in the existing act and substituting this new subsection.

The purpose of the supplementary provisions contained in sections 2 and 3 of the amending legislation deserves some comment. Section 2 is designed to protect the position of pensioners who may be absent from Canada on the day when the amending legislation comes into effect and who, if they returned to Canada within the time limit specified by section (1) of the present legislation, would be entitled to pick up certain retroactive payments for the months during which they had been absent. If section 2 were not included in the amending bill there might be some doubt as to this entitlement to retroactive payments for these returning pensioners. Thus section 2 ensures that such persons will be fully protected with respect to any retroactive payments to which they would have been entitled.

Finally, the third section in the bill before us is traditional in character. It is designed to cover the position of the pensioner who is outside of Canada at the time when the new legislation becomes effective and who continues to remain outside of Canada for a further period following the passage of the new legislation. Any such individuals who have the required 25 years' residence in Canada following their twenty-first birthday may, without returning to Canada, make application to have their pension payments resumed, and if found to be eligible they will be reinstated with effect from the first day of the month when this amending legislation comes into force. This is a reasonable approach to the matter because it will not force eligible persons who are now living outside of Canada to return to the country in order to receive benefits.

It will be noted that I referred to the matter of the date the legislation comes into force. In this regard I should mention that there is no provision in the amending bill specifying the date upon which the new legislation becomes effective or providing that the legislation shall become effective only on proclamation. Because of this the amending legislation will come into force on the day when the bill receives royal assent.

Perhaps some reference should be made to the fact that the amendment will mean sending Old Age Security cheques outside of Canada and this will involve certain new problems for the administration. Fortunately, the Department of National Health and Welfare will be able to call upon the experience of other branches of the Government service which have been dealing with a similar situation over the years. For example, the Annuities Branch of the Department of Labour, the Canadian Pension Commission, and the Superannuation Branch of the Department of Finance all issue payments of one kind or another to beneficiaries in other countries.

I am sure that honourable senators will agree with me that this amendment will be most helpful in overcoming many cases of hardship which otherwise would occur—older persons who have had to leave the country permanently because of health reasons; others who have left for other countries in order to live with their sons and daughters, as well as numerous other similar cases which come to mind. The legislation is not put forward with a desire to encourage older people to leave Canada, but rather to recognize the fact that our senior citizens are entitled to consideration if for one reason or another they find it desirable or necessary to live elsewhere in their years of retirement.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, debate adjourned.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
Ottawa

9th June 1960

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Thursday, the 9th June, at 5.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. Joly de Lotbinière
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Senator Brunt, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell for the royal assent, at approximately 4.15 this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.15 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

GUEST OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we shall have the pleasure and the honour in just a few minutes to receive on the floor of the Senate the Right Honourable Robert G. Menzies, Prime Minister of Australia. So, if it is your desire we will adjourn during pleasure.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Right Honourable Mr. Menzies was escorted into the chamber by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, honourable senators standing, and was presented to the Honourable the Speaker and seated at the right of the Chair.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, we are highly honoured indeed in having present with us this afternoon and seated on the floor of the chamber the Right Honourable Robert Gordon Menzies, C.H., Q.C., LL.D., M.P. As you know, the right honourable gentleman is Prime Minister of Australia and Leader of the Liberal and Country Party Coalition in that country. He has held the office of Prime Minister longer than anyone else in Australia—from 1939 to 1941 and from 1949 up to the present moment.

After having graduated in law from the University of Melbourne, where he had a brilliant academic record, Mr. Menzies was called to the bar in the year 1918, and in 1929 he received appointment as King's Counsel. He entered politics in 1928, when he became a member of the Legislative Council—that is the upper house—of the State of Victoria, Australia. In the next year he resigned to contest a seat in the Legislative Assembly—that is the lower house—of the State of Victoria.

In 1934 he entered federal politics. He was Attorney General and Minister for Industry from 1934 to 1939, when he became Prime Minister. From 1941 to 1949 he was Leader of the Opposition and an Opposition member of the Advisory War Council.

Mr. Menzies is also an author of considerable note, having had several of his books published. He holds an honourary LL.D. degree from Laval University in Quebec, which was conferred upon him in 1956.

On this visit Mr. Menzies is accompanied by his wife, who is at present seated in the south gallery of this chamber. Dame Pattie Menzies is herself a lady of great distinction. She was invested with the riband and cross of the Grand Cross of the Order of the British Empire by Her Majesty the Queen on February 18, 1954 in recognition of public services to the Commonwealth of Australia.

We are indeed delighted to have the Right Honourable Mr. Menzies with us today and we hope that he will come back to visit us many times in the future. On this occasion we are particularly pleased that he is present because the bill ratifying the recent trade treaty between Canada and Australia will be assented to a little later this afternoon.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, our distinguished guest is far from being a stranger in Canada. In fact, there are very few countries in the world in which he is a stranger. I do not know of anyone who could be described more fittingly as a world figure than our distinguished guest today. He has visited almost every country, and not only is his name known throughout the world but he would be recognized if he walked down the street almost anywhere. I join with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in extending him a warm welcome today.

On a previous visit to Canada, as the Leader of the Government has said, he received a degree honoris causa from Laval University. He received a degree also from McGill University. So we feel, as I hope he does, that he is very much among friends when he comes to Canada.

Mr. Menzies has represented his country at international gatherings, at commonwealth conferences and at meetings of the Prime Ministers. As the Leader of the Government said, he has a long and distinguished career as a parliamentarian. He has tasted the bitterness of political defeat and enjoyed the sweets of many victories.

Among other occasions, Mr. Menzies visited us in 1941, at which time he addressed both houses of Parliament. I would remind him that there are today among the members of this house 42 honourable gentlemen who were members of one or other of the houses of Parliament at that time. Perhaps my reminder will result in the putting of some limitation on what he might say today, because I assure him that many of us remember the inspiring address he delivered on that occasion.

In closing my remarks may I use words similar to those used by the late Mr. Mackenzie King when he welcomed Mr. Menzies to our Parliament in 1941. In associating myself with the honourable Leader of the Government in his welcome to Mr. Menzies, I do so with exceptional pride and pleasure, in that it affords to us, as members of the Senate, an opportunity to say to Mr. Menzies in person many of the things that the people of Canada have been thinking about him and his country over the years, and particularly many of the things that we thought during the dark days of the war when so many of his young countrymen trained as airmen in our country, and subsequently, without regard to their personal safety, performed deeds of great valour and gallantry in defence of freedom and democracy.

We also welcome Mr. Menzies for himself. We know him well as one of the leading public men, not only of the commonwealth, but of the world. We welcome him as an exponent of great causes, who is fearless in his public utterances, strong in his leadership, and broad in his vision. We are delighted to have him here, and we feel that his sojourn in our land will be a happy and profitable one for himself and, more especially, for us.

(As the Right Honourable Mr. Menzies rose to speak, honourable senators stood and applauded.)

Right Hon. Robert G. Menzies: Honourable senators, I am deeply indebted to the two speakers for what they have said in welcoming me here today. In Canberra we have a quaint practice of our own: when a visitor important to the Parliament of another Commonwealth country visits us, the Honourable the Speaker, with due ceremony, invites him to take a seat on the floor of the house, and he occupies it, but he is not allowed to open his mouth under any circumstances. You have a different practice.

I have just been reminded of my visit to the Parliament of Canada in 1941. Perhaps my friend the honourable Leader of the Opposition in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) will not recall as vividly as I do that on that occasion I had made a speech at a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club. The Prime Minister of the day was rather pleased with that speech, and afterwards he said he would like me to come over to Parliament and speak. It was then 25 minutes to 3. I asked him at what hour he wished me to come. He replied, "At 3 o'clock." So for the next 20 minutes I might have been seen wandering around the garden looking at the trees and collecting my thoughts. Under those circumstances I hope I may be forgiven if I literally do not remember one word I said on that occasion. But I take it as a very great compliment that somebody else does.

This is a very interesting event this afternoon. Again, we in Australia do not have the same formalities attached to royal assent. This occasion is quite remarkable for me, and I hope for all of us, in that royal assent is being given to a trade treaty between our two countries in the presence of the Prime Minister from each country. That, I think, has some significance, and for us a very great significance.

I may say I have always found it uncommonly easy to get involved in an argument when in Ottawa; anybody is willing to have one with me. People have certain political classifications here, but I find myself greeted warmly by both sides of the house—one, because I carry its name; and the other, because it suspects that I have some ideas in common with it. I don't know. But it is very friendly and, as I say, I am always able to raise an argument.

But on this occasion I am comforted by the knowledge, and you are too, that our two countries are for all real purposes in the world side by side. We are literally brother countries. We have been side by side too long and in too many circumstances to have any differences that are any more than froth on the surface. Canada and Australia have a great common destiny. Every visit that is made to Australia by a visiting Canadian strengthens our common feeling, and I like to believe that every visit to Canada by some Australian who is prominent in his own country has a similar effect.

We always feel at home with each other. We believe in the same things. We have the same spiritual values. We have the same parliamentary machinery. In fact, the only difference that I have observed this afternoon is the difference between the Senate here and the Senate of Australia. When we, as a Government in Australia, start to get interested in the Senate, I want to tell you—and this, of course, must go no further than yourselves—it is because the Whip has come along and said that we might be beaten on the vote. It is then that we are tremendously interested in the Senate!

Our Senate, as you know, is elected on a state-wide basis. We have a system of election which means that no Government, so far as I can discover, can ever have a majority of more than four in the Senate. With you there are differences, and I am very glad for your sake that there are differences, because in my own country, I never quite know whether, having said "Good day" to a senator, I will see him in six years' time. Here

I see some old friends—not old faces, but old friends—and I am delighted, indeed, to see them.

Thank you very much. I know you have a time limit. That is a comfort that was given me after my speech at lunch-time. I was told, "At any rate, this afternoon you are on a time limit." I think somebody told me that I had to finish by 4.38, and I see that it is now 4.40. So, having exceeded my time limit I will content myself with thanking you very, very warmly for your reception, and assuring you of the universal friendliness and good will of my own country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Mr. Menzies, may I thank you for consenting to address the Senate. This is a great occasion, as you have noted, for both Australia and Canada, and it must be a great occasion for you, sir, because it is the first time you have been invited to come to the Senate—not summoned.

Mr. Menzies, we have met you at Quebec, where you made a wonderful speech, which is reported in the records of Laval University I was not there to hear that speech, but I read it, and since then I have been looking forward to this opportunity of hearing you here today. The magnificent address you gave this afternoon proved again that you are the great orator about whom we have heard so much.

Thank you again, sir, for coming to address this august chamber.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine presented Bill S-35, respecting the International Boundary Commission.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thursday next.

Honourable senators, in anticipation of someone's asking me what this is about I would like to say that the International Boundary Commission was established by treaty in 1908 to define and mark certain portions of the international boundary between Canada and the United States of America. The commission was by treaty in 1925 required to define and mark other portions of the international boundary and was further charged with the maintenance of the boundary line between Canada and the United States of America and Canada and Alaska by the placing and maintaining of monuments and buoys and the maintaining of a boundary vista.

The treaty of 1925 was approved in that year by resolution of Parliament but no legislation was passed with respect thereto. The purpose of this bill is to enable the commission to carry out more effectively in Canada its functions under the treaty of 1925.

OLD AGE SECURITY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 9, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mrs. Irvine for the second reading of Bill C-63, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on Bill C-63, may I say at the outset how much I appreciated listening to the honourable senator from Lisgar (Hon. Mrs. Irvine). I most sincerely compliment her upon the pleasant and wonderful speech she delivered when introducing this bill the other day. Having said so, I want to say now, before I proceed further, that that does not mean I agree with certain sections of the bill. I shall refer to them in the latter part of my speech and deal with the objections then.

One thing that has struck me lately in the Senate is that since I came to the House of Commons, in 1930, there has been quite a change in the attitude toward social legislation. I was not here in the Senate in 1926 when there was a partisan vote dividing against the Old Age Pension Bill by 45 to 21, but in looking through the records I find no other instance of the Senate taking such a stand on any measure of this kind.

I remember when the Right Honourable Mackenzie King moved and introduced the Family Allowances Bill. Let me say right here that no one ever heard about family allowances until he introduced the measure into Parliament—not even the members of his own party. It was all his own doing. On that occasion the Acting Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons put forth ten reasons why his party could not support family allowances. I am very glad, therefore, to see the Conservative party come along now and get behind all the social legislation that the Liberal party has introduced, and making it appear that the Conservative party was responsible for it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Don't be sarcastic.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It stands as a fact for the people of Canada that every piece of social legislation on the statute books of this country was put there by the Liberal Government. I challenge anyone to refute that statement.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Just a minute. My understanding is that you are entirely wrong if you say that the Leader of the Opposition opposed family allowances.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Croll: Oh!

Hon. Mr. Reid: Well, I could go and get the facts and read them to you, and the date, too, because I read them before I came here this evening. My friend gets up to challenge my statement. Well, he should be sure of his facts before rising to make the challenge. I will give you the date, and you can check it yourself. In 1946 the late Gordon Graydon, was Acting Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. I was there. Also, it is on record, and I checked it, and I stand by what I say. So just do not be too quick in contradicting unless you are sure.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You have not read it yet.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Go and send for it and read it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The only man I can think of in this connection was the Honourable Herbert Bruce, of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Reid: In all sincerity as a senator, I can say that the late Gordon Graydon put forward ten reasons why they could not support baby bonuses. I say that without fear of successful contradiction.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I can tell you that the only man who opposed them in this chamber was the senator from Blaine Lake.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Another Conservative, you see, opposing social legislation. So I was correct, honourable senators, when I said that they are coming along and jumping on the bandwagon and getting behind the Liberal social legislation. I shall have more to say about the expenditures on that as I proceed with my remarks. And do not think I am worried by interruptions, because honestly I like them. As long as one speaks the truth he can stand up before any audience or any person. That has been my policy since I came to Parliament in 1930.

Now I have a few loose ends to gather together.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You had better tie up your loose ends a bit.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And you had better get your facts more clear.

May I draw to the attention of honourable senators the trend in expenditures of old age security, because the trend of increased expenditures does not seem to faze the present Government.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: We are getting more old people, aren't we?

Hon. Mr. Reid: In 1958 there were over 827,000 people in receipt of old age security. I am giving round figures for convenience. The cost was then $473 million. In 1960 the recipients had increased to 873,000 persons, and the cost was $575 million. In the two-year period the numbers had increased by 46,000, and the cost by $102 million. The Government forecast for the future is most interesting. I do not know how many honourable senators have been looking at these committee reports, but I advise them to do so, because from them they can pick up lots of splendid information we should all know about. The Government forecast is from 1964 to 1965, and it estimates that the cost of old age security will then have reached $666 million, an average increase of $20 million each year.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Do I understand this is what you are boasting your party introduced to the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Oh, you are just trying to be funny. I think my friend has got the thought by now.

I will read some interesting information I got the other day regarding the aged citizens of this country, which shows that the aged of Canada are increasing; in other words, the people of this country are beginning to live longer. One of the strange things that one notices in looking over the details in the schedule is that up until 75 years of age there are more males than females; but when we go from 75 to 90 or over the picture changes and there are more females than males. It is most interesting, especially when one looks at the ages of 90 and over. So men, be careful.

In 1951 there were 8,145 persons in Canada 90 years of age or older. In 1956, the latest year for which I could get the figures, the number had doubled to 16,165.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Those were over 90?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Those 90 or over. Having come across those figures, I thought they might be interesting to members of the Senate. I know they were extremely interesting to me.

I want to deal for a few minutes with the system of social security in two countries, the United States and Great Britain, and in doing so I think I can provide honourable senators with some interesting information.

As every honourable senator knows, the Government appointed Dr. Robert M. Clark to investigate the United States system with a view to finding out if the American system was an improvement over that of Canada. First of all, before I quote from the report, may I say that, to my mind, the British system and the American system are both superior in one regard particularly, and that is that the funds needed to support them do not come from the exchequer. In both countries the schemes are solely contributory, which, of course, holds down to some extent the ever increasing demand for more pensions.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Do Canadians not contribute?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am speaking of direct contributions. There are many in Canada who do not contribute other than what comes out of any sales tax.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Is there anyone in Canada who does not pay sales tax?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No, but you cannot compare contributions of that kind to direct contributions. It certainly is not the same as if a person contributes so much a week directly. But why raise that point? There is quite a big difference between the two systems. I repeat, the system in Great Britain and the system in the United States is a direct contributory system, in which contributions are made by persons to that fund, and nothing comes out of the treasury. You are not going to say that that is the same as the one we have here.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, but I do say that Canadians contribute.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes, but not to the same extent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not in the same form.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is my own personal view. That brings up one distinct disadvantage in Canada, because with the social security system we have here the amount is ever increasing, it never seems to be sufficient. For instance, family allowances were hardly put into effect before there was a demand to increase them. Those of us who lived in the days when there were no family allowances wonder how we ever existed because many nowadays cannot exist without family allowances. Some are always looking to have more, and so request the Government to increase them. That is why I raise the point.

The system in each of the two other countries I mentioned is somewhat of a protection against—I would not say bribery exactly, but against appealing to the party in power to increase old age pensions or family allowances. In Great Britain and the United States there is a direct contribution from the individual and the employer, and not from the treasury at all, and this system keeps them clear from that kind of influence.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Does the United States Government not sometimes increase the allowances?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes, the United States Government proposes to increase it, but it is also proposing to increase the contribution from 6 per cent to 9 per cent deducted from their salaries.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Do you not think it was a direct case of political bribery when family allowances were first introduced?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No, it more like bribery when you offer to increase them after opposing them. That is more like looking for votes.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Will another question be allowed?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Horner: When once started, nothing else could have been expected but what the honourable senator is complaining about now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What is the question?

Hon. Mr. Horner: The question is, did you not realize when you started down that road that, as I often warned, there is no end, there is nothing to do but go further down?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Or off.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, may I continue? With permission of the Senate I would like to state the few more matters that I have to state on this bill. I must say it is a splendid night and I am enjoying it, but I would like to have on the record what I propose to say.

I do not know how many honourable senators have read the report issued under the name of Dr. Robert M. Clark, but for those who have not done so I would advise them to read the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Estimates for Tuesday, March 8, and there you will find an exposé of Dr. Clark's report, put on the record by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That is where I obtained the information on this report rather than by reading through the lengthy report which Dr. Clark presented to the Government. I want to place this on record by way of information:

> Another point the Clark report brings out is that the American system is based on graduated benefit levels while the Canadian employs a flat-rate benefit. Although in the upper income levels, the United States system provides—particularly for single persons—benefits more generous than the Canadian, this is offset to a considerable extent by the fact that at lower levels benefits are smaller than in Canada. The average single U.S. benefit is slightly more than $72 compared to the Canadian flat rate of $55. Dr. Clark points out that if we take the average American benefit and compare it to their national income per capita, and do the same for Canada using our flat-rate benefit, the Canadian benefit is actually higher than the American when stated as a percentage of personal income per capita.
> The American old age, disability and survivors insurance program, as Dr. Clark points out, is currently based on 3 per cent contributions from both employers and employees amounting to a total of 6 per cent of payroll. And this is intended to rise by 1969 to 9 per cent of payroll. If we accept the fact that the average per capita income of Canadians—including those in their active working years—is 30 per cent below that in the United States, the question that presents itself is this. How can we expect, other than by establishing contribution rates that are proportionately higher, to achieve a level of pension benefits equal to the American level?

Now I am going to say right here that some system might well be added to our present old age security system whereby more can be given to the really needy people. It is well known to all honourable senators that $55 or even $110 a month is not sufficient for many people who depend entirely on old age pension security. Therefore, I say we can go still further in improving this scheme. There perhaps could be superimposed on the present arrangement a contributory system, not the same as in the United States, but along the same line. May I now place on the record some information about the pension system in the United States, which may be of interest to all senators.

> Since January 1, individual workers have been paying a maximum premium of $144 a year for the protection they get from Social Security. Employers match that amount, making the total premium—or payroll tax—now 6 per cent on income up to $4,800 a year.
> This tax, as now projected in the law, will rise gradually to a total of 9 per cent—or 4.5 per cent each on employer and employee.

The authorities in the United States are somewhat worried over the way their system is heading. Let me give you one example. Mr. A., a salaried worker, has been covered by social security since 1937. He plans to retire this year when both he and Mrs. A. will be 65 years of age. The monthly pension for Mr. and Mrs. A. will be $178.50 and the expected total pension for the remainder of their lives will be $30,938.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Could the honourable senator tell us if the coverage provided in the United States is as broad as that given under our Old Age Security Act? For instance, are farmers covered?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am not sure whether farmers are covered, but there are great numbers who are not in the employed classes and are not covered. They have no way of paying into a fund. People in those classes must rely on help of a charitable nature from the Government or some other authority.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Everybody in this country is covered by the pension.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Everybody comes under the act, upon reaching the age of 70 years.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: And there is no contribution.

Hon. Mr. Reid: No direct contribution is made.

Honourable senators, I shall give the reasons why I oppose certain sections of this bill when I come to discuss it. First, I thought I should place before the house certain information about the pension system in the United States. I have also a word or two to say regarding the British system.

The British pension system is also a contributory one. Here is one thing they do, which I admire: a booklet is sent out advising the worker to continue working until he reaches 70 years. This is what the booklet has to say:

> Shall I retire or stay on at work?
> For many people this is not a difficult question to decide. They are fit and active at minimum pension age (65 for men and 60 for women) and wish to continue in work and earn wages. They prefer the interest of a job and the companionship of their fellow workers to staying at home. They think that to retire at 65 or 60 is to waste the knowledge, skill and experience they have gained over the years at work. On the other hand, there are others whose health is not so good and who feel that they are not able to stay at work. They will wish to retire and take their pension and perhaps do some work occasionally. But in between these two extremes, there will be those who cannot make up their minds what to do; and if you are one of those people you may like to consider the following points before you decide.

The pamphlet points out that if they work longer they will qualify for a bigger pension. This I think is a laudable thing in itself. People who have skills and who are healthy should not be discarded at 65, but should be encouraged to carry on until 70, or even older, if they desire to do so.

Let me give you the rates of pension under the British system, which I have converted into dollars and cents for convenience and ready understanding. The employee pays $1.40 weekly, or $5.60 monthly; his pension at 65 years is $30, and at 70 is $40. A married couple—a man can insure his wife as well as himself, and a single woman can insure herself—at 65 years they get $60 a month, and at 70 they get $84. If the wife is not insured at 65, the couple get only $48, and at 70 they get $66 per month.

Honourable senators, those are briefly the rates of pension under the British old age pension system. As I say, it is strictly a contributory scheme, being paid for by the employer and employee with no contribution, so far as I can learn, from the exchequer or from the Government.

My attention was recently drawn to a matter affecting Canadians who decide to go to Great Britain to live. I just happened to pick up the information by telephoning the British Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance in Ottawa. I have here a pamphlet entitled Social Security arrangements between the United Kingdom and Canada. From it I learned that provision has been made by law in Great Britain to include within the British pensions scheme Canadians and their families who leave Canada to reside in Great Britain. I frankly say I had not heard about such an arrangement.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it a reciprocal arrangement?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I cannot say whether it is reciprocal or not. I do not propose to go fully into this matter—not that it is too involved, but this is perhaps not the time or place to do it. Honourable senators can secure one of these pamphlets by telephoning the United Kingdom High Commissioner's office in Ottawa. May I read just a few lines of the introduction to it:

> This leaflet describes how the social security arrangements made between the United Kingdom and Canada, which came into operation on 1st January, 1960, enable people to receive certain United Kingdom benefits by virtue of residence or employment in Canada.

This seems to be an encouraging step, certainly one in the right direction, and one of benefit to Canadians who perhaps have not done too well in this country and decide to return to the United Kingdom and start life over again. I shall endeavour to learn whether we have made this arrangement applicable to Britishers coming to Canada. As I say, it is the first time my attention has been drawn to the question.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: May I ask a question of my honourable friend?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I was wondering whether this arrangement was a kind of treaty? Is a payment made by Canada to the United Kingdom to cover this arrangement?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No. The payments have to be made by those who benefit. Perhaps I could best answer that question by reading one paragraph from the pamphlet. Under the general heading "Benefits", question No. 2 reads:

What contributions do I pay if I come to the United Kingdom from Canada?

Answer:

If you were previously insured under the present United Kingdom scheme, you must pay contributions from the date you arrive in Great Britain.

If you start work as an employed person you must pay contributions immediately. Otherwise you should inquire at a local Pensions and National Insurance Office about your liability.

Perhaps this question and answer will throw a little light on the subject:

6. Is it worth paying United Kingdom contributions when in Canada?

Paragraphs 2 and 4 of Leaflet N.I. 38 state the circumstances in which you may pay United Kingdom contributions voluntarily while you are abroad.

Under what circumstances do we have United Kingdom contributions in Canada? I take it, from reading the pamphlet, that people who live here and afterwards go to Great Britain can take advantage of the scheme by contributing to it. They are given credit, to some extent, for the length of stay in this country and they do not have to make back payments, shall I say, but they have so much to pay, and immediately they arrive in Great Britain they can be taken in under the scheme, whether they are single or married and whether or not they have children.

I am sorry if I have detained you too long, but these interruptions and questions take a little time to answer, and it has not altogether been my fault. I maintain, first of all, from what I am able to gather, that no great demand has been made for this kind of proposed legislation. It is true, I will admit, that the passing of this bill may help in the next election, because after reviewing the promises that were made prior to the last election I cannot conceive of any new promises that could be made.

I am strongly of the belief that all who receive the old age security pension should be Canadian citizens. I do not know of any citizens who are more loyal to the country than those born in Great Britain. I know that I became a Canadian immediately I arrived, and I am a strong believer in people being citizens of the country in which they live, especially if they can get pensions without direct contributions. Personally, I cannot see anything wrong with that.

I do not know of any other country that will hand out from its treasury a pension to every Tom, Dick and Harry who comes to it and stays ten years. I can tell you of two cases that I know of where people who have been contributing to relatives in a country in Europe are now trying to induce them to come out here because of the expected passing of this bill. One is 60 years of age and the other is 61. It is understood that when they are here ten years they will get $110 a month. To a person coming from the Old country, or one of the European countries, that is quite a tidy sum to receive, and I maintain it is just utter nonsense to say that a person who is 60 years of age contributes much, if anything, toward his old age security pension in those ten years. The amount he would contribute through the sales tax in that time would be trifling. It would take a good accountant to work out just what he would contribute.

As I pointed out on a former occasion, if a married couple 60 years of age took out an annuity payable at the age of 70, it would cost them $9,000. That is the figure I have obtained from a commercial institution. If that is the case, then it is costing the Government or the country that same amount, $9,000. Yet, we say to those who are not citizens: "Come along, and we will give you this pension." I would rather see something given as an inducement to younger people to come here. When the old age pension was first put into effect, in 1927, it was on the understanding that the people who had built this country and who had borne the brunt and the heat of the day were entitled to some recompense from the wealth of Canada. This was the story told the people back in the twenties.

We are now being extremely generous. I would not be so annoyed about this if it were not for the way this country is drifting —and I use the word "drifting" in a financial sense. It looks to me as if the Government does not care a hoot about how high the debt goes or how much it spends. I have the figures of the debt here. Our debt increased by well over a billion dollars in two years. The gross debt increased by $747 million and now stands at $21 billion. I am not an accountant, and I just cannot tell the difference between the net debt and the gross debt. There are so many things involved in that word "gross" that I cannot just grasp its meaning, but the net debt increased by $404 million last year, and it now stands at over $12 billion.

I wonder what the Honourable Mr. Fleming, who stood up in the House of Commons and said: "Put us in and we will cut off $500 million", is thinking now in his quiet moments. The debt is ever up and up. The estimates for 1960-61 are up over $70 million, and I have not added in the supplementary estimates which have come along. That is how they get around it. They hold these sums back and tell us that that is all the money they are going to spend, and then they come back wanting another $300 million or $400 million, and that bill is rushed through the Senate, and nobody seems to give it a thought.

Having sat on the C.B.C. committee with the Honourable the Minister of Finance, I well remember the strong stand he took against the C.B.C. Is there now any control over the C.B.C.? In 1956 they had $31 million, and this year it is up to nearly $72 million, and the end is not yet in sight. When questions are asked respecting the C.B.C., such as the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding) asked the other night, we are told that the Government is not responsible, but Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I wonder what this has to do with the bill that is before us.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am not surprised that you are getting hot under the collar, but I am endeavouring to show honourable senators that we are now going to hand out between $3 million and $4 million, to start with, and at the same time we are telling people who have lived 25 years or more in Canada that from now on they can leave Canada for good if they want to and still get their old age security pension, and those who want to leave this country can get their old age security pension the rest of their lives. I am endeavouring to show the financial plight to which we are drifting, and this at a time when our budget should be balanced. The United Kingdom, the United States, and France, three great countries, balanced their budgets last year. Why can't we in Canada balance our budget and set our own house in order? The honourable Minister of Finance has told us to save—and I have his words here—but there are no signs of saving in the Government.

I am objecting at this time to spending even $3 million under this bill. It will certainly encourage many of our old age pensioners to spend their remaining days with their relatives or friends in other countries, for many recipients of old age security would never think of leaving this country otherwise. I am against the principle of inducing people to leave this country and I am particularly opposed to the treasury giving those who are not citizens of this country $55 per month.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable senator if when he uses the words "not citizens" he really means non-residents? No non-citizen can draw an old age security pension, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am pleased that my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) has brought up this question, for there are many people who cannot get it through their heads that you do not have to be a citizen of Canada to get this pension. A person merely has to have lived in this country for ten years.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: My honourable friend means a resident for ten years.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes. You only have to be a resident for ten years in order to qualify for this old age security pension of $55 per month. I think it is wrong. I take pride in being a Canadian and I oppose this whole scheme.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I do not intend tonight to enter into any general discussion on social legislation in Canada although, like other honourable senators, I have strong opinions on the subject. I firmly support the social legislation that is on Canada's statute books at the present time. Because I was responsible for the administration of old age security for some time in my own province of New Brunswick, I am keenly interested in any amendments to the Old Age Security legislation and I cannot let this bill pass without expressing my approval of it.

I would like to congratulate the honourable senator from Lisgar (Hon. Mrs. Irvine) on the very fine and clear explanation she made of the bill when introducing it. She showed that she had a real understanding of the legislation, and sympathy for it.

As Regional Director of Old Age Security, I knew of and often dealt with many cases where under the provisions of the act pensions had to be suspended when the pensioner went out of the country for more than one month, either because he was seeking a warmer climate for health reasons or because it was necessary for him to live with or near to close relatives outside Canada. This often involved real hardship. The provision permitting retroactive payments for three months' absence in a calendar year, provided that the pensioner had not stayed out of Canada for more than six months, was some alleviation of this situation but, as you may know, the reinstatement and retroactive payment could only be made after the pensioner had returned to Canada. Frequently it was while the pensioner was out of Canada that he had the most urgent need of the money, and payment to him after his return was not nearly so helpful nor so necessary.

The present amendment makes it possible to continue payments to all pensioners who go out of Canada for six months; and if the pensioner who goes out of Canada, or who is out of Canada at the time the legislation becomes effective, has resided in Canada for 25 years after reaching the age of 21 payments may continue as long as he remains out of Canada. This will be of great assistance in such cases as those to which I have referred.

Honourable senators, this legislation gives fairer treatment to those old age security pensioners who have lived and worked and paid taxes in Canada for many years but who find it necessary either for health or other reasons to reside outside of Canada, and I certainly give the bill my support.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, first I want to endorse everything that the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) said against the Tories, but not against the bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You are straddling a fence.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The bill is our baby and we intend to defend it, if necessary, but it really has not come under attack.

I want to congratulate the honourable senator from Lisgar (Hon. Mrs. Irvine) upon the very lucid, clear and convincing presentation she made on introducing this bill. She had a feeling for it, and that is the proper approach to this kind of legislation.

In so far as I am concerned I approve, endorse and wholeheartedly support the principle of the bill. I was a member of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which brought in the report upon which this act was originally passed in 1951. I need not remind the house, for the honourable senator from New Westminster has already said it, that the Liberals are responsible for every bit of social legislation presently on the books. It sounds good just to repeat it and to know that it cannot be contradicted. The act we are amending today was placed upon the statute books by a Liberal Government, and is the only universal pension system available to any group of senior citizens in the civilized world. In that respect it is unique. It was and it still is a new dimension in social security.

It is interesting to know how this act came about. The joint committee of 1951, to which I have made reference, had a very difficult task before it. You will recall that the Old Age Pension Act provided for a payment at that time of $30 a month for those over 70 years of age, with a means test. The means test was odious to the recipients, and the pension itself was inadequate. The administration was difficult and haphazard; it was politically unpalatable and hard to defend. It had very few defenders. The committee had many hearings and carefully examined the existing schemes which, to the best of my recollection, were mostly of a contributory nature. After the many hearings were concluded a special subcommittee was appointed to bring in a report. I was privileged to be a member of that subcommittee. It was indicated to us that if we were able to bring in a unanimous report, legislation would follow. You can appreciate that there were four parties involved at that time. The Social Credit party was still alive.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Well, it is still alive.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Still alive, you say?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It forms the Government in two provinces.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am talking about the Parliament of Canada, not the provinces. These things all took place in the Parliament of Canada.

You can appreciate that there were many compromises, yet the report was unanimous. Thus came about the Old Age Security Act of 1951.

Now, the committee considered many things. There was the matter of age, whether to make the qualifying age 65 rather than 70. When we took a look at the possible cost, we were a little taken aback and decided that the cost would be a little too heavy to start with. Then we considered lowering the age for women to 65. Britain makes a distinction between men and women in granting the old age pension. We left it for the time being at 70 years for both. The amount of the pension was considered. We all realized that $30 was inadequate. But what was adequate? We finally recommended $40, an increase of $10 over the $30 already being paid. Residence qualifications were considered—whether residence should be enough, or should we demand citizenship. Also whether it should be residence for 10 years or 20 years. Here, too, we compromised and decided to leave it at 20 years for the time being, in order to see what experience might be gained from the administration of the legislation. Then the question of absence from the country arose. There was legislation on our books providing for absence from the country with respect to other pensions. That was some guidance for us. The question arose as to what length of absence, whether to permit six months or three months, and it was decided to start with a three-month period, and that we would deal with it later in the light of experience. We also studied the contributory systems, and much consideration was given to a contribution scheme. It was suggested that we have a contributory system parallel to the Old Age Pension Act. Then there was discussion with regard to superimposing a contributory scheme upon the Old Age Pension Act. In the end came the Old Age Security Act as we know it, which has been improved, as I will indicate, over a period of years. At that time a contributory scheme was considered desirable, but we realized that it would take too long to make it beneficial and meaningful to those senior citizens who needed help at once. I am speaking of 1951. There was a great urgency that something should be done at that very time. Consequently, the contributory scheme was left for another day.

The honourable senator from Lisgar has already stated that the 1951 act provided for a $40 pension for those over 70 years of age, and the qualifying residence was 20 years. It was to be paid for by a formula, a rather clever formula, I thought, which was devised by the Finance Department, and referred to as 2-2-2, with a maximum, that is, 2 per cent corporation tax, 2 per cent sales tax and 2 per cent income tax. It was hoped that that formula would raise enough money to make this scheme self-supporting, but it did not then, and it has not done so to this day. The deficit has been made up from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. In 1957 the pension was raised from $40 to $46. How this formula was arrived at was a mystery which was not understood by members of Parliament and was unappreciated by the voters. After the election of 1957 the qualifying residence was reduced by ten years and the period of absence was increased from three to six months, and the pension was increased to $55. Last year the formula for payment of the pension was changed from 2-2-2 to 3-3-3, with an increased maximum. The Minister of Finance has said that the fund will now be out of the deficit position. In his view—and I have no reason to challenge that view—he thinks that the 3-3-3 formula will be able to carry the fund in a surplus position. I do believe that the present formula falls with unequal weight on those least able to pay, and that it should be on a progressive rate rather than on a flat rate. I do not believe that after nine years it can be argued that the pension is a gift. It is clearly as of right.

This bill provides that residence in this country for 25 years after the age of 21 will entitle the pensioner to receive a pension even though he resides out of the country. It is difficult to understand, if a person is entitled to the pension, why he should not receive it wherever he may be a resident. I think the distinction should end there. A person who comes to Canada at age 60 and qualifies at 70, makes a contribution. Since we do not weigh the contribution of other citizens, why should we penalize those who appear to make less of a contribution than some others? If for reasons which they consider good—such as health, family, or other reasons—they find that they must leave the country and live elsewhere, I see no good reason why they should not take their pension with them. I ask myself the question, which you must ask yourself: Why 25 years after the age of 21? Why not 20? I have no answer to that question, and the Government has not any answer to that question. I ask why the arbitrary cut-off? It seems that the Government is trying in the light of experience to feel its way. I know some people look upon this kind of legislation with a fishy eye, to begin with, and then don't like the idea of pensions going out of the country. However, I think this is an improvement on the present act, and I am prepared to support it and to wait and see what happens in the light of some further experience. We shall be improving this act as time goes on, and there will be other opportunities to say something in connection with this sort of legislation and other legislation of a similar nature.

I want to make one special plea. Even if it falls on deaf ears, I am prepared to chance that. I want to make a special plea for the blind and the disabled pensioners. I know that it is a rule, and generally it is a good rule, that a person can draw only one pension from the federal Government. Consequently, those blind and disabled persons who are in receipt of a pension lose it when they receive the old age security pension. That brings on a particular hardship, since their afflictions have nothing to do with age. If the pensions are needed by the blind and the disabled before they reach the age of 70, how much more are they needed when they reach the qualifying age under the Old Age Security Act?

One more thing that needs to be said, and it is well to note here, is that one receives the pension only when he or she makes an application and fills out the necessary forms and satisfies the department. Nobody needs to accept it. In any event, no matter how high the tax bracket a person enjoys, there is still some benefit from accepting the old age security payment. I have heard in this house some complaints of people having to receive the pension and I have been waiting for an opportunity to say that the Government is not forcing it on anybody.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No, but a person entitled to receive that pension pays income tax on the amount of the pension even if he does not receive it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He does not.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes, sir, he does.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You are quite correct; he is deemed to have received it and pays income tax even if he does not receive the money.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: He has to take it, otherwise he pays income tax on something he does not receive.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The point I am making is that he does not have to take it. Of course, he has to pay tax. He has not the right to complain, because to my mind even if he is in the highest income tax bracket he will still have something left over after paying the tax.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Even if he does not take it, he must pay income tax on it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, of course he must, but he can correct it very easily by writing a letter and sending his birth certificate along to the Department of Health and Welfare.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Because he has to pay income tax on money he does not receive he is really being forced to take the pension.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is available for him, but no one is forcing him to take it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He is entitled to the pension, but whether he takes it or not he has to pay income tax.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He is deemed to have taken it.

We will be meeting this act from time to time, and we need to give consideration to improving it. There is room for improvement.

The qualifying age in my view is too high. In addition to that, there has been a great deal of talk in this country about a direct contributory scheme. Some studies have been made on it, but no action has been taken and none appears on the horizon. That is regrettable. There has been too much caution and lack of eagerness and consideration of a contributory scheme.

We must not be guilty of inattention to the plight of the aged. Too many of our aged citizens are being forced into retirement for no reason other than age. They cannot make ends meet on the monthly cheques from the Old Age Security Act and very many of them appear to have little more in the way of income, or ability to earn income, in order to make up the deficit. Many of these people don't feel old or incapable until they start looking for a job. I am not telling this house anything new when I say that in many instances the prevailing reason that a man is too old at 40 has nothing to do with his skill, but simply that a man of 40 who is seeking employment is judged to be a handicap to a conventional pension plan. Thus in this country these trained minds with unimpaired skills are left to "rest and rust".

This house has a habit of being honest with itself, and I think we have to admit that our social security program was enacted to erase from our conscience the guilt of the thirties. We often refer to our social security measures by using the term "welfare state". To me that means social reform in an advanced stage. Unfortunately, it is more used, particularly in this chamber, as a crushing phrase to suggest that a country which is a welfare state is soft and makes people soft. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We find that the reaction to a new departure is still confined to such questions as whether the nation can afford it, whether it will undermine the moral fibre of the people involved and whether it will impair the sacred doctor-patient relationship, even in those cases when no doctor can be afforded. I am getting to the point where I think we have to take a hard look at the totality of our social security. In December 1959 the Canadian Welfare Council recommended that the Government appoint a royal commission to study all aspects of federal responsibility in the welfare field to do three things: (a) assess present program; (b) determine priorities; (c) examine extensions. And the council listed the following for consideration, which I read from the Windsor Daily Star of December 12, 1959:

> 1. A cash sickness benefit program to provide income when people are forced off payrolls by illness.
> 2. A contributory or flat rate benefit program for dependent survivors, now only partially covered by provincial mothers' allowances.
> 3. Financial assistance universally available for all over 65 who need more than their pension benefits or old age assistance.
> Another result of haphazard development of social security has been uneven benefits. Individuals or groups receive higher benefits or better services because they happen to live in different places.
> A royal commission study into social welfare could serve a useful purpose in pointing up gaps and overlapping in services.

Yet we are very far from being a full welfare state. I think it worth while to consider what other countries, that is comparable countries, have in the way of welfare that we lack.

Let me talk for a moment about full health insurance. We in Canada have national hospitalization and full medical service for the needy in some provinces. Australia, Chile, Iceland, New Zealand, Germany, Great Britain, all have full health services for all their people.

Old age pensions: We have a flat rate of $55 a month for persons over 70 years of age. Great Britain and the Scandanavian countries have a contributory scheme with a pension equal to half pay on retirement.

Unemployment Insurance: We have limited benefits in this country. Most countries extend benefits for 52 weeks a year.

Maternity benefits: None are available in this country except through hospital insurance. There are 42 countries in the world that pay maternity benefits.

Hon. Mr. Buchanan: The province of Alberta does.

Hon. Mr. Croll: But does it not do so through the hospital insurance plan?

Hon. Mr. Buchanan: No.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I stand corrected by my honourable friend, who knows Alberta better than I do.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Provision is made for 12 days' coverage in hospital.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Well, good for Alberta! We ought to follow them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: New Zealand has a splendid system.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have not a list of the other countries. There are, as I have said, 42 countries which have maternity benefits and New Zealand could be one of them.

Incapacity for work: We have a disability pension with a means test. Thirty-two countries have disability pensions without a means test.

Sickness insurance: We have none in this country at all. Iceland, Sweden, Belgium, Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, Italy, all have full sickness insurance coverage.

Funeral benefits: 29 countries in the world pay funeral benefits; Canada has none.

In addition, we have in this country child maintenance, known as family allowances. Twenty-one countries have some form of child maintenance.

I am sure honourable senators will forgive me if, in talking of Family Allowances, I remind the house that a great Canadian who died yesterday, the Honourable Brooke Claxton, as Minister of National Health and Welfare, was responsible for bringing this measure before Parliament and for its administration. We owe him a great debt. This measure has been of substantial benefit to Canadian people, despite the fact that the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) voted against it. He said his was the only dissenting vote in the Senate.

Honourable senators, that enumeration gives us some idea of the social services available in countries comparable to Canada. My suggestion is that a total study would give us an overall picture, and would tell us of the inadequacies and the failures of our present piecemeal approach, which has so many noticeable gaps. It is particularly noticeable in the light of new ground which will presently be broken in the province of Saskatchewan when the Government of that province introduces a compulsory prepaid medical plan, which was the chief plank in their recent platform and was endorsed by the voters, notwithstanding what anyone else says. I think health insurance is our most urgent need, and it appears to have the greatest reward. Better medical care available to all our citizens would not only improve health and save life, but it would also make industry more efficient and allow greater economies in expenditures on other social services.

It is heartening to read the wise and responsible statement issued by Dr. A. D. Kelly, General Secretary of the Canadian Medical Association with respect to the proposed legislation in Saskatchewan. I quote from the Toronto Star of June 10 last:

> "This is a democracy," he said, "The C.M.A. accepts the decision in that light. Our efforts will now be bent on avoiding the defects we see in government plans elsewhere."

That can only mean that the medical association intends to help formulate Government plans, wherever they may be made, and will assist in their administration. In other words, the association realizes that this is inevitable, and the best thing to do is to have a hand in the planning of it.

It is even more interesting to recall that the charge made against the National Health Service in Great Britain was that it was expensive and uncontrollable. In 1953 the Conservative Government there established a committee to inquire into the operation of the service to learn how outlays could be got back under control. It will be remembered that the British health plan was under attack. I have the report here. To the surprise of everyone, the committee found that after five years of operation of the service the per capita outlays were about the same as when it was established and that costs as a percentage of the gross national product were declining. So the project received full support and is no longer a political question in that country.

We in this country are today faced with serious differences in pension, health and other welfare plans that have been developed for individual occupations and industries, where workers are concerned with their own reward. There is no question that the individual industry bargaining on social benefits should be integrated to the orderly development of an overall comprehensive program that pays greater attention to equity and to need.

Today we have a hodge-podge on the level of benefits, depending upon the strength of the bargainers, the ability of an industry to pay, and the welfare traditions of the particular industry. So a study of the overall social security would do much to bring these matters into line, with the result that benefits would go to those who need them most.

The Old Age Security Act is one of the really shining lights among our social security measures, one which I have supported on other occasions and which I wholeheartedly support now. I hope that before long the Government will see to it that the system is improved in the way that it can best be improved, namely, by lowering the qualifying age limit.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, some years ago Mr. Beveridge submitted a plan to provide security from the cradle to the grave, and tonight we have had very, very interesting speeches with regard to all pensions that are paid by nearly all Governments. I must pay tribute to the honourable sponsor of this legislation (Hon. Mrs. Irvine) and to my colleagues who have delivered elaborate speeches on the matter.

But, to revert to the present bill, it stipulates two things—two very different things. One is that the payment of the old age pension will not be stopped because someone spends six months outside of Canada. This is quite reasonable, and I agree with it, but when the door is slightly ajar there are some people who want to make it quite open. I cannot agree with the second provision, which is to the effect that when anyone has spent 25 years in Canada after attaining the age of 21 the old age pension will be paid to him indefinitely outside of this country. That makes no sense to me. Why was this period of time established? Who did it, and at whose request? Why 25 years?

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) was perfectly right. He said: "Who made that calculation, and why?" I wonder how it can be explained. I find that it is completely without any sense that Canadian money should be paid to any person who repeats the words of Cato:

Ungrateful country, thou shalt not have my bones.

He is paid, until his death, for staying outside of Canada. Who could imagine that? To me, the one who drafted this legislation is not "all there". I do not know who it was. In saying that, I offend no one in the Senate, because this comes from elsewhere. It must have come from a gentleman who thought of that in some dream, and who, perhaps, wants to enjoy it himself. There is no possible reason for it.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I apologize for interrupting the honourable gentleman who is explaining this situation very well, but may I suggest a possible explanation of why this change is proposed? Suppose my son and his family live in New York; and I live alone in Canada, but want to die while living with my son's family. I wonder if cases such as that are not the reason for permitting pensioners to continue receiving the pension when out of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: My honourable friend is good natured. He has a great deal of imagination, and I thank him, but the case he suggests is one in a million. I do not see the use of that part of the bill.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I cannot stand for this bill that is before us, and I must tell the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that it will arouse the public against social legislation. The people will say: "We oppose it". Naturally, there are some people who go south to a mild climate in which to spend the winter months, but there is no better climate than that of Canada in the summer months. I cannot see why those people do not return to Canada for six months and then go back to visit across the border. I wonder if the Government would be agreeable to the striking out of subparagraph (b) of the proposed new subsection 1 of section 5 of the Old Age Security Act. I will read the clause, and everybody will realize that I do not exaggerate. It says:

Subsection (1) of section 5 of the Old Age Security Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

5. (1) Where a pensioner absents himself from Canada and remains out of Canada for six consecutive months, exclusive of the month in which he left Canada, payment of his pension for any period he continues to be absent from Canada after those six months shall be suspended, but

(a) payment may be resumed with the month in which he returns to Canada,—

So far there is no objection. If we put "30" there I will support the bill, but here is the part I object to:

—and

(b) payment may be continued for any period he remains out of Canada after those six months if he establishes that at the time he left Canada he had resided in Canada for at least twenty-five years after attaining the age of twenty-one years

Twenty-five plus 21 is 46. Who receive pensions at the age of 46, except those who receive family allowances and the blind? Besides those people, there is nobody. Who made that calculation with respect to somebody being 46 years of age and receiving the old age pension?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It does not say that.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No, but I make my own interpretation. I will tell my honourable colleague from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that there are some youngsters of 21 who are just coming out of school and will not work, who are ready for the old age pension. It is unfortunate. It is sad. I will remind him also of a great man's theory on relativity. He spoke of the relativity of space. There is also the relativity of age. What saves some people who have quite a number of years behind them, even the age mentioned in the Scriptures, three score and ten, from being precisely old is that they are not senile, they are not decrepit and they keep their hearts young. It is quite depressing to hear so much about old age.

We know the story of the Good Samaritan who had a big heart and who went to help someone along the roadside who was suffering and abandoned by everybody. But the state is not supposed to be a Good Samaritan, although it is only fair that people who are unfortunate and who suffer, I would say, the injustices of life, should have all their troubles remedied to a certain extent, provided that they are old people, that they stay with us, that they do not deny and disown Canada. I am all for giving a chance to those who, upon the prescription of a doctor, have to live in a milder climate during the hard season. Six months is enough. Let us write "30" after paragraph (a) and let us not pass paragraph (b). This is for the good of everybody and for the satisfaction of our minds.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, I shall not detain the house long, but I do wish to speak briefly about the new portability principle of the bill to which the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has objected so vigorously.

The basic intent of the bill revolves around the right being acknowledged and given by Parliament to a Canadian who has reached the age of 70 and qualified for old age security payments to carry this benefit payment with him wherever he may go, provided that the person has contributed for 25 years to the economic growth and development of this nation and also contributed to the provision of the required tax revenues from which these payments were being made on the 2-2-2 and now on the 3-3-3 formula.

We might remember that at a previous session of Parliament we had agreed to a reduction of the previous 20-year residence qualification, which now stands at ten years. In other words, we have accepted as a matter of principle that ten years of contribution to the economic development of Canada and ten years of tax revenue contribution gives to the Canadian the right to receive old age security payments provided he continues to reside in Canada.

When the scheme was initiated we also accepted as an operative principle that this money should be spent at home, and we cut off these payments when a person left Canada, although on his or her return we permitted retroactive payments of three months which we increased in 1957 to a period of six months.

The present bill introduces a very important new principle. It amends the limitations on these out-of-country benefits and provides for full portability of these benefits, but only for those who have spent at least 25 of their productive working years in this country. Canadians who have not reached this 25-year minimum—and there were questions raised as to how these 25 years were arrived at—will still be subject to the former restrictions, with the important difference that payments will not be immediately suspended as before but will be continued for six consecutive months, not including the month when the person left Canada.

As I read the bill, the 25-year residence-in-Canada period is elastic in the sense that a pensioner with, say, 22 years of residence in Canada may live in Canada for three more years, and thus satisfy the full portability provision of this act. If my interpretation is incorrect, I hope that it will be corrected either here on the floor or in committee.

I am going to support this bill, because I want to believe that it will be of assistance to many Canadians who may, for reasons important to themselves, wish or need to reside elsewhere than in Canada for health reasons, for economic reasons or what have you. Having expressed my general support of this bill, which I find useful, sensible and reasonable as far as it goes, I feel that I must make these additional and, I hope, pertinent observations.

Honourable senators will remember that the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mrs. Irvine) gave a very careful and clear explanation of the basic reasons which are prompting the Government to make the amendments now before us. These reasons, if I may recapitulate them in an abbreviated form, hinge upon the proposition that these security benefits are earned by those who will receive them by the 25 years of productive effort and by the now nine years of specially withheld taxes. We were told that this legislation makes an effort to strike a balance between those who have earned this right to full portability and those who have not and whose pensions, as was stated, would be out of all proportion to the contributions they had made to the Old Age Security Fund and, I might add, to Canada's economic development.

My basic criticism of the legislative instrument which is to achieve this judicious balance is that it is inadequate, because it divides the "in's" and the "out's" somewhat very crudely and roughly. Please remember: ten years in Canada and you qualify; and, on the basis of this new amendment, you can then live approximately six to seven months outside Canada on a recurring annual basis. This means that with ten years of contributions you are entitled to spend half or a bit more of these benefit payments outside Canada. This new privilege or right you have earned, according to Parliament's new interpretation, if the bill passes in this form. If we accept the proposition that these benefits are earned, then I suggest in all sincerity that we ask ourselves whether we cannot evolve a better legislative instrument which would measure portability more effectively and more justly for those Canadian citizens who may have lived in Canada for 15 or for 20 years of their productive life. Why not, as the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) asked, have a progressive portability—if I understood him correctly. Why this arbitrary cut-off of 25 years?

I have this suggestion to make to the Government as an improvement of this bill. Why should a citizen who has lived in Canada for, say, 20 out of 25 years of his productive life not be entitled to say 20 twenty-fifths, or four-fifths, of his old age security benefit outside of Canada? One could argue that if ten years of residence in Canada entitles recipients to spend half and a bit more of their benefits outside Canada, then 15 years of productive work in Canada might entitle the recipient to spend 15 twenty-fifths, or three-fifths, of these benefits outside of Canada. It could be argued that only the more wealthy will be able to enjoy the financial freedom to leave Canada for six months of the year and still receive their monthly payments and come back again, while those who are poorer will simply be unable to take advantage of these relaxations. It could also be argued that many of these poorer people would benefit a great deal if they knew that they could leave Canada and go back to the United Kingdom, for example, to live with their children or relatives and receive some percentage of the benefits, the percentage that they have earned through their contributions of labour and taxes. I am interested in helping these older people, no matter how small their percentage might be, and I see no particular problem in working out this entitlement relationship.

For the sake of further argument—and we might remember that the honourable the sponsor of the bill stated that it is estimated that between 80 and 90 per cent of all pensioners will have no difficulty in establishing that they have 25 years or more of residence in Canada following their twenty-first birthday—suppose we refine this legislation further to make it possible to grant what I would term "in-between stages of portability on a sliding scale" to Canadian citizens. My suggestion is very simple. Beginning with 15 years of residence in Canada, why not have 50 per cent of the security payment fully portable at this level, this percentage increasing by 5 per cent for every additional year of residence up to 25 years, when the whole security payment would become fully portable, as this bill envisages? If this measuring device is too fine, perhaps some formula equally equitable could be devised.

Honourable senators, in concluding, I want to say once again that I support the legislation as far as it goes, and I make my suggestions to the Government on the same grounds that were advanced when this bill was introduced, namely, that these benefits are not gifts, they are not privileges, but they are really earned. If so, then I maintain that the percentage of portability of these benefits could be adjudicated with greater justice.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I trust it is the intention of the Government to refer this bill to a committee. In fact, I must insist, unless I am satisfied this evening that the bill is in the right form and need not go to a committee. There is one word in the bill which gives me considerable concern. I refer to the word "and" at the end of paragraph (a) of new clause 5(1), which provides that:

> Where a pensioner absents himself from Canada and remains out of Canada for six consecutive months, . . . payment of his pension for any period he continues to be absent from Canada after those six months shall be suspended, . . .

Well, that is clear enough. Then the clause continues "but"

> (a) payment may be resumed with the month in which he returns to Canada, and
> (b) payment may be continued for any period he remains out of Canada after those six months . . .

Does that mean that the old age pensioner who has been absent for six months from Canada must return to Canada, when payment of his pension will be resumed, and after that he can remain out of Canada a further period, provided he has spent 25 years in Canada? I am sure that is not the intention, but I am not sure that is not the only conclusion you can come to on account of the word "and" at the end of paragraph (a).

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is no objection whatever to the bill being referred to the proper committee for further study.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am bringing this to the attention of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) now so that he will have someone present in committee to clarify that point, which I think is important. I did not read the debate that took place in the other house too carefully, but I doubt if that point did receive consideration there.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

UNVEILING OF MARBLE PORTRAIT OF HON. CAIRINE R. WILSON

IN THE SENATE ANTECHAMBER, FRIDAY, JUNE 10, 1960, AT 5 O'CLOCK P.M.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Prime Minister and ladies and gentlemen, this is an occasion which happens only once. We are here today through the representations of a number of friends of Senator Wilson, through the kind co-operation of the Speaker of the Senate, with the support and interest of the Prime Minister, and the pride of the Clan Mackay, as evidenced by the presence of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario.

I was very happy to accede to the request of the committee to open these proceedings, but I can assure you that it is not my intention to make any comments on either the personal or the historic significance of this occasion. However, I do want to make a few remarks with reference to the co-operation of the Prime Minister, and to say to him how grateful we are that he has agreed to perform the very important function of unveiling this portrait. Of course, the interest of the Prime Minister in the public service of women is well known, and no one should know that better than I. But in addition to my own appointment and that of Senator Irvine, in the last three years there have been appointed to boards and commissions some twenty-two women; and Canada is now represented abroad by women in the respective capacities of one ambassador, two consuls and eight vice-consuls, all of which, I think, is significant and is tangible evidence of the great interest the Prime Minister has in the role which women can play in the service of their country.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is with a great deal of pride that I call upon the Prime Minister to speak now, and to officiate in this ceremony.

I present to you the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada.

Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Your Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, ladies and gentlemen, my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has mentioned the fact that this is indeed a unique and historic occasion, and it is well that we should recall the achievements of those who are entitled to national recognition while they live. Too often the things that we would say remain unsaid until the person about whom they are said is no longer able to hear them.

I am privileged to be here this afternoon and to join in doing honour to one who has made a great contribution to Canada. It is well to recall at this time that it was not so many years ago that there was grave doubt expressed as to whether women were persons. It was a matter of only 30 years ago when the question arose as to whether women could be appointed, or were qualified for appointment, to the Senate of Canada. That there was some divergence of view in that regard is indicated by the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada decided that women were not qualified. However, in those days there was a right of appeal to the Privy Council. That august body, after hearing the arguments advanced, decided that women were persons, thereby enabling the Upper Chamber to have that membership on the part of womenkind that we in the House of Commons even in those days had learned to appreciate through the membership of Agnes Macphail.

So it came that Mrs. Cairine Wilson was appointed to the Senate of Canada.

I think of those who participated in that valiant fight for recognition. And of course, without any prejudice whatever, may I say that all five were from Western Canada, one only of whom, the Honourable Irene Parlby, is living today. They made their contribution, they advanced their claims, they were recognized.

Then it came about as to who should be appointed to the Senate. I reveal no secret, that there are always available persons prepared to accept appointment to the Senate of Canada. I think that applies in every generation, regardless of the identity of the Prime Minister. But at that time there was one who stood out. Mr. Mackenzie King, the then Prime Minister, recommended the appointment of her whom we honour on this occasion.

Why should Senator Wilson have received the honour? Well, through the years she had taken a tremendous part in the service of her country, particularly in the field of recognition of the humanitarian necessity of assuring homes for refugees. In the public field she had been born into the atmosphere of Parliament. Her father was a member of the Senate—and again there is no bias when I point out that the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, the President of Clan Mackay, is here on this occasion in order to pay his unprejudiced tribute to the Clan Mackay. Senator Wilson's husband was a member of the House of Commons. In the field of international affairs she had been President of the League of Nations Society of Canada.

Those were worth-while contributions. But for myself, fine as those contributions were, I think of her as one who in the field of social and humanitarian service made a contribution as comprehensive as the numberless organizations in that field. I could name them. To do so would simply mean to name practically all those voluntary organizations which bring about the translation of the concept of brotherhood to those lesser privileged. In that field too Senator Wilson has made a contribution that is recognized throughout the world.

On this occasion, in performing a function which is a happy and privileged one for me, I know, Senator Wilson, that in recognizing you today in this way, that in the years ahead, long after you have left, men and women, as they pass this way, will recognize you as one of those who in your day made a contribution worthy of being remembered.

That is all I have to say; much more I could say. It is now my privilege to unveil this marble portrait of Senator Wilson. In doing so may I say my hope is that her life will be an inspiration not only to us living, but to generations yet to come.

(The portrait was unveiled.)

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Mr. Prime Minister, Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen—or may I say my friends, for I hope you are all my friends. After listening to the fine tributes from the Prime Minister I fear you are wondering who this amazing woman is. I could not believe that such praise would ever come to me. Agnes Macphail once said that she and I would be remembered by posterity, thanks to the work of Felix W. de Weldon. It is now true. Agnes Macphail is enshrined in bronze near the House of Commons, where she served so long and so well. But in my wildest dreams I never pictured my own image in the Senate antechamber to be unveiled by the Prime Minister of Canada in the presence of such a gathering.

I can only express my thanks, particularly to those few friends who organized this wonderful tribute.

It is true that I have been tremendously interested in the cause of the homeless. That I should have been the means of lending more succour to them, is a great joy today. I thank everyone who has had any part in these proceedings.

The Prime Minister alluded to the fact that there are now several women in the Senate. I regret that the Honourable Iva Fallis, who joined me here in 1936, is no longer with us; and I am sure we who are here today are indeed sorry that Senator Mariana Jodoin is ill and cannot be present. We all pray for her early recovery.

It has been a great joy and satisfaction to me to know, and to be assured by my colleagues of my own sex that I made the way more easy for them. My husband lived in constant dread that I should do something which would bring the family and my sex into disrepute.

All I can say is, I know that I am unworthy of the tribute you have paid me today.

Hon. Mark R. Drouin (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Prime Minister, in coming here this afternoon you have enhanced by your presence and by your eloquence the historic importance of this great occasion. We all know how heavily you are burdened each day by the affairs of the nation, but you give us proof every day of your dedication to your exalted position. You are always willing and even anxious, prompted by the natural generosity of your heart, to pay homage to Canadians, like Senator Wilson, who have served their country well. This is, I am sure, the reason for your presence here today. I express the sentiments of all those assembled here, including Senator Wilson, in telling you how grateful we are to you for being with us and making it possible for us once again to enjoy the superb gift of oratory which you possess to such a high degree. Speaking after you is never an easy task—that is why I prepared the text of my remarks—and I must admit that I always try to avoid it. Today this was, however, not possible, and I beg your indulgence.

Mr. Prime Minister, Your Excellencies, honourable Ministers, honourable colleagues, Members of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen, we are assembled this day to honour one of our company whom we hold in deep affection and respect.

The Honourable Cairine Reay Mackay Wilson completed recently thirty years in the public service of our country. Throughout this long and fruitful career she has won the esteem and admiration of all Canadians for her devotion to the common weal, the maturity of judgment and wisdom of counsel she has constantly displayed in the discussion of affairs of state, her successful initiatives for the relief of suffering and the redress of existing evils at home and abroad, her effectiveness as an advocate of social justice and security, and her personal qualities of charm, friendliness and dignity. We are grateful to her for her admirable contribution not only to the work of this house but to its reputation and prestige.

Her readiness to support actively any cause to further the betterment of her fellow citizens, her practical idealism and her dedication to human welfare and well-being, her gifts as an organizer and speaker would have marked her for a position of leadership in any field of endeavour. It was her good fortune and ours that she was given scope for her outstanding abilities, not only in this house, but in national and international organizations.

Many of Senator Wilson's qualities she no doubt owes to her Scots ancestry, and my honourable colleagues will pardon me a feeling of pride, on this occasion, for the Scots blood in my veins. If I may be allowed to carry on in this more personal vein, I am particularly gratified that Senator Wilson was born, as I was, in the province of Quebec, and that she was brought up, as I was, in the two main traditions of our country.

(Translation):

Not only, Madam Senator, have you enriched the French language with a new word, that of "sénatrice", but you have, by the dignity with which you bear it, given to this title an added distinction. You have been an inspiration to our women's associations who have helped raise the moral standards of the country and who have made a new contribution to social well-being. As their interest in social activity increases, our women realize more fully the part they are called upon to play individually and collectively. Increasingly conscious of their rights, of their duties and of their power on public opinion and on the laws of the land, through the exercise of their prerogatives as citizens in their day-to-day relations, women of today have a useful contribution to make to the solution of problems with regard to children, public health, housing, social justice, morality and the respect of spiritual values. Nationally, as well as internationally, you have, by wise and effective action, defended and advanced all the causes which you have espoused, in order to improve the lot of the poor, of the underprivileged, of the forsaken and of those whose personal activity has been curtailed by violence, injustice or unfortunate circumstances.

We are paying tribute, Madam Senator, to the qualities of heart and mind which have characterized your life and made of it a worthy model for Canadian women, whom you have represented in our Chamber for more than thirty years.

I deem it a signal honour, as Speaker of the Senate, to accept and to receive in this Chamber the magnificent work of art bearing your likeness and reflecting so faithfully the personality of one of the most distinguished members of the Senate, for whom we all have the greatest admiration.

(Text):

It gives me considerable pleasure and I am personally honoured to formally accept, in the name of the Senate of Canada, this magnificent marble portrait of Senator the Honourable Cairine Reay Mackay Wilson, to whom we all wish to formally convey the expression of our esteem and admiration.

I would now call upon His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Ontario, who belongs to the same clan as Senator Wilson and presides over its destinies. Your Honour, would you care to say a few words and bring these proceedings to a close?—Thank you.

Hon. John Keiller Mackay (Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Your Excellencies, Senator Wilson, ladies and gentlemen, the privilege of raising my voice on this auspicious occasion fills my bosom with sudden emotions, and my mouth with expressions, though imperfectly expressed, of respect, admiration and esteem for my friend and clanswoman, Senator Cairine Mackay Wilson. A devoted wife, loving mother, charming grandmother, and an adorable great grandmother, Senator Wilson, now in the very prime of her intellectual powers, continues to make a great contribution to the public life of this country. Her head is crowned not only with silver, but respect, admiration, esteem and love.

RAILWAY BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill C-61, to amend an Act to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of the proposed legislation is to extend for a further period of three years the provisions enacted in chapter 40 of the Statutes of 1958, which increased during the period of three years from January 31, 1958 the maximum contributions available from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund.

Honourable senators will no doubt remember that on September 2, 1958 I introduced a bill, No. C-52, to amend the Railway Act. At the beginning of my remarks on that occasion I said this:

> Honourable senators, I would like to give a brief explanation of this measure. It has mainly to do with section 265 of the Railway Act, which section was brought into force as far back as 1909 as an amendment to that act whereby Parliament set up a Railway Grade Crossing Fund which supplied not more than 20 per cent of the cost of any one railway grade crossing, the maximum amount being $5,000. This section, honourable senators, has been amended many times since: in 1914, 1919, 1926, 1928, 1929, 1938, 1947, 1950 and 1951, and perhaps at some other times of which I have no record. Every time an amendment was made to this section it was for the purpose of increasing the grant for any one grade crossing and also increasing the annual grants made by Parliament to this fund.

A little later in my explanation of that Bill C-52 I mentioned that there were certain other amendments, and I said:

> The first permits grants to be made from the fund toward the cost of placing reflective markings on the sides of railway cars ...
> The next amendment specifies the maximum contributions to be made to assist the railway companies with respect to the marking of sides of railway cars.
> The third amendment provides for the marking of sign boards at level crossings with reflective material.

These provisions in the 1958 legislation increased the contributions from the fund from 60 per cent to 80 per cent, with a maximum of $500,000, toward the cost of construction of works for protection, safety and convenience in respect of existing level crossings, and from 30 per cent to 50 per cent, with a maximum of $250,000, toward the cost of reconstruction of existing grade separations. These provisions also included similar percentages toward the cost of relocation of public utilities necessary for these works, and provided grants of 80 per cent of the cost of placing reflective markings on the sides of railway cars. The provisions applied to works authorized during a period of three years from the 31st day of January, 1958.

The reason why the present bill is necessary is that the three-year period will expire next January. It is proposed by this measure to extend these provisions for a further period of three years.

After the 1958 act was passed the Government voted an additional $10 million for that year over and above the statutory provision for an appropriation of $5 million, to be applied to works eligible for grants to the Railway Grade Crossing Fund. An additional $10 million was also voted in 1959.

Honourable senators will be interested in some further information as to what has been accomplished. With respect to the reflective markings on the sides of railways cars, much progress has been made up to the present time. Reflective markings had been installed on 3,770 box cars as of December 31, 1959. On May 1, 1960 the Board of Transport Commissioners ordered the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to mark 3,000 box cars each in 1960.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) be good enough to describe the kind of markings being put on these box cars?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not have that information at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. Wall: How would the total of 3,770 box cars that have been marked, together with the additional 6,000 to be marked in 1960, compare with the total number that are supposed to be marked, and how long is this work going to take?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot inform my honourable friend of the total number to be marked or how long it will take to mark them. One reason for extending the time for another three years is so that the work can be completed. After that period the railway companies can carry on the marking of the new cars, and the cost to them from that time on will be less.

Although the 1958 bill was not sent to committee for study I would not object to sending this bill to committee. If that is done, one of the Commissioners of the Board of Transport will be present to give detailed information.

When the 1958 legislation was before us the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) asked me some questions, which I replied to a day or two later. He inquired as to what extent reflective markers had been placed on box cars in the United States. I understand that the Great Northern Railway Company has marked all its railway box cars. Generally speaking, however, railways in the United States are not required by law to put reflective markings on their cars, but some of the companies have used reflective paint and reflective markings of their own volition and at their own expense.

Automatic protection installations were made at 600 crossings in the past two years. These consisted of flashing lights and bell at 549 level crossings and automatic gates with flashing lights and bell at 81 level crossings. Grade separations were made at 99 locations in the past two years. That work covered the following: 58 new grade separations, resulting in the elimination of as many level crossings, and 41 reconstructions of existing grade separations.

Honourable senators may also like to know how many applications for automatic protection and grade separations are now before the board. The applications are for automatic protection at 353 level crossings and grade separations to eliminate 58 level crossings, and reconstruction of 26 grade separations.

That is all the detailed information I have with regard to the work that has been done. However, the intention is to carry on with this work for another three years after the 31st day of January 1961. I am sure honourable senators know and believe the work is very important, owing to the large increase in the number of automobiles, trucks and other vehicles that are on the road day and night. People are continually being killed at level crossings, and many deaths have resulted from collisions of motor vehicles with trains having no reflective markings on the sides of the cars.

Honourable senators, that is a brief explanation of the bill which I am presenting today for second reading.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Do I understand that the percentage contributed by the federal Government is being increased from 60 per cent to 80 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It continues at the present rate.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: 80 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As I explained, the 1958 legislation increased the contribution from the Fund from 60 per cent to 80 per cent, and that is not being increased by the bill before us.

Hon. Mr. Higgins: May I ask the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a question? Subsection (2) of section 1 of the bill says:

> The total amount that may be applied towards the cost of placing reflective markings on the sides of railway cars shall not exceed eighty per cent of such cost, . . .

What about the other 20 per cent? Does this mean that the Government pays 80 per cent, and the railways 20 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is correct.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, we are indebted to the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for the interesting information he has given us about progress that has been made during the past few years in connection with the improvement of various level crossings and the additional grade separations that have been built.

I think the house will be unanimous in approving the extension of the time within which these additional contributions are to be made by the federal Government. We are simply following out a principle which, as the honourable leader said, has been incorporated in our legislation for a very large number of years, providing for contributions by the federal Parliament to the cost of these works.

I was interested in what the honourable leader had to say about reflective markings on freight cars. As I remember from the debate of two years ago, reflective markings on the sides of box cars are intended as a safety device at night to protect motorists who are approaching a level crossing where a freight train happens to be standing or to be going by. I suppose somebody has to start this thing, the placing of reflective markings on box cars, and this country has begun that, as the leader explained. In fact, as I think he said, the Board of Transport Commissioners has ordered two Canadian railways to continue placing these reflective markings on their box cars. But the difficulty is with regard to another matter that the leader discussed, and that is the situation in the United States because, as honourable senators know, the large majority of our freight trains consist to some considerable extent of box cars belonging to United States railroads. So where a train is standing at a level crossing at night and there are reflective markings on certain box cars and not on others, it may be that the danger to the motorist is thereby increased. In such a case he perhaps sees a reflective marking on each side of the level crossing, but the car which happens to be across the level crossing at the moment may be an American car and not bear reflective markings, so he thinks the road is clear.

I am glad that my honourable friend has suggested that this bill be referred to a committee for study, because I think we should get information as to the general policy that is to be adopted and as to the possibility that the United States might in due course follow the example which has been set by Canada and require, by legislation, that box cars of American railways shall have these reflective devices attached to them. Until that happens I think certainly the objective of the legislation will not be completely realized and conditions may be, for the time being, even more dangerous than before.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, unfortunately I was not in my seat when the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) commenced his explanation, and it may be that he has answered a question that I would like to put. I would like to know why this work was not done in the three years that have gone by. When we passed the statute of 1953 we were given assurance that this work could be completed in three years. A number of years have gone by and now another three years are asked for.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Just two years have gone by. The figures I gave as to completions were to the end of January last, and some 3,000 box cars have been ordered to be marked.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Only ordered? How many have been marked?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I gave the number that have been marked.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Two years is quite a long time to take to mark a few box cars. There are quite a number of box cars in Canada altogether, but only 3,770 have been marked. We passed this legislation in the first place because of the number of tragic instances where motorists ran into the side of railway trains, with results more disastrous to the motorists, perhaps, than to the railways. Now, I am not so complacent as my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) about giving another three years on top of the two years that have gone by, and another year besides—in all six years—to mark a few box cars.

With regard to American cars, I see no reason why markings cannot be hung, perhaps temporarily, on cars which cross the border into Canada. This protective device is a reflective marking, not an electric light or an oil light or something of that kind; it is merely a method of reflecting the motorist's own lights and giving him warning. I think somebody has been dawdling about this thing much too long and needs to be hurried up a bit.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not say that it is going to take another three years to mark these cars.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why then give the railways another three years to do this work? We are really allowing them four years more, because they have one year left of the three years that we originally allowed them. Why give them four more years to mark a few box cars?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I say that the big work to be covered by this legislation is the elimination of level crossings by the building of overpasses or underpasses, and that is a slow job.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I can understand that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The cost of constructing these structures runs into a lot of money—$500,000 for one, $300,000 for another, and maybe more than that for some others. The elimination of level crossings has been going on since 1909. The work is being done as fast as possible, but it is absolutely impossible to complete it throughout Canada in three more years. This work will no doubt be carried on to a greater extent than putting reflective markings on the sides of box cars.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In that case why do we extend the time for marking cars as well as for doing this heavier work?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We will find that out.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I can understand clearly why we do not force the railways to eliminate all level crossings within the next three or four years, but why should the work on level crossings delay the marking of box cars?

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I can appreciate what the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) has said about box cars owned by American railways being in the make-up of Canadian trains, but on the other hand, if we stop to think about this matter, surely it is an indictment of the motorists of Canada. Are they not able to discern obstructions in their road at nighttime? I would like to have some information as to the methods used in other countries to ascertain whether a person is capable of operating a motor vehicle safely. For instance, in Sweden, I understand, it is very difficult to secure a driver's licence. There an applicant is subjected to a thorough test which he must pass before he is allowed to take a motorcar on the road.

It does seem outrageous that a person in charge of a motor vehicle, perhaps loaded with passengers, would drive straight into the side of a moving train, or even a standing train. Surely a man who has proper control of his car, good eyesight and brakes that are working well, has little excuse for running into a train.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The problem exists only in bad weather.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Certain people in some provinces suffer from poor eyesight or are physically incapable of proper operation of a motorcar, yet they are issued licences year after year, and we hear of one accident after another.

There is something to be said for going to the expense of marking railway cars, but the railways are not always to blame for accidents at level crossings. I say the motorists themselves should exercise more care.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the vital and important part of this legislation, it seems to me, is the contribution it would make toward elimination of level crossings. This work has been going on now for a good many years. At the moment I have forgotten the number of level crossings in Canada, but the figure was given to a committee some years ago. The procedure has been to eliminate the most dangerous crossings first.

It is, of course, important to put reflector markings on freight cars so that they will show up at night, but we should not delude ourselves into thinking that if this is done it will result in absolute prevention of accidents at crossings. The human factor is ever present.

I recall many years ago when automobile traffic in Canada was but a fraction of what it is today and the use of the highways by trucks was largely unknown. On one occasion while travelling to Winnipeg with the then Chairman of the Board of Transport Commissioners—and, I may add, one of the ablest chairmen the board has had in its long history—we were discussing the matter of accidents. He told me it was remarkable the number of accidents that occurred in broad daylight by reason of motorists running into the side of moving trains. Clearly, such an accident is not the fault of the railway, although if there had been a grade separation at the point in question the danger would have been eliminated. But we sometimes overlook the important factor of the human equation in accidents. I am unable to explain why a man driving a motorcar on a straight road who sees a moving train would run into the side of it. But such accidents happen every year.

79955-1—52

I quite agree that the placing of reflectors on box cars would cause them to show up well in the light of the headlights of a motor vehicle, just as a highway sign will light up at night and stand out as a signal to motorists. But I am not under any delusion that the putting of reflectors on box cars is going to eliminate entirely the accidents that occur far too frequently. The important thing is the elimination of the crossings. The time may come, perhaps a good many years hence, when all crossings, or at any rate the more dangerous ones, will be replaced by overpasses or underpasses. This legislation, because it is definitely moving in that direction, is entitled to the support of the house.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I regret that I was absent from the chamber during the earlier part of this discussion.

We have had for many years regulations covering flashing light signals to protect railway crossings. What the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has just said is all too true, that the human element is at fault in a great many cases. But, as he added, the time may come when there will be no crossings. If traffic by airplane, buses and motor cars continues to grow, the railways may not operate in the future. However, at the moment they are with us, and we have to meet the dangers that exist.

My reason for rising is to explain to honourable senators a condition with respect to signals which I understand has existed for many years. Some time ago two men in Ottawa brought out a patent for a new railway crossing signal, which I thought had considerable merit. I am sure most honourable senators have noticed the type of warning the railways place at tunnels, which consists of a crossbar with cords hanging at a certain level from it. Those cords are placed there to warn a worker on top of a railway car who may have his back turned and not know that the train is approaching a tunnel. When he feels the cords he knows he is at the tunnel and he ducks down.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: A low bridge.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Thank you. That is the correct expression, a low bridge. The warning gives him time to bend down and thus save his life.

The men to whom I refer took up this idea and perfected a model for use at level crossings, in the form of two arms extending over the highway at a certain height, with cords hanging down over the highway. When a car approached the crossing it would be faced with the cords, and even if the driver was not entirely sober he would realize that he was approaching a railway crossing and should take care. These men came to me and asked if I would help them put their idea across. I said I would. However, I learned to my amazement that signal devices for use on railways are controlled exclusively by interests in the United States. It is a closed corporation, and I found that they would not even look at the new invention.

At some time in the future a committee might do well to look into this question and see if some other arrangement could be made. If improved signals were devised they might save many lives. True, they would not prevent all accidents, because men will always do foolish things. It is a well known fact that, strange as it may seem, motorcars have run into, not the front of a train, but the tail end of it, thinking it had passed by. I bring this information to the attention of honourable senators.

I thought I should mention to honourable senators that if this bill goes to committee I will ask something about the combine that controls the present signalling system of the railways. I learned in Ottawa a few years ago from the railway companies that there could be no change because the signals are under licence from certain companies in the United States. I place that before you honourable senators, for whatever it is worth.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The idea of the men you mention would be to leave those bars there permanently on either side of the highway?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes. If a man ran through them, neither he nor his car would be injured. However, the railways are not willing to look at some new type of signal while the present combine is in existence.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: It has been said that the federal Government will pay 80 per cent of the cost and the railways 20 per cent. However, sometimes the provincial departments of highways are concerned in this matter. Does the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) think that under this legislation the federal Government can arrive at an agreement with the provinces and the railways?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think this does not concern the railways alone.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not think the total cost of eliminating level crossings is paid for in the proportions that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) suggested. I know that the municipalities involved have to pay a very substantial portion, and that is the reason for the delay in many of these matters.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: As a matter of fact, the bill says that the federal Government shall pay an amount not to exceed 80 per cent of the cost, so in fact it may be less than 80 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It does not say who pays the rest.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am assuming that the amounts paid are subject to negotiation between the railways, the Government and the municipality involved, because many of these highways over which there are level crossings are built, not by the provinces but by municipalities. I think municipalities are involved in a large number of these level crossing matters where there is negotiation as to the amount of money to be put up by each one of the parties concerned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt, for Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 8, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Robertson, who drew to the attention of the Senate:

1. The desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group who are presently examining ways and means of achieving closer economic co-operation, and in particular with the U.S.A., and the two Europeans trade blocs, the Inner Six and the Outer Seven, for the progressive removal over a period of years of trade obstructions in order that our ability to trade profitably will be maintained and increased through

(a) the progressive reduction of our costs of living and production; and

(b) the progressive reduction of specific obstacles to our exports that may presently exist, and to guard against the creation of new ones.

2. That by becoming closely associated economically with their 500 million peoples, we will remove the tragic possibility of Canada's becoming isolated from the great modern currents of trade and commerce. By our precept and example we will contribute to removing the possibility of a trade war developing between the two sides of the Atlantic, a development that the Soviet Union fervently hopes for and which might well enable the communist world to accomplish economically what they have failed to do militarily.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, in supporting the argument that has been presented to the Senate by my honourable colleague from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) I am sure we all appreciate the contributions he has made to this subject of improved international trade relations. I thank him warmly for the repeated statements he has made during this session, and previous sessions, bearing on this subject.

I do not intend to stress or repeat the points he made in his address of a week ago. I do agree, though, with his repeated warnings about the serious consequences to Canada of the impending threat of competition from those countries abroad which seem determined to organize themselves into closed trading groups.

Owing to developments in Paris and London since the honourable senator from Shelburne spoke here a week ago I shall have to modify somewhat our approach to this subject as contained in the first paragraph of the motion which assumes that the twenty-nation group of which he spoke will embrace the union of the so-called Inner Six and Outer Seven. The word that has come from London, and to which I shall refer later, reveals the fact that there does not seem to be much hope at present, at any rate, of any such union between the Inner Six and the Outer Seven resulting from the meeting in Paris.

However, my purpose in sharing in this discussion today is to give, if possible, a certain perspective to the course of international negotiations and agreements during these past twenty years revealing some of the high aspirations and much of the irony, which, since 1945, have characterized a gradual decline from a high level of idealism to one of rather halting performance. That decline seems at times to be almost turning gallant and devoted allies in the common cause of the last war into bitter and uncompromising rivals, and even enemies in the ruthless competition for the trade and commerce of the world. It is suggestive, really, of all that happened to destroy the aims and objects of the League of Nations after the First World War, and in this, I submit, we are all facing an arraignment and a challenge of which we should be fully conscious.

This is not a partisan matter. That might be, possibly, one good reason for associating the Senate with a positive effort to have this country exert its influence as definitely as possible in reviving the belief and conviction in the declarations which were given to the world at the beginning and at the end of the last war. I shall be as brief as I can in outlining some of the outstanding expressions of international policy with which the world has been made familiar during the past two decades, and on behalf of which its representative leaders have given united support.

I have here at hand the official documents and the texts of those main agreements, and if any honourable senator would like to have an exact reference I shall be pleased to give it to him; otherwise I shall limit this review to a summary of those texts. I might add that any of them are available at any time to honourable senators at the library of the Department of External Affairs.

Firstly, I am sure most of us remember that historic meeting of the British Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Sir Winston Churchill, with the President of the United States, the late Franklin Roosevelt, off the shores of Newfoundland in August 1941. There the Atlantic Charter was drawn in eight clauses and given to the world over the signatures of those two great leaders. The fourth and fifth clauses of that document are important, and I shall quote them, as they are short and to the point.

Clause 4 reads:

> They (meaning their countries), will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all States, great or small, victorious or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world, which are needed for their economic prosperity.

Clause 5 expressed:

> desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.

One month later at an inter-allied meeting in London the Governments of Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, the U.S.S.R., and Yugoslavia, and representatives of General de Gaulle, leader of Free France, made known their adherence to the principles set forth in the Atlantic Charter.

The first clause of that joint declaration read that their common aim was:

> to secure that supplies of food, raw materials and articles of prime necessity should be made available for the post-war needs of the countries liberated from Nazi oppression.

Associated with the countries I have named here in connection with that London conference, which in effect provided for the reprovisioning of Europe after the war, were the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa.

My third reference is to this side of the Atlantic even before the United States formally entered the war. The President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, in what became known as the Hyde Park Agreement, pledged their respective countries:

> to provide each other with defence articles which each country could best produce, and that production programs should be co-ordinated to this end.

Later an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States provided for the continuation of the principles of the Hyde Park Agreement into the post-war period, with special reference to the problem of reconversion of industry. Indeed, embodied in the written terms of the so-called lend-lease agreements, which accompanied so much interchange of goods between Canada and the United States during the war period, was the clause providing for the continued free exchange of the products so affected after the end of the war.

Next came the formation of the United Nations Organization in 1945 and the writing of the United Nations Charter. One of the outstanding features of the Charter was the provision for the establishment of special agencies such as the I.T.O., the International Trading Organization. The purpose of that organization, as everyone knows, was to further a freer exchange of goods throughout the world.

Without attempting at this time to enumerate the several international conferences which were held under the auspices of I.T.O., and the persistent progress which was made towards a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, now known as GATT, it can be said that this agreement represented the culmination of all the efforts that had been made in this direction after the declaration contained in clause 4 of the Atlantic Charter.

Out of the United Nations meeting in New York in 1947 emerged the Marshall Plan, which was described at that time by the London Economist as an unprecedented example in the history of the world of practical idealism and imaginative creativeness. Under that plan some $23 billion of credit to be applied over a period of five years was extended to help those countries which had been devastated by operations of war, to enable them to rebuild their industries and bring new life to millions of stricken peoples. This represented what was generally recognized as a great pump-priming enterprise, apart from, but in furtherance of, the organized aims of GATT.

In his speech at Harvard University in June 1947 the Honourable George C. Marshall, then Secretary of State in the Government at Washington, in outlining his plan for the relief of Europe—prior to its being placed before the United Nations Council—stipulated that the application of it must depend upon the initiative of Europe itself. The program should be a joint one, agreed to by a number, if not all, of the European nations. That initiative was taken by the Right Honourable Ernest Bevin, Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, and M. Georges Bidault, the Foreign Minister of France, which led to the establishment of an administrative organization to handle the Marshall Plan for European economic co-operation known as O.E.E.C.

By the time one has followed the developments over ten to twenty years it is almost necessary to attach to one's study a key list to interpret the capital letter initials of the names used to describe these different organizations. If I happen, therefore, to use one or two of these designations in passing I hope I may be pardoned if I do not also at the same time explain the full significance of these terms.

It is out of this European administrative organization, O.E.E.C., that the present movement toward co-operative reciprocal trade amongst twenty nations in the Atlantic area, including Canada and the United States, was recently started. We are also seeing today the results of the rebuilding that has been done through the O.E.E.C. in the years that have passed since the introduction of the Marshall Plan to Europe. The increasing volume of exports of manufactured goods to the shores of North and South America during the past five years from countries like Italy, France and West Germany tells its own story. It is this kind of result, incidentally, which tempts some people so often to declaim about the futility of war and to conclude that the victor in the long run becomes the loser in the ruthless game of commerce and trade. At any rate, the economic and financial recovery of these countries has been so great that they are practically independent of further financial aid from America at this time.

Finally, there is NATO, which was formed in 1949, and in which Canada took a leading formative part. The fateful second Article of that Treaty "sought to eliminate conflict over international economic policies, and to encourage economic collaboration" amongst the signing nations in the North Atlantic Organization. Within the past year, NATO, as a solvent of international economic problems and a promoter of trade, has pretty well discarded its responsibilities under Article II. NATO as a military defence shield to the free world still exists, but the incompatibility of military operations and strategy, with the more peaceful objectives of international trade, seems to have been effectively and lamentably demonstrated. Possibly there has been a need for closer co-ordination of effort between NATO and O.E.E.C., which had charge of the administration of the Marshall Plan. At any rate, the world is now to be presented with a new trading arrangement identified with the so-called Committee of Twenty, to which I have referred, and which has been described by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson). Intervening the other day, our own Prime Minister called for a reorganization of NATO, presumably for defence purposes. Dr. Spaak, of Belgium, is due to come to Canada shortly to discuss the NATO situation with our Prime Minister. One does not need to stress further the object of this organized group of twenty nations representing practically all members of the Atlantic Community and including those which are marked as isolationist blocs in Western Europe. Suffice it to say that this would appear to be a final, broad co-operative effort to give fruition to those hopes and aspirations which were expressed by Churchill and Roosevelt in the Atlantic Charter, and repeated in the Charter of the United Nations at the end of the war. It has still to prove its existence and establish a working organization. Problems of finance and exchange have still to be solved and explained, and a sound basis of union between the blocs of Six and of Seven has still to be defined.

During the last days of the past week we had intimation in the public press that Britain had decided to join the European Common Market group of six countries and to attempt a consolidation with the group of Seven known as the European Free Trade Association. This turned out to be wrong, as the events of a few days later proved. At the same time as the publication of this so-called news item, Canada had its representative attending a meeting in Paris of the Committee of Twenty to carry forward its plans for a scheme of reciprocal trade extending over a period of five years. The latest word of enlightenment upon this whole situation comes in a report from Paris in the London Times, which indicates that the bloc of Six is not disposed to unite with Britain and the other members of the group of Seven. The exact statement, dated from Paris on June 10 in this report, is as follows:

> The twenty-nation trade committee today gave its full approval to yesterday's agreement to set up a study group to examine the short-term difficulties arising from the tariff changes of the Six and the Seven. The group will meet in Paris on about July 7 and is expected to report back to the trade committee by about the middle of September. The full committee will then meet again before the end of September.

That was the final conclusion of a meeting which had been assembled on the previous day, and from which this report was issued:

> The six members of the Common Market made it perfectly clear at the meeting of the twenty-nation trade committee here today that they are not yet prepared to face any long-term solution of the Six and Seven problem in Europe. This, therefore, has dashed all the immediate hopes of any form of association in which Britain and the other members of the Seven might enter into a larger European trading group. The Six, in fact, have not responded, as was hoped in London to the terms of the Seven's offer to examine any way in which the Seven might join the customs union of the Six.

A little further on the article continues:

> For the moment any idea of accommodation between the Six and Seven must be shelved and the British Government's recent decision to adopt a far more flexible policy towards the Six (even to the extent of considering entering the customs union of the Six) has not met with any ready response. The French view, it is obvious, in spite of President de Gaulle's recent speech, remains unchanged.

Then the dispatch concludes that these Geneva talks are likely to continue far into 1961.

In the light of these considerations, surely the time has come when the Government of Canada should state a definite position in relation to these matters. What, one might add, will be the consequences of failure this time, if the proposals of reciprocal trading amongst the member nations in the proposed group of Twenty fall by the wayside? And as indicated by the results of the recent meeting in Paris there is no disposition on the part of the group of Six to have to do with the Outer group of Seven or any other nation. As I endeavoured to suggest in this chamber a year or so ago, in connection with another discussion introduced by my honourable colleague, Canada may have to find temporary refuge at least in seeking a western hemisphere bloc of her own, in which the United States and countries of South America would be associated. At the present time 75 per cent of our total trade is done in this area. Ultimately, I believe, the force of resistance of these different blocs to each other will effect a breaking down of such international barriers and a return to a larger measure of world trade. Meanwhile, the trend today partly suggests a repetition of the history of the mercantilist system of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries when Mediterranean countries, and later the Netherlands, controlled trade and much of the world's wealth. Fortunately for the future progress of the world, that system ultimately yielded before the enlightened teachings of Adam Smith, and the practical application of his doctrine of international trade by the British people under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel and Cobden and Bright. I think that historical period is worth remembering at this time.

In conclusion, one might suggest that the role of the governments of democratic countries would be expected to reflect the undisputed collective desire of their respective peoples for a more peaceful and a more co-operative existence in the world. Can anyone seriously dispute the claim that the rank and file of people anywhere look forward hopefully to a settlement of international conflict and a resumption of normal human relations, uninterrupted by threats of atomic warfare? If it were possible to register even approximately by referendum the will of the people who vote to elect governments throughout the world, regarding this issue of peace and war either hot or cold, can anyone doubt the overwhelming result in favour of adopting the simple principles of a good neighbourhood? Political leaders seem to yield to measures of local expediency and nationalistic demands rather than to the basic obligations of solemn world engagements. The power of special political interests at home still seems to be paramount; and at the present time those countries which entered into the membership of the United Nations with the gleam of a new free world on the horizon seem to be getting, as the years go by, farther away than ever from their united goal.

As I have indicated, from latest reports from Paris, the future of the group of Twenty is fraught with increasing uncertainty. But from the written records of those who have been scorched by fires of disappointment in their efforts on behalf of great causes in the past, and still have kept the faith, it is possible to find declarations of encouragement and hope in the face of threatened adversity. One of these is from the pen of the late Colonel Edward House, the unselfish and devoted author of the League of Nations Covenant, which was championed so valiantly by President Woodrow Wilson years ago. Colonel House died in 1938, but he lived long enough to chronicle words spoken and things seen during the Paris Conference of 1919. At the end of his memoirs he wrote:

> As I look at the wild world with which we are confronted today, I still find comfort in some words of Thomas Carlyle: "Nothing that was worthy in the past departs; no truth or goodness realized by man ever dies, or can die; but it is all still here, and lives and works through endless changes."

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, trade is indeed a matter of great concern to all of us, and the honourable sponsor of this discussion (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and all those who have spoken on the matter deserve our commendation, but I hope that I will be permitted to disagree with them entirely, and I will qualify my point of view.

The purpose of the motion is to express the desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation Group. That would mean a multilateral agreement, and a multilateral agreement in trade cannot be profitable to a small country like Canada.

I remember the time when the then Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce was advocating multilateral agreements, and it gave him the importance of diplomacy and he finally finished his career as an ambassador. I will not say that he had that end in view when he advocated multilateral agreements. He was not the one who discovered them. They had come from the defunct League of Nations, which has been succeeded by the United Nations.

I have visited the United Nations building at my own expense, honourable senators, and I was the only one of the parliamentarians who paid for his trip to New York to visit that huge building and see the reclining chairs, the comfortable chairs, the cheap drinks, etc., and the people who were walking around like illustrious Russian dancers. I was not impressed at all. I saw that the building was full of people who were not the accredited representatives of any particular nation—Canada, for one, had all its representatives in the office of the Consul General in New York—acting as if they were the direct descendants and legitimate heirs of all the bureaucrats of the defunct League of Nations. They try to make themselves helpful and they make varied suggestions, in order to guild their blazon and their shield, and these multilateral agreements are their fanciest and most cherished schemes.

How is it possible for a country like Canada to be side by side with the United States, with England, with France, with any of the big countries of the world? There are only two groups of nations with whom we can deal separately. They are the Inner Six and the Outer Seven, which are mentioned in this particular motion.

I understand that if Canada wants to trade with the Inner Six it is very easy to start the preliminaries. Right here in Ottawa are the ambassadors, who are mostly trade agents, and it is very easy for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and for his officials, to get in touch with every one of the foreign representatives of the Inner Six nations. Then it would be possible for Canada to enter into trade agreements, profitable trade agreements for both sides, for they cannot be profitable for one side only.

I am all for bilateral trade, and when some nations group themselves together to abolish all trade barriers it is evident that we must deal with them separately—that is, with the group separately. I mean we must deal separately with the Inner Six and separately with the Outer Seven. That is the way to achieve results.

That is a point of view which I have thought of for a long time and which I am glad to have the opportunity to express. I have in my files upstairs a very good report of a speech made on trade at the beginning of the year by no less renowned a gentleman than Mr. Crump, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who is surely well informed on the subject. He warned us about the future. So did another gentleman who is well known in Canada, Mr. Ashforth, President of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. These men are very much concerned about what will ultimately happen to our trade.

If Canada makes an agreement with the Inner Six or the Outer Seven, Great Britain and the United States will have nothing to do with the dealings of our country with those two groups. It is our own business, the business of Canada. I warn the Government to be very careful about the agreements it signs, which have to receive the sanction of the big powers. It is a matter of great concern to us.

And what about South America? We have trade possibilities there. We can go there. Brazil is developing very fast, as are other South American countries. Will we have to get the permission of Great Britain or the United States or any other country to deal with them? I remember the time when Mr. Mackenzie King refused—it was in the month of August of 1940 or 1941—to deal with them because Canada was not a republic. Imagine the silliness of the argument, that Canada, not being a republic, could not deal with South American republics or join them in a Pan-American union. There was an argument made at that time. I remember that another member of Parliament, an English-speaking member from Ontario, and I protested the contention. It was a long time ago, some 20 years ago, that we advocated trade with South America, but nothing was done about it. We have our ambassadors there, but what are they doing? We had one ambassador there who wasn't worth his shirt. He was not qualified as an ambassador, but he was sent there. The least we can ask of our ambassadors is that they help us to trade. I am sure all honourable senators would agree with that. They cannot help us much with regard to defence, international peace and such things, but they can help us with regard to trade, and to be successful they must have the backing of the Government.

Now, it is very easy to recite what the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt said, but he is gone; or to recite what President Woodrow Wilson said, but he too is gone. They all are gone. We can't live with the dead. We must live with our contemporaries. I would not depreciate the memories of those great men, but what is the use of mentioning what they said at conferences ten, twenty, thirty years ago? The world is changing, and we must be of our own times. We must have enough imagination to find a plan to improve conditions in Canada and to prevent disaster.

Naturally, everybody knows, as the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) so appropriately said, that the United States, Canada and other countries of the world helped those countries which were destroyed by war, in order to make them self-supporting. They are now self-supporting, and they do not need us as they once did. And who expects any gratefulness for what has been done to help those countries to recover? No one! The only thing they will listen to will be statements that it is to their own interest to trade, not with the United States, not with England, but with Canada. Instructions to this effect should be given to every representative of Canada abroad, from the ambassador down to the lowest clerk. They should be instructed to promote and develop the interests of Canada, just as the Russians do. And what merchant navy do the Russians have? Apparently it is not so big, but that country succeeds in trading with the whole world. It is not because it is a communistic nation that we cannot follow its example. It has given us a good example with regard to trade, and we have no reason not to follow it.

I have very deep convictions about this, and I do not intend to depreciate the representatives of Canada abroad. There may be good men among them now, although there have been men of a different kind. There are now good men who try to promote the trade of Canada.

One thing I must say to the credit of Mr. King is that as soon as he returned to power in 1935 he made use of all the work that had been done to prepare a treaty with the United States, and to have it signed by the President of that country and by himself. I thought it was quite an improvisation, but he explained to me that the matter had been worked upon for a long time, and therefore he made the great announcement that Canada was willing to trade with the United States and any other nation of the world, that Canada was an independent trading nation. When people speak of free trade it is important to make the distinction that free trade is not only abolition of the obstacles of tariffs, though it has for the most part been understood as that until now.

At this point I want to pay homage to my colleague the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), who was Minister of Trade and Commerce when that treaty was signed with the United States. It was the right thing to do. It did create a commotion to the benefit of Canada, and that was a good point.

To return to what I was saying about freedom of trade—by having free trade I mean being free to trade with any other country, with no obstacles in the way. At the present time we have an obstacle, and that is the agreement that has been signed with the United States and which prevents our trading with a country behind the Iron Curtain.

I have quoted great names; I will quote another one. It will not be flattery, because this man is dead, but he survives in our memory. He was one of the greatest bankers of Canada. I refer to Mr. James Muir, who was President and Chairman of the largest Canadian bank, the Royal Bank of Canada. He took the trouble to go to Communist China with one of his aides, and he made a report, with illustrations. His findings were contained in the report of the Royal Bank of Canada, and in them he showed the possibilities of trade where nobody had gone. Naturally, Great Britain is trading with Hong Kong, but Communist China wanted to trade with Canada and it could not do so. The other day at a committee of the Senate I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs how it was that Canada was not free to trade with any other nation of the world on account of an agreement that had been signed with the United States. It was slavery in trade. It was, to use an expression in the motion, trade obstruction. We are not free.

We have an open market in China. At least, we had it; perhaps we have lost it now. I do not know, because I am not familiar with the present situation. But we had great openings in China, and we could not do anything, because it would have displeased the United States. Canada cannot claim to be a great country when it is the vassal of the United States in a matter as important as trade.

Let us see, honourable colleagues, what openings there would be for us if the largest populated country in the world were trading with Canada at a time when the United States was unwilling to go there. We had an open market, but because we had signed an agreement of some kind, and because that agreement still exists, we cannot deal with them. As the emperor Vespasian said, "Money has no odour." Naturally, the Canadian people would benefit largely from the expansion and progress of our trade in any country of the world. I must pay a particular tribute to the memory of Mr. Muir who was an independent thinker, and who had very great experience in banking and trade, and who took the trouble to show the way to the Canadian Government. But, now, as lawyers say in court, with all due deference and respect, I find this motion futile. It is futile because we can go nowhere. It would be a journey to nowhere to try to accomplish something in the matter of improving our trade with the assistance of twenty other competing nations. This is what I wanted to tell you, honourable colleagues.

Perhaps it is still too early to speak like this, but the years to come will prove to you that what I am saying on this 15th day of June 1960 is not without solid foundation. You have too much experience not to realize it, but your minds may be blurred by the propaganda that has been made for the United Nations, for NATO, etc. You might say, as Asquith did: "Well, we must wait and see. Times will be better." Times will be better if you make them better. It is upon you that the country relies, and the Senate can do more than the House of Commons in warning the Government against all dangers in trade. Very often farmers from the west ask for more subsidies for their wheat, for assistance in transportation, etc. Why? It is because they have quantities of unsold wheat. We have quantities of unsold goods that could be sold in all countries of the world with great benefit to Canada and to the Canadian people.

Having said that, I will not keep you any longer. That is enough for now, but I will have other opportunities of bringing this to your attention, because I respect you and I rely on you, for the good of the country. You are independent. You are all independent. You are wise men and women of great experience and great knowledge, and I am sure that if you unite in deciding that Canada should make her own decisions with regard to trade, should make her own approach individually to each one of the important groups that have been mentioned and each one of the other nations, then you will have the satisfaction of having accomplished your duty, and you will have the joy of seeing the good results of your work.

On the other hand, to conclude—I do not often conclude, but I will; as a rule I leave it to your intelligence, honourable senators, for you to draw your own conclusions—I will mention the alternative. If you do not agree with the ideas I have submitted to you in all deference, then the only thing to do will be to move to reduce all the expenses of Canadian representation abroad to one dollar.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Wall, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Before the house adjourns can the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) tell me if he expects to proceed tomorrow with the five Government bills listed on the Order Paper?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was just about to make a statement concerning the business of the Senate for tomorrow. Honourable senators will see from a perusal of the Orders of the Day for Thursday, June 16 that the Estate Tax Bill, the bill with respect to capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System, the Excise Tax Bill, the Customs Tariff Bill, and the International Boundary Commission Bill are set down for second reading. These are all Government bills, and I would like to have them placed at the head of tomorrow's Order Paper so that they can be proceeded with as expeditiously as possible. I propose to proceed tomorrow with the second reading of the Estate Tax Bill, the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Bill and, if there is time, the International Boundary Commission Bill. One reason why I am anxious to get on with the last-named bill is that a witness whom we want to appear in committee will be unavailable after the end of next week because he will be leaving Canada. I understand he intends to show in committee a film to illustrate how the boundary markings are set up. I think this would be very interesting to honourable senators, and therefore I should like to have this bill go to committee not later than Thursday next.

Honourable senators, I would ask that the Government bills be placed at the head of the Orders of the Day for tomorrow.

Some hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 16, 1960

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-71, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine tabled:

Exchange of correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Provincial Governments, including Resolutions passed by the Quebec Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, concerning the amendment of section 99 of The British North America Act, 1867. (English and French texts).

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING PROPOSED AMENDMENT RE TENURE OF OFFICE OF JUDGES TO BE PRINTED IN MINUTES

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved, with leave of the Senate:

That the exchange of correspondence between the Government of Canada and the provincial Governments concerning the amendment of section 99 of the British North America Act, 1867, tabled this day, be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is to have those documents available next week when the motion for amendment of the British North America Act will be dealt with.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-63, to amend the Old Age Security Act, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without any amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Olive L. Irvine moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

RATES OF DUTIES TO BE PRINTED IN MINUTES

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved, with leave of the Senate:

That a table setting out the rates of duties provided for in Bill C-74, intituled "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff", and the corresponding rates in effect prior to the 1960 Budget, be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the motion is adopted I should like to say that this is a very excellent step and I feel we are all indebted to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for having this material printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. It means that when we come to consider the amendments to the Customs Tariff Act we shall know what the situation was before the proposed amendments. In other sessions we have always complained that we did not know just what the changes were that we were studying. This is a big step forward and I hope it is the start of a practice which will be followed in the future.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 21st day of June, 1960, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

ESTATE TAX BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson moved the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the Estate Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure that we will all recall the passage of the Estate Tax Act at the session two years ago, particularly because it had a very thorough and, I deem, searching consideration by this body, and by the Banking and Commerce Committee, at that time. Consequently, I am happy to be able to say now that some of the amendments involved in the amending bill I am now presenting were adopted in this house at that time and strongly urged upon the Government, but were not accepted then. I refer particularly to one section of the act which I shall come to later on.

The present amending bill, namely, Bill C-65, is a result of the experience in the operation of the statute since its coming into force on January 1, 1959. Several of the amendments are the direct result of recommendations made to the Government, or more particularly, perhaps, to the Treasury, by responsible organizations such as the Canadian Bar Association and other bodies.

I propose to deal with the bill as briefly and succinctly as possible. I intend to propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for detailed examination, for I suggest that the committee is perhaps a more appropriate forum for such detailed examination than this house. I say that because of the very technical nature of the subject-matter in bills of this kind. We shall have present in committee the officers of the department concerned, who will give a full explanation of the various sections of the bill. However, as indicated, I will now briefly examine the sections of the bill and try to explain them.

The first section deals with the proceeds of insurance policies, and implements one of the paragraphs of the Estate Tax resolutions presented in the other place, which reads as follows:

> That there be included in computing the aggregate net value of the property passing on death any amount payable under a policy of insurance effected on the life of the deceased for the benefit of the family of the deceased, where such policy, immediately prior to the death, was owned by the employer of the deceased.

I am sure you will all recall that some sections of the act deal quite fully with the question of proceeds of insurance policies but, as so often happens, there was apparently a loophole in the act with regard to a certain type of ownership of a policy of insurance. That loophole is being filled by section 1.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Does it increase or decrease the tax?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am just coming to that.

It appears that under the present act if a policy of insurance is technically owned by a person's employer, then even though the proceeds of the policy upon death are payable to a person's estate or family, such payments would be exempt from the estate tax.

I think it is clear that here is a loophole in the act which, as I said a moment ago, requires to be filled. In other words, under the act there is obviously great scope for persons making appropriate arrangements with their employers which would deprive the treasury of very considerable revenue to which it is fairly entitled. So much for Section 1.

Section 2 is perhaps the most complicated and technical amendment in the bill, relating as it does to the method of determining the value of the consideration for property disposed of by a deceased during his lifetime in consideration of an annuity. As the section deals with such a technical subject I am going to suggest that such detailed consideration of it as may be required be made in committee rather than here. I might add that the amendment remedies what is deemed to be a serious flaw in the present act. I am referring here to subsection 1 of Section 2.

I come now to subsection 2 of section 2. This is a relieving provision. Under the original section there apparently is some possibility that under certain conditions property passing to a beneficiary under a will might be liable to be assessed for duty twice. The present section makes sure that there could not be double taxation of that kind.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Good.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In other words, the amendment is for the purpose of relief against such a contingency.

Subsection 3 of section 2 is merely for the purpose of making subsections 1 and 2 applicable in each case from the commencement of operation of the act, which was, as honourable senators know, January 1, 1959.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In that respect it is retrospective?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. These are really curative sections and they are retrospective to January 1, 1959.

Section 3 is also a relieving provision and results from representations made in a brief which was presented to the minister some time ago by the Canadian Bar Association.

In regard to section 4, subsection 1, this amendment has reference to the value of a gift made by a testator and concerns the question whether a gift is an absolute one or not. Some gifts, whether contained in a will or made during a person's lifetime by an appropriate document, may not appear absolute but are in fact so. That is, the gift may never reach the intended donee because of the fact that it has been used up by the beneficiary in accordance with rights conferred in the will or document. The amendment makes it possible for a defeasible gift to be made indefeasible within a year of death, in which event it will become allowable for exemption in the usual way. That is applicable to cases where the gift eventually goes to a charitable organization or would be otherwise exempt from tax by reason of the nature of the donee.

Furthermore, the amendment defines more precisely what constitutes a charitable organization in Canada. Apparently there has been some doubt whether gifts made to, say, a foundation, which does not itself engage in charitable activities are exempt from estate tax. For example, it is suggested that there is some doubt as to whether a gift made to the Atkinson Foundation, which in turn makes gifts to charities but does not itself engage in charitable work, would be exempt from estate tax. This section clears up that point and makes certain that gifts to such a donee do not attract estate tax.

I come now to section 5. Honourable senators may recall that when the act was in committee there was considerable criticism because of the fact that the appropriate section regarding the aggregate taxable value of property passing on death did not specifically indicate that any estate not exceeding $50,000 was completely and unequivocally exempt from tax. I am sure honourable senators who were in committee during those hearings will recall that one could only discover this fact by reading several subsections, and that it was felt the provision was not specific enough.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will that provision be made to apply as of January 1, 1959?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: There is no change in the law. This section clarifies and nails down in concise language the provisions in regard to the $50,000 exemption. I repeat, there is no change in the law, simply a clarification of it in respect of that particular feature.

Section 6 is an amendment in respect of situs of property. I think that any further explanation in that regard might more appropriately be made in committee. As honourable senators are aware, problems relating to situs are always of a technical character.

Then, section 7. The present act provides a limit of four years after which the minister may not make a reassessment of an estate, except of course in the case of misrepresentation or fraud. Under the proposed amendment the taxpayer may waive this four-year limit in appropriate circumstances. In other words, it provides a method by which the taxpayer may request a reassessment of the estate to be made after the period of four years. This is obviously a relieving section in favour of the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Would my honourable friend permit a question? Why would a taxpayer request an estate to be opened up after four years, unless possibly he was guilty of fraud and wanted to clear his conscience or avoid some penalty?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I think that will appear clear when I refer to the next section, which is similar in content.

I come now to section 8, to which I referred at the outset as being the part of the act to which this house took strenuous objection at the time of the passage of the original act. I recall that the objection to the law, as then stated, was led especially by the honourable senator from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard). I am happy to say that the views of the honourable senator and of those who supported him are to a large extent being adopted by this amendment. So section 8 is a relieving section. It was enacted as a result of additional representations made recently by the Canadian Bar Association and, I believe, by other bodies. It is mainly applicable in case of annuities or similar interests which at the time of the original assessment could only be valued according to tables of present values of annuities, and by taking into account the facts relevant at the date of death of the deceased. The revaluation will be permitted in cases where within four years of death an event occurs which makes possible a revaluation in the light of changed conditions. I think perhaps this will effectively answer the question asked by the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt). Changed conditions do occur, and as a result of such changing conditions in some cases the taxpayer may ask for a reassessment.

Section 9 is a procedural section dealing with the subject-matter of section 8.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Is this amendment not the opposite to section 7 of the bill, which would allow a four-year limit? The explanatory note to section 9 reads:

> This new subsection makes it clear that the minister may make a reassessment after receiving a notice of objection from the taxpayer even though four years have passed ...

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is correct. I said section 9 was procedural, because I think it is intended to be remedial right back to January 1, 1959, when the act came into force.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In any event, we can consider the matter when the bill is in committee.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes, it can be further considered in committee.

Section 10 is an amendment which also deals with rules for determining situs of certain property. Here again, I think there is little purpose in going into it more extensively at this time.

Section 11 also is a relieving section. As provided in the act a seized property, that is a property seized for non-payment of duty, had to be sold within 10 days of seizure. Under the amendment this period may be extended by the minister to 30 days, and I think provision is made to the effect that the sale is not mandatory in all cases.

Section 12 is largely procedural; that is to say, it does not affect the question of tax but deals only with the powers of the minister in regard to giving consent to the transfer of certain kinds of property by certain transferors, and, in particular, to the transfer of property in which the deceased did not have a beneficial interest at the time of his death. It also authorizes all insurances which do not exceed $900 to be paid over by the insurance company to the beneficiary thereof without either consent or notice to the minister. It is true that under the present provisions consent of the minister is not required for insurances up to certain amounts; but, apparently, in regard to the question of notice, there was a tremendous amount of paper work involved both by the department and the insurance companies, particularly in regard to small industrial insurance policies. At the time of payment of these small policies notice had to be given to the minister in each instance, and apparently that became quite a nuisance. Consequently, this section alleviates in that regard.

Section 13 deals with the Canada Council. Section 21 of the Canada Council Act specifically makes the Canada Council a charitable organization for the purposes of the former Dominion Succession Duty Act. Instead of amending the Canada Council Act, the Estate Tax Act is amended to prescribe that the Canada Council is a charitable organization under the act.

Honourable senators, apart from a few substantive amendments which affect the matter of taxation, this bill to a large extent tidies up certain sections which, during the last year and a half, have been found to require amendment, mainly to make the act more workable. I trust that this explanation has been of some value to honourable senators, but, as I say, further detailed explanation of the bill can no doubt be made in committee.

Hon. John G. Higgins: May I ask one question? Perhaps the information I desire will be available in committee, but I think we ought to be able to obtain it here. Does clause 1 mean that where the proceeds of an insurance policy, in whole or in part, are payable to the estate of a deceased, the tax has to be paid on the portion which goes to the estate, but if the proceeds go to an employer and do not form part of the estate there is no liability for tax?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: The position in that respect is this, that where the technical ownership of a policy of insurance is in an employer, then although the proceeds of the policy are paid to the estate, or to the widow, say, of a deceased, those proceeds, under the present act, do not attract estate tax. Honourable senators will see that that opens up quite a loophole. I could be a member of a company which I do not control, and be employed by that company, and the company might effect a large amount of insurance on my life in such circumstances that it owned the policy, yet on my demise the proceeds of that policy would go to my family and not attract tax. I think it is obvious that such a condition is unsatisfactory and improper, and should be remedied. Honourable senators will recall that there is a great deal of verbiage in the act in regard to policies of insurance which are effected and owned by a company which a person might control. As I said at the outset, there was a loophole in the act with respect to these particular circumstances that I have related.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure we are greatly indebted to the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) for the very careful analysis which he has made of this technical piece of legislation. If I may say so, personally, I feel that the approach he has made to this subject-matter is somewhat more objective than the statement he made to the press on June 8, and I think, perhaps, it carries a greater measure of approval than what he said on that other occasion!

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The other was a good statement, though.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. As he has said, this act is not a stranger to the members of this chamber, because this chamber considered the act very thoroughly two years ago. I am happy to see that one of the seven amendments proposed here at that time, but which was not accepted in the other place, has now been adopted by the Government, not in this bill but in a provision in the Income Tax Bill which will come to us later. That is the amendment which purported to avoid double taxation in connection with a widow's interest in an annuity—I think that is, perhaps, the easiest way of describing it.

We do not like to seem to be patting ourselves on the back, or taking a bow in our own house, but I think that that proposal made at that time was a valid proposal, and I am very happy, indeed, to see that it has been adopted.

As the honourable senator who explained the bill has said, these amendments, generally speaking, are remedial. They fill gaps. They do make some changes in the incidence of tax, perhaps, but frankly I feel that these changes, which are contained principally in clauses 1 and 2, cover situations which Parliament and, I think, the people of Canada, want to see covered by a taxing statute of this kind.

I hasten to say, of course, that with all the verbiage in the act, it is one of those pieces of legislation which delight the lawyers and drive most other people to distraction. I heard a story the other day about a member of this chamber who had been listening too long, as he thought, to constitutional arguments. He happened to be a member of the medical profession, and he said to one of our colleagues: "Some day I am going to collect all the medical terms containing five or six syllables I possibly can, and I am going to put them into a speech, and I am going to go into the chamber and make that speech simply for the purpose of confounding the lawyers." I hope he does not do that, but I am afraid that we lawyers sometimes carry our ideas pretty far.

As the honourable sponsor of the bill has also said, many of the amendments embodied in this bill were suggested by outside bodies, particularly the Canadian Bar Association. In the current issue of the Canadian Bar Journal, which appeared today, there is reproduced the brief presented quite recently to the Government in respect of this act. I did notice upon reading that article that a good many of the proposals made by the Canadian Bar Association in its brief have been adopted here.

I do not propose to deal with many of the clauses of the bill. It is rather inappropriate to do that in this chamber, and I think that can be done better in committee. Nevertheless, there are some points I would like to raise, and perhaps it might help if I raised them now in anticipation of the committee's studying this bill.

Clause 12 of the bill, as the sponsor said, permits transfers of certain assets after death without estate tax releases being provided where the property, in this case an insurance policy, does not exceed the sum of $900 in value. This is a minor point but I think in practice, at least in Ontario, a bank account can be transferred or dealt with without a release if it is not over $1,000. In other cases I think assets to the value of $1,500 can be dealt with without release. It may be that $900 is a very appropriate figure for an insurance policy. I wonder why that figure was chosen, because it is different from the normal run-of-the-mill thing you find in connection with estates.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Might I comment here that the present act does contain authority for a trustee or an insurance company to pay out a policy up to, I believe, $1,500, but in each case the trustee or the insurance company is required to report such payment to the minister. The only difference now in regard to these policies with a limit of $900 is that there is no requirement to report to the minister. I mentioned there had been a tremendous amount of paper work involved in these reports, and that will be eliminated now. I believe the reason for the adoption of the figure of $900 is that it includes, generally speaking, the maximum amount of most of these industrial policies that my honourable friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) knows about.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you. I thought there would be an explanation of that kind, but I think in the case of bank accounts, when the banks do pay out without a release within the prescribed time, they do not have to make a report to, in this case, the provincial succession duty officer. However, it is a very minor point.

I should like to say something about clause 8 of the bill. This provides for a reassessment in the event of death or other change in the marital status of an annuitant within four years of the death of the deceased. As the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) explained, when this legislation was considered by our committee two years ago we did question, in a general way, the wisdom of taking a valuation at the date of death as the final valuation for the assets in the estate. At that time we had quite a discussion on the point as to whether or not some leeway should be allowed, and that the executor should be permitted to value assets during a period of time—say, for six months—after death, rather than be committed to a valuation as at the date of death. Part of the reasoning which impelled this suggestion, was as follows: It has happened that a person has died at a certain date while holding many securities and, perhaps due to a serious decline in the market, the value of the securities has been greatly diminished very soon after death. Yet the duty has had to be paid on the basis of the higher valuation because the market was at a high level on the day of death.

The department, for reasons of its own, resisted the idea of giving an executor a latitude and allowing him to value these assets at some time of his choice between the date of death and six months or a year later. The principle of this argument has now been recognized in clause 8 of this bill in respect of annuities. This is a relieving clause and I commend the Government and the administration for having done this. I would hope that with further experience additional consideration might be given to the proposals which were made by the Senate committee in respect of the broader field. Perhaps in another session the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg South will come and tell us that another idea urged by members of this chamber has been accepted.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I believe an amendment was actually placed before the committee last year to the effect that executors of an estate be allowed to value on any date they chose within six months of the death of the testator, but the amendment was defeated in committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It just shows that we had the courage of our convictions and we proposed an amendment.

I should like to say a few words about clause 4(2) of the bill, which I believe will apply only to exceptional cases. It seems to deal with a situation in which a beneficiary under a trust or a will, or perhaps of a gift made during the lifetime of the deceased, may feel that it would be unprofitable to accept the gift or bequest. If the election to refuse the gift or bequest is made within a year from the date of death, the tax would not apply. I assume, of course, that the gift-over was in favour of a charitable institution. Again this is a relieving section and I think it is helpful. There are not too many of us who are in a position where we can decide that a gift of any kind is something we cannot afford to take.

Clause 2(2) might be worth mentioning although I must confess I am really painting the lily, because the honourable senator from Winnipeg South explained the bill well enough. But the situation covered by this provision is roughly as follows. If it were not for special provincial legislation, in the case of a man who devised the residue of his estate to his son and found that his son died before him, the residual bequest in the father's will, if the father died without changing his will, would lapse and there would be an intestacy. This is apart from provincial legislation. Section 36 of the Ontario Wills Act picks this situation up and it provides that, in a case like this, the son is deemed to have died immediately after the father, although in fact the son died first. Now, if a son survives a father and gets a bequest under his father's will, normally this is part of the son's estate. What this section provides is simply this, that even though that lapse is prevented from happening by the operation of provincial law, the bequest from the father to the son does not form part of the son's estate. It is taxable, of course, in the normal course of events, in the father's estate, and then the son's heirs, whoever they may be, will find that this is an asset in the son's estate, but it will not be an additional asset for taxation in the son's estate. I think, again, this is a useful thing to have in this act.

Honourable senators, apart from these few remarks, I have nothing further to add to this discussion. I am very pleased indeed that the bill will go to committee, and if there are any technical aspects which might require improvement, there will be some good people there to attend to that.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING AND GUARANTEE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill C-69, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System for the period from the 1st day of January, 1960 to the 30th day of June, 1961, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, known as Bill C-69, is an act which provides the necessary money for meeting the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways for the period from January 1, 1960 to June 30, 1961, a period of eighteen months. It further authorizes the Government of Canada to guarantee repayment of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways during this period.

Honourable senators will recall that a similar bill to this one is passed each year so that the Canadian National Railways can carry on the operation of the world's largest railway.

The bill is in the usual form, which was originally adopted by the Parliament of Canada during the year 1952. It was in this particular year that the form of the act was changed so as to include the financing of all capital expenditures, whether authorized under that act or under any earlier financing and guarantee acts, and this procedure has again been followed this year.

This year's bill with respect to the expenditures and guarantees of this railroad might roughly be divided into three or four parts. By clause 3, subclause (1) paragraph (a) of the bill, the Canadian National Railways are authorized to make capital expenditures in an amount not exceeding $309,950,000 during the calendar year 1960. A brief summary of this proposed capital expenditure is set out in clause 3, and will be found on page 2 of the bill. I have been given to understand that when the officers of this railway company appear before the committee they will give a full explanation in conection with each item that is set out in this clause.

In view of the fact that this particular bill covers expenditures which are to be made by the railway from the 1st day of January 1960 to the 30th day of June 1961, paragraph (b) was inserted, which allows the railway to make capital expenditures in an amount not exceeding $86 million between the 1st day of January 1961 and the 30th day of June 1961. In other words, the bill covers more than a fiscal year for the railway company, and this clause is put in so that the company can operate during the first six months of the next fiscal year.

Honourable senators will note that under this particular paragraph the Canadian National Railways Company is entitled to invest in the securities of Trans-Canada Air Lines in order to enable this latter company to make any necessary capital expenditures. This provision also applies in connection with the authorized expenditure of over $309 million.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why is that done?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Because it is a subsidiary of Canadian National Railways. That is how the financing is always done. The parent company does the financing for the subsidiary. That has always been the practice ever since Trans-Canada Air Lines was incorporated.

If honourable senators will again refer to page 2 of this bill, they will note that the amount which has been authorized to be spent during the current calendar year on behalf of Trans-Canada Air Lines is a sum not exceeding $82,350,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Where is that amount to be found?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: On page 2 of the bill, near the top of the page, in the first column, it says:

Trans-Canada Air Lines financial requirements, $82,350,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Finally, under paragraph 3 of this particular clause provision has been made for the railway company to enter into contracts prior to the 1st day of July 1961 for the purpose of acquiring new equipment and generally acquiring and improving the capital assets of the railway company, in an amount not exceeding $51 million. However, it should be borne in mind that no payments of any kind can be made on these particular contracts until after the 31st day of December 1960, and all such payments must be made before the 1st day of July 1961.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Do you mean to say that no payments at all will be made this year?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right: no payments are to be made this year under these particular contracts. Any amount which may be owing on these contracts on the 1st day of July 1961 will have to be provided for and covered in a similar bill which will be introduced next year.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask the honourable gentleman a question. I take it that paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subsection (1) are three different authorizations.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): One is for $309 million, one is for $86 million and one is for $51 million?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, this bill, I presume, is going to be referred to committee where we can get further information.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes. When I finish my explanation I will move that the bill be referred to a standing committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There is some information that I would like to get. Since I entered this house a lot of money has been appropriated for the Canadian National Railways, and I would like to get some information as to just about what that all amounts to. Up to the present I have never been able to get that information. I was present in the Senate at the time that we wrote off $1 billion of this railway's capital, money that it owed to the Government, and the then president of the company told me before the committee that it would never come back for more money.

Hon. Mr. Reid: He said it would break even every year.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes. Now what I want to know is this, and I think the people of this country are entitled to know it too: Just how much money have the people of Canada put into the Canadian National Railways since the Government took it over? How much of the debt of that company was taken over, taking into consideration the write-offs and everything else that was done for the company? How much money did we put in it right from the start? I have never been able to get that information and I think we ought to have it by now. A year ago the annual loss amounted to $61 million and this year's loss, I think, was $48 million. Now, those are terrific sums...

The Hon. the Speaker: I will have to call the honourable senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) to order. I was waiting to see if the honourable senator was only putting a question, but I find he is really making a speech.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Pardon me, Mr. Speaker. I thought the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) had finished explaining the bill.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But you gave way.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, I was just answering the question of the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly).

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, will you answer mine?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will endeavour to obtain the necessary information for the honourable senator when the matter is being considered by the Committee on Transport and Communications.

Subclause 2 of clause 3 authorizes the railway to do the following: (1) borrow money and issue securities; (2) insert in the annual report of the company the amount of money borrowed; (3) include in the annual budget for the calendar year 1961 an estimated amount which the company will require for capital expenditure during the next fiscal year; and (4), set out in the annual budget the amount still owing under all contracts which have not been completed.

This bill further provides that the railway company can issue its own equipment trust certificates, bonds, debentures and other securities.

It also provides that the amounts available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization shall be used toward meeting the expenditures which are authorized under clause 3 of this bill.

Finally, this particular clause has a limiting feature in it, namely, that the railway cannot during this period issue securities in an amount exceeding $203,950,000.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Where will the balance of the money come from?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: There will be a carry-over from the current year, and it will come partly from this source, partly from the Treasury and partly from the amortization of debt.

If honourable senators desire to ascertain the breakdown with respect to this amount of $203,950,000 I would refer them to the explanatory note in the bill, which is set out opposite page 1. It is fairly lengthy and contains a number of items, but I think they all are self-explanatory.

Incidentally, the amount which this company is authorized to borrow, namely $203,950,000, is to be reduced by the value of any preferred stock which is purchased by the Minister of Finance from the railway. For example, if during this fiscal period the Minister of Finance purchased preferred stock having a value of, say, $950,000, then the borrowing would be limited under this clause to $203 million.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As I understand the honourable gentleman, if the Minister of Finance should take up preferred stock to the value of $950,000—

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is an arbitrary figure.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): —then in that case the company could borrow up to $203 million?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And if the Minister does not take it up?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The company can borrow up to $203,950,000. If the minister takes up no preferred stock the company has a ceiling of $203,950,000 on its borrowings.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And the ceiling is reduced by the amount that the Minister takes up?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I notice from the explanatory table opposite page 1 that the make-up of the authorized borrowing, $203,950,000, includes the item in paragraph (b) of clause 3, capital expenditures in 1961, $86 million, but it does not include the item in paragraph (c), $51 million. Is this because the company will enter into contracts?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: The amount of $203,950,000 I take to be the amount which the Canadian National Railways can borrow over the eighteen-month period.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Yes, but it does not include the item in paragraph (c), $51 million.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I will obtain the explanation of that for the honourable senator when this bill is before the Transport and Communications committee.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I wonder if the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) would give a clearer picture of that amount of $950,000 which he mentioned a few moments ago. I am a little hazy in regard to that. If the company borrows $950,000 from the Government, or if it sells to the Government preferred stock in the amount of $950,000, that shows as a debt against the Canadian National Railways. Would the honourable senator be good enough to tell me what is the difference between, on the one hand, putting the whole amount on the market and, on the other hand, dividing it into $203 million and $950,000?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that this preferred stock has been set up in the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. I cannot tell the honourable senator why the railway might prefer to sell preferred stock or why the Minister of Finance might prefer to buy preferred stock for the part of the money which is required rather than to borrow it from the public. It might be that at the time the company was ready to float a bond issue the market would be unfavourable, in which case the company could sell preferred stock to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And the company would not have to borrow so much.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I regret that I cannot tell the honourable senator why the company might at any particular time sell preferred stock to the minister rather than borrow from the public. However, I have made a note of it and we will get the explanation when the bill is being considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Just one more question: Does it sound reasonable to you?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is window dressing.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, it is not window dressing. The Canadian National might find it very much to its advantage to sell preferred stock to the Minister of Finance rather than go into the money market at some particular time when it required money.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Is the amount of $950,000 that you mentioned a nominal figure?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It is just a figure I chose.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: But it might be more?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It might be more, it might be less; and the company might not sell any preferred stock at all. I chose that sum in order to illustrate in round figures how the amount of the borrowings by way of bonds and debentures may vary.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): A good box-car figure.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Clauses 5 and 6 of the bill deal with guarantees to be provided by the Government and with the manner in which moneys realized from the sale of securities will be handled. Both of these clauses are self-explanatory and have been contained in all similar bills since the year 1952.

Honourable senators will note that under the heading "General" on page 4 of the bill, certain powers are given to the railway and certain administrative procedures are set up. For instance, the railway company has power to assist any other company which is in the national system, such as all the hotel companies, Grand Trunk Western lines, and other branch company lines.

Clauses 8 and 9 deal with the financial transactions which take place between the Minister of Finance and the railway, including the right of the Minister of Finance to advance moneys to the railway to cover deficits.

Honourable senators will note that in clause 10 the Minister of Finance is empowered to make advances to Trans-Canada Air Lines in order to cover deficits if such should occur during this fiscal period.

Clause 11 of the bill is entirely new. Under the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act the minister has the right to purchase the 4 per cent preferred stock of the Canadian National Railways at any time up to December 31, 1960. Under this clause this right is extended to December 31, 1961, in order to make this right of purchase of preferred stock co-terminus with the other provisions of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act.

Clause 13, the final one in the bill, appoints J. A. De Lalanne, a chartered accountant carrying on business in the city of Montreal, to act as an independent auditor in order to make a continuous audit of the accounts of this railway, such appointment to expire on the 31st day of December 1961. I understand that this is necessary in accordance with good accounting and auditing practices, and also necessary so that this railway will be provided with an independent auditor until a bill similar to this one is passed during the year 1961.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is that a new auditing company?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. It is the same company that acted in the previous year.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: How long has this firm been auditing the accounts?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It was appointed during the year 1957.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to say anything further in connection with this bill. When it receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. If possible, I would like the bill to be considered by that committee on Wednesday next, so that the necessary arrangements can now be made for attendance of the proper officials of the Canadian National Railways before the committee on that day.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, do I now have permission to proceed with what I was going to say?

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator may proceed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not want to interrupt anyone, but I understood that the honourable gentleman from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) had sat down.

I do not think we can consider this bill as early as Wednesday next, if we are to get the information that I have asked for. If my honourable friend will look over previous proceedings he will find that when the question of the general write-off of the railway system took place we spent considerable time going over the estimates, and each year certain questions have come up. In addition to the statement I have asked for, I want something more. I want to know who controls the continuation of this railway system under its present management, when it is going behind in every year of its operation. Why should we as Canadian citizens be faced with a bill of $40 million to $60 million on an enterprise which simply cannot pay its way? Why should we keep hitting our heads against a wall and taking a tremendous loss every year? I think at a time like this, when there is a demand for increased rail rates, all these things should be taken into consideration.

I have followed the activities of the President of the Canadian National Railways for quite some time. I recall on one occasion when he was before our committee he refused to tell me the sale price of a building at Brandon to a private individual. He also refused to tell the House of Commons. Then when I got one of his officials on the stand I asked him, and he told me. The reason he told me was that he knew that I could find out what the sale price was, because under the Manitoba law an affidavit of value has to be sworn before a transfer of property can be registered. As I say, one of his officials, and a very able man he was, knew that I could get the information if the railway did not give it to me.

My point is this: at a time when we are posing as business people, attempting to carry on business with other countries of the world, with a great world-wide economic struggle taking place, why should we go behind year after year in one of our own businesses? We are borrowing more money from the rest of the world than we are lending, and we are going behind every year. Why should we lose anywhere from $50 million to $70 million a year and probably more on our railways? That is the information I want to get.

I appreciate the efforts of my honourable friend from Hanover in his explanation of the bill, and in his anxiety to get it to committee on Wednesday next. I am quite agreeable to have it go to committee on that day, but I want to have the information I have asked for before we report the bill to the house. If you see to it that I get the information, we can put the bill through on Wednesday. I must have that information. Specifically, I want to know how much we have lost every year since the system was taken over by the Government up to the present time. How much have we written off each year, how much has the Government and the people of Canada had to pay? What is the solution of the whole problem? On one occasion the president of the railway was before the committee; I asked him about future advances, and he said that unless Canada was hit by a great disaster, it would be the last time they would ask for money.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. Haig: As a senator from the province of Manitoba, I think I am entitled to have that information, because if the demand for increased rail rates is met the farmers of the Prairies will have to pay more for transportation of their chief products to market.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Honourable Mr. Brunt, bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fred M. Blois moved the second reading of Bill S-35, respecting the International Boundary Commission.

He said: Honourable senators, as you well know, Canada and the United States share a common border. Each of our nations has a common heritage, a common interest and common objectives in domestic, national and international relations. Our celebrated undefended common border stretches for some 5,500 miles across forests, prairies, mountains, lakes and rivers, and through many settled communities. It is proof to the world of the ability of two nations to live peaceably with each other, and I am confident that every citizen of the United States and Canada is extremely proud of this condition.

Before referring directly to the Boundary Commission I think it would be informative and, perhaps, essential that honourable senators have some of the history concerning the boundary between our two countries. It also must be kept in mind that these boundaries have effect upon not only the land but the waters, and particularly the fishing rights in said waters.

The several sections of the international boundary between the United States and Canada were originally agreed upon and defined in treaties between the United States and Great Britain concluded in 1783, 1818, and 1846. The first of these treaties, the Treaty of Paris, which brought to a close the American War of Independence, defined the boundary as far westward as the Lake of the Woods. The second of the treaties, the Convention of 1818, defined the boundary along the 49th parallel from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains. The third treaty defined the line westward from the Rocky Mountains to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island, and thence southward and westward through that channel to the Pacific Ocean. The boundary between Alaska and Canada was originally defined in a treaty between Great Britain and Russia in 1825, to which the United States became a party in interest through the purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867.

As the frontier of our nation moved westward it was found that, due to the lack of accurate geographic knowledge of the country at the time these original treaties were made, the treaty descriptions of parts of the boundary were subject to several interpretations. It was not until three additional treaties had been negotiated, and their provisions carried out, that that part of the international boundary line originally agreed upon by the Treaty of Paris was finally settled. These were the Jay Treaty of 1794, under which was established the identity of the St. Croix River, one of the boundary streams designated in the treaty of 1783; the Treaty of Ghent of 1814, under which was established the national ownership of the islands of the Passamaquoddy Bay, the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes as far as the north end of Lake Huron.—It is interesting to note that on the first official boundary maps of the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes is to be found the name of the noted geographer David Thompson, who was employed as a surveyor for the British section of the commission which mapped this part of the boundary following the Treaty of Ghent.—The third treaty was the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842, which defined more exactly than the treaty of 1783 had done the boundary from the source of the St. Croix River to the St. Lawrence River and the line westward from Lake Huron to the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods.

Similar questions also arose with respect to the boundary at the west coast. Although the treaty of 1846 had presumably fixed the boundary through the waters between the continent and Vancouver Island, it was found necessary in later years to settle the question of the national ownership of several of the islands in these waters. This was done by the treaty of 1871, by which the location of the boundary with respect to the islands was referred to the Emperor of Germany as arbitrator, whose award was to be considered "absolutely final and conclusive".

Also, in the case of the Alaskan boundary the description of the line as originally set forth in the treaty between Great Britain and Russia in 1825 proved upon subsequent explorations to be quite indefinite, and several questions arose concerning the true meaning of certain clauses of the treaty. These questions were settled under the provisions of the treaty of 1903 by the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal.

Thus it was not until 120 years after the War of Independence, or shortly after the beginning of the present century, that all the major questions with respect to the International Boundary Line between the United States and Canada and between Alaska and Canada had been settled and the general location of the line finally agreed upon.

This has been a very brief history concerning the boundaries between the two countries. I would refer honourable senators who are interested in further information to the eight joint reports of the International Boundary Commission and the report of the International Waterways Commission, which are to be found in the Library of Parliament and the provincial libraries. These will be found to be most interesting reading. They tell, among other things, of a grant of land by King James of England to Sir William Alexander in 1621, which included all of Nova Scotia as it is today, across the Bay of Fundy to the St. Croix River, thence northward to the south shore of the St. Lawrence River down and around Gaspé and including the present province of New Brunswick. All of that was known at that time as Nova Scotia. It was not until 1763 that a royal proclamation created the province of Quebec, including all the south bank of the St. Lawrence, and it was not until 1784 that the province of New Brunswick was created.

After reading these reports, I am confident that honourable senators will agree that Canada owes much to those early boundary commissions and their staffs of engineers, and also to the present commission and their staff who are so ably carrying on the work of placing and maintaining monuments and buoys and the maintaining of a boundary vista.

Following this brief history I would like to discuss the International Boundary Commission and Bill S-35, respecting the same, which we have before us.

In order that the boundary should be physically marked out the International Boundary Treaty of 1908 established the International Boundary Commission, which is composed of two sections, a Canadian and an American section. By the treaty of 1925, to "define and complete the international boundary between Canada and the United States", the commissioners appointed under the treaty of 1908 were to be responsible for continuous maintenance of the international boundary line, the boundary monuments and a cleared 20-foot skyline vista along the line. The 20-foot vista is composed of 10 feet on the United States side of the line and 10 feet on our own side.

The 1925 treaty was approved by a resolution of Parliament in that same year, but no implementing legislation has been enacted to give the Canadian commissioner authority to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty with respect to the maintenance of the boundary monuments and the clearing of the 10-foot vista on the Canadian side of the boundary line. In fact, there is no specific authority for the commissioner to obtain the right of access to the boundary vista itself.

In consequence, honourable senators will appreciate that if the existing situation is not remedied—that is, if the Canadian International Boundary Commissioner is not given legal authority to exercise his functions—Canada might be placed in a situation where she would be unable to fulfil the obligations of a treaty to which she is a signatory.

At this point I should like to describe something of the nature of the boundary line as well as something of the work which is carried out by the Boundary Commission in order to maintain the boundary monuments, reference monuments and vista.

A moment ago I mentioned that the international boundary line stretched for some 5,500 miles. Honourable senators may be interested to know that this distance is roughly the same as that between Vancouver and Shanghai, or that between Toronto and Buenos Aires. Inevitably, the marking and maintenance of a boundary line of such length requires a considerable effort on the part of the Canadian and United States Boundary Commissioners. There are, in fact, more than 8,000 markers and monuments which have to be looked after in connection with the line.

Let us consider the path of the boundary from its easternmost starting point in Passamaquoddy Bay. From Passamaquoddy Bay the line progresses across water and through forests until it reaches that region of the province of Quebec known as the Eastern Townships. Each different type of terrain provides a different problem to the Boundary Commissioners, and I would ask honourable senators to join with me for a moment in examining some of these problems.

With the exception of one small region in the Great Lakes, those portions of the boundary line which pass through rivers and lakes are not physically marked with buoys. However, its position can be established at any time by reference to a system of permanent marks which are set on the shores. These marks, which are found along such watercourses as the St. Lawrence River, the Great Lakes, the Straits of Juan de Fuca and the Portland Canal, number more than 2,500, and the positioning and maintenance of all of them is the responsibility of the boundary commissioners.

As we all know, the boundary between Canada and the United States is unfortified and there are, therefore, many places where, apart from the boundary monuments, it is not easy to see a boundary line—it has to be imagined rather than seen. However, this is not at all the case when the boundary runs through forests and other wooded areas. Ever since the middle of the 1800's and the early 1900's a swath 20 feet wide, made up of ten feet on Canadian soil and ten on American, has been cut through the forests and woods. Honourable senators will recall that a moment ago I employed the term "a cleared 20-foot skyline vista". This means that if a man were to stand on a section of the boundary line which cut through a forest he would be able to have a clear view of the sky above his head: that is, besides seeing a swath 20 feet wide in front to him, his view of the sky would not be obstructed by overhanging branches. Hence the boundary is clearly identified even when it runs up the side of a wooded hill.

The path of the boundary through forests provides a dramatic sight because it is so clearly visible. Aerial photographs have been taken at a height of about 20,000 feet on a clear day and this path shows distinctly. I would add that in addition to providing an aid for aerial navigation this swath has been instrumental in saving the lives of people who, having been lost in the woods, have come across the swath and stayed on its path.

There is a total length of 1,350 miles of boundary passing through forests. The vista is continually being closed by the growth of young trees and undergrowth, and it is part of the duty of the commission to cut this new growth at frequent intervals, as often as is necessary, to maintain a cleared line through the forests.

In addition to traversing watercourses and forested areas, the boundary passes through fine farmlands, through villages, towns and other closely-settled areas. And here other problems present themselves.

In beauty spots, such as the International Peace Gardens on the border between Manitoba and North Dakota, and at the Peace Park between Douglas, British Columbia, and Blaine, Washington, the citizens of both countries have for many years enjoyed the favourable development of a common boundary area.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I might point out to honourable senators that on the Canada-United States boundary line at the Peace Park stands the International Peace Arch, which I believe is the only peace arch in the world.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: The Peace Park on the British Columbia-Washington border is almost as fine as the Peace Gardens between the province of Manitoba and North Dakota.

Hon. Mr. Blois: In addition, an increasing number of fine modern customs and immigration buildings are to be found at well-marked crossings from coast to coast. These are very attractive. At other places, however, ditching operations have endangered the boundary monuments, billboards have added an element of unsightliness to the international boundary and a few dwellings and commercial establishments are to be found across the line itself.

For the better enforcement of the customs and immigration laws, and in order that the international boundary line should be free of obstructions, the United States in June 1908, set aside as a public reservation all unpatented lands lying within 60 feet of the international boundary. Similar action had already been taken by the Government of Canada respecting the Yukon-Alaska boundary in April 1908, and reservations were subsequently made by the province of British Columbia in November 1908, by Saskatchewan in 1931, by Manitoba in 1930, by Ontario in 1925 and by Quebec and New Brunswick in 1923. The existence of a 66-foot road allowance on Alberta's southern boundary achieved the same purpose.

While the intent of the reservations just described is clear, in Quebec and New Brunswick most of the land adjoining the boundary was already at the time in private hands.

I wish to emphasize to honourable senators that the proposed legislation now before them seeks in no way to destroy or remove existing structures or buildings, but only to prevent other structures and buildings from being erected on the international boundary in the future. I would say that this is a reasonable action and one which is in the national interest. It works no more hardship upon an individual than a municipal bylaw which prevents property owners from constructing within a given number of feet of a sidewalk or a road.

From what I have already said, I think honourable senators will understand that a good part of the Boundary Commissioners' work consists of clearing the vista through forests and inspecting, repairing, and maintaining boundary marks and monuments.

There are several reasons for the need of repairs to monuments. Monuments are frequently heaved by the action of frost, especially in swampy or in wet ground. The banks of rivers cave and wash away, sometimes taking monuments with them or dislodging them. A monument located on a sand or gravel bed is sometimes disturbed by the removal of this material for use in road construction. Relocation or improvement of highways along or across the international boundary often requires the moving of monuments to new sites. Deterioration of concrete bases requires repairs or the complete renewal of some of the bases. Monuments are sometimes broken off by road-grading machinery or snowplows.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask if the United States makes any contribution?

Hon. Mr. Blois: The contribution of Canada and the United States is on a fifty-fifty basis on all work being done.

Large trees occasionally fall on some of the monuments and either break or displace them. Frequent inspection of the boundary monuments is therefore necessary, and repairs and replacements of lost or damaged monuments are usually made at the time of the inspection.

Special projects, such as the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway, may also require action by the Boundary Commission. On the international section of the seaway a new system of reference monuments has been established to replace more than 40 such monuments which were in places now flooded.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Does that change the boundary line of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

Hon. Mr. Blois: Not the boundary line, but the markers have to be changed, so that the engineers can find the boundary at a later date. In view of the question which has just been asked, perhaps I should say that the work done by the commission is not duplicated by any other agency, either federal or provincial, and I understand that a similar situation prevails on the United States side. All expenses incurred by the International Boundary Commission in carrying out its functions are shared equally between our two countries.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: To what extent? Fifty per cent represents what in dollars?

Hon. Mr. Blois: The yearly cost is approximately $60,000. It may be between $60,000 and $65,000, judging from the figures I was able to obtain.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is that the total cost?

Hon. Mr. Blois: The yearly cost.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: For Canada?

Hon. Mr. Blois: That is for Canada.

I understand that approximately the same number of Americans and Canadians are employed for the work crews on the national sections. A report is prepared each year concerning the work which has been carried out during that year and copies are sent to both Governments.

Although the commission has for many years carried out the functions defined in the treaty of 1925 without legislation which specified its powers to do so, the increasing development and use of land near the international boundary from coast to coast has led, with increasing frequency, to proposed encroachments upon the boundary area by buildings and other structures.

With the increased use of heavy earth moving equipment in road building and other construction projects, and with the building up of the area adjacent to our boundary, increasing numbers of boundary monuments are endangered annually.

The legislation now before honourable senators is desirable, therefore, in order that Canada may be able to fulfil her treaty obligations, to provide adequate protection for the system of monuments, to allow the Boundary Commissioners assured legal access to the boundary area, to prevent unauthorized encroachments in that area and to facilitate the application of customs regulations.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, we have just listened to a very interesting address outlining the work of the International Boundary Commission. If this is a new piece of legislation, I commend the giving to the commission of powers with regard to policies it should have had many years ago.

The honourable senator outlined a great deal of the history of the International Boundary Commission. However, I think he omitted one of the most important points of that history, especially in so far as British Columbia is concerned. I ask the indulgence of honourable senators while I touch upon that point.

The history of the boundary line from Alberta to British Columbia commenced, if my memory serves me, in 1845. The honourable senator spoke of the great amount of work required to keep the survey path clear today. Well, it is just child's play today compared with the work in 1845, when they had to hew their way right through solid timber. In those days Canada was a colony of Great Britain. The Americans had sent their survey team from Washington, and the survey team from British Columbia came from the Old Country. Everything had to be brought by boat around Cape Horn. There were no marking monuments available here. Horses were brought in, and the surveyors came and started at the point in the middle of the gulf mentioned by the honourable senator. The Canadian survey group headed east and the American group headed west. It is very interesting to note that the account of that great survey by the British on behalf of Canada was lost for fifty years and that it was only found by accident in the observatory of Britain. Americans have no record at all of their survey—it is lost and gone.

In reading the records, as I have done—and I shall have something to say shortly about this boundary line—it was interesting to note how difficult it was in those days to keep the British and the Americans from fighting. There were intensely hard feelings between the two survey parties. The story of the hardships endured by the people who had come to British Columbia for the first time is almost unimaginable. One account is from letters that were sent to the Secretary of State in Great Britain. I was able to procure a book which includes all the letters. One of them intrigued me. In regard to one point, now called Chilliwack, but which then had a different name, a statement says:

> My Lords, at noon today the sun was darkened or blackened out by mosquitoes.

The surveyors could not see the sun because of the mosquitoes.

In the course of my reading I found something which I thought I could use to good advantage in asking for an exchange of a piece of property, now in the United States, called Point Roberts. Because the line which runs through what is called Point Roberts leaves a piece of territory a mile and a half or more in the United States, the rest, to my mind, should belong to Canada. We would dearly love to have that, because Point Roberts is occupied mostly by British Columbia people who have summer homes close to the city of Vancouver. However, I discovered that the 49th parallel line was not the actual 49th parallel, and that the surveyors had made a mistake of half a mile. So I said: "I have something to say to the Americans now. If they will give us this portion of property at Point Roberts, we will be satisfied, and not request the half mile which we should have owned at Blaine." Naturally I felt kind of good about the discovery. But what surprised me was the answer I received on two occasions in the House of Commons. I was told by the Government of the day that an order in council passed in, I think, 1923—I am subject to correction as to that year—had designated the present line as the 49th parallel. Now, I have always doubted that it was legal for the Government to pass an order in council designating the boundary line. I claim that should have been done by an act of Parliament, just as we are proposing to do now by this bill, and I am still of that mind. I raised the question on two separate occasions, once before the Right Honourable Mackenzie King and once before the Right Honourable Mr. Bennett, and both gave me the same answer, that I was raising a question of great importance—my reply being: "Any silly fool would know it is of great importance. Don't tell me that kind of story." But that is as far as I got.

I think this story of the international boundary in Alberta and British Columbia is a most interesting one. I have a copy of the book I referred to and would be glad to lend it to any member of the Senate who wishes to read it. I thought I would take advantage of this occasion to tell of that incident and to say how much I appreciate the bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. Blois: I thank the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) for the additional information he has given us; it is a very interesting story, speaking as it does of some of the hardships endured in surveying the border.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire of the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois) whether it is going to be referred to committee?

Hon. Mr. Blois: After the bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on External Relations. I may say that the present Commissioner, Mr. Lambert, has a film which illustrates very distinctly and clearly some of the matters I have been outlining, and if members of the committee would like to see this film he would be pleased to show it, provided that we can have a meeting of the committee not later than next Thursday, after which date he will be away from Ottawa on some of his duties.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lambert, debate adjourned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

MOTION FOR ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN FOR AMENDMENT RE TENURE OF OFFICE OF JUDGES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved, pursuant to notice:

That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that You may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted Addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Amendment as to tenure of office of Judges.

30 and 31. Vict., c. 3.

1. Section ninety-nine of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Tenure of office of Judges.

"99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the Judges of the Superior, District and County Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Termination at age 75.

(2) A Judge of a Superior, District or County Court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age."

Short title and citation.

2. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1960, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960.

Commencement.

3. This Act shall come into force on the first day of September, nineteen hundred and sixty.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion has been on our Order Paper for a long time, in fact, ever since January 19 last, and honourable senators have therefore had plenty of time to study the matters covered thereby in all their aspects.

Before dealing further with the motion, I think I should mention the judicature sections of the British North America Act. These are sections 96 to 101 both inclusive.

Section 96 has to do with the appointment by the Governor General of judges of the Superior, District and County Courts, except Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Sections 97 and 98 deal with the selection of judges from the bars of the different provinces.

Section 99, which is the one we are principally concerned with, reads as follows:

99. The judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Section 100 of the British North America Act deals with salaries, allowances and pensions of Superior, District and County Court judges which are to be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Section 101 deals with the establishment of a Canadian Court of Appeal and any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. Under that section, we set up the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court.

The purpose behind this motion, honourable senators, is that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen praying that a measure be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to repeal section 99 of the British North America Act and to substitute therefor a new section 99 providing, among other things, for the retirement of judges of the Superior, District and County Courts upon attaining the age of 75 years, or upon the coming into force of the new section if at that time that age has already been attained. It will not be necessary for me to read the exact wording at this time.

This bill, if passed, will be known as the British North America Act, 1960. Later in the debate an amendment to this motion will be moved to change the date on which the act will come into force.

At this time, honourable senators, I wish to refer to certain legislation which was passed by the Canadian Parliament in 1927. There are several honourable senators here who were then in Parliament and they will, no doubt, remember that on March 10, 1927 the Honourable Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, introduced bills in the House of Commons to amend the Judges Act, the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act. These bills had principally to do with the retirement of judges of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts of Canada at 75 years of age. Those courts, as I have said previously, had been set up under section 101 of the British North America Act.

The bill to amend the Judges Act and the two bills amending the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act were passed unanimously in the Commons after a very limited debate and then came to the Senate, where the three bills were introduced by the Leader of the Government in the Senate of that day, the Honourable Senator Dandurand. All three bills were passed unanimously by the Senate after a very short debate, occupying only two pages of the Hansard of this house on March 30 and 31, 1927.

In his introduction to the Judges Bill the Honourable Senator Dandurand stated:

The other enactment is the limitation of the age of the judges, and their retirement when they reach 75 years. It applies to the present judges as well as to those who shall be appointed in the future. Honourable gentlemen realize that the highest tribunal in the country must be maintained in the best state of efficiency.

A little further on the Honourable Senator Dandurand said:

The Department of Justice has submitted to Parliament an enactment by which judges shall be retired at the age of 75. This is for reasons of efficiency. It is felt that the judges should be in a position to do their full duty and it is realized that it is somewhat difficult to persuade a judge who is losing his strength that the time has arrived for him to withdraw, or that he is not as capable as he was.

The Honourable Senator Dandurand went on to say that he had been told of a certain senior judge who asked a junior judge in the same court to be sure to let him know when he felt in his own mind that he, the senior judge, was not as capable as he should be and the time had come for him to withdraw. The junior judge said that after he had done as requested, the senior judge never spoke to him again.

Honourable senators will have noticed that by the first words of section 101 of the British North America Act the Parliament of Canada had full power to pass the three bills referred to, and it was not necessary to obtain an amendment to that act.

The legislation which we are now bringing before the Senate is not revolutionary or unusual. In my opinion it is quite similar to the legislation which was passed in 1927. All we are asking for now is that legislation be enacted terminating the tenure of office at the age of 75 years of judges of the Superior, District and County Courts. If the legislation becomes law it will read as follows—I quote from subsection 2 of the new section 99 as it appears in the Address:

A Judge of a Superior, District or County Court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age.

Honourable senators will note this is quite similar to the 1927 legislation to which I referred.

I am also of the opinion that the same reason which was advanced in 1927, when the age limit of 75 was fixed for judges of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts, now applies with equal force to the fixing of the age limit of our Superior, District and County Court Judges at 75 years.

However, whereas Parliament had the power to pass the 1927 legislation without securing an amendment to the British North America Act, it is now considered that by virtue of secion 99, which I have just read, it is necessary to secure an amendment to that act in order to implement the legislation which is now before us. The only way in which that can be done is by a joint address of the Senate and Commons, and that is the reason why we are obliged to adopt this procedure.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to go into the reason why the Parliament of Canada finds it impossible to amend its own Constitution in a case of this kind. That was fully gone into by the Prime Minister in the other place during his remarks last Tuesday. At that time he dealt, in detail, with the seventeen different occasions since 1867 when amendments have been made to the British North America Act. But I will say this, that I hope before long an agreement can be reached with the provinces whereby the authority to amend Canada's Constitution will be vested in the Parliament of Canada with the approval or co-operation of the provinces.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Constitutional lawyers are generally of the opinion not only that an amendment to the British North America Act is necessary, but also that the consent of all of the provinces is also necessary before any such request for an amendment to the British North America Act is made. The Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, later the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, was firmly of that opinion, as will be clearly seen by reading the House of Commons Debates for 1944, at pages 2248 and 2249, where he is reported as saying:

This is in my opinion a matter which should not be presented for amendment to the imperial Parliament without previous discussion with the provinces, because the administration of justice and the establishment of the courts are matters that are within provincial jurisdiction. It is my view that the proper procedure with respect to amendments to the B.N.A. Act when dealing with any portion that gives jurisdiction to provincial Legislatures should involve prior conference and consultation with the Legislatures, and if it is sought to take away from them something which has been allotted to them, their consent should be obtained.

Again, in 1946, as reported in the House of Commons Debates, at page 2711, he stated the following:

Is it still the opinion of the Minister of Justice that an amendment to the B.N.A. Act, which would provide power to retire judges at a stated age, would require the consent of the provincial legislatures? To that my answer is that, notwithstanding the vote of last night, I persist in that view.

Later in the same debate he stated, in answer to a question by Mr. Diefenbaker:

In my opinion it would have to be the consent of all of the provinces that would be affected thereby.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Did Mr. Diefenbaker agree with that?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In 1945 the Honourable Mr. St. Laurent made an attempt to reach an agreement with the provinces on this same kind of matter, and on January 2, 1945 the Minister of Justice of that day wrote to the Attorney General for each province suggesting for his consideration an amendment to the British North America Act providing for the retirement of judges upon their reaching a certain age, but nothing came of it. The Province of Alberta disagreed entirely, and only six provinces sent replies. There was no reply received from British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. Other attempts were also made over the years as far back as 1903, but without success.

Honourable senators, I am happy to report now that for the first time the consent of all of the provinces has been obtained.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The consent of the provinces, or the Attorneys General?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Minister of Justice wrote to each Attorney General and received unanimous replies. Last Thursday I tabled correspondence in the Senate, and honourable senators will find the same, including the resolutions passed by the Quebec Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, in appendix A to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of that day.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That was the only province that did it. In all the others the Attorneys General spoke for the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, that is correct.

Also, honourable senators, on numerous occasions the Canadian Bar Association has requested action on the part of the federal Government in this matter. From 1936 up to the present time eight submissions from that association have been made urging Parliament to deal with the problem of retiring judges at 75 years of age.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Were they all from the Canadian Bar Association? Were not some of those from provincial Bar Associations?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am subject to correction there, but I will give a brief summary of each one and then we will find out.

In 1936 there was a resolution to that effect by the Council of the Canadian Bar Association. In 1937 there was a report of the Committee on Civil Justice of the Canadian Bar Association to the same effect.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: To what effect?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Asking for the retirement of Superior Court Judges at 75 years of age.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did any of these submissions contain a suggestion that we modify the British North America Act?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not sure. I have in my file much information on this question, but I did not intend to go into that fully tonight. However, I can do so if honourable senators wish me to take up the time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I believe there was a letter in 1920 suggesting that the British North America Act be amended. Perhaps I should go on with my remarks.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) whether it is not so that a suggestion was made either by the Canadian Bar Association or a province that instead of amending the British North America Act a reference be made to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether the Parliament of Canada had the right to make this amendment without going to the imperial Government?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is correct. It was suggested that an amendment be made to the British North America Act or that a reference be made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: But that suggestion was made on only one occasion during all the time the Canadian Bar Association dealt with the matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have a record of that in my file.

In 1944 a resolution was passed by the Ontario section of the Canadian Bar Association. In 1952 a letter was received by the Department of Justice from the President of the Canadian Bar Association dealing with the same question. In 1953 another letter was received from the President of the Bar Association. Also in 1953 a resolution was passed by the Bar Association.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Has the honourable gentleman a copy of the resolution?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: All I have is a statement that there was a resolution, dated September 12, 1953 by the Canadian Bar Association urging the Government of Canada to take the necessary steps to bring about the compulsory retirement of Supreme Court judges at the age of 75.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask, would it be too much for the honourable Leader of the Government to table these resolutions and perhaps give them to us in the same form in which we have various letters from the Attorneys General? This is an important matter.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was going to give the exact wording of the resolution passed in September, 1959, at Vancouver, but before I do so I would like to say that in 1955 another letter was received from the President of the Canadian Bar Association.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As an individual.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Finally, in September, 1959, another resolution was passed by the Canadian Bar Association at its annual meeting in Victoria, in the following words:

> Resolved that the Canadian Bar Association reiterates its recommendation for the compulsory retirement of Superior Court judges at the age of 75 years, and suggests that the question whether Parliament has under the British North America Act No. 2, 1949, power to amend the Constitution of Canada to so provide be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada.

That is what I was referring to before.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I be permitted to say that I think we have the right, when references are made to documents of this nature, to ask that they be tabled. If I am not mistaken, Bourinot states that any senator has the right to demand that such documents be tabled. I now request that all of these documents be tabled.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will do my best, but I do not know whether I can table them or not.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am asking not that they be tabled at this moment, but some time after this sitting.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) wants more than to have them merely tabled. I believe he would like them to appear in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or to be made available to us in the same way that the letters from the Attorneys General were.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not quoting from any letters. It is only when I am quoting from a letter that I have to table it when asked to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: When you state the substance of a letter we have a right to the text of it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As I understand the rule, it is only when I quote from a letter that I have to table it, if requested. But I will do the best I can to please my honourable friends.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That will be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I should like to say that the motion with respect to this matter has been on the Order Papers of both houses of Parliament since January of this year, and I for one have not received any objection or protest from any source whatsoever.

Honourable senators, legislation has also been passed in the United Kingdom intituled the Judicial Pensions Act, 1959. I have a copy of that act here.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask my honourable friend if that legislation is compulsory so far as the judges who were holding office when the act was passed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If the honourable senator will be patient I will read to him section 2(1) of the Judicial Pensions Act. It states:

> A person who holds an office listed in the First Schedule to this act shall vacate that office on the day on which he attains the age of seventy-five years.

That applies to the Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the President of the Probate Divorce and Admiralty Division, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would my honourable friend be good enough to read section 3 of that act?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is an option section.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Well, would the honourable leader read it?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You read it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think my honourable friend the Leader of the Government wants to be fair about this. He has referred to the United Kingdom Judicial Pensions Act, and surely he will not object to reading another section. I suggest he should read section 3. I do not mind if he does not wish to read it now, for I intend to read it when I speak.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is fair enough.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is quite all right.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is in the section that is so prohibitive?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am almost through with my explanation, if you will allow me to finish. These are only preliminary remarks and I will have something to say later on, if any opposition appears. I trust, honourable senators, that this motion will meet with the unanimous approval of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is nice to hope.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In my opinion, legislation of this kind is long overdue, and will be welcomed by the great majority of the people of Canada. I submit that public opinion is strongly behind this bill.

Before I conclude, I wish to say that one of my colleagues, when he speaks later on, will be moving an amendment to change the date when the act would come into force to the first day of March 1961. This change would give the Parliament of the United Kingdom more time to deal with the matter.

Honourable senators will have noted that on the Order Paper of the other place there is a resolution to make changes in the pension provisions affecting all judges, including those whose retirement becomes automatic by virtue of their reaching or having reached the age of 75 years. This is complementary to the matter referred to in the motion which I have just been discussing, and that is the reason it is being introduced at this time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator a question? To begin with, would it not be well to hold up this bill until we have seen the other one?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I may say the Minister of Justice telephoned me just before I came into the chamber and said that he intended to introduce the resolution in the other house at 8 o'clock this evening; so that long before this debate is over we shall have all the details of that other bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is satisfactory, so far as that question is concerned. There is another question, however, that is bothering me a great deal. In fact, a number of questions are bothering me, but there is this one in particular. As I understand the honourable senator's remarks—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Are you making a speech now?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I am only asking a question. As I understand the honourable senator's remarks, the County Court judges and District Court judges are to be included with the Supreme Court judges in the requested amendment to the British North America Act, so that in future, if I understood the honourable leader correctly, it will be necessary, if we wish to change the retirement ages of the County Court judges, to ask the Parliament of Great Britain to do it. Is that right, and if so why?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think the honourable senator knows as well as I do that in 1912 an act was passed fixing the retirement ages of County Court and District Court judges at 75, and ever since that time there has been some doubt in the minds of constitutional lawyers as to whether or not it should have been done in that way. Many contended that it should have been done by an amendment to the British North America Act, and the only reason why District and County Court judges are included in this motion is so that the doubt may be removed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that he expects to have an amendment to the British North America Act which will enable the Parliament of this country to amend the act without going to the United Kingdom? If that is so—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not say that at all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, I understood him to make a statement like that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, no, I never said anything like that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then why the urgency? There is certainly a feeling in this country that Canada should be empowered to amend its own constitution, and if that is so why are we enlarging the powers of the imperial Parliament by including the County Court judges in this proposed amendment?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not inclined to answer a question of that nature. It is argumentative from the beginning, and my friend knows it. Attempts have been made along this line ever since 1903, and we are not getting any further with it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: To bring in the County Court judges?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It was the County Court judges that I was referring to. If it is merely desired to resolve a doubt concerning them, would it not be better to apply to the Supreme Court of Canada for an answer, rather than put this thing beyond our control by going to the imperial Parliament?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

OLD AGE SECURITY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Olive L. Irvine moved the third reading of Bill C-63, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, may I say first that I enjoyed the repartee among the members of the legal profession when the previous motion was discussed.

Secondly, I compliment the honourable senator from Lisgar (Hon. Mrs. Irvine) upon the brevity and clarity with which she so ably explained and presented this bill.

Honourable senators, I rise in my seat for two reasons: First, it is only natural that a physician, a medical man, would support this bill to the full, not in the guise of socialism or of state welfarism, but in the true sense of humanity.

Secondly, particularly do I wish to make a few remarks on account of what was said, pertaining to the ennobled profession to which I belong, by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) last Tuesday evening.

The Canadian Medical Association met at Banff, Alberta, last week, and at the very moment that the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina was speaking the Council of the Canadian Medical Association brought forth its resolution. However, honourable senators were informed in this chamber of the remarks by the Secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. A. D. Kelly, which remarks were quoted from the Toronto Daily Star, a newspaper which has been most vitriolic and scurrilous in its attack on the medical profession in this country. Why, I do not know. The president of that newspaper went to prep school with me and I know him very well. Secondly, the managing director has been a patient of our office.

Before I proceed with the statement of the honourable senator, I would bring to his attention the fact that he had the privilege of listening to, and I had the signal honour of introducing, Dr. Wilder Penfield, at a parliamentary luncheon here about two weeks ago. What did Dr. Penfield say? Bear his remarks well! He wanted controls of no kind, whether they pertained to education or anything else. And he illustrated that beautifully in a magnificent address. There was a great brain talking, the inner working of the supremely balanced intelligent man. But, I will not confine my statement to a medical man of his international reputation: I will go to the legal profession.

Sir Hartley Shawcross of England, speaking before the Society of the Fellowship for Freedom, stated:

> The objects of the welfare state tend to become the components of the statistical total, rather than human beings, with complex and infinitely different personalities.

The honourable senator, after quoting his remarks from the Toronto Daily Star, found out next morning that he had been a little premature in his final diagnosis. The resolution introduced at the Canadian Medical Association on Tuesday, June 14, and unanimously passed, stated:

> The Canadian Medical Association believes that a single Government-controlled scheme of medical care is not the answer to our problem. The association will support any program of medical services insurance which adheres to certain specific principles and it outlined them in detail.

I will allow honourable senators to draw their own conclusion.

But let us proceed a little bit further. The honourable senator quoted the report of a committee of the National Health Service in Great Britain, which recently has been published, and he stated:

> The committee found that after five years of operation of the service, the per capita outlays were about the same as when it was established and that costs as a percentage of the Gross National Product were declining; so the project received full support and there is no longer a political question in that country.

Here is the report of the royal commission on doctors and dentists, 1957-1959. One of the members of that committee was the learned John Jewkes, Esquire, Commander of our Most Excellent Order of the British Empire, Professor of Economic Organization in the University of Oxford. What does he say? At page 159 he says:

> I regret that I am not able to sign the report.

What is the true picture of the national health scheme in England? Here it is. In Great Britain, in 1942, the cost of the national health service plan was estimated to be £70 million a year. Actually it cost £170 million that year. For 1958 the cost was running to almost £700 million. With allowances for population and price increases, this is still almost two and one-half times the original estimate. I think that answers that particular statement.

Now, let us go to Saskatchewan. The Honourable Walter J. Erb, Saskatchewan Minister of Public Health, in addressing the Saskatchewan Hospital Association in October 1959, indicated the concern of his Government that overuse of hospital facilities was adding to the cost of the provincial hospital plan. Mr. Erb indicated the plan cost the province around $5 million in 1948 and the cost for 1959 was expected to exceed $33 million. The honourable senator states that the vote in Saskatchewan was a clear indication for the adoption of state medicine. From a population of 800,000 people, half the size of Montreal or Toronto, what do we find? The only promise of state medicine in the Saskatchewan election came from the Douglas Government. Four Saskatchewan voters out of ten cast their ballots for the Douglas Government; six Saskatchewan voters out of ten cast their ballots against the Douglas Government. We do not know, nor does anyone else, to what extent state medicine influenced the casting of ballots; but if state medicine did influence the balloting, if state medicine was the issue, then Saskatchewan voted against it by six to four. Where is that province going to get the money? From Quebec and Ontario. Saskatchewan is the province that has, or at any rate it states that it is going to have, a comprehensive scheme of medical care. Ontario and Quebec cannot afford any such luxury; indeed, they cannot afford the sheer necessities. As matters now stand pertaining to the province of Ontario, there is a gap of $125 million a year between what Ontario can do and what Ontario ought to be doing in the way of essential services. In other words, both Quebec and Ontario pay abundant taxes so that Saskatchewan can enjoy abundant living. These two provinces scrape and pinch and do without so that Saskatchewan can spend high, wide and handsome on medical schemes, on low-cost housing projects, on providing farmers with indoor plumbing.

The doctor-patient relationship may most simply be described as a request from the patient for help, with the assumption by that patient of an obligation to reimburse the doctor. The Government—this is Saskatchewan—in its proposed plan, enters this relationship, not in the area of responsibility of the physician to the patient, but in the area of the responsibility of the patient to the physician. The Government literally removes that individual responsibility and becomes a monopoly for the employment of physicians. I ask my honourable friend if he would like that to apply in principle to the legal profession of this country. The honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies), speaking in England the other day, was very much concerned about the restriction of freedom of the flow of news and information. I am quite sure that he would concur, if he were here today, on how physicians would feel on restriction as a result of a monopoly by government.

Just a few more words on this Government control compulsory prepaid medical care plan for Saskatchewan. What are the actual facts? At present, two thirds of the population, or some 655,000 people, have prepayment protection or some other form of health insurance as follows: 320,000 are in medical plans; 175,000 are in municipal doctor plans; 60,000 under commercial carriers; 50,000 under the Swift Current health region; 30,000 under the Old Age pension and Mothers' Allowances and 20,000 under social aid; in addition there are those who pay direct or receive care from the Department of Veterans Affairs. A survey of general physicians' medical accounts shows that only 9.6 per cent of the accounts were not paid in 1959. This represents all those who didn't, couldn't, or wouldn't pay. Everybody, however, received their care.

The Government wishes to appear beneficent and stresses only the appeal of the unfortunate. From the time of Bismarck to the present day that has been the appeal, and the doctor is the first man to admit that such a group does exist. Since medicine began, it has been the privilege of the profession to care for the illness of this group, and I speak from thiry years of practical experience, giving them the best care that medicine could provide without thought of recompense. Indeed, it is well known that the out-patient departments of our city hospitals have been brought to the highest quality of medical care obtainable anywhere, for this group.

This plan, in my opinion, is nine parts evil to one part sincerity and it is a procedure which may be an advance in the field of vote getting, but it would be a complete failure in medical research, medical practice and surgical practice. In an article written in the Canadian Catholic Register a few weeks ago, I stated:

> The remedy for this creeping socialism must come from Canada's youngsters; if they can learn that nothing comes easy in life, that they shouldn't be spoon fed by the federal Government or any other Government, that if they work hard they will be successful, well, then this country will survive. If our children, yes and its citizens will grasp the idea that their real security is found in their hearts and hands instead of in fringe benefits and the so-called compensation of the welfare state, then they and our nation are secure against communism.

Finally, as the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) said in this house a few weeks ago, this country does not need state medicine. To doctors, regimentation is regimentation, whether it is imposed by the Government, by labour unions, or by an insurance industry. They genuinely believe that this unfortunate trend will ultimately impair the quality of patient care. They believe that free enterprise, the profit motive and competition are as much in the public interest when applied to doctors as they are when applied to any other segment of the economy. They believe that by working with all groups they can help stem the tide toward paternalism and the welfare state. They recognize and are proud of the fact that their primary mission is the service of humanity.

Yet they believe that the financial rewards of their work should be commensurate with the tangible and intangible value of the service they give when the means exist. When the means actually do not exist, they will continue, as they always have, to give their services for less than their actual value, or for nothing. They believe that their willingness to do this should not be construed as total unworldliness subject to any imposition. They are a numerical minority in a changing world that demands more and more of them and yet offers proportionately less and less in return. They are not as intransigent as they are made out to be. They are glad to work in good faith with anyone who joins with them for the benefit of their first concern, their patients. They suspect, with some justification, that their good will and conscience are being exploited and they consider this neither necessary nor desirable. They recognize their imperfections and shortcomings and they know that the unscrupulous few among them have tended to give a bad name to them all. They do not think that this is a reason for destroying a whole edifice which, imperfect though it may be, has been built in the interests of humanity. Democracy, in endeavouring to pull down all, may pull down one of its most valuable possessions. It would be difficult to rebuild it. Let it be preserved, improved and strengthened.

Honourable senators, I am in complete support of this bill.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks before the passage of Bill C-63, and to deal with one or two questions which arose when the bill was in committee and which are not on the record of this house at the present time.

Many of us who attended the committee were a little disappointed that no cabinet minister was present to answer certain questions. It is true that there were two highly qualified and skilled servants of the Government there, and with their presence we found no fault, but there were one or two questions we raised with regard to matters of policy which should have been answered by a minister, and which the officials could not answer. A question was asked one of the officials with particular reference to the matter which I am now raising, and I am placing it on the record of Parliament so that all who run may read. This question was asked with respect to section 3 of the bill: Is it possible for a person who lived in this country 25 years after he became 21 years of age, and left the country, to obtain the old age pension of $55 a month when he returns to the country? The answer was yes.

I should like to point out to honourable senators just where this situation leads us. Before coming down to the chamber tonight I looked up the record of the number of people leaving Canada. I learned that from 1950 to 1957 some 253,337 Canadians left Canada for the United States, and that during those same years 35,072 Canadians returned to Canada, leaving 218,265 Canadians in the United States. Those figures, as I say, apply to a period of only seven years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could the honourable senator give us the figures of the reverse situation? How many citizens of the United States came to Canada during that period?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I do not think those figures are available or are a matter of record. It is worth remembering that the figures as to the returning Canadians come from official records of the United States. Apparently we have no official record of the number of Canadians returning from that country. It is so stated in the Canada Year Book for 1958.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do we not have the immigration figures?

Hon. Mr. Reid: We have the figures as to the number who migrate to the United States, but we do not have the number who emigrate from that country. Therefore, we have to rely on the United States figures as to the number of Canadians returning to this country, and I have given the figures.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question? Were the Canadians who returned some of those who left Canada during that seven-year period?

Hon. Mr. Reid: We do not know. It would take a great deal of research to find out who the persons were and whether they went back and forth between Canada and the United States during those years. All we have to go on are the bare figures given to us in the Canada Year Book. As to who left the country and who returned, they may or may not have been the same persons. An honourable senator sitting nearby just tells me that he asked the same question of one of the directors and was told that there are no figures available in answer to that question.

As I came along the corridor leading to the Senate chamber tonight I spoke to an official who remarked: "Am I ever glad to hear about this bill! I have written to my sister who lives in New York. She can now come back here, pick up her pension and return to live in the United States." I predict that the parade will start just as soon as the effect of this bill becomes known. That is one of the reasons I would have liked the minister to be present in committee, to ask him whether he had gone into this specific question. Naturally, we could not blame the officials for not informing us, because they were acting under the minister.

Some people may think that I am against social security. I am not. But I can see many things that could be done for the betterment of our people other than handing out pensions to those who are going back to live in the United States or some other country and spend Canadian funds. That spending is a dead loss to this country of money which has been raised from the Canadian people. I refer particularly to persons who stay out of the country for 25 years and then come back in. Will anyone say that a person who has been out of the country for 25 years has contributed anything at all toward the pension which we are going to give him? Personally, I would rather have seen the Government do something for the blind and disabled persons of this country, perhaps give them an old age pension of $55 a month at the age of 60 or 65 years. I am one who believes in providing bread to all rather than cake to some. Hence, I express my objection to section 3 of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ESTATE TAX BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson for the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not propose to deal with many of the provisions of this amending bill. I intend to confine myself to three sections which I think are rather important. Most of the other sections have to do with the sort of thing that inevitably occurs when we have a piece of new legislation or a codification of existing law, in the working out of which it becomes inevitable that changes must be made to meet the situations in practice.

I propose to refer to sections 1, 2 and 6 of the bill. I refer to section 1 because the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) in his explanation suggested that the purpose of the introduction of the amendment was to plug a loophole which had been found to exist in the estate tax law. If what this does is plug a loophole, then there is certainly a completely new definition of "loophole", so far as I am concerned. What this amendment does is deal with a situation where in the course of employment an employer protects an employee by a policy of insurance on his life, the proceeds of which may be payable to the wife or the children of the employee. This section provides that in those circumstances, the proceeds of that policy shall be included for the purpose of determining the aggregate value of the estate of the employee when he dies.

I must assume, from what the honourable sponsor of this bill said, that this sort of thing is not covered by the provisions of the Estate Tax Act as it presently exists. I think, possibly, that is true, because when I examine the provisions of the act on this point I find in the various situations that are covered there is some interest by the employee in the proceeds of the policy. The policy may be payable to the estate; the policy may be a policy which, although it is payable to a trust, is payable to a trust over which he has some control; or it may be a policy in which he shares with others some interest. But, as far as I can see, this amendment is an extension of a principle which is found in the existing law reaching out to cover in another aspect all possible assets to be included in the estate of the deceased person.

I throw out this suggestion, that if the law is intended, or is to be made, to reach out and gather in for estate tax purposes the proceeds of an insurance policy in such a situation, then the proceeds should be looked at more in the light of a gift, and the only portion of the policy that should be brought into the estate for purposes of value for estate tax should be the portion that can be related to the last three years of the person's life, because such a policy may be in existence for a number of years. If the employee were given money in that period, or if the employee were even contributing money in that period, he would qualify under the gift provision. If he is regarded as having some interest, my difficulty is in appreciating what interest he may have, because certainly the widow could sue the insurance company for the proceeds of the policy and could collect in that action, but the estate nevertheless would have to pay the estate tax. I may be exaggerating when I say I can conceive of a situation where the proceeds, when added to the estate for tax purposes, might raise the valuation of the estate to such an amount that by payment of the tax the estate itself would be impoverished.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or obliterated.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, you can use whatever word is strong enough to indicate that there would not be any cash left.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I want next to deal with section 2. Section 2, generally, is designed to cover in a different way a situation that is presently covered in the estate tax law, and that is the situation where a man in his lifetime will part with some portion of his assets in return for an agreement or an undertaking to pay him an annuity at a stated amount for the balance of his life.

Section 4 (2) of the present Estate Tax Act applies where a person transfers property —and generally the transfer is to someone in his own family—in return for an annuity to be paid to him. Under the present law, and even under the law as it will be when this amendment is passed, if the annuity paid does not exceed 5 per cent of the value of the property transferred, there is deemed to be no consideration. But, if the annuity exceeds 5 per cent of the value of the property transferred the original section 4 (2) (b)—that is the present law—deemed the consideration to be the amount by which the capitalized value of the annuity exceeded the capitalized value of a 5 per cent payment. Under the present law the difference between the property transferred by such a person in exchange for the annuity and the deemed consideration which is received in the form of the annuity was to be included in the aggregate value of his estate.

The change which takes place in this proposed amendment, as I indicated, does not change the situation where there is no difference between the annuity and the deemed consideration. If, however, the annuity exceeds 5 per cent of the value of the property transferred the amendment provides that the payments actually received are added together, less 5 per cent of the property transferred, plus interest on each amount of excess from the time of payment to the date of death. These varying amounts are added together and form the consideration deemed to pass for the transfer of the assets. The property included, when this section becomes law, will then be the property transferred in consideration of the annuity, less the consideration so calculated.

May I give an example? Suppose A transfers to B $100,000 in consideration of an annuity of $10,000, and A lives for ten years. At the end of the first year the excess is $5,000, and the addition of all those excesses in each year is going to make up the sum total of the deemed consideration. So you take that amount of $5,000 at a rate of interest of 5 per cent, and you have to make that calculation for nine years, and then you carry on for each year thereafter until you reach the tenth year. You subtract that amount from the value of the assets which were transferred for that annuity, and the result is the amount that is added to the aggregate value of the estate. It will be seen that this new method results in an increase in the deemed consideration in direct ratio to the number of payments made under the annuity, and in most cases the consideration will be higher under the new provision than under the old.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: You did not work the example right through and give us the ultimate figure.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, mainly because I was a bit lazy in putting down the figures for each year, but I am sure my friend will be able to find a moment in which to do it.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Are you sure that the bill introduced by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) did not confuse you on that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, my efforts in calculating interest on a simple proposition in that particular case may have worn out my ability to figure to such an extent that I did not even have the inclination to figure out this one.

The other item I propose to refer to is section 6, which deals with situs of property. Section 6 of the bill provides for two amendments. Both section 6 (1) and section 6 (3) relate to the new provision that, for provincial purposes, where no rules of situs exists for any property it is deemed situate where the deceased died domiciled. These amendments relate to section 9(8) of the present Estate Tax Act, and that section has to do with credits or deductions that you may take on account of provincial taxes.

We can eliminate right away section 6(2), because it is within its own little compartment. It has added the words "for the transfer thereof" to the section as it presently exists. That particular subsection 2 does not change the present rule but further delineates it.

Under the present provision shares and debenture stock are situate in the province of domicile if the corporation maintains a register of transfers there or otherwise where the register of transfers nearest—that is, nearest geographically—to the place where the deceased was ordinarily resident.

The added words in section 6(2) of the bill specify that it must be where the shares of the class held by the deceased could be transferred, and not just where the corporation maintained a register of transfers. It must be in relation to the particular shares.

Just to illustrate, let us say that A dies and is resident in Toronto and has preferred shares in the XYZ Company. There are transfer offices in Toronto and in Montreal, but the Toronto office does not deal with preferred stock. It was considered under the original section that the situs would be Toronto, but the change makes the situs Montreal.

A new paragraph (e) in section 6(3) of the bill provides a new rule of situs in relation to the particular matters about which I am going to speak. Where there is no other rule laid down in section 9(8) of the Estate Tax Act as it presently exists, or where the situs cannot be readily determined under existing rules, then the property is deemed to be situate where the deceased was domiciled. Previously, in my view, where no rule existed I suggest that the common law rules would apply, but this new paragraph would appear to make the common law rules completely inoperative so far as provincial situs is concerned. That is in relation to the particular items with which I am going to deal.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Where would the situs be under the common law?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The ordinary situs would be where the thing is located.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Not the domicile?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is this not an improvement?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It may or may not be.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It works both ways.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am going to illustrate where, in my view, it falls down. It may have the effect of putting the situs of certain particular rights for provincial credit purposes in a province where there is no provincial tax and therefore no credit to be obtained, yet the thing would have its situs in the province which exacts provincial taxes and would not be able to get the credit.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am confused. My honourable friend had better start his illustration.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is noticeable that in the original section 9(8)(a) most of the rules in section 38 are used, except where there are specific rules laid down by section 9(8) itself. Section 9(8) is the section which deals with provincial credit and the qualifications based on situs which would entitle you to get that credit. Section 9(8) imports into it the rules of situs which are found presently in section 38 of the estate tax law, with two notable exceptions. These are paragraphs (l) and (m) of section 38. For some reason or other they have not been brought into the present section 9(8) of the estate tax law.

Section 38 (l) gives a situs to patents, trademarks and industrial designs where they are registered. Section 38 (m) deals with copyrights, franchises, rights or licences and considers them situate where they are exercisable.

It is not known why these forms of property were omitted, why they were excluded from section 9 (8) (a), when all other rules of situs were brought into section 9 (8) in the present law. There are other forms of property which might come within the descriptions which I have read from paragraphs (l) and (m); for instance, goods on ships where there is a bill of lading, dower and courtesy; and there may be other forms of property I do not think of at the moment.

I must admit it is not every day in the week that somebody dies possessing a patent or copyright, but these cases do occur, just as many other cases occur. The rule may be intended to be one of convenience rather than of law, but it would appear to me that by putting this section 6 (3)(e) in the bill and providing a new paragraph (e) in section 9 (8) of the Estate Tax Act, if any dispute arises between the estate and the department with respect to situs the department might very well say, "Since there is some doubt we will invoke this paragraph (e) and say that the situs is where the deceased died," because section 6 (3) (e) says:

> property for which no specific provision is made in any other paragraph of this subsection, or the situs of which, determined as provided therein, cannot with reasonable certainty be identified, shall be deemed to be situated in the place where the deceased was domiciled at the time of his death;

Since the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) likes illustrations, let us take the following. If A is domiciled in Alberta and has a patent registered in Ontario, Ontario will levy duty because that is an asset in Ontario, but this amendment, when it becomes law, so far as the dominion authority is concerned, will say that the patent is situate in Alberta and therefore there is no provincial tax credit applicable.

Whether this has been thought out and a decision has been made to incorporate this provision as a matter of convenience, I do not know. The field may or may not be large, but I can conceive that individual cases may be reasonably large in number, and therefore what I suggest is that we certainly should have a full explanation as to why the provisions of paragraphs (l) and (m) of section 38 were not imported into the provincial tax credit sections when the statute was originally enacted and why we now have the situation where it would appear that the situs of such rights is going to be where the deceased person was domiciled at the time of his death. The full effect may not have been traced through, but if it has been we are entitled to know the reason why before we give our assent to something of this kind.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Blois for the second reading of Bill S-35, respecting the International Boundary Commission.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, first of all, I wish to thank the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) for adjourning this debate for me on Thursday last. Since it was impossible for me to be present, I asked him if he would be good enough to do so. As I am aware of his keen interest in the happy relations existing between Canada and its neighbour to the south, I knew he would be present on that day to follow the debate here. He told me that the honourable senator from Colchester-Hants (Hon. Mr. Blois) had given an excellent presentation of this bill. I have subsequently read the speech delivered by the honourable senator on that occasion, and I would recommend its reading to anyone who was not able to be present last Thursday. The honourable senator explained to the house that there are about 5,500 miles of border across Canada, and that along that border is an area of 20 feet which he described as a skyline vista, a strip which is not land in all instances, because in some cases it is under water. However, the strip of 20 feet extending 5,500 miles across Canada can be followed as the border between our two countries. The honourable senator stated that aerial photographs had been taken from great heights showing this strip across our country. He also explained to the house—and I am repeating something of what he said in order to arrive at my own few remarks—that all disputes between Canada and the United States had been settled by 1903, since which time there have been no disputes between our two countries. He emphasized, and I can only repeat what he said, that since the war of 1812 there have not been any forts, guns or defences of any kind between our two countries, and that the only distinguishing marks between them in most cases are customs houses. We have lived all these years in peace, and I have no doubt we shall continue to live in a similar happy condition throughout the many years that lie before us.

In 1908 a treaty was arrived at between Canada and the United States whereby it was agreed that the boundary line between the two countries would be surveyed and boundary marks set up. The honourable senator informed us that it took from 1908 to 1925 to complete the surveying of that area, and when it was completed, in 1925, another treaty was entered into. It is to that treaty that this bill refers. The treaty provided that the two countries would keep the boundary vistas open; they would move boundary monuments to new sites and establish such additional monuments and buoys as they deemed desirable; they would maintain at all times an effective boundary line between the dominion of Canada and the United States and between the dominion of Canada and Alaska, and so forth.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to read the whole treaty, but I think it would be of interest if I placed on Hansard article IV of the treaty of 1925, which sets out the arrangements in the agreement entered into between Canada and the United States with respect to the permanent establishment of this boundary line. With the consent of the house, I would therefore include this document in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you.

TREATY OF 1925

Article IV

Whereas, pursuant to existing treaties between Great Britain and the United States, a survey and effective demarcation of the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River and through the Straits of Georgia, Haro, and Juan de Fuca from the 49th parallel to the Pacific Ocean and between the Dominion of Canada and Alaska from the Arctic Ocean to Mount St. Elias have been made and the signed joint maps and reports in respect thereto have been filed with the two Governments;

And whereas a survey and effective demarcation of the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States from the Gulf of Georgia to Lake Superior and from the St. Lawrence River to the Atlantic Ocean and between the Dominion of Canada and Alaska from Mount St. Elias to Cape Muzon are nearing completion;

And whereas boundary monuments deteriorate and at times are destroyed or damaged; and boundary vistas become closed by the growth of timber;

And whereas changing conditions require from time to time that the boundary be marked more precisely and plainly by the establishment of additional monuments or the relocation of existing monuments;

The contracting parties, in order to provide for the maintenance of an effective boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and between the Dominion of Canada and Alaska, as established or to be established, and for the determination of the location of any point thereof, which may become necessary in the settlement of any question that may arise between the two Governments, hereby agree that the commissioners appointed under the provisions of the treaty of April 11, 1908, are hereby jointly empowered and directed: to inspect the various sections of the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and between the Dominion of Canada and Alaska at such times as they shall deem necessary; to repair all damaged monuments and buoys; to relocate and rebuild monuments which have been destroyed; to keep the boundary vistas open; to move boundary monuments to new sites and to establish such additional monuments and buoys as they shall deem desirable; to maintain at all times an effective boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and between the Dominion of Canada and Alaska, as defined by the present treaty and treaties heretofore concluded, or hereafter to be concluded; and to determine the location of any point of the boundary line which may become necessary in the settlement of any question that may arise between the two Governments.

The said commissioners shall submit to their respective Governments from time to time, at least once in every calendar year, a joint report containing a statement of the inspections made, the monuments and buoys repaired, relocated, rebuilt, moved, and established, and the mileage and location of vistas opened, and shall submit with their reports, plats and tables certified and signed by the commissioners giving the locations and geodetic positions of all monuments moved and all additional monuments established within the year, and such other information as may be necessary to keep the boundary maps and records accurately revised.

After the completion of the survey and demarcation of the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States from the Gulf of Georgia to Lake Superior and from the St. Lawrence River to the Atlantic Ocean, as provided for by the treaty of April 11, 1908. The commissioners appointed under the provisions of that treaty shall continue to carry out the provisions of this article, and, upon the death, resignation, or other disability of either of them, the party on whose side the vacancy occurs shall appoint an expert geographer or surveyor as commissioner, who shall have the same powers and duties in respect to carrying out the provisions of this article, as are conferred by this article upon the commissioner appointed under the provisions of the said treaty of 1908.

The contracting parties further agree that each Government shall pay the salaries and expenses of its own commissioner and his assistants, and that the expenses jointly incurred by the commissioners in maintaining the demarcation of the boundary line in accordance with the provisions of this article shall be borne equally by the two Governments.

Honourable senators, that treaty of 1925 was approved by a resolution of this house at that time. However, as honourable senators know, a treaty or a convention binds the subject, that is, any individual or a corporate body, in so far as it or the principles embodied in the treaty or convention have been embodied in legislation. Thirty-five years have elapsed since the treaty of 1925, and it has not been embodied in our legislation, and now the bill is presented to us in order to give the treaty legislative effect.

Now, it might be asked what happened in the United States? Well, in the United States a treaty with another country must be ratified by the Senate, and when it is ratified it becomes binding upon the subject. The position, therefore, has been that throughout these 35 years the treaty has been effective completely in the United States, but not so in Canada.

The question I ask is—and if the honourable senator who introduced the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois) does not feel free to answer it, I trust it will be answered when the bill goes to committee—Why is it now, after 35 years, found necessary to implement this treaty by legislation? Apparently we have had no trouble along the border for the past 35 years. Or has there been some trouble which we have been able to get around? It may be so. Or it may be that some trouble is anticipated. In any event I feel we should know why the bill is coming along at this time, why it did not come along ten years ago or twenty years ago. What is the reason for bringing it in now?

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Honourable senators, may I answer the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald)?

From the information I was able to gather, as our population is increasing particularly near the borderline, near the skyline vista that I referred to, there are at the present time, as I mentioned in my remarks, buildings actually on the boundary line itself. Within the last few years efforts have been made to put additions on existing buildings. Now, the commissioners, that is the Canadian and American commissioners working together, have, by personal pleas, been able to argue people out of doing this. But, honourable senators, there is some fear that where there is no legislation backing this up this matter will some day go further. And not only that, but it might happen, as I believe it has in the past, that a number of buildings, such as garages or stores, would be erected on the border itself and spoil the vista that we are trying to keep open. All that is being sought by this bill is appropriate legislation to control such activities. As the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has just suggested, when this matter comes before the committee we could have the appropriate officials present to explain it thoroughly.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I thank the honourable gentleman for his explanation. I think he has given a reasonably complete explanation, but I was a little concerned as to just where this trouble might arise, in what parts of Canada. Apparently there has not been much difficulty in the past, though from what he has just said it appears that some problems have arisen, and it is expected that others might arise in the immediate future.

In any event, I feel that the legislation is very desirable. I think it is unfortunate that over all these years the treaty, which, has been completely effective in the United States, has not been effective so far as Canada is concerned. I should think that would put the commission in a very difficult position.

After this legislation has been passed by Parliament, both Canada and the United States will be in the same position so far as the treaty is concerned. I have no hesitancy in endorsing the bill completely.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Blois) a question? He has stated that for more than a hundred years the only offensive and defensive establishments that exist on the international boundary are custom houses. Is it not about time we got rid of them?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I was wondering if the honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois) would give us a little more information.

I notice that the scheme of this bill seems to be to enable the commission to exercise control over the boundary, to maintain and erect boundary monuments, and to remove any unauthorized works and things of that kind. I also notice that the definition of boundary in the definition section means the international boundary between Canada and the United States of America as determined and marked by the commission. I find that to be the definition, but I do not find in the operative part of the bill any specific authority to establish a boundary. I see there is authority to enter upon and pass over the land of any person in order to gain access to the boundary or to survey the boundary, but on what basis does the commission make a determination of the boundary? Or is the boundary established by other authority and administered by the commission?

Hon. Mr. Blois: I think if the honourable senator refers back to the treaty of 1908 and also to that of 1925 he will find the boundary was laid down some time ago, and the commissioners are only given authority to see that the boundary and the boundary monuments are maintained. This matter was straightened out prior to the appointment of the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Then I wonder why the definition of boundary is framed in the way it is, because it definitely means the international boundary between Canada and the United States of America and its determination by the commission. From my honourable friend's speech on explaining the bill and from what has been said here tonight, I would rather think that the commissioners do not determine the boundary at all, but that it has already been determined and they are simply put in charge to administer it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CRIMINAL CODE (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT) BILL

BILL WITHDRAWN

On the order:

Second Reading of Bill S-6, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (Capital Punishment)".—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, when I introduced this bill on January 20 and it received its first reading. I said:

> Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to abolish capital punishment. This bill is identical with a bill which is now before the other house and which at two other sessions has been talked out there. I feel it is time that Parliament spoke out on this human problem. When the bill is called for second reading I intend to ask that it stand to await progress of the House of Commons bill.

The House of Commons has provided extra time for discussion and debate, and is likely to provide even more time at this session.

In those circumstances, at this late stage in the session, I ask permission to withdraw this bill. I just say that if the bill in the other place is not finally acted on I will be back again with my bill next year, when the problem will still be a live one.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, bill withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the order for resuming the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Robertson, who drew to the attention of the Senate the desirability of reciprocal agreements with the Twenty-Nation group.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I was hoping that the honourable senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) would proceed with his remarks on this order tonight. We have a great many Government bills on the Order Paper which I would like to have advanced to the head of the list.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall ask that the order for the second reading of Bill C-73, to amend the Excise Tax Act, stand until tomorrow, and that it be placed as Order No. 1 on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I intend to make a similar request with respect to Order No. 10 for the second reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Customs Tariff. We have to get these budget bills through.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Then, why not go on with the Excise Tax Bill or with the Customs Tariff Bill tonight?

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, since I am the cause of the commotion, may I say that I am now prepared, and have been for some time, to go on with this debate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Then let us go on with it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know when the honourable senator will get a chance to speak if he does not take the opportunity now.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Does the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) wish the house to proceed with the Excise Tax Bill next?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not want anything in particular. I just do not want all of these orders to be placed ahead of my bill.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, if it is agreeable to the house I will proceed now.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 15, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Robertson, who drew to the attention of the Senate:

1. The desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group who are presently examining ways and means of achieving closer economic co-operation, and in particular with the U.S.A., and the two European trade blocs, the Inner Six and the Outer Seven, for the progressive removal over a period of years of trade obstructions in order that our ability to trade profitably will be maintained and increased through

(a) the progressive reduction of our costs of living and production; and

(b) the progressive reduction of specific obstacles to our exports that may presently exist, and to guard against the creation of new ones.

2. That by becoming closely associated economically with their 500 million peoples, we will remove the tragic possibility of Canada's becoming isolated from the great modern currents of trade and commerce. By our precept and example we will contribute to removing the possibility of a trade war developing between the two sides of the Atlantic, a development that the Soviet Union fervently hopes for and which might well enable the communist world to accomplish economically what they have failed to do militarily.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, we are indebted to the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) for initiating this discussion on our current trade problems, a subject which he has raised on previous occasions. The purpose of this inquiry type of motion is to focus our attention upon the danger signals and challenges that face us as we assess the meaning of external developments in trade in the form of the emergence of Western European trading blocs, in the form of meetings of the Twenty-Nation group, in the form of more stringent competitive conditions upon the world markets for what Canada has to sell, and to relate these to our internal developments, to the increasing foreign control of our economic enterprises, to our own rising costs of production, to our problems with the rising tide of imports, to our high level of unemployment during a period of increasing business activity, to the increase of imports and to other obstacles which are having an impeding effect upon the sale of our products, both at home and abroad. Everyone in this house understands and appreciates the cardinal importance of our current trade problems, and I hope that many more honourable colleagues will take part in this discussion, to give us the benefit of their experience and thoughtful reflections.

Although I am now speaking for myself, I believe that my sentiments will be shared by the majority of my colleagues when I say how much we appreciated what was to me a most helpful explanation of the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) with respect to the broad historical perspective of the high aims and aspirations which governed the evolutionary development of trade relations in the Western world during the past two decades. Because of the honourable senator's wide experience with public problems, the light he shed upon the historical context of international trade relations and the support he gave to this motion were highly significant to me.

Honourable senators, my contribution to the discussion of the problem of the desirability and the growing necessity of entering into reciprocal agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group will not be learned or exhaustive, for I am not an economist and not a particularly good student of trade developments. Approaching the problem strictly as a lay person, I hesitate to do anything more than to explain my concern about two basic problems which do have a bearing upon the inquiry we are considering, namely, how are we to plan and to act so that the Canadian economy may produce more and sell more, not only to Canadians but to non-Canadians, so that there may be more jobs for those who are now unemployed and for those who will be coming into the labour market in ever-increasing numbers, so that our standard of living may be sustained and if possible improved by a steady net growth in our productivity and by a progressive refinement of our application of the principles of distributive justice.

By we, I mean all levels of government, all public and private economic enterprises, and each and every Canadian, for we are all concerned and we are all involved in answering some very difficult questions which have been placed rather squarely before us by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in a succession of public statements which contain his measured and sober appraisals of facts that are simple and straightforward. You know what some of these questions are. For example, are we living too lushly and beyond our means on the avails of our resources which are being increasingly developed by foreign capital? Can we help the process of re-establishing an equilibrium between our spending and our income through an expansion of domestic secondary industries with their creation of jobs here in Canada? Do we need to borrow so much abroad to maintain employment and national growth? Do we need to import so much equity capital, or can our saving and spending be more effectively directed so that we do not run into so much risk of foreign economic control? Do our present unemployment figures show that we are misdirecting our spending?

I want to bring to your attention this meaningful summary from an address by the Governor of the Bank of Canada delivered in Winnipeg on January 18, 1960, to a meeting of the Canadian Club. He said:

> In our country, pursuit of an excessive and unsustainable rate of capital expenditure since the war has not only contributed to the unstable cycle of short-lived boom followed by a recession but has also been responsible for a growing deficit in our international balance of payments, a large excess of imports of goods and services over our exports, increasing reliance on foreign resources to finance (directly or indirectly) both capital projects and consumption, and a great increase in our foreign debt and in the annual burden of debt charges. It has also produced a higher level of interest rates than might otherwise have appeared, and recurrent periods of tight money and difficulties in the field of bank loans and bond markets.

Into this context I am tempted to add that perhaps we need to take a new look at Government policy on trade and tariffs, and that industry and business may need to sacrifice some immediate profits by intensifying and extending its search for diversification, efficiency and economy. Organized labour bodies have a most significant role to play in this search for increased productivity and economy, or, as Governor Coyne puts it:

> In one way or another those of us who are employed must contribute out of our resources to help share the cost of unemployment and to help create conditions in which greater employment opportunities will be available.

As I intimated, I wish to bring to your attention two problem areas which are tied to and symptomatic of our trading difficulties which, for want of a better name, I choose to call "illustrative exhibits". I shall first deal with our position with respect to our international balance of payments.

Just tonight the Ottawa Citizen featured an editorial entitled "Dependence on Outside Capital". If you examine the first quarter of 1960 the situation, roughly, is this: We exported, thank goodness, more than we imported, so our deficit on merchandise to all countries is only $46 million for the first three months, which is $108 million less than in the first three months of 1959, but on total imports and exports—that is merchandise, tourist trade, freight charges, etc.—we have deficited 40 per cent more than during those comparable three months in 1959. The result has been that we have imported $380 million in net new capital as against $262 million in 1959, and of this amount of $380 million, honourable senators, $175 million, or twice the 1959 figure, came into Canada to be directly invested in foreign-controlled enterprises.

Not long ago the Financial Post reviewed the activities of the Australian trade commission which had been visiting Canadian cities for some six weeks. Sir Douglas Copland, the leader of the mission, told the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto that in some respects the economies of Australia and Canada are complementary, since both nations have the great advantage of youth, great natural resources still to be explored and utilized, and since both are enjoying rapid increases in population and national wealth. Because of the efficient functioning of the Australian Loan Council which controls all governmental borrowing and the loans of publicly owned utility commissions, he pointed out that the financing of capital investment, without incurring too heavy a load of debt, had been accomplished smoothly, with the happy result that the great bulk of the debt is internal.

Of special significance to me were three bar graph charts which compared Canada with Australia in three significant aspects of present economic development. These bar graphs were given in the Financial Post of June 11, and their accredited source is the Australian Trade Commission to Canada. The bar graphs are very interesting. In unemployment Canada had at that particular time —and it does not say the exact date upon which these comparisons were made—an unemployment figure of 8.9 per cent, and the figure for Australia is .6 of 1 per cent. In foreign ownership of industry Canada's figure is 65 per cent and Australia's is 10 per cent. In foreign trade deficit Canada's figure is $1,400 million, and Australia's is nil.

Although honourable senators are thoroughly acquainted with the basic facts about Canada's external trade in 1959, it does seem significant to refer to the Annual Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce in order to review the salient features of our trade imbalance. In 1959 we exported 5 per cent more, or $5,140.5 million. We imported 9.3 per cent more, or $5,519.4 million. The Annual Report then analyses the commodity pattern of changes in the exports and imports, and the direction of trade, and so on, but the most significant thing is, of course, the analysis of the balance of payments at page 21 where the report deals with this problem and, among other things, says:

> From 1958 to 1959, exports rose less than imports and the deficit on merchandise trade increased from $156 million to $378 million.

Further on it states:

> For the second consecutive year the merchandise deficit in Canada's trade with the United States declined; from $564 million in 1958 to $538 million in 1959 . . .

Then it is significant to note that in trade with the United Kingdom and the commonwealth countries the Canadian export surplus fell from $338 million to $246 million as sales to these areas rose very slightly, while imports increased by 13.5 per cent. And then with all other countries, the merchandise balance changed from an export surplus of $55 million in 1958 to an import surplus —that is a deficit—of $96 million in 1959, and the net result, taking non-merchandise items into account, was that Canada's external deficit on current international transactions rose from $1,085 million in 1958 to $1,460 million in 1959, which is $400 million more, a 40 per cent increase in our deficit in one year.

I believe that here we come to the core of the problem which is surely related to trade, for as I understand things this deficit in the balance of payments can only be remedied in one of two ways: either by releasing more goods and services for export and actually selling them abroad, or by reducing Canadian demands on foreign resources. There is a third way, and I want to refer to it indirectly by pointing out that in the Financial Post issue of November 21, 1959, under the heading "United States Control on Rise in our Vital Industries" Mr. Michael Barkway starts this way, and I think it is an important point to be considered:

> If the twentieth century belongs to Canada, whom does Canada belong to?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Wall: I should now like to refer to a very interesting analysis of the problem of the Canadian balance of payments which was prepared by the Canadian Bank of Commerce and issued on May 16, 1960.

Our 1959 deficit, and we have had these consistently since 1952 in mounting overall size, was, as I stated before, $1.46 billion. And the question arises why have we entered a chronic state of growing deficits in both merchandise and non-merchandise items which means that we are incurring foreign debt or increasing foreign ownership of Canada? To do what? To pay for both a higher level of capital spending and a higher standard of comfort which are perhaps higher than would be justified by our own earning capacity. In other words, are Canadians spending more than they are earning and are we earning less because of an over-supply situation in the world's capacity to produce many of Canada's staple exports, because of other countries re-establishing their markets at our expense, because of restrictions against Canadian goods and services, because of the birth of regional trading blocs, and because of our high cost economy to which the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) referred so aptly and succinctly?

More knowledgeable men than I must assess these background factors which are responsible for this growing and to me alarming imbalance of payments and what steps must be taken to reverse this deficit situation. All I know is that we are steadily going into debt to non-Canadians, and I am not solaced by statements that the imbalance in Canada's transactions has not yet proved very troublesome or burdensome or that all this deficiting will really be beneficial, for the net capital inflow required will build our economy, will produce more wealth and will make us all more prosperous some time. This is true but there is another side to this point. Furthermore, our present unemployment figures take the edge off this exuberant confidence, for somehow the tremendous injections of capital into Canada have still left us with this painful and unresolved problem which was discussed by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association just recently: "How can we create more jobs in industry"?

I would refer honourable senators to Governor Coyne's remarks to the Ontario Chamber of Commerce at Hamilton on May 12, 1960, when he gave this very sober and rather stark picture:

> We are sometimes told, by foreigners, that we must not contemplate reducing our reliance on new foreign investment each year, and correspondingly our excess of imports over exports, because it would lead to an increase in unemployment. This is absurd, and indeed it implies that only a further increase in the annual rate of increase in foreign debt—and imports—could enable the Canadian economy to achieve full employment. It is simply not true that Canada has to continue to borrow abroad, and import vastly greater quantities than it exports, in order to maintain economic growth and full employment for a growing labour force.

Honourable senators, between 1946 and 1956 and before we felt the full impact of the competition of the rebuilt industries of the Western world, Canada's gross national product per capita in real constant dollars rose by 19.3 per cent, Canada's labour force rose by 19.7 per cent and Canadians holding jobs increased by 19.5 per cent. Notice how balanced that seems to be. But between 1956 and 1959, when we had the greatest injections of foreign capital, the labour force rose by 7.7 per cent, the real gross national product per capita actually decreased by 4.1 per cent, and the number of Canadians employed rose by 4.9 per cent. We are now beginning to lose the battle. You will readily see that we are losing, at least temporarily, the employment battle despite the huge injections of foreign capital to increase our productive capacity and to create more jobs.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Might it not be worse without that capital?

Hon. Mr. Wall: Might it not be worse? That is a moot point, honourable senators. I would say no—that we could do more on our own resources.

Not only are we mortgaging our future, either by straight loans or by enlarging foreign equity control over our economy—and you will notice that our interest and dividend payments plus retained earnings are now passing the respectable sum of $1 billion per year—but our deficits on what I choose to call the ordinary day-to-day expenses of ordinary living are almost $400 million on merchandise alone. As an ordinary layman, I would include with these current day-to-day expenditures, for which we should pay now, these other expenditures which we should not push off on future generations, such items as deficit on travel expenditures of $192 million; freight and shipping, $95 million; inheritances and migrants' funds, $55 million; and all other current transactions, $332 million.

You will see, honourable senators, that what we are dealing with is day-to-day living national deficits of another $1 billion a year, and it is becoming increasingly apparent that most of this is for consumer goods and services, and not, or I said before, to increase our capacity to produce more jobs and more wealth tomorrow. I believe that it is one thing if we as a Canadian family borrow from one another, but no sensible Canadian family would be able to maintain its economic integrity and stability if it continued to pile up deficits in this fashion year after year. You will say that a country is different, and that is true, but is it that much different? Should we not examine most carefully why we are in effect overspending, how we are financing these deficits, and what this will mean for Canadians in the future?

If we were only borrowing to pay for these deficits, then I would not be so concerned; but the problem has other and, I believe, more serious ramifications, and these revolve around the increasing non-Canadian control of our industry and business generally.

What, honourable senators, is the real meaning of the warning of the Governor of the Bank of Canada regarding this continuous trend in our imbalance of international payments, which you will find on pages 7, 8 and 9 of the bank's annual report for 1959?

A rather interesting example of a country's concern about the imbalance of payments can be found in the June 4 issue of Foreign Trade, a publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In it is an article by the Canadian Assistant Commercial Secretary of Caracas, dealing with the increasing of import controls by Venezuela. The heading of the article says:

To foster local industry and safeguard the balance of payments, Venezuela is stepping up import control.

I am bringing this to your attention, not because I want to imply that I am in favour of the stringent remedies which Venezuela has chosen to solve this problem—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I hope not.

Hon. Mr. Wall: —but simply to stress that this problem in its Canadian context is grave and urgently demands governmental and non-governmental action.

The 1959 White Book on Italian Economy shows a very interesting picture of Italian economic activity. Sometimes we tend to regard the strength of the economic activity in that country in an improper light. In 1959 the Gross National Product at current prices went up to 6.6 per cent, due largely to increases in the industrial sector of 7.4 per cent. Investments were up 8.2 per cent over 1958. Savings by the Italians now amount to 25.2 per cent of total resources. Of special significance to me was the table of Italian balance of payments. Although there was a deficit in the balance of trade of $131 million, the revenues from tourism, from capital and labour, from other services, and from remittances and gifts resulted in a net surplus on the balance of current payments of $559 million in 1958 and $752 million in 1959. When one looks at the International Monetary Fund Balance of Payments Yearbook, volume 2, which gives us the current account balances for the various countries, it is very interesting to see Canada with a minus figure for several consecutive years, starting with about $500 million, and ending this year with about $1.5 billion. The United States has some minuses, but mostly pluses. France has a surplus this year of $650 million. The Federal Republic of Germany last year had a surplus of $1,709 million, and so on.

I have brought this to the attention of honourable senators because of my layman's concern about our own solution with respect to the balance of payments, which I simply cannot accept as being in a relative state of equilibrium or in a condition of desirable normality. To me, the economic principles underlying the question of the balance of trade and of the balance of payment are as compelling as the law of gravity. We must either spend less abroad for current expenses on services and goods of various kinds, or we must compete more effectively on the United States and other external markets to sell more of our goods and services. How we are to do it is not for me to say, but do it we must, and we should, and I suspect that this sincere concern prompted the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) to introduce his very valuable discussion and to present it with such thoughtfulness and depth.

Into this context of Canadians living within their means and financing more of their industrial, business and public enterprises through internal savings, I would like to interject this thought: perhaps our attention should be directed to the fact that there is emerging the problem of so arranging the equity financing of the private sectors of our economy to permit a still wider distribution of preferred and ordinary stock among the Canadian citizens at large. I believe that broader stock ownership of industry is a sensible and most desirable objective for the kind of capitalism we have today, because in a very real sense it will be a sequential extension of the democractic and free enterprise doctrine in the economic sphere of our national life.

Mr. Eric W. Kierans, the new President of the Montreal and Canadian stock exchanges has lately pointed out that over a period of 16 years, from 1936 to 1951, 603 major Canadian corporations financed 82.2 per cent of their growth by internal or retained funds, and only 9 per cent by bond borrowings from the public, and 9 per cent by the sale of common and preferred stocks.

To me, this means that except for the shifting of equity ownership as a result of sales on our stock exchanges there has been very little extension of the stock ownership of industry and business among the many more Canadians during this 16-year period, and I regard this as decidedly unsatisfactory and unhealthy.

The Financial Post of June 18, 1960, in its editorial section called "The Nation's Business", claims that the typical corporation is fast becoming the big machine run by a few professional management people, whose prime interest is often likely to be very different to that of modest shareholders for whom dividend policy is very important. The article further comments that the capital gains policy frequently followed is usually of prime interest to the well-heeled group controlling a company's stock. Might I submit that there is much to ponder about in these interesting observations of Mr. Kierans. I quote:

Government should concentrate all its efforts on increasing savings in the personal sector. Internal savings by corporations may have already gone too far. It might even be appropriate to devise the necessary tax measures to encourage a wider distribution of corporate earnings.

And to this I would add that it might also be wise to so work things that there will be encouraged a wider distribution of Canadian equity ownership.

Honourable senators, I have just a few more remarks to make and these will deal with the last lines of the notice under discussion, which draws our attention to the emerging problem of the potential economic competition of the Sino-Soviet bloc, and the necessity of avoiding any form of trade war between the two sides of the Atlantic, which is a development that the Soviet Union fervently hopes for, because it might well enable the communist world to accomplish economically what it has failed so far to do militarily.

I would like now to make a few observations about this great basic issue of Sino-Soviet economic competition, which will undoubtedly have far-reaching effects upon the Western world and upon the developing nations of Asia and Africa, perhaps within the next decade. Surely it is quite clear that Canada might be affected more directly and more seriously than many of our Western partners, simply because Canada and the Soviet Union are very much alike in their natural resources and in the kind of exports which both are likely to want to sell on the world markets. Surely it is also evident to all who know something about the Soviet economic machine that it could be a most dangerous and intractable competitor, because of its highly centralized and government-integrated character where domestic requirements can be stringently controlled and where costs of production can be subject to other than strictly economic considerations.

We may now well be enjoying a five-or six-year lull period as the latest Soviet Seven Year Plan to build up its productive capacity and to catch up on its domestic requirements is being implemented, but let us not underestimate the possibilities and the potentialities of the Soviet economic machine which may soon be able to produce export goods in quantity and of good quality and at most attractive prices, especially if we find that our costs have been increasing in the meanwhile.

We have slowly and painfully learned that the Soviets do possess the military power to inflict great physical destruction upon our peoples and their productive capacities, and I need not describe the efforts we are now making to match them in the field of missiles, to erect advance warning systems, and generally to protect ourselves and to make certain that deterrent-type striking forces are ready to launch a devastating counter-offensive.

But have we really roused ourselves to examine the implications of the phenomenal growth of the productive capacity of the Soviet Union and of its satellites? Have we re-examined the basic validity of the many generalizations—fond generalizations I would call them—which we have been making about the Soviet economic system? For example, do we still believe that Soviet industrial and commercial commissars cannot be as efficient and dedicated managers as our leaders are, or that the Soviet people cannot be motivated to dedicated and almost feverish work—and if you want to know what feverish work means, read some of their novels—through a highly potent mixture of fear and incentives, all tied to large doses of a most efficiently propagandized Soviet national pride? Do we still believe that there is something elusive and spurious about the very large annual increases in Soviet production rates, or that the Soviets are not spending enough time on basic and applied research which, incidentally, is organized on an industry-wide basis?

I have in my hand a book called Soviet Economic Power, Its Organization, Growth and Challenge, issued this year and written by Professor Robert W. Campbell, of the University of Southern California. This book is very comprehensive. It is an authoritative account of how the Soviet economy functions and how well it performs its job, and all you have to do is to read the last few pages called "Prospects for the Future" to inform yourself what this very serious-minded and very competent professor has to say about the extent of the competition and progress that this Soviet economic machine will show within a few years.

Then one must say that we must honestly reassess our own position.

What Professor Campbell does is to underline very clearly the greater ease with which this increased productive capacity of the Soviet Union, which is running about 9 per cent a year, may be channelled to military purposes, to non-consumer investment goods purposes, or to external trade, credit or technical assistance purposes to lesser and underdeveloped countries, at very low rates of interest, for very long terms, with excellent propaganda techniques, and always with political objectives in mind.

I have sketched this emerging problem of the economic strength of the Soviet bloc to underline the competition we may soon face in the international markets from the new techniques that are being used by Soviet trade missions and embassies that are filled with technical experts and commercial attachés. If you examine some of the Soviet trade treaties made within the past year or two, you will notice that the U.S.S.R. is prepared to buy anything that their new trading partners have to sell, be it meat, fish, cotton, rice, fibres, raw hides or industrial machinery. Let us not forget that one salesman is able to buy or sell whatever the Soviet economy needs or produces; and often it seems to us that this buying and selling is not in accordance with strict economic necessity or accepted and sound trading practices. How free enterprise, with the assistance of governments, is to meet and solve this emerging problem of Soviet competition is a problem that will have to be given urgent attention on a priority basis, and the sooner the better.

These considerations bring us back to the suggestions contained in the proposal of the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson), that the avenues of trade among friends must be kept open and that our mental map of our overseas markets must be extensive and flexible. For that is how I interpret the senator's emphasis on the desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group who are presently examining ways and means of achieving closer economic co-operation, and to this proposition I give my unqualified support.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your kind attention.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, debate adjourned.

CITIZENSHIP

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN CANADA

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

> 1. Are there any categories of British subjects who are presently living in Canada and who are neither Canadian citizens nor citizens of the commonwealth?
> 2. If so, what are they?

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: The answer to this inquiry is as follows:

1 and 2: No.

The only persons possessing the status of British subject or commonwealth citizen in Canada apart from Canadian citizens are those whose country appears in the First Schedule of the Canadian Citizenship Act or whose country has been the subject of a proclamation under section 34 (2) (a) of the Canadian Citizenship Act by the Governor in Council.

The countries listed in the First Schedule of the Canadian Citizenship Act are "Australia, Canada, Ceylon, India, New Zealand, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom".

Those countries which are the subject of proclamations by the Governor in Council are "Ghana, Federation of Malaya, Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland".

Section 23 (2) of the act provides that every person having in Canada the status of a British subject may be known as a British subject or as a commonwealth citizen.

EXCISE TAX BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William R. Brunt moved the second reading of Bill C-73, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

He said: All honourable senators will recall that when the Minister of Finance made his budget speech in the other place, on the evening of March 31 last, near the end of the speech he referred to certain resolutions with respect to the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act. The resolutions with respect to the Excise Tax Act will be found on page 2687 of Hansard of the other place.

In all, 13 changes to this particular act were referred to in the resolutions, and these are now incorporated in this particular bill.

The bill itself is a short one, containing as it does only three clauses. However, the meat of the entire bill is to be found in the schedule which forms part of the bill and will be known as Schedule III to the Excise Tax Act.

Clause 1 of the bill makes a simple amendment to subsection 4 of section 35 of the Excise Tax Act, as passed by the Parliament of Canada during the year 1952. By this amendment an extension is provided for as to the types of security that the minister may accept from a licensed wholesaler or jobber. Formerly the minister, in accepting Government securities, was restricted to bonds issued by the Dominion of Canada. Now he will be able to accept also other securities issued by the Dominion of Canada, and securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. An example of such would be bonds issued by the Canadian National Railways, which carry the guarantee of the dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would the honourable senator permit me to call to his attention the fact that the provision that the security shall be acceptable to the minister is new? At present there is the rather unusual provision that the security shall be acceptable to the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I had not noticed that change. However, I note that the word "minister" is underlined. I thank the honourable senator for bringing the matter to my attention. The minister is the person who will now pass on the type of security.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I direct the attention of the honourable senator to the fact that the security is not limited to Government bonds.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: As I said, the minister will be able to accept as well other securities issued or guaranteed by the dominion Government. I realize there are other securities that are acceptable and are outlined in the bill. There is no change with respect to these.

Clause 2 of the bill repeals Schedule III of the present act and substitutes a new schedule, which is set out in the bill as Schedule III and will become Schedule III to the Excise Tax Act.

Schedule III relates to the 13 changes to the Excise Tax Act which the minister proposed in his resolutions of March 31 last. It is my intention to comment only briefly with respect to these 13 changes and, when the bill receives second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where witnesses can be heard and a full discussion can take place with respect to each of these changes.

The first change to which I would call the attention of honourable senators abolishes the sales tax on electric heating equipment using 220 volts or greater, and which is a permanent installation as part of an electric heating system for buildings. However, the repeal of the sales tax does not apply to the electric wiring and other materials leading to or connecting such equipment to the source of supply of electric power. This amendment is to be found in the schedule on page 2 of the bill.

The next amendment removes the sales tax from ducts for warm air heating systems for heating buildings. This also will be found in the schedule on page 2 of the bill.

The third exemption applies to speaking aids and the parts used in connection therewith, including batteries. Honourable senators will find this in the schedule on page 3 of the bill.

The following additional goods are now exempt from sales tax: Surgical sutures, referred to in the schedule on page 3; perlite, a form of vitreous rock in globular form, referred to in the schedule on page 6; and portrait photographs of individuals, as set out in the schedule on page 11. The sales tax has been removed also from perforated pipe used for drainage purposes, provided that the inside diameter of the pipe does not exceed four inches.

If honourable senators will look at the schedule on page 5 of the bill they will find that the exemption from sales tax on feeds and feed supplements has been extended to include feed supplements for adding to feeds for fur-bearing animals, and that the exemption applies also to the material used exclusively for the manufacture of these feeds.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is one of the new additions?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: That is right.

In the schedule on page 3 of the bill honourable senators will note that there has been a change with respect to hardware for doors and sash, and further that grease traps used in connection with septic tanks are exempt.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Could the honourable gentleman pronounce the first word under "Charitable, Health, Etc." on page 3? The spelling is "A-d-r-e-n-o-c-o-r-t-i-c-o-t-r-o-p-h-i-n".

Hon. Mr. Brunt: After having listened to my honourable friend spell the word I would not attempt to pronounce it. I will leave it to some of the experts on education to give it the proper pronunciation.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Did I understand the honourable senator from Hanover (Hon. Mr. Brunt) to say that hardware is exempt in this schedule III?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No, hardware for sash and doors is not exempt.

A very important exemption with respect to sales tax has been brought into effect with regard to coverings and materials used in connection with fruits, vegetables, eggs, butter, cheese, ice cream, bread, flour, milk and cream.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does the senator from Hanover think it is an oversight that margarine, which is also a food, has not been included?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I am very sorry I cannot give my honourable friend the answer to that question. I realize that margarine is very dear to his heart. Possibly it may be exempt at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I see that grease traps are exempt.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Surely we would not compare those with margarine.

Full particulars of these exemptions will be found on pages 3 and 4 of the bill under the heading "Coverings". I would point out that covers and crates are exempt even though they are used many times in connection with the marketing of the products mentioned under this heading of "Coverings".

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Can the honourable senator give us any information as to what is meant by the words "usual coverings or usual containers"?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. I understand they were not able to provide a definition for that in the other place either.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is it a matter of what is ordinarily used?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: It may be.

At this time I think it should be pointed out that the Maritime provinces have not been forgotten with regard to the sales tax exemptions which are being provided this year, and I am sure that this will be good news to the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) and the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley). On page 8 of the bill it will be noted that materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage are now exempt from sales tax. I am sure that will be very good news to all people from the Martime provinces.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What about British Columbia? We have fishing vessels there too, you know.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: But British Columbia does not holler in the same way that the Maritimes do.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You are right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): Their need is not so great.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The squealing wheel gets the grease.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What about the great harbour of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: Let us not get into harbours today.

Honourable senators, in clause 3 of this bill it is provided that these changes will come into full force and effect as of April 1 last. I understand that it is usual and customary to include such a clause in all bills of this particular type.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Has the honourable senator any explanation of the item "Portrait photographs of individuals"? Whose portrait is being taken?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I can only assure you that it is not the portrait of the honourable senator from Hanover.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Can the honourable senator tell us what revenue changes will result from these alterations?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: No. Possibly we can get that information in committee.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What is a "perforated pipe for drainage purposes"?

Hon. Mr. Brunt: I understand that it is a drain pipe with holes in it.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I have little to say about section 1 of this bill, for I feel that the explanation given by the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Brunt) is adequate so far as I am concerned and no doubt so far as all honourable senators are concerned.

I think the important part of the bill is Schedule III. In recent years whenever the Excise Tax Act has been amended the practice has been to re-enact the entire Schedule III with the changes proposed in the new legislation. This has been done again and I think it is worth while mentioning that Schedule III contains some nine and a half pages of articles and equipment exempt from the sales tax. Every time the schedule is changed—and there are some 13 or 14 changes this year—and additions are made to the schedule, it means we are exempting from the sales tax the articles included in the amendments.

The changes being made in these nine and one-half pages of exemptions do not represent a substantial change in the Excise Tax Act. What those changes will mean by way of revenue to the country I think we might well find out in committee. But I feel it is important to know just what has been happening about excise taxes.

In 1956-57 the revenue derived from this source amounted to $1,192 million. In 1957-58 it was down a little, to $1,158 million. In 1958-59 it amounted to $1,140 million, and in 1959-60 the take was $1,324 million.

My view is that this is not getting the tax collector off the backs of the taxpayer, for there are more collections being made through the Excise Tax Act this year than there have been since 1956-57.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It may be that there is more business.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Certainly, but there is more tax money coming in. It has been said in this house, as well as in the other place, that the excise tax, being a hidden tax, is an insidious tax, but it is a tax beloved by governments, for, being hidden, it avoids the direct wrath of the taxpayer. It is levied at the wholesale level so that the retailer absorbs it, and he of course passes the tax on to the consumer. It was once said by the present Minister of Finance, when he was in opposition, that this kind of tax attracts markup upon markup upon markup.

Now, without knowing what the change in the revenue is—and I have a feeling that the change through these amendments is not very significant—I think the tax collector will be into the pockets of the Canadian people for excise tax almost as much under this legislation as he would have been if the legislation had not been passed. However, for even small relief from taxes we can be grateful, and in this respect the bill is helpful.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: How much relief is anticipated?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am afraid we will have to get that information in committee. The honourable gentleman who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Brunt) has not the figure, and I certainly have not, nor have I any way in the world of getting that figure.

I would think that even for the minimum amount of relief that might be available under this legislation we should be grateful. Perhaps in another year circumstances and conditions will be more auspicious for greater reductions!

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I must say at once that, looking around the vast edifice of expenditures that we are building up everywhere, I cannot find myself in agreement with the hope just expressed by the honourable senator who preceded me. Excise taxes are a hidden tax. In the great majority of instances, when we buy an article in a shop anywhere there is embedded in the price we pay for it an excise tax that we have imposed in Parliament—at the request of a government, of course, irrespective of its political affiliation. That violates one of the sound concepts of taxation accepted by all important economists. It is a species of plucking the goose without inducing him to squawk.

In my odd reflective moments, I have often speculated what would be the effect upon public revenues if by some means we could bring excise taxes and sales taxes—all indirect taxes—immediately to the attention of the consumer. I venture to say that the pressures for reductions in taxation would be so great that no government could resist them. When a government can get money from taxpayers and fortify its revenues in this fashion there is always a temptation, unless the government possesses extraordinary will power, to spend unnecessarily. Probably there is no more important matter that could engage the attention of Parliament than this matter of how our taxes are levied and how our revenues are secured. Of course, a government does not desire to court unpopularity by imposing taxes that are well known to the individual. Consequently, income tax is about the one tax now that brings home to the individual taxpayer the fact that he has to pay for the expenditures he requests a government to make. In that connection, I have always thought that it was a serious blunder, or rather a serious error—I will put it that way—when we raised the exemptions in the income tax to the point they have reached today. I recall that back in 1932 in Manitoba the provincial Government, of which Mr. John Bracken was then Premier, was faced with a very difficult situation. In order to maintain fiscal solvency and to pay the interest on the outstanding bonds of the province it was faced with the choice of either defaulting on interest or imposing an additional tax, and the Provincial Treasurer of that day wisely, I think, imposed a 2 per cent wage tax, as it was called. If my memory serves me, that tax applied to all incomes over $660, whether derived from wages, salaries, or any other source. So the working man, or the stenographer, who earned over $660 a year had to pay a tax, and the individual who had a salary of, say, $50,000 a year likewise had to pay 2 per cent on that amount. It was a drastic proceeding, and at the time there was a great outcry about it. But what was the result? About a year later the Provincial Treasurer told me, in response to a question, that the imposition of this wage tax had cut down by at least 75 per cent the demands made upon the provincial Government to spend money. If we can bring home to people the fact that they have to pay, out of their pockets, for the services and other things they demand, it will have a very salutary effect upon the demands they make.

It is impossible now, of course, to alter this legislation. For the small mercies it contains we should all be thankful; but I do bring this point to the attention of the house, that the important thing is to curb spending wherever it can be curbed, and I venture to say that if we took a very close look at all the programs of public expenditures today, at all levels of government, we could find very many places where very substantial economies could be effected.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to express my complete agreement with the comments of the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) in regard to this form of taxation, and to thank him for making them. What I rose to say, however, was that I think this house is entitled to some explanation of why these particular items are exempted from the sales tax and others remain subject to it. We have been given no information of that kind at all. For instance, here is an item, doors and window screens. They are taken out of the tax system, they are exempt. Why drop all doors and window screens? Why not sashes and glass and so on? There must be some reason behind exempting these new items and perhaps old items as well. The measure is important for what is not in it rather than for what is. The number of additional exemptions, 13 or 14, is not important at all. What is important is the continued levying of the sales tax on a vast number and quantity of goods. It is a nuisance tax. It is one of the most expensive taxes in which we indulge—I mean from the point of view of the cost of collection, which is very high—and I would congratulate the Government upon the small favours it has given to us and express the hope that the time will come when this type of taxation will disappear.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I do not propose to apologize for bringing a certain subject again to the attention of the Senate. I might give an additional reason why it is an anomaly that margarine is not on the list of exemptions. Going back into more or less recent history, margarine—or, as it used to be called, oleomargarine, which is not the proper name because oleomargarine implies animal fat and margarine is now made entirely from vegetable oil—margarine was quite legal at one time during the First World War and the soldiers abroad were eating it. There was a scarcity of butter. Later on, influence was brought to bear from certain quarters, which we all know, and the question of margarine was fought out in the House of Commons. I can remember taking part in those debates, in which the enemies or opponents of margarine won out, and as a result margarine was again made illegal.

According to my memory, the sales tax was brought in after that. At that time articles of food and many other commodities, whose number I think would reach into the hundreds, were made exempt from the tax, but since margarine was not then a legal commodity it naturally was omitted from the exempted list. Had it then been a legal commodity in this country it probably would have been placed on the list of those foods that are exempt from sales tax.

Since then there has been a great deal of opposition to margarine. My friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) will remember the trouble we had in this house in connection with the bills I introduced to make margarine legal, which bills were rejected. We did ultimately get a favourable judgment from the Supreme Court. But in spite of all the efforts that have been made throughout Canada by the Consumers' Association and other groups of women, who have demanded again and again that the sales tax on margarine should be repealed, and who have tried in the different provinces to have the prohibition against the yellow colouring of margarine repealed, they have not had much success so far. Coloured margarine is permitted in two provinces now, Newfoundland and British Columbia. It almost became legal in Manitoba just a few months ago. A bill to permit colouring of margarine in the province was brought into the Legislature, I understand, and a vote was taken. The division of the house was equal and the Speaker cast the deciding vote, for continuing the ban on coloured margarine.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I have not the slightest doubt that if a vote of the Canadian people were taken there would be an overwhelming majority in favour of exempting margarine from sales tax.

I appreciate that the matter of colouring is not properly debatable here, because it is a provincial matter altogether, but I think this sales tax is an unholy tax as far as margarine is concerned. The tax is 11 per cent, which adds at least three cents to the retail price of a pound of margarine.

Let us look at some of the exemptions we have here and see how truly unreasonable it is to maintain the sales tax on margarine, an article of food at least as important as some which are exempted from the tax.

This is not a food that I am mentioning first, but I notice that sawdust and wood shavings are exempt from sales tax.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And prune juice.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Prune juice, yes, and steel pens for farm animals. I was wondering whether those were fountain pens or the newer type of pens in use now.

Here is a list of foodstuffs that are exempt from the sales tax: baking powder, baking soda, cream of tartar, barley, bread, butter, cheese, cream, eggs, egg yolks, glucose, honey, ice, lard, rice, salt, shortening, soups, split peas, sugar, yeast, yogurt, edible gelatine, gravies, ice cream—and now I think even the containers for ice cream are added to the exemptions. Then we have jams, jellies, marmalades, preserves, malt syrup, maple syrup, corn syrup—and corn syrup being a substitute for maple syrup we ought to think seriously of putting a sales tax on it because it interferes with the income of the farmer who produces maple syrup.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I wonder if my honourable friend has considered this possible answer to his question: that it all depends on who is interested and how much pull he has got.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am coming to that.

Peanut butter is exempt from the sales tax. I think that the butter people ought to protest about that exemption. And here is something that might give cause for concern on the part of the authorities:—sandwich spreads are exempt. I wonder what would happen if a sandwich were spread with margarine? Would that margarine be exempt?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It won't spread.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Oh, yes, it will spread all right. Has my honourable friend tried it?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Well, he tried the wrong brand.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: He must have frozen it first.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Spaghetti, macaroni and vermicelli are exempt. Tea, coffee and substitutes therefor are also exempt. I imagine if tea and coffee were being produced by the farmers of this country they would not allow any substitutes to be exempt from the sales tax.

I have given these examples to show the absurdities that exist in this matter.

Of course as my friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has suggested, the tax is imposed on margarine entirely for one purpose, to satisfy a minority, the producers of butter. And the peculiar thing about it is that the farmers themselves—I know this is so in my own district and throughout the province of Ontario, even in the dairying districts—buy margarine at grocery stores in towns and cities and use it. And even in the province of Quebec, where it is illegal to sell margarine, I am quite certain that one can buy it. I have done so myself, although it went under another name. There is not only inconsistency, but hypocrisy about this whole question of margarine.

I would like to make an appeal to the Government—perhaps I will take definite action later—that it yield to what I believe is almost the unanimous opinion and desire of the people of this country to put margarine on the same basis as other foods.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I would like to say to the honourable senator who has just spoken that I am sorry he is not a dairy farmer and has not the interest of a large section of our people and the health of the people generally more at heart.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What does my friend mean by "health"? Does he mean that margarine is not a healthful food?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Not as good as butter.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Doctors tell us that margarine in many respects is better than butter. We are told that margarine does not contain harmful deposits of cholesterol, whereas butter does.

Hon. Mr. Brunt: There is some doubt about that. Research in that respect is still being carried on.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising to my feet again, but I do not think I should allow the suggestion to go abroad that margarine is not healthful.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is not as healthful as butter.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I had not intended to say anything on this question, but when the honourable senator from Kings (Hon. Mr. McDonald) referred to margarine as being possibly dangerous to health, I felt I should point out to him that some years ago the Government of Canada made a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on the question of the constitutional validity of a federal statute passed in 1885 prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of margarine, the preamble to which statute referred to oleomargarine as being a deleterious article of food, but notwithstanding that fact, the reference material placed by the Government before the Supreme Court as the basic information for the court acknowledged that margarine, as it was known at the time of the reference, was recognized as a wholesome, nutritious and healthful article of food. That was the attitude taken even by the Privy Council when it affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada that the statute in question was unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Why do they colour margarine to imitate butter?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend, I take it, is asking me a question. I wonder if he would tell me at what season of the year butter is not coloured?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It can be coloured.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Why do they colour butter in the wintertime?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brunt, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Lionel Choquette moved the second reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill C-74, is one of four bills required to implement the various budget resolutions which the Minister of Finance introduced on March 31. It would provide statutory confirmation of the amendments to the Customs Tariff which were proposed at that time and which, in accordance with the usual practice, came provisionally into force on the following day.

In introducing this bill, I should like to refer briefly to each of the five sections which it contains, and then to comment rather more fully on Schedule A which is annexed to it. As is usually the case with tariff legislation, the schedule is the most important part of the bill.

Section 1: The purpose of this section of the bill is to insert, in what I might describe as the preamble to the Customs Tariff, definitions of two terms which appear at a number of places in the revised schedule. These terms are "man-made fibres" and "sliver". I believe that the definitions are self-explanatory. However, I might comment that the definition of "man-made fibres" is sufficiently broad to include all of the various synthetic materials commonly known as rayon, viscose, acetate, nylon, orlon, terylene, acrilan and similar fibres, whether cellulose products or true synthetics. This definition, and also the definition of "sliver", is as recommended by the Tariff Board in a report submitted pursuant to Reference 125.

Section 2: This section provides for the deletion from the Customs Tariff of a long list of tariff items, and the substitution therefor of the items annexed as Schedule A to the bill. Many of these items are not changed except as to form and arrangement. However, in other cases there are changes of substance, some of which are important. I shall have more to say about the schedule at a later stage.

Section 3: This section provides for minor amendments to the provisions in the tariff relating to automobile parts. These amendments were requested in a joint brief submitted by the Canadian Automobile Chamber of Commerce and the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association.

The first subsection adds three items to the list of automotive parts set out in tariff item 438c. Item 438c provides that parts listed therein may be imported free of duty if of a class or kind not made in Canada, and if imported for use in the manufacture of automobiles by a manufacturer who achieves the required proportion of commonwealth content —in general it is 60 per cent in the vehicles he produces.

The second subsection provides for a purely technical and nonsubstantive amendment. The third and final change provided for in this section adds two items to the list of parts which may be imported free of duty under item 438d, if of a class or kind not made in Canada, when for use in the manufacture of motor trucks, buses or ambulances by a manufacturer who achieves 40 per cent or more of commonwealth content.

Section 4: This section, in conjunction with Schedule B, provides for a technical change in drawback item 1030. The effect of the change is to delete a part of the item which became redundant as a consequence of the amendment of tariff item 236.

Section 5: This section relates to coming into force. It provides that the various tariff amendments provided for in the bill shall be deemed to have come into force on the day following the budget, which is the usual practice in respect of tariff changes. In the interval between the budget and the granting of royal assent to the resulting legislation customs collectors apply the new rates of duty provisionally.

I think it was the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) who suggested last year that we publish the previous tariff rates as well as the newly proposed ones. The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) remembered that request, and so did I, and we had the rates printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 16, which are likely in the hands of honourable senators now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Congratulations.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Although I shall not be able to explain each item, honourable senators will be able to compare them because of this printing in the Minutes.

Dealing with Schedule A, I remarked earlier that, as is usual with tariff legislation, Schedule A is the most important part of the bill. Honourable senators will note that this schedule sets out in detail the new tariff provisions which are to replace the former items deleted by section 2. Honourable senators will note also that the schedule is divided into three parts. This grouping of the items was introduced in order to facilitate their consideration.

In dealing with this schedule I shall attempt to summarize its main features. I shall not, however, embark on any comparisons of rates of duties or detailed explanations of each of the more than 120 tariff items which are listed in it. A tabular comparison of the new rates of duty with those formerly in effect has been prepared for our use, and has been printed as an annex to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 16, as I have already pointed out. If honourable senators, after examining this material, should wish to obtain additional information regarding any items which are of particular interest to them, I would suggest that they do so when the bill is referred to committee, as I assume it will be.

Part I of the schedule contains what might be described as the "textile package". In explaining it I might, perhaps, refer to what the Minister of Finance said in introducing his budget in the House of Commons. He pointed out that the tariff items included in this part related primarily to textiles, and that the effect was to implement the results of tariff negotiations designed to give effect to certain reports which have been submitted by the Tariff Board pursuant to Reference 125.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask if all the schedules that we are looking at now are complete?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes, they are complete.

This Tariff Board reference included all the textile items. The particular reports in question are those relating specifically to cotton and cotton products, to silk and man-made fibres and their products, and to textile wastes, rovings and yarns. I should perhaps add that the main wool fabric item was revised on a previous occasion, and that there are certain other parts of the textile schedule on which the board has not yet reported and which, consequently, are not dealt with in this bill. I should add also that the need for negotiations arose from the fact that most of the tariff items in question were subject to commitments under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—that is, GATT.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Has the honourable gentleman any reference to the number of items in these schedules that are not GATT items?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I could probably get it at the end of my speech, and if I am able to do so I shall let the honourable gentleman have that information.

The minister noted that the group of textile tariff items dealt with on this occasion involved some increases and some reductions in rates, and that it was found that the increases in duties, of which the most important related to coloured cotton fabrics, somewhat over-balanced the decreases. Hence, in order to conclude negotiations, it was found necessary to offer reductions in the rates on about a score of Canadian tariff items outside the textile field. The implication of this is that this measure affords the Canadian textile industry some additional protection, on balance, as recommended by the Tariff Board, and that this is being matched by reductions in tariffs in other fields.

If honourable senators want to follow Schedule A I will refer to some of the items that come in that category. They are 187e—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: On what page is this?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: This is to be found in Schedule A at page 560ee of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, June 16. Then, 199m is again a reduction where a reduction had to be made, and sugar cane wax, 225c; and 347e, not produced in Canada; 414a, parts of typewriters; 414e, parts of adding machines; and also 463c and 456a.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): These were all reduced?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): This was part of the bargain?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Part of the bargain, yes. Those are just a few examples, but they show that in most cases the Tariff Board, in making its recommendations, sought to make reductions mostly on goods that were not produced or manufactured in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: None of those were textiles, were they?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, no. That is a compromise with other countries for the textile increases.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Were all the textile items increased? Would the honourable gentleman know that?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Not all. You can follow it in Schedules A and B. Part I of Schedule A covers substantive tariff changes resulting from the textile negotiations. It includes also the additional items outside the textile field which were affected by the negotiations. Some of the reductions in question were requested by Canadian industry, while others involve quite small reductions from relatively high rates and these should not damage the industries affected.

Part II of the schedule also relates to textiles, but it contains only changes which are merely matters of form. These changes do not involve any amendments of substance whatsoever, and their purpose is to renumber certain existing items in respect of which the Tariff Board recommended that no change be made, so as to fit them into the revised schedule.

The third and final part of Schedule A covers miscellaneous tariff changes, of which there are thirteen. This is a smaller number than usual. In this connection, it has been indicated that in considering requests for tariff alterations the Government had in mind the fact that this coming autumn an important round of tariff negotiations under the GATT will be initiated, and that some of the suggestions received during the past year might find some place in the forthcoming negotiations.

Of these miscellaneous changes, the most significant tariff increase relates to the first item in the list, which covers what is commonly known as "instant" potatoes. The production of instant potatoes recently commenced in Canada, and with encouragement should expand further. It is expected to provide an important market for Canadian potato growers. The proposed new rate of duty is 17½ per cent. As honourable senators will note from the schedule, most of the other changes in this group are of a technical nature, or involve the reduction or removal of duties in respect of imported materials which are required for use by Canadian producers. The second item in the list will serve as an illustration. Formerly item 124b provided for the free entry of squid, which is used as bait in the fisheries. At the request of the Fisheries Council, the item is being expanded to include octopus and cuttlefish, which are also extensively used as bait.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Where?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It must be down where my honourable friend comes from.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I have never heard of their being used for bait in my district.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I have never used them.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Don't try to.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Apparently it was requested that octopus and cuttlefish be included in the item.

Honourable senators may be interested in the general effect of all these changes taken together on the level of the Canadian tariff. This is a matter about which it is difficult to generalize, and I can do no better than to quote verbatim a brief summary which the Minister of Finance gave to the House of Commons in this regard. He said:

The resolutions propose changes in 123 tariff items. Of these changes 20 are purely formal;

they simply involve the renumbering of existing items as a matter of convenience. A further 49 involve changes in nomenclature without alteration in the rates of duty. Sixteen involve increases in the rates of duty that will be payable, while 38 involve decreases. As on earlier occasions, I should warn that these bare statistics are not very revealing or conclusive, but they do serve to indicate the general balance and moderation with which this Government is approaching tariff matters.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: With respect to the 60 items which bear increases, can the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) give the house any idea of the approximate average percentage of increase? I assume most of them are textile items.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We would have to follow the schedules as printed and compare them.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I would just like an estimate of the average.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: There are only 38 that involve decreases.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I thought my honourable friend said there were 60-odd.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No. Thirty-eight involve decreases, 49 involve changes in nomenclature and 16 involve increases.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) whether the changes in the textile duties coincide exactly with the report made by the Tariff Board following the hearing of the textile industry before the board?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I understand so.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: They exactly reflect the findings of the board?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is quite right.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure we are greatly indebted to the honourable gentleman from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) for the care and trouble he has taken to provide a very good explanation of the bill now before us. This is not the honourable gentleman's first appearance in connection with tariff matters, and he is becoming somewhat of a tariff expert. It is not an easy field in which to become expert and, if I may say so, I think he has come a long way from his first attempt at this. It is a great pleasure to hear from him.

The honourable senator has said that what we have before us is, in effect, a bill to implement a recommendation from the Tariff Board which involved for the most part a lot of items renegotiated under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Practically all of these items are GATT items. There are some that may be of individual interest. For example, with respect to item 66b, it used to be that pretzels came into Canada attracting a most-favoured-nation tariff of 20 per cent. Now pretzels will attract a duty of only 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Croll: All pretzels?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: No; those which come in under the general tariff will still attract a duty of 30 per cent. I also notice—and I wish I had known this some years ago—that under tariff item 530d "hair, curled or dyed" can be imported to Canada at 12½ per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent. There may be some people within the sound of my voice who might be interested to know about this, although like me they might not be able to do very much about it!

I do not know whether anybody is interested in tariff item 559e, which has to do with nubs, slugs, slubs, neps or kemps, which are going to come in free hereafter. It is interesting to note that under the previous schedule the tariff rate was "various"!

I also notice that under tariff item 565 saris of any material are to bear a duty of 20 per cent, 22½ per cent or 50 per cent. There may be some ladies who will be interested in this item. I think it too high.

Honourable senators, I feel that a bill like this is a difficult type to discuss in this chamber. But it does give rise to questions about how these tariff changes occur, and we might spend just a few minutes on this because I believe it to be completely pertinent to this measure. Usually when tariff changes are required, the industry involved goes to the Government, to the minister concerned, usually the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue, and makes representations about the plight of its industry. After consideration of the items concerned the minister may, if the items are not too complicated, apply his policy of more protection, or change the tariff if he sees fit. If the application involves a matter of great complexity he can, under the Tariff Board Act, refer the matter to the board for hearing and decision. That, of course, is what happened in connection with these textile schedules as, indeed, it happened some years ago in connection with the plastic schedule.

The board then arranges a hearing, sets dates, arranges for witnesses to be called by the various parties concerned and hears argument from the people who come before it. Then, after due consideration, it issues its report, which it sends to the appropriate minister. This report can recommend, as indeed the three reports made by the Tariff Board on the textile schedule did, increases in the schedule. This hearing, I think, was very complicated. It involved technical matters.

When the Government receives the report from the board it studies it, and may accept it in whole or in part, or reject it. If the Government is free to accept the report and implement it, then the Government can come to Parliament with its recommended tariff changes. If, however, the Government is not free—and it may not be free because of the GATT treaty—but still agrees with the report of tariff changes recommended by the Tariff Board, its position must be to re-negotiate the items to be affected with other countries signatory to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. That is the negotiation stage, and in this case what would happen, and did happen, was that the Government went to the countries affected and asked for certain increases in the Canadian tariff on these items as they came into Canada. In order to get these increases, Canada had to offer certain other advantages, rate reductions, usually in other fields. In this case, I think they were all outside the textile schedules. Increases were asked in certain textile items in these negotiations, decreases were offered for other items and after those negotiations were completed the minister made the statement of policy on budget night, with the result that we have this bill.

I think it appropriate to say something about the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at this point. The original agreement was finally negotiated at the end of 1947 and came into effect on January 1, 1948 for a period of three years. Originally some 28 countries were affected. Now there are over 40 countries, and the treaty has been renewed from time to time with varying changes. The general purpose of this treaty has been to attempt to forestall tariff wars, tariff disputes, between countries, particularly in the post-war period. There is a new re-negotiation coming up under GATT in December of this year, in Geneva. It is rather heartening for people who believe in the general principle of GATT to know that the Government has been able to secure the services of Mr. Hector McKinnon, former Chairman of the Tariff Board, to lead the Canadian team on that occasion. Mr. McKinnon is an old hand on GATT negotiations, and, as honourable senators know, he is one of the very outstanding persons who have been in the Canadian public service.

The situation which obtains in respect of these negotiations is not a simple situation, and the trading patterns that have been developed in today's world are much more complicated than they were before World War II, and certainly more complicated still than they were before World War I, when trade treaties were matters of negotiation between individual countries.

I think it appropriate here, in considering this bill, to look, for example, at the problem created by the establishment of the Common Market, called the Inner Six, in Europe. Among those six countries there is going to be, after a twelve-year period, which has already been shortened, complete free trade. In respect of their dealings with third party countries, they are going to have a common tariff, and the minimum of that tariff, it is expected, will be the average of the six tariffs which now apply. What then is the position of Canada in respect of her tariff policies and her trade policies, in the face of the developments within the Common Market?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Did he say the minimum new tariff would be the average of the present tariff? I thought it was to be the maximum.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, I would think it might be the maximum; I would hope it might be the maximum. I would hope that it might be even less than the average, but I think in some respects it could be the maximum, too.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Would the honourable gentleman permit a question? Would he tell me when those decisions were arrived at, to which he is now referring, as to the common tariff against the rest of the world? I ask that because my understanding is that Canada and the United States and other countries are negotiating in regard to these very matters now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Oh, yes, there are continuing negotiations, and the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) and the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson), are quite right.

The original scheme for the operation of the Common Market was set out in the Treaty of Rome a few years back. At the present time Professor Halstead, who is running this operation for the Common Market people—and I heard him speak about this matter in Washington—is hoping that this external tariff will be the lowest possible tariff. The Americans and other nationals concerned about the development of affairs within the Common Market area are negotiating as effectively as they can to have that external tariff as low as it possibly can be. Mind you, the point is that many of these countries, in fact, all these countries, are signatories to GATT, so that whatever tariff increases have to be negotiated there will have to be corresponding decreases offered by these countries in exchange for the increases, just as Canada has had to offer decreases to get the increases on the textile schedule.

I am quite conscious of the difference between the arrangements proposed for the Common Market and the arrangements proposed for the Outer Seven, of which Britain is generally considered the leader. Generally speaking, however, what they will have as between themselves is a free trade area too, and honourable senators I think will appreciate the problem this situation creates for Canada. For example, France and Italy are generally high tariff countries; they are both in the Common Market; their tariffs are bound to come down. Benelux and West Germany have low tariffs. Canada may have had difficulty in getting certain goods into France and Italy. We have not as much difficulty getting goods into Benelux and West German markets because of their low tariffs. But once the new common external tariff has been negotiated, there is going to be a certain amount of resistance to Canadian goods going into those former low-tariff or non-tariff countries like Benelux and West Germany. Likewise, in the Outer Seven, if over a period of years they reach free trade among the seven countries, Danish bacon and butter will have free access to the British market, and Canada of course has a very great interest in selling butter and bacon in the British market. It would mean also that pulp and paper from Sweden would have free access to the British market; and Canada has a great interest there. This free trade arrangement between Denmark, Sweden and British can imperil Canadian markets in the United Kingdom for these products and the commonwealth preferences will not help much.

Honourable senators, what I am saying is this, and perhaps I am painting the lily by saying it, that the trading patterns developing in Europe are matters of very great consequence for a country like Canada, which depends so much upon the sale of her products abroad. The same applies to a new group developing in Latin America. This new group is called LAFTA—the Latin American Free Trade Association. The volume of our trade is not, relatively speaking, very great in that area, but these countries are developing. They are an American group of countries. It is something in which we must continue to have an interest.

I think all this points up the importance of the resolution offered to this house by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson). May I also say this, that I think the documentation of the intentions and the beliefs of the Western world as we know it, given by the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) the other night, indicates most Western countries believe in the principles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They are against tariff wars. They desire to move in the direction of the freest possible trade.

Last night the honourable junior senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) talked about the threat from the economies of the Iron Curtain countries to the economies of the West. It is one thing to have it from him, and it is another thing to have it from the authorities he quoted, but we have it from a greater authority still, with all due respect to him. That authority is the General Secretary of the Soviet Union.

Khrushchev has said, "I will not beat down the West with weapons but I will beat down the West with trade."

There is an increasing urgency on the part of a trading nation like Canada to do everything it can, first to maintain the strength of its own economy, and to co-operate for the development of the economies of the West. The danger to the West, the danger to the trading position of the West, and the danger to the stability of the West arises from the Russian state-trading threat.

Honourable senators, I say the bill before us is a good object bill to consider in this general background. It is technical, it is narrow. I say there are developing new trading patterns. There are developing in this Western world new skills, new processes. There are new countries awakening, and they are going to be factors in the trading that goes on in the West. I say that at the present time what this country needs very much is a bold and imaginative and realistic policy on foreign trade. This policy is not to be found reflected in or emerging from this bill. I am not being critical of the bill, because this bill simply reflects the result of certain mechanical processes which have gone on to produce certain relatively minor tariff changes. But the bill is not an expression of policy.

What we do need in this country and will continue to need with the greatest of urgency is a policy on trade. We must know the direction in which we are going. So, too, we must know how we are to deal with the changing trading patterns with which we are confronted everywhere. What we need in this country, as the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) would say if he were here, is the opening of the great debate on trade. This debate is a debate of urgency for the people of Canada. I submit that the policy devised to solve these problems should not be a policy developed out of panic. We have had policies develop out of panic in recent years. Some of our financial policies have been policies developed because it was too late to do anything except take expedient steps. I think we have been in a panic too in some respects, perhaps in many respects, about our defence policy. I hope the same kind of situation will not develop in our trade policies.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, by speaking now it is not my object to close the debate. It is merely to answer a question asked by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). He asked for the number of items in the schedule which are not GATT items. The answer is that all the items listed in Part I of the schedule were negotiated under GATT, while none of the items in Part II (Formal Changes) or Part III (Miscellaneous Changes) were effected by GATT negotiations at this time. However, a good many of the items in Part II and some of those in Part III are and continue to be subject to bindings of rates under GATT.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my remarks on this bill will be brief. That I promise in the beginning.

The honourable senator from Ottawa, junior or senior, I am not sure which—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Very junior.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Well, the honourable very junior senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) very clearly outlined the process by which the Government arrives at the recommendations that it makes to Parliament in respect to tariffs. To Canada, of course, there is no matter that is more important—and I know it is generally so recognized—than our ability to find markets for our products. Our prosperity will hinge very largely on our success in that respect.

What I wish briefly to draw to the attention of the house is that the greatest difficulty that Canada faces today lies in the high cost of our production. Canada is a high-cost country. Every time that we increase taxes, that we increase wages, we are making it more difficult for our manufacturers of finished materials and producers of raw materials to compete in the markets of the world. The fact is that this whole problem of trade, of finding markets, is not confined alone to the discussion that we may have at Geneva or anywhere else in respect to the tariffs that may apply, but back of it is the question of the costs of getting our goods to the markets of the world. I mention this because in my humble judgment it is a very important factor in this whole problem. It is impossible, I would assume, to have similar conditions in regard to taxes, wages and that sort of thing which affect the cost of production in all the various countries with which we trade. But we must, by all the skills we have, by all the economies we may be able to achieve, find a way if possible to reduce our cost of production so that we can effectively compete.

I think the same is true of the United States. Last year that country had a very crippling steel strike which lasted, as I recall, some 10 weeks. What was the one effect produced by that strike? It was that users of steel in the United States developed import connections with countries in Europe and with Japan, and the steel companies of the United States today are in an era of very low weekly and monthly production of steel partially because of these imports. But the answer is not to check the imports. I have never believed that that was the answer to difficulties in building up our Canadian industries, because by that method we hurt more people than we help. But I repeat, it is vastly important not only for governments but for the people generally to give consideration to this immense problem of how Canada can reach a state of affairs where we can compete more successfully in the world.

I hope to have some remarks to address to the house on the question raised by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson), and I may have something more to say at that time upon this particular aspect of the problem.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 21, the adjourned debate introduced by Hon. Mr. Robertson, who drew to the attention of the Senate:

1. The desirability of Canada's entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the countries of the Twenty-Nation group who are presently examining ways and means of achieving closer economic co-operation, and in particular with the U.S.A., and the two European trade blocs, the Inner Six and the Outer Seven, for the progressive removal over a period of years of trade obstructions in order that our ability to trade profitably will be maintained and increased through

(a) the progressive reduction of our costs of living and production; and

(b) the progressive reduction of specific obstacles to our exports that may presently exist, and to guard against the creation of new ones.

2. That by becoming closely associated economically with their 500 million peoples, we will remove the tragic possibility of Canada's becoming isolated from the great modern currents of trade and commerce. By our precept and example we will contribute to removing the possibility of a trade war developing between the two sides of the Atlantic, a development that the Soviet Union fervently hopes for and which might well enable the communist world to accomplish economically what they have failed to do militarily.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I want to thank the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) for having brought up this subject, because it provides latitude for a broad and general discussion on trade.

Trade is particularly important to Canada, where two out of every five employed persons produce for the export trade. It is important also because of the adverse balance of merchandise trade in Canada today. Last year the value of our imported goods exceeded by $1,460 million the value of the goods exported. Canada badly needs markets because of her vast surplus of foods, paper and other products which we produce.

As has been said here this afternoon, all nations of the world are interested in obtaining markets and improving trade conditions. They are reaching out, they are grasping for markets, and they are to some extent disregarding the welfare of other countries. They are disregarding the mutual concern and benefit of the whole world.

This, honourable senators, was not the attitude of the great leaders of nations who met in various conferences at the end of the last war. It was not the spirit of Locarno. It was not the spirit of Hyde Park, when the great President said that the United States of America would never stand idly by if any foreign country landed hostile troops on Canada. It is far different from the attitude of those who signed the Atlantic Charter, in which they hoped for a peaceful world where all nations could dwell with safety within their own borders and where all men in all lands could live out their lives in freedom from fear and want. Those attitudes seem to be deteriorating as time goes by. There has, however, been co-operation and some splendid agreements have been made, such as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the North Atlantic Treaty, and others. But, as I said, times seem to be changing and new times demand new measures. So we must act promptly if we are to avoid the depression which seems to be definitely threatening the whole of North America.

A good deal has been said this afternoon about trade, and I should like to bring up one problem which is of fairly recent origin. Let me say that in the province of Alberta there are more than blue skies, prairie flowers and gorgeous scenery. There is a tremendous surplus of fuel. Beneath the surface of the ground in Alberta there are 46 billion tons of coal, or about half the minable coal of all Canada. There are in Alberta about 27 trillion cubic feet of reserves of natural gas, or enough to supply the needs of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the province of Alberta for the next 30 years. In addition, some 2½ trillion cubic feet are being discovered every year. At the end of 30 years, instead of having a reserve of 27 trillion cubic feet, we shall have 51 trillion cubic feet.

A thousand barrels of crude oil seems like a lot of oil. But every day the wells of Alberta produce 300,000 to 400,000 barrels. The Alberta Oil and Gas Conservation Board and the Premier of that province say that a million and a quarter barrels of oil could be removed daily without depleting the supply. In fact, it is said that this could go on for another 30 years, and at the end of that time there would still be 12,000 million barrels of oil in the sedimentary rock below the surface of western Canada.

Those figures, honourable senators, do seem fantastic, but they are the very lowest which the many investigations have placed on record. Yet, in spite of that vast supply the oil industry, in particular, is not prosperous. It is not prosperous for one reason only, and that is that it cannot find markets for the oil it produces. Mr. Vernon Taylor, Vice-President of Imperial Oil, who has been investigating this problem, has stated that there is a possible market in the United States. He thinks that within ten years the United States might take a million or a million and a quarter barrels of oil per day from Canada, but we know from experience that the United States market is a very uncertain one. The Americans are always liable to put on restrictions and quotas, and the market is not to be depended upon.

There is, however, one other market which is available, and that is the market in Canada. We use a lot of oil in this country. We have about one automobile for every four persons and we have an average of one tractor on every occupied farm. We use about three-quarters of a million barrels of oil every day, and less than half of it is produced from wells in Canada. Over half of it is imported.

The Borden Royal Commission investigated this problem recently, and it stated flatly that unless the producers could find a market for 700,000 barrels of oil a day by February of next year some arrangements should be made for western oil to reach the Montreal market. Well, February is not very far away, and at the present time there is only a market for about half of that quantity, so it would seem that action will be needed very soon if that target is to be met.

The crude oil that is used in eastern Canada comes from the Middle East and from Venezuela, and our Commercial Secretary in Venezuela recently made a report on conditions there. He said that the whole economy of that country is based on the export of oil, but lately there has been a change in policy and during the last year, 1959, three different measures were introduced to restrict and limit the importation of certain goods. The Venezuelan people wish to build up their own agricultural industry, and they wish to save their foreign exchange, so they have put restrictions on the importation of such things as powdered milk, flour, automobiles, paper, hams, and things like that. In fact, one measure has really destroyed that market for Canadian flour entirely. In 1958 they took in about $6.5 million-worth of flour, and in 1959, under these restrictions, they imported only about half a million dollars' worth. Our market there for the other products I have mentioned will disappear too if they take a notion to restrict importation of them severely.

That, I think we will all agree, is a movement in the wrong direction. It is a movement away from the free exchange of goods throughout the world, and it is not what the leaders of recent times have hoped would come about. Surely we should do some negotiating with Venezuela. Surely, it does not expect to send its oil here in such large quantities as at present after refusing to accept products which we must sell.

Mr. Taylor has wisely said that the basis and the hope of our oil industry lies in export. He says that the putting on of restrictions and import quotas will stop the importation of oil to some extent, but it will not encourage the export of oil. The great trouble is to find a country to which this oil can be exported. He feels that there would be no hope of western oil getting into the Montreal market, claiming that the cost of transportation and other penalties would more or less outweigh the advantages.

Mr. Charles S. Lee, President of Western Decalta Petroleums, who speaks for the petroleum industry, takes a directly opposite view. He refutes the statement that transportation costs would prevent western oil from getting into the Montreal market. He says it is not true that western oil would cost from 23 to 39 cents per barrel more than offshore oil. His contention is that even if you have to pay the tariff which is mentioned by the pipe line people, 60 cents per barrel, Canadian oil could compete there. He says further that that rate could be reduced to 52 cents per barrel, and he is most insistent that if the target of 700,000 barrels per day set by the Borden Royal Commission is not reached by February the Government should take measures to obtain a pipe line or other method of transportation so that western oil can get into that big Montreal market.

Both these men have made a special study of this problem and we are not able to say which of them is right, but we do know that there is a market in Montreal for 250,000 barrels of oil per day. We do know that if that oil could come from western Canada the treasuries of the dominion and the provinces would gain millions of dollars from taxes and from rentals and things of that kind. We also know that every barrel of oil that comes from offshore has to be paid for in American dollars, and that if that money went to western Canada it would greatly help the producers who have invested large sums of money and have been waiting a long time in the hope of getting results. It would increase employment and the demand for goods, and in that way it would bring a great measure of prosperity to all of Canada.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the subject at present under discussion is one of the most important that we have had before this house this session, or, indeed, in many previous sessions. The matter brought to our attention by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) indicates clearly in its terms the importance of it. I cannot help feeling that there are more lions in the path than appear at first glance, which have to be dealt with before the objective of the matter which has been brought to our attention is reached.

I agree with everything that has been said about the importance of international trade to Canada, the importance of finding markets for our products. Down through the ages trade has always been a condition of affairs that has brought countries more closely together. In fact, over 100 years ago, when Bright and Cobden led the forces for low tariffs in Great Britain, the main argument they advanced was that if nations traded more with each other they would tend to understand each other better, and so reduce the possibility of warlike conflict between them.

We look at the problem today and we find that in every country consideration is being given to matters of trade. Probably the most spectacular successes so far in recent years have been in the development of what is known as the European Common Market.

That embraces, as honourable senators know, six countries, the chief of which are France, West Germany and Italy. Fifty years ago no one would ever have considered for a moment that it was possible for countries like Germany and France, traditional enemies for hundreds of years, to come so closely together that they would sit around a table and discuss how they could co-ordinate their economic activities, yet that is precisely what has happened.

After World War I and in the interlude between the two Great Wars—and I mentioned this several years ago in a debate in this house—the great French statesman Aristide Briand laid it down that Europe must integrate or perish. The integration is taking place now. The Common Market countries have a population of over 180 million people and in many respects their economies are complementary to one another. I was rather interested a few days ago to learn from a Canadian civil servant, whom I have known many years and who has spent his last seven years in European countries, that, in his opinion, in the matter of foodstuffs the Common Market countries in Europe would probably within a reasonable time be self-sufficient.

When we think, for instance, of the implications of that in our export of wheat from this country it makes one reflect a bit. What will happen in Europe is at the moment uncertain. Great Britain had an opportunity to join the Common Market countries when this enterprise was undertaken, led by French and German statesmen, but she held back for two reasons. First, she feared the effect it might have on her commonwealth associations in trade and, secondly, she was very doubtful at that time whether it was possible for these European countries like Germany and France, which had been traditional enemies, to come together in a plan of this kind and continue to work together. Throughout the world, particularly in Europe, there was some skepticism as to whether the Common Market ideal could be achieved. But it has been achieved, and the participating countries are more than delighted with the progress they are making. They will reach a point very soon where they will have a common external tariff against the rest of the world. As the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has said, that state will be reached through reduction of the higher tariffs of France and Italy to the level of the lower tariffs of the Benelux countries and West Germany.

Well, here is a vast area of 180 million people who economically are going to integrate. I think that is as certain as anything can be. Now, what are Britain and the Outer Seven going to do? This is an extraordinarily difficult problem which is facing Great Britain at the moment. She would like to be associated to a certain extent with the Common Market countries. She fears, and with reason, the effect that a common external tariff created by the Common Market countries might have on her trade in Europe, and so she is associating herself with the Outer Seven. However, the Outer Seven, in both population and economic wealth, are nothing like the equal of the Common Market countries. Only last week discussions took place in Paris between Great Britain and the Common Market organization as to how far Britain could associate herself with it. Britain suggested she might be willing to join in what is known as EURATOM and also in the European steel and coal community, but the Common Market countries said, "No, it will be all or none."

In the London Economist, which probably has the highest reputation of any economic journal in the world, I found an interesting statement in its leading editorial of a week ago last Saturday, just before the discussion between Britain and the Common Market countries commenced in Paris, and if I may I should like to read one paragraph from it:

> If the present trade talks in Paris end in continued disagreement, one of the most important questions in all our history will be whether Britain should then try to outbid them by offering the full-scale thing.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They did end in disagreement, did they not?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: They ended in disagreement; and as the Economist pointed out, Britain would then have to consider whether she would modify or abandon her commonwealth preferences and join wholeheartedly on the same terms as the other Common Market countries in this new association in Europe.

The editorial continues—and I would ask the house to note this:

> That would mean joining the Common Market, accepting a gradual integration of social policies, a less gradual integration of economic policies, and the high possibility that this would eventually lead on to radical political coalescence with Europe —the lot.

That is a very important matter before Britain at the moment, and that is the matter which the discussion introduced by the honourable senator from Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Robertson) deals with.

As far as I am concerned, I think Britain would be wise to scrap the commonwealth agreements, if they stand in the way, and join the European community. If she took with her the other countries associated with her in the Outer Seven there would then be a community in Europe integrated economically which would probably reach 300 million people. The influence of Britain in that European Common Market organization could be nothing but salutary, useful and helpful throughout the world. There is little doubt that the statement made by Briand more than 30 years ago, that Europe must integrate or perish, is in process of realization. If Britain joined the Common Market area with Sweden and Norway and the other countries associated with her now in the Outer Seven, within a decade the group would become a powerful counterweight to the communist countries in Eastern Europe. Europe has been the origin of our modern civilization. In all matters that affect the principles of government she has been the guiding star to the world. In literature and art—in all the qualities that make for a better civilization—Europe has been the great leader for the past thousand years. Therefore, if it were possible to achieve not only economic unity but a large measure of political unity, it would create in Europe a tremendous counterweight to the expansion of the communist philosophy in Eurasia. I think it is certain that the working closer together economically of all these countries would lead to closer political co-operation, and if that happened I would expect that within a few years this vast organization of 300 million people would develop a common foreign policy toward the rest of the world.

Where does that leave Canada? The honourable senator from Ottawa West spoke about the efforts being made in South American countries, half a dozen or more of them, to integrate their economic policies. That leaves Canada and the United States, if we ignore China, which on the whole is a communist bloc. What, then, will be our position? That, honourable senators, is the matter that was raised in the discussion promoted by the honourable senator from Shelburne and personally I think it is of tremendous concern to this country. That honourable senator, who has observed this situation for quite a long time, suggests that we should endeavour to approach the European organizations to see if we cannot become more integrated with them economically. Well, it certainly is worth a trial. But our action, in my humble judgment, will be governed almost entirely by what happens to the United States. If the United States should join that community, then the way is absolutely clear for us. There is no doubt that the United States has given every encouragement to the Common Market countries to get together, not only economically but politically—and for a very good reason, a reason which applies to Canada as much as to the United States. If the countries of Europe can build up economically, if they can unify their ideas politically so as to emerge with a common foreign policy, then they have within themselves the power to build their own strength to match anything that may come against them from the communist countries, even Russia included. When that point is reached, the United States could withdraw its troops from Europe and its missile bases from Great Britain, France and Germany; and Canada could then take its troops back home as well, for there would not be any obligation upon us to help Europe police itself, if she developed her own strength, as it is quite possible for her to do, and as she undoubtedly would do in the emerging picture of these developments. Therefore, in any way we look at it, it seems to me the matter is tremendously important.

When we come back to look at our own economic position we find that we are moving to rather doubtful ground. I have always believed that international trade was the great soothing influence to bring nations closer together in understanding. I believe that as firmly now as I ever believed it in the past. Our prosperity in Canada is bound up almost inextricably with our foreign trade. Look at the picture in reverse. Supposing we say, this is a good deal of a crazy world; we will try to live within ourselves; we will raise tariffs to protect our industries and give employment. Well, we would then be in the position of proceeding to freeze on our own iceberg. If every country did that the net result would be a slowdown in the progress of civilization. By the very nature of things our trade is intimately bound up with the United States; it cannot be otherwise. As far as I am concerned, I am all for the promotion of the freest trade possible with our neighbour to the south. I would lay down one condition. I make bold to say here that as far as Canada is concerned I would favour complete free trade with the United States tomorrow, on one condition—that it be buttressed by a treaty for at least 25 years. If we had such a treaty, an obligation of the United States, that country would live up to it, and we would live up to it. Someone may say that would integrate our two economies. Perhaps it would; but I have confidence enough in Canadians to say that it would not mean, as many might be inclined to think, our political absorption by the United States. Indeed, the great danger to Canadian sovereignty, to Canadian independence, so far as the United States is concerned, is a condition where we cannot find markets for our goods. If we could trade freely with the United States, the greatest market in the world, any impetus to join up with that country in order to secure economic advantages would disappear. I do not hold with those who are critical of the United States in its trade policies. I know that it has caused us irritation at times. Of course, let us not forget that the irritation has not all been on one side. When we empowered the Government, a few years ago, to assess valuations for duty purposes, that action was directed mainly at the United States and Japan and it did curtail a certain amount of imports from the United States. So we have not been altogether sinless in this respect.

In these dark and gloomy and foreboding times throughout the world today, I do think that the brightest ray of hope that has come to us for a long time is found in this movement in Europe to forget the animosities of the past. Winston Churchill said on one occasion, "We must be good Europeans." It is comforting to realize that Europeans are coming to understand they have a common interest in peace in Europe and the world, and that they are not going to suffer, but will gain, by economic integration. It is no secret that the French went into the Common Market proposition with many doubts and reservations. Now they are enthusiastic supporters of it.

The curious thing is that when you develop and expand trade many of the ghosts you feared will disappear in the morning mists. I think we are grateful to the honourable senator from Shelburne for bringing this matter before us for consideration. I do suggest that there is nothing more important for this country than to consider these grave problems in all their aspects.

If I may allude to it again, one other matter that causes me concern is the height to which our costs in Canada have risen. We may say that we will keep out Japanese imports because their wage scales are one-quarter to one-third of ours, that we will keep out European products because their wage scales also are much lower than ours. But when we do that we draw the strictures a little closer around our own economy, and that is not the road to helpful development.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 493 to 510 which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, reports adopted.

UNIVERSITY GRANTS

NOTICE OF MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before we adjourn I ask the indulgence of the house to revert to Notices of Motion.

Honourable senators will observe on the Order Paper for tomorrow the following notice of motion by the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard):

That the Senate strongly recommend that the Government give consideration to the payment to Quebec universities of grants or subsidies amounting to over 8 million dollars voted by the Government of Canada, in favour of Quebec universities in 1952-53, 1953-54, 1954-55 and 1955-56.

The honourable senator from Grandville has asked me on his behalf to withdraw that notice of motion, and I do so accordingly.

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I now be permitted to revert to Notices of Inquiry?

On behalf of the honourable senator from Grandville I give the following notice for June 28:

That he will draw the attention of the Senate to the anomaly and discrimination maintained against the Province of Quebec universities due to the lapse of subsidies voted in favour of but not paid to such universities during the years 1952-53, 1953-54, 1954-55 and 1955-56, amounting to approximately $9,000,000.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION BILL

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Norman P. Lambert, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Relations, presented the following report:

The Standing Committee on External Relations, to whom was referred the Bill (S-35) intituled: "An Act respecting the International Boundary Commission", report as follows:

Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Lambert reported that the Standing Committee on External Relations had considered Bill S-35, respecting the International Boundary Commission, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate without any amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Blois: With leave of the Senate, I move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why the hurry? Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Blois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buchanan, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked "Why the hurry?" and he did not get an answer to that question.

Hon. Mr. Blois: Honourable senators, my only reason for suggesting that the bill be given the third reading today is that, as all honourable senators know, after it is passed here it has to be considered in the other place. It is getting late in the session and I thought we would save a number of days by passing the bill this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If anybody raises an objection, let us leave it over until the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two on this subject. We had a very satisfactory meeting of the committee which considered the bill this morning. The witnesses were excellent, and their evidence was reported and will be printed. I had this bill initiated in the Senate, in order to show that I was able to get some more Government legislation introduced here rather than in the other place, and in view of the fact that we have given it careful study and that, as was stated by the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Blois), it still has to be considered in the other place, I was hoping we could send it there today. Of course, we need the unanimous consent of the Senate to do so.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The other place does not seem to be in any hurry to send bills over here.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I suggested that the third reading be given at the next sitting, but I wish to raise a point. As all my colleagues know, I like to see the rules observed. I think that every time someone asks to have something done that is not in conformity with the rules an explanation of the request should be given. Now, a very good explanation has been given by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and on my part I am quite satisfied to have the third reading of this bill today.

The Hon. the Speaker: The rules provide that a bill may not be read the third time the same day it is reported out of committee, except with leave of the Senate. When leave is given, if the honourable senator who moved the motion desires to make an explanation it should be made after the motion is stated by the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, in view of the explanation that has been given I am willing to withdraw my objection, but I do not want this procedure to become a common practice.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, may I make one query? If I understood the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) correctly, he stated that a record had been taken of the proceedings of this morning's committee. If it was desired that we give third reading to this bill today—and I have no objection whatever to that being done—why should we have had the committee proceedings reported?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For the benefit of the members of the other house.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: We do not need to look after them. They will look after themselves.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We do not mind helping them. They need it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That may be so, but I am interested in knowing why, if it was thought necessary to give this bill third reading today, we had a Hansard report made of the committee proceedings. The printed report is not yet in our hands, and it may not be in the hands of the other place before the bill is considered there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It may be a week before we get the printed proceedings.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION BILL

ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

Second Reading of Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act respecting the International Development Association".—(Honourable Senator Aseltine).

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have been requested by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) to have his bill, the Finance Charges (Disclosure) Bill, dealt with ahead of this order. The honourable senator wishes to close the debate on the second reading of his bill today and he assures me he will not take more than half an hour. I ask leave of the Senate to have this order stand until the honourable senator concludes.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

FINANCE CHARGES (DISCLOSURE) BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill S-25, to make provision for the disclosure of information in respect of finance charges.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, first I wish to thank those who have participated in the debate on second reading of this bill and the many others who have evidenced a keen interest in it. There have been some valuable contributions which indicated a broad understanding of the purposes of the bill. Some of the suggestions that have been made from the floor have serious content. I hope they will be studied in committee.

The purpose of the bill is to have lenders and vendors tell the truth about interest rates and finance charges, and to abolish one of the most pernicious snares in credit, namely, the fine print on the contract which the victim seldom understands when he is putting himself in hock.

It provides, first, that the total finance charges for any loans, bonuses, discounts, and anything else, must be stated clearly in the contract and that the total percentage, in relation to the loan, must be shown in simple annual interest; and, second, that the penalty for breach of the act may be a fine up to $500, or up to six months' imprisonment, or both. Noncompliance would disbar the lender from recovering any interest charges.

This bill would go a long way toward eliminating an evil which has come to light much too often from such activities as are carried on more particularly by the Let-Me-Be-Your-Friend-Finance Company and the Bleeding-Heart-Advantageous Mortgage Company, where hardworking people, tricked by obscure and puzzling language, are assuming a staggering load of debt and interest.

When I last spoke on this bill I gave you some examples, and there are hundreds more that all of us could relate. It can be stated with finality that there is no legislation dealing with: (1) loans over $1,500 by loan or finance companies or otherwise; (2) the very, very wide open field of conditional sales agreements for the purchase of household effects and automobiles, or (3) the abuses under second mortgages which are screaming for a remedy. This bill has been carefully drawn up by competent people on whom this chamber normally relies. The principle of the bill is the disclosure of information. I ask the house to endorse it and to send it on to committee for study.

Section 91 of the British North America Act enumerates the powers of the federal Parliament and, in particular, item 19 specifies interest and item 27 specifies the criminal law. Therefore, there can be no denial that interest and criminal law are within the exclusive competence of the federal Parliament.

I do not believe that there is a constitutional aspect to this bill. I am of the opinion that there is no constitutional question involved—the question is a red herring. When there is no argument on the merits, the constitutional question has a habit of arising, whether it exists or not. If there should be a constitutional question, it can easily be resolved by endorsing the bill in principle, sending it to committee, and obtaining an opinion from Justice or, better still, from the legal officers on whom we normally rely for such opinions.

I shall qualify this bill constitutionally on the basis of criminal law and interest, both within the exclusive prerogative of the federal Parliament. If there is difficulty about details, the matter can be dealt with in committee. There may be some view that the bill attempts to cover too much territory. That is for the committee to say.

I propose to deal with some of the observations that honourable senators who are learned in the law have made concerning the principle of this bill. To begin with—and this is essential—I propose to deal with the constitutionality of the measure.

The honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) suggested that in his view this bill could not be vindicated, so far as the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada is concerned, under the general heading of "Criminal Law". At the outset I might say that I disagree with him on this point. By paragraph 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, the criminal law, including procedure in criminal matters, is assigned exclusively to Parliament. Nor can it be said that the reservation of exclusive jurisdiction to Parliament in this field is to be given a narrow or reactionary connotation.

I do not propose to deliver a lecture on the subject, but in view of the efforts put forward by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) and the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) to impugn the constitutionality of the bill, I would like to cite at least three cases in support of the position which I have taken and which I hope other senators will take.
