"Madame said that a stranger would only make-her worse; that she would distrust any one she did not know, but that if her dear old physician, who had attended her always in sickness, could see her, she would be glad. Alasi he was in New York, and she did not lke to ask that he might be sent for. It would seem to you childish." Of course this speech had been made at Cora's instigation, but it had the desired effect. John Arthur bounded up, and bade Celine precede him to his wife's chamber, and the result of his visit was what the invalid had intended it to be. She was so pretty, and so pathetic, and so very ill! Celine decirated that she was growing more fevered every moment, and as for her pulse, it was like a trip-hammer.

John Arthur had an unuttrable fear of illness, and after trying in vain to persuade Cora to see one of the village doctors, whom, he declared, were very good ones, he announced his intention to telegraph to the city for the doctor who had been her adviser in earlier days.

And to this Cora reluctantly consented. "It seems foolish," she said, plaintively," and yet I don't think I ought to refuse to send for Doctor Le Guiss. I feel as if I were really about to be very ill, hard as I have tried to fight off the weakness that is coming over me."

Cora lay back among her pillows, with closed eyes, and made no sign that she heard. He spoke again, and the eyes unclosed slowly, and she said, with slow languor:

"Send to my brother; he will find him." Then closing her eyes, she murmured, "I want to sleep now."
Celine turned toward him an awemured, "I want to sleep now."

Celine turned toward him an awestruck countenance and motioned him to be silent. He tip-toed from the room, theroughly frightened and nervous, and sent a message to Lucian Davlin forthwith.

When he was safely away, Cora awoke from her nap, and desired Celine to let in more light. This done, she propped herself up among her pillows, and taking from underneath one of them a novel, bade her maid tell everybody that she was not to be disturbed, while she read and looked more comfortable than ill.

Toward evening, John Arthur looked in, or rather tried to look in, upon his wife. But Celine assured him that her mistross was sleeping fitfully and seemed much disturbed and agitated at the slightest sound, so his alarm grew and increased.

Celine, who seemed to know just what to do, turned them both out, which did not displease either greatly, as the brother and sister were equally afraid of contag gion, and were nervous in a sick-room.

At length the doctor arrived, and with him Lucian Davlin, the latter looking very grave and anxious, the former looking very grave and anxious, the former looking very grave and wise.

Celine was summoned to prepare the patient for the confing of the physician.
When this had been done, and the wise man erose to go to his patient, John Arthur and Lucian would have followed him. But he waved them back, saying:
"Not now, gentlemen, if you please; let me examine my patient first. That is always safest and wisest."

So the three, Luciap, Arthur, and his sister, sat in solemn silence awaiting the verdict of the doctor from Europe.
At last he came, and the gravity of his face was something to marvel at. Advanoing toward Mr. Arthur the doctor seemed to be looking him through and

"Will you tell me how lately you have been in your wife's room."

John Arthur answered him with pallid lips. "We were there this morning, my sletter and I." The doctor turned toward Miss Arthur, looking, if possible, more various than average the property of the propert Miss Affaur, 100x1ng, 11 possible, more serious than ever.

"I am sorry, very sorry," he said.
"And I hope you have incurred no risks. But it is my duty to tell you that Mrs. Arthur is attacked with a fever of a most Arthur is attacked with a fever of a most malignant and contagious type, and you have certainly been exposed."

Mr. Arthur turned the color of chalk and dropped into the nearest chair. Miss Arthur, who could not change her color, shrieked and fell upon the sofa. Lucian groaned after the most shricked and fell upon the sofa. Lucian groaned after the most approved fashion. And the man of medicine continued:

And the man of medicine continued:

"Above all things, don's agitate yourselves; be calm. I will immediately prepare some powders, which you will take hourly. We will begin in time, and hope that you may both escape the contagion."

Then he surned to Mr. Davlin. "My dear boy, you had better go back to the oity; at least go away from the house. This is no place for you."

But Lucian shock his head and said that he would not leave while his sister was in danger.

The following morning Dr. Le Guiso passented himself at the door of Miss Arthur's dressing-room. After making many inquiries, such as decore are wont to terrify patients with, he prenounced contagion. But her system was not over strong; in fact, was extremely delicate. If there was any place near at hand suited to a lady like herself, his advice was to go there without delay. She was not rugged enough to risk remaining where she was. Before sunset Miss Arthur was quartered at the Beliar inn. She had dispatched Mr. Peroy a note the day before, bidding him delay his visit. Now she was under the same recof with him, greatly to her delight, and his disgust. John Arthur had not fared so well at the hands of the learned physician. He had swal.owed his powders faithfully and hopefully, but the merning found him lasguid and dismal, with aching brain hopefully, but the merning found him languid and dismal, with aching brain and nauseating stomach. The doctor shook his head, and bade him prepare for a slight attack of the fever. It promised to be very slight, but he must keep his room, for a few days at least, and attend to his medicine and his diet.

And so the drama had commenced in CHAPTER XXIX. A STARTLING EPISODE.

The Royal mail steamer 'Boma' has arrived at Liverpool from West Africa. The 'Boma' (says Reuter) left the French Congo port of Loango on the lith ult. A few days previously a French officer and one or two others had reached Loango from Wadelai. The officer is alleged to have delared that the French had, or would have in a very short time, in Wadelai somewhere about 100,000 armed men. It was not stated who the men were or how they were armed, but it was assumed that most of them were natives of the district led by French officers, with a number of Senegalese of the Wadels and approach of them were natives of the district led by French officers, with a number of Senegalese arrived at Liverpool from West Africa. When night came on, he sank into a heavy slumber.

At twelve o'clock that night, all was quiet in and about the manor.

Cora Arthur was sleeping saundly, dreamlessly, as such women do sleep. In the room adjoining hers, Celine Beroque sat, broad awake and listening intently. At last, satisfied that her mistress was sleeping. Celine arose and stole softly into the room where she lay.

Softly, softly, she approached the couch, passing a river of moonlight that poured in at the broad windows. Then she drew from a pooket, something wrapped in a handkerchief.

Noiselessly, swiftly, she moved, and then the handkerchief, shaken free from the something within was laid upon the SPONGES TOILET SOAPS
