But a great change has come about, either due to prosperity on the part of the children or an attitude of state-paternalism as evidenced in so many instances. Nobody seemingly is desirous of accepting parental responsibility and the demand is that the state provide fully.

In my home community I know of four homes which have provided accommodation for from fifteen to forty each of these senior citizens. They are well housed, properly fed and cleanly kept by the matrons of the homes. The charge is $26 a month, leaving the pensioner $2 a month for tobacco or other knick-knacks so dear to them. Many who have no other home and who can pay their way are taken in and live comfortably with others of their age and likings. These homes are under medical supervision and standards and are a decided asset to any community. Their numbers are growing across Canada and are thus making the care of the aged very convenient and peaceable. It is well for the older people to be together, because the old and the young do not assimilate too readily according to present-day social standards. It would be a generous move on the part of this government to recognize fully the part these homes are playing and to give them some definite assurance of further assistance. The matrons of these homes have bed patients in their care and charge as low as $45 a month for this service. The extra cost above the pension is borne by the county or other responsible municipality. This relieves our hospitals, which are too readily over-crowded. With the new health group insurance plans and schemes as formulated and now working, our hospitals do not know what to do, and many of these elder and incurable patients are now being removed to these homes which are taking a rightful and necessary place as subsidiary hospitals. We are at the parting of the old ways of doing things, and new schemes must be devised to care for the needy.

I maintain that the moral fibre of the country can be judged and assessed in just so far as it takes care of its old, its blind, its sick, and its needy. Germany on her way to build up her superior master race was accused of destroying all those who could not add to her national standards and income.

We in Canada are known abroad as a Christian nation, so let us measure up to our reputation as such by increasing our allowance to all those eligible to such an extent as is within our capabilities to pay and within the needs of all those requiring this assistance.

Our present plans of payment have been consistent with those of other countries and in that our actions are indeed worthy. I am certain that, after a careful survey by our experts, a plan of payment agreeable, not only to the taxpayer, but also to those in dire need, will be instituted as acceptable to all.

I should like to refer all groups in this house to the table presented by the then minister of national health and welfare on page 752 of the 1946 Hansard. I am sure much valuable information is contained therein, which should be carefully studied by all before they voice their comments. This table has been well prepared and the figures are astounding. The age of seventy, with the modified means test, seems the plan most feasible for the present, but on referring to the table on page 754 of the same Hansard we will readily agree that females are in much more urgent need than the males. Here at the age of seventy we find sixty-nine per cent of the males not gainfully employed, while ninety-six per cent of the females are in the same unemployed class and require assistance. In the sixty-five to sixty-nine age group we find thirty-one per cent of the males unemployed, while in the same age group ninety-two per cent of the females are thus classified.

So, when we make seventy the over-all age group for both, we are falling short of our duties, because male and female are certainly in two distinct groups, with the female in urgent need of the lower age classifications. We realize that this will cost huge sums but, with the war over and our national income at a high level, it behooves us to assist these aged citizens who have given their all and, during the days of hardship, to make this Canada the great nation it is today.

Now a word on immigration. We must have a clear-cut immigration plan, admitting only those who will fill in an unnecessary gap and relieve a farm situation that has become very much unbalanced. Immigration authorities inform us that the number of immigrants desiring to enter Canada is infinitely greater than it was two decades ago. While some countries may have regulations regarding exit permits and export of capital, these restrictions will no doubt be modified as conditions grow more normal.

In the British isles, 300,000 are reported as awaiting transportation to some of the countries of the commonwealth, and 100,000 have at least made serious inquiries. The high commissioner for Australia has recently stated that his country has set up an immigration policy of admitting 700,000 new citizens annually, with those from the British isles preferred. Under their government's new scheme, British servicemen would be transported free of charge and non-veterans at $40 each, while immigrants from other countries would pay their own passage.

With the labour shortage in Britain very acute, the British government is alarmingly concerned lest the lure of other countries might induce unlimited numbers to leave her shores to take up their homes elsewhere. We feel that the acute shortage of housing in our urban municipalities is detrimental to admitting skilled labourers; yet our countryside has many vacant dwellings suitable for farm workers. Immigrants of two social standards should be admitted, and could be without throwing our economy out of balance.

Our desirable class would be single men without capital who would be willing to take jobs on the farms, learn our methods, save their money and, as thousands of former similar ones have done, purchase and operate farms of their own in the future. Nationalities of this type in the past have been Belgians, Hollanders and Danes, who came here years ago as hired help, have made good, and now own and operate farms of their own as good Canadian citizens.

Another necessary and readily assimilated class are the ones with considerable capital and farming experience to purchase immediately many of our farms now operated by farmers who are anxious to retire owing to advancing years or ill health and who would readily dispose of their farms. Our agricultural resources alone could maintain hundreds of thousands of additional persons. There is at present a ready-made opportunity for newcomers because many unoccupied rural homes are awaiting arrivals and new ownership and farm operation.

Recently our department of agriculture in the town of Petrolia made a rural survey of one of our townships, the township of Warwick. The township of Warwick is fairly representative of all the other townships in that part of southwestern Ontario. This is what they found. It is a complete survey:

The survey's summary for Warwick township describes the township fairly well and is reprinted below:

Number of farms visited, 719; 230 were pasture farms.

Nobody living on them; 247 were under 100 acres; ninety-nine of these 719 farms were rented; thirty-seven had empty houses fit for dwellings; 113 had bush on them; 154 were located on country road or highway; 187 farms were watered by creeks; 150 were infested with either thorns or weeds. That generally happens when they are turned into pasture farms. That part of the farm is more or less neglected and they grow up in weeds and thorn bushes. Here is an important fact that I should like hon. members to get: 163 of these 719 farms were operated by men over sixty years of age. Therefore there is a wonderful opportunity for European farmers coming in with capital. There is a ready-made opportunity. These men are all willing to dispose of their farms and move into town if they could only get a house to live in when they decide to move.

The immigrant from other lands has added materially to our industrial development and agricultural prosperity. It is true that we can never again admit these immigrants as we did during the early part of this century when they were arriving at the rate of one thousand a day and speeding across our country to develop and bring into being two of our prairie provinces. I can remember well when a thousand a day from Europe were speeding across Canada. They brought with them many of their skills and scientific knowledge, which, when added to and applied to our own, has worked to the advantage of all.

The most recent addition to my constituency has been a great number of Czechoslovakian families. They succeeded in leaving their homeland immediately before the war and brought with them much capital and purchased many of our better farms. They settled in groups, which was probably detrimental to their best behaviour; nevertheless they readily assimilated themselves into our ways of life because they intend to stay here. They adopted our methods, learned our language and settled down as good law-abiding citizens. Their children attend our schools and are growing up as the Canadians of the future, being schooled in an atmosphere in the very best of our customs and traditions. Canada cannot afford to let time pass without instituting an immigration policy broad enough—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON: I have only a few more words.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Finish your speech.

Mr. HENDERSON: Canada cannot afford to let time pass without instituting an immigration policy broad enough to admit to this country thousands of desirable settlers to populate the vast open spaces and to assist in the development of a greater nation. Our national economy is built up on our export market; but with double the present population, or three times it, we would have a great domestic market which, after all, is the soundest, since a home market is not dependent on trade treaties and international political bickering.

Our present needs are in the fields of agriculture, which is drying up and production decreasing owing to a large extent to the lack of help. We in Lambton-Kent have the roads; we have the unoccupied farms; we have the proper type of soil which has been developed by a hardy and virile race of pioneers, but at the present time and in the immediate future we must have sufficient immigration and labour that is not adverse to giving an honest day's toil for an honest day's pay. The citizens of the future must have stout hearts, intelligent minds and willing hands.

On motion of Mr. Langlois the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 26, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE—QUOTATION FROM BIBLE

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Last Friday, at page 3378 of Hansard, the authenticity of my interpretation of holy writ was challenged by one of my good friends from Toronto. I was supported by the book, sir, the bible on which you were brought up. I went home and got my own Gaelic bible, and I am going to put the quotation on record. I have a precedent for doing this, because John Tolmie—

Mr. MacKINNON: He was my uncle.

Mr. MACKENZIE: —did this about forty years ago, in the Gaelic language as used in that part of the country from which my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) comes. This is what it says in Genesis, chapter 27, part of verse 22:

Is e 'n guth guth Iacoib, ach is iad na làmhan làmhan Esau.

The translation, which I give to a long suffering Hansard, is:

The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, does this mean that this house is becoming trilingual?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It should be.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules the right hon. minister should not try to introduce a third language in the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane) moved that the third report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented to the house on Friday, May 23, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC ACT

JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL AUTHORITY OVER RATES OF PAY, HOURS OF WORK, ETC.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 254, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister explain the purpose of the bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of this bill is to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act so as to give the federal authority jurisdiction over rates of pay, hours of work and certain working conditions of the employees of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. As the matter now stands the provinces, under property and civil rights, have passed their own legislation, and the result is that the collective agreements which have been entered into between the railways and their employees have not uniform application in all parts of the country. The purpose of this legislation is to occupy the field in so far as labour relations of railway workers are concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: With the consent of the provinces?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not necessary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR ASSETS—DEBERT MILITARY CAMP

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. How many people were employed at Debert depot by war assets corporation for each of the twelve months prior to May 1, 1947?

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

2. What was the total (a) salaries and wages; (b) travelling and living expenses, paid to all employees at said Debert depot in each of the twelve months prior to May 1, 1947 ?

3. What was the total value of material sold in each of the twelve months prior to May 1, 1947 by war assets corporation from their Debert depot?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1 and 2. At War Assets Corporation's warehouse No. 41, Debert, Nova Scotia:

Note.—No living expenses are incurred by the corporation in connection with the operation of this warehouse. Expenses shown above consist of general operating and local transportation disbursements.

3. Material is moved out of a War Assets Corporation warehouse for delivery or release to the purchaser, on receipt of the release copy of a sales order from the branch office of the corporation which made the sale. This copy of the sales order does not indicate the sale price. In order therefore to answer this part of the question, it would be necessary to have every branch across Canada report on the sales made from the Debert warehouse during the last 12 months. In view of the large volume of work involved, no answer to this part of the question has been prepared.

INCOMES OF CANADIANS IN VARIOUS BRACKETS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. During each of the last ten years for which complete returns are available, how many persons in Canada received incomes of (a) less than $2,000 per year; (b) $2,000 to $5,000 per year; (c) $5,000 to $10,000 per year; (d) $10,000 to $20,000 per year; (e) $20,000 to $50,000 per year; (f) $50,000 to $100,000 per year; (g) $100,000 to $200,000 per year; (h) over $200,000 per year?

2. What were the gross incomes reported in each of the above brackets?

Mr. McCANN: The Department of National Revenue can reply to questions on personal incomes only in so far as taxpayers are concerned. Therefore the tables given below relate only to taxpayers and not to all persons in Canada as requested. Complete figures by calendar years are available only for the years 1942 and 1941. The department has made estimates for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946 and the figures are included here although they will not be the final official figures for the years concerned. The income classes have been altered to conform to the classes adopted in compiling the original statistics. Reduction of the exemption levels in 1942 had the automatic effect of substantially increasing the number of taxpayers in the two lowest income groups as compared with 1941. The exemptions have been unchanged from 1942 to 1946. Subject to these comments, the requested information is contained in the following tables:

2. If so, on whose authority and on what terms?
3. Has the national film board been commissioned to do certain work including art work for use in connection with the Marian congress?
4. If so, on whose authority and on what terms?
5. Is the national film board to be used by the government to compete against private enterprise?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes. The national film board was commissioned by the children's film department of Gaumont British Instructional Films to produce the film.

2. The film was commissioned on the authority of the government film commissioner and the national film board, as it was projected originally for the national film board's own production programme. The script together with an estimate of cost was shown to and approved by Gaumont British Instructional, a non-profit organization, advised by the national advisory council on children's films for Great Britain and associated with the Rank Theatrical Enterprises. The film was then produced independently by the national film board. Gaumont British Instructional was invoiced for the production cost, which has been paid.

3. Yes.

4. On authority of the government film commissioner, in answer to a request made by Mr. Jacques Auger representing La Direction du Congres Marial.

5. No.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—SUSPENSIONS FOR MISUSE

Mr. BREITHAUPT:

1. In view of the numerous press and radio reports regarding recipients of family allowance cheques misspending such money, has the Minister of National Health and Welfare made any detailed enquiries in this respect?
2. If so, what were the findings and what action is being taken?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Reports of misuse of family allowances received from all quarters are investigated in the regional offices.

2. Following the investigation, if a report is found to be justified, the account is immediately suspended. Since January 1st 1947 the following number of accounts have been suspended on account of misuse of family allowances: January, 119; February, 23; March, 39; April, 33.

PUBLIC SERVICE—WAR DUTIES SUPPLEMENTS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What are the names of temporary or permanent civil servants who did not receive war duties supplements in (a) Department of Mines and Resources; (b) Department of Transport; (c) National Film Board?
2. Who recommended payment of war duties supplements?
3. What is the reason why war duties supplements were not paid to all employees in these departments?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I speak of course only for the Department of Transport, but what I say will apply, I believe, to other departments. In the first place in the Department of Transport there are almost 8,000 employees. Of this number 721 have received war duties supplements. This would mean that an answer to the first part of the question would require the compilation of names of temporary and permanent civil servants with respect to over 6,000 employees in this one department. The information I have from the deputy minister is to the effect that even by assigning one or two clerks to this work, it would take almost two months to obtain the information. In view of these facts perhaps the hon. member would consent to dropping that part of the question.

As to the second part of the question, I would say that the payment of war duties supplements is recommended by the head of the department.

As to the third part the answer is that payment of war duties supplements varies, depending upon the nature of the war services performed by the employees. In many instances there were employees who in these departments, because of their purely civilian duties, were not entitled to war supplements.

Would the hon. member consent to dropping the question?

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Since the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) is not in his seat at the moment, perhaps the matter could stand until he returns.

Question stands.

IMMIGRATION

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH POLISH GIRLS ARE BEING BROUGHT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Labour now answer my question with respect to Polish girls?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In reply to a question asked last week by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as to girls at present located in displaced persons camps in Europe being brought to Canada by the Dionne Spinning Mills of St. George, Beauce, Quebec, I would advise that the details of the arrangement are set out in order in council P.C. 1193.

With reference to the specific contracts which will be entered into by the girls with the Dionne Spinning Mills, they will provide for rates of wages no less favourable than those required by the provincial laws of Quebec.

My information is that it is the intention of the company to pay these girls the same rates of wages which prevail for other labour in the mill, and an order for return has been tabled which shows, according to reports to the Department of Labour, that no girls are employed at less than 25 cents an hour and that the average rate is 35 cents per hour. However, later information on the question of wages has been received in a telegram from Paul Baillargeon, attorney for the Dionne Spinning Mills, dated May 22, reading as follows:

> Answering your telegram: Taken from one of our recent payrolls girl machine operators minimum for experienced beginner is twenty-five cents per hour paid for forty-eight hours weekly but only work forty-six. This equals approximately twenty-six cents per hour minimum. This is increased to thirty cents per hour after one month. After that they are paid according to what they produce. Our experienced girls earn up to a maximum of sixty cents per hour plus three per cent. They also receive two per cent of their weekly earnings for vacation pay. They receive group sick benefit and death insurance five hundred dollars for females. We have only two married women.

In further explanation I quote from Mr. Dionne's letter to my colleague, the hon. the Minister of Mines and Resources:

> These girls will take their headquarters at the convent which is situated 500 feet from the mill and is under the direction of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd.
> I will pay the transportation of these girls from their homes to Canada. I will see that these girls or widows are healthy morally and physically. I will comply with the rules and regulations of the Canadian government.
> I will make a contract with these girls to refund me their transportation charges at about 25 per cent of what they will earn weekly in my plant. I will pay these girls, when they begin to work, according to the ordinance No. 5 regulating the salaries and conditions of work of textile industries in the province of Quebec.

That is the end of the telegram.

In addition, the company has undertaken to return the girls to point of origin if the arrangement is not mutually satisfactory.

I now table copy of P.C. 1193 dated April 1, 1947, and other documents pertaining to this matter.

I thought my hon. friend would like to see the whole file.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the arrangement in any respect under the supervision of or in conjunction with the intergovernmental committee on refugees?

Mr. MITCHELL: Speaking from memory, I do not think so. My understanding is that these girls are being obtained from displaced persons camps in the American and British sections of Germany.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does this not contravene parliament's own legislation as contained in chapter 109 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, particularly section 2 thereof, which deals with alien contract labour?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. At the moment conversations are going on, and have gone on, between myself and the Minister of Mines and Resources in connection with joint applications from trade unions and employers to bring people from these displaced persons camps to Canada. Speaking now as an individual, I think that the Canadian people have some responsibility in this regard. With all measures of this nature you have more or less to move easily and carefully into the policy. I could not say whether it does conflict.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is my point. Has the minister looked into this particular point? I read the act carefully this morning and section 2 certainly prohibits this kind of importation of labour. I realize that there are other sections which may give the government authority, but it seems to me that that was not the intention of parliament when the act was passed. I am not criticizing the relief of displaced persons, but I want to see that they are brought here under proper conditions and with the proper authority of parliament.

Mr. SINNOTT: Have you any objection to these people coming to Canada?

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask one supplementary question on that point? Has the government received any applications from other employers of labour along the same lines as that of Mr. Dionne?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is yes.

FISHERIES PRICES SUPPORT

QUESTION AS TO PROCLAMATION OF OPERATIVE SECTIONS OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries in connection with a matter of importance to the fishermen of the maritime provinces. Can the minister indicate to the house when the fisheries prices support board will be set up to administer the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): In reply to the question of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare I would advise him that it so happens that at the moment the deputy minister of this department is in Geneva attending, at the request of the fishing industry, the international trade and tariff conference. After he returns to Canada, which I expect will be early in June, it is my intention to make some announcement as to when the operative sections of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, will be proclaimed.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

LOSS OF TRANSPORT PLANE ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, copy of which I have sent to him, and in his absence I would ask his parliamentary assistant to take note of the question. Has the search for the T.C.A. plane lost on April 29 on the Pacific coast been abandoned? When will the investigation into the cause of the loss be commenced, and what will be the composition of the investigating body? Have any claims for damages been filed?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): If the hon. member will allow his question to stand as notice, it will be answered in a day or two.

[Mr. Sinnott.]

HUMAN RIGHTS

FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—OBLIGATIONS UNDER UNITED NATIONS CHARTER—APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, May 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie that the house go into committee on a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of parliament to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in many respects I believe that this debate on a resolution to set up a special parliamentary committee to study human rights and fundamental freedoms is one of the most important debates that we shall take part in during the present session. It is one debate wherein we are not vying with each other in a discussion over the cost of this or that commodity or involving ourselves in a discussion of the pros and cons of some expenditure. To my mind it involves the discussion of the fundamental philosophy of our democratic way of life as against the philosophy of totalitarian slavery.

The terms of the resolution indicate that a good deal of thought has been put into it. I should like to read the resolution, and for the sake of brevity I will omit the names of the members of the joint committee. The resolution reads:

> That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all members of the united nations may best be implemented;
> And, in particular, in the light of the provisions contained in the charter of the united nations, and the establishment by the economic and social council thereof of a commission on human rights, what is the legal and constitutional situation in Canada with respect to such rights, and what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

It is a little difficult for me to detect all that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may have had in mind when he worded that resolution. I cannot conceive why in the whole matter of the united nations organization, with its charter and many complicated relationships, both economic and educational and commercial, and in matters of world justice and what have you, this one matter of human rights and fundamental freedoms should be singled out as being so important as to warrant the appointment of a special parliamentary committee to investigate, discuss and make recommendations.

As we are all aware, 1867 was the year of confederation, but Canada was a country and a nation long before that. It strikes me that Canadian citizens have always enjoyed what we regard as human rights and fundamental freedoms. Why is it necessary now, so many years after confederation, after so many years of life in a democracy, that we should begin to turn our attention to a delineation of these human rights and fundamental freedoms?

I have taken an intense interest in the speeches which have been made so far in this debate. Some of them have been filled with exceptionally good advice, but there have been some that I have not been able fully to understand. The other day I listened with a good deal of interest, as I usually do, to the able speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), but there were one or two things that I did not quite understand, indeed which appeared to me to be just a little self-contradictory. At page 3160 of Hansard I read, for instance, this paragraph:

> Six hundred years ago they fought in Scotland against the foreign oppressor. They fought for the right of nationhood, and today there is still that same desire in the world for the right to self-determination.

I agree with that; I do most profoundly agree with the speaker on that point. But it does seem to me that that fundamental principle has already been done away with in some of our international gatherings. A few years ago we were all enamoured of a highly important and precious document known as the Atlantic charter. It had been signed by some of the big men of the earth. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic charter has become a scrap of paper, for in the negotiations carried on since the Atlantic charter was signed there has been little regard in many instances to giving the right of self-determination to some of the smaller nations.

The other day I read in the Toronto Star—I do read the Toronto Star occasionally—a British United Press dispatch from London, headed "Turks say U.S. aid is annoying Soviet," and the article reads:

> The Turkish newspaper Aksam, which frequently reflects official opinion, said in an editorial broadcast by the Ankara radio today the U.S. aid programme has increased Russia's "hostile sentiments" toward Turkey.
> The newspaper said Soviet policy would have to change if Soviet-Turkish relations were to improve.
> "There is nothing we can do to renew the ties of friendship that we desire to have with Russia, for the conditions appear to be clear-cut," Aksam, said, outlining the conditions as:
> "We have to give up the straits and Istanbul. We are to act an an enemy toward Great Britain and the United States. We are to set up a communist government, imported wholesale from Russia. And nothing less than the whole thing will do, for if one single condition is turned down, Russia won't even look our way."

That is a very important press dispatch, for the reason that it does away completely with the right of small nations to their national self-determination. I do not know what the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North would be towards the recent United States loan to Turkey, but I do know that the expressions in some circles from those holding socialist views are not very happy ones. Yet in this dispatch, which reflects very largely official opinion, I have read the attitude taken by Turkey.

Much has been said during recent months as to the necessity for the nations of the world giving up some of their national sovereignty. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I have never been able to fathom just what these advocates mean, because when we ask them what part of our national sovereignty we are to give up, they never seem to know just what; they never seem to have an answer. While on this point I might mention our Canadian ambassador to Washington, who the other day in a speech bodly asserted that some of the nations would have to give up some of their national sovereignty. I might ask, Mr. Speaker, whether Mr. L. B. Pearson, our ambassador at Washington, was reflecting our official opinion in Canada, and if he was, who gave him authority to make that statement that we had to give up some of our national sovereignty? The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) is in his seat, and he can answer that if he wishes. I do say this, that diplomats as a rule are very careful about breaking into print, and I should like to know who gave the right to Mr. Pearson to make that statement, and whether it does reflect official opinion in this country. Furthermore, if it does reflect official opinion, I say that this parliament has a right to know from the present administration what part of our national sovereignty we must surrender. So far, while in past years this phraseology has been shouted from the housetops, we have not yet heard what part of our national sovereignty we must surrender.

The other day at a dinner given by the health league I heard one of Canada's eminent scientists speak on the atom bomb. His message was most interesting and deserved a good deal of commendation. I wish that that message might be put into print and circulated throughout Canada. But this was the part to which I took exception. Somehow or other before he finished—and I said to myself as he was coming to this point, "Ah, here it is; I thought so!"—he said that we should have to surrender some of our national sovereignty. I do not know why he had to conclude on that note. I often think of the little phrase in scripture when our Lord was before Pilate and Pilate said something to him. Our Lord turned to him and said: "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee?" I just wonder how many of these men in important positions speak the words of truth and soberness as their own original thoughts, or whether somebody whispers something in their ear and as a result they are reflecting what they may think is a popular phrase, something that is in the air.

Here we are in this parliament—

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, may I inform my hon. friend that the quotation I gave today was derived from a hundred different languages.

Mr. HANSELL: Evidently the Minister of Veterans Affairs was engrossed in something else, because I was not referring to what the minister said at all. I did not have him in mind. The only thing I regret is that I am not making myself interesting enough for him to listen. However, I often wonder what good it is anyway. It does not make any difference how forceful your arguments are; when the vote is taken the government always wins. We win the argument and the government wins the vote. What I was talking about was the selling out or the surrendering of a part of our national sovereignty. Let the government state what it is we are surrendering. I am fearful that when these men in high places talk that way what they mean is that we are to surrender something of our human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I go further in my analysis of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. He talks about racial discrimination. I am not going to labour the point, but at page 3161 of Hansard he says:

> . . . where racial discrimination and intolerance of another's religious beliefs will be regarded as crimes against all mankind; where freedom of speech will be the inalienable right of every citizen.

That paragraph is self-contradictory, because if I am to be charged under the criminal code or if it is to be regarded as a criminal offence for me to criticize another religion, then I have not free speech. I say that I have the right to criticize another man's religion, and he has the same right to criticize mine. It is all very well to confine this to religion, but take political beliefs—I am not talking about party machine politics now, but we have come to the place in the world's history when there are political beliefs on a world-wide scale which are, I was going to say, almost tantamount to being a religion.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: They are.

Mr. HANSELL: They are to a very large extent. In the debate on the speech from the throne the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to socialism as being a new way of life that was dawning upon society, or words to that effect. I take issue with him as to its being a new way of life; it is about as old as mankind itself. But that is neither here nor there. A way of life is certainly as potent as a religion. If it is to be thought a criminal act to criticize a philosophy of life, then I have not freedom of speech. You cannot have it both ways.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North, referring to Jehovah's Witnesses, said as reported at page 3162 of Hansard:

> We will deplore perhaps the way they say it; and yet I maintain as a democratic citizen that they are entitled to freedom to say it so long as they do not violate the laws of the land.

I agree with that, but how can you reconcile that with the former statement that it should be regarded as a criminal act to criticize another religion or sect? I should like that explained. I often wonder what some people mean by racial discrimination. I have the greatest respect for all other races of man. The good Lord created everyone, but I wonder whether it is to be regarded as racial discrimination if a man in a restaurant displays a sign, "All white help". If fundamental freedom means anything it means that if a man wishes to display a sign of that kind he should be able to do so. Why not? He is in business. If he does not get business it is his own fault. I wonder whether it would be right for a man to have a Japanese valet. Perhaps because the Japanese will not associate with his friends he would like to have a Japanese valet. What would happen if a Canadian or an English butler applied for the job? Is the employer to be considered subject to the criminal code if he says, "No, I am sorry, I cannot employ you; I want a Jap". If a man wants to employ a Jap I think he should have the right to do so. That is one of the fundamental freedoms we have.

I do not claim to know everything about socialism—

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says "Hear, hear"; but I will pit my knowledge of socialism against his. I might tell my friend a little story. Some years ago I was charmed with socialism as it was portrayed in those days, and it is only by a little twist somewhere or other that I cannot explain why I am sitting in this group instead of sitting with the group to my right.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. member got twisted.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps so. It might be news to the hon. member to know that I was associated in a small way as a young lad with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) when he issued what was known as a non-partisan paper. I used to be his cartoonist. Oh, I have caricatured my friend the hon. member for Cariboo pulling away a big bag of money from the capitalists. And he paid me good money for drawing these cartoons. On one occasion I wanted to get some information and I wondered to whom I should write. I believe I was in the constituency of Mr. Bennett at the time, but I thought I had a bit of a socialist mind and I did not know many socialists. Finally I got in touch with a revered gentleman, Mr. Woodsworth. I wrote to him, and he answered my questions in a gentlemanly manner and sent me a few pamphlets. Those pamphlets were of course on Fabianism, and believe me, I read them through. I ate them up. I said to myself, "I believe they have something there". I studied them carefully and got other books on the subject, and I may say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I came within an ace of being a full-fledged socialist. I am glad however, very glad indeed, that certain fundamental truths began to dawn upon my mind; and today, all joking, all levity aside, I want to say this, though I know that some will disagree with me: As a world philosophy, basically, when the socialist talks of racial discrimination his eventual objective is the ruination of man by the mongrelization of the human race.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You know better than that.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says I know better than that. It proves what I said a little while ago; he just does not know everything about socialism. My hon. friends have not made that claim, of course. I am speaking of socialism. I am not saying that the C.C.F. have made that claim. If they want to deny it, it is all right with me. I do not care. I am saying that is the big idea behind socialism.

Mr. JAQUES: Communism.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the big idea in socialism. Let us remember this. God created every one of us, black or white, yellow, red, it does not matter what the colour of the skin may be; He created every individual with a soul. But the same God who created us said that He had fixed the bounds of men's habitation. We can tear those bounds down, I suppose, because sometimes we dare to assume we are a little wiser than the omniscient.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We seem to have learned a lot since the Lord created the earth.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not distinguish between world socialism and world communism. Somebody said the other day that the C.C.F. were Liberals in a hurry. I would say the communists are socialists in a hurry. That is all there is to it as far as I am concerned. The member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in this debate referred to the socialization of land. Our C.C.F. friends deny that. I do not say they are going to do that in Saskatchewan; I am not so bold as to say that. As a matter of fact, I know the premier of Saskatchewan quite well. We sat in the house together. He is a fine gentleman. I do not think he would want to socialize the land, but I would say that fundamentally socialism dares to propose the socialization of land. I am dealing with the philosophy of socialism. I had a book put into my hands some time ago by a friend of mine. The title was "The Case for Socialism". The author is Fred Henderson. I may say my friend bought this book at one of the C.C.F. meetings. I have copied certain extracts in my own hand, and at page 22 I find the following:

> It is this private ownership of land and capital which we socialists indict as the root cause of poverty. We challenge its justice and its right to exist or continue. We trace directly to it the ruin, the widespread misery and the destitution, of the mass of the people.

Then at page 24:

> As for land ownership—well, it is hardly necessary nowadays to be a socialist to see that most Liberals and many orthodox politicians admit, that there is, and that there can be, no moral or just title whatever to the private ownership of land.

I can read more.

Mr. REID: That is the philosophy of Great Britain.

Mr. HANSELL: At page 31 of the same book I read:

> Let there be no mistake about it. Socialism, I repeat, is an attack upon the institution of private property in land and capital. We socialists advocate the expropriation of the landed and capitalist class;

And on page 32:

> I want you to be perfectly clear about this and not to attempt to shirk the full consequence of the socialist proposal. Do not, for example, let us deceive ourselves into thinking that we can get around this accusation about confiscation and robbery by talking about some form of compensation to the persons whom we propose to expropriate. If the nation gave them compensation, in the sense of giving them the equivalent of what it is proposed to take from them, we should fail in our purpose.

Fundamentally, I began to learn some of these things as I read some of the books which were advocated by socialist-minded people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That helped you to get untwisted.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going to detain the house. All I wish to say is this. I do not know whether all members of this committee have the same conception of what human rights and fundamental freedoms are, but I say that the world is built upon law and order. The universe is built upon law and order, and it behooves all people to be subject to law, order and good government. There is a liberty which does not recognize authority, and that sort of liberty becomes licence. I have a strong feeling that the conception of human rights and fundamental freedoms of some members of the committee is going to be almost diametrically opposed to the conception of human rights and fundamental freedoms of other men on that committee.

Our socialists—let me interject this here—every once in a while take a crack at private enterprise. I am going to say that private enterprise is nothing more or less than the exercise by individuals of their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The right to own property.

Mr. HANSELL: When I say that, I do not modify my statement. I only point out that there are abuses in private enterprise, but it is not private enterprise that is at fault but the abuses, and we have to correct those abuses. My hon. friends laugh a little, giggle a little, but that does not concern me. I say that if "fundamental freedoms and human rights" means anything it means that a man has the right to do business with anyone who will do business with him. If that is private enterprise, all right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I see that your eye is on the clock as well as on me, so I take it my time is pretty well gone. I close with a quotation from Major C. H. Douglas, whom some of us claim to be one of the greatest minds in the world today. He says:

> In our anxiety to make a world safe for democracy it is a matter of real urgency that we do not tip out the baby with the bath water, and, by discarding too soon what is clearly an agency which can be made to operate both ways, make democracy even more unsafe for the individual than it is at present.

[Mr. Hansell.]

I close on that note. I say what we have to do in this committee is guard the human rights and fundamental freedoms that Canada has enjoyed ever since confederation. Nothing has changed in Canada, except that we have had the infiltration of a type of philosophy that would prepare our minds and soften us up for the acceptance of something that is diabolically evil.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the minister will close the debate if he speaks now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I just want to thank all parties and all hon. members who have spoken for their splendid contributions to this debate, which has been kept on a very high plane indeed. The committee will be set up as soon as possible. It is the desire of the government that my distinguished colleague the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) shall be chairman of the committee, subject of course to the wish and will of the committee itself. In that capacity I know he will render his usual efficient and distinguished service.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF STATUTES ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DISALLOWANCE AND RESERVATION OF BILLS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, to amend the Publication of Statutes Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is fully explained in the explanatory note published with the bill itself. Under the act which determines the distribution to be made of the Canadian statutes it was provided that copies would be supplied to the governor general to be transmitted to one of the principal secretaries of state of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom for consideration by the government of the United Kingdom, to the end that they be disallowed or allowed to operate, and also that certain bills might be reserved by the governor general for His Majesty's pleasure. In the conference of 1926, when the Balfour declaration was made, the question arose as to what would be the position with respect to the possible disallowance of dominion legislation by His Majesty on the advice of his ministers of the United Kingdom, and what was the position that had been reached with respect to reserving bills for the consideration of His Majesty on the advice of his United Kingdom ministers.

The question was left to be dealt with by the conference of jurists which was set up to determine what were the practical steps to be adopted to carry out the principle embodied in the Balfour declaration. That commission met in 1929, and with respect to disallowance unanimously made this recommendation, which is to be found at page 16 of the report of the conference on the operation of dominion legislation and merchant shipping legislation, 1929:

> The conference agree that the present constitutional position is that the power of disallowance can no longer be exercised in relation to dominion legislation. Accordingly, those dominions who possess the power to amend their constitutions in this respect can, by following the prescribed procedure, abolish the legal power of disallowance if they so desire. In the case of those dominions who do not possess this power, it would be in accordance with constitutional practice that, if so requested by the dominion concerned, the government of the United Kingdom should ask parliament to pass the necessary legislation.

In respect of reservation the recommendation, which is to be found at page 19 of the report, is as follows:

> Applying the principles laid down in the imperial conference report of 1926, it is established first that the power of discretionary reservation if exercised at all can only be exercised in accordance with the constitutional practice in the dominion governing the exercise of the powers of the governor general; secondly, that His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will not advise His Majesty the King to give the governor general any instructions to reserve bills presented to him for assent, and thirdly, as regards the signification of the king's pleasure concerning a reserved bill, that it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom against the view of the government of the dominion concerned.

That being the constitutional practice, on April 5, 1943, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a declaration in the House of Commons in answer to a question submitted by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to this effect:

> It has never been the practice for the clerk of the parliaments to send bound copies of the Statutes of Canada to the British Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. On certain occasions, namely during the years 1927 to 1942 inclusive, they have been sent by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, since the arrangement concluded at the imperial conference in 1926, has been the recognized channel of communication between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom.
> The purpose of transmitting the Statutes of Canada in this manner has been to comply with the provisions of the Publication of Statutes Act and of section 56 of the British North America Act.
> In 1942, in view of the complete obsolescence of the power of disallowance, and in order to bring the actual practice into conformity with the constitutional position the transmission from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs was stopped.

That has been the situation in fact since that time. But there is still in the Publication of Statutes Act a provision which requires the Clerk of Parliaments to send bound copies to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for transmittance. Since 1942, instead of being transmitted to the United Kingdom, they have been sent to the library of the houses of parliament here. Nevertheless—

Mr. GRAYDON: These houses of parliament?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To our Canadian houses of parliament. Nevertheless, though it was suggested that the Department of External Affairs tell the Clerk of Parliaments that he no longer need send them, it was felt that that would not be proper. There is a statute which places that duty upon the Clerk of Parliaments. And until parliament relieves him of that duty, it was felt that no one could give him instructions to disregard it. So the purpose of this bill is to amend the statutes respecting the publication of statutes, and thus relieve the Clerk of Parliaments of the obligation placed upon him by parliament, which is now without any practical object.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 20, letter E of the senate, is one which has caused me considerable concern, and one about which the house should have some clarification as soon as possible. The debates in another place, to which I am not permitted to refer in detail, consisted largely in an explanation of the bill itself by its sponsor. Little or no debate took place there, and for that reason we have no explanations before us by those in the senior chamber with respect to points which might normally be raised in the house. What was said in introduction by the hon. senator in the other place was much the same as has been said today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent).

Looking through the bill and the various statutes connected with it I find there are a number of matters concerning which I should like to have some explanation when the bill reaches committee of the whole. First of all it should be made clear that the Publication of Statutes Act, which is chapter 2 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is one which deals with the subject matter indicated by its title. Today we are not interested in the repeal of the whole statute which was passed in 1925 by the parliament of Canada, but we are directing our attention to those parts of the statute which have to do with the publication of our statutes in the United Kingdom. If I may say so, it seems to me we cannot separate that part of the Publication of Statutes Act from the British North America Act itself.

Let me bring to the attention of the house the two sections of the British North America Act which is seems to me bear directly on this bill. Chapter 56 of the British North America Act states:

> Where the governor general assents to a bill in the queen's name, he shall by the first convenient opportunity send an authentic copy of the act to one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and if the queen in council within two years after receipt thereof by the Secretary of State thinks fit to disallow the act, such disallowance (with a certificate of the secretary of the day on which the act was received by him) being signified by the governor general, by speech or message to each of the houses of parliament or by proclamation, shall annul the act from and after the day of such signification.

And section 56 states:

> A bill reserved for the signification of the queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the governor general for the queen's assent, the governor general signifies, by speech or message to each of the houses of parliament or by proclamation, that it has received the assent of the queen in council.
> An entry of every such speech, message or proclamation shall be made in the journal of each house, and a duplicate thereof duly attested shall be delivered to the proper officer to be kept among the records of Canada.

I read those two sections to show that the British North America Act was clear as to the power of disallowance; and I shall proceed from that point. It was because of section 56 of the British North America Act that section 6 of the Publication of Statutes Act, now to be repealed, was passed. That section states:

> As soon as practicable after the prorogation of every session of parliament, the Clerk of the Parliaments shall obtain from the king's printer a sufficient number of bound copies of the Statutes of Canada passed during such session of parliament, and shall deliver to the governor general one copy duly certified, for transmission to one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state, as required by the British North America Act 1867.

And then it goes on to indicate that certified copies of all bills, along with certain other things, shall be delivered. The two acts, the British North America Act and the Publication of Statutes Act, especially section 6, are linked together; the one is woven into the fabric of the other.

The minister has indicated that on April 5, 1943, certain questions were asked with respect to this by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I do not think that I need to read the questions and answers in full, but I should like to indicate their general purport and significance.

It would appear that in 1942 the government stopped sending any further bound copies of the Statutes of Canada to the dominions office in London. As the minister pointed out, prior to that and after the Balfour declaration the procedure had been altered somewhat whereby the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent bound copies rather than the Clerk of the Parliaments. I have found out in my explorations that the Clerk of the Parliaments is actually the Clerk of the Senate. The channels through which the copies of the statutes were sent were changed from the Clerk of the Parliaments to one of His Majesty's principal secretaries, and they then went from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the dominions office in London.

That went on from around 1930 until 1942. According to the answer given to the hon. member for Temiscouata, to be found on page 1828 of Hansard of April 5, 1943, the practice was then discontinued. The reason given by the Prime Minister was this, and I quote from page 1829:

> The purpose of transmitting the Statutes of Canada in this manner has been to comply with the provisons of the Publication of Statutes Act and of section 56 of the British North America Act.

I have already put parts of those statutes on the record. The Prime Minister then goes on to say:

> In 1942, in view of the complete obsolescence of the power of disallowance, and in order to bring the actual practice into conformity with the constitutional position, the transmission from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs was stopped.

So far as I can gather there was no change from 1931 until 1942 with respect to our constitutional position, and in 1942 the government sent for the last time the Statutes of Canada to the United Kingdom. It may have been that the matter was overlooked in the meantime, but I think we are entitled to some explanation from the minister as to why they were stopped in that particular year. I am wondering if they were stopped because the hon. member for Temiscouata put the questions he did on the order paper at that time It would seem that up until the time the questions were put on the order paper and the answers given, the statutes had been going regularly through that last mentioned channel and without any hindrance or stoppage by the present government.

There is one point upon which I am not at all clear. A few moments ago the minister for external affairs referred to the conference of jurists which was held in 1929 for the purpose of giving an opinion as to our position, having in mind the Balfour declaration and the changes brought about by the two imperial conferences held in the late twenties, the conference in 1930 being the last one held in respect to that. One thing which the minister tried to explain to the house was in reference to page 16 of the report of the conference of jurists, or commission of jurists, as he was pleased to call it. They agreed that any self-governing dominion could abolish the legal power of disallowance if they so desired, and it is upon those words that I want to build another point in my argument.

The British North America Act by section 56 plainly gives the power of disallowance. The conference of jurists indicated that that power could be abolished by the parliament of a self-governing dominion. The Statute of Westminster, passed in 1931, does not amend the British North America Act, and consequently does not amend section 56, which provides for the power of disallowance in the other parliament. While I understand clearly what the minister says with respect to the effect of the Statute of Westminster and its wide significance so far as our nationhood is concerned, still that statute provides by section 7:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

Having made a careful check of the amendments to the British North America Act since 1930 I find that there has been none which could in any way be stretched to include section 56 which calls for the power of disallowance by the United Kingdom. That being so, I only want to go into the matter as fully as possible in order to see if we cannot clarify our position. According to the statutes which I have brought to the attention of the house this afternoon, that power of disallowance is still outstanding. If so it is a serious business for this parliament and a serious business for this country. The power of disallowance is tied in with the legislation at present before the house. It seems to me that this legislation either goes too far or it does not go far enough. Tied in as it is with section 56 of the British North America Act this bill is neither flesh nor fowl nor good red herring. It is an innocent useless measure unless the legislation with respect to the disallowance clause in section 56 is actually obsolescent. I should like to know from the minister when we are in committee what obsolescence means. If that section is obsolescent and has no meaning, then so is the Publication of Statutes Act obsolescent and without meaning My point I think is clear. If one needs amendment, both need amendment; if one does not need amendment, neither does the other, because the two are so closely linked together.

The other point I would raise is this. When the terms of the Statute of Westminster were agreed upon by the various members of the commonwealth, were changes such as this discussed and decided upon? Why is this matter arising now, some seventeen years afterwards? Also I would ask what about the other members of the British commonwealth of nations? What is their procedure in matters such as this, having in mind the Statute of Westminster itself. The house is entitled to know these things. On the surface this bill appears to be an innocuous piece of legislation. When I first looked at it, it seemed as though we might as well put in statutory form what we have been doing and that is drop the practice of sending these statutes across to the old country. But there is much more to it than appears on the surface, because, as I have tried to show, it goes to the root of an important principle with respect to the British commonwealth of nations.

This brings me to another point which I would like to impress upon the government. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is time that the members of the British commonwealth of nations ought to be less shy about each other and that they should try to arrange for more regular, frank, man-to-man talks among themselves. There is no reason why Canada should not take the lead and call a commonwealth and empire conference, even in the year 1947. There have been calls for such a conference from many prominent citizens, both in the United Kingdom and here, and by the press of both countries. Ex parte methods such as this before us, a little whittling at the main issue, amending some little section in the Publication of Statutes Act—that is not what the people expect today. They expect that we shall get together as units of the commonwealth and clarify our position, and that our constitutional position shall be brought up to date where that needs to be done. Canada stands in a splendid position in regard to the commonwealth. It would not surprise me, even if it should other members of the house, if in the years that lie ahead this country became the centre of a greater and more powerful British commonwealth of nations. Canada ought to give the lie to those in other parts of the world who say that we are witnessing the liquidation of the commonwealth and empire. That is not quite what the people of this country or the people in other parts of the British commonwealth really believe.

No one is prouder of being a Canadian than I am, and no one I think has ever more clearly expressed that than I have. More than that, I am one of those who have always revelled in the fact that Canada is an autonomous nation in that great, happy and peaceful family of nations. But at the same time I think that Canada's most brilliant prospects as a nation will be heightened and brightened by taking a more active lead in this great peace-loving family of nations of which we are so proud to form a part.

The Right Hon. Anthony Eden, standing in this house in 1943 where the Clerk Assistant is now sitting, made some momentous statements, and one which received applause from every section of the house regardless of party was that the British commonwealth of nations was a pattern upon which the peace structure of the world might well be fashioned. I think that is so, Mr. Speaker. We as a commonwealth and empire mesh in well with the present international machinery. The commonwealth and empire have no national objective that can be gratified by war and no international objective that cannot be fully gratified by peace in the years that lie ahead. And so because of the extent to which this legislation and that which is tied up with it fits into the great framework of the British commonwealth of nations—perhaps I should not call it a framework because after all, as has been well said, the looser the bond the closer the tie, and there is nothing of the strait-jacket about the British commonwealth and the empire; for it can develop and expand without snapping any of its bonds, which is one of the great things about it—because this legislation comes so close to the whole picture of our commonwealth relations I have asked this afternoon for the clarification which perhaps the minister will feel like giving when we are in committee. On that understanding I am agreeable to the bill being given second reading now.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, whatever criticisms may be made of this bill I think it is a step in the right direction. It gives the proper interpretation to the present constitutional position. As to its marking the disassociation of members of the British commonwealth I must confess that I cannot see that. Much that has been the subject of criticism in the British empire is being removed and the empire is being turned into a commonwealth of self-governing nations, the ultimate end of which will be a stronger and better and more real association, I believe, than we have at the present time. I look forward to the maintenance of that association, but I do think that constitutional provisions as obsolete as the one we are discussing this afternoon can only lead to misunderstanding outside this country. I know that again and again when one is in the United States one will be asked about the constitutional position of Canada, and when one says that we are a self-governing independent nation within the commonwealth, questions of this kind are asked: Is it not right that the British parliament has the power of disallowance? Have you the right to amend your own constitution? Who governs you? Who sends the Governor General, and so forth? I do not think we weaken the commonwealth association one bit by facing the constitutional realities and wiping from our statute books matters which are subjects of misunderstandings abroad and which are not in conformity with our present procedures. Therefore I believe that this bill should be supported by the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Clerk of the Parliaments to have custody of certain original documents.

Mr. McKAY: While there is provision for an amendment to the Publication of Statutes Act, may I draw the minister's attention to the index and tables of the public statutes found in the Revised Statutes of Canada. In the extreme left column the subject matter is stated. In the middle column the number of the revised statute is given; on the right the amendments are given with the year and the chapter amendment. To facilitate the locating of sections, it seems to me they should be indicated, and some sectional revision should be made. Not infrequently one must go back eight, ten and even twenty years to locate the amending sections. That all takes considerable time. Would it not be possible to state the section amended as well as the chapter? If the amendments were indicated it would save hon. members considerable trouble and time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is, of course, aware, that this index is not an official part of the statute; it is something that is prepared as an aid to those who have to consult the statutes. I shall have the hon. member's remarks drawn to the attention of those who attend to the printing and binding of the statutes, because I think it would indeed be helpful to have the amendments indexed not only as to the chapter but also as to the sections.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it the minister's opinion that this particular part of the Publication of Statutes Act is in any different position from that of section 56 of the British North America Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 56 of the British North America Act now provides for something which a general conference of the governments of the autonomous units of the commonwealth have declared formally to be obsolete. It has become a recognized practice that disallowance will not be recommended by ministers of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom with respect to any legislation of an autonomous dominion. That is the constitutional status which has been attained. It has also been declared that the parliament of the United Kingdom would not undertake to legislate for an autonomous dominion unless it be at the request of that dominion. That is the present constitutional situation. If, in spite of that, the parliament of the United Kingdom chose to reenact the Colonial Laws Validity Act and to attempt again to treat the units of the commonwealth as subordinate colonies, in theory it might still be the legal effect of such statutes, but it would not work. It would not operate; it would be the death-knell of the commonwealth association.

We could have proceeded to submit joint addresses to ask that the terms of section 56 of the British North America Act be modified, but whenever we do attempt any modification whatsoever of the British North America Act we have a pretty active controversy in this country. Today it is not desirable to have these controversies unless we are going to achieve something as a result of the controversy. When it is merely something that is academic the controversy is undesirable.

In 1940 the hon. member for Temiscouata brought up this matter of transmitting our statutes and he was told what the practice then was. The hon. member just slightly qualified what I had said. Before 1926 the channel of communication between a dominion and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom was the Governor General. That was the original position. He was the representative of the government of the United Kingdom; he was the channel through which the dominion communicated. Then the usual process by which constitutional changes have come about without revolution in British countries operated and the Governor General got into the position where, in fact, his constitutional relationship with his ministers in Canada was the same as the constitutional relationship of His Majesty with his ministers in the United Kingdom. That became the situation in fact, recognized as such, and the channel of communication between the Canadian government and the government of the United Kingdom became the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do not mean to assert that we are to have an embargo on the export of statutes to the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact they still go. They need them for their own information as we need theirs for our information.

But here is a provision in a Canadian statute which states that certain copies are to be sent for a certain purpose, and that purpose has entirely disappeared. Therefore the proposal that was made originally came up in 1940 and in 1942. It was proposed that the Clerk of the Parliaments be told not to comply with the Publication of Statutes Act. That proposal was not accepted. It was felt that it would not be proper for the government to attempt to say that a servant of parliament would not do what parliament had said he should do, and that if he was not to do it parliament should be asked to make the necessary statement. That is what the bill is for. It would be quite as logical to have addresses to modify section 56 of the British North America Act; but my hon. friend knows what suspicion would be aroused. Any attempt at this time to get an amendment to the constitution would give rise to serious controversy. There would be some who would say that it is not going far enough. I was horrified to read in one of the papers of my province that the new editor appointed to direct the course of that paper was advocating a Canadian republic. To have any controversy over whether we are to have at this time a Canadian republic or not would be, I think, a pretty futile one, one that would not lead to any practical result and would stir up a lot of feeling for nothing. Why not deal only with the things that will achieve some practical result and not unnecessarily stir up controversy that does engender some bitterness and produce no good. Therefore it was felt that the only unnecessary thing that was still being done was that the Clerk of the Parliaments was complying with this requirement of a Canadian statute.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What practical result is achieved by doing it in the manner that is followed here instead of by address?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The practical result will be that the Clerk of the Parliaments will be no longer under any obligation imposed upon him by a Canadian statute to send certified copies to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the purpose of their being sent to Britain for examination and disallowance. He will be no longer under that duty. His Excellency the Governor General will, if he were to feel that this declaration of obsolescence is not sufficient to relieve him, still have the duty put upon him by the British North America Act of doing what section 56 calls for, but I do not think he will feel any conscientious scruples about not doing it, while the Clerk of the Parliaments, being required by a Canadian statute, which was consolidated in 1927, to act in a certain way, felt that he should do so, and no one felt that he could be told not to do it unless parliament relieved him from that duty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it a fact that he has not been doing that, or was not from 1940 to 1943?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He has been doing it. He still sends copies to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but since 1942 the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not sent them for the purpose for which the Clerk of the Parliaments sends them to him. Instead, the copies he gets for that purpose he sends to the library of this parliament to be added to those that are kept there.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Copies for Registrar General.

Mr. GRAYDON: With all deference, I think the minister has made a good case out of the material he has, but the situation is still confused. I am not at all certain that the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and pretty powerful questions too, have been answered in a way that entirely satisfies me. On the other hand, the minister has perhaps reasons for this kind of thing. If, however, section 56 is subject to obsolescence, or whatever term the Prime Minister uses, this also is subject to obsolescence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Possibly it is subject to obsolescence, but the Clerk of the Parliaments is faced with a statute which was reenacted in 1927 and he complies with it.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is still faced with section 56.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. That is an obligation imposed upon the Governor General, and that has not been carried out by His Excellency for a great many years, since the establishment of the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, through his officers, had been simply following the old practice: "The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for the Dominions and advises him that he is forwarding so many copies of Canadian statutes", and they used to go as a matter of course. When the question was raised in 1940 the matter was discussed as to whether a bill would be brought down then or not. The country was at war and it was felt it would not be desirable to introduce any bill at that time. The subject came up again in 1942. It was discussed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the under-secretary of state for external affairs, and they decided that they would no longer send copies. The next year a question was put by the hon. member for Temiscouata, and the question again arose whether we should bring in a bill. The decision was that we would not do so while the war was on, and this is the first opportunity that has offered to have a bill since the war came to an end.

It may be unnecessary. Perhaps, if my right hon. colleague the Minister of Justice were consulted, he would give an opinion that would satisfy the Clerk of the Parliaments that the Canadian statute is as obsolete as that provision in the British North America Act. But I am not sure that he would, and I am sure that if parliament passes this bill it will settle this matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the Governor General is not greatly concerned about his position, I should not think the Clerk of the Parliaments would be either.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has given a most interesting review, and a good deal of information has been brought before the committee. I am particularly interested in one statement he made, namely that for some years the Governor General has not been carrying out the provisions of section 56. As I understood the minister, he stated that since Canada had had a Department of External Affairs the Governor General has not followed the provisions of the section. What I should like the minister to tell us is this. When were the provisions of this section discontinued, so far as the Governor General is concerned? Who made the arrangements for the change? Was there any communication with any governmental authority outside Canada when the decision was made by the Governor General not to transmit any further statutes passed by parliament?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will not say that the Governor General ever did the transmitting personally.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They were transmitted in the name of the Governor General.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was set up, communications to the United Kingdom government were made in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. No other arrangement was arrived at, and this provision of section 56 probably does not mean anything other than the Canadian government. The words "Governor General" probably mean nothing less than the Canadian government, because under the British North America Act the Governor General is in terms the administrator of His Majesty's government in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that strictly correct under the British North America Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; all executive power is vested in His Majesty and exercised on behalf of His Majesty by the Governor General, with the advice of his ministers in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to know since what year the Governor General has not transmitted the statutes passed by this parliament. The minister has not answered the question at all. He made the statement that from the time Canada had a minister for external affairs the Governor General ceased to send copies of the statutes passed by parliament. My question is simply this: since what year has section 56 not been carried out?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will not say section 56 was not carried out. The terms of section 56 were carried out, in fact, up to 1942 inclusive. I am sorry I have not the old file here. The oldest one I have contains a letter addressed by the Clerk of the Parliaments on January 15, 1940, to the under-secretary of state for external affairs, in compliance with section 6 of chapter 2 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927:

> . . . I send you, herewith, a certified copy of the Statutes of Canada passed during the fourth session of the eighteenth parliament, 3 George VI, 1939, for transmission to one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state.

That was followed by a communication in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the following terms:

> The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the secretary of state for dominion affairs and has the honour to enclose herewith, for transmission to the librarian, dominions office, six copies of . . .

And so on. I can get the old files and on another occasion give my hon. friend the time any change in the language of transmission was made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: From what the minister has said in reply to the hon. member for Peel, do I understand that ordinarily it would have been considered necessary to apply to parliament for an address from both houses in order to repeal any section of the British North America Act? That is the law and practice, but in this instance, because the sections in question have become obsolete through changing practice over the years, the government decided that an address to amend the British North America Act at this time might have aroused suspicion, to use my right hon. friend's word, or difficulties in parliament, with the possibility of a long discussion on the subject. Instead, the shorter and indirect course has been followed, namely, that of amending a statute which was passed by parliament to implement the pertinent sections of the British North America Act. Does that sum up the situation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not say it was to do anything to the British North America Act indirectly. It does not do anything to the British North America Act either directly or indirectly. It does propose to repeal, as being the simpler method, a statute which was passed by the Canadian parliament to implement something that was in the British North America Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is just one other question. Are there any sections of the British North America Act that are obsolete at this date, other than sections 55, 56 and 57?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Without giving the matter very careful consideration, I should not like to say there are sections which are obsolete. There is no doubt that if one were to frame a constitution at the present time it would be expressed in language that would be appropriate to present practices, and much of the language that is in the British North America Act might be changed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just when do the provisions of a statute reach the stage of obsolescence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is a matter which is subject to the Einstein theory of relativity. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that statutes do become obsolescent.

What does it require for one to become obsolescent? They are not in fact recognized as obsolescent until some court or body in authority has said so. With respect to the ordinary rules of law, it is the courts that say, "Well, that has become obsolescent," and until they find that as a fact no one is entitled to regard it as obsolescent. Here this body, made up of representatives of all the autonomous states of the commonwealth, found that this was obsolescent and made recommendations accordingly. The recommendations they made were based upon that as well as the other declarations of the conference, and in the Statute of Westminster they were accepted by this parliament and the parliaments of all the other units of the commonwealth, on the basis that this disallowance and reservation had become obsolescent, and on the basis that the Governor General was no longer the channel of communication between the government of a dominion and the government of the United Kingdom. That was the real foundation upon which the Statute of Westminster was built, and it was accepted everywhere.

On the title.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one other question I asked him before? What is the position of the other units of the commonwealth with respect to this very problem with which we are now dealing?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I am not in a position to say whether or not they had local statutes of their own implementing the provisions which had to do with disallowance and reservations.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNITED NATIONS

POWERS OF GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO ARTICLE 41

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 132, respecting article 41 of the charter of the united nations.

Mr. GRAYDON: I expect the minister will want to make some explanation, and I myself have some remarks to offer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under the charter of the united nations, approved by both houses of the Canadian parliament, it is provided that there shall be, as the principal organ for the maintenance of security among the united nations, a security council. The charter provides three phases of procedure in dealing with disputes which may arise between nations. The first is the phase of conciliation, when the security council uses its best endeavours to get the parties to the dispute to agree to remove the cause of the dispute. If the procedure of conciliation fails, then article 41 of the charter empowers the security council to decide upon non-military sanctions, which will be applied to a recalcitrant state. The council may decide what measures, not involving the use of armed force, are to be employed to give effect to its decisions; and it may call upon members of the united nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

That is the article which gives to the security council the power to make these decisions. Under article 25, to which we have agreed:

> The members of the united nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the security council in accordance with the present charter.

As hon. members know, the Canadian government can enter into international arrangements. But the action of the Canadian parliament is required to make it obligatory for Canadian citizens to do the things that may be necessary to carry out the international obligations assumed by the Canadian government.

At the present time there does not seem to be any urgent need for action to implement decisions under article 41 of the charter. Unfortunately—at least I regard it as unfortunate—proceedings in the security council have dragged to an extent and to a degree that has appeared to be disappointing and not to give us the feeling that it was capable and willing to take an active hand in preventing international strife. Nevertheless we have agreed to the charter. It is the only international instrument we have at the present time, and members on all sides of the house have declared that they support the policy of doing everything Canada can do to make the united nations succeed.

That being the attitude, we do not want to be subject to any reproach that any act or omission of ours was a reason for delay in having the united nations and the security council fully operative. We therefore ask parliament to authorize the governor in council, should occasion arise, to make such orders binding upon Canadian citizens as might be required to carry out Canada's obligations under articles 41 and 25 of the charter of the united nations in respect of non-military sanctions imposed by the security council upon a recalcitrant member of the united nations organization.

Similar legislation has been passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom and by the parliament of New Zealand. It has not yet been passed by the parliament of Australia, or that of South Africa. Similar legislation is not required in the United States. When the united nations charter was approved by the American Senate, that made it the law of the land; and it is in all respects a part of the law of the United States. So that the executive government there has power to carry it out. It is there in such form as to bind the individual American citizen.

Here, under our system, international treaties do not have a binding effect upon individuals because it is not normally within the power of the government to impose obligations upon citizens. It is only by parliament that that can be done; and this bill is recommended to parliament to empower the governor in council to take by order in council such action as we might be required to take by a directive of the security council.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, the procedure in Canada in respect of this legislation has been somewhat similar to that taken by the parliament of the United Kingdom. This is another piece of legislation which has come from the other chamber for our attention. The same procedure was followed in the United Kingdom. Over there the debates showed clearly, as they took place on April 5, 1946, in the House of Commons at Westminster, that there was a unanimity of opinion which, in view of the present situation in the British House of Commons, is a matter of interest.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to two sections of the charter of the united nations which deal with and bear upon the legislation now before us. Article 25 says:

> The members of the united nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the security council in accordance with the present charter.

And article 41 says:

> The security council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the members of the united nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

The United Kingdom was the first nation with a constitution requiring such legislative action to pass this provision. During the debates in the House of Commons at Westminster, reference was made from time to time to the fact that they were pioneering.

In my view the legislation before us does not necessarily involve a question of principle, because we must remember that we are bound by the principle of the charter. It does, however, deal at length with the method to be employed, and which we intend to employ in carrying out the undertakings we have already given when we attached our signatures to the San Francisco charter. In the bill before us wide and sweeping powers are given the executive. Perhaps I need not place on record the language of the bill itself, because it is in the hands of hon. members. I understand that when the bill went to the other place it was even more sweeping in its characteristics than it is now. After considering it in their house and in a committee, the honourable members of the other place succeeded in changing, altering and restricting the penalties. But even now the bill is not quite as sweeping as the one passed by the United Kingdom parliament. There are some suggestions which I have to make, based upon those which received the sanction of that parliament and which, I think, could be properly applied and would, I believe, strengthen and better the legislation now before this chamber.

The restrictions in connection with penalties are not to be found in a corresponding way in the United Kingdom legislation. Under normal circumstances I think this house would rebel against the giving of such wide and sweeping powers to the executive at the present time. However, there are perhaps arguments which the government will want to use to the effect that this situation is different from the one we would normally face in the domestic field. May I say that whatever happens to this legislation, whatever sweeping powers are given under this legislation, it must not be considered as a precedent in the domestic field.

Several questions were raised in the other place with respect to the legislation. I cannot deal with them, but there is one thing I think the minister ought to answer. I should like him to make a note of this because it should be dealt with either on second reading or when the bill is in committee. I refer to the question which was raised with respect to dominion and provincial jurisdiction. This is a move in time of peace rather than in time of war, and the question was raised as to whether or not certain items in the legislation are beyond the purview of the dominion parliament to enact. There is nothing wrong with raising that question. If we are to have the power in Canada, it must be constitutional power. I raise this question in order that the minister may reply later. The question arises as to whether or not international conventions signed by the government bind the Dominion of Canada including the provinces, or whether we might have to watch our step because of the privy council decisions in connection with the Bennett reform legislation passed in 1935. These are matters which deserve some attention and should be answered by the government.

One member in the other place referred to this bill as having teeth in it. I have not been able to find anything but false teeth in most of the enactments that have been passed by the united nations up to date. In all fairness and frankness, one has to admit that up to the present time there has not been much in the way of teeth in the heavily endowed organs of the new world organization.

While this bill went to a committee in the other place, we have had no full report from that committee. We should have the evidence which was considered, particularly when we are dealing with legislation such as this. Otherwise the Commons is going to be somewhat in the dark with respect to what has happened in connection with the examination of witnesses and the like.

I should like to ask the minister under what act such as this Canada had the right to apply sanctions under the old league of nations. I should like to know whether any such bill was passed and, if so, when? Our part in the sanctions of 1935 was not something that many Canadians can look back upon with any great degree of glowing pride. I think we all remember when statesmen in Canada, I suppose supported by public opinion, suggested that the Abyssinian dispute was not worth the life of a single Canadian soldier. Perhaps that was so; but whatever happened, whether it was the accumulation and combination of the Abyssinian and other disputes, finally we reached the position where we lost not just one single Canadian soldier but 39,500 in all branches of the services only a few years afterward. That gives one some idea of how we should look back upon these sanctions.

We had our experience before with economic sanctions and I took the trouble to look up the newspaper reports of 1935. When one could find news of the sanction problem among the returns from the general elections of that particular period he found something like the following, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 4, 1935:

> The league of nations subcommittee on economic sanctions approved in principle today the Canadian proposal that petroleum, coal, iron and steel be added to the prohibited list—introduced Saturday by Doctor W. A. Riddell to committee of 18.

Then the Ottawa Journal of November 16, 1935, contained this:

> Canada moves in sanctions against Italy. Necessary order in council reported passed by government.

Then on December 2, 1935, the same paper stated that Mr. Riddell was silent on the stand that the government had taken, that only his personal opinions were represented and not the views of the Canadian government when he took the step he did in connection with oil sanctions against Italy. The Standard of London said:

> Canada makes news. Her government has repudiated responsibility for the proposed oil sanctions against Italy. Today's declaration indicates a big break in the ranks of the sanctionist nations.

We have travelled a long way since then. When we are speaking about the glowing future, it is always worth while to stop and take an inventory of the not too glorious past. That is why I have brought up the questions I have today. We have gone a long way since the day when a statesman representing Canada at the league of nations—it is really not so long ago—said that Canada was in a favoured position in that she lived in a fireproof house so far as world affairs were concerned. We have gone a long way since then, and it is a good job that we have. We have now reached the point where the house is being asked to give a body outside Canada, a body upon which there may not necessarily be Canadian representation, the right to sever our trade, our communications and our diplomatic relationships. The government is now asking parliament to give it the power to carry that out. It is not proper to raise grave questions about that at this moment, and I am not doing so. I am only indicating the distance to which parliament and the people of Canada appear to have gone. We are now agreeing to do the collective international bidding of other nations. By this legislation we give that obedience now, and in doing so I think we are making a significant move. Just as the question was asked in the United Kingdom parliament, we might here ask whether other nations throughout the world are giving this power as well.

Of course, our position in Canada is this, that the world is but a shrunken ball of its former self, and here we are sandwiched between two great centres of power with competing ideals and whose efforts at closer collaboration have not always been successful. I think most of our people realize now that our property and our lives are perhaps more endangered by what happens from without than by what happens from within. It may be that between the last two wars when we took the isolationist stand we did we were greenhorns in diplomatic circles, but that does not entirely excuse us for what we did although it provides a pretty valuable lesson for what we should do at this time. Moreover, when we were taking the position we did we were travelling in pretty prominent isolationist company. I fancy that not only has Canada learned some lessons but the great republic to the south has learned some lessons too, and the events of very recent times have proven it, because the great republic to the south is now spending, not by the million but by the billion, on fire-ranging in various parts of the world in order to extinguish blazes which later might cost them as much if they actually got out of control, as they did in former times. Bearing that in mind, I suppose it is not to be wondered at that the Canadian people, the Canadian government and the Canadian parliament should find themselves digging deeper into the soil of world affairs than they ever did before.

I want to give this warning, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Canadian people are keeping abreast of all this great movement into the international field which parliament and the government are taking.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They have not a chance.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend says they have not a chance and perhaps he is right. He is right very often about a number of things. It seems to me essential that parliament and the government and public opinion should form one great team in Canada, for otherwise, if one gets ahead of the other, a disastrous reaction might conceivably set in. That is one of the things I am so anxious about. I am hopeful that we in parliament who have from time to time been representatives of this country in the united nations organization are carrying with us public opinion, because, after all, if this is to be a peace that will be permanent, it has to be a peace supported by the peoples of the world, or otherwise it can never be a permanent peace, as I hope and pray it will be.

The surrender of sovereignty, upon which one of my hon. friends spoke so eloquently this afternoon, is something which touches vitally the very life of our people. It is so easy to talk about the surrender of sovereignty without knowing exactly what it means and without having experienced what it means. What our experience will be in the surrender of sovereignty is another matter for which perhaps I cannot answer. One sees examples of those who do not seem very anxious to give up their sovereignty, for I find, by the current issue of Newsweek, that the frankest passage in Gromyko's speech was this—as you know, Mr. Speaker, Gromyko is the soviet representative on the security council:

> The united nations is an organization of sovereign nations. The Soviet Union cannot agree that its national economy be made dependent on the will even of a majority of the control organ.

That, coming from one of the major powers in the world, is pretty difficult for us to understand, particularly in view of the fact that that great nation was one of those which had signed the charter in the first instance and is also protected by her veto on the security council.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did the hon. member notice the word "economy" in there? Is any other nation prepared to surrender its economic sovereignty?

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is, I think, on an entirely different tack from the one I am taking. I am trying to indicate that the soviet itself is not reaching out with any great degree of eagerness and enthusiasm to allow other nations to direct its policy and tell it what it is going to do, and I would not have been at all surprised if Mr. Gromyko had made an even franker declaration if he were not speaking in public.

The other point I would make is this. This is our first bill which recognizes the fact that our sovereignty is to be surrendered in the interests of world peace and the united nations organization. This is the first bill which actually implements that partial surrender of sovereignty. I think, too, that this bill means the gearing of ourselves to a new policy of more political surrender of national sovereignty to the united nations organization. It may be that many of us are not anxious to do that. It may be that some people look jealously upon our own rights so far as national sovereignty is concerned. But we signed the San Francisco charter with the overwhelming approval of the people as a whole. We signed what we are now purporting to implement so far as practical considerations are concerned.

One cannot look upon the economic sanctions end of our united nations work without thinking also of the collateral part, the military sanctions. The military sanctions and the staff committee's report to the security council have been one of the most disappointing and discouraging things that I have heard or read since I have had anything to do with the united nations itself. It is not setting up an international army, navy or air force. It does not purport to do that. The report in fact says that, because there are so many of the big powers which have a veto and can say no, there is no use in having a large army, navy or air force at all. In other words, we are not even to have an international police force. We are just going to have a nice easy-going little body of truant officers to make sure that the little boys throughout the world will not cause any trouble. But, Mr. Speaker, when did the little boys cause any trouble without the help of the big ones? You will not have a world war started until you get the big boys in there. You will have no global conflict and no world war until the big boys join in, although it might be started on the pretext of a little boy having done something.

I look askance, I look with grave disappointment at the fact that we are apparently to have a toothless security council. That has many aspects that we do not always realize, because the whole question of national disarmament the world over is predicated on that very thing. There is not a single nation of the world that will disarm unless it is sure that its national security is to be guaranteed, and effectively guaranteed by somebody else or something else. If they cannot rely on anything more than a few truant officers in the security council there will never be any disarmament even on a minor scale in the world. That is one of the reasons why I look with such discouragement and disappointment upon the report of the military staff committee, because it might easily mean the beginning of an arms race again in the world, which most of us had hoped and prayed the united nations organization would obviate with its great structure for peace.

With respect to this particular bill, I must say that the United Kingdom are in a little different position from us. They have the veto so far as economic sanctions are concerned. We have none. Even if we are one of the non-permanent members of the security council, which we are not today, we shall not have any. Hon. members know what the veto means. I realize it is perhaps futile and hopeless to talk about it now. It was a compromise in the original instance, but you see what happens. You have five powers with the veto who can say that nothing will be done. That is what it means. Nothing will be done; you will not have economic sanction; you will not have international troops go into a country; in other words, they can paralyse the effort of the united nations organization. Any one of the five can do that. What happens? Every little power cultivates a big power for a friend. Why would they not? It is the most natural thing in the world because, unless they have a big power for a friend, then the united nations organization might conceivably go in with their international force, small as it might conceivably be. With all that comes a gathering around with each one of the big five as a core. There is a gathering around of nations. What does that mean? That means the old days of power blocs in the world again. That is one of the things that we in Canada must watch very carefully.

I wish to make another observation that has nothing to do with military matters in the ordinary sense. When the San Francisco charter was signed I thought there were dangerous loopholes in it. One of the major loopholes is perhaps this. While in various parts of the charter we had provisions for economic sanctions, in other parts of the charter we provided for armed forces to stop aggression. But all the time we were talking about military aggression. The charter was silent on perhaps what has become the most modern, perhaps the strongest and most effective, certainly the most insidious, kind of aggression. The charter did not cover the question of ideological aggression at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or industrial aggression.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall be glad to have my hon. friend add to my speech because he can always make it better by doing so. But I wish to say that it would have been more to the point if some way could have been found whereby the united nations could apply some kind of sanctions to the ideological aggression which is so evident and so much abroad in the world today. It is not armed aggression, but it has the germs of provocation which, I hope, will not lead to armed aggression in the days that lie ahead, although there are certainly chances for that situation arising.

I hope that this bill will be carefully considered, not just on second reading. We are prepared to recommend second reading for the purpose of having it go before the external affairs committee. There are some parts of it that ought to go before that committee. Following the procedure which was adopted in the other house, I make this plea to the minister. In view of the fact that no evidence is available to us from the other place, the bill ought to be sent to a standing committee of the house. When that is done I hope that the government will give consideration to one or two matters which occurred to me as being important in connection with strengthening the bill. It is so important that I think the government ought to give some undertaking, so far as it can do so, that in serious cases, while parliament is sitting, the government will not unnecessarily avail itself of the wide and sweeping powers contained in the emergency legislation with which it is now clothed. I realize, and so does the government, that time may be of the essence so far as these matters are concerned. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not going to withhold from the government the right to act quickly if an emergency arises, because minutes and not hours may be the deciding factor with respect to sanctions. More than that, the government ought to do what the United Kingdom did, namely, not to wait for fifteen days or whatever the act calls for in regard to the time of tabling the order in council when parliament is sitting. If parliament is sitting the order in council should be laid on the table forthwith. That is what is done in the British house, and we could do no better than to follow the precedent that they have set.

The question of penalties ought to be thoroughly reviewed and considered. Those are matters that can be left to the good judgment of the standing committee on external affairs if the government sees fit to refer the bill to that body. In that committee we must see what practical factors are involved so far as the Canadian people are concerned. We must know that because it is essential. While some people may be carried off their feet by the onrushing winds of cloudy sentimentality, the nations of the world are beginning to be more realistic about the whole question of peace. We should make sure that we are applying common-sense Canadianism to world problems of today.

I also wish to mention what was referred to in one of the debates in the British house when a similar bill was before parliament there. It is something which we can take to heart ourselves. Let us not play with the question of the united nations and peace. So often—and I do not say this necessarily about any party or group in the house—we are somewhat hypocritical. Let us not be hypocritical about the whole question of peace and what it means. Very often we talk one way and when it comes down to the hard cold facts we want to talk in another way. We cannot have our cake and eat it. I suggest that we have a policy of economic sanctions which is not the type of policy that the Canadian government repudiated in 1935, but a policy that, to use the words of a British statesman in the house when the debate was in progress, cannot be characterized as all bark and no bite.

I believe that many hon. members will be glad to endorse and approve this legislation, because Canada cannot stay out of a great structure of economic sanctions, since this nation must never leave itself in the position, so far as an offending nation is concerned, of being an international bootlegger in any sense of the term. That is not our role. It is not the kind of role Canada has played up to date or intends to play in the years that lie ahead.

Let me say this in conclusion. Either we mean business in this international fight to keep the peace, or we do not. If we do, then let us shoulder our full responsibility. If we do not, let us not be hypocritical but rather abandon the whole thing now.

I believe I speak for everyone in our party in this house when I say that I for one want Canada to pull her full weight and, having that definitely in mind, I will support this legislation for the reasons I mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This piece of legislation is something we are obligated to adopt, and I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), that the matter be considered by the committee on external affairs, is one which the government might well accept.

When I look at the charter of the united nations I realize to what an extent article 41 is intended to carry out the intention of the preamble:

> We the peoples of the united nations, determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind—

—obligate ourselves to do certain things. We obligate ourselves—> —to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security, and to ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest.

The article we are now discussing places in the hands of the security council a means whereby it is hoped that the subsequent use of armed force may be avoided. Consequently it is an article of the united nations charter which should command the support of all parties in this house.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Peel as he discussed the question of sovereignty. I do not regard our adherence to the united nations as in any way involving our surrender of sovereignty. To my mind, what it actually does is to extend our sovereignty far beyond our own borders, extending it into affairs where otherwise we might have no voice and might not be able to help to determine policy which might involve us in disastrous results in the years to come.

The very fact that we are a member of the united nations, though at the moment we are not a member of the security council, does give us an extension of our sovereignty over matters about which we would have no say and in which, at least, we would have no determining voice. And so this article 41 of the charter gives us a right to participate in measures that may be necessary in order to prevent the involvement of all other countries and our own in a worldwide war.

I do not think any of us in this house, whether we have seen the united nations in operation or not, and have followed the work of the security council and other organs of the united nations, can say that so far the organization has measured up to what those of us who were in San Francisco hoped it would attain. But in spite of all the criticisms that might be levelled against the united nations organization, one is inclined to ask the critics: What do you suggest that could take its place? That is the crucial question. What is there that could be devised which at this moment would take it place?

I hope that one day we may reach the stage foreshadowed by the prophets of old when we may beat our swords into ploughshares, when the lion may lie down with the lamb, and when we may live together as a great brotherhood, under some kind of federation or parliament of man. But the parliament of man is a long way off. I believe it is possible through an organization, even as we have set it up at the present time, to look forward to its ending the possibility of armed conflict among the peoples. I say, armed conflict, because I agree with the hon. member for Peel that there are two kinds of struggle. There is also the ideological struggle, but I would say to him that I know of no way in which it would be possible to prevent the flow of ideas across the world, which are at the root of the ideological struggle; and my reliance, as far as the ideological struggle is concerned, is upon the belief that the democratic way, democratic methods of self-government, will enable our people to do all those things which are necessary to improve our standards of living, and so on, so that ultimately the ideology of freedom, in the political and in the economic sphere, will be attained and safeguarded because of its rightness and its power.

May I ask that you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I have the consent of the house to say this. Several members have asked about the resumption of the budget debate. The debate will be resumed tomorrow afternoon, and we most earnestly ask for the cooperation of all parties to conclude it tomorrow.

Mr. GREEN: Will the discussion of the resolutions follow?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Immediately.

Mr. GRAYDON: And continue until finished?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before six o'clock, I was discussing article 41 of the charter of the united nations, and had remarked that we could not draw a curtain across the world and prevent ideas from flowing in various directions; nor should we seek to do so. I know the feeling of the various delegates who were present at the meeting of the united nations in New York last autumn, and before that in London and San Francisco, was the feeling expressed by Mrs. Roosevelt on one occasion, when she said of her work on the economic and social council that it was the most exasperating thing in the world.

We know we have to arrive at understandings with the country that in the last twenty-five years has emerged as a great world power. I refer to Russia. They do not understand our approach to the problems which confront the world, nor do we understand their approach. I sometimes think we could learn a lesson from our own history. After all, for years they were more or less outlawed among the nations, and the treatment we accorded them between the wars accounts in no small measure for the distrust and suspicion they now feel with regard to us. Except for some of their top leaders, and incidentally very few of them, none of the Russians has had any close contact either with the outside world or with the ideas we represent. I think we have to bear in mind that they came into power after a revolution which they had fomented by all possible means, including widespread conspiracy. If we know the history of revolutions I think we shall realize that for a period after a revolution the ideas which brought it about and the methods by which the revolution was made successful are the methods that follow a revolution. Even in our own British history, if you go back to the Stuart period you find the overthrow of Charles; Cromwell; then the restoration; the coming of James; the overthrow of James, and so on. All during that period you find a history of intolerance that seems to be common to revolutionary and post-revolutionary periods. Similar experiences, to a degree, followed the French revolution. And we have to bear in mind that on the foundation which was built up prior to and following the revolution is imposed a philosophy of Marxism, applied to the Russian situation. I think all this accounts for a great many of the difficulties with which the world is faced today. After all, the Soviet Union is a young nation in the field of the world diplomacy, and her leaders have not had the experience and training the leaders of the western nations have had. So I feel keenly that, while we must stand firmly by our democratic principles and traditions, we should endeavour at all times and everywhere to understand the background of the people with whom we are trying to come to an understanding at the present time. It seems to me, if we can do that, we shall be moving a long way toward a better understanding in the world.

This article 41 of the charter gives the security council certain powers, including the power to take measures exclusive of war, and commits us to participation in those measures. I hope we shall never have to use any of the enforcement measures provided in the charter. We may have to do so, but I hope not. In any event, I think it is wise, considering the state in which the world is now, that we should be properly prepared to do whatever may be necessary in order to promote peace, first, and prevent war if war is threatened, and to put down aggression should aggression occur. I sometimes think the people of today are unaware of the difficulty which faces mankind, and the threat which overshadows the world. When we think of the new weapons of war, and particularly the atomic weapons, we begin to realize that if war did come there are only two countries which conceivably could participate in such a war. Those nations are, of course, the United States and Russia; and neither, except for destroying the centres of population of the other, could achieve a successful invasion or the conquest of the other. Perhaps that realization on the part of both may be one of the factors which will enable the world to preserve peace. No one can gain from the type of war that will come if the united nations organization fails. As I said this afternoon, while we may be some distance from any form of world government, world government must come if we are to have universal peace some time. I do not expect that will come in my lifetime or in the lifetime of hon. members of this House of Commons, though we strive to that end, but at least we have, within the united nations, an organization which may be a foundation upon which permanent peace can be built.

As far as Canada's part in this political and ideological struggle is concerned, I think we should take the middle view, the view that is being taken by the western European people and the people of Great Britain; that, instead of inflaming public opinion against the United States on the one hand or against Russia on the other, we should do all we can —and I think Canada can do a great deal— to bring about an understanding between these two great powers and among the united nations. As I said once before in the house, I was pleased that the head of the Canadian delegation, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), was the first delegate at New York, at the second part of the first session of the assembly, to draw to the attention of the assembled nations the fact that we had not yet laid the foundations of security enforcement, if I may put it in that way; for Canada, and particularly those nations which are not the so-called great nations, have a tremendous stake in seeing to it that the security council operates without war.

As the leader of our delegation said in New York, unless we can devote to the building of homes and the improvement of the conditions of life of our people in our countries the amount we shall be compelled to devote for defensive purposes, and unless we are able to make this charter effective, we cannot in the days to come improve our standard of living as we would like to improve it. Instead of, as our people thought as they were fighting the war, and when the war ended, our being on the threshold of a newer and better age, we may sink down into the depths of despair and misery. That will be the result, unless we can make this organization work.

So I wanted to say tonight that we must try to bring about better understanding among nations, and particularly between the two giants which emerged from this war. I know it is exceedingly difficult to get our point of view into the Soviet Union; and sometimes I feel that perhaps the point of view of the Soviet union is not always placed accurately before our own people. One had only to be at those conferences to realize that very often the reports published, and particularly those in some sections of the United States press, with respect to discussions which took place in the various committees and the assembly gave a most distorted picture of what actually occurred in the discussions.

So far as the article and the bill before us are concerned, let me say that we support the bill because we believe it is another step in the promotion of peace and in Canada's support of the only organization to which we can look at this time for the preservation of peace in the world.

And I say to those critics of the united nations, and of the united nations charter, that when they criticize they should be prepared to say what they have to offer the world in its place. If there is nothing else, then it seems to me the best thing to do is to support what we have. It may not be as effective as we would like it to be; nevertheless I believe it is a step forward. Though it may be a difficult step, and may sometimes appear to a great many people, a feeble step, yet it is a step we ourselves should take with the rest of the world.

Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that we support the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to imagine all the things which are involved or which might be involved in Bill No. 132. What I find considerably more important, and perhaps embarrassing, is that I have not as yet been able to envision all the purposes for which the provisions of the bill might be used. I consider it my duty to find out these things before I say whether I will support the bill or not. There are implications in it which I certainly do not like. It may be that my fears are not well founded, but that can be known only after I have given the bill the most thorough investigation.

I will challenge anybody who has not been a participant in the sessions of the united nations to say at this stage just what is implied in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Even they cannot do it.

Mr. LOW: I am afraid I must agree with what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said. Many things have been said in this debate—and it has been short, it is true—about peace, and about putting teeth into international legislation to ensure peace. I listened with keen attention to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and also to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

I must say that the group which I represent, and for which I certainly am speaking at this time, will take second place to no group in its desire for world peace. We are sincere in our desire for that condition. But I must say further that we take a realistic position with respect to the means by which peace shall be achieved.

Let me remind the house that peace does not stem from statutes, from sanctions exercised upon people, or from coercion. Peace resides in and springs from the hearts of men. The will to peace has to be cultivated in the hearts of men. The only satisfactory condition for world peace is that which can be found in finding out, by careful study and investigation what the causes of war are, and then removing them at the earliest possible time.

I would feel much happier about the united nations and the work it has done if I could have seen it giving much more of its time to a study of the causes of war, instead of watching it giving its undivided attention to other aspects of international relations such as force or sanctions, or ways of divesting nations of their sovereignty—which, in itself, I remind hon. members, is very often a cause of war.

I believe that the provisions of Bill No. 132 may have such far-reaching results that we, as responsible representatives of the people, should exercise the greatest care in becoming thoroughly informed about it, and about what it provides for. Further than that, I think we should do everything we can to see that the Canadian people are made fully aware of its implications.

I know there is widespread anxiety not only here in Canada but elsewhere in the world about the effectiveness of the united nations, about whether or not the united nations will be able to achieve what it set out to achieve, namely world peace. I find, as I talk to people wherever I go, that they have not much knowledge about it; they have not much information.

I recall that back in 1945 when the house was debating the united nations charter, and whether parliament should approve Canada's participation in the united nations, I pointed out what I believed were some of the dangers and some of the weaknesses in the charter. I suggested then that the only way the united nations could possibly be successful would be to have the undivided support of the people, not only of this country, but of every other country in the world participating in it. I suggested at that time that one means of mobilizing that support would be by means of the radio. In Canada we had the network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stretching across Canada, and we should have given over that radio network every bit of information it was possible to gather about the united nations, so as to allow the people to measure its possibilities, to judge of it and to get to understand it. I say once more that the most effective motive force for any organization designed to bring about world peace, such as the united nations, must come from the awakened conscience of the people. We cannot expect to impose peace by sanction or statute; it must come out of the people. I am concerned about getting information to the people, and I suggest that one of the best ways of informing the public is to have this bill go before the standing committee on external affairs. I support that suggestion whole-heartedly. I spoke to the minister about it the other day and he suggested he would give it consideration. I hope he has given it that consideration and will be ready to move that the bill be sent to the committee where we can examine witnesses, where representatives of the press can be present to give publicity to the information that may be brought out.

I understand that this bill was referred to the standing committee on external affairs in the other place but I searched everywhere for the proceedings of that committee and I was very much disappointed to find that such an important measure should be discussed and investigated without any record of the committee's proceedings being kept. I voice this in criticism of that other place. If they are to justify their existence surely it is their responsibility to provide a record of their proceedings, especially in connection with a matter of such importance as this bill and others that originate in that place and are sent here for our consideration. I believe I speak for my group when I say that we want to know all that it is possible to know about the bill and its implications before we can say whether or not we will support it. I have serious doubts as to whether it does not run afoul of provincial rights, and I believe the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) suggested the same fears. I wonder if the minister, when he is making his rebuttal, will set our minds at rest on that point? This and many other questions ought to be fully investigated before hon. members attempt to express their judgment on the bill. Therefore I suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs give us the assurance that it will be sent to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I was hopeful that we would hear tonight a real formula for peace when the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) said that we should beat our swords into ploughshares and our spears into pruning hooks. He should have gone on and given us a real formula for peace, but he did not. I am not one who claims that you can have an abiding peace on an economic and social security foundation, because foundations of that kind change with the country in which you live. If the leader of the C.C.F. had gone on a little farther with his quoting of Isaiah he would have found that even away back in Isaiah's time it was found that the foundation for the cure of war was to be found in the Prince of Peace. As Paul said, other foundations can no man lay. You can have all the money you could possibly use; you can have all the things you could possibly be surrounded with, but if you have not the source of peace in the individual heart you are not going to have peace in the nation. You can have that peace only by building on the one foundation. When the nations of the world come to that understanding, then we shall have peace at home and we shall have peace abroad.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before the house finishes with this matter, there are several things which I consider it my duty to bring to the attention of the house. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked a question which I believe had a considerable effect upon hon. members. He asked: What have we to put in the place of the united nations? I should like to be granted the indulgence of the house for a while to say something concerning that matter. I think the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) put his finger on the root of the whole situation. I do not recall his exact words, but the thought I got from them was this: It is just as foolish to try to build an edifice to guarantee the peace of the world on unsound, unstable and unsatisfactory foundations economically and socially as it would be to try to build a New York sky-scraper on a bed of quicksand. The economic and social foundations which exist among men today are just as unstable and treacherous as a bed of quicksand. The objection which I have taken to this whole united nations situation since early 1945 has been based on the ground that no adequate attention has been given to these economic and social foundations which are so treacherous and which have caused such terrible trouble in the world during the last forty years.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to some matters which are very serious. Some of the material which I propose to present to the house tonight I have had in my hands for a year and a half. I have been doubtful as to whether or not I should put it on Hansard; but I have a feeling that the time has come to put some of this important material on the record so that it can be considered when this bill is being considered. This bill is supposed to be a measure to strengthen the united nations, the object being to enable the world to have peace. Let us examine the whole thing in the light of some of these facts.

First, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said, let us find the cause of war. We do not need to go back any farther than the war from which we have just emerged. What caused that war? I am going into this in an effort to find out whether the thing we have established as the united nations has even a ghost's chance of dealing with the cause of war and preventing war. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar both expressed dissatisfaction with what has happened as regards the united nations up to the present time. There is a fundamental reason for the failure of that organization.

Why is Russia taking such a strong stand in the whole matter of the united nations? I am afraid it is done for two reasons. In the first place, the Russians seem to know more about essential fundamentals in trade than we seem to be able to get through our heads. Next, the Russians are not afraid to tell the truth and face the facts when they know them, and it seems to me that a good many of our people are afraid to tell the truth and face the facts.

What caused world war II? Let me turn to what brought Japan and the United States into conflict in the last world war. I shall have to refer to some documents to show what brought them to clash, but briefly I would say it was the fact that the United States insisted that the most favoured nation clause should apply to herself and Japan. Japan knew that if the most favoured nation clause were established as a fundamental basis for trade relations between herself and the United States, the economic existence of Japan would be rendered an impossibility; and so they fought. I believe I can adduce evidence which will satisfy every hon. member, or at least it will give him food for thought. I turn, first of all, to the document of November 26, 1941, a statement by Cordell Hull to the Japanese ambassador while they were negotiating. There is every indication in the words which were used that the Japanese were struggling even at that late date to avoid the calamity of war. I read from clause 4 of section 1 of the document—as usual the people who know all about these things are not listening. The second paragraph of the clause reads:

The government of Japan—

It is the United States speaking.

—and the government of the United States have agreed that toward eliminating chronic political instability, preventing recurrent economic collapse, and providing a basis for peace, they will actively support and practically apply the following principles in their economic relations with each other and with other nations and peoples:

(1) The principle of non-discrimination in international commercial relations.

(2) The principle of international economic cooperation and abolition of extreme nationalism as expressed in excessive trade restrictions.

(3) The principle of non-discriminatory access by all nations to raw material supplies.

(4) The principle of full protection of the interests of consuming countries and populations as regards the operation of international commodity agreements.

(5) The principle of establishment of such institutions and arrangements of international finance—

Think of Bretton Woods!

—as may lend aid to the essential enterprises and the continuous development of all countries and may permit payments through processes of trade consonant with the welfare of all countries.

May I just point out to the members of the house how familiar those words sound in our ears—in our ears who have read the Dumbarton Oaks conference report and the Bretton Woods conference report. What the United States was insisting on in effect was the establishment practically of those two sets of proposals; and it was because Japan could not possibly accept those conditions that she resisted even by war.

Now I quote a little further on from the same document, clause 6 of section 2:

The government of the United States and the government of Japan will enter into negotiations for the conclusion between the United States and Japan of a trade agreement, based upon reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment and reduction of trade barriers by both countries, including an undertaking by the United States to bind raw silk on the free list.

Now, Mr. Speaker and hon. members, it stands out as clear as the sun in a cloudless sky that what the United States insisted on was the most favoured nation clause. Have you heard any word from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) concerning that matter? Have you heard a single word from the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) concerning that matter? Have you heard a single word from any member of the Liberal party concerning that matter? Why is it there has been no discussion in this house of the cause of the last war? Can you imagine any hon. member of this house who is a medical doctor undertaking to cure a disease before he diagnoses the cause?

An hon. MEMBER: They often do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We in this house and apparently in all the legislatures in all parts of the British commonwealth have been setting about to find a cure for the ills that afflict this generation and which resulted in two wars without giving any attention to the cause. No wonder the united nations arrangement is a disappointment—no wonder! And now it is proposed that this house put through a measure which is supposed to put teeth into the security council, which is to be guided in its thinking and its operations in this world by a group of men who apparently know nothing whatsoever about the causes of war and are in no way disposed to remove those causes, people apparently who are intent upon trying to deal with symptoms instead of the causes of disease.

I should like to say just a word about the people in the other place. I wanted to rise and ask the hon. member for Peel a question this afternoon while he was speaking, but I feared I might throw him off his line of thought. I wanted to ask him this question: Where did he suppose the other place got this measure we now are discussing? Where did it come from? Did some member of the other place draft this bill? Who put it into the hands of the members in the other place? And who was the member in the other place who sponsored this bill and supported it? No wonder the hearings of the committee that investigated this bill were never printed! And here we are sitting here and paying no attention to important matters like that. Where was this bill drafted—in Canada or in the United States? That is important. The hon. member for Peel this afternoon almost let the cat out of the bag when he said that certain senators "were able to get certain changes." This bill was supposed to originate with the members of the other place. Yet the members of the other place had to struggle apparently to get changes in the bill! Surely the members of this house are not going to go into this thing with their eyes closed! Surely there is the handwriting on the wall! Surely there is ample cause for suspicion and anxiety in a procedure like that!

Let me go forward with the cause of world war II. I come now to what the Japanese say, just to show whether what I have indicated, was actually the cause of the war. Here is the reply which the Japanese ambassador put into the hands of the United States government. I am quoting from subclause 1 of clause 4 of the document put into the hands of the United States government at 2.20 p.m. on December 7, 1941:

> The American government advocates in the name of world peace those principles favourable to it and urges upon the Japanese government the acceptance thereof. The peace of the world may be brought about only by discovering a mutually acceptable formula through recognition of the reality of the situation and mutual appreciation of one another's position. An attitude such as ignores realities and imposes one's selfish views upon others will scarcely serve the purpose of facilitating the consummation of negotiations.

That is so beautifully put, so humbly put, so clearly and so tersely put, that it is like a cry of anguish.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): I suppose Pearl Harbor happened under those terms.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member will listen and not talk he will learn a lot. He is going to learn a whole lot more if he can only keep himself quiet. All he knows about the cause of the last war could be put in a nutshell.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Are we to take the word of the Japanese for it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member needs to keep himself quiet and patient. I am not asking him to take anybody's word. He can draw his own conclusions. He has intelligence; let him use it.

The hon. member raised the question of what the Japanese said. I challenge the hon. member to show that what is stated in my quotation from the Japanese note is not exactly what the United States is doing today over in Geneva. I challenge him to show that that is not exactly the purpose of Bretton Woods; that that is not exactly the purpose of Dumbarton Oaks and that it is not exactly the purpose of the San Francisco conference and the united nations agreement. I challenge any hon. member who thinks he can answer the challenge. I would advise him to get himself well prepared before he attempts it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I raise a question of order? The hon. member has made some allegations and statements in regard to procedure with reference to the present legislation. I want to assure him that this was considered by the elected members of the government of Canada who represent democracy in Canada. Purely on the question of expedition this legislation was sent, as we sometimes do, to the other house to be referred back to this house. The hon. member is talking the most crazy nonsense I ever heard in the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I have to say is that if this was originated by the administration in Canada it stands as one of the most potent condemnations—

Mr. MACKENZIE: And responsible to the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —of the administration of Canada that can be conceived.

Mr. MACKENZIE: All right; try to defeat it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not afraid to meet my hon. friend, but I do not want smart alec or ignorant remarks; I want hon. members who think they can answer my arguments to produce documents in proof of what they are saying as I am doing. It will require documents to answer what I am saying.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should like to suggest to the hon. member who has the floor that he confine his remarks to the general principle of the bill which is before the house. The purpose of this bill is to empower the government of Canada to carry out the obligations of Canada under section 41 of the charter of the united nations signed at San Francisco on June 26, 1945. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, up to the present time no hon. member who has thus far spoken has spoken on the principle of the bill. I do not think anybody knows just what the principle is. In a general way, so far as I can gather, the principle of the bill is that we are putting tremendous powers in the hands of an organization with a policy we know nothing about, an organization which we can in no way make responsible to this parliament, the security council, an organization concerning the personnel of which we know nothing and over which we can exercise no influence; and yet we propose to put almost limitless power into the hands of that organization to perform in Canada. I am raising the question as to whether we can afford to do that, considering all the facts which I am adducing. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that I am speaking exactly on the principle of the bill.

May I read the closing remarks of the aforementioned Japanese answer to the United States:

Thus, the earnest hope of the Japanese government to adjust Japanese-American relations and to preserve and promote the peace of the Pacific through cooperation with the American government has finally been lost.

The Japanese government regrets to have to notify hereby the American government that in view of the attitude of the American government it cannot but consider that it is impossible to reach an agreement through further negotiations.

Which, Mr. Speaker, as clearly as words can convey, indicates to us what caused world war II. Yet not a word is said about that cause or how to remove it. The assumption is that Japan was only foolish, just as we contended that Hitler was a madman—

Mr. MITCHELL: Was he not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Great states do not go to war on pretexts like that. States of well nigh hundreds of millions of people do not take fearful risks just because they have whims or happen to be led by madmen. Why, surely, two terrible wars within the very lives of most of us must have impressed that on our minds. There is a fundamental cause somewhere. What is the cause?

An hon. MEMBER: Russia.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Two documents from which I have read excerpts indicate clearly what was the cause of the last war.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on, but I am half afraid that I am devoting too much time to this. I shall, however, read what Cordell Hull said on December 7, 1941, after he read the Japanese document from which I have quoted. I will maintain that no hon. member who will read through the Japanese statement carefully and in an unbiased manner would be unimpressed by the realism of the Japanese statement and the moderation of the words. He will be impressed by it.

After the American Secretary of State read two or three pages he asked the ambassador whether this document was presented under instructions of the Japanese government. The ambassador replied that it was. The secretary as soon as he had finished reading the document, turned to the Japanese ambassador and said:

"I must say that in all my conversations with you during the last nine months I have never uttered one word of untruth. This is borne out absolutely by the record. In all my fifty years of public service I have never seen a document that was more crowded with infamous falsehoods and distortions on a scale so huge that I never imagined until today that any government on this planet was capable of uttering them."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hon. members applaud Cordell Hull's remarks. That is the reaction of men who do not know. Now hear the reaction of a man who does know. Hear now the statement of a man who knows realities concerning international trade. The Japanese statement to which Cordell Hull in those words so slightingly referred is correct and accurate in every phrase.

Mr. IRVINE: What was the date of this document?

Mr. BLACKMORE: December 7, 1941.

Mr. IRVINE: Was not the last war in progress at that time?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right, but it was not known at the time. It does not alter the truth of the remarks that are made. I know what is in the hon. member's mind. I am glad he brought it up. I had hoped that someone would. The question will be raised, had not the Japanese made up their minds to fight? I am going to read another document which will satisfy hon. members on that question. The question would be, did the Japanese just make up their minds to conquer the world?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will you please speak loud enough, Mr. Speaker, for me to hear you.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's remarks are not relevant to the bill which is before the house at this time. If he reads the bill and the explanatory note the hon. member will realize that his remarks are not relevant to the bill which is before the house. If he does not confine his remarks to the general principle of the bill I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I certainly do not want to come in conflict with Your Honour, but I wish to say to you and to hon. members that the things I am saying have a more potent bearing on the subject matter of the discussion than any other material that can be brought before them tonight.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The astounding thing is that hon. members can talk any kind of claptrap in the house and get away with it, but the minute any hon. member attempts to deal with realities he is not permitted to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I did not say that the hon. member's remarks were not important; I say they are not relevant to the general principle of the bill. I am sorry, but the hon. member will have to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill as the rules require that they should.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall have to refer only to the statement that I was going to make. I ask hon. members who are interested —and everybody in the house is vitally interested—to get the report of the United States Army Pearl Harbor Board issued October 20, 1944, and published on August 29, 1945, —it will be in the New York Times in our library—and read the conclusions especially No. 1 of C (Responsibilities). There they will find the following:

> However, war with Japan was inevitable and imminent because of irreconcilable disagreements between the Japanese empire and the American government.

Mr. Speaker, the main "irreconcilable disagreement" was over the most-favoured-nation clause.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with the bill?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It has a great deal to do with it, because the bill is supposed to deal with an organization that is supposed to prevent war. My argument is that it is just utterly futile to think you can prevent war when you do not take any means to remove the cause of war. Therefore the first thing you have to do is to find the cause.

I am going to pass on from there to another aspect of the matter. I am afraid I shall not be permitted to read another most important passage. I will merely refer to it, because I know a good many hon. members will want to read it. There is an excellent book written by Colonel L. S. Amery, who was in the British war cabinet and who certainly knew about matters of trade. There is no man in the British empire who knows more about such things than the Right Hon. L. S. Amery, C.H. He wrote a book called the "Washington Loan Arrangements".

An hon. MEMBER: Is he a brother of the spy?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Those who read Hansard will realize what sort of silly, non-essential remarks a member has to deal with when he tries to discuss a serious matter in this house.

In this book, the "Washington Loan Agreements", which is right on the cause of war and right on the problems of peace, right up to date, was published in February, 1946. There is a copy in the library; I urge hon. members to read it. I would refer them to the introduction at page 5, starting with paragraph 2, "What we are entitled to object to," and reading right through to page 8 at the end of the second paragraph to the words "of our national economic policy." In that statement the Right Hon. L. S. Amery points out that the United States is still following exactly the same policy which precipitated the war between herself and Japan, the policy which rendered it utterly impossible to avoid that conflict. With the United States pursuing that policy, do we sit in this house and imagine that we can gain world peace by establishing an organization to take away the sovereignty of the British nations? Surely we cannot be deluded to that extent!

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, speaking of the UNO, asked this question: what can we put in its place? Since he has asked the question, I presume you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to answer it. If not, I will refrain from further speech. I would, however, lay down what we can do to replace the iniquitous united nations arrangement. I say to hon. members that, as the days go by, they will find the united nations organization less and less valuable, more and more disappointing, as regards its ability to prevent war. But they will find that something horrible and insidious will develop increasingly among them due to its powers to influence the life of this nation and to clutter up its activities, impairing its freedom of action, and in various other ways making it impossible for us to be prosperous or to prepare for and to fight the next war. They will find that happening to a degree which will simply sicken them in every fibre of their being.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: As many as you like.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman agree with the policies of the Right Hon. L. S. Amery in regard to the dominions, to the commonwealth and to India?

Mr. BLACKMORE: In answer to the right hon. member I would say that the question he has asked has nothing to do with the matter and, if I were to discuss it in connection with this bill, I would be out of order. However I would ask the right hon. member to do this. I hope he has read the book. If he has not, I would ask him to read the passages I have indicated in the "Washington Loan Agreement".

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have read it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would ask him then to be prepared at any time to discuss the matter with me—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am ready right now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —and I will answer him point by point. I will challenge him to discuss with me, point after point, every statement that the Right Hon. L. S. Amery makes in those passages to which I have referred and show me where Amery is wrong. He cannot do so. Instead, I will prove to him that Amery is right, and I will do so by reference to what is going on in Geneva, where the United States is trying to beat down the British preferential tariff, which is the only means available to us of protecting our economy in the British commonwealth. The United States, I say, is doing everything in its power to break down that economy, to destroy it. Let the minister prepare himself and, if he can, challenge the statement I have just made.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do so now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Wait until we get a good chance in committee and I will take the right hon. gentleman right to the floor, when he will get the finest spanking he has ever had in his life.

May I turn now to the question of what to do instead of having the united nations organization. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar despairs about it. He seems to think that if it fails we shall have the atomic bomb on us, and all the other horrible things he fears. Well, in the last war we could have used gas and utterly destroyed the world, but we did not; we could have waged bacterial warfare and utterly destroyed mankind, but we did not. I presume in the next world war we shall have the atomic bomb, which could be used then to destroy the peoples of the world, but we shall not use it. People have too much fun fighting and killing one another to kill themselves off completely. They will not do that. The hon. member need not despair so much. If, however, the fundamental causes of war are not removed, men will fight, no matter what they fight with, whether it be atomic bombs or their teeth or fingernails, because they will have to fight in order to live.

The hon. member asks what we could do to replace the U.N.O. The other night I made a speech on this question. I know I shall not be allowed to read from it now, but I would refer hon. members to the remarks I made on May 16, as recorded at page 3170 of Hansard, where I answered that question in the speech I then made. I pointed out that it would be perfectly feasible to organize the nations of good will in the world under an organization like the British commonwealth, in which every nation has its sovereignty, but in which every nation, because of a common purpose and understanding, will stand together with the rest in order to accomplish great ends.

There is not a nation in the world, as far as I know, that would not join such an organization if the matter were put plainly before it. As I pointed out the other night, this is the kind of thing that Anthony Eden advised. Let us have an organization built upon a blueprint after the fashion of the British commonwealth. He certainly did not imply any support of the monstrous organization that was erected in the united nations organization, or such a horrible engine as the security council, which threatens to deprive the nations of their sovereignty.

If we have an organization like the British commonwealth, which we can have if we will, and then adopt the nine principles which I advocated the other night, some of them too far advanced for many members of the house to accept, but which nevertheless will be found important and sound, then we shall have an alternative.

Before I go into that, however, I should like to point out for the information of hon. members—and I believe all hon. members will agree with me—that the fundamental and inevitable cause of war is economic, and the fundamental, economic cause is the fact that, as nations trade, some of them fall into adverse trade balances and debt to others for the reason that they cannot keep their people from buying more goods from those other nations than those other nations will buy from them. We in Canada are witnessing that process right at the present time, even with our vast resources around us. What, then, must be the pathetic condition of a nation like Belgium, or Holland, or Czechoslovakia, or Yugoslavia when it undertakes to protect its economy? What must have been the position of Italy, with its 47,000,000 people on their barren slopes. What must have been the position of Hitler with 66,000,000 crowded in an area not one-third as large as Ontario. The fear of an adverse trade balance was insistent, that and the establishment of unrepayable international debt, debt that can be repaid only in goods.

Take Canada as an illustration. We fall into debt to the United States, and we cannot pay because the United States will not accept our goods, which is the only means we have of repaying the debt. They put up tariff barriers, establish quotas, and by several other means prevent us from paying, which means that they put us into a state of unrepayable debt. When nations suffer that sort of thing they cannot avoid war. It is either war or utter national economic destruction. They prefer the war. There we have the fundamental cause of wars. How can you overcome this adverse trade balance situation and this unrepayable debt situation? The other night I laid down the principles on which you must organize your society. The first was this, that each nation retains its complete sovereignty to order its affairs in accordance with the will of its people.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, dear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I know the Minister of Labour is quite like a fish out of water when he gets on anything but labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am tired tonight.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I know you are tired; that is one of the reasons you never learn anything about how to govern a country with respect to these trade matters. If the cabinet is made up of people who know as little about economics and finance as the Minister of Labour knows—well, anyway, principle No. 2 was that each state undertakes to maintain adequate armed forces.

3. Each power undertakes to go to the aid of any other member of the association of nations which is the victim of armed aggression. This is right along the line the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wanted to hear, but the hon. gentleman has left the chamber. He asked for something and then ran away so that he could not get it.

Principle No. 4 is, each member undertakes to prohibit its nationals from owning or controlling any property or economic undertaking in another sovereign country. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) who is in his seat, if he were free to answer, how much of the difficulty in connection with Canada's trade balance is the result of the tremendous amount of United States capital invested in Canada. A very great deal of the trouble arises from that factor. This principle 4 is intended to overcome that factor in our international trade position.

5. Each nation undertakes not to export goods to any other nation, except in payment for imports from that nation, without the consent of that nation's government. If that principle were established, how many nations would lose all fear of economic penetration and conquest! While the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was speaking this afternoon and mentioning certain kinds of aggression, I interjected the words "industrial aggression." If you adopted that clause you would avoid industrial aggression and the fear which results from it, which is one of the direct causes of war.

6. Each state undertakes to receive payment in goods and services for any debt owing to its nationals. What a glorious blessing it would be to all the members of the British commonwealth if the United States would come out frankly and say, "We will do that. If we sell goods in your country, Canada, and you cannot pay us, we will accept goods in return, let them be of any kind."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have called the attention of the hon. member three times to the fact that his remarks should be relevant to the legislation now before the house. Now I would ask him to kindly resume his seat.

Mr. LOW: May I be permitted to raise a question of privilege? I know Your Honour is trying to be absolutely fair, but I am afraid you may be unaware of the schedule which is at the end of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. member will admit that the Chair and the members of the house have been very generous.

Mr. LOW: No, sir, under the circumstances I cannot admit that, because the hon. member has not spoken for his forty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I have decided that his remarks are not relevant to the bill.

Mr. LOW: Is that your ruling, Mr. Speaker? If so, I am forced to challenge it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I must call the attention of the hon. member—

Mr. LOW: We simply challenge your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would hope that hon. members would collaborate with the Chair. Three times I called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his remarks were not relevant to the bill which is before the house. If the hon. member will read the explanatory note and what is contained in article 41 he will realize perfectly well that the remarks made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) were not relevant to the bill. I believe it is the duty of an hon. member to abide by rulings of the Chair and to help the Speaker of the house by doing so.

Mr. LOW: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to read what it says in article 41, in support of my contention that the hon. member was completely in order, before I challenge your ruling?

Mr. LALONDE: You are challenging the ruling.

Mr. LOW: I have already done so, but in deference to His Honour the Speaker I am asking for one moment to explain what I mean. I am reading from page 2 of the bill, the schedule which appears at the end, setting out article 41; and this Bill No. 132 purports to be an amendment to article 41 of the united nations charter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LOW: That is what it says. Read the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: We cannot amend the charter in this house.

Mr. LOW: Article 41 says:

> The security council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions—

Mr. LALONDE: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Mr. LOW: I am speaking to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you ask the hon. member to resume his seat?

Mr. LALONDE: Oh, well, I will.

Mr. LOW: I have the floor. I repeat:

> The security council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the members of the united nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations—

That is trade relations

> These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations—

That must include trade relations. It is an economic sanction.

> —and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

I contend that this clearly envisages the possibility of the application of sanctions against an offending nation, which may include trade sanctions. The hon. member for Lethbridge is discussing trade as one of the causes of war, which certainly must have application and must be related to the principle of this bill. So I would suggest that you give the hon. member an opportunity to complete his forty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I suggest in a very friendly spirit that we forget technicalities and get on with the work of the house. There is an old song I used to know in the first war entitled, "The more we get together, the happier we will be."

Mr. LOW: But you are taking up more time than the hon. member would need to finish.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am raising another point of order. At the time he was interrupted the hon. member was quoting a great authority—it was himself, it is true—but quoting from a speech made during a previous debate this session, which certainly is out of order in this House of Commons.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I raise a point of order. I think Your Honour has gone perhaps a little far afield, if I may say so with great deference, in view of the subject matter which is being discussed. I really think the hon. member for Lethbridge should have an opportunity to conclude his speech. He has not very much longer to go; this is not a very partisan matter, and I think the fewer difficulties we have in the debate, the better. I can quite appreciate Your Honour's position; I am not challenging it, nor am I even criticizing it, but perhaps we might inject a little of the milk of human kindness into this debate and let the hon. member go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members will realize that I called the attention of the hon. member three times to the fact that his remarks were not relevant to the bill now before the house. If the Speaker did not intervene and require the hon. member to resume his seat I wonder where hon. members would find any authority to enforce the rules of the house. I would ask them to assist their Speaker. I should be very grateful if hon. members would accept my decision and continue with the debate.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I say a word in my own defence? I would just like to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have asked the hon. member to resume his seat, and I would request the next hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. LOW: I certainly do not like that at all, Mr. Speaker. I must challenge your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the house is an appeal from the Speaker's decision. We have before the house the second reading of Bill No. 132. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) had the floor. The Speaker called his attention three times to the fact that on second reading of a bill the hon. member who has the floor should discuss only the general principle of the bill. His attention was again called to the fact that on second reading of the bill the discussion should be relevant to the bill before the house; and also to the fact that he was referring to a former debate. After three times the hon. member for Lethbridge was asked to resume his seat. Then the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) rose and appealed from the decision of the Speaker.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

(Text):

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall keep the house from coming to the question for only a few minutes, but in view of the fact that the united nations has been referred to as an iniquitous organization I feel that something else ought to be said before this debate closes. I for one am aware of the fact that the united nations structure as it now stands has certain shortcomings, that improvements are needed, and it is also true, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has said, that we should do everything we can to muster popular support for this people's organization. But it must be pointed out that the world would be in a sorry state if there were not some hope in the united nations. The fact is that for all its shortcomings it is grappling with some of the fundamental problems of war and peace. I want to refer in one sentence to the fact that an integral part of the united nations set-up is the economic and social council which is dealing with these fundamental problems.

It seems to me that the principle of the bill before us is so clear that there ought not to have been any necessity for arguing the point, nor should there have been the straying that has been evident during the course of this debate. We are not debating at this time the charter of the united nations. That charter has already been agreed to by some fifty-five nations, members of the organization, and not only has Canada signed the charter, but its signature has been approved by a unanimous vote by both houses of parliament. I submit, therefore, that we are not now arguing the merits of the charter nor the merits of article 41. One of the articles in that charter is article 25, which reads:

> The members of the united nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the security council in accordance with the present charter.

The principle of the bill before us is simply this: Is this parliament prepared to give the government of the day the necessary constitutional power to carry out a commitment we have already made? In the interests of international organization, in the interests of the wider sovereignty it provides, in the interests of world peace, I am glad that the government of the day has brought this measure before us, and I believe that it should receive the unanimous support of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, some hon. members have suggested that the bill should be referred to the standing committee on external affairs, and the government has no objection to its being examined before that committee. I therefore move that the bill be now referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister not making a statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I made a long statement on the resolution.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the bill before us deals with two main principles. One is the change from three commissioners to one commissioner and two deputies, and the other is to include the words "prison reformatories" in the term "penitentiaries".

No doubt this bill is designed to implement a recent decision of the government, presumably on the recommendation of the commissioner as it appears in his report which was tabled during the present session. I should like to quote from pages 8 and 9 of that report of the commissioner, General R. B. Gibson. He says:

> (a) The royal commission proposed the appointment of a prison commission composed of three members to administer the penal system of Canada responsible directly to the Minister of Justice. It is evident that in making this recommendation the royal commission had in mind its further recommendation that the federal government take over the administration of all the prisons in Canada, thus centralizing the control of the Canadian penal system under the government of Canada. As will be stated later, it is not yet considered practicable to give effect to this recommendation and the government has recently decided that for the present it is preferable to entrust the administration of the penitentiaries of Canada to a single commissioner assisted by two deputy commissioners, with a headquarters organization consisting of the inspectors and staff of the present penitentiaries branch, the inspectors being reclassified as assistant commissioners.

(b) It is proposed that one deputy commissioner will be primarily charged with the selection, training, assessment and further reconstruction of the staffs of the penitentiaries and with the organization and supervision of a training school for penitentiary officers. He will also be responsible for the supervision and development of the educational facilities in the institutions under the control of the dominion government.

(c) It is proposed that the second deputy commissioner will be primarily charged with supervision and development of the medical and psychiatric services, physical training and recreational facilities as well as the development of research and statistics to assess the adequacy and results of present and proposed methods of correctional treatment.

While the commissioner's report presumes to deal with implementing the recommendations of the royal commission presided over by Mr. Justice Archambault, there is a change from three commissioners to one commissioner, and therefore it is a serious departure from the recommendations of the Archambault commission. As I understand the situation, the recommendation for a three-man commission was adopted in the enactment of chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1939, and in enacting this measure, which is the present Penitentiary Act, which by the way with the exception of one or two sections has not yet been proclaimed, the main principle was the appointment of a three-man commission. I read from the debates of the House of Commons of 1939, at page 1472 of Hansard, where the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, introduced the resolution preceding that legislation and reading as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a commission with power under the Minister of Justice, to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners; and, generally, to repeal and reenact with consequential amendments the Penitentiary Act.

Later on, in explanation of his resolution, the then minister of justice said:

It will be—

That is the new act.

—the Penitentiary Act substantially as it is today in the statute, except that it provides for the establishment of a commission of three to replace the superintendent of penitentiaries.

The commission to be appointed was, I presume, to be a commission of three men and decisions were to be made by three commissioners. In the case of a disagreement I presume the majority would prevail. The new enactment before us this evening sets aside this important principle, and if the new enactment were adopted the commission would consist of just one commissioner and two deputy commissioners, who would simply obey the orders of the commissioner and perform the duties assigned by him. I think this is a grievous mistake which I should like the Minister of Justice to reconsider. There is no question that three men are better than one, speaking generally; but particularly in this case it is of the utmost importance that the decisions should not be just the opinions of one man.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member say that fifteen would be better than three?

Mr. JAENICKE: Not necessarily. We deal here with human beings who, it is true, have run foul of the law. They are still human beings and many factors must be considered in their treatment, both as to punishment and as to their rehabilitation.

I have no criticism to offer of General Gibson's appointment. I understand and I have heard that he is an energetic and capable person; but, Mr. Speaker, is it not strange that when the appointment is made of a superintendent or of any other high official under the Penitentiary Act and in the penitentiary service we cannot think of anyone except a military man. From the results of their administration of penitentiaries prior to the Archambault report, they have not exactly covered themselves with glory, as the report of the Archambault commission would indicate. Could not the minister think of some penologist or some similar expert to head the proposed commission or at least to be a member of it? I presume that a military man was picked because we have to have discipline in our penal institutions and military men are naturally reputed to be good disciplinarians. While I do not admit that discipline, at least as I understand the term, is the main factor in the treatment of our prisoners, yet it is an important one. I have no objection to a military man being one of the three members of the commission with the other two being trained in penology, psychology, criminology, social service or other similar branches of knowledge.

This matter was brought up in the debate in 1939, and the then minister of justice seemed to have the same idea. I quote from his remarks at page 1477 of Hansard of 1939. This is what the then minister of justice said:

I can assure my hon. friend that these men will not be selected because of political affiliations. We will try to have men who are expert in this work. It has been urged for some time that there should be a medical man on the staff of the penitentiaries, an expert in mental diseases and that sort of thing. The idea is to have three men at the head of our penal system whose names and abilities will be a guarantee to the people of Canada that this very important branch of the administration is being looked after properly.

I think that is what the Archambault commission had principally in mind when it so strongly recommended the appointment of a three-man commission. To emphasize this point, let me quote from the Archambault report at pages 342 and 343. This is what the Archambault commission has to say:

In our present system the problem of penal administration is too large in scope and too serious in results to be left in the hands of one man. It is noteworthy, as a matter of record, that Canada is practically the only country where the penal system is not administered by some kind of commission or board.

I may say that this same paragraph was also quoted by the then minister of justice in 1939 in support of his resolution at that time. I continue to quote from the Archambault report:

In Great Britain, the prison commission is composed of a chairman and two other commissioners, one administrative and the other medical, and is reenforced by four assistant commissioners, one of whom acts as secretary.

Then on page 343:

Under this system the continuity of policy can be maintained and the control of prisons, though subject to the will of parliament, is divorced from the changing views of party policy. Each member of the commission is responsible for his own share of the work of the department. Differences of opinion may arise in the course of the commission's discussions but, to date, it has not been found necessary on any occasion to bring a question to a vote for settlement.

The act of 1939 differs very little from the old Penitentiary Act, being chapter 154 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. Its important difference is the setting up of the commission in the place of the one superintendent. This important change is now to be discarded and the old method of a one man czar to administer our penal institutions is to be readopted. The main difference is that, instead of calling him a superintendent, we shall now call him a commissioner. I am afraid that I cannot give my support to a step which, I believe, is a retreat from a former more advanced policy.

When I first read General Gibson's report my reaction was favourable, but when I had more time for study any favourable impression was soon dissipated. I have not the time to go fully into every phase of the report about which I might offer criticism or disagreement, but I shall confine myself to efforts in making suggestions or recommendations as to how we might accomplish or make a start in unifying our penal system.

When General Gibson says, as I quoted a few moments ago—

It is evident that in recommending the three-man commission the royal commission had in mind its further recommendation that the federal government take over the administration of all prisons in Canada thus centralizing the control of the Canadian penal system under the government of Canada.

—I wish with great respect to differ from the general in that regard. The three-man commission was recommended, irrespective of whether or not we had a unified or centralized penal system throughout Canada.

The last paragraph of that section of the royal commission's report dealing with the recommendation of the three-man commission reads as follows, and may be found on page 344 of the report:

The prison commission, as recommended, would perform the functions now performed by the superintendent and three inspectors. It would have power to appoint staffs, and would act as a central parole board. The members should be removable only for cause.

I therefore maintain that the recommendations are not interdependent. What does the commissioner say about the unification of the penal system? I quote from his report on pages 14 and 15:

(a) The royal commission recommended that the Canadian penal system should be centralized under the control of the government of Canada, with the federal authorities taking charge of all the prisons in Canada, the provinces retaining only a sufficient number to provide for offenders against provincial statutes, prisoners on remand, and those serving short sentences.

(b) Under the British North America Act legislative authority for the establishment, maintenance and management of penitentiaries is assigned to the parliament of Canada, whereas the provincial legislatures have authority to make laws in relations to the establishment, maintenance and management of public and reformatory prisons in and for the province. It thus appears that while the provincial legislatures alone have legislative authority to provide for reformatory institutions in and for their respective provinces, the establishment or acquisition of reformatory institutions with dominion wide scope is not excluded from the sphere of the government of Canada.

(c) The royal commission suggested that centralization might be accomplished by two methods:

(i) by amending the criminal code, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act to change the minimum term for which a convicted person may be sentenced to a penitentiary to a period of less than two years; or

(ii) by an agreement being made between the dominion and the provinces for the former to take over the administration of provincial penal institutions, in order that persons committed to prison for terms of less than two years might be committed to federal institutions.

(d) It is evident that in the present state of the law any comprehensive change in the control of penal institutions can only be reached by agreement between the dominion and provincial governments.

While I cannot wholly concur in the conclusions of the commissioner as set forth in that last sentence, what has he done to see whether agreement between the dominion and provincial governments can be reached?

On page 3 of the report he speaks of many visits to provincial institutions, and informal discussions with provincial officials on matters of penal administration and policy, but the report is silent as to whether these discussions pertained to a unified system, and what were the reactions of the provinces, or what were their respective views on the matter?

There is a movement of reform in many of the provinces today, and one would think the provinces would be only too willing to cooperate with the dominion. Indeed, one paragraph on page 11 of the report seems to indicate that the maritime provinces are only too anxious to cooperate. I quote from page 11 of Commissioner Gibson's report:

In the maritime provinces there is at present nothing between the county gaols and the penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick. The royal commission recommended the establishment of a central prison farm for the maritime provinces to afford better facilities for the confinement and reformation of prisoners serving sentences of less than two years than are available in the county gaols. This proposal is now under discussion with the provinces, who have suggested that such an institution be operated on their behalf by the dominion government. If satisfactory arrangements can be made for the establishment of such an institution, with separate facilities for dealing with young offenders, it will provide improved facilities for the classification and segregation of offenders in the maritime provinces.

I will say that if the provinces are in that mood, if the other provinces feel the same as the maritime provinces—and I have reason to believe they do—we should proceed along those lines immediately and quit worrying about the British North America Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member give me any reasons he has for thinking that they do? I have been looking for such reasons for a long time.

Mr. JAENICKE: The report says that this proposal is now under discussion with the provinces, and they suggest that such an institution be operated on their behalf by the dominion government.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is, the maritime provinces. To what other provinces does the hon. member refer? What other provinces want us to go into their field?

Mr. JAENICKE: I said the commissioner's report might have indicated what other provinces had made suggestions, or what suggestions they had made. I do not know. The report does not say, although it does say that the commissioner has visited all the other provinces. I have an idea that the proposed amendment to the definition of "penitentiary" to include prison reformatories has reference to the situation in the maritimes, to which I referred in the quotation, although I am convinced that the definition, as it now stands in the act is sufficient to include prison reformatories such as have been under discussion between the maritimes and the commissioner on behalf of the dominion.

We cannot unify the present penal system all at once. I admit that, but I think we can make an immediate start such as the proposed action in the maritimes and follow it up with other provinces which might be willing to cooperate. The report contains come notable proposals on segregation and treatment of young offenders, and it will be of interest to quote some sections. First, I would refer to page 10, paragraph (b):

As a first step in developing a plan of segregation, it is proposed to provide in Kingston penitentiary in the east and in Manitoba penitentiary in the west for the detention of incorrigible and intractable prisoners whose conduct and anti-social attitude makes it desirable to separate them from the normal prison population in other institutions.

I commend this. Later on, on the same page, in paragraph (d) I quote:

It is proposed to develop Collin's Bay penitentiary in the east and Saskatchewan penitentiary in the west as institutions for the treatment of young convicts and the reformable type of prisoner.

I also endorse this. Then on the same page, in paragraph (e):

The situation in the province of Quebec must be dealt with as a separate problem because of the difficulty and undesirability of transferring persons who speak the French language to institutions staffed by English-speaking personnel.

At present St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is filled to its capacity of 1,100 and contains in its population some 165 young convicts under the age of 21 years. A population of 1,100 is too large to be handled efficiently. Your commissioner therefore recommends that authority be obtained for the establishment of a new institution in the province of Quebec separate from St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, and that this institution be of the reformatory type, to which could be transferred youthful and reformable offenders sentenced to terms of two years or more in the province of Quebec. It is anticipated that the principles of the Borstal system may be applied to this institution.

While all this is not yet according to the Borstal system, nor is it satisfactory segregation, it is, in my opinion, at least a start, especially in Quebec and in the maritimes, where new institutions are recommended to be set up. Collin's Bay and the penitentiary in Saskatchewan are to be a sort of quasi-Borstal system, but they will always retain the character and especially the reputation of grim prisons, and after some start which we might make we shall have to instal the Borstal system throughout Canada. Indeed, the same sort of experiment with regard to the special treatment of young offenders has been tried at Collin's Bay, and the superintendent reports some pleasing results in the last report with regard to the special treatment of prisoners in that institution. On page 7 of the penitentiaries report there is an interesting table. I shall quote only the last two years. It is a table giving the number of prisoners discharged from Collin's Bay since 1930 and shows the number of those who have been reconvicted. There has been a considerable improvement in the last two years. In 1943-44 the total discharged were 128 and the total reconvicted were 28. In 1944-45 the total discharged were 122 and the total reconvicted were only 16. The superintendent goes on to make this comment thereon:

> One thousand four hundred and eleven convicts out of 1,779 being apparently reformed and leading a normal citizen's life, is, I submit, a most interesting achievement. As already stated, the percentage of the repeaters, as far as penitentiary sentences are concerned, is 20·68. This satisfactory result is mainly due, and this must be emphasized, to the fact that those convicts while serving sentence at Collin's Bay penitentiary, were not contaminated by hardened recidivists, nor were they in contact with any habitual offender who through the years has learned "all the tricks of the trade" and who boasts of his criminal career.

The results of this experiment are encouraging, especially in the last few years, as I have pointed out, and I trust that this will be followed up and continued, but not at the expense of the other experiments which the commissioner has or should have in view and which I have already mentioned. However, as far as statistics go, the situation in Collin's Bay seems to be the one bright spot. I do not wish to go into tables of statistics and comparisons with other countries, but the latest statistics available to me show that, while non-indictable or minor offences have declined during the war years, there was no such decline in connection with indictable or major offences, and they are still on the up-grade. From 397 per 100,000 population in 1942 to 410 per 100,000 population in 1944—these are the latest figures available to me. Convictions of young offenders are still worse. Convictions of young offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one rose from 773 per 100,000 population in 1942 to 1,022 per 100,000 in 1944. That is for major indictable offences, which shows that the situation is still serious.

The superintendent's report deserves the careful consideration of all hon. members and contains an interesting summary of the reports of chaplains of the penitentiaries. They were instructed to analyse the causes which led certain classes of convicts to the penitentiary. I wish to quote the case of two boys, cited in the report of the superintendent at page 50. This report was compiled by one of the penitentiary chaplains, and this is what I find:

> Convicts Y-11 and Y-12. Case of two very young boys under sixteen of very good families. Were following the sea as a profession hitchhiking from their homes at the close of the lake navigation season to go to the home of relatives on the Atlantic coast, whence to ship aboard a deep sea ship. The two ran out of food and money when near their destination, and, finally, in a panic, took a car in which the keys had been left to complete the last lap of their trip. They were apprehended en route, taken before the local magistrate where, without counsel or opportunity to get help from their families, they frankly pleaded guilty and were promptly sentenced to three years in the penitentiary. It was their first offence. They did no damage to the car. Their destination was legitimate although the use of the car without permission was, of course, wrong. They come from solid law abiding families, were travelling at full permission of home and school authorities. They had unblemished records and were a couple of kids. Remote cause: nil. Immediate cause: hunger and panic. (These two convicts were since removed from the large penitentiary to which they had been sentenced to a smaller institution where more selected convicts are sent.)

It is difficult to believe a story like that, isn't it? Here we have two boys under sixteen sent to the penitentiary under these conditions; and we must assume the facts to be true, since this is the report of the chaplain who interviewed these boys. I wonder who committed the greater wrong against society, the boys or the magistrate. During the Easter recess I was discussing this astounding case with a magistrate in my own province, who suggested that the tendency in those provinces, presumably the maritimes, was to sentence convicts coming from other parts of Canada to the penitentiary so that their governments would not have to pay for the upkeep of the convicts. I cannot subscribe to that; I cannot believe it is true, but I am repeating what I have been told. Another suggestion was that the magistrates in those provinces are inclined to send convicts, especially young convicts, to the penitentiaries since there are no institutions in their own provinces where those boys might be sent, at least no fit and proper institution, and sending them to a penitentiary might be better than sending them to the provincial jails. Perhaps there is some truth in both statements that have been given me; and, if so, is it not high time we did something to bring about a unified system, especially a Borstal system for young offenders?

It is hard to believe that young boys under sixteen years of age would be sent to a penitentiary; yet if you read the report of the superintendent you will find tables of statistics on pages 73 and 74, which show that four boys under sixteen years of age form part of our penitentiary population. So I trust the minister will move soon, and move his commissioner to act soon, in the formation of a Borstal system, or at least in adopting the recommendations made by the commissioner, which I read a few minutes ago.

The bill before the house purports to bring about improvements in our penal system, and if it did this I would welcome it. To me, however, the core of the bill is a change from a three-man commission back to the old system of one boss for the whole organization, and I consider this an abandonment of the main recommendation of the Archambault report, which I consider one of the finest reports any royal commission ever made. Because that is the case I am very sorry, but I shall be forced to vote against second reading of the bill.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to devote just a few minutes to this subject, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to confine my remarks as far as I can to this whole question of reform in prisons. You know a lot of us think there is some magic in this word Borstal. We say, "Let us have the Borstal system," and then we assume that all our difficulties will be over. That is very far from being the case. I do not know how you could ever have anything like the Borstal system operating throughout Canada without a definite arrangement between the dominion and provincial governments. I realize that in the province of Ontario they have gone a long way in the treatment of youthful offenders. Quebec has also made considerable progress in that direction. Unfortunately we in western Canada, I think I am fair in saying, have done nothing at all. The situation there is that in order to get any reform school which is of any use those three provinces must join together, for the simple reason that we do not have a prison population sufficient to operate three different institutions. The only way that could possibly be handled—and this is not a complaint about the dominion government, though they might be of some assistance—is to get the three provinces together and sell them the idea of one institution for Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hasn't British Columbia its own system?

Mr. GREEN: They are establishing it now.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are on their way, but at the moment I know of nothing out there. I am not speaking from any recent information, but the only institution of the kind I know of is at Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, and I believe some of our people still go there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: British Columbia did have one, did they not?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, the provincial government of British Columbia. In any event, whether or not I am completely accurate, the thought I have in mind is that once more we are up against this question of jurisdiction, and it does seem to me that not a great deal has been accomplished even during the present year, according to the report, in getting over that obstacle, which is a complete block, one might say, with respect to any over-all picture of reform for young people in our jails.

The question of reform is a very big one, I know; and I am coming back to the province of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), where they have an excellent penitentiary at Westminster. I was going to say I had occasion to be there, and by that I mean I had occasion to visit it once. I learned a great deal from a man whom I now know very well, who spent sixteen years in that institution as a convict and is now out on ticket of leave. I think he has a broader knowledge of the workings of the convict mind than anyone I at least have ever met. His position on the human side of the story is this. We will say we go into an institution and grant a reform. One that he told me about, for example, was the right to talk in the cells after meals. If you know how these tiers of cells are arranged in our penitentiaries, they have solid walls between the individual cells and conversation is almost unheard of because immediately it becomes a babel of shouting from one place to another. As he told me, men who are anxious to work and who had drafting boards in their cells were trying to learn something by way of engineering—because they have a very good library in that institution. But they were just stopped on account of the bedlam. This privilege was granted by General Ormond, who was superintendent and a kindly disposed man; and the thing just came to nothing.

The answer to that was, he told me, that the young chaps were immediately convinced that the move was not made through the decency or kindness of the authorities, but that they were immediately persuaded by the old lags that this had been forced on them; and they assumed all the credit for the change which was made, as they assume credit for every change which is made. Therefore they become the heroes to these younger chaps who are in the institutions and are necessarily in association with these older men.

I am not going to advocate anything, but I am going to ask whether or not the government has given consideration to a law such as one finds in the state of New York, for example, where, after four convictions for a definite type of crime, a man is removed from circulation. It is the equivalent of life imprisonment, after four convictions. It seems to me there may be some good in that idea—perhaps not as strict as they have it; but I am suggesting that the government should consider it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member will find consideration was given to that recently.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am glad to hear it. I want to say this, with all the definiteness that I can, that while in the report of General Gibson we have suggestions as to what is to take place at Stony Mountain, and what is to take place in one of the eastern institutions, there is no use whatsoever in talking reform unless the incorrigibles are separated from the rest of them. That is just a basic thing that must be done. Get the old ones out of circulation, and then you have a chance with the younger men. The chap of whom I have spoken was so insistent upon that that he said, "You might as well stay home and stop trying, as things are. The chances are ten to one that the young fellow who goes in there under present circumstances will come out much worse, and also much smarter, because he learns the tricks of the trade from those who are more experienced, and who also have served a much longer time in gaol."

General Gibson has been there for a year, or a trifle more than that. I have seen him on trains, and I know he is getting about and doing his best to see as many people as he can. But I must say this, that I had hoped we would have advanced farther at this time. The problem of segregation is not one which presents many difficulties; it is a comparatively simple thing to do.

May I say with respect to the three-man commission which my hon. friend has spoken about, and which he finds so objectionable, that I am unable to follow him there. We still have the same three men, although we have put different labels on them. Naturally one man is in charge, and then we have the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), a man in whom we have great confidence, who is in charge of the commissioner. However, that, it seems to me, is just a matter of shuffling the cards. I do not think any great principle is being violated by following that course.

I am going to be brief, and to stop right now, by expressing a hope. I have read debates on prison reform for years. But in the last twenty-five or thirty years practically nothing has been accomplished. So tonight I am now going to stop talking, in the hope that the government may do something quickly with respect to the reformation of our prisons.

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long, because I spoke about this subject last year. However, in view of General Gibson's report, I wanted to make some further observations.

I feel that the general ought to be complimented on his report, because it indicates broad understanding and a progressive mind. I thought he rather caught the spirit of the Archambault report.

As I recall the report, it laid down three principles, namely segregation, classification and after-care. In his report, General Gibson covered the first two rather thoroughly. If I can make any suggestions it would be on minor points—perhaps minor is not the proper word to use. Perhaps I should say that I would address myself to a few matters which lack emphasis in the report.

With respect to the Borstal system, General Gibson says that the system offers the best known opportunity for the reformation and rehabilitation of those who have not yet become hardened criminals. With that we all agree. While the Borstal system is directed to the needs of wayward youths, we must bear in mind that almost everyone in penitentiaries at the present time was once of an age and character that the Borstal system might have been useful to him. This fact is obvious when one looks at the annual report of the superintendent of penitentiaries which, in table 5 on page 7 indicates that in seven penitentiaries in Canada 1,238 of a total inmate population of 3,362 are under the age of twenty-five years. Table 4 indicates that one-third of the offenders are serving terms of three years or less.

I thought for a few moments we might consider the need of employing Borstal tactics in our penal therapy. British statistics show that approxmately sixty per cent of discharged Borstal inmates do not appear before the courts for further convictions. We see that twenty per cent are reconvicted once, and the remainder once or more.

What is our record? Page 8 of the same report shows that in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, there were 708, or less than twenty per cent of offenders who had no previous convictions. Over one-half—to be exact, 1,802 of the total of 3,362 had from two to eight convictions. It is to be remembered that these figures do not take into account the large number of people found in the many reformatories, industrial schools and jails across the country. I think it is obvious that something must be done to correct such an alarming situation. There seems to be no reason why Canada should have a greater proportion of recurring criminal tendencies among those who are released from her institutions of correction. We do not have the crowded cities there are in England, a circumstance which is often a contributing factor. There are other reasons, but in the main it is that our penal therapy is out of date and inadequate and in some degree ineffective.

One of the chief contributing factors is the lack of education which is a great cause of delinquency. On page 75 of the report I came across these startling figures: Out of a total of 1,635 persons, fifty-eight could neither read nor write, eleven could only read and 1,293 had common school education.

General Gibson has not lost sight of that, and in section 18(b) on page 13 of his report he points out that a thorough survey of the methods in each penitentiary by an experienced educationalist is necessary. It is true the Archambault report made a similar recommendation. Like the speakers who have preceded me, my complaint is that the recommendations are not being implemented fast enough; that these are all fine intentions, but we are not moving along quickly enough.

There is another matter which is important and which I think should be brought to the attention of the house, the matter of prison discipline. This is a most important phase in reformatory treatment and it has been forcibly brought to our attention by a riot in Stony Mountain penitentiary. I should like to refer to an article in the Montreal Gazette setting out an interview with an ex-convict who had served some time there. There is no reason why he should not tell the truth and here is what he had to say:

> The outbreak had been no massed riot and had been the result of petty punishments. A man smoking out of hours would be awarded seven days solitary confinement and a man snoring would get three or four days "for creating a disturbance."

And again:

> It was the narrow petty penalizing which had been responsible for the outbreak. All the prisoners wanted was better conditions. They all realized they had to do their time, but they didn't see why their existence should be made intolerable.

General Gibson has not lost sight of that recommendation. There again we have the same difficulty. These matters are small, but they accumulate and cause mischief in the institution. I come now to something which I think has been overlooked in General Gibson's report, the matter of after-care. I consider this to be of paramount importance if we are to cure criminal tendencies in our young offenders. On page 67 of the report it is stated that of those discharged during the year, fifty-six were under the age of twenty-nine. Table 15 on page 13 shows that a total of 838 prisoners were interviewed by welfare organizations during the year, despite the fact that 1,061 were discharged during the same year. We may well ask ourselves: Where are those discharged people to go and what are they to do? Are they being ostracized by society? What means have we provided for the reestablishment of ex-prisoners as useful, contributive citizens in our society?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you not think that is the best feature of the Borstal system?

Mr. CROLL: I was just finishing up if I may. I have here a quotation from "Prisons and Borstals," as follows:

> Every young person on release is placed under the care of an association which is responsible to the prison commissioners. The association endeavours to find them employment, help them with regard to lodgings and outfits, and arrange generally through their local agents for supervision, assistance and advice.

I came across this article in the Toronto Telegram of May 10. A man appeared before Magistrate Cameron in Orillia, and the article goes on:

"I am aware that the facilities offered to persons released from penal institutions are not adequate," stated Magistrate Kenneth Cameron in sentencing ..... to five years in Kingston Penitentiary.

And again.

Magistrate Cameron pointed out that ..... was apparently addicted to such crimes, and as there was little in the way of adequate facilities to take care of such people on securing their freedom, the chance of him conducting himself properly on release was remote. The public had a right to expect protection from such acts.

So he sent him to the penitentiary for five years. The man probably may have deserved it and I am not arguing the matter at all, but the point here is that he realized that there was a great inadequacy and the only place he could possibly send him to was the penitentiary. We have not the after-care which the Borstal system provides. Of the 838 persons who were visited last year in our penitentiaries, 635 were interviewed by an organization that had no responsibility at all to the penal authorities, who were doing this work solely as a contribution to the welfare of mankind; I refer to the Salvation Army. General Gibson recommends a policy which is, in fact, comparable with the Borstal system, and on page 16 he makes a recommendation with which I heartily agree. However, we have to do a little more than just recommend. He points out:

The Canadian penal association, under its new president, Major J. A. Edmison, K.C., has undertaken the task of coordinating the efforts of the prisoners' aid societies in the various provinces and of arousing greater public interest and cooperation in assisting discharged prisoners to obtain employment.

Then he goes on to say:

Your commissioner is of opinion that the activities of these societies should be encouraged and recognized and recommends that when a society demonstrates that it has been organized to carry out its duties with a reasonable degree of efficiency, provision should be made for it to receive financial assistance from the dominion government, based on the numbers released from federal institutions who have been assisted by its activities, to supplement the funds received from other sources.

The Canadian penal association are willing; these people are interested in this work. Because of their interest, because of their understanding and because of the work they have already done, I think they are entitled to recognition and to some monetary assistance. I think what has come out of these debates is an awareness and recognition that the penal system of this country is inadequate and that there is urgent need for penal reform.

General Gibson holds that view and I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) holds that view. It is manifest from the report submitted by General Gibson that he is well aware of the need for penal reform. I think our purpose here today is to keep urging upon the minister to hurry along to get some of this work done because there is a great urgency. So my only contribution to the debate is to say to the minister, if we cannot have the Archambault report at this particular time, we are willing to settle for the Gibson report; but do not keep that from us either, because the conditions are not improving and the country is, I think, quite prepared at the present time to accept the Gibson report although it may appear to be inadequate. We must clearly understand, however, that General Gibson has grasped the principles involved and has attempted to meet the problem as he sees it. It appears to me that he is seized with the need for reform, and immediate reform, and I am asking the minister to see that these recommendations are implemented as quickly as possible.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to add a very few words to this debate, and I think I can sum up what I want to say by putting in a plea for more urgency. Let me say at once that I do not wish to underestimate the difficulties that exist. I know we cannot do everything overnight. Second, I believe that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is just as humane a man as there is in this house and just as anxious to see this job done as anybody. Nevertheless I feel, as I look back over the last eight or nine years, and particularly over the last year, and particularly as I read this report of General Gibson, that there is no sense of urgency felt. There seems to me to be a fatal deliberation about the whole business, and the reason I deprecate that is the very reason given by my seatmate, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), that, while we are deliberating, day by day young men who perhaps were accidental criminals to begin with are being taken into the penitentiaries and becoming expert and perhaps permanent criminals by the very treatment we are giving them. That seems to be an undisputed fact. Therefore I suggest that there is an urgency, and if there is an urgency, frankly I do not find any sign of it in this report.

I would point out at this stage in my brief remarks that it has been stated in this house and never denied that we who rightfully regard ourselves are so advanced, and are in many ways advanced, are nevertheless regarded as a backward nation in this respect. That statement has been responsibly made—and I repeat it—and it has never, so far as I know, been denied in this house. If that is true I think that is the background which should cause us to feel a great sense of urgency, the evidence of which I have never been able to find.

The first reason why I feel this sense of urgency is lacking is put in my mind by reading paragraph 4 of the report, and if my inference is wrong I hope the minister will correct me. Mark you, here is a commissioner specially appointed, as I understand it, to get on with this special job and try to put into effect a report which came out nine years ago. I am not forgetting the war. Nevertheless the Archambault report is nine years old and there are reports behind that going back for thirty years. So that we are really in arrears thirty years. Paragraph 4 of General Gibson's report reads as follows:

> During the past six months, as a result of the untimely death of Mr. P. M. Anderson, K.C., of the Department of Justice, your commissioner has been assigned to supervise directly the administration of the penitentiaries branch on behalf of the department and has thus been afforded an opportunity of observing and participating in the day to day management of the penitentiaries.

The commissioner puts that forward, that substantial work has been put upon him—if I am wrong in my inference I hope I shall be corrected—which I assume has slowed him up in the discharge of this special duty, which I am suggesting is so very important and urgent.

Then I come to paragraph 7 of this report, and here again I have a feeling that things are moving, yes, but there is no urgency; nobody is shoving the thing along as if it was an emergency to be dealt with, as I think it is. Paragraph 7 begins by saying this:

> The reorganization of the penitentiary administration recommended by the royal commission has not yet been undertaken.

I realize that you cannot suddenly undertake a reorganization. You have to give it thought. You cannot plunge into it in an ill-considered manner. But that sentence does not indicate that there has been any real sense of urgency, which is what I am asking for. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who speaks on this matter with more knowledge than I have, stated that segregation is urgent; it is so important and vital; he said that the difficulties in the way were not insuperable, and yet very little progress in that direction has been made.

I go on to paragraphs 8 and 9, which indicate that a good many things have been done, but for the most part they are not very far-reaching ones. I will read a few. The first one reads:

> deprivation of the privilege of seeing visitors and receiving letters has been abolished as a punishment.

I should think that is good. And the next one:

> deprivation of library privileges as a punishment is only awarded where such privilege has been abused.

That is good. I read further down on the same page:

> shaving and bathing have been made more frequent. In several penitentiaries, showers have been installed.

I pass on to paragraph 9, which indicates that today more farm work is being done in connection with the penitentiaries. That is very good indeed; I approve that heartily. Then I go on to paragraph 11, which speaks of certain structural changes to various penitentiaries, and I think that is all to the good.

Then I come to paragraph 12, dealing with personnel, which is so all-important of course in this matter. It begins by saying:

> Following the royal commission's report a survey of personnel was undertaken and in 1939 a selected group of officers was sent to the British training school at Wakefield. Unfortunately the advent of war prevented the continuation of this project.

That we cannot complain about. It goes on:

> In-service training has been carried out in the institutions to some extent, in one or two penitentiaries with a considerable measure of success. There is, however, a definite need for a well planned training programme throughout the service. The establishment of a training school for penitentiary officers, as hereinafter proposed, will permit the development of a uniform standard of training—

And so on. Then I should like to refer to paragraph 13 which says:

> While conscientious efforts have been made by the wardens and their staffs to carry out the provisions of the regulations with respect to the classification boards in the penitentiaries, and these boards have met regularly and performed very useful service in deciding the type of work to which the convicts should be assigned, it has not been possible to develop their full usefulness in planning individualized programmes of treatment because of the lack of facilities for the segregation of the different classes of the prison population.

Finally I come to paragraph, 26 the last paragraph and this again makes me feel, as I said before, that there is no feeling of really getting on with the job, as if it were something we were concerned about.

Mr. HACKETT: Ask the minister to include penal reform in his next national emergency.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have jurisdiction without that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Recommendation 26 reads as follows:

> The proposals contained in this report constitute the first stages in the further development of the royal commission's recommendations.

It seems such a long, long way off that anything really is to be done. I continue with the recommendation:

> The reorganization of the headquarters administration, the establishment of adequate procedure for the selection and training of staffs, the development of more scientific methods of classification and the provision of additional accommodation to facilitate the separation of the various classes of prisoners are essential preliminaries in the adoption of a broad policy that will place greater emphasis on the corrective and rehabilitative aspects of institutional treatment. As the carrying out of these proposals proceeds, it will be possible, in consultation with the wardens, to apply in each institution the more detailed recommendations of the royal commission in respect to the treatment and training of prisoners. Your commissioner submits that the implementation of the present proposals will provide a sound basis for the further development of the programme of penal reform.

I do not want to be cheap, sentimental or unreasonable, but, as I say, this is a report full of the future tense. There is no past tense in the whole thing to indicate that anything important has been done. There is practically no use of the present tense; it is all in the future. This will be done as a preliminary to something else, and then when that preliminary is done we shall get on to something else.

As I take my seat I should like to say, with whatever earnestness I can command, that if we had enough imagination in the house really to bear in mind what the hon. member for Calgary West said, namely, that under our present system we are manufacturing new criminals day by day, there would be more present tense and not so much of everything left to the future.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Since I am not a lawyer it must seem strange for hon. members to hear me speak on this matter, but I have had more correspondence this session on this matter than on anything else. I am not going to dwell on the subject because it has been covered very well by all the speakers. I want to congratulate the speakers from all parties who, in my opinion, approached this matter in a non-partisan way. I should particularly like to endorse the attitude taken by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) in his remarks to the minister. While there may have been reasons for delay during war time, there are no reasons for delay now in putting the Gibson report into effect.

As I said a moment ago, I have had more correspondence on this matter than on anything else which affects my riding.

An hon. MEMBER: You have more criminals.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is unfair. My riding happens to be particularly interested in the youth of the country. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the house on the attitude that it has taken on this matter in viewing it, not from a party point of view, but from the point of view of the welfare of the youth of the country.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I regret that I was not in the house earlier this evening to hear the discussion that has taken place. I know I would have benefited had I had the privilege of hearing other hon. members who participated in this debate.

At this late hour I do not intend to speak at any length but, sir, over the years I have had some little experience with the results that flow from the operations of penitentiaries. I do not know what the opinion of previous speakers has been; but, in my opinion, while many changes must take place, while our system today is very antiquated, it has done a surprising work, having regard to the difficulties under which those who operate our penitentiaries are actually working. On occasion I have seen men who have served their terms come from the penitentiaries and return once more to a life of crime. In large measure society is responsible for that; for when they return to a life of crime, in many instances the cause is that, after their discharge from penal institutions, they have no opportunity to secure work and little opportunity to regain their place in society. We are all to blame for that. I think it only fair at the outset of my remarks to make that statement.

I realize the difficulties under which the penitentiaries are operating today. I know some of the shortcomings in connection with the administration. In saying these things, however, I cannot do other than mention the fact that, while the Archambault report was handed down a good many years ago and while there may have been some explanation for not implementing many portions of that report during the war years, there were few excuses prior to the war and since the termination of hostilities there have been few excuses that the government could rely on.

As I see the situation it is this. The officials of the penitentiaries operate under, as I said a moment ago, an antiquated system in respect of which there has been little change in the last 100 years. So far as the staffs are concerned, within their power they are trying to carry out their responsibilities, but as I hear their story they find themselves in a position of being subjected to too many regulations from headquarters in regard to the administration. There has been a dilatoriness about everything.

Mention has been made this evening—and I mentioned it myself—that the report was handed down some nine or ten years ago and little has been done. I think, sir, that if those who are inmates of the penitentiaries, and particularly those who are discharged from these institutions, were of such numbers as to make their influence felt, many changes would have taken place in the administration of penitentiaries as a result of the representations made by those who have been discharged. Look at it as fairly as we may, all of us realize that there are shortcomings, definite nonfeasance. Representations are made from time to time and reports are handed down, but how few of us are prepared to take the interest necessary to make a great issue of the matter of penitentiary reform in our country. In Britain they were prepared to do that, and great leaders took up the cudgels and led the way. In Canada it has been otherwise. Private institutions, charitable institutions have undertaken the work. The Canadian Prisoners' Association has done a remarkable work. At the convention recently held in the city of Windsor, recommendations were made that might well be brought before the house and possibly later in this debate an opportunity will be given for the purpose.

There are those who speak of the number of recidivists, and certainly the statistics show that there are great numbers. But that has not been my experience with those whom I have known who have served in penitentiaries. The proportion has not been great so far as Saskatchewan penitentiary is concerned. Certainly it has not been as high as in other penitentiaries across the country, and one of the reasons has been that we have not had there a meeting with the older prisoners. New prisoners who come in, many of them desiring to reform, later on come under the influence of older and more experienced men, but there we have not had so many of the old-timers, the dangerous criminals, and the result has been that many who have been discharged from that institution have returned to civil life and are making good citizens.

I think of one man whose case I brought to the notice of the house. I will not mention the name, but the facts regarding him are in the knowledge of the former, and no doubt of the present, Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). Some seventeen years ago a young man in Saskatchewan was sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. He served for a period of years. When he entered the penitentiary his idea was that he would endeavour to live down the crime he had committed. He was convicted of murder and there was a commutation. He served in the penitentiary for fifteen years. When he entered the penitentiary he was in grade two or three. He continued to take advantage of the opportunities there. He accepted positions of responsibility in the service and by 1941 or 1942 had passed examinations equivalent to entrance into university.

All through the years this man studied; all through the years he dreamed of his freedom when his crime should have been expiated, and in 1944 he was granted ticket of leave and was discharged from the penitentiary, subject to monthly report. He joined His Majesty's forces, became a non-commissioned officer with the rank of sergeant, served for a period of approximately two and a half years, was discharged with a perfect record and is today living in Saskatchewan, restored to the district in which his crime was committed, and there enjoying something of the appreciation of the people at large for what he has done and what he is now trying to do.

Sometimes we look at the dark side, but here is an example of a young man who has proven that if he is prepared to accept the responsibilities that rest upon him, if he is prepared to take advantage of what is offered today, small as it is, there is hope for our penal institutions. But just because of such an example—I have pointed out one and there are others—it does not mean that this is general. Later on as I speak, I intend to refer to other examples and then to place before the house a few suggestions.

One suggestion I make now. That young man today, after having served approximately three years in the armed forces, has returned to his own district and is still required to report to the mounted police every month. There is a change that could be effected. Remove that disability, because disability it is. The police know where he is. He wrote to me the other day and pointed out this situation, and he said, "I will do my part if only you are able to secure the support of those in charge of administration to relieve me from being penalized for the rest of my days and required to report".

There is my first suggestion, that when a man is discharged from the penitentiary he should be given an opportunity to become rehabilitated. Do not hang about his neck a mandatory order that requires him, wherever he is, to report each month his whereabouts and also that he is willing to return to penitentiary when he is called upon.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 27, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC ACT—PRESS REPORT AS TO INVASION OF PROVINCIAL FIELD

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The Montreal Gazette of this morning carries a Canadian Press dispatch concerning the introduction of Bill 254, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, which gives the impression that the proposed amendment is to permit the federal government to invade the provincial field in regard to the labour relations of the railways.

The purpose of the bill is to give the federal government jurisdiction over rates of pay, hours of work and working conditions of the employees of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over these railways, and the object of the bill is to occupy the field in so far as labour relations of their employees are concerned. The government considers it is now time for parliament to exercise its jurisdiction by legislating in the field of labour relations as affecting the construction, operation or maintenance of these railways.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did not the minister use the word "invade" yesterday?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I did use the word "invade", but I intended to use the word "occupy". But then the press report went on to say that a question was asked by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with reference to whether the government intended to invade this field without the consent of the provinces. I do not think the hon. member used any such word. He simply asked whether we had obtained the consent of the provinces, and I said it was not necessary. The press report stated that I replied, "not necessarily", and clearly indicated an intention to invade the field. There is no such intention at all. We already have the field.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL—PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—MARINE AND FISHERIES

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) be substituted for that of Mr. Harris (Danforth) on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Knowles be substituted for that of Mr. Moore on the standing committee on industrial relations.

That the name of Mr. Moore be substituted for that of Mr. MacInnis on the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

DEFENCE COOPERATION

SECURITY RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES IN NORTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps it should more properly be directed to the Prime Minister, but I sent notice to the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I knew it was at least partly within his purview. Does President Truman's request to congress yesterday for enactment of legislation "authorizing a programme of military collaboration with all countries of the western hemisphere" mean that there has been any alteration in or extension of the policy of collaboration between Canada and the United States which was announced by the Prime Minister earlier this session?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then in view of the fact that the legislation requested evidently would open the way for Canada to make purchases from the United States through a new avenue, would not that be an extension of what was originally announced to the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have seen nothing in the statement which to my mind extends the meaning of what I said in the house some time ago. I do not know if my hon. friend has something in mind that I cannot fathom, but I gather he wishes to know if the statement made by President Truman alters in any particular the statement I made here some little time ago, and my answer is no, it does not.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STORAGE OF GOLD—CHANGES IN REGULATIONS RESPECTING UNITED STATES FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Last week I asked the Minister of Finance about the storage of gold by certain mining interests. Yesterday I believe an announcement was made regarding the reimposition of certain measures of foreign exchange control as they concern United States currency. Could the minister give the house a statement regarding the latter matter, and is he prepared to answer the first question, which I asked him last week?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): No, I am not yet prepared to make a statement on the question asked last week. It is continuing to receive very careful consideration. As my hon. friend will appreciate, it is not a simple question, nor is it free of certain complications, but I will make a statement to the house at a very early day.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the reimposition of foreign exchange control?

Mr. ABBOTT: On that matter it is a fine question as to what announcement should be made in the house and what should not. There is no change in policy with respect to the regulations announced yesterday. The house will recall that when the foreign exchange control bill was before the committee last year it was suggested that Canadians should have the right to retain in their possession a certain amount of United States dollars, and an amount of up to $100 was suggested. It was decided to do that as a trial measure. It has been found that the retention of United States dollars by Canadians, presumably as a result of that general provision, has substantially exceeded the amount involved in a similar period last year. For that reason it was decided to change the regulation and provide that amounts up to $10 only could be retained, and that a person going to the United States could take only $25 in all without obtaining a permit, of which $10 could be United States currency. There is no change in the regulations which allow any Canadian wishing to go to the United States for travel or other purposes to obtain reasonable amounts of United States dollars. The only difference is that he must go to the bank, obtain a permit on form H and have that permit when he reports at the customs office at the border.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON 1944 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house whether a payment on the 1944 wheat will be made at an early day?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There will be a payment on the 1944 participation certificates this summer. This morning the hon. member sent me notice of his intention to ask this question, and I was in touch with the wheat board in an effort to give my hon. friend and other hon. members of the house more definite information in this regard. The best information I can get now is that every effort is being made to get these payments out as quickly as possible, but they cannot be more definite than that it will be as early as possible this summer. Later today I hope to have an opportunity to make a statement in connection with participation payments and other matters connected with wheat.

TIN

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO RELIEVE ALLEGED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): I believe hon. members have received letters pointing out that many factories in Canada may have to shut down owing to a shortage of tin. Would the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply make a statement as to whether anything can be done immediately to rectify the situation?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I received notice of this question only a few minutes ago. While Canada's allocation of tin for 1947 was only 75 per cent of the allocation for 1946, supplementary purchases have been made and I was told recently that the situation is improving. However, I will try to find out the situation as at the present date and give a more detailed answer tomorrow.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

LOSS OF TRANSPORT PLANE ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) inquired about the lost T.C.A. plane. His first question was:

Has the search for the T.C.A. plane lost on April 29 on the Pacific coast been abandoned?

I am instructed that the R.C.A.F., who carry on searches and rescues in connection with planes, as the official government service, advise that the search has been officially abandoned. T.C.A. report that they are still following any clues that may come in, in an attempt to solve the fate of the plane. The second question was:

When will the investigation of cause of loss be commenced and what will be the personnel of the investigating body?

The answer is that the investigation has been completed. The board was composed of R. Carter Guest, Mervyn Fleming and Norman Terry, all senior officers of the civil aviation division, Department of Transport. The third question was:

Have any claims for damages been filed?

T.C.A. advise us that no claims have been filed.

Mr. FULTON: If I may ask a supplementary question, is the minister in possession of any information with regard to the report that messages from the plane were heard at Ashcroft and Lytton? I believe these reports came in during the course of the last week. Has any further information come to light in that regard?

Mr. HOWE: Complete investigation indicates that there is no authenticity in these reports.

COASTAL FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY OF CONSERVATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): As the house will recall, last session I brought the matter of offshore fisheries to the attention of the government, and in this connection I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Fisheries. It arises out of a statement made in the house last week by the Prime Minister, in which he said that among the resolutions to be introduced in the house this session was one respecting the conservation of fisheries on the high seas. The question is, has the government decided whether or not it will adopt a policy of conservation of coastal fisheries on the high seas similar to that enunciated by President Truman in his declaration of September 28, 1945?

[Mr. Howe.]

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On September 28, 1945, President Truman made two declarations. In order to make the answer complete and intelligible I think I should recite the first one, which was as follows:

By virtue of and pursuant to the authority vested in me as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time jointly recommend the establishment by executive orders of fishery conservation zones in areas of the high seas contiguous to the coasts of the United States, pursuant to the proclamation entitled "Policy of the United States with Respect to Coastal Fisheries in Certain Areas of the High Seas," this day signed by me, and said secretaries shall in each case recommend provisions to be incorporated in such order relating to the administration, regulation and control of the fishery resources of and fishing activities in such zones, pursuant to authority of law heretofore or hereafter provided.

The second declaration had to do with placing the subsoil and sea bed of the continental shelf under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior for administrative purposes pending the adoption of legislation. I take it that the hon. gentleman's question refers to the first declaration, which has to do with the conservation of sea fisheries adjoining the coast. The answer to his question in that sense is in the affirmative. The government intends to introduce a resolution in that regard, as the Prime Minister stated on May 21, 1947.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN EMBASSY AT WASHINGTON—PROPERTY FOR RESIDENTIAL PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government has yet made any decision with respect to the projected acquisition of property for the purposes of the Canadian embassy at Washington.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a decision was made this morning, and before coming into the house I ascertained that it had received the approval of His Excellency, authorizing an offer for the property for residential purposes which was under consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: How much is the offer?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: $300,000.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. G. LEOPOLD LANGLOIS (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall make the most of the opportunity I am afforded of taking part in the budget debate to discuss exclusively the important matter of relations between the central power and our various provinces.

We have heard several hon. members express divergent opinions on the subject and we have noticed more particularly the objections raised by hon. members who, in line with the principles that their provincial leaders have advocated, stand against the dominion government's policy in this respect.

I shall first point out that those who do not favour acceptance, on the part of the provinces, of the central power's proposals, have put forward no new argument but repeated only those which were stated by anti-confederationists during the conferences held by way of preliminary to Confederation. In fact, on October 24, 1864, Mr. E. B. Chandler, of New Brunswick, member of the legislative council, speaking on a motion of Mr. Oliver Mowat, said the following:

> We agree to a legislative union.
> We set about destroying the constitutions of local governments, thus relegating the latter to the humble status of great municipal corporations.

Mr. A. A. Dorion who, at the time of Confederation, led the anti-confederationist movement in Quebec, expressed similar opinions and claimed that the resolutions passed at conferences were an attempt to establish a centralized federative union, as is shown by the following excerpt from one of his speeches on the subject:

> The confederation I suggested was a true confederation, entrusting vast powers to local governments and allotting only a certain amount of authority to the federal government.

> Such a confederation is very different from the one now suggested to us, for the latter hand over powers to the central government, reserving for local governments the slightest possible degree of freedom of action.

You will recall that Hon. Maurice Duplessis, ever since he came to power in the province of Quebec, has often quoted these two excerpts. Yet, in spite of arguments put forth by Mr. A. A. Dorion and others, including Hon. Maurice Duplessis, confederation has been in effect since 1867 and the provinces have not yet been reduced to the status of great municipal corporations, far from it.

In fact, our Canadian provinces have grown and prospered together with the rest of the nation and have thus contributed to the building of one of the most prosperous and free countries of the world. Our past constitutes a brilliant refutation of the arguments put forth by the opponents of the proposals submitted by the dominion government. However, we must not pause there because the achievements of the past compel us to prepare our future. As the Canadian nation develops, it must solve administrative problems of ever increasing importance.

In 1867, one of the main obstacles to Canadian confederation was the settlement of financial problems. The task consisted in granting subsidies to compensate the loss of revenue incurred by certain provinces entering confederation, on the one hand, and enabling those provinces, by means of subsidies to establish, on the other hand, provincial budgets sufficient to permit the various provinces to meet their obligations towards the people and act as local governments within the framework of the confederation.

Mr. Speaker, a brief study of the expenses incurred by the provinces since confederation under the three main administrative headings clearly shows that the subsidies provided in 1867 are no longer sufficient. For instance, as far as education is concerned, the current expenses have increased in the following proportions from 1867 to 1930:

1867: $2,500,000 or 78 cents per capita;
1896: $8,000,000 or $1.60 per capita;
1913: $37,500,000 or $5.00 per capita;
1921: $88,000,000 or $10.05 per capita;
1930: $119,200,000 or $10.54 per capita.

The maintenance expenses of highways have doubled from 1921 to 1930, increasing from $364,000,000 to $734,000,000. From 1867 to 1937 there has also been an increase from $1,200,000 to $284,000,000 in the budget of those same provincial governments as regards social services and public welfare. The logical conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that the subsidies granted the provinces in 1867 are no longer sufficient, in spite of the increases obtained since, and especially in 1907, when the Canadian constitution was amended.

Is it not a fact that one of the provinces was once on the verge of bankruptcy, while the financial position of two others is far from steady.

Moreover, our country's development since 1867 has increased the scope of the administrative problems of the various governments which make up confederation; those national problems require settlement on a national scale.

The first step in that direction was taken in 1927 by the dominion government when they introduced old age pension legislation in order to help provincial governments who could not afford expenditures on such a large scale. When the act first came into operation, the federal authorities paid only 50 per cent of expenses, but in time they had to raise their contribution to 75 per cent of the total cost. The pension provisions for the blind are another example of federal intervention directed towards helping the provinces in the solution of purely provincial matters. I could also mention the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Family Allowances Act.

Who would dare contend that our country will keep on growing through strict adherence to what was laid down in 1867 by the fathers of confederation? Moreover, the dominion proposals would simply apply to our present needs the principles on which confederation was based in 1867.

Those who oppose the federal plan claim that such proposals are directed against provincial autonomy and are conducive to centralization. The argument with respect of autonomy cannot possibly be serious. Autonomy means independence, neither restricted nor limited, but full and complete even in the financial field.

Economists might say that as long as the family, the municipal corporation and the province are financially independent, so will be the country as a whole. But such autonomy and independence may not be achieved when the contrary is true, as it is unfortunately so at the moment in too many cases.

Is an invasion of provincial autonomy possible, when an amendment to the constitution is not even necessary to authorize provincial legislatures to negotiate with the dominion? Is an attack on provincial autonomy possible, when the legislatures are perfectly free to accept or to reject the federal proposals? Is centralization possible, when the dominion is willing to surrender to the provinces exclusive jurisdiction in the administration of social legislation? Are we threatening the autonomy of provinces, when we provide them with the means of meeting their obligations to the people? Do our provincial premiers believe that the autonomy of the provinces is better protected when, in order to balance their budgets, they must resort to foreign lenders, as was too frequently the case in the province of Quebec from 1936 to 1939? In the 1930-1935 period, when the central government, under the leadership of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, distributed unemployment relief benefits and contributed 50 per cent of the cost of municipal works, why did the province of Quebec not worry about its autonomy as it does today? Was the fact that such unemployment relief benefits and 50 per cent contributions came from a government wholly sympathetic to the present leader of the Quebec government sufficient to protect her autonomy? I leave it to my hon. friends of the opposition to answer this last question.

The hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Hamel) speaking on this matter on Wednesday, May 21, quoted figures that I cannot accept. Indeed, as shown by the record, at page 3309, the hon. member stated:

> Even the dominion proposals, however, uphold an intolerable discrimination. Subsidies vary according to each province, here as elsewhere; the per capita grant paid to the province of Quebec will be the lowest in the country. Ontario's will amount to $18.04, Alberta's to $18.64, Saskatchewan's to $19.03, Nova Scotia's to $19.20, New Brunswick's to $19.69, Manitoba's to $19.77, British Columbia's to $21.29 and Prince Edward Island's to $24.31, while that of Quebec will be only $17.29, namely, $2.37 less than the average rate.

My hon. friend seems to have followed the example of the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) who is reported, on page 1689 of Hansard, as having said:

> In the last twenty-five years, when I had to plead cases before the courts of my country, I always made it a point to present facts, and once the facts were proven, draw conclusions.

The hon. member should have added: but only such facts as could serve the purpose of the cases which I pleaded.

That is possibly why, following that example, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche quoted only such figures as enabled him to draw conclusions in line with his opinion on the government's policy in the matter of direct taxation.

I shall therefore immediately demonstrate this serious omission of the hon. member in his summary of the dominion's proposals to the provinces.

I have chosen to outline the proposals made to four of the provinces: Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, i.e., two central provinces, one of the maritimes and one of the western provinces.

The proposals were as follows: $12.75 per capita (which amount was offered to all provinces without exception), plus the statutory subsidies guaranteed by confederation; plus 50 per cent of the personal income and corporation taxes as collected in 1940 in each of those provinces, plus the family allowances already paid, and the dominion's contribution to payment under the pensions act for the aged and the blind. The aggregate amounts for the four provinces mentioned are as follows:

Quebec—$42.66 per capita.
Ontario—$38.01 per capita.
Nova Scotia—$44.86 per capita.
British Columbia—$39.84 per capita.

The average for all provinces in Canada is $41.43. It will be seen therefore that Quebec's share exceeds the average by $1.23 per capita, whereas Ontario's will be $3.42 short of the average. Can it now be held that the dominion's proposals discriminate against the province of Quebec?

Family allowance statistics show that, under the act, Quebec is getting $22.24 per capita while Ontario gets only $16.69, British Columbia $15 and Nova Scotia $20.82. According to our estimate of what the province will obtain from the financial agreements proposed by the central government, Quebec, in case of acceptance, would receive a total sum of $63,011,000 in 1947, or three times what she collected in 1940 in personal and corporation income taxes, plus $1,511,000. Besides, the central government guarantees minimum subsidies to the provinces and this amount would be $56,383,000 in the case of Quebec. In addition, the federal government makes an alternative offer of $15 per capita, instead of $12.75 plus 50 per cent of personal and corporation income taxes, to those provinces who had no income or very little income from these sources, in 1940. Each province is free to accept this uniform amount if she thinks that her interests are better served thereby. It seems, however, that Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia alone could benefit by this alternative offer.

Such are the proposals of the federal government to the provinces. They were submitted to them in the best interest of our people as a whole and, to use the words of the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), on a totally free and temporary basis.

Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a table which I will be glad to show the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche, whenever he wishes to secure information so that, in future, when he speaks on the matter he may state all the facts without reservation.

In the last few days, Mr. Speaker, we have followed an interesting debate on the legal aspects of the proposals submitted to the provinces. Our so-called nationalists, who have now taken the name of autonomists, claim that the British North America Act grants the provinces exclusive jurisdiction in matters of direct taxation.

Mr. HAMEL: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LANGLOIS: Surely.

Mr. HAMEL: Could he tell us who stated in this house that the provinces had exclusive jurisdiction in matters of direct taxation?

Mr. LANGLOIS: The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) speaking on the budget, a few days ago—I cannot specify on what day, but it was last week—

Mr. HAMEL: Could the hon. member quote the statement?

Mr. LANGLOIS: The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay quoted part of a judgment, which in fact was not a judgment, but a statement by a judge, who was attempting to prove that the province of Quebec, in a special case had obtained a favourable ruling from the privy council, granting her not only the exclusive right, but priority, in case of conflict.

Mr. HAMEL: Quite so.

Mr. LANGLOIS: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying a few moments ago, we have heard for the last few days an interesting debate on the legal aspect of the proposals made to the provinces and I stated further that our so-called nationalists—I believe I did hit at least one of them—who assume today the title of autonomists, claim that the British North America Act confers exclusive jurisdiction on the provinces as regards direct taxation. I certainly do not share that view, which is at variance with numerous decisions by our highest courts and is not consistent with the way sections 91 and 92 of our constitution should be construed. However, that does not prevent me from respecting the opinion of our friends in the opposition who claim further that our language, our faith and our most sacred rights are endangered by those they are wont to call "the Ottawa centralizers". I wish, nevertheless, to suggest to those hon. members, whose sincerity I do not question in the least, to face the facts as they are. It is not by voicing protests, and expounding nationalist arguments that they will safeguard our rights and freedoms, should such rights and freedoms be really imperilled, as they claim. Let us suppose, for a moment, that those gentlemen are right and let us ask them if, in the light of existing texts, and especially in the light of the decisions given by the privy council, and finally taking into account the opposite views expressed both in this house and outside, they are justified in taking refuge behind the protests they voice as protectors of their race and as the last bulwarks of our rights and freedoms. I believe that we must rather be realistic in approaching that important problem and that we have no right to harbour a feeling of false security. Moreover, I claim that if we want our rights and freedoms to be safeguarded, we should not merely assume that they are sacred and inviolable, but rather that it behooves us to ensure such inviolability through concrete and definite facts.

My hon. friends opposite must realize that there is now in Canada an important group of socialists whose aim is to establish a planned economy and who do not hesitate, at all times, to prophesy, should they ever assume power, a complete upheaval in the economy and the mode of life until then known in this country. Therefore, are we not justified in dreading the future should those socialists ever come to power in Ottawa, because their policy of planned economy and what they call social planning cannot be carried out without encroachment on provincial prerogatives? Would it not be better if, to show its respect for provincial autonomy, the dominion should set a precedent giving further practical evidence of its intention not to take advantage of prior or exclusive jurisdiction in the field of direct taxation?

This precedent is now being set when this government offers the provinces a temporary agreement—and I insist on the word temporary—recognizing provincial jurisdiction and asking the provinces to enter into such an agreement for the simple purpose of avoiding duplication of taxation and costs of collection. The opportunity is given us to set this precedent for the benefit of the future generations of this country as a whole and of each of the provinces. It is a new idea but one to my mind worth trying for it implies a genuine guarantee of our rights and liberties, and especially because I should be extremely loath to let my French-speaking compatriots' future depend solely on the right of veto held by the present Prime Minister of Ontario, as our opponents would have us do. Recent statements by the originator of the famous principle "equality of sacrifice" are still too fresh in my mind.

Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with the concern expressed by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche who in a nightmare of nationalist apprehension—I was going to say alarm—sees our racial group ruled with a rod of iron and deprived of its essential freedoms.

In answer to his remarks, may I remind him that it is not by preaching fear and suspicion to our French-speaking compatriots that we shall encourage them to go on playing the part which they have taken up to this day in this great and wonderful Canada of ours.

I submit that French civilization in America is past the survival stage and is waiting only for the growth of a new generation of bold and proud youths to burst into bloom. I am sorry for my hon. friend, but I cannot conceive of a French-speaking Canadian who takes pride in the achievements of his forebears, wishing that his racial group be confined within the limits of some Canadian reserve.

I have no hesitation in saying that we need have no fear to go forward in Canada side by side with our compatriots of any race or creed. I say also that our French civilization compares with any other. What would have been the point in surviving, if we chose to perish within the confines of self-imposed limitations.

Mr. Speaker, I say also to my hon. friend for St. Maurice-Laflèche that we are not a group of failures who should be segregated in a separate enclosure. We have enough courage and mettle not to surrender our own heritage in order to seek refuge in a narrow and benumbing separatism. My hon. friend might find a source of inspiration more in keeping with the aspirations of our fellow countrymen if he borrowed the words with which the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada, during the war, urged French-speaking Canadians to raise the torch of French civilization which had fallen from the hands of agonizing France.

Mr. Speaker, returning to the important problem of dominion-provincial relations, I state that the people of my province do not share the views of their present leader; if the hon. the premier of the province of Quebec has any doubt on the matter I challenge him, on behalf of the French-speaking members on this side of the house, to vindicate his policy by immediately going to the people on this very issue.

Moreover, if he is sincere and if he still claims that our rights and freedoms are really threatened, it is his duty to appeal to the people. I need not have an exceptional amount of courage to challenge Mr. Duplessis and his satellites to fight that issue with us before the Quebec people, because I am convinced that the population of my province still possesses enough pride and courage to continue its magnificent contribution to the building of a powerful Canadian nation on the American continent.

(Text):

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members would be happy to see this debate concluded at the earliest possible moment. However, this is indeed an important budget and deserves the conscientious attention of all hon. members. As has been said so many times already in this debate, the most glaring fault in the budget is that nothing was done for that half of Canadians who find themselves with incomes less than the minimum necessary to get into the taxation bracket at all. The government surely has slipped up badly in not having done something to increase the living standards of these people, who are finding it so difficult to get along under present conditions.

On looking over the changes in the amount of income tax for this year, I can see that the reduction for those in the lower brackets has been considerably more than it has been for those in the higher brackets, in relation to what they paid at the beginning of this year. It seems to me that to reduce by 54 per cent something which is unfair is to take away only 54 per cent of the unfairness and still leave something which is exceedingly unfair. I have worked out a little table of my own, comparing the relief granted in the various income tax brackets. I have done this with regard to a single man, but the same thing applies generally to a married man, to a married man with two children, and so on. If one takes the income tax relief in dollars for 1947 as a whole, as compared to the tax at the beginning of this year, and then relates that tax relief to the man's income, one sees that the effective amount of relief has been low in the low income brackets and relatively high in the middle and higher income brackets. If the man with an income of $1,000 should be given tax relief of $10 or one per cent, surely all will agree that the man with an income of $10,000 should not be given relief of more than $100, which is one per cent, the same proportionate amount. The single man, however, with $800 income has been given tax relief in this budget amounting to $3 or ·375 per cent of his gross income. To the single man with an income of $2,000, the tax relief is $47, which amounts to 2·35 per cent of his income. Not only is the man with an income of $2,000 already making two and a half times as much as the man with an income of $800, but the government are giving him in tax relief six times as much, on a proportionate basis, as they are giving the man with the $800 income.

The same thing applies going up the scale to the higher brackets, and to a greater extent, until one reaches the $7,500 bracket. A man with $10,000 income is granted relief of $393, which is 3·93 per cent, or more than ten times as much relief as is granted to the man with an income of $800. I say that the emphasis has been placed entirely wrongly in this budget. The only basis for fairness would have been to increase the exemptions far above the present $750 for a single man and $1,500 for a married man.

I note also that a married man with an income of $1,800 pays $36 in taxes and a single man with the same income pays $180. The married man with an income of $1,800 is given, through the income tax laws, an additional net income of $144 compared with a single man earning the same income. Going up to the $10,000 bracket, a single man pays a tax of $2,253; a married man with that income pays a tax of $1,190. To a married man earning $10,000, the government allows $263 with which to maintain his wife, as compared to a single man earning that amount and as compared to the $144 for maintaining his wife allowed to a man who earns only $1,800. I think that that difference in tax, as between a married man and a single man, should be the same in all income tax brackets. Here is a married man with $10,000 income who gets $7,767 net income on which to maintain himself and his wife, and he is paying to the government $263 less in taxes than a single man with that amount.

As I said before, the tax relief for a single man with an income of $800 amounts to ·375 per cent of his gross income, the magnanimous sum of $3. The married man earning $2,000 gets tax relief in 1947, compared with the present rate, of $24, or 1·2 per cent. A married man with two children earning $2,000 gets tax relief of $16, or an increase in his income through tax relief amounting to ·8 per cent.

The government through this tax relief is giving to persons in these income tax brackets increases in income anywhere from about one-third of one per cent to 1·2 per cent; and the change in the cost of living index from March this year to April this year amounted to 1·7 points. The change in the cost of living in one month has more than wiped out all the tax relief the government is giving the people in the year 1947. Surely that is not good enough. The government should have given a good deal of tax relief to the people in the lower income brackets, and maintained price control, so that the people in those brackets would be able to obtain the necessities of life.

But while the average income earner in Canada is not faring well, we see that the corporations are making very large profits. An article in the Financial Post of April 12 says this:

> Caught between high taxes and sharply rising prices consumers are not going to be any more complacent when they learn that company profits have been mounting. A survey of the combined results of sixty companies show earnings almost 30 per cent higher than in 1945.

Then it goes on to say:

> The same trend is abundantly apparent in the United States where President Earl Bunting of the National Association of Manufacturers bluntly warns if the constant sudden upward winding of the spiral continues you will see one of the most terrible busts this country ever had.

Corporations are making more money than they have ever made. The government is giving them in addition great taxation relief. And the corporations in return are going to give to this country "one of the most terrible busts".

The Nesbitt, Thomson and Company revised index of dividend payments shows that corporation dividends are on the increase. Taking the index of 100 for the period 1935-39, the following figures will show the upward trend:

July, 1946	140·2
January, 1947	155·3
March, 1947	156·8

Dividends are going up by leaps and bounds.

I have figures here showing the profits of some of the companies which supply goods of great importance to the consumers of Canada. The table is as follows:

Company	Net Profit After Taxes, 1945	Net Profit After Taxes, 1946	Increase in Profits
Easy Washing Machine Company	$ 25,496	$ 50,594	about 100 per cent
Building Products Limited	335,242	1,295,434	286 per cent
Canadian Western Lumber Company	459,619	1,019,428	121·8 per cent
Canada Cement Company	1,080,140	2,178,523	101·6 per cent

It will be noted that some of these companies supply building materials. No doubt the great increase in profits is one of the main reasons why houses cost so much more today than they did a few years ago.

But the cost of living is not the only thing that is going up. The cost of production for farmers in western Canada has gone up at a tremendous rate in the last year and a half. A year ago this spring the government removed the subsidy of 45 cents a barrel which was paid on crude oil shipped to the prairie provinces from the United States. At the time of the withdrawal of the subsidy the companies were allowed a two cents a gallon increase in the price of gasoline. That two cents would take care of the subsidy of 45 cents, and perhaps a little more. But the two cents a gallon increase was allowed on all petroleum products sold in western Canada, even including gasoline manufactured from crude oil taken from the Turner valley. The companies were thus able to make large profits on the increased price granted for all their gasoline, irrespective of the crude from which it happened to be made.

On April 1 of this year the government removed its three-cent wartime tax on gasoline. At the same time it removed the ceiling on that product. The companies absorbed the tax that the federal government was otherwise getting. It is too bad that the government had not removed the three-cent wartime tax on gasoline before it lifted the price ceiling. Then the people would know that the companies have, in effect, taken over the taxing powers of this government, because they increased their price by that three cents, or more. In tractor gasoline in Saskatchewan there was an increase of four and a half cents —and that is the most important fuel sold to farmers in that province.

The oil companies did not do so badly in 1945 and 1946. These figures will serve to show the profits:

Company	Net Profit, 1946	Net Profit, 1945
Imperial Oil Limited	$17,326,112	$16,616,586
B.A. Oil Company	3,319,572	3,151,334
McColl-Frontenac Oil Company	3,218,596	1,464,515

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was that a net profit?

Mr. ARGUE: Net profit after taxes. I am sure that with the large increase in price they are obtaining for their products in western Canada, and to a lesser extent throughout the rest of the nation, these companies will make still higher profits in 1947. Another reason they will make higher profits lies, of course, in the removal of the excess profits tax, which is to take effect at the end of the year.

A year ago the agricultural implement companies got a 12½ per cent increase in price. The two Canadian companies made considerably more profit in 1946 than they did in 1945. The profit of Cockshutt Plow Company increased 18·4 per cent. The profit of the Massey-Harris Company increased from $1,588,480 in 1945 to $2,125,570 in 1946, an increase of 29·5 per cent.

Mr. MAYHEW: Can the hon. member give the profit on domestic business and export business?

Mr. ARGUE: I tried to get the figures of those companies broken down in that way, and I was told they did not keep their books in that manner. All I am pointing out is that the trend is upward. I venture to say their profit in 1946 was greater than in 1945, and certainly I would be pleased to have the assistant to the Minister of Finance, if he can, bring forward evidence to show that the reverse was true. I have tried to find out what were their profits on Canadian business only, but I do not think that is too important because I believe the trend is definitely upward. If that is not so with these companies they are different from almost all other companies doing business in Canada.

The government is claiming to give income taxation relief amounting to anywhere from 54 per cent to seven per cent. It is estimated that personal income taxes for 1947-48 will bring in $625,000,000, or a reduction of $70,000,000 from $695,000,000 estimated for 1946-47. This represents a decrease of about ten per cent in the amount of money the government expects to get through personal income tax in 1947-48 as compared with 1946-47. Then the government estimates that in 1947-48 it will obtain $300,000,000 in corporation taxes as compared with $239,000,000 in 1946-47; but it expects to get only $170,000,000 in 1947-48 through the excess profits tax whereas in 1946-47 it obtained $449,000,000. The total taxes the government expects to get from the corporations of this country in 1947-48 amount to $470,000,000, as compared with $688,000,000 in 1946-47. This reduction in taxation on corporations amounts to more than 31 per cent, as compared with 10 per cent for the salaried men, the wage earners and the farmers. I say this government has fallen down badly; that it is giving tax relief where tax relief is not needed, and that it is not giving tax relief to those who today are suffering through the rise in the cost of living. I have friends in this city; I have friends in western Canada, and in talking to these people I find many of them are actually in dire need because of the rapid rise in the cost of living. These people were expecting that if the government would not maintain price control at least it would exempt those in the low income groups from the payment of any income tax whatever.

When one reads the daily and weekly press, or almost any magazine, one finds scattered throughout warnings that a depression or a recession is imminent. I think it behooves the government to state in the budget what its programme is to maintain prosperity and see that a depression or recession does not come. I believe one of the most important things it could do would be to take complete control of the banking system of this nation, and there are very good reasons for that. One is that in 1945 the chartered banks of this country had three times as much invested in government securities as they had by way of loans. In that year they had $3 invested in government security for every $1 they had on loan. In other words the governments of this nation, federal, provincial and municipal, are supplying the income of the banks; and I say that when any corporation depends upon the government for its income it is time the government owned that corporation.

The banks, too, have done very well in the last few years. I was able to get the 1946 profits of only a few of the banks. I have here the figures for the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank of Canada. In 1945 the net profits of the Bank of Montreal were $3,514,522, while in 1946 their net profits were $4,487,782.91. The profits of the Royal Bank increased from $3,828,143 in 1945 to $4,020,895.51 in 1946. The dividends paid by the Royal Bank increased from $2,100,000 in 1945 to $2,800,000 in 1946. If we are not to experience a depression then we must see that purchasing power reaches the hands of the people who want to spend the money on consumer goods. Banks are willing and glad to lend in times of prosperity, but in times of depression they are not willing to lend and do not lend. It does not matter what steps the government may take to see that the reserves of the chartered banks in the central bank are adequate; if a depression is upon us they do not lend, not matter how high their reserves may be. So I suggest to the minister that by nationalizing the chartered banks the government will obtain a very good instrument for preventing depressions.

Throughout the budget speech of the minister, on one page after another, he refers to our dependence for our prosperity on what happens in the United States, pointing out how closely our economy is linked to the economy of that country. According to an article appearing in the Toronto Daily Star of May 15, ten leading economists in the United States, of whom three were former heads of the OPA, believe that a crisis is imminent in that country. The Minister of Finance stated that our prosperity might continue to be reasonably good provided there was not a depression, or a recession as he called it, in the United States. Well, I think it is time we saw to it that we had a measure of prosperity in this country all the time depending upon the resources of this nation, not depending upon what may or may not happen in the United States. I do not believe the United States is following or will follow economic policies that will enable Canada, if our present practices are maintained, to have prosperity; and that applies to all the other nations of the world as well. I do not think the United States is going to admit the imports necessary for foreign nations to have the American dollars they need to buy the imports they require from the United States. The minister pointed out that we were short of American dollars, had an adverse balance of some $603,000,000 in 1946; and an article in the Financial Post of May 24 states that at the present rate Canada is buying United States goods, and the present rate at which we are selling goods to the United States, this year we shall be short of American dollars to the extent of $850,000,000. The government should take steps to see that that situation is corrected, and I suggest that as they have seen fit to make a contract for the bulk sale of Canadian wheat to Great Britain, they should be willing and prepared to make contracts for the bulk importation into this country of the goods we need from countries like Britain which need our dollars to pay for our wheat.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that the budget falls short in many respects. The most glaring fault is the lack of a single provision for improvement of the economic position of the majority of Canadians whose income is so small as to keep them out of the income tax brackets.

2. The tax relief granted in the lower income brackets is proportionately much less than that granted in the middle and higher brackets. For example, the tax relief in 1947 for a single man earning $800 is $3. This relief equals only ·375 per cent of his total income. But a single man earning $10,000 is afforded tax relief of $393, which is equal to 3·93 per cent of his income. This relief is proportionately ten times greater for the man in the $10,000 bracket than for the man in the $800 bracket.

3. The government's headlong policy of decontrol has resulted in a sharp rise in the cost of living. This trend is shown by the increase in the cost of living index from 121 in April, 1946, to 130·6 in April, 1947, a rise of approximately 8 per cent. This 8 per cent increase in the cost of living far exceeds the tax relief granted in the budget, which for a married man in the $2,000 income bracket with two children, amounts to only ·8 per cent.

4. The 1948 income tax for a married man earning $1,800 is $144 less than the tax for a single man earning an equal amount. But not only is the married man earning $10,000 left after taxes with an income of $7,747 as compared with $1,636 for the married man earning $1,800; he is taxed $253 less than the single man with an income of $10,000.

If a married man in the $1,800 bracket is allowed only an additional $144 on account of being married, this amount should apply throughout all the brackets.

5. At a time when the standard of living of the mass of the Canadian people is being reduced, company profits are at a record high. Dividends, too, are on the upgrade from the index of 131·2 in January, 1946, to 156·8 in March, 1947. Profits of the major Canadian oil companies are much higher in 1946 than in 1945 and promise to be still greater in 1947 with the large and unwarranted increase in gasoline prices.

In the midst of all this, the reduction in anticipated taxation revenue from corporate enterprises is from $688,000,000 in 1946-47 to $470,000,000 in 1947-48, a reduction of more than 31 per cent. This compares with a reduction in anticipated personal income tax revenues of only ten per cent.

6. Because of the increasing dependence of chartered banks for income on holdings of government securities, and because of the need to increase the volume of purchasing power in the hands of the public at the onset of a depression, I believe the time has arrived when it is in the public interest that the chartered banks be nationalized.

For all of these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the budget has failed the Canadian people and consequently I shall be forced to vote against it.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on his first budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has been showered with bouquets from all sides of the house. The kind references to the minister are a good indication of the esteem in which he is held by members of all parties. These references may be taken as a recognition also of the minister's all-round ability. I too should like to join with those who have already congratulated the minister on the delivery of his first budget speech in the house. I should like to add, however, that along with their congratulations hon. members should have also expressed sympathy for the minister in his present position because, as he no doubt knows, he is now the chief target on the government side not only for members of this house but for the Canadian people generally. It is my view that if the minister does become the subject of bombardment from this side of the house it will not be as a result of any weakness on his part but because he has allowed himself to become the spokesman of the old debt-creating system which belongs to the sixteenth century but persists in running Canada's financial policy in the twentieth century.

Whatever the outcome of my forecast may be, I would in all sincerity suggest to the minister that he request the leader of the house to place him on the front benches, as near to the Social Credit group as possible, so that it may be easier for us to get at him. The present seat which the minister occupies may be convenient for him as he appears to be well shielded, but that seat is definitely inconvenient for the opposition members. What I am saying bears out the contention of the Social Credit members that it does not matter how able or how popular a member may be before he is appointed a minister of finance; he is bound to fail because he is given an impossible task, that of operating a money system which cannot distribute to the Canadian people the goods and services which they require. So we sympathize with the Minister of Finance, but we sympathize even more with the Canadian people.

During the debate thus far, government supporters have lauded many features of the budget, and of course the opposition have criticized it quite severely on some points. So far as I am concerned I shall undertake to show that this budget does not meet with the requests of the Canadian farmer.

On the 16th day of April, 1947, a delegation of farmers presented a nine-page brief to the Minister of Finance, his deputy and their advisers, requesting that the government do something to assist the Canadian farmers, at least in the west, in keeping the agricultural industry on a stable basis. The delegation placed fourteen recommendations before the minister. Let me read each one and then express my opinion whether or not these requests were granted. No. 1 reads as follows:

Four year average for income tax purposes.

In parenthesis, the Alberta Farmers' Union states:

We were advised that this was a matter of government policy and would have to be dealt with by the Minister of Finance and his cabinet.

The fact remains that the Minister of Finance and the cabinet have not acceded to this request. Let us take No. 2:

That in case of dispersal sales of live stock, an equivalent number of animals to those owned on January 1, 1941, be considered a capital asset and not subject to income tax.

Has the government granted this request? The reply is, of course, no. In parenthesis, the delegation which interviewed the Minister of Finance, in publishing the report of their visit to Ottawa, said:

. . . would be given consideration and they could see logic in our argument that foundation herds should be established as the year of 1941. They were going to look into this matter and see what recommendations could be made along this line.

Well, so far the government, and I presume the Minister of Finance or his advisers, have had time to look into the matter and either grant this recommendation or refuse it. In his budget the Minister of Finance said nothing on this point, so I take it that the request was not granted.

Recommendation No. 3 read as follows:

That exemptions be raised to $1,200 for single and $2,400 for married persons and proportional increase to dependents.

We all know that the minister did not grant this request. In their report the delegation also said:

This also was a matter of government policy.

Therefore recommendation No. 3 was not granted either. Let us take No. 4:

Allowance for labour of farm families in connection with production on the farm.

Has anything been done in this regard? Well, the reply is obvious. The government has not granted this request either. Let us take No. 5:

No further responsibility for income tax on farm wages.

The reply of the government spokesman was that it would be quite impossible to grant this request because it was felt that the tax should be collected at the source, and the farmer should be expected to collect it the same as any other employer; therefore request No. 5 was not granted.

Let us take request No. 6:

Board of arbitration on income tax cases.

The reply which was given to the delegation was to the effect that this had already been set out in the act, and it was only a matter of time before this board would be appointed. The fact remains that so far the arbitration board has not been appointed; consequently thus far the request has not been granted.

Recommendation No. 7:

That payment of arrears of interest and principal on the home farm, due before 1940 be allowed as deduction for income tax purposes.

After having listened to the Minister of Finance and after having read his speech carefully, I did not find a single reference to this particular request, which is an important one so far as farmers are concerned. The delegation urged that payment on old debts and arrears of interest be deductible for income tax purposes. The government officials stated that they would look into the matter after they had pointed out to them the reasons why the delegation asked for this concession. It was due to the trying times of the thirties when the farmers were not in a position to pay off their mortgages, and a considerable amount of this debt accumulated interest over a period of years. On this question I may point out that industrialists, some of the oil companies and gold mining companies, are granted certain privileges when they begin their operations, to enable them to get the proper start. I commend the government for that, but why should not the same principle be applied to the farmers?

Recommendation No. 8:

Provision for final clearance to all taxpayers within two years.

The delegation was told that the government would give immediate attention to this as soon as they were able to get sufficient staff. In parenthesis, the delegation said:

They have had this in mind for some time and consider the taxpayer entitled to clearance and they were hoping to do it within one year instead of two.

The argument there is that the government is unable to do it at the present time because of insufficient employees. What is wrong with our veterans? Why not employ these young men? I know many of them who are qualified and are certainly eager to learn, and they could learn to handle this problem and to do this type of work. Why not ask them to come in to do this work? Surely they are entitled to it. To say at this time that there is insufficient staff is, to my mind, a poor excuse. The government has not granted this request.

I now come to request No. 9:

No special exemptions to any class but full provision for proper expenses.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

We know there are certain types of employment where expenses are not allowed. Hon. members know that until a year and a half ago they were obliged to pay for telegrams and other expenses; that they were not allowed to charge these expenses to the expense of being a member. We are now compensated in another way. It matters little what provision it may be, every taxpayer should be entitled to deduct legitimate expenses when they are connected with the obtaining of income. So far, No. 9 has not been altogether adjusted.

I now come to No. 10:

Simplification of income tax forms.

Everyone who has had to calculate his income tax knows that this year as in previous years it was still a difficult job. Unless one studies the various clauses of the act and the various questions in the form, it is quite difficult even for a man who has had something to do with filling out forms of various kinds. Let us take a farmer. I maintain that it is absolutely impossible for a farmer to know where to begin and what to enter and what to leave out, to know whether to claim exemption or not. So that simplification of income tax forms is one thing the minister should look into, and the government should provide assistance to every person who cannot compute his own income tax deductions. This has not been done so far.

11. In computing net worth statements over the years 1941-1945 the increase in value of live stock and implements, which has come about through the general advance in prices, should be discounted, and an equal amount of this property valued on the same basis per unit for both years.

I might say a word about this net worth system of collecting taxes. I understand that the net worth system is applied in the three western provinces, and in Alberta the income tax officials go as far back as 1941. I understand that in Saskatchewan they go back to 1942, and in Manitoba, in some districts, they go back to 1941, while in other districts they go back to 1942. Why the difference? Surely this government fully realizes that it is unreasonable to demand that a farmer at this particular time should pay for the first years immediately after the outbreak of the war, because the farmers had just got through a ten-year depression. The government were not concerned then with the problem of siphoning back to the farmer a certain amount of purchasing power but now that he is making a little money, they feel that they should siphon it off as fast as they can. This system of computing the farmer's tax is unfair.

I took up several cases with the officials of the income tax branch, and I do not believe, although the officials were very kind, that the farmers in general felt they were being treated as well as they should have been. They felt that the inspectors simply came around and put down what they thought the farmer's income was and what his expenses were. I feel that number 11 has not been granted them.

12. Uniformity of interpretation and administration of the income tax act. It should not be left to the discretion of district inspectors to vary the provisions of the act.

Incidentally, the officials of the department agree with the delegation on this point, but so far nothing has been done. As a result, this request was not granted. I come now to a very important one:

13. The brushing and breaking of new land should be considered as a current expense.

I have already pointed out that certain companies drilling for oil are allowed, for the first three years, I believe, certain privileges. Why should not the farmer be entitled to the same privilege? So far, however, that has not been done.

14. Money expended in drilling or boring wells or excavating dugouts on the farm, together with all equipment for same, should be chargeable as a current expense.

This is the last request of the Alberta Farmers' Union delegation, and this request has not been granted.

When we study this budget from the point of view of the farmer we must conclude that it is a poor one, because it has not granted a single request of the fourteen which were submitted by the farmers; and this organization, by the way, is the largest farm organization in Alberta. Other farm organizations have placed before the government similar requests and they have not been granted. In other words, the requests of one-third of our total Canadian population have been ignored, and that is something that I feel the Minister of Finance should review, to see what can be done for this group of citizens who, as we all know, constitute the basic industry of this country. So much for income tax as far it affects the farmers.

When the Minister of Finance made his speech he placed several tables on Hansard and compared the proposed income tax on Canadians with that imposed on United States citizens. I happen to have run across an issue of World Report of May 27, 1947. This publication sets out a table giving a comparison between the taxes paid by Canadian citizens and those paid by Americans.

Let us take the tax paid by a married couple with two children. In Canada, under the old system, the one still in existence, the taxpayer in the $2,000 income tax brackets, having a wife and two children, pays $68, and under the new system, $36. In the United States, under the old system, the one that still operates, the taxpayer did not pay anything. Under the new system he will not pay anything.

Let us take next the $2,500 brackets. In Canada, under the old system, the taxpayer would pay $192, and under the new system, $130. In the United States, under the old system, he paid $95 and under the proposed system, $66.

We now come to the $5,000 class. In Canada, under the old system, the tax was $910, and under the new system, $630. In the United States, under the old system, it was $589 and under the new system, $471.

In the $10,000 brackets, in Canada it was $2,646 under the old and $1,930 under the new. In the United States it was $1,862 under the old and is $1,489 under the new.

I think that is sufficient to show that the United States taxpayer does not have to bear the burden which the Canadian taxpayer has to bear; and we all know that the earning power of Americans is greater than that of Canadians.

There are two other things to which I wish to refer. From groups of farmers in my constituency, I have received a number of resolutions and requests in regard to the increase in the price of binder twine. One of these resolutions reads in part as follows:

Members of the Alberta Farmers' Union, local No. 77, wish to draw your attention to the proposed increase in the price of binder twine. In view of the fact that all commodities purchased by farmers have increased tremendously and prices on farm products have been kept under rigid control, it is needless to say that the proposed increase in the price of binder twine would be acutely felt by the farmers, and would tend still further in upsetting the balance of economy in the agricultural industry.

We therefore request your assistance in making a firm stand against any such increase.

I feel that I am justified in placing this request before the government so that they may give it the proper consideration.

The other point I wish to mention is in regard to the refundable portion of the income tax which was collected by the government from Canadian citizens. As we all know, the refundable portion which was deducted in 1942 will be refunded some time after March 31, 1948. I have had several requests from persons all across this country—persons who find themselves in a difficult financial position and persons who have become sick—that their refundable portion be refunded to them on making application at this time. I discussed the matter with the Minister of National Revenue

(Mr. McCann), and he prided himself on the fact that so far the government refused to refund this refundable portion to a single person, regardless of circumstances. Well, it may be a source of pride to the minister, but it seems to me that it is unreasonable. The government should appreciate the fact that these small wage-earners cooperated with the government throughout the years of the war. When these people find themselves in dire circumstances, if they can produce an affidavit or a medical certificate to show that their health has been impaired or that they cannot earn a living, it seems to me that we could make an exception and refund the entire amount that is due them. I know there are two exceptions. Persons who are sixty-five years of age or over may make application to the Minister of National Revenue and may get the refundable portion which is coming to them. The other exception is with regard to persons who die; they can get the money refunded, but they do not need it then. I should prefer to see the man who is living, and perhaps sick, get this money back so that he can recover. It is less important to pay out the money to whoever shares all his belongings after he is gone. Let us try to prolong the life of the living men. I know a man—he is not in my constituency; he happens to live in Edmonton—who requested that I do everything posible to get this refundable portion for him, because he has been in bed for weeks and weeks and has not a cent to his name. So far the minister has refused to do anything about the matter. I just wish to remind the government and the ministers concerned about this matter and I would plead with the government to do something along this line. Surely we can make exceptions when conditions warrant a certain change.

I realize that the house is anxious to conclude this debate tonight and take the vote. Therefore I shall not take up any more time on this occasion, and I wish to thank the house for the kind attention it has given me.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), in the concluding portion of his remarks while speaking in this debate, referred to the Canadian wheat board. I was in the house enjoying the speech of the hon. member and enjoying the nature of it and admiring my hon. friend's pleasant manner of speaking. That may be the excuse for my not following too closely just what was being said. However, over the week-end I took occasion to glance over Hansard, as I sometimes do, and I read for the first time that portion of the hon. member's remarks dealing with the Canadian wheat board. In fairness to him, as well as to me, to the department and the Canadian wheat board, I think I should refer to some of his remarks. He said, as reported at page 3341 of Hansard:

> I come now to discuss something of a serious nature, namely the wheat board . . . First I want to say this. There has been no meeting of the agricultural committee of this house, I think since 1942. At no time in the history of the wheat board since 1936 have the audited accounts of that board ever been placed on the table of the House of Commons. I do not want to be misunderstood. I realize that, by statute and in fact, statements have been filed by the board itself, but no audited statements have ever been filed as such and were never filed before any public body in Canada until a few weeks ago when they were tabled in a senate committee.

Later on in his speech, the hon. member said:

> This wheat board of ours cost, in 1939, in administrative and overhead expenses, $677,342; in 1942, $842,149; in 1945, $1,592,543. You will remember that this is all handling the same crop. I will admit they did take up some minor things like rape seed and a few incidentals which do not very much restrict or enlarge the picture.

Later, the hon. member dealt with a comparison of salaries, rentals and various other matters between the years 1939 and 1945, showing the difference in these figures in the total costs for each year. I think the hon. member will agree with me that to show a clear and proper comparison the cost should be based on the number of bushels handled in each crop year. However I shall deal with that in more detail later.

The hon. member went on to say:

> In the period, from 1936, when it was instituted, to 1945, the end of the crop year of 1944, this board lost in its operations $112 million.

And he stated further:

> We in this House of Commons endeavoured to have this matter referred to a committee where there might be an examination of the operation of this board, but we were refused that by the government. May I also say that both the groups to my left, if my memory serves me correctly, voted with the government.

This is a minor point. Although I believe I intimated in the house that the legislation should not, in my opinion, be referred to the committee on agriculture, I do not believe there was any vote on the matter. While there was an intimation from other parts of the house that the legislation should not be referred to the committee on agriculture, no one in any part of the house asked for a vote on that point. There was an overwhelming vote from all parts of the house, including the official opposition, in support of the legislation as introduced.

Then the hon. member for Calgary West states:

My second criticism is this: here we are paying in one year to a firm of auditors—

And so on. I know every hon. member, including the hon. member for Calgary West, would be anxious to be fair to any business firm which cannot speak for itself in the house. I think it is only fair to point out that this firm of auditors was first appointed in 1935, at the time of the establishment of the Canadian wheat board by the then Conservative government under the leadership of Mr. Bennett. I believe this is a capable firm of auditors, although I have no special knowledge about them, except by reputation. They have continued down through the years since that time.

Toward the close of his remarks the hon. member said this:

I close, sir, by repeating that I am not making any sign of a charge of dishonesty against anybody. But I say that this business has now cost the taxpayer $100 million odd, aside from what it has cost the farmer.

I know the hon. member for Calgary West was not thinking of making any charge of dishonesty. I know he and many other hon. members know personally the personnel of the Canadian wheat board, know them well and know them favourably. And the last thing they would wish to do would be to cast any reflection upon the wheat board; nor do I think that any such reflection was in the mind of the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I tried to make that clear.

Mr. MacKINNON: On more than one occasion during the course of his remarks the hon. member did say that, and that is why I read part of the context, to show that such was the hon. member's desire.

But there have been occasions when references have been made by hon. members, principally those of the official opposition, in regard to the general question of the accountability of the Canadian wheat board to parliament. I wish to show that the wheat board has fulfilled all its obligations in this regard. Annual reports have been submitted each year and have been tabled in the house by the responsible minister. In addition, the activities of the board have been the subject of examination by the committee on agriculture.

I wish to recall that I drew to the attention of the house on February 27 last the fact that—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When were the reports of the wheat board submitted to the committee on agriculture, and in what years?

Mr. MacKINNON: If the hon. member will wait a minute I shall be glad to give him that information.

I wish to recall that I drew to the attention of the house on February 27 last the fact that the reports and audited financial statements for the 1939-40, 1940-41, 1941-42, and 1942-43 crop years were given an exhaustive examination by the committee on agriculture and colonization in 1942, 1943 and 1944.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the minister unduly, but as a member of that committee may I say that in every case we were denied information, as a result of votes in the committee.

Mr. MacKINNON: No doubt the hon. member will be answered in what I purpose saying before I take my seat.

The report of the committee on agriculture and colonization dealing with the 1939-40 and 1940-41 annual reports of the Canadian wheat board reads as follows:

The committee directed its attention to a review of the annual reports of the Canadian wheat board as referred to in the order of reference and matters arising therefrom. These reports contained detailed information as to the amount of wheat (actual and under future contracts) handled by the board and its operations in the marketing of same.

Your committee was impressed, during its inquiry with the capacity and ability of the members and officials of the Canadian wheat board and desires to record its opinion that the marketing of Canada's wheat is being carried out by them in an efficient and businesslike manner.

The annual report for the crop year 1941-42 was also referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization and became the subject of exhaustive examination.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister will admit that no minority reports are permitted.

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the hon. member for Lake Centre would just let me finish. What I am submitting to the house is not being submitted in any acrimonious spirit. It is simply offered in reply to observations made in the house concerning which I do not want any misunderstanding. And I am sure the hon. member for Calgary West does not want them misunderstood, either.

Particular attention was given to orders in council which became effective during that particular crop year. In its report, dated July 20, 1943, the committee on agriculture stated:

The committee commends the officers of the Canadian wheat board for the comprehensive, detailed and lucid manner of presenting reports and accounts.

In its report at that time the committee on agriculture and colonization made certain recommendations in regard to the Canadian wheat board and government policy in regard to the handling of grain.

The report of the Canadian wheat board for 1942-43 was submitted to the committee on agriculture and colonization in June and July, 1944. After studying wheat board operations, the committee reported on July 7, 1944. Among other points dealt with in the report of the committee were the following:

The committee again commends the officers of the Canadian wheat board for the comprehensive and lucid manner of presenting the reports and accounts. The committee was gratified to learn that four of the recommendations of last year's report concerning policy with respect to flaxseed, to the allocation of cars, and the referring of the annual report of the Canadian wheat board to a committee of the house, have been given effect.

Owing to the pressure of other parliamentary work, the standing committee on agriculture and colonization did not meet in either 1945 or 1946, and I personally have no recollection whatever of any request or suggestion in either of those years that there should be a meeting of that committee to deal with the report of the Canadian wheat board. As I stated the other day, it is the intention of the government to refer the more recent annual reports of the board to the committee on agriculture during this session. Members of the agriculture committee at that time who are now in this house will recall the thoroughness of those discussions; and if hon. members who were not members of the agriculture committee will read the various proceedings of that committee they will find that a most exhaustive analysis was made of wheat board operations. In the light of this, surely the criticism of wheat board operations up to July 1, 1943, made by the hon. member for Calgary West, is definitely not well taken.

As far as the wheat board was concerned, I believe it was quite prepared to be examined on its later reports had an opportunity been provided through a meeting of the agriculture committee. As I stated during discussions in the house last February, the government is quite prepared to have the agriculture committee review all wheat board reports which have not been examined by this committee up to the present time.

Then the hon. member for Calgary West made certain comparisons between the cost of board operations in 1939-40 and certain subsequent years. Anyone who has closely followed the grain discussions in this house is aware of the vast expansion which took place in wheat board operations during the war. These enlarged activities have continued into the present crop year. It is quite natural that this increase in board operations should be accompanied by a positive increase in operation costs. Surely no one in this house expected the Canadian wheat board to undertake the responsibilities it carried in 1942-43 and 1944-45 at the same absolute cost figures as prevailed in the crop year 1939-40. I might state that in 1939-40 board operations consisted of the selling of wheat delivered to it—and at that time the grower could sell where he liked—from the 1939 crop and the disposing of stocks carried over from the 1938 crop. By way of comparison I would refer briefly to the 1944-45 report of the board, which sets forth clearly the board activities in regard to wheat, both western and eastern, and in regard to barley, oats, flaxseed, sunflower seed and rape seed; the administration of the drawback in respect of flour and other human foods containing wheat sold and delivered in Canada; the administration of price ceilings on whole wheat on behalf of the wartime prices and trade board, and the administration of equalization funds with respect to both oats and barley. This report also refers to the work of the board in connection with crown wheat supplies and the provision of wheat to countries in receipt of mutual aid.

To complete the picture, reference must be made to the circumstances under which the wheat board operated. As members of the house know, during the first four years of the war this country accumulated a vast wartime reserve of wheat. Responsibility for the storage and financing of wheat largely rested with the board. Hon. members will recall that on July 31, 1943, the carryover of wheat in Canada in public storage and on farms amounted to nearly 600 million bushels. The amount of wheat carried in storage facilities in this country exceeded our entire pre-war storage capacity. From August 1, 1943, this great accumulation of Canadian wheat started to move abroad and was almost completely disposed of, along with deliveries from succeeding crops, by July 31, 1946. The distribution of these stocks of Canadian wheat over a period of three years, in accordance with the food strategy of the final years of the war and in accordance with the urgent requirements of a hungry world since the war, represent a tremendous administrative problem for the board. During these same years our board has been engaged in making very large payments to producers from surpluses accumulated by the board in the crop years 1940-41, 1941-42, 1942-43 and 1943-44, and the adjustment payment in respect of the 1945 crop. These are the circumstances under which the board has operated since the early part of the war, and these are the circumstances which fully justify an enlargement in board operating costs.

In regard to the operating costs of the board, I believe the hon. member for Calgary West should have related the figures he quoted to the bushels of grain handled by the board. Had he done so, I am sure he would have drawn other conclusions. The administrative costs of the board on the wheat handled for producers remain today approximately what they were in 1939, a small fraction of a cent a bushel, in fact less than one-quarter cent a bushel, despite the added administrative load. I do not propose to deal with specific cost figures. As I have stated, ample opportunity will be given for the discussion of items of this kind in the agriculture committee during the present session of parliament. Participation payments available to the producers have amounted to $138,081,969.41 since 1940, of which $127,794,718.34 has been paid out and a balance of approximately $10,287,251.07 remains to be claimed by producers who are entitled to it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is up to what date, which crop year?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is up to the end of the 1943 crop year. It should be made clear that these payments are additional to all payments received by producers at the time of delivery of their grain to country elevators; that is, the initial payment. Moreover, the board has on hand over $60,000,000 for distribution as final payment on the 1944 crop year. Distribution of this money will commence this summer, and when this payment is made the total participation payment distribution will have amounted to over $200,000,000.

The largest wheat board deficit, of $60,000,000—actually it is within a few dollars of $61,000,000—resulted from the marketing of the 1938 crop, when the board purchased wheat from producers at eighty cents a bushel. I wish to interject that this loss would, of course, have been much greater had the government acceded to requests from many parts of this house for a higher price for wheat. This initial price was approved by parliament, which was fully aware that a deficit might result from establishing a fixed initial price as high as eighty cents a bushel. At that time the government had in mind that western Canada had gone through a prolonged drought and a prolonged depression, and I am very glad indeed that we had in Canada an instrument through which a measure of stability could be placed behind the western economy when very low prices were prevailing in the markets of the world. The same basic position prevailed in 1939-1940, when a further deficit of some $9,000,000 was incurred by the board.

I should like to submit to the house a table showing the total amounts paid to producers, the cheques cashed in each crop year and the balance outstanding for each crop year on the crops from 1940 to 1944. The table is short, and I would appreciate it if the house would permit me to have it inserted in Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ROWE: Is 1944 the last year for which the minister has accounts?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes. The table is as follows:

The Canadian Wheat Board

Payments to Producers to April 30, 1947

	Total amounts payable to producers	Cheques cashed to April 30, 1947	Balance payable, April 30, 1947
1940 wheat crop	$ 26,081,800 16	$ 25,751,563 50	$ 330,236 66
1941 wheat crop	15,305,476 69	15,096,749 02	208,727 67
1942 wheat crop	19,692,770 12	19,505,680 01	187,090 11
1943 wheat crop	36,725,167 12	31,219,595 92	5,505,571 20
1945 wheat crop—10 cents adjustment payment	23,543,840 58	19,578,863 26	3,964,977 32
1942 oats and barley crop	1,570,750 97	1,564,938 55	5,812 42
1943 crop oats	8,867,004 74	8,834,031 12	32,973 62
1944 crop barley	6,106,932 94	6,058,607 21	48,325 73
1944 Ontario wheat	188,226 09	184,689 75	3,536 34

From an operating point of view, I would point out that members of the Canadian wheat board have been drawn from the private grain trade and the pool organizations. The government has been fortunate in securing, as members of the Canadian wheat board, men with a wide and practical experience in the marketing of wheat. I believe that this has been an important factor in the efficient operations of the Canadian wheat board over a long period of years. Since I have been Minister of Trade and Commerce, and have come in close contact with the operations of the board, there have been several changes in its personnel but I think that all during those years the quality of service given by the board has been exceedingly high. We have lost men from the board from various causes, men who gave tremendously of all they had to the work of the board and then had to retire. We have had a recent loss in the person of Mr. Huntting who left the board some time ago. All these men have given great service. I should like to give the house a remark that was made to me by Mr. Huntting when he told me that he intended resigning from the board within a matter of a few weeks. He said that he intended taking a rest for a few months and then possibly entering into private practice. He told me that the people of Canada would lose the services of the type of men we have been able to get to serve Canada on the wheat board unless we took into greater account the actual monetary returns that should be made to them for their services. I think every one of these men could leave the government service and get from 50 to 100 per cent more for their services elsewhere. From my own personal knowledge I know that to be a fact, and it is for that reason I have taken this opportunity to express my high appreciation of the work of the members of the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the minister will permit one question, he does not dispute, does he, a single figure I gave?

Mr. MacKINNON: If the hon. member will follow what I have said he will note that there is a very great difference in our statements.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But the minister does not dispute a single figure that I gave, does he?

Mr. MacKINNON: Oh, yes, I do.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Which one?

Mr. MacKINNON: What I have said speaks for itself, and clearly shows the difference.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, my speech will be somewhat shortened by what has been said this afternoon by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). I want to congratulate him and his compatriot in our group, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) upon their contributions to this house. They are a credit to themselves and an evidence of the real greatness of the Canadian people.

The 1947 budget was presented to us as one granting great relief to the income taxpayers of Canada. But reviewing the budget in its entirety and analysing its figures, I find that the greatest relief has not been in the income tax field at all but in the granting of exemptions from the excess profits tax as of December 31, 1947. It has been evident to the Canadian people and to us here for many, many months that monopoly enterprise as we know it in Canada has been putting pressure on this government to give it relief from the excess profits tax, along with its demands for the removal of price controls. Price controls were removed during the first few months of this year in spite of the tremendous increase in company profits which were being made in almost every field of Canadian industry. Attention has already been drawn to the tremendous increase that has taken place in company profits for 1946 in most of the industrial firms in Canada, and with the removal of price controls we shall find that these prices will rise abnormally. What justification the government had for removing price controls when profits were climbing as they were is best known to them. But the Canadian people are alert and are watching these things.

Mr. MAYHEW: Then the hon. member's prediction of gloom and despair is really a bogey. He actually expects prosperity?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I shall come to the point which the hon. member raises if he will listen.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): You will be disappointed if we have prosperity.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The final surrender has been that this government, on top of taking price controls off, now permits the removal at the end of 1947 of the taxation of excess profits. It should be remembered that the excess profits tax was imposed as a check on profits arising out of war business. It will be remembered that this government passed a special order in council setting aside the legislation passed in 1939 which limited profits on war contracts to five per cent, when these industrial firms refused to make badly needed war goods so long as that act remained in operation. The excess profits tax was a tax on above normal profits arising out of war conditions. We maintain that the present situation, under which these companies are still making excess profits, arises out of conditions which are a direct result of the war; namely, there is an abnormal purchasing power in the hands of Canadian people as a result of war savings, gratuities and so forth, and, in addition, the ordinary peacetime requirements of the Canadian people in food, clothing and other goods were not available to them during the war. There has been this long period of security of goods, linked with a long period of pre-war scarcity of purchasing power, so that today the demand for goods was never greater.

In view of those conditions the checks of price control should have been maintained. If they are to be removed the least we could expect was that the government would continue to tax excess or abnormal profits. But price ceilings are being removed and the companies can now charge on most commodities all that the traffic will bear. The scarcity of goods and the purchasing power in the hands of the people in the form of war savings and war gratuities provide an effective market, and for a few months the industrialists of this country will enjoy greater profits. They are going on a profit spree today. We are opening the floodgates to an inflationary period which, I fear, will bring its consequences, and unfortunately, while the industrialists and those who are making these profits are having their spree today, all the Canadian people will suffer and suffer deeply in what will happen afterwards. Higher prices mean higher costs of living, and higher costs of production. The agriculturalist is not able to keep up, and the falling wages mean lower standards of living. All the benefits of the prevention of inflation are going to be lost to the Canadian people.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member talks about falling wages. Would he give an example?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am talking about the natural fall in wages which will come as soon as the purchasing power of the Canadian people has been used up. With increased cost of living, savings will be taken away; people will not be able to purchase commodities at high prices and commodities will not be there.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is emotional economics.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is one of the minister's balanced economies, speaking in a large way. The Canadian people have been left to the uncontrolled and unrestrained profiteering of those who control many of the necessities of life, and essential commodities, such as food, clothing and shelter. The government in power has finally yielded to the pressure put on by those who are engaged in the distribution of Canada's necessities at the expense of the great mass of the people. I maintain that the results will not be felt for a year or two, but they are inevitable. There will be first a greater concentration of wealth in the hands of a few; second, a rapid depletion of the purchasing power in the hands of the Canadian people—

An hon. MEMBER: You hope.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: —and a period of excess profits. When this is over and Canadians can no longer purchase, production will be reduced; wages will fall and lay-offs in industrial plants will then be common. To prevent these results, controls should be maintained, and, above all, excess profits should be taxed.

An hon. MEMBER: You want to see a depression.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not want to see a depression; I want to prevent it. The removing of controls and the allowing of an increase in profits, and then on top of that taking off the taxation on excess profits are two steps which make for an ultimate depression. The fight of the government of the country during the war to control inflation was an example to the world. The Canadian people benefited tremendously from the measure of control to which they subjected themselves, and they did so in most cases with very fine grace.

Great credit is due to the previous minister of finance for the way in which he dealt with those people who came asking for special privileges and the right to increase prices. This saved the Canadian people from years of inflation. We were the envy of countries outside of Canada; we were looked upon as an example, but today that is gone.

Mr. RINFRET: We still are.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With prices going the way they are today, with costs soaring, with no limitation on them?

An hon. MEMBER: Not so high.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I hear hon. members to my right mumbling. They have complained that price control and rationing were killing the initiative of Canadian industrialists. Well, today they are really enjoying a very high profit era, according to all the financial reports received today. The Canadian industrialist is now being given his freedom and initiative to clean up for himself. The government is apparently giving him a free rein. The present uncontrolled monopolistic enterprise system is dying throughout the world except in the United States and Canada. I doubt very much whether it could withstand another depression.

I now wish to compare the treatment which the government has given to these privileged industrialists by the removal of the excess profits tax, with the treatment which has been given to another group of people at the opposite end of the economic picture, people who seldom reach the income tax level. I want to place before the house the treatment that these people are receiving under the income tax regulations, and particularly in western Canada.

The farmers of Canada, like most Canadians, did not object to paying just and equitable taxes. That particular injustice with which I wish to deal has not affected all the farmers across Canada, because the present injustice arises out of particular government regulations and restrictions which were placed upon these farmers in western Canada during the years 1942 and 1943. In those years the wheat farmers and wheat growers were, by very necessity, singled out by special regulations by this government.

Back in 1945 the Canadian Federation of Agriculture presented to the special senate committee on taxation a brief in which they protested against the inadequate and inequitable application of present income tax regulations to farmers, because those people who framed the present income tax regulations had apparently intended them for general business operations, and had failed to take into consideration the unique position in which the Canadian farmer found himself.

It is interesting to note that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his budget speech intimated that the act was being revised. So far as the particular grievance which I wish to present is concerned, I fear that the revision will come too late. The damage has already been done and the injustice has been perpetrated; but I would urge the minister to have the act revised as quickly as possible. I would suggest also that in the name of what is proper, decent and right, steps should be taken immediately to right an injustice, which I am going to place before the house this afternoon. I think it is so glaring an injustice that it will arouse any fair-minded person who is familiar with its operation.

Two changes have been made in the farm income tax regulation, one which allowed the farmer who has a loss in any one year to charge that loss against the next year's operation. It was a rather useless piece of patchwork, because when a farmer gets into the position where he has an absolute loss in any one year, assessing him for income tax in the next year is not much of a relief.

The next amendment, which allowed the farmer to average his income over a period of five years, was the first real improvement, but it was apparently implemented by experts who were in touch with the situation, and it very nicely missed the most important year to the western grain farmer, namely, that of 1944. It has come too late to prevent grave injustice.

The complaint which I wish to present to the house—and I have mentioned it on several previous occasions—occurred in 1944. The Canadian people will remember that during 1942 and 1943, because of lack of shipping facilities and the war situation generally and the shortage of storage space and cars, the Canadian government found it necessary to place a quota against farmers delivering their grain. The government requested them, in an effort to assist in winning the war, to store their grain on the farm ready for the hungry people of the world and the armies in the field as soon as they could take it out. Again in 1943 a quota was placed against the farmer and he was requested to keep his grain on the farm. This the farmers did willingly. In some cases the quota was raised. It was as high as eleven bushels; but many of the farmers were compelled to take their production of those two years and store it on the farm at their own expense.

Mr. MAYHEW: Which was very profitable.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I shall show the hon. member in a moment how profitable it was. They did not even ask the government to pay them something on production for that year. In 1944 the farmer was asked to deliver his grain, since the starving people of the world and the armies needed it to help bring victory. In the spring of 1944 the farmers hauled in their grain as rapidly as possible, only to find in 1945 their patriotism rewarded by having all their surplus grain production which they had stored in 1942 and 1943, and delivered in 1944, raise them into the income tax group. The officials came along and took all that production and placed it in one year and charged against them all the moneys they had received in the one year. No appeal from the treatment of the taxation branch has been successful. Some years later the farmer, who never even suspected that he would be placed in the income tax group, is called into town by the income tax inspectors and asked for the permit books. The books are checked and the income is assessed for that year. Let me give some examples of actual cases that came to my notice.

A. This farmer in 1942 had an income of $950. The grain was still on the farm. His expenses were $1,100. He had a loss of $150 in storing the grain on the farm.

An hon. MEMBER: How much grain had he?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There were several hundred bushels. In 1943 he had an income of $1,657 and his expenses amounted to $1,376, or a profit of $281. The grain is still on the farm, but he has not the cash income. Now we come to 1944. They ask him to deliver the grain and he hauls it out. In 1944 his total income was $4,764, and his expenses for that year amounted to $1,579, so that he had a profit of $3,185. On that he is taxed $380.

Mr. MITCHELL: Was that not spread over the three years?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, it was not, and that is the very point. In 1945 his income was $2,155 and his expenses were $1,237. He had a profit of $918.

This is the important point. His annual net profit over that period of four years was less than $1,100, or below the income tax level fixed by the Canadian people for a married man.

An hon. MEMBER: Would it be plus his living?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: His living for himself and his family is chargeable. He has to mark that in his returns as so much produce taken from the farm.

An hon. MEMBER: Why did he not show that he had so many bushels in stock? He should have shown that he had so many bushels.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He was not liable for income tax because these fellows never paid income tax. Even in 1945 he was not told by the income tax inspectors of that time that it was possible for him to go on the accrual basis. I will give the figures and the information he has to fill out, in order to indicate his difficulties. As I say, this man's annual income over that four-year period was some $1,100, which is less than the amount the government fixes as taxable minimum.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are not taxed on any income less than $1,200 for a married man. This man was under the impression that he was doing a patriotic service by building granaries at his own expense and storing grain when the government could not take it. If he had been allowed to deliver his grain he would not have been taxable. He would have been in the same position as any other farmer in Canada. But because he is a western farmer growing grain trying to fulfil the regulations of the government he is forced into that position. He was not informed in 1944 of what would be done. He did not find out until 1945. Such people did not earn enough money in any year to make them liable for tax. Government regulations forced this man into tax levels by compelling him to withhold sale. He could not believe that he would be taxed for carrying out the government's instructions. He was willing to suffer a loss in 1942 of $150 and live on a miserable profit of $281 in 1943. His appeals to the taxation division in Regina were, however, unavailing. He was charged a five per cent penalty for late filing, and eight per cent interest was charged against his arrears for the period during which he had not paid. He received the following letter from the income tax division under date of March 5, 1946:

Re: 1944 income tax assessment—$416.67

It would appear that your income tax assessment is in arrears as noted above, notice of which was recently forwarded to you. Will you please make arrangements for settlement immediately as interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum is accruing.

This is not an isolated case but one that can be repeated in every village, town and hamlet in my part of the country, where the income tax officials have suddenly swooped down on the district and called the farmers in.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not only in the west.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I can give the figures for the east. Let me take now case B. This man in 1942 was not assessable; in 1943 he was not assessable; in 1944 his assessment was $298 and his tax was $56.

Let us take case C in the same town. In 1942 he was not assessable, nor was he assessable in 1943, but they got the permit books and checked deliveries in 1944 of grain grown and all the work done in 1942 and 1943. In 1944 he delivered 2,397 bushels of wheat, most of which was delivered during the months of January to June and therefore could not have been grown in 1944. This amount was taxed

$187.95 for that year on grain which he stored for the government and the people of Canada. As one farmer wrote to me:

> They taxed me for two years' work and for storing my grain for them. I do not mind paying what is right but surely not this. If they think I will work and slave 16 to 18 hours a day and keep this grain for the government and then pay it over to the income tax, when they compel me to put all three years' production into the one year, they are badly mistaken. I will quit farming as soon as I can.

It is little wonder, then, that among the income taxpayers on the farm, the grain growers in western Canada, for the year 1945-46, Saskatchewan farmers paid more farm income tax than all the farmers of Ontario and Alberta put together, and that the grain growers of Manitoba were in many cases caught almost as badly.

If this is an example of justice as handed down by the present government it is little wonder that these farmers protest against it. The undeniable fact is that grave injustices were perpetrated under the present farm tax regulations. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech promised some action in the rewriting of the income tax act, which would indicate that he and his colleagues are aware that these wrongs and injustices exist.

The instances which I have given of injustices as applying to the grain farmers of the west are one explanation of the remarkable fact that in 1945-46 Saskatchewan farmers paid, for the 1944 income year, the sum of $2,587,632 in income tax, while Manitoba was caught similarly, whereas only 280 Quebec farmers were assessed and the total amount of their payments was $59,913.

An hon. MEMBER: Diversified farming.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, but they were allowed to deliver their produce. In this case, however, the government prohibited the farmers, by its regulations, from delivering their produce. What would your farmers say if there were regulations that prohibited them from delivering for a period of three years and then lumping it all in one and charging income tax on it? Yet that is what is being done here, and in the whole of the maritime provinces only 318 farmers were assessed for income tax, their total payments amounting to $82,588.

I should like to review the kind of forms which the farmer has to fill out. Along with the regular information given in the special form, he has to give his income, gross wages, and net income from professional fees, net profit from farm or ranch, net income from rentals and income from interest, dividends and so on, and total income, subtracting donations to charitable organizations, medical expenses and so on. Then under section 13 there is a tax on item 12-K, found in the tax tables on pages 3 or 4, less a 4 per cent reduction of item A as per the 1945 statutes. Then there is C, tax after subtracting B from A, and D, less applicable portion, if any, of British and foreign income tax paid. Then there is E, tax after subtracting D from C, then there is the provision with regard to family allowance, under section 17, and so on.

What I am trying to point out is that the complicated income tax form is far beyond the comprehension and ability of an ordinary person to gather together the information and do all the arithmetical work and accounting necessary. On top of this, the farmers have to include the special T-1 supplemental in which they give their farm receipts for the calendar year, showing their production from crops, grain; live stock, meats, et cetera; dairy products; fruits and vegetables; miscellaneous sales such as maple syrup and sugar; patronage dividends; produce raised on farm and consumed in the farm home. This is for garden produce, I suppose.

Mr. LESAGE: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The government do not tax a person living anywhere else on that. I think it is absolutely ridiculous. Then farmers must show farm expenses; purchases of seed, purchases of live stock, cost of repairs and maintenance; general farm expenses; taxes on farm; interest paid; wages paid. The trouble is that very few farmers have the time to be accountants. What is required is a simplified form of farm accounting—

Mr. LESAGE: Have you a sound proposition?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: —where farmers can write down in a simple way what their produce is, what their income is for each member. The farmer is taxed as an individual for the income of the whole family. His wife and family all go together. The work of five or six is all lumped together and placed on the one man. That is not right. The form of the income tax forms put out by the government is unjust if you apply this type of thing to the average farmer.

The recent reduction in hog production in western Canada, which again this year shows a reduction, amounting to some thirty-seven per cent, can be traced to a large extent to the injustices which farmers feel with regard to their treatment under the farm income tax regulations.

Farm organizations have requested and suggested to this government, in view of the peculiar nature of the set-up of farm industry, the violent fluctuations in income and the uncertainty of return for the work, that higher exemption be granted for every farmer for production in poultry, hogs and dairy products. If they would grant an exemption of $500 for the farmer in that type of thing, it would go a long way to relieve the feeling of injustice under which he is suffering.

Mr. LESAGE: The form would be more complicated.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the form would be simplified, and it must be simplified. Exemption for farm income should be raised. There is not just the one man concerned. It is the man and his whole family. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in their 1947 annual convention, passed a resolution asking that the government increase the exemption to $2,400, if they are to maintain this type of return to be handed in by the farmer.

I realize that there are great difficulties in connection with this problem, by its very nature. The farmer does not keep records. If he had done so, and realized his actual position, I am afraid we should have had very few farmers left on the farms of western Canada to produce wheat. I think the same is pretty well true of farmers across the whole of the dominion. Those who have done that essential work need proper recognition, not discrimination and this kind of thing. I urgently request the government to implement immediately some change which will rectify this gross injustice which was done to the farmers in 1944.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the matter of Canadian immigration is before a committee of this house and that one is not allowed to discuss the subject at this time. If I had the opportunity, I would voice a protest for the people of my constituency against the present regulations. I will, however, refer to what our sister dominion, Australia, has done. Although less favourably situated, she is doing a great job in providing the people of Australia with an immigration policy. I believe arrangements were made for that country to take in some fifty thousand orphans from Europe. The Canadian people know what Canada can do, and the excuse that we have not the shipping is just not good enough. The Australian government have undertaken a programme of converting their shipping into passenger boats to bring immigrants to that country, and their programme calls for some seventy thousand a year. Canada and this government achieved great things in the war. What we did in the way of the British empire air training plan, our conversion in industry, in synthetic rubber production and the atomic bomb reveals what the Canadian people can do. The record is just too good for this government to turn around and say, "Oh, we can't do anything about it; we haven't the shipping." If the Canadian people and the Canadian government wanted the shipping, they could have it.

In closing, I should like to make a national plea for the government of this country and the Canadian people as a whole to realize what is happening and put a stop to what I will call the rapid Americanization of this Canada of ours. For years there has been a gradual draining off of Canada's wealth—our resources, human and material—to the great and wealthy nation to the south of us. United States capital is developing and controlling our natural resources such as pulp, minerals, oil and water power. Recent purchases, according to financial news, reveals the gradual passing of financial control of Canadian industry into the hands of United States capital. Wall Street is moving into Canada. During the war, control of a large block of Canada's water power was handed over to the subsidiary of a world aluminum combine. The Imperial Oil Company was granted by the federal government the sole right of exploration for oil and a large tract of oil-producing territory in the Mackenzie river basin. Hollinger interests have recently obtained the right to the development of what appears to be one of the greatest mineral resources in the northeastern part of Quebec and Labrador. Just a few days ago this house passed a bill to grant them the right and privilege of constructing a railway from the St. Lawrence river up into that area.

What is wrong with Canada? What prevents Canadian capital from developing Canada's resources for the benefit and welfare of the Canadian people? If Canada is to play her great part in interpreting the old world to the new and the new world to the old, we must make Canada here a land which will provide for our Canadian youth as a land of greatest opportunity for them, and a land which will attract the best from other countries. "Canada for the Canadians", might in many respects again become a slogan for the Canadian people if it is to prevent itself from becoming dependent upon a rich uncle to the south. We should be looking forward to the development of our own birthright, to making ourselves a growing nation, willing and capable of asserting herself as one of the united nations making her contribution to a world of peace.

It would appear at the present time that some such spirit as this is necessary if we are not to be absorbed entirely by our rich and powerful neighbour to the south. We have been greatly enriched by the diversity of our population, each group making its own contribution through its wealth of culture and ability. It is now the duty of the Canadian people to show that their unity creates a strength which can illustrate to the world that the peoples of the world can work and unite, and by cooperating can make a contribution to a world of peace.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when one reads the debates which took place on the budget he necessarily comes to the conclusion that it must have been a grand evening in the House of Commons when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) delivered his budget. Of the things that have happened during my forced absence from the house on account of illness, this is surely the one I regret most to have missed.

I notice that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) said at that time that "we were in a sort of sunshine atmosphere." The leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low), exclaimed "we were carried along in such a happy mood." It seems that everyone was under the charm of a great performance. They could not have felt that, if they had not believed at the time that the proposals contained in the budget speech were wonderful.

Yet when the debate was resumed every opposition speaker seemed to find these proposals had something wrong with them. There is only one conclusion to be drawn; either the impression created when the budget speech was delivered was justified—and those proposals could not have deteriorated that much since then—or else the proposals were not as good as they looked, and in that case the minister must have been a wonderful illusionist —a new Houdini—who could create such an impression that he was that night a public benefactor.

One way or the other the minister deserves credit for his performance, and he must by now be satisfied with the many compliments he has received, to which I wish to add mine. Considering that this is the first budget of the minister, and one which brings a certain measure of relief to Canadian taxpayers, one naturally is bound to express admiration for the man who presents it and who supervises its drafting. He certainly deserves it. But the minister would be the last to resent, I am sure, my taking this occasion to pay a well earned tribute to his predecessor, to whom befell in a moment of crisis one of the most ungratifying tasks, but one which was carried with indomitable energy and courage. I do not necessarily subscribe to all the attitudes the former minister of finance the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), may have taken, but I think he deserves the gratitude of the Canadian people for the way he has guided our financial policy. The present minister has all the ability and the tactfulness to carry him through his task, and his debut has been made under most favourable auspices.

It has been customary to consider the budget speech as an exposé of the country's balance sheet, and the proposals submitted by the government to finance, by way of direct or indirect taxation, expenditures necessary for the good administration of the country. It is not the summing up of an economic programme or the planning of a general economic and social policy. The monetary aspects have, therefore, always been given more prominence than actual economic repercussions or social consequences of the government's expenditures programme.

The proof of the ability, with that system, lies, therefore, in the balancing of the budget by maintaining the administrative expenditures at a level compatible with sound business practice, without impairing the efficiency of necessary public services; by providing for a reasonable programme of social security; and by keeping the burden of taxation at such a level that it will suffice to cover the expenditures while not imposing too great a strain upon the taxpayer, through heavy income taxes or vexatious indirect taxes.

Taxes are not, therefore, the extortion by the state of the product of labour, or income from hard-earned economies—in pure fantasy as intimated by one hon. member. Taxation provides a way to pay for services rendered. It has existed since time immemorial in one form of government or another. And the modern ways, though seemingly more complicated, are more just and equitable than the old. When I hear hon. members of a new political sect going around and saying that taxes should not exist, and that they would take them off if they came to power, I have a hard time to believe either in their sincerity or in their judgment.

It is right to criticize the nature and form or amount of taxes. But to preach against the principle of taxation is illogical. No government likes to tax; no one has happily been faced with the obligation of taxing; but all have had to do it. Taxes, as I said, are a form of payment for value received. The value is the sum total of the administration of public services, and particularly as far as paying the costs of social security schemes is concerned. The whole country benefits by these expenditures, but money must be provided to pay them. Taxes, fairly calculated, justly calculated, are the means to do it.

What we have to ask is: have we value for our money; are we well administered, or is our money squandered? The second point is: are these payments collected from the right people and through the methods that are least likely to cause trouble or to become a burden upon those who pay?

This is what we have to look into, and this is what the citizens of Canada have to consider, rather than listen to those who pretend they can administer the country with thin air or dancing numerals.

I contend that, on the whole, this government has well administered the finances of the country through five years of war. If we accept the fact that there have been no startling abuses, and that all moneys expended had been provided by votes of the house, accounted for by treasury, or by the comptroller, we cannot but admit that what the Canadian people have paid during the war, and what it will pay now, it has wanted to pay. We have paid, through taxes and borrowing, for the cost of the war; and from now on we shall pay through taxes the interest on our borrowed moneys and the cost of our social security programme. We cannot eat our cake and keep it.

I was surprised to see in Hansard, that, of those who were criticizing the taxes we have to pay, many were the same people who, during the war, were advocating more and more expenditures. It is impossible to reduce taxes beyond a certain point, because we have the burden of interest on our war debt. Yet those who were clamouring for heavier and heavier commitments during the war are now among those who protest against taxation.

When the war was on, they paid in silence, and dared not protest; but today they claim that all taxes should be reduced. Unfortunately we have to face the music, and shall have to do so for a long time. Canada's national debt is a war debt; indeed, is is a two-war debt. In 1914, before we entered the war, our debt was $544,391,000. At that time we had to support the empire to make the world safe for democracy. The result was that from 1914 to 1920 the gross debt increased by almost $1,200 million, to a total of $3,042 million, due to heavy war and post-war expenditures.

In 1939 we rightfully took our part at the side of the allied nations, this time to stop Hitler, and to save the world from nazism and fascism. One of our ways of doing this was to feed Britain and to help finance her. Once Hitler was defeated, we had to help put Britain back on her feet. All that cost us an estimated $24 billion, or $2,000 per capita, while the United States spent about $339 billion, or an average of $2,400 per capita. From 1939 to 1944, as a result of that, there was an increase of $12 billion, incurred mainly for war purposes. And when the war was finished we realized that we had done a good deal for the allied cause. Let us say we did more than any other country except the big powers. It is true that, in spite of what we did, recognition in international affairs was not manifested to any great extent; it is true that Mexico, which did well but did not spend four per cent of what we spent, was invited to sit in the inner councils of the united nations. But at least we have the reward of satisfaction with a task well done.

It is worth while to note that in 1914 the interest on the public debt was only $12,893,000, which rose to $139,500,000 in the year following the first war and has now reached $461,000,000, or 37·36 per cent of the ordinary expenditures for the current year, which amount to $1,233,000,000. This interest is equal to seventeen per cent of the grand total of expenditures for the year, including war, special and so-called reconversion expenditures. Therefore my astonishment is great to hear some of those who, during the war, criticized the present government and stated it was not doing enough, stand up now and criticize the government because it has to keep taxation at a level sufficient to pay for the cost of the war and the administration of services.

That my hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) should protest against the impossibility of further reducing taxation, I am not surprised. He is logical with himself; he opposed the war expenditures. Yet I cannot agree with the statement he made in this house that all those expenditures and all our sacrifices were in vain, because as yet we have not the benefits of peace and already we must face new dangers. No matter what might lie ahead, we first had to overcome the dangers which were facing us at the moment. It may be that the world is heading for a new cataclysm, though I refuse to see it in the near future; but at the time the war expenditures were made these things had to be done. I will admit that we could have been more moderate in some ways, that we could have kept an eye on our potentialities and not mortgaged our future to the extent we have. I admit that some Central and South American republics did less and have benefited more, and today are as highly respected as we are. But let us not forget that in Europe there are other nations which did not awaken in time and which paid dearly as a result. At the time these expenditures were undertaken it was hard to realize what should be done and what limitations we should put on them. It was hard to establish a reasonable limit to our commitments, because of the necessities of the war and also because of the mass hysteria which developed at the time among certain elements not only in our country but in many others. I do not regret having supported the government in the policies which it considered necessary and which required the expenditure of these large sums which have been added to our national debt. We have paid this money, and will have to pay the interest now, because we had to do it one way or the other. It may be that we did too much, but we had to do something, and now everyone should be ready to face the future and pay what must be paid.

According to the budget forecast, in 1947-48 we shall have to provide revenues to cover expenditures amounting to $2,100,000,000. At present rates of taxation the estimated revenues amount to $2,540,000,000. The minister has concluded, therefore, that revenues could not be safely reduced more than $160,000,000; so the extent to which this reduction will lighten the burden of Canadian taxpayers and the advisability of adopting the measures suggested by the minister are the main points with which we are now concerned.

The first reduction is made up of $40,000,000, resulting from the repeal of the gasoline tax. We shall not benefit much by that, because the provinces will enter the field at once. The most important reduction is the lowering of the income tax revenues by an estimated $110,000,000 for the present year and $175,000,000 for a full year. This phase of the budget has been generally well received throughout the country, and it brings relief principally to those in the lower income brackets. No matter how we feel about other aspects of possible reductions, I am of opinion that the taxpayers with lower incomes will be those who will more greatly benefit, and this is as it should be. This question has been so well covered by my colleague and neighbour the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) that I need not dwell upon it tonight; but it may not be unadvisable to look at certain of the proposals that have been made to bring about more relief for those with small salaries.

For a long time I was convinced of the possibility of raising exemptions to $2,000. If we consider the returns for 1946, at first sight this appears quite feasible within the limits of reduction set by the minister. For 1946 the sums collectable from people earning less than $2,000 amounted to $147,133,000. Therefore we are tempted to take this as the amount which would be lost if the exemption were extended to all those earning $2,000 or less. But the explanation given by the minister that such exemptions not only would affect people receiving less than $2,000 but would affect all taxpayers, and that ultimately those in the higher brackets would even benefit more, convinced me that this would be hard to do within the limits that have been fixed by the present budget. I consider, however, that it is of the utmost importance that the small income group be eliminated from our tax calculations at as early a date as possible, and that the efforts of our experts should be centred on that.

When referring to greater reductions in the income tax, the minister mentioned that if this were done it would necessitate an increase in the sales tax. Far from doing that, I think at the earliest possible moment the minister should start reducing this tax. Here, though I may scandalize some of my hon. friends, I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me this afternoon. I submit that this reduction could have been made this year if last year the government had not decided to repeal the excess profits tax as at the end of 1947. I can but wonder at the urgency that seemed to exist in the minds of some of the treasury advisers to lighten the charges on corporations. If we look at page 2552 of Hansard for this session we find that for the fiscal year 1946-47, personal income taxes were estimated at $695,000,000, the corporation tax at $239,000,000, and the excess profits tax at $449,000,000. In the corresponding column for 1947-48 the estimate for personal income tax is $625,000,000, which with the proposed reduction would amount to $515,000,000. The corporation tax is estimated at $300,000,000, which is $61,000,000 more than that of the preceding year, indicating that a larger income is expected to be made by corporations; but in the following line we see the excess profits tax estimated at $170,000,000 instead of $449,000,000, which is a reduction of $279,000,000.

I am quite willing to agree that the high excess profits tax which prevailed during the war had to be lowered in order to permit some corporations to obtain added cash for expansion and reconversion; but I wonder if we did not go too far in reducing it to a straight fifteen per cent for the current year, and if we did not show too great an urgency entirely to free corporations of that charge by deciding that it would terminate at the end of 1947. The best arguments that could be advanced in favour of maintaining that tax until we liquidated most of our extraordinary expenditures resulting from war commitments can be found in the minister's speech, in the paragraph where he explains why, despite the representations of those who wanted it to terminate immediately, the government decided to maintain the tax until the end of the period which had been foreseen by the previous minister of finance, which is the end of 1947. The minister said, "We have taken into account the views advanced from many sides." I do not for one moment doubt his sincerity or that of his advisers, but I think probably big business is better equipped than the man in the street to substantiate its point of view on financial matters. It can engage technicians and economists to attempt to prove that repealing the excess profits tax would ultimately benefit the wage-earners, but I personally think differently.

In his budget speech the minister gave an eloquent lecture to Canadian business enterprise, but I doubt if this will prove enough to convince big business that it has much to do in the future for the preservation of free enterprise in a changing world. The experience of the past is that they understood when understanding was forced upon them by circumstances. In the United States they resisted Mr. Roosevelt's programme and fought him, and they could not understand that his energetic actions were saving them and saving the situation at a critical time. Anyone who might think I exaggerate need only read the speech made to the American Manufacturers' Association by Eric Johnston, chairman of the chamber of commerce of the United States, when he retired. We see today in the country to the south reactionary elements trying to destroy one after another all the accomplishments of the new deal, and a new form of hysteria permits it. The fear of communism has been so instilled into everyone that it is sufficient to label any proposal as communist to kill it.

I personally think that if we had been less generous with the corporations last year we might be doing more for the small salaried people this year by reducing the sales tax. According to the estimated revenue for 1947-48, at eight per cent the sales tax would bring $325 million. At six per cent it would mean a reduction of $82 million passed on to the masses of the people. If there had not been a cut of $239 million in the estimated revenue for 1947-48 on account of the excessive reduction of the excess profits tax and a complete disappearance of that tax for 1948, we might have been able to lower the sales tax by twenty-five per cent. At any rate that was the decision taken last year and my protest should have been made then. The minister might say that it is impossible to reestablish that tax or any portion of it, because corporations have now planned their programmes accordingly.

It is hard also to understand why subsidies on the necessities of life such as milk have been discontinued. It would be impossible for dairy producers, of whom there are many in my constituency, not to raise the price of their products because they cannot at the former prices meet production costs. The situation is not as bad here as it is already in the United States. There are tables there as well as here where milk is already becoming scarce.

This brings me to the question of government controls. The matter has been fully discussed and I do not want to dwell upon it, but as some people in my constituency, taken with the zealous habit of sending letters prepared by their party organization, have made the discovery that I had not voted on the controls bill and reproached me for not opposing it, I wish to state that unfortunately I was absent because of illness, but I want also to emphasize that had I been able to be present I would have supported the controls bill, not for party reasons, but because I believe it was a good bill, and I never shirk my responsibilities to please a few people when I am convinced that a measure is good.

What I cannot understand is how people can complain about the rise in prices once controls are removed and yet advocate the removal of all controls. It is true that controls bring many inconveniences in their application and that they may hurt certain interests, but it is recognized that their benefit to the masses of the population are greater than the inconveniences which they may at times impose. They must be, in our economy, of a temporary nature and must be resorted to only in special circumstances; but whenever they have been repealed too soon the masses have deeply felt the counter-shock.

Before summing up, I should like to touch briefly on a few questions concerning income tax. I think consideration should be given in our system of taxation to the most important question of education. A country like ours needs more and more educated and well-informed citizens. The greatness of a country depends on the value of its citizens, and the service of the citizens to the community is influenced in no small degree by the extent of their knowledge. It is true that, under our present constitutional set-up, education is a provincial responsibility and prerogative, but this does in no way exempt the government of the country from contributing its share to the betterment of education in any way it can, or rather in any way in which the provinces will allow it to do so.

One of the best ways, it seems to me, would be to encourage parents to keep their children in school and college and, if gifted, send them to a university. We have seen by some figures given to us that the average income of wage-earners and of all gainfully occupied people is not so high as to enable all to enjoy a high standard of living, far less to enable many to divert a large part of their earnings to the higher education of their children.

There are two ways we could adopt to help remedy this situation. One would be to extend the age for family allowances in the case of children pursuing their studies past sixteen. That would be just a token of encouragement but it might help a little.

Another way would be to extend the special exemption of income tax to a higher age for children pursuing their studies. This, I know, has been advocated by others, but I have always felt so keenly about the charges that have to be borne by parents who understand the importance of giving their childen the best possible educational equipment with which to go through life that I feel I must join with other voices which have been raised in this matter.

There is another question I should like to mention in regard to the assessment of taxes on the farmers. I will admit that a very small number fall in the category of income tax payers, but in the case of those who do I have noticed an anomaly which may be peculiar to our part of the country but which at all events deserves our attention. Cases have happened of farmers who, when getting more prosperous, have been subject to income tax, and I think the assessment has been made without taking some most important elements into consideration. This has to do mainly with salaries to farmers' sons and other members of the family. Our Quebec farms are operated most of the time as a family concern. The children work on the farm from the moment they can and no salary above their bed and board is paid to them. They contribute to the community and get no wages, but when they reach the age for marrying their father takes out of his accumulated capital, whether it is all in land or partly in cash, the value which he considers equal to his son's share in the prosperity of the family, and he gives him part of the land he has acquired during his life, or he gives him cash to buy a farm. This is a form of what I might call delayed salary. When the income tax assessors try to compute the actual income of that farmer over a number of years they do not accept that system and, in order to arrive at the income, they establish the capital and in it include the son's share as the father's gain. I think decent salaries should be allowed to farmers' sons in such income tax assessments. Whether they are paid monthly, yearly, or in a lump sum after a number of years should not be material. I commend this to the attention of the minister because I know personally of such cases and, this being a practice much followed in rural Quebec, it may be that others will have to suffer if the attitude of the department is not changed in this regard.

Now that I have advocated the reduction of taxes, I would not be following the regular pattern if I did not advocate some expenditures. I notice that it is a general practice on all sides of the house to complain about taxes and the next moment to put in a claim for public expenditures. I shall not impose on the house a list of the public works that would be needed in my constituency, but I should like nevertheless to submit to the government that consideration should be given at an early day to a programme of public works or capital expenditures in the country.

Wharves need to be rebuilt; public buildings are badly needed in many parts of the country; irrigation projects and other improvements are necessary. The time will quickly come, according to many economists, when men will again be looking for employment instead of jobs looking for men. The closing of war industries has been partly compensated for in some parts of the country by the reconversion to peacetime production, but in many parts of the country such readaptation has gone on more slowly and I cannot but feel that it is high time to start elaborate plans for a programme of public works, to be ready when the needs arise.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I may say that the budget now under consideration is a source of satisfaction and relief to a large part of the population. Owing to our actions of the past, it cannot be lightened much more, and we realize that the taxpayers of Canada are paying for what they wanted during the war and for what they wanted in the way of social security for the period of peace. I think the cut in the sources of revenue is in the right direction, with the qualification I have made with regard to the excess profits tax.

Much has been said of our system of government in relation to others and of the necessity to fight for its preservation. I personally think it is better because it respects the individuals and their liberties, but let us not forget that our aim should not stop at respect for the freedom of the individual but should also include the improvement of his standard of living and his freedom from want. The time has come for the drafting of a far-reaching Liberal programme if we want our system to justify itself.

I believe it is right that the Liberal party in Canada should be the one to put it into effect. I believe that such a programme could easily be worked out under the system of improving the fate of the masses, while at the same time permitting a fair but reasonable return to those who, having worked and gained, are willing to risk their oftentimes hard-earned money in new commercial and industrial ventures.

Let us not get too panicky in our fears of communism. The best way to vindicate our present system is to work hard and plan well for the future. Some people consider our present form of capitalism as a permanent institution and fear the world will regress if it disappears. The same things were said when the French revolution gave a death-blow to monarchial systems throughout the world.

No system of government has yet proven itself perfect. I am quite satisfied that the present one with improvements is best suited for our country, but I am convinced that the world will experience many philosophies of government before it succeeds to give to all its inhabitants a fair and enjoyable life on this planet.

The government of the world has been in constant evolution and up to now it has never gone backwards for a very long period of time; its march has been onward. A proportionately larger number of people live well today than in the previous centuries, and I am confident that this will continue improving with the years and that Canada will rise to its opportunities and make for itself an ever larger place among the nations of the world.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): It is not my expectation to speak at any length tonight. The debate has already continued for a considerable period and practically every aspect of the subjects dealt with has been referred to. Before the debate concludes, however, I wish to make some observations on certain questions that are before the house and the country and then to state the position we propose to take with respect to the main motion and the two amendments made to it.

The motion by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is, in effect, a motion of approval of the government's budget. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), and the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) are criticisms of that budget. It is these questions that we are now called to vote upon. I may say at the outset that when the subamendment comes up, which will be the first upon which a vote will be taken, we in this party will support these criticisms; and when the main amendment comes to be voted upon, we shall, of course, support it too. We shall support both of these amendments for the reason that the tax reductions are both inadequate and inequitable.

What are the issues upon which we are asked to vote tonight? I want to deal first with the main issues in the budget itself and then with the points raised by the two amendments. The government's tax proposals do two things: first, they perpetuate a tax burden 300 per cent greater than in any peacetime year. That is the main fact which we must not lose sight of in this debate. And they do one other thing. They reduce taxation by only seven per cent for this current year and by only twelve per cent for the year which follows. Those are basic facts in the government's budget position.

With respect to the amendments, they touch upon five points. They express regret that the budget provides no relief from indirect and hidden taxes; that the government offers no encouragement for the development of certain natural resources, such as agriculture and mining; that the government has failed to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference; that it has failed to raise the levels of income tax exemptions; and that it has failed to provide relief for the most needy half of the population of Canada. The question before us is, are these statements facts; are they correct, or are they not? To the extent that they are true the government deserves our censure.

I wish to ask first, is the statement of the government's fiscal position correct, namely, that the tax burden is 300 per cent greater than it was in the highest taxation period prior to the war? And is it correct to say that there has been only a seven per cent reduction in this fiscal year and only a twelve per cent reduction for the next year in the present budget? The facts are, from the government's own records, that the largest tax per year prior to the war was, in round figures, $550 million in 1939. The proposals in the present budget are in the neighbourhood of $2,200 million, or four times as much, or 300 per cent more than in that 1939 fiscal period.

The government's tax proposals this year, as I read the minister's address, are a reduction of $160 million this year and $265 million next year, which, on the basis of the last year's budget, is a reduction of seven per cent for this year and twelve per cent for next year. We take the position that that degree of taxation is too high, and that those taxation reduction proposals are too little.

I want now to examine the statements of criticism as outlined in the two amendments, taking them in order. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Does the budget provide relief from indirect and hidden taxes? The answer is no. No one in the house will dispute that answer. The reductions are confined almost wholly to the income tax. That part of the dominion's revenues collected from regressive taxes, the hidden and indirect taxes which bear heavily upon the poor, is not reduced in any way. That was the first criticism in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, a criticism which was expressed in different words in paragraph (e) of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. As I said, regressive taxes are taxes which bear unduly upon the poor; and these taxes provide practically half of the revenues of the Canadian budget. There has been no reduction in those taxes. The consequence is that the poorest section of the nation receives no relief by this budget, even at a time when the cost of living is going up —it is said to have gone up three per cent in the last four months—and even at a time when the government has taken off subsidies amounting, in the total, to $200 million.

With respect to the second criticism in the main amendment, does this government offer any encouragement to the development of our natural resources, particularly the resources of agriculture and mining? We maintain they do not. The policies of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have the whole country baffled. I wonder if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself knows what the Minister of Agriculture is up to. The Minister of Agriculture has the government handle all the wheat and sell it at prices that force the farmer into growing coarse grains; then the government seizes the coarse grains and disposes of them in Canada at prices that encourage the production of bacon; then it finds that it cannot fill its bacon contracts with the old country and calls upon the taxpayers of Canada to put up, as some estimate, twenty-five per cent by way of bonus for every hog that Britain buys.

These are basic things in the government's agricultural policy. Our agricultural and mining policies are the two sections of our economy which should, if properly managed, help us with the solution of both our internal and external problems.

You may ask, how is the government failing the farming industry? It practically denies the farmer the dollar market in the United States. It practically shuts us out, and even outside the dollar market it makes the farmers sell at prices lower than those received by their competitors in the British market. It makes our contracts in Canadian dollars and then does nothing to protect the value and integrity of the Canadian dollar. It asks us to sell our products to Britain and other countries on time, at prices lower than other countries are demanding and getting. We are denied the market across the line where we could get higher prices and obtain United States dollars for which our economy is crying out so loudly.

In point of fact, the government's bilateral trade policies are imperilling our own exchange situation on this continent. It is selling huge amounts of our agricultural produce overseas at less than world prices and buying from the United States much more in the way of commodities than we sell to them. In the crop year 1949-50, all that the farmer is certain of is the Canadian dollar, and he has no idea what it will buy. In recent weeks the price of butter has increased ten cents, and 8½ cents of the increase is the withdrawn subsidy. The government gives with one hand and takes away with the other. There is no relief in the budget except for those who are reasonably well off. That is the basic criticism from the humane point of view.

With respect to mining, I will take only a moment to deal with that. It has been discussed fully by others. The government admits its own failure. Its action in revaluing the dollar on July 5 deprived Canadian gold producers of $3.50 for every ounce of gold sold to the United States. The government got panicky about holding the price line and our dollar situation has been going from bad to worse.

If these observations with respect to agriculture and mining are not accepted at their face value, I would refer to but one statement in a government document published by the bureau of statistics. It is entitled "Canadian Constitutional Data". I will read only a portion of one paragraph. It has to do with the question of developing our own resources and whether we are doing enough in that direction. The statement is as follows:

> Canada is one of the last countries to have her frontiers pushed back, and this process has not yet reached its limit, nor have the natural resources on much of the land been explored, exploited or harnessed.

This is from a government document published only within the last few weeks.

I come now to the third criticism in the main amendment. Has this government failed to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference? One has only to ask that question to answer it. A few months ago the government came forward with a programme in connection with dominion-provincial relations, and among other things it proposed a policy of social security, health insurance and public investment or public works—the purpose of which was partly to help head off depression. The combined policy was variously estimated to cost the different taxing jurisdictions in the country, $400 million or $500 million, or $600 million a year, when completed. This cost added to our present budget makes a total budget approximating ninety per cent of the highest wartime taxation we ever had.

What has happened? The government says, in effect, "We can only proceed with that policy if a large proportion"—it is a little vague about it—"of the provinces agree". Seven have agreed and two have not. The government now says it cannot proceed with that policy without having the assurance presumably of more provinces than have agreed, and yet the government does not call a conference. As a result, those policies which the government says are good, which it says it can only proceed with after some more general agreement, it now lets fall by the wayside because it fails to provide the opportunity for that more general agreement; and so those policies of social security and health insurance and public investment remain up in the air. Nothing is done. That is one of the criticisms in the amendment.

I come now to the first of the two criticisms in the subamendment. Has the government failed to raise the exemption levels in the income tax? Again one has only to ask the question to answer it. It has not. The question now is whether it should or should not have done so. The simple fact is that the government today is taxing people who are receiving less income than will maintain a decent standard of living for many families in this country. If the government considers it is good policy to tax people who are already not getting enough income to pay their way, then the government's policy can be understood; but if it is bad policy to do that, then the government should be censured for its failure in this year's budget to give them relief.

The final criticism in the sub-amendment raises this question. Has the government failed to provide relief for the most needy half of the population? At page 2554 of Hansard the Minister of Finance said:

> The exemption levels established last year are high enough to exempt completely from tax more than half the people earning incomes in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, on the statement of the minister half of the Canadian people have received no benefit from this budget—no relief whatever—at a time, as I said a moment ago, when their costs of living are going up and when this government has taken off the subsidies which formerly helped keep the costs of living down. If it is wise to give no relief to the most needy section of the Canadian population, then the policy of this budget is understandable. But if it is unwise to continue to ask the poor to bear an unfair share of the burden of taxation, then, as I said a moment ago, the government should be censured.

So much for the basic facts in the minister's motion and for the five criticisms outlined in the two amendments. I now wish to touch upon three or four other questions which have to do with us here and with our economy as well. The first is the question of foreign exchange control. Our United States dollar situation has been referred to several times in this debate. It was never so serious as it is now. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) pointed out, the report tabled in this house the day before the budget was brought down does not fully reveal the current situation. If the year that this report covers—1946—were divided into three-month periods our deficits and commodity trade with the United States would be shown as $93 million, $120 million, $126 million and $158 million—a steadily worsening situation. When it is stated in that manner, it means much more than when an average of those four figures is taken.

By contrast, we sold to Britain over $597 million worth of goods; and we were able to take from Britain, or Britain was able to supply to us only $201 million worth of goods. Yet Britain has taken up approximately half of our one and a quarter billion dollar loan. On a per capita basis we are lending Britain more than four times as much as the United States did. We supported that policy, but what use will it be either to Britain or to ourselves if we assume a load which will crush us down? We may thus become more of a hindrance than a help to Britain. Last year we made her turn over to us $150 million worth of gold, three-quarters as much as she sent us in goods. It is clear from the minister's statement that the government has no present solution for the unbalanced United States dollar situation. All it can do is hope and pray that something will happen in the United States, though that something may be a recession which will do us harm.

This so-called dollar situation which, in other words, simply means the trade position, has always been a Canadian problem; as I said, it is particularly acute now. The facts behind it are these. On July 5 last our government became unduly apprehensive about United States prices and decided that they must do something to make it easier for Canadians to buy United States goods. The result is twofold. They have made it relatively too easy to buy from the United States, and relatively too difficult to sell to the United States. We maintain in Canada a price ceiling which they do not maintain in the United States. As long as we have this price ceiling there will be a gap between the amount of money coming to the counter and the amount of things on the counter. That surplus money for which there are not goods to spend it on in Canada drives purchasers to the United States to buy goods there. The remedy is one which has been referred to often in this house and elsewhere; it is increased Canadian production.

We have made bilateral deals which make it difficult for us to obtain United States dollars for our farm products. There are other considerations involved, I know. Nevertheless that is one of our great difficulties. Our present United States trade situation as it developed from July 5 is a perfect example of how controls work. One control makes another control necessary. The government decided to maintain a price ceiling, and therefore had to revalue our dollar so as to lessen the cost of United States imports. Now it finds adverse trade balances running against us more acutely month by month.

With respect to international trade generally, some of our policies are blocking, not promoting, the Geneva programme of multilateral trade and the lessening of restrictions against trade. The government talks multilateral agreements, but certain of its policies cut across those of the whole international trade organization. We were given to understand that this government did not like the empire trade agreements. But now, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) says, the government regards the empire preferences as something quite precious. If the other countries at Geneva know as little about this government's trade policy as the government itself apparently knows, they surely must see through a glass dimly.

I now wish to refer briefly to one of the special commodities in connection with trade, and because it has been discussed so often and so fully in this house I shall be very brief. I refer to the subject of wheat. In my opinion, the British wheat agreement killed the London wheat conference, a conference which was called to try to get an international agreement with respect to wheat prices, wheat quotas and so on—a conference which failed. As I said, in my judgment the Canadian-British wheat agreement killed that conference. Why would Britain agree to a $1.80 price ceiling? She had already established a ceiling of $1.55 in the agreement made with this government a year or two ago. By contrast, her idea of a floor price was somewhere around $1; and that idea of a $1 floor price was also sold to Britain by Canada. Is it any wonder that Britain and some others objected when certain of the nations wanted a higher level than a $1 floor and a higher level than $1.55 as a maximum price? It was difficulties such as those which caused the break-down of that conference which had such great possibilities.

I now wish to add a word about the situation in Europe which, over many decades, has been the chief market for our surplus products. The United States is talking about facing the problem in realistic terms. They talk about getting back to lend-lease, as contrasted with loans. Mr. Acheson, then secretary of state, renewed pleas that congress provide $17 billion in post-war lend-lease. General Marshall has also spoken along similar lines. The United States is thinking in terms of big things, as we expect her to do. That must be done to reestablish Europe and restore a workable peace. But the United States is not tying one hand behind its back as it plans to undertake the job.

What are we doing? If it is good policy to help Great Britain or other parts of Europe by turning over our wheat at $1 less than the world price, it is the United States which should be doing it, and not us. But the reverse is the case. We cannot afford to continue to do it indefinitely. Yet we embargo the sale of our farm products to the United States. If our farm products or a larger portion of them were sold to that country they would collect United States dollars, now so badly needed here, and they would, in addition, bring a larger measure of equity to our agricultural industry. As a matter of fact, if our farm products were allowed the benefit of world market prices, our United States dollar difficulty would be considerably lessened.

I come now to my final point, namely the menace of communism in Canada. The British and the United States governments are beginning to understand that a policy built on weakness, instability and appeasement, in dealing with Soviet Russia, is as futile, and as ineffective, as the same policy proved to be against the Hitler and Mussolini gangs.

Too many people have forgotten that it was the bolsheviks who set the precedent for the modern totalitarian leaders. Hitler and Mussolini were diligent students of bolshevik tactics, and now that these pretenders have been destroyed, we find, in state after state of Europe, the very shoes they walked in are being filled by agents of the soviet power centred in Moscow.

The nazis, and the bolsheviks are alike in that they are guided by only one political principle in seizing power. That principle is that the end sought justifies any means. They have the one-party system with its special privileged role in public life. They give the secret police a paramount position in the state. They organize and affiliate with similar parties abroad, and employ these parties for their own global and strategic purposes to fight democratic governments everywhere.

They assist their fellow travellers with public funds, and they give them the protection of their own diplomatic services. They direct them to attain their ends by sabotage and espionage. They employ the same technique in imprisoning political opponents and putting them to death by administrative decree; they have the same ideas about concentration camps, and the same primitive instincts that led them to inflict punishment on the families of their political exiles. They have the same methods of propaganda.

We have had in this country a partial exposé of Moscow-directed espionage activities in our own public service. I did not agree with all of the government's methods, but I refrained from public criticism on the theory that the devil must be fought with fire. My only regret now is that the government did not act sooner; that it did not act more effectively, and that it is not now following through.

What is happening on our labour front? That is the part of our economy in which we should have the most concern at the present time. We have all heard of the Pat Sullivan exposures with respect to the Canadian Seamen's Union. I turn to the May 31 issue of Liberty, in which a well-known Ottawa correspondent deals with this subject under the startling caption, "Could the Reds Cripple Canadian Industry?" The author says, among other things:

> If the communist party could bring simultaneous pressure in the vital spots where its influence is great, it could cause industrial chaos in wide areas of Canada.

And he says that on the available evidence the communists could now play havoc in the coal mines and fisheries of Canada, in our logging camps, in lake and coastal shipping, in great electrical manufacturing companies, and possibly in the automobile industry as well.

He maintains that in every one of these individual industries there have already been communistic red strikes. He points to the Sydney coal mines, to the maritime fisheries, British Columbia and Ontario logging camps, the Montreal and Toronto fur industry, the Ontario electrical factories, the Windsor automobile plants and Pat Sullivan's Seamen's Union which I have already mentioned.

This is a startling report going out from the capital city of this country, and written by a responsible member of the press gallery. Either these statements are true, or they are not. If they are true, the government should do something to correct the situation. If they are true, as many believe they are, the government should be ashamed of its own indecision in so important a matter.

We know now how these communistic organizations work. Every youth movement, every practical organization to improve the economy and social status of individual workers —all these the communists use, or try to use, for purposes that are not Canadian.

We know how difficult it is for some workers to resist them. We are promised during this session legislation covering a labour relations code. If this parliament cannot provide machinery so that Canadian organized labour can protect itself against communist activities, there is something sadly lacking somewhere. This parliament should see to it that Canadian labour unions, and Canadian cooperatives are not used by Moscow agents to become the stalking horses of the Soviet Union's imperial designs.

We in Canada are now no longer isolated from world affairs. We are now on the main highway over which this issue is likely to be fought, if it is fought. Let us then address ourselves to the problem of mopping up communistic activities in Canada. There are many governments of many countries today hanging in the balance. They do not know which way to move. If they give the democratic process a chance they fear the great democracies will not back them up. This is one of the great hours for decision in our history and in the world's history. Canada should be prepared to make its decision, and let the whole world know what its decision is.

All dictatorships are alike to us. I believe that the second world war could have been prevented if the nations of the British commonwealth and the United States had let the dictators know in time that if they continued their aggressive ways they would have a fight on their hands.

What is mainly needed now is to let the communists know, in a frank but nevertheless friendly way, that, so far as we are concerned, they are entitled to their own type of economy, as long as they desire it, but that we have no use for their underground activities in this country, and that we propose to send their agents back home wherever we can root them out.

Let me now summarize briefly what I said in the earlier part of my remarks. With respect to the budget, it is dishonest in so far as it claims a real surplus. It has taken money secured from the sale of capital assets and counted it as current revenue, in order to say that it had a balanced budget. The surplus is said to be greater than any in Canadian history, greater than all surpluses put together. It well might be, because no other government in Canada had the assets arising from the expenditure of $10,000 million of the money of the Canadian taxpayers to sell, and then to apply the proceeds to the current revenues of the country.

The budget is also unsound in so far as it continues regressive taxation at its present height, thus levying an undue tax burden upon the poor. And it is misleading in so far as it leaves the impression that all is well in Canada. The government's policies are making us sell on credit at low prices in markets where much of the debt will not be repaid, and denying us the right to sell in a market where we can get higher prices in cash which we must have if we are not to run the risk of bankruptcy.

In regard to the government's motion asking us to approve a budget 300 per cent higher the third year after the war is over than in any previous peacetime budget, and giving us reductions of only seven per cent in the total tax for this year and twelve per cent for next year. On this matter our position is that the taxes in the budget are too high and that the tax reductions are too little.

With respect to the five criticisms in the amendments to which I have referred, the truth is simply and clearly stated in each of them. There has been no reduction in the regressive taxes, in the indirect, hidden taxes. There has been no stimulation of the development of our great primary industries of agriculture and mining upon which our internal and external problems so largely depend for solution. There has been no resumption of the dominion-provincial conference, which the government says it must have before it can carry out its own policies. Yet it neither carries out those policies nor calls a conference. It is afraid to meet the huge costs those policies involve and afraid to admit that it is afraid to face them. It is afraid to say it is going to add now or in the near future four or five or six hundred million dollars to the tax burden of this country. And so it does nothing. The budget does not increase the level of tax exemptions. It thereby imposes a tax upon people receiving incomes less than the amount necessary for a decent standard of living. Nor does it provide any relief for that half of the Canadian people who are below the level of income tax exemptions, and very little relief for large numbers of those above that level. The Minister of Finance spoke about a fifty-four per cent reduction in taxation at some of the lower income levels. But he did not emphasize that this fifty-four per cent reduction might mean only $6 a year in some cases, $10 a year in other cases, and $12 in others. So more than half the people of this country get no relief at a time when their costs are going up and when added costs are put upon them through the action of the government in taking away its own subsidies.

In these circumstances, we in this party feel we have no choice but to support both the amendment and the subamendment to the budget motion.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was just four weeks ago tonight that I had the honour of presenting to the house the government's financial proposals for the coming year. Since that time we have heard many speeches, most of them very good; and as usual in a budget debate they covered a wide variety of topics.

I do not propose to detain the house for more than a moment or two. In listening to those speeches—and I listened attentively to almost all of them—it seemed to me that

hon. gentlemen opposite were hard put to find any effective criticism of the budget proposals themselves. Such criticism as they made I think I shall be able to deal with when we are in the resolution stage, and rather than detain the house in the taking of the vote that is what I propose to do.

I cannot, however, allow the vote to be taken, without expressing my deep appreciation for the many generous personal references to myself which came from all sides of the house. Hon. gentlemen opposite confined their expressions of appreciation to the form rather than to the substance of what I had to say, but I attribute that fact to the natural and inevitable inclination of oppositions to show a singular lack of judgment with respect to proposals made by the government side of the house. Therefore I feel that I can take genuine satisfaction in the remarks they made with respect to myself personally as to the form. But with respect to hon. gentlemen on this side who praised the substance as well, I think they showed better judgment than hon. gentlemen opposite; and from what I have read in the press of the country, editorial comment and otherwise, I think their remarks reflect the judgment of the country as well.

However, I conclude these brief remarks by expressing my genuine appreciation of the very kind references which have been made from all sides of the house as to the manner of presentation, if not the substance.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. WYLIE: I was paired with the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke previously I made the suggestion that the parity move had been brought about by pressure put upon this government. This was denied by the then minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). We must accept his statement as an hon. member of this house, but we cannot accept—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices. It is impossible to hear what is being said by the hon. member who has the floor.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We cannot accept all that he said, in that the supposition was absurd. There are certain inescapable facts which I must bring before the house at the present time. The first question into which we must examine is this: Would the United States government have interfered—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members not to speak so loud. To hon. members who are speaking behind the curtain, I would appeal and ask them to carry on their conversations in the lobby.

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We must examine other actions of the government about that time, and it is germane to the subject to look at what the United States government did with regard to the extremely ticklish question of Palestine at the time. The United States government did interfere, and it interfered definitely and considerably, in that a statement was made last year at about the same time to the effect that, on the suggestion and request of the United States government, it was proposed that 100,000 Jews be admitted immediately into Palestine.

At that time the question of Palestine was one of the most ticklish in the entire international sphere. Therefore it is obvious that if the United States government would have interfered in that, they would have interfered in other matters. For the record I wish to quote two paragraphs from Keesing at page 8198:

> In London, where President Truman's message caused much embarrassment and irritation, a government spokesman stated that on receiving the text of the message Mr. Attlee had immediately sent a request to the President to delay the issue of the statement until Mr. Bevin could be consulted and a further telegram sent to Washington explaining the British point of view, but that President Truman had replied that he was unable to comply with Mr. Attlee's request.
> "The British government," said the spokesman, "has been working hard to bring the Jews and Arabs together. It is not correct that the discussions have been broken off. Consultations with the Jews are actually in progress at this moment. It is, in the British government's view, most unfortunate that a statement of this kind should have been made. It may well jeopardize the settlement of this difficult problem."

That is significant, because the statement of the President had been given to the British government before it was published. The British government protested that it should not be made, and the United States government went ahead and published the statement. The significant thing there is that the machinery used by Washington was to inform the British government secretly of what it proposed to do before it did it. I wish to quote one more paragraph from the same authority, at page 8198:

It was felt in London and openly admitted in America that President Truman's message had been prompted by purely internal political considerations in view of the forthcoming elections in New York state, with its important Jewish vote, and to anticipate a statement on the Palestine question by Governor Dewey on behalf of the Republican party.

I bring that up because it is important, for it shows that the United States government were prepared—that is the history of it—to interfere, and they were prepared to and, in fact, did interfere for political purposes, in the internal affairs of other states.

The second question that we must examine is this: Could the United States government have made the suggested proposition concerning parity? It is obviously impossible that the United States government could have made it now with a hostile senate, a Republican controlled house and Republican controlled senate. But at that time the Democratic party was in control of both the senate and the house, and with an election year coming up, it is quite simple to understand that the administration could have put pressure on the members of its own party in both the house and the senate to assist this legislation, on a quid pro quo basis.

I wish to mention some of the statements made by Democratic members of the United States senate with regard to the British loan. These were made prior to the beginning of July. The first quotation I wish to use is from a radio speech by Senator Johnson of Colorado, on February 16, 1946:

The British loan is not to provide relief for starving people. It is to provide relief for a decadent empire. My slogan is: Billions for the relief of starving children but not one cent of American taxpayers' money for the relief of empires.

That is a Democratic senator. The next authority I have is Senator Wheeler, who was at that time chairman of the interstate commerce committee, one of the senior committees in the whole United States senate. He had this to say in a radio speech on February 16, 1946:

If we have $4 billion more to give away, let us turn our attention to the United States, where we have some very difficult problems. We have millions of veterans coming back. They are going to make large demands upon the country. We have slums all over the United States where the money could be used profitably for the public good.

That is an important Democratic senator.

Mr. ISNOR: He changed his opinion later.

Mr. ADAMSON: He did not change. Some of them did, but Senator Wheeler did not.

Mr. ISNOR: He did.

Mr. ADAMSON: He did, eventually. I now quote Senator McFarland of Arizona. I have the quotations here, and I shall be pleased to give them to Hansard, with the date and page of the Congressional Record. Senator McFarland had this to say, at page 4586 of the Congressional Record:

What I do want to address myself to is the proposition that our government should not enter into an agreement for a tremendous loan to a foreign power except on a sound business basis, which cannot be done without first having reached some agreement and understanding with that power regarding an existing unpaid obligation. What I am contending for is simply plain common-sense business principles.

Then I quote Senator Richard B. Russell. And I may say that all these are Democratic senators and supporters of the administration. Senator Russell of Georgia had this to say, at page 4591 of the Congressional Record:

I referred, Mr. President, to the fact that future generations of Americans would be paying for the more than $40 billion of lend-lease supplied to our allies in this war. The same future generations, yet unborn, will be contributing taxes to defray the $4 billion British loan which is proposed by the pending joint resolution.

I think it is interesting to note that Senator Russell was one of those who changed their opinions and supported the resolution. Then we have Senator Johnston of South Carolina, who says this, at page 4333 of the Congressional Record:

I cannot even call this proposal a loan. It is, instead, the most munificent gift in history, and from the most heavily indebted nation in the world to a nation that will continue to be, as she always has been, unappreciative, unreliable, and totally without conscience in dealing with us.

That was a Democratic senator, a supporter of the administration. Then we come to Senator Allen J. Ellender of Louisiana, and his statement has a great deal of charm in it, which I am sure the house will appreciate. It is found at page 4187 of the Congressional Record:

So, in order to give the British the dominant position which they occupied in the past as was described by the distinguished senator from Utah, it will be necessary to keep on pouring money into London, just like pouring money into a rat hole, and expecting it to reach the rats. I simply cannot see it otherwise.

Then, of course, we get a statement from Bilbo. I would not mention Bilbo because I do not think it is important, but he opposed it, and I will just quote a line or two of what he said, as found at page 4160 of the Congressional Record:

Shall we grant this gift-loan to Britain? No, no, a thousand times no.

I have other quotations from the house of representatives which I shall not use, but there was a feeling which cannot be considered as anything but one of extreme hostility expressed by the Democratic party, with a Democratic President to a Democratic piece of legislation. These were only the people who spoke, but there were many others who opposed it. When a joint resolution was introduced into the senate, after all these condemnatory statements, the committee on banking and currency submitted the following report, and the date here is important. This is an extract from the Congressional Record, July 8, 1946, pages 8401-2, which was the beginning of the debate. Here is the Democratic party committee supporting the British loan, and it does so in these words:

The committee on banking and currency, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) to implement further the purposes of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out an agreement with the United Kingdom, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favourably thereon without amendment and recommend that the joint resolution do pass.

On the 4th of July we get condemnation from the Democratic party themselves, entirely outside the Republican party, and bitter denunciation of the bill. On July 8 we get a unanimous resolution from the Democratic committee on banking and currency, recommending that the loan do pass. What caused the change of policy?

Then we come to the next point we must observe. Was it to the advantage of Canada for the United States to pass the loan? We have just had it pointed out tonight that we lent to the United Kingdom four times as much per capita as did the United States. Had the loan not passed, we in Canada and our entire economy would have been in serious jeopardy. We are in difficulty now. We do not see our way clear. We are in great fiscal difficulties with regard to exchange. But had this three and three quarter millions of hard currency not been available, nothing we could have done would have supported the United Kingdom or allowed the United Kingdom to have even a slim chance of recovery. I do not have to say to you, Mr. Speaker, or to the house, that unless we do have recovery in the United Kingdom, this country and, in fact, the world will suffer a serious dislocation not only of trade, but of all peaceful commerce throughout the entire world. I say that with regard to the United Kingdom.

The next question we must ask ourselves is this: Was it to the advantage of the United States to have the Canadian dollar at par? I think the answer must again be yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member arguing that pressure was brought on Canada by the United States to revalue the dollar, or that the matter was discussed with the United States government? Does he argue that?

Mr. ADAMSON: No, I am glad the minister asked that. I am not disputing the minister's word, at all. He was the responsible minister at the time. A little later on, I propose to bring out a few more reasons. The reason for parity was external pressure brought on this government. The minister has said it was not, and I accept his statement. But I do not accept that suggestion on the assumption that the supposition I stated was, in his words, absurd.

Mr. ILSLEY: I repeat it. It was both absurd and naive. As a matter of fact, I debated some time before I decided which adjective I would use.

Mr. ADAMSON: All right; I am merely making my statement, and I shall leave it to the house to decide.

Let us consider our trade with South America, one part of the world in which we were in competition with the United States. We look at United States exports to Latin America for the year 1946, based on the third quarter of United States trade, and which reached the large sum of $2 billion in exports and $1,777 million in imports. With Canada the United States exports were $1,555 million and the imports were $940 million. Trade with Asia, which was largely on a credit basis, was valued at $1,250 million, with imports valued at $860 million. With England the exports are valued at $740 million and the imports at $150 million.

That trade with South America and the Canadian trade with South America had increased in many instances as much as thirty times over the pre-war figures. That was the point where Canadian trade was definitely in competition with United States trade, and the advantage that the dollar at a discount gave us was obviously of considerable value.

I have mentioned dates. The OPA lapsed on June 30; parity on July 6; the joint resolution was introduced on July 8 and passed on July 13—passed despite all adverse criticism, and with the united endorsation of the democratic committee on banking and commerce.

We are now asked to look at the government's case. First of all, I want to mention one or two things parity has done to Canada. This very day we see the stringent restrictions on ownership of United States currency, scaled down to $10. The drain on United States currency in Canada must obviously be terrific, or the government would not have taken this emergency step. When I spoke on May 14 I suggested that there were three possibilities. They could reimpose restrictions; they could put up a tariff; they could devaluate. There was no other way, once this step had been taken, of preventing the drain on our currency.

The first step has already been taken; restrictions are being reimposed. The parity move has cost the country untold hundreds of millions of dollars. The first cost was the loss of $160 million in exchange. Equities in the stock market have decreased in the order of $200 million. Risk capital has all but dried up, and the production of vitally needed monetary gold is seriously restricted.

Those are the results. Why was this move made? We are asked by the government to believe that the move was made to protect the Canadian dollar against the inflation they suspected in the United States. If you have a suspected currency and you are worried about its worth, in order to protect your own currency do you tie your currency to the one that is suspected? I think that is most extraordinary. It is the same as the case of a man who, we believe, has smallpox. We are not sure, but we think that is the ailment from which he suffers. What we are going to do is that we are going to handcuff ourselves to him, get into bed with him, eat with his knife and fork and clean our teeth with his tooth brush. Is that the way to isolate ourselves from a contagious disease? Is tying our dollar to the United States dollar likely to isolate our Canadian dollar against the contagion of expected inflation? Could there not be some other reason?

The other reason advocated by the finance department was this, that we were frightened of the impact of panic United States money on the Canadian economy. We were frightened of loose United States funds coming into Canada putting up our price structure. There was one very simple way to overcome that. That was adopted, namely the procedure of putting on export embargoes in respect of certain foodstuffs. It was done at Windsor and at other border points where Americans came over and bought Canadian foodstuffs. There was a serious meat shortage at the time, and they were restricted in the amount of meat and other foodstuffs they could export from Canada. It was a very simple thing which was done.

The second point is that theoretically they were frightened of United States panic dollars, United States currency coming into Canada and pushing up the price structure. That is inflation. But once you had secured your basic foodstuffs and your commodities, which was done, I suggest that a few hundred million dollars—if there were that much money of which the government was frightened—of United States funds coming into this country would be pretty useful to have in Canada at this time.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the reasons given by the government need further explanation. The results are becoming cumulatively more serious. The minister says those were the reasons for putting the dollar at parity. I accept his word; but I do say that the case for parity, as put forward by the government, needs more explanation than has been given thus far.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:—

1. That the tax in respect of transportation tickets or rights of transportation

(a) be removed in respect of transportation by vessel or aircraft extending outside of the northern part of the western hemisphere, except in respect of any part of such transportation that is between any port or station in Canada or the United States and any other port or station in Canada or the United States; and

(b) be extended to apply in respect of all transportation by vessel wholly within the northern part of the western hemisphere;

and that the second proviso to subsection 1 of section 32, under which section the tax is imposed, be repealed.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister give us an explanation of this change?

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of the proposed amendment to the transportation tax is to bring the competitive position of Canadian companies into line with that of United States companies. Generally speaking, the amendment will exempt foreign travel under tickets purchased in Canada. The chief effect of the change, from the point of view of the Canadian tax, is to exempt transatlantic and transpacific air travel. Previously, air tickets from Canada to the United Kingdom have been subject to tax. In future, no tax will apply on direct travel from a point in Canada to points in the United Kingdom. The tax will still be payable on tickets purchased in Canada for travel in and over the United States, just as tickets purchased in the United States for travel to points in Canada will be taxable.

Mr. FRASER: This is the only place that I can see where I can bring up the question in regard to the luxury tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid it would not be relevant to discuss luxury taxes under this resolution relating to the transportation tax.

Mr. FRASER: This is the Special War Revenue Act, is it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but this is a resolution on which will be founded a specific amendment to the war revenue act. The hon. member may have an opportunity to discuss the luxury tax on the second reading of the bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act, but under the rules of the house he cannot do so in connection with this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: Under standing order 58 (2), all discussions in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. At present we are considering clause 1, that the Special War Revenue Act be amended as indicated. It deals wholly with transportation, and I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the clause.

Mr. FRASER: Then I take it that it will be all right to bring the matter up on the second reading of the bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will be perfectly free to say anything about the luxury tax when I move the second reading of the bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. COCKERAM: Last year, during the budget debate, I brought up the question of taxation on air transportation to remote areas in Canada, and I have taken up the matter with the minister on several occasions. This is a very unfair tax on workmen working in the bush and mining districts, in that they have to pay fifteen per cent on air travel where there are no other means of communication. Take the district of Pickle Crow. The fare is $35 and the tax is approximately $6. For the same distance by rail, the tax would be seventy cents. I think it is very unfair that men working in remote areas should be called upon to pay a tax which, under normal conditions, if railways or bus lines were available, would amount to seventy cents, as against $6. I would ask the minister to consider the removal of this unjust imposition. This tax alone makes it difficult for mines operating in the Yellowknife, where the fare is $200 and there is a $30 tax, to get men into the area so that they can earn their living. It is time the tax was removed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I gave consideration to the point which my hon. friend raised, as he said, and decided that I could not recommend this year the complete exemption of this transportation tax for that type of travel, but I am advised that, under the act as it stands, by a ruling of the Department of National Revenue, unscheduled trips pay only one cent per passenger mile, which is very much less, I am told, than the fifteen per cent tax.

Mr. HOMUTH: What is meant by unscheduled trips?

Mr. ABBOTT: Where there is no regular route with a regular tariff, I am advised.

An hon. MEMBER: And no time table.

Mr. COCKERAM: In those mining districts such as Red Lake, Pickle Crow, Yellowknife and San Antonio these are scheduled trips, and therefore these men going in there to earn their living must pay a fifteen per cent tax on air transportation, which is many times what they would pay on ordinary transportation, and it makes it very hard to get men to work in those areas.

Mr. HOMUTH: I might add to what the hon. member has said. It was my privilege a year ago last winter to go into Red Lake on several occasions. At that time the Ontario government was trying to lay out the road to Red Lake, and it was difficult for them to get people into that district, difficult because once they get in there, it is hard for them to get out again owing to cost of transportation. They had to fly in and out. Now the Ontario government is building a highway in there which will make it a little easier. There is a community that, once they can get houses built, will be a city of fifteen or twenty thousand in a short time. In fact, if they had houses today Red Lake would be a city of 20,000 people. It is difficult to get labour there to develop these mines, which would bring extra revenue to the country and extra income tax. We should develop our gold resources, but people simply cannot afford to go in and out as they would like, and have their families, because there are no accommodations there for them to take their families in. In such cases some special consideration should be given them.

Mr. ABBOTT: The point has been discussed with me and the officials of the department, and a number of hon. members who are familiar with conditions in the mining districts have also brought it up. After very careful consideration, I came to the conclusion that this year I could not exempt that particular class of travel within Canada from the fifteen per cent tax which applies to all air travel, with the exception of unscheduled trips where the special rate applies.

Mr. JACKMAN: The committee is entitled to know the minister's reasons. He has the same opinion as he has held for some time, and I should like to know why, where there is no alternative means of mechanical transportation, this tax must apply. The hardships in these various regions, as has been pointed out, are rigorous, and everything should be done to encourage the development of these outlying territories, which are so rich in natural resources. Will the minister tell the committee his reasons? May I ask, further, where one can find the law that exempts unscheduled flights from the fifteen per cent tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are a variety of reasons. For one thing, it is difficult to confine the areas to which it applies.

An hon. MEMBER: Administrative reasons?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and they are important. Moreover, it is difficult to segregate luxury travel. Hunters, trappers, tourists want to go in and see these areas, and so on. On balance, I came to the conclusion that I was not justified in exempting this particular class at this time. The reasons may be good or they may be insufficient, but there were a number of reasons.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where does one find the law that exempts non-scheduled flights from the tax; or is it a departmental ruling?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the details because it is not my own department, but I am advised that the particular reason is this. These are done on charter at a named rate and not in accordance with the recognized tariff, and the department ruled that the rate which would be established by the air transportation company, with one cent per passenger mile added, would be roughly comparable with the tax of fifteen per cent imposed on the regular scheduled tariff.

Mr. JACKMAN: But the minister just said it would not. The minister said that the tax on these unscheduled flights was small and did not compare with the fifteen per cent tax, and now he tells us, on the advice of his assistants, that it is comparable. May I suggest to him that the people who use these non-scheduled flights are more likely to be in the luxury class to which he referred and which we should also encourage, although not at the cost of other less fortunate people. Hunters and fishermen are the ones who will get the non-scheduled planes more than the ordinary miners who go up to these out-of-the-way posts and develop our country. A group of these men do not hire a plane; they use the scheduled service and are subjected to a fifteen per cent tax. In other words, if there is any discrimination here at all, it is discrimination against the worker and in favour of the man who can afford to pay the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that there is one added reason for the differentiation in connection with the unscheduled trips, namely, that in a good many cases the plane will carry a good deal of freight and equipment in addition to passengers. That is taken into account in fixing the one cent rate with respect to passengers.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether the tax is paid in full and a rebate given, or whether the tax is paid at the reduced rate when the transportation is arranged for? Is it necessary to arrange for each exceptional case, or is some organization set up which deals with cases of a specified character?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that the tax is collected at the time the payment is made for the flight.

Mr. CASE: I have been handed a pamphlet by someone. It is entitled "Ways and Means Resolutions, Resolutions of April 29, 1947; Income War Tax Act."

Mr. ABBOTT: Over the page. We are on the Special War Revenue Act legislation.

Mr. CASE: I am going to discuss the title of the copy I have in my hand. I want to know if Canada is still at war. I have asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare and others. Apparently we are still at war, and I should like to know with whom. No one has ever told me. I understood there was a proclamation at the beginning of the year stating that Canada was no longer at war. But I have sought to find out and I am told that we are still at war. If we are, I want to know whether we are at war with Russia, with the United States, or with whom?

An hon. MEMBER: With the government.

Mr. CASE: If this is the Income War Tax Act, I want to know with whom we are at war?

Mr. FULTON: It is the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. CASE: It is the same thing. These people are talking about transportation into remote areas. I should like to get to my home once in a while, and that is not so remotely situated. But I want to know if Canada is still at war and, if we are, with whom we are at war. If we are not still at war, when was it determined that we are not at war? I do not know whether that is a proper question for the Minister of Finance, but no one has ever been able to tell me; and I have sent notes across the house hoping that those who favour me would advise me. We are apparently still at war with someone, but I do not know with whom.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will do my best to set my hon. friend's mind at rest. As he will see when the bill which is to be founded on the resolutions is brought in, we are removing the word "war" from the title and it will be called the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. HOMUTH: In view of the situation which the hon. member for York South and others have placed before the house, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for York South:

That the following words be added to paragraph (a) of resolution No. 1: "or areas not served by any other form of transportation than aircraft."

The CHAIRMAN: It occurs to me that this would disturb the balance of ways and means and accordingly would not be in order. I must therefore rule that the amendment would be out of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let us carry them all if that is the idea.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are these words complete and significant enough to describe what is meant, "extending outside of the northern part of the western hemisphere"? What does that embrace?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course my hon. friend appreciates that the language of the resolution is not, as a rule, as specific as the language of the statute which will be founded upon it. I am advised that in the bill which will be introduced there will be definitions which will clarify exactly what that means.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to say one thing about this Red Lake business. In these remote areas—and Red Lake is remote, being 100 miles away from a railway—you cannot get there in any other way than by air, and the rates are about twenty cents a mile. I think the return there to Kenora is $36. Men going into Red Lake have to pay four times as much per mile for transportation, and there is the hardship owing to this tax, which is $3 one way and $6 return. That is quite a considerable outlay on top of the $36 you have to pay for transportation for the round trip.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ROWE: Just before eleven o'clock, I want to urge, whether the motion is in order or not—and you have ruled it out of order, Mr. Chairman, and we accept that decision—that the minister give some consideration to the suggestion which has been made. After all, the revenue which is collected is very small in this case, and the hardships which have been mentioned are, I think, generally felt by a great many labouring men who cannot afford to pay the extra amount. I want to urge upon the Minister of Finance that he give some consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before moving that the committee rise, may I say that I will give consideration to the matter again before I bring in the bill. As I say, I do not want to hold out very much hope, but I will take into consideration the points which have been brought forward here and discuss the matter again with the officials of the department. I will consider it again before bringing in the bill. I move that the committee rise and report progress, unless you want to report this resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the committee desire to carry clause 1?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Fourth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

SUGAR

PRESENT STOCKS IN STORAGE—REPLY TO QUESTION AS TO INCREASE IN RATION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question arising out of a press statement regarding sugar stocks in storage in Canada. According to the report to which he referred, these stocks were large, and he asked me whether in view of that situation consideration was being given to increasing the ration by approximately four pounds per person, to take up the surplus. I told him at the time I thought the situation was not such as to justify an increase in the ration. The information I have found is as follows.

While it is true that there are considerable stocks of sugar in the country at the present time, this is no indication that sugar rationing could be abandoned. In fact the world sugar situation is still quite tight, and the abandoning of sugar rationing is out of the question for some time to come.

The reason for the large stocks of sugar on hand now is that we have been receiving quite heavy deliveries of Cuban sugar against our international allocation. Under this international arrangement the actual shipments to Canada are governed by a number of factors, and we take the sugar when we are able to get it, and store it for future use.

Our allocation will allow an approximate per capita consumption of about 80 pounds this year, which is nine pounds better than last year, but still ten pounds or so below the pre-war per capita consumption.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): What is the amount of sugar in storage in Canada today? According to this statement, the storage facilities are being overtaxed because of the amount on hand. The suggestion has been made that soft drink companies, bakeries and the like be given one month's supply in advance on their quota, as is done in the United States, with a view to removing the congestion in storage.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot give a figure as to the amount in storage. I have not asked for that information. However I shall look into the question as to whether storage facilities are being overtaxed. The fact remains that on balance, over the year, our allocation will not give us more than an approximate amount of 80 pounds per capita, as I said before. We take the stocks as and when we can get them.

[The Chairman.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INCOME TAX—CHECKING RETURNS OF FARMERS

Mr. MILLER:

1. Are any income tax assessors engaged in travelling around the country checking income tax returns of farmers?
2. If so, how many from each income tax division?
3. Of these, how many from each such division are (a) full time; (b) part time?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.
2. Charlottetown, 2; Saint John, 3; Montreal, 5; Ottawa, 4; Toronto, 3; Hamilton, 9; London, 1; Winnipeg, 25; Regina, 25; Saskatoon, 8; Edmonton, 21; Vancouver, 2.
3. (a) None; (b) Answered by No. 2.

In explanation of the above it is pointed out that all employees of the taxation division are full time employees but the assessors engaged in travelling around the country checking income tax returns of farmers do so only periodically.

RADIO BROADCASTING—"NATION'S BUSINESS"

Mr. FULTON:

What is the actual amount of money expended by the C.B.C. in a full year under the present arrangement for the broadcasts of the "Nation's Business" on the national and French networks, covering such items as pay of staff involved, cost of recording, proportion of charges for line service for that period of time, etc.?

Mr. McCANN: It is impossible to make any calculation of costs chargeable to this programme. No staff are employed exclusively on this programme and no accurate assessment can be made of incidental or part time employment involved.

I would suggest this question might well be asked before the committee on radio broadcasting, where officials of the C.B.C. might be able to give information on more detailed questioning.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many unemployed men as of this date are there in each of the provinces?
2. What was the total amount paid in each province for unemployment insurance during each of the months of March and April, 1947?
3. How many unemployed, eligible for insurance benefits, were registered in the months of January to April inclusive by provinces?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Records of persons registered at the national employment service of the labour department show those who are registered as seeking work and are given as an approach to the answer to the question. The figures are as of May 15, 1947. This is the latest date for which the figures are available.

CANADIANS IN RUSSIA

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon):

1. Has this government a record of Canadians, being British subjects by birth or naturalization, who having gone to Russia before or since the outbreak of war are still in that country?
2. How many are known to this government to have applied to the Soviet authorities for permission to return to Canada?
3. How many requests have been refused or not acceded to, and what are the reasons given?
4. What steps, if any, does this government propose to take in behalf of those Canadians whose requests have not been granted?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I have been supplied with an answer which contains all the information that is available here and the indication that at some considerable cost and delay further information might be obtained by having an examination made of the files of the Canadian embassy in Moscow. I am tabling the answer, and if after seeing it the hon. member who has asked the question feels that he requires further information and will so indicate we will have those files searched. The answer follows:

1. No. No record is kept of persons leaving Canada to reside in other countries.

2. From time to time there have been instances of persons resident in the Soviet Union who have applied to our embassy in Moscow for confirmation that they are Canadian citizens and for Canadian passports in order that they may obtain exit visas in order to leave that country. It would be possible to ask the Canadian embassy in Moscow to review its files and provide some approximate information concerning the number of persons who have requested the embassy to provide such services since the office was opened in 1943.

3. So far as it is known to the department, no requests have been refused or not acceded to except in the case of persons who are dual nationals of Canada and the Soviet Union and who are therefore subject to the laws of the Soviet Union so long as they are physically present in that country.

4. In view of the dual national status of the persons referred to in the answer to question No. 3, no steps would normally be taken on their behalf unless peculiar circumstances in any particular instance justify such action.

REVENUES COLLECTED ON TELEPHONE SERVICES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What has been collected by the federal government in each province for each of the last three fiscal years as taxes on telephone (a) extension services, and (b) tolls and long distance services?
2. What taxes have been collected in the various provinces (a) from private telephone companies; (b) from public authorities providing telephone service?

PUBLIC SERVICE—WAR DUTIES SUPPLEMENTS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What are the names of temporary or permanent civil servants who did not receive war duties supplements in (a) Department of Mines and Resources; (b) Department of Transport; (c) National Film Board?

2. Who recommended payment of war duties supplements?

3. What is the reason why war duties supplements were not paid to all employees in these departments?

Mr. CHEVRIER: With reference to this question, I made a statement on Monday and indicated that so far as the Department of Transport was concerned it would be very difficult to answer it. I gave the reasons therefor, and I asked whether the hon. gentleman would not allow the question to be dropped. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who was leading the opposition at the time, suggested that the question be allowed to stand. In view of the statement I have made perhaps the question could now be dropped and the hon. member can reinstate it if he wishes after he has seen my statement.

Question dropped.

ELIGIBILITY FOR CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. How many people in Canada are eligible to take out citizenship papers?

2. How many have taken out citizenship papers to date?

3. How many citizenship papers were issued at the price of $5?

4. How many at the price of $1?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Part I of the Canadian Citizenship Act defines natural-born Canadian citizens. Part II of the act deals with Canadian citizens other than natural-born and also provides for acquisition of Canadian citizenship by those qualified to apply. No statistics as to numbers who may be eligible to apply.

2. 5,370.

3. 3,016 aliens under section 10 (a) of the act.

4. 2,354 certificates in proof, under section 10 (b) and section 39 of the act.

(The answer to 4 includes certificates issued free of charge, under P.C. 502 of the 11th February, 1947, to veterans who served with the armed forces of Canada during time of war and regarding which no separate record has been kept.)

In addition to the 5,370 certificates of Canadian citizenship issued to date, there are about 6,700 pending. Among these, are about 4,050 which are declarations of intention by aliens which will not reach completion until 1948. The remainder are, in the main, applications for proof of citizenship by Canadian citizens in process of completion.

BABIES LEAVING CANADA FOR ADOPTION IN THE UNITED STATES

Mrs. STRUM:

What has been the procedure whereby Canada has granted passports to babies leaving Canada for purposes of adoption in the United States?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When a child's name is not included in the passport of its parent, an individual passport is issued to the child upon receipt of a properly executed application form "B" (for children under sixteen years of age) signed by the parent or legal guardian of the child. Proof of guardianship under provincial law is normally required. In exceptional circumstances, where such proof is not available, an application signed by a person who appears to be the legal guardian, or to have the child in lawful custody, is accepted. In all doubtful cases, the passport officer, before issuing the passport, seeks the advice of the appropriate provincial welfare authority. Passports are documents of identity which facilitate border crossings; they are not issued "for purposes of adoption".

SOCKEYE SALMON—FRASER RIVER RUN

Mr. REID:

1. Were tests made as to quality of Sockeye salmon entering the Fraser river during the 1946 salmon fishing season?

2. If so, when will the result of the tests be made available?

3. Will the report of the results be made available to members of parliament?

Mr. BRIDGES:

1. Yes.

2. It is expected they will be available not later than July 30, 1947.

3. Yes.

CANADIAN FORCES—LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. CAOUETTE:

1. During world war II, did the men killed in action have any life insurance?

2. Do their parents receive any pension?

3. If so, what are the qualifications for eligibility thereto?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. There was no dominion government insurance plan for members of the forces. Injury or disease resulting in disability or death was provided for by the Pension Act.

2. Yes, if eligible within the provisions of the Pension Act.

3. (a) The Pension Act, section 33 (1)—

A parent shall be entitled to a pension when in a dependent condition and, at the time of death of the member of the forces, wholly or to a substantial extent, maintained by him.

(b) The Pension Act, section 33 (3)—

A parent, who was not wholly or to a substantial extent maintained by a member of the forces at the time of his death and subsequently falls into a dependent condition, may be awarded a pension provided he or she is incapacitated by mental or physical infirmity from earning a livelihood and that in the opinion of the Canadian pension commission such member would wholly or to a substantial extent have maintained such parent.

(c) The Pension Act, section 33 (4) provides for an additional award when there is more than one parent.

3. Are there any sub-contractors? If so, what are their names and addresses?

4. What amount do they supply and how much have they received in payment for same during the past year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

Mr. McMASTER:

1. According to return made by sessional paper 239-A the sum of $444,949,665.18 of accelerated disbursement has been allowed to taxpayers in Canada. Would the minister give the amount included in the said sum in the different years?

2. What loss in the revenues of Canada, either by way of loss on excess profits or otherwise, was caused by allowance of the said depreciation?

3. What was the number of corporations or individuals to whom in the aggregate this accelerated depreciation was allowed?

4. What was the amount of the ten largest allowances given?

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM ALBANY RIVER—DAMAGE TO PROPERTY ON LAKE ST. LOUIS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the water of the Albany river which previously flowed into James bay been diverted by the government or any of its departments?

2. If so (a) has such action caused the water of the Albany river to flow into Lake Superior; (b) at what time and in what year did such diversion take place?

3. If not, is the dominion government aware of such work being done by the government of the province of Ontario?

4. If so, in what year did the Ontario government proceed with this work?

5. Is the dominion government aware of damage to estates bordering on Lake St. Louis, since 1940?

6. Have the riparian owners on Lake St. Louis complained of the succession of floods caused by the flood waters of this lake?

7. Has the government been informed of the Marquette drive being considerably damaged this year?

8. If so, what steps are being taken by the government to correct the situation?

UNITED NATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUSTICE RAND TO PALESTINE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Why has the government named Mr. Justice Rand, of the Supreme Court of Canada, to act on a committee appointed to investigate and report on the Palestine crisis, thus precipitating a judge of Canada's highest court into a political controversy in which Canadian opinion is sharply divided?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to my hon. friend in the first place that his question is irregular. It is put not so much for the purpose of obtaining information as for expressing views of his own, which are of very doubtful value.

May I say to my hon. friend, in answer to the first part of his question as to why Mr. Justice Rand was appointed to this very important post, that it was because we thought he was the best possible choice that could be made, and that the choice would be widely approved by the Canadian people, as it has been.

NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN ORGANIZATION AND RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare pursuant to the press report in an Ottawa newspaper of May 13, announcing the formation of the National Cancer Institute of Canada. Will the minister inform the house whether the cancer institute is now organized, and what progress is being made, especially in regard to research?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did give me notice of his question this morning, for which I thank him. As he and other hon. members know, my predecessor, who is now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), intimated in this house a year ago that in view of the fact that 80,000 Canadians had died from cancer during the war, and in view of the alarming state of that dreadful disease in this country as in others, he proposed taking steps to see whether some measure of coordination on the national level could not be given to deal with this tremendous problem.

I should like to take advantage of this occasion to pay a tribute to what my predecessor did in laying the groundwork for a conference which as Minister of National Health and Welfare I called on January 27-28 of this year, a conference to which were invited all the cancer control workers and cancer authorities in Canada to see whether some means could not be devised to provide for some coordinating authority with respect to this matter. As a result of that conference the Cancer Institute of Canada was set up. It is a non-governmental, non-profit-making body. Its purpose is to deal with this problem on a national scale, not only clinically but particularly in the field of research. I do not think at this stage there is anything further I can add except to express what I know will be the hope of this house that this institute will succeed in its great endeavours.

I should add this further word. As Minister of National Health and Welfare, at the instance of the interim committee of the institute, and as one of the trustees of the King George V cancer fund, I addressed on behalf of the institute an appeal to the trustees of the King George V cancer fund for financial assistance to enable the cancer institute to carry on for the time being. As a result of a motion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bracken), the trustees of the fund have placed at the disposal of the institute on a three-year basis the sum of $450,000 to enable the institute to carry on in the initial stages of what I trust will be a very important and fundamental work.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of recent serious developments in the dispute at the plant of Ottawa Car and Aircraft, such as the court injunction against picketing, interference of the police, and consequent disorder, will the Minister of Labour undertake to intervene again and seek the cooperation of the Ontario minister of labour to bring the employer and union together to secure a just settlement of the dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The dispute referred to does not come under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour.

FUEL

STATEMENT ON COAL AND OIL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I desire to make a short statement on the fuel situation. Hon. members will recall a recent statement of mine with regard to the fuel oil situation. It has now been brought to my attention that, throughout Canada, domestic coal consumers generally appear to be delaying making provision for their next winter's supply of coal. Several coal dealers have stated that coal stocks are piling up, and it will be impossible to handle the total tonnage requirements unless there is a constant and active movement of coal into domestic coal bins.

While the immediate situation would appear to be somewhat better in respect to United States coal than it was at this time last year, the situation in eastern and western Canada is somewhat worse. The eastern mines are about to reopen after a prolonged strike, and it is unlikely that any important amount of the coal lost during the shut-down can be recovered. In western Canada the mines are operating on a shorter work week and are already finding some difficulty in moving coal into the hands of distributors.

Last winter a combination of circumstances, particularly the bad weather, brought about a serious car shortage. This badly hampered the movement of fuel during the winter months. It is hoped that this condition will not recur, but in any event I would exhort all users of coal to exert every effort to get their supplies in during the open season.

As hon. members know, coal control was discontinued on December 31, 1946. It had been the practice during the existence of the control for the coal controller to attempt to persuade consumers to buy their coal early, and to this end he used advertising and other means. I believe this job can best be done by the coal producers and distributors now, and that the public, in its own interest, should cooperate fully to ensure that adequate supplies shall be available for next winter.

Just a word about fuel oil. I held a meeting of the principal refineries in my office this morning. I found the situation worse than I had expected. Not only will the refineries not be able to take care of new customers for fuel oil, either industrial or domestic, but it is doubtful whether they will be able to take care of the customers whom they have served in the past. The shortage is continent-wide, in fact almost world wide. The difficulty is lack of transportation, lack of refining capacity and lack of oil easily accessible to markets. Therefore I should like to warn hon. members, and through them the people of this country that plans for conversion from coal to oil should be carried out only after an assurance has been received from a reliable source that a supply of fuel oil can be furnished.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the minister whether the installation of oil burners is still continuing, and whether there is any way in which the government can limit the number of oil burners being installed?

Mr. HOWE: About a month ago I gave the house a warning of the situation and urged that no oil burners be installed unless a previous arrangement had been made with a reliable distributor for the supply of fuel oil. I am today reiterating that warning. I know that oil burners are still being manufactured, and I am afraid that some of them are being sold. All that the government can be expected to do is give the widest possible publicity to the true situation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to ask a supplementary question in regard to wartime housing. Are arrangements being made for the installation of oil burners in Wartime Housing houses?

Mr. HOWE: I shall examine the situation. To the best of my knowledge oil heaters are not being installed in Wartime Housing houses. I think that in areas where natural gas is available, that type of heating is being used; in other localities coal is being used. However, I shall confirm my impression and correct it if necessary.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Is it fair to ask him whether the indications are that with regard to oil this will be a temporary or an indefinitely prolonged situation?

Mr. HOWE: The situation I have described will definitely carry through the burning season of 1947-48; it will perhaps be as difficult during 1948-49. By that time new refining capacity now being planned can probably be brought into production and new drilling can be completed; so the industry hopes that by 1949 and 1950 the situation can be brought into equilibrium, but I should say not before.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to people buying coal and filling their bins at the present time. Has he considered asking the service clubs across Canada to help him in this situation? I believe that they could do a good piece of work in that regard.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question—

Mr. FRASER: This is no joke. To the people of my district it is serious.

Mr. HOWE: I ask them to do so now. My hon. friend will recall that having returned the distribution of coal to private enterprise, the government has no direct responsibility in the matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOWE: I think we should reasonably ask for everybody's help in this very important work. It means much to the welfare of our citizens.

Mr. FRASER: Now that the minister has asked them I believe that they will do a good job.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: Some hon. members evidently do not want the people to have coal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is there a special tax on natural gas coming from Peterborough?

Mr. FRASER: In regard to the last question, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we have not yet had it piped in from Fraser Valley.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:

1. That the tax in respect of transportation tickets or rights of transportation

(a) be removed in respect of transportation by vessel or aircraft extending outside the northern part of the western hemisphere, except in respect of any part of such trantsportation that is between any port or station in Canada or the United States and any other port or station in Canada or the United States; and

(b) be extended to apply in respect of all transportation by vessel wholly within the northern part of the western hemisphere;

and that the second proviso to subsection 1 of section 32, under which section the tax is imposed, be repealed.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: We were discussing, when the house rose last night, this resolution, the effect of which would be to relieve from transportation tax purchasers of aeroplane or ocean transport going overseas from a point in Canada. Representing as I do the population of Red Lake, which is probably the largest pocket of population in the country dependent solely upon air transportation, I want to add my voice to those that were heard last night urging the Minister of Finance to eliminate the transport tax with respect to those areas where only air transportation exists. I do not think hon. members fully appreciate the great hardship that prevails in those areas because of transportation costs where transportation is a basic necessity to the people. To go from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Red Lake one has to travel a distance of less than 100 miles, yet the single fare is $20, on which there would be a 15 per cent tax amounting to $3, which on the return fare of $36 amounts to $5.40. The fare cost is about four times that existing on the T.C.A. lines and about seven times the rate that those of us are accustomed to pay who ordinarily use rail transportation. You can see therefore what an imposition it is on the people there to have this 15 per cent added.

The minister said that he would consider these representations. They have been made to him for some time. The various mines in my district and in other parts of the country have been making representations to him, and I myself have spoken to him, to the minister of mines, the minister of transport and the minister of reconstruction on the subject. I do not want the Minister of Finance to think that this would be a difficult administrative problem.

The minister said that a change had been made with respect to non-scheduled air services, a change reducing the tax from 15 per cent to a tax of one cent per mile for non-scheduled air transportation, passengers only. I think that as the scheduled routes to the major mining areas are so well defined and well known, there would be no administrative difficulty in relieving them from this tax. All that would be necessary would be to provide in the bill that the department should have discretion and be able to make certain specific routes free from transport tax if it could be shown that the population depended entirely on air transportation.

I am sure the same situation that exists in my district exists in other parts of the country, particularly northern Quebec and the rapidly developing Yellowknife territory. Because the ticket costs are about seven times the rail cost, it means that anyone in those areas is paying the crown a tax seven times per mile what others pay in other parts of the country when using other means of mechanical transport.

It is not known to all members of the house that those of us who represent districts of this kind have a personal handicap that other members do not have, and that is that we are not provided with transportation passes to meet our electors in areas that can be reached only by air transportation. I hope that at some other stage there will be an opportunity for the house to give consideration to those of us who not only pay this tax but must, to do our duty by our electors visit these various parts of our large ridings at our own expense.

Mr. COCKERAM: Following the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I should like to table the different fares and the taxes from Edmonton to Whitehorse, Edmonton to Yellowknife, Winnipeg to Red Lake, Sioux Lookout to Pickle Lake, Winnipeg to Favourable Lake, and Whitehorse to Mayo, if there were rail transportation into the area. I have the various figures worked out between the points I have mentioned, and rather than burden the committee with them I would ask unanimous consent to place them on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. COCKERAM: The table follows:

District	Single Air Fare	Mileage	Approx. Rail Fare Based on 3c. a mile (1st)	Tax on Air Tickets	Tax on Rail Tickets
Edmonton to Whitehorse	$75.00	990	$29.70	$10.25	$4.45
Edmonton to Yellowknife	80.00	710	21.30	12.00	3.20
Winnipeg to Red Lake	22.50	175	5.25	3.37	.80
Sioux Lookout to Pickle Lake	20.00	125	3.75	3.00	.52
Winnipeg to Favourable Lake	45.00	325	9.75	6.75	1.47
Whitehorse to Mayo	60.00	190	5.70	9.00	.85

Mr. ABBOTT: After listening to the representations made by various members I said I would give further consideration to the practicability of granting a specal exemption from this tax to areas whose only effective means of transportation was by air. I have given the matter further consideration. I will not make a positive commitment at the moment. What I said last night was that before the bill was brought in I would see what could be done. I have asked the officials to work out a clause which will give this exemption but would not be subject to certain obvious abuses, which I think hon. members will appreciate. It is not free from difficulty, but I believe such a clause can be worked out, and on the assumption that it can be, it will be included in the bill. It may be necessary to come back with a supplementary resolution, but I make that statement now.

Mr. SKEY: As well as those mining areas that are served by companies, there are many individual prospectors in Canada who must charter aircraft. These men are not working for large corporations that own their own aircraft; they are independent prospectors who must charter a machine to go into the north country. I feel they should be considered at the same time. They would be going into the same kind of remote areas. I suggest that perhaps transportation taxes of this type could be credited to the individual or corporation in respect of their income tax in the same manner as charitable benefits are deducted.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Lest the minister find that the difficulties in working out the clause he has suggested are greater than he anticipates, may I make a suggestion? This is a very unusual case. It is a case that has to do with the development of the north country, which can mean so much to us. I imagine the amount of the tax involved is very small, and this might be an instance of throwing a sprat to catch a whale.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the only ground on which we can be justified in singling out this case for exemption. The circumstances are unusual. The areas are remote and there is no other effective means of transportation, and presumably, as various members have pointed out, the cost is very much higher. That is the only basis on which it can be justified.

Mr. REID: Will the minister make a statement with regard to another aspect of the situation, and that is taking off the tax on travel abroad. I understand there is quite a conflict going on behind the scenes between the T.C.A. and the revenue department in regard to the transportation that was booked by many Canadians prior to the tax coming off. Many of them feel that they have a grievance against the imposition of the tax up until the first of May. Let me give one example, which illustrates many more cases. A man books passage to Great Britain in January of this year. He happens to be in the head office the day before the tax comes off and is told by T.C.A. that the tax must be collected. That night the tax is off. He feels he is out $243. He is not travelling to the old country until some time towards the middle of June. He sent information today showing that in the United States this very question has arisen and the United States revenue department has issued instructions that all refunds have to be made to those who have booked passages on transportation outside the country but who did not have to pay for the ticket until after the tax was removed.

Mr. ABBOTT: If they have not paid, there is no question involved here.

Mr. REID: But Trans-Canada Air Lines has taken the stand that according to the act they must take the tax from the people.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not if they have not paid for their ticket.

Mr. REID: I know of a case which is just now being debated, where the demand was made that the fare be paid although the people are not leaving this country until the middle of June.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. REID: They are called upon to pay the tax. The matter should be looked into and some agreement reached between the revenue department and Trans-Canada Air Lines. I realize that there must be a deadline. All those going in to book passages after May 1 know that the tax is off, but those who inadvertently or otherwise booked passage in January, February, March or April and are not leaving the country until June or July should surely not be called upon to pay a tax as heavy as the one they have to pay. I am asking the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance to look into many of these cases, and I think they will realize the injustice which many are suffering at the present time.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have had a number of representations along the line that my hon. friend has indicated. Of course, that is a problem arising every time a tax is taken off. The man who has an inventory on which the tax has been paid does not get a refund. Neither does the man who has bought some service on which the tax is paid. In this case, if he has bought his transportation and taken it up, the tax has been paid, and we take the view that there is no refund available. If he has simply reserved his passage and has not paid for it, of course he gets his ticket afterwards. However, I will take note of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask this question: Has the government of Canada no policy with regard to bonuses, subventions and subsidies for air borne traffic for these outlying districts here set out in order to develop the great natural resources up in that country? The country was undeveloped, until those were adopted for railway and canals; and now it is aircraft. For that great hinterland up north have the government no policy now, after the war, to develop air transportation? Are they leaving it for private industry to go up there and not only find the resources and develop them, but provide transportation by air unaided by subventions? There was a bonus system of subsidies and subventions for light and power and transportation, both federally and provincially. With the rich resources up in that great country where we spent so much money during the war, surely the government of Canada must have some national policy for its development and not leave it to private people. I would ask the minister to consider that matter in the recess, if this legislation cannot be amended without a ways and means measure. Now that the war has been over for two years, I think the government should have some policy in the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not exactly in my department. As the commiteee knows, we have appropriated substantial sums of money for building mining roads into various parts of the Northwest Territories, including Yellowknife. But in so far as it lies within the provinces, that is naturally the primary responsibility of the provinces.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind hon. members that in committee we should direct our remarks to the clause under consideration. It does seem to me that the last question is not particularly in order.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I should like to add my word to what the hon. member for New Westminster has said with regard to the collection of tax on aircraft transportation overseas when the passage was not taken until after the tax was removed. I know the minister has just said that if the man did not make a deposit on his ticket he would not be subject to the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he had not bought his ticket.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But Trans-Canada Air Lines demanded that deposits be made by these people. It was a question of duress. If you wanted to get your ticket, you paid your deposit.

Mr. FRASER: It was the law at that time.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think the government is morally obligated to see that these refunds are made. I think the tax under these conditions is on absolutely indefensible ground morally, although I am not going to try to argue with the Minister of Finance on legal grounds because I concede that he is my superior there.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a question to ask, and I will first read the clause:

That the tax in respect of transportation tickets or rights of transportation

(a) be removed in respect of transportation by vessel or aircraft extending outside of the northern part of the western hemisphere,—

It is the next part that I want to ask about.

—except in respect of any part of such transportation that is between any port or station in Canada . . .

I have been trying for some time to arrange an aeroplane trip up to Hudson bay, first stopping at the Belcher islands, then going back to the east coast of the bay to Clark islands in order to make a survey of the iron resources in that bay. There is no regular aeroplane route into that country. I shall have to engage a private plane or some private company to take me up and back. Shall I have to pay the tax on that trip?

Mr. ABBOTT: That will be covered, if it is covered, by the further amendment that I may introduce. It has nothing to do, of course, with the resolution as it now stands, which relates simply to transatlantic and transpacific travel. I have undertaken to see if an appropriate amendment can be introduced to permit the exemption of tax on aeroplane travel into these remote areas, particularly mining areas, where there is no other readily-available means of transportation. As to what the exact terms of that amendment will be, I cannot yet say. However, I have given the undertaking that if it can be worked out I will introduce it. I cannot tell my hon. friend now whether it will cover the exact case which he has outlined. I would hope it might.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Will the minister also reconsider the transportation tax collection?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is purely an administrative matter. The tax is repealed as and from May 1, 1947. It is the usual rule when a tax is removed as from a certain date, that there is no refund to one who has already paid it. We do not make refunds on inventories. We do not as a rule make refunds on taxes. It is similar to the case where a man buys something at a higher price, and the price changes the next day; he has bought a little too soon. That is the general rule in the making of budget changes. It is only in the most exceptional circumstances that you depart from it, and for fairly obvious reasons. We will consider the matter further, although I would not want to hold out too much hope.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask a question with regard to draftsmanship. If the minister will look at paragraph (a) he will see that it begins by saying that the tax in respect of transportation tickets or rights of transportation "(a) be removed in respect of transportation by vessel or aircraft"; which seems to imply that the tax existed in respect to both. Then clause (b) reads: "be extended to apply in respect of all transportation by vessel". Are the words "or aircraft" left out with intent?

Mr. COCKERAM: What does that clause actually mean?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a little technical, but I am advised that in the past if you bought a one-way ticket to Europe or to Bermuda it was not taxable but if you bought a return ticket it was. Now in accordance with a similar practice adopted in the United States with respect to this tax, if I may use the figure, we intend to put a box around the northern part of the North American continent; and tickets sold from one point within that box to another point will be subject to this tax. I think it will be made a little clearer when the legislation is actually brought down. My hon. friend will appreciate that these resolutions are drawn in rather general terms and that the statute itself will be a bit more specific.

Mr. HACKETT: The northern part of the North American continent; what does that mean? North of Mexico?

Mr. ABBOTT: I answered that question last night and said there would be a definition in the statute itself when it is brought in. I have not seen the draft of the statute and I cannot give my hon. friend that definition today, but it will be specifically defined in the terms of the statute.

Mr. GREEN: Does it include Bermuda?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I am informed that it does.

Mr. HACKETT: And Mexico?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I asked the minister last evening, not out of idle curiosity, how it was that the tax on aeroplane travel was sometimes based, in the case of non-scheduled flights, on a rate of one cent a mile rather than the 15 per cent rate. I wonder if he could tell me how that came about?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not too certain that I am quite clear on that myself; it is primarily an administrative problem, but here is the situation as I understand it. It relates largely to a private chartered plane which would be taken by an individual prospector. The charge could be on a mileage basis or at a charter rate. The plane would carry both passengers and equipment, and sometimes general freight. The department did not want to charge a tax with respect to the freight; therefore this rate of one cent per passenger mile was worked out as an alternative. That may not be too clear but I am afraid it is the best I can give my hon. friend at the moment. If he would like a further explanation I would be happy to refer him to the officials of the department.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am more interested in the general principle behind this matter than in the actual tax of one cent a mile on non-scheduled flights. I find that in a number of cases we pass taxation statutes here, framing them as we think they were intended to be framed by parliament. By the time they are operated upon in the national revenue department however, they bear little resemblance to the original. I want to know just how it comes about that when we pass a law imposing a tax of 15 per cent on aeroplane travel the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance sees fit to change the basis of the tax.

Mr. LALONDE: Will the minister give me some information about this tax on passengers in chartered planes? When a plane is chartered to carry both passengers and goods, is the tax applied to both passengers and goods, or to the passengers only?

Mr. ABBOTT: Just the passengers.

Mr. HANSELL: I think it is a commendable thing, of course, when we are asked to pass anything that removes some tax and therefore I do not see how I can oppose this particular item. But personally I am opposed to any tax on railway and steamship travel, for the reason that the tax is imposed upon a service which is given. I can quite understand when the government has to obtain revenue, as it does under the system under which we are now operating, how they have to look around for sources of taxation. I can quite understand how they could reasonably tax chewing gum and lipstick and a few other things of that kind. But that is something people buy, something they have, something they use and wear out or keep as long as they wish. Here is a tax on a service which is given. People do not carry it home with them; it is a service they are compelled to have. I can understand—perhaps I would not know how to designate it—how a tax might reasonably be imposed upon pleasure travel, but you see we are so constituted that if we want to go somewhere we cannot get there without taking our bodies along with us. Therefore we need a little transportation. This is a service given to us, and we are taxed upon a very necessary service. I am opposed to that because, as the government looks for new sources of revenue, the first thing we know we are going to be taxed upon other types of services.

Mr. BURTON: Don't give them new ideas.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps when I remove my baggage to the train, or when I take a taxicab somewhere, I will find myself paying a tax. I do not suppose they would be so mean, shall I say, as to tax doctors' bills, but a doctor renders a necessary service, and the first thing we know the government is going to say, "We have taxed this service and that service; perhaps we can tax doctors' bills." All sorts of services are being taxed. I think we have to cut this thing off somewhere and cut it off as short as we can. I do not think any government has a right to tax such things as necessary services that are given.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to ask just one question before this item carries. The air transport board have licensed a number of carriers for certain routes; I am thinking of several emanating from Toronto, which are occasional carriers. During part of the season they run fairly regularly, and in the winter perhaps they do not run at all. I understand that under the regulations these carriers would be taxed at the rate of one cent per passenger mile, though they are definitely licensed to operate from certain points to certain districts. I am thinking of the service from Toronto to Muskoka and Toronto to Lake of Bays, and further north. On the other hand mining operations, such as the service from Kenora to Favourable Lake, which has a definite rate but no definite schedule, because it is a definite prescribed trip operated by Canadian Pacific Air Lines would be taxable under the 15 per cent rate, whereas the other services would be taxed only at the rate of one cent per passenger mile. I point out to the minister that in the one case the tax is extremely unfair, while in the other it has to do with what is more or less a pleasure type of travel which probably should stand the extra impost.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, if I am able to follow out what I hope I may be able to do—that is, eliminate this tax where the flight would be made to a certain area where there is no other means of transportation—that would eliminate the 15 per cent tax and the cent tax as well. It is explained that that cent tax is in lieu of the 15 per cent tax, and applies only, in addition to the matter of the unscheduled flight, to where the plane is carrying both passengers and freight. If the plane were carrying passengers, only 15 per cent would apply to the price of the flight. But it is to get away from charging this tax on the freight that this was worked out, after consultation with the air transport companies. They advised the department that that was equitable, and worked out, as closely as could be arrived at, at the 15 per cent rate on the passenger part of the load.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That the tax on syrups enumerated in customs tariff items 139 (except glucose and grape sugar) and 140 (except molasses) be reduced from two cents per pound to one cent per pound.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might give an explanation. The purpose of this amendment is to remove present anomalies in the sugar tax structure. Prior to the war, table syrups and corn syrup sold for domestic use were taxable at the same rate as granulated sugar. During war time, for price ceiling reasons, the tax on sugar was reduced from two cents a pound to one cent a pound, although the tax on table syrups and corn syrup was left at two cents a pound. The amendment at present proposed would bring the tax on syrups into line with the tax on sugar of one cent per pound. Revenue from the sugar tax in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947, was about $11,300,000.

Mr. HACKETT: This lowers the rate to one cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: This resolution involves an amendment to section 80 of the Special War Revenue Act. Under that section we deal with the tax on soft drinks. I should like to make a few submissions to the minister today in respect to that tax.

If he will remember, we had a spirited discussion last session; at that time he made some concessions to the tea and coffee drinkers.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is now considering resolution No. 2, with respect to syrups. I do not think at this time a discussion on soft drinks should be allowed. I should think when second reading of the bill is before the house the discussion might be in order; but it is not related to this resolution.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not raise any objection—and rightly so, I suggest. I submit that the resolution involves a change in section 80 of the Special War Revenue Act, because it concerns a schedule under that section. In that same schedule we find a portion of the tax on soft drinks. Furthermore this item has to do directly with the same group of taxes. The same commodity, sugar, is required for the manufacture of soft drinks. So that in two ways I say it is relevant to have the discussion now.

I submit, sir, that you are unduly zealous in raising the point at this time. Certainly if I am in order in discussing the matter on the bill, I am equally in order in discussing it on this resolution, and I submit I should not be ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I assure the hon. member I do not wish to restrict the discussion unduly. But as chairman of the committee I feel I should draw the attention of hon. members to the resolutions under discussion. I believe it is the wish of the committee so far as possible to keep the discussion relevant to the resolution under consideration. However I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might add a word. I agree with the view taken by the chairman, that my hon. friend is not strictly in order when he proposes to discuss the soft drinks tax on this resolution. He would be completely in order if he were to make a speech on second reading of the bill. I took the same stand last night in connection with the hon. member for Peterborough West.

The tax on soft drinks comes in here only because it is in the schedule referred to in section 80, along with a great many other commodities. This is a very narrow change in the act, and relates solely to bringing into line the tax on table syrup and corn syrup with the changed tax on sugar.

If we were to allow a discussion on this very interesting topic of soft drinks in the committee stage on this resolution, I believe we would have to allow the discussion to take place in detail, and to answer questions in detail in respect of all the other commodities taxed under the schedule. I submit that would be going a long way. My hon. friend will have the fullest opportunity of placing his views on the question of soft drinks before the house when the bill is introduced, one section of which will relate to this resolution. I do suggest, however, that he is out of order now.

Mr. GREEN: On the minister's own argument I am in order, because he has said I can discuss it on a section of the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I said it could be discussed on second reading.

Mr. GREEN: Or on second reading. If I can discuss it on a section of the bill, then I can discuss it here.

Mr. ABBOTT: My answer is that the hon. member cannot discuss it on a section of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: I do not want to carry my submission to the extent of having to appeal from the Chairman's ruling. I understand, sir, you have not made a ruling yet, in any event. But I submit I am in order, bearing in mind the two points I have mentioned. Certainly I am in order on the ground that sugar is required in the production of soft drinks.

Mr. ABBOTT: And a great many other things are required, too.

Mr. GREEN: This is part of the tax on sugar. Now, the minister may not like to have this subject discussed; I do not doubt that he is trying—

Mr. ABBOTT: Nonsense. I can discuss soft drinks as well as my hon. friend. I have had as many letters as he has.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps that is why he is trying to put off the discussion.

Mr. ABBOTT: My reason is that I am endeavouring to cooperate in completing the proceedings of the house, in order and within a reasonable time. If we debate all those resolutions in the schedule in respect of which sugar is a raw material, then surely the field is wide open. My hon. friend or any other member in the committee may make any speech he likes on second reading of the bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act. He can talk about soft drinks, or about the candy tax or any of the other taxes imposed under that act. But when we are trying to have passed through committee a resolution which authorizes the introduction of a bill to make certain specific amendments, then it seems to me it is out of order to throw the door wide open and to discuss any commodity tax imposed under the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act. That is what my hon. friend is suggesting.

Mr. GREEN: The minister does not want to have the session delayed by the opposition asking questions, and I can quite understand why.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that.

Mr. GREEN: We can understand why he takes that position. I would do the same thing if I were over there. But I submit that if we are to be bound down when the house is in committee, in a manner such as has been suggested by the minister, we would have imposed upon us an entirely unwarranted restriction of our rights as members of the house.

It will be noticed that the minister did not raise this point of order. He was perfectly willing to have the discussion go on. The chairman was the culprit. I suggest that I be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN: I did raise the point of order, because I try to keep discussion in committee within the bounds of the rules. It occurs to me, with considerable force, that there are about 79 other items in the schedule.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If you are going to make a ruling, Mr. Chairman, will you allow me to say one word further?

The CHAIRMAN: May I conclude my statement? I will give the hon. member opportunity to make his remarks before I give my ruling. As the minister has stated, there are eighty items in the schedule, and if we allow a discussion at this time on soft drinks there is no reason why we should not allow a discussion on any of the other seventy-nine items. But I do not think that would be the wish of the committee. After hearing everything that has been said so far I still feel that the discussion on soft drinks would not be in order at this time, but as I said, I shall be glad to hear from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, I shall not base my remarks on technical rules of order, but I think the discussion should be allowed as a matter of convenience and common sense. It is a matter in which I believe a good many members are interested. I do not think there is any chance of any of the other seventy-nine items being brought up at all. I suggest that for us to make speeches across the floor at each other on the second reading of the bill is a poor substitute for a free and easy discussion in committee where question and answer are in order. It does seem to me that as a matter of convenience as well as for the reasons given by the hon. member for Vancouver South, it would be in the interests of the committee to discuss this matter now, and that we should not be kept from discussing it by a technical rule. It is a matter of public interest and of interest to a good many members of the house.

Mr. BOUCHER: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? If you were to say it would be out of order at this time to discuss the tax on soft drinks, would it not amount to an interpretation of the rules to the effect that there could be much wider latitude for debate on second reading than on the resolution? The object of a resolution is to give notice of the introduction of a bill and to give a general outline of its purpose, but not its specific terms. But once the bill has been introduced and given second reading you have its specific terms before you. I should think that the rules of the house would govern debate more strictly on the second reading of a bill than they would on resolutions, that debate on the second reading would be more restricted. On the other hand we have the Minister of Finance saying that it would be proper to make speeches on the soft drink tax on the second reading of the bill but improper on the resolution. If we look at the logic of it I think we shall realize that the better policy and the more efficient and I believe the more expeditious would be to allow question and answer in committee on the resolution rather than having long speeches on second reading.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I make a suggestion in connection with this matter?—and I do it as one who does not intend to take part in the soft drink debate. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that members are desirous of speaking on this matter, and if some arrangement is not made as to where the discussion can take place, members will be attempting to discuss it at every possible stage. Frankly I do not see any place where the rules clearly provide that the soft drink tax can be discussed; for the budget makes no reference to it at all. I think it would be a matter of convenience and expedite the business of the house if the discussion could take place now, on the understanding that it would not constitute a precedent for permitting the discussion of other matters. I think it would be best to have the discussion now and get it over with.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have run into this business of not creating precedents before. My understanding of the rules of the house, and I must confess that my knowledge of them is not as wide as it might be, is that they are made to be followed and designed to expedite the business of the house. Standing order 58 provides that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. I do not want to cut off any debate on the soft drinks tax. I assume that a great many members want to put forward their views and urge that the tax should have been removed, so there is going to be no surprise element in this soft drinks tax debate. I am not going to be a bit surprised by it. I know everything I can say in answer to it now, and I am quite prepared to answer at the proper time, but I say that the proper time under the rules of the house is on the second reading of the Special War Revenue Act, when I shall be prepared to answer any arguments then put forward. The only question I can answer now is: Are you going to take the tax off? My answer would be no.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There has been a lot of discussion and a lot of time wasted over this. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that there is a clause of this resolution on which the discussion could take place, and that is clause 4, which deals with sales and excise taxes. Anything in connection with sales and excise taxes could be discussed under clause 4, so you might as well let the discussion proceed and get it over with.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, are we discussing a point of order or are we discussing the item?

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing a point of order, and hon. members are expressing their views on the point of order before I give my ruling.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has intimated that there could be a debate on the second reading, but what I would ask him is whether he means that there can also be a discussion when we are considering the sections of the bill in committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: There can only be a discussion of matters which are relevant to the particular sections. Unless the government sees fit to introduce an amendment there will be no amendment to the Special War Revenue Act with respect to the tax on soft drinks. Nevertheless it is perfectly open to any hon. member to express any views he may have with respect to that or any other tax covered by the bill when it is up for second reading. That is all.

Mr. GREEN: That means in effect that if you rule against me, Mr. Chairman, there can be no discussion of this soft drinks tax when the house is in committee. There can only be a discussion of it in speeches on the second reading of the bill. I submit that that is most unfair, that in effect it is gagging the house on this question.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is nonsense.

Mr. GREEN: That is the effect of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend knows better than that.

Mr. GREEN: That is the effect of it, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we should be allowed to discuss it at this time. I repeat my grounds for asking that the discussion be held now. The resolution comes under the same section of the act and under the same schedule of the act and involves a sugar tax, and sugar is the main commodity used in the manufacture of soft drinks. I therefore submit that I am in order in discussing the soft drinks tax on this resolution.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, the arguments advanced by the minister have convinced me that this is the place where the discussion can take place.

Mr. ABBOTT: Were you not convinced before?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Chairman. I had a more open mind toward the question than the minister would have had to the arguments that would have been advanced by my hon. friend respecting this tax. The minister with great frankness, unusual in ministers, has said that no matter what arguments may be advanced by those who desire this change, there is going to be no change in the soft drinks tax. In listening to the argument, I had a more open mind than that displayed by the minister. We have had this argument year after year, and invariably it started off by a general discussion of the question whether or not the section permits a discussion. Over the years I think we have found that time is saved when a discussion such as this takes place once and for all. Now that we have heard both sides, I suggest that it will not take long. We have taken more time in discussing whether or not it should have been discussed than would have been taken in discussing the subject had it been discussed. Having regard to the general feeling of the committee, I suggest, sir, that you be not too strict in the application of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN: I have been generous in allowing discussion at this time, and I have received expert advice which I appreciate. I am almost prepared to make my ruling, but perhaps I should hear the hon. member for Humboldt before doing so.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to speak on this matter because I opened up the subject last night.

The CHAIRMAN: After I hear the hon. member for Humboldt, I shall hear the hon. member for Peterborough West and make my ruling.

Mr. BURTON: What I was going to bring to your attention before you made your ruling, sir, was this. The Minister of Finance said that when the bill came up for second reading any hon. member could speak on the questions that have been raised. May I point out that when the bill is up for second reading all that any of us can do is to talk. When it comes to making any change or any impression on the minister to change the bill, may I say that I have never seen that happen in this or in any other house. On second reading you vote for the principle of the bill. If you rule against us now, sir, you put us in the position, if we do not like what is incorporated in the bill, of having to vote for it if we approve the principle of it.

As has been mentioned before, if the wishes of the Minister of Finance are followed, the question cannot be discussed at any other place. What is the purpose of the resolution stage if it does not give the minister, who is piloting the resolution through the house, the benefit of the advice that may be offered to him by hon. members representing all parts of the country? If he is not prepared to make any change in the resolution, why try to lead us to believe that we can discuss it and have any effect on it on second reading of the bill? I contend, Mr. Chairman, that our procedure is obsolete, and that we should have something to say in helping to draw up legislation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I must answer the constitutional point raised by my hon. friend. He asks why a resolution precedes a bill. It is in accordance with the old British parliamentary practice that a money bill must be preceded by a resolution. A resolution can be proposed only by a member of the government. A private member is not permitted to move an amendment to a resolution which affects the balance of ways and means. The resolution is to permit a particular tax which it is proposed to change to be discussed, not any and every tax which hon. members may feel should either be imposed or removed. That, I think, is perfectly clear to my hon. friend.

I know my hon. friend did not mean to insinuate otherwise. The purpose of introducing a resolution with respect to a particular tax, in my understanding, is not to enable hon. members to suggest any other tax that they think should be proposed which does not relate to the particular tax covered by the resolution.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. FRASER: In the remark made by the minister a few moments ago, he said that we could ask him all the questions we wished on second reading, and he would answer them.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not on second reading.

Mr. FRASER: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: If I said that I did not intend to say it.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said he would answer all the questions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I said argument.

Mr. FRASER: All right; argument and questions are the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FRASER: Pretty close to it. The minister would not have a chance to answer them.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would conclude the debate on second reading.

Mr. FRASER: The minister would not have the time to answer all the questions at once. The resolution says:

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act—

And so on. Amendments are being made, and then it goes on to provide for certain things as set forth here. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I believe that under the heading we can discuss anything at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask the minister a question and you may listen in, too. This is a resolution preceding a bill.

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the hon. member that all questions should be put to the minister through the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is honoured more in the breach than in the observance. This is a resolution preceding the amendment of a certain act. The minister said that certain things could be debated when the bill comes up for second reading. Must it not naturally follow that if this is a resolution preceding the amending of an act, on which a bill will be based, anything that can be discussed on the bill can be discussed on the resolution?

Mr. KNOWLES: And vice versa.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course; therefore anything that can be discussed on the bill surely can be discussed on the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend may be right. I have never made any pretensions of being an expert on the rules of the house. My understanding has always been, over the three or four years I have followed these matters, that when we were discussing a particular resolution we had to stick to its terms. Possibly I have been labouring under a misapprehension all this time. That has been my understanding. It seems to me it is a common-sense sort of rule if one is to expedite the business of the house. As I said before, I do not want to curtail debate or discussion on the soft drink tax or any other tax. My only suggestion is that we have the discussion if we can at the proper place. If you will make your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I shall abide by it. I suggest that the proper place for the discussion is on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before you make your ruling, sir—

The CHAIRMAN: I have had a lot of advice. I think I should be in a position to make my ruling shortly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Ruling.

Mr. McMASTER: I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver South desires to speak on the tax on sugar. In the course of his remarks on the tax on sugar, he will be led into a consideration of the sugar that is used in various ways, and he will find that it is used in soft drinks. That is the sugar he wants to speak on. He does not want to curtail his remarks to one specific use of sugar, and I do not see why he should not be permitted to make his remarks.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask a question? I suggest that this discussion could all take place under clause 4.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are not considering that clause.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Clause 4 states:

That payment of sales and excise tax be required without refund in respect of taxable goods purchased or imported . . .

And so on. There is no question in my mind that the discussion can take place on this clause. The whole gamut of it can be discussed, and you may rule as you like.

The CHAIRMAN: As chairman of the committee I am bound by the rules of the house. Some hon. member suggested that we might gag discussion. If that is the result it is on account of the rule, and it is the rule that should be changed. Let me read to the committee standing order 58 (2):

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It leaves no latitude so far as the chairman is concerned. He must see that the discussion is strictly relevant. Before I could make any ruling that would contravene the standing order I would require the unanimous consent of the committee. I take it that there is not unanimous consent at this time to a discussion of the soft drink question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Therefore I must make my ruling in accordance with the standing order. There are seventy-nine items in the schedule referred to in the present clause, and if at this time I allowed discussion on soft drinks without unanimous consent, I would have to allow discussion of the seventy-eight other items. I do not think that would be the wish of the committee. Therefore, since there is not unanimous consent at this time for the discussion of the soft drink question, I am forced to rule that discussion of the question at present is out of order.

Mr. GREEN: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I must appeal your ruling to the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I may remind the hon. member for Vancouver South that the appeal will be to the house and the Speaker will have to be recalled and take the chair. In view of that, does he wish to proceed?

Mr. GREEN: I realize only too clearly what has to be done, but we have a question to discuss, and the result of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, is that it cannot be discussed either here or in committee when the bill is brought in. We do not propose to let that go without appeal to the house, and therefore I appeal to the house.

The CHAIRMAN: The only result of my ruling is that discussion of soft drinks cannot take place under this clause. That is the only result of the ruling.

Mr. GREEN: The fact is that there can be no discussion across the floor of the house as a result of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and therefore I appeal to the house.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

The chairman of the committee of the whole ruled that discussion of the question of soft drinks could not take place under clause 2 of the resolution referring to the Special War Revenue Act on the ground that under standing order 58 (2) discussion should be strictly confined to the clause under consideration. Mr. Green appeals the ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Special War Revenue Act, section 2.

Mr. COCKERAM: This tax of one cent a pound on sugar is the tax the confectioners have to pay?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is correct.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is it a fact that chocolates and confectionery are the only foods that pay such a tax as a war tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: All foods that have sugar in them pay the tax. There has been sugar tax for some time; it has been reduced from two cents to one cent, but the tax is on sugar as such.

Mr. COCKERAM: Recently the cost of sugar was increased by one cent a pound, and is it to offset that increase that this tax is being reduced by one cent?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. ABBOTT: No; my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The tax on sugar as such was reduced one cent a pound two or three years ago. The tax of two cents a pound on these specialized syrups, which was based on sugar, was retained at two cents. This is an adjustment action, to bring the tax on these table syrups other than glucose and grape sugar into line with the tax imposed on sugar itelf. It is a related measure, as the hon. gentleman will appreciate.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the reason for the exemption of glucose?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no exemption; that is simply the definition.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there a tax on glucose and grape sugar now?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Glucose and grape sugar are already taxed at the rate of one cent a pound. That is the explanation.

Mr. MacNICOL: And this brings them all to one cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Section agreed to.

3. That the provisions relating to the imposition of the consumption or sales tax on the sale price of goods be amended to provide that where the sale price is payable in instalments, the tax will be payable pro tanto at the time of payment of the instalments whether or not there has been physical delivery of the goods.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the minister explains this matter would he say how active has been the consideration given the removal of the sales tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps the committee would like the usual brief explanation as to just what is involved in this change. The purpose of this amendment is to enable the department to continue to collect tax on instalment payments on taxable goods, regardless of whether there has been physical delivery of the goods. A recent court decision held against the departmental practice which over the years has been followed. I think the principle which has been followed is sound, and the purpose of the amendment is to provide law for continuing it. I have in my hand a long list of various commodities which are sold under these terms, coal stokers, pulverizers and so on.

Mr. FRASER: Is this not already in section 80A?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is in section 86, I am told.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the name of the case?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe it is the Dominion Engineering case; I have not the reference here. The case in question related to some paper mill machinery sold by Dominion Engineering. That was the particular set of circumstances in which the question arose; and to the surprise of the department this practice which it had been following for years, which it believed was justified under the act and which the department believed was the law, was held by the court not to come within the section. The section imposes a consumption or sales tax of eight per cent on the sale price of all goods produced or manufactured in Canada, et cetera; and then there is this proviso in section 86 (1) (a):

Provided that in the case of any contract for the sale of goods wherein it is provided that the sale price shall be paid to the manufacturer or producer by instalments as the work progresses, or under any form of conditional sales agreement, contract of hire-purchase or any form of contract whereby the property in the goods sold does not pass to the purchaser thereof until a future date, notwithstanding partial payment by instalments, the said tax shall be payable pro tanto at the time each of such instalments falls due and becomes payable in accordance with the terms of the contract, and all such transactions shall for the purposes of this section, be regarded as sales and deliveries.

I do not remember the reasoning in the case, but apparently it was held that where there was not actual delivery, though there were payments of instalments, we could not charge the sales tax.

Mr. McMASTER: Read the next clause. I think that is the answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: The next clause reads:

Provided further that in any case where there is no physical delivery of the goods by the manufacturer or producer, the said tax shall be payable when the property in the said goods passes to the purchaser thereof.

Mr. McMASTER: If it never passes you never get it.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. WRIGHT: Does this clause apply to the luxury tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: It has nothing to do with that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the minister would answer the question I asked in the beginning.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, consideration was given to all the taxes, including the so-called luxury tax and the sales tax. But as I said in my budget speech, I came to the conclusion that such tax relief as I felt could be given this year should be concentrated on the personal income tax, and that therefore it was not possible to make a reduction in the sales tax. As my hon. friend appreciates, a reduction of even one or two per cent in the sales tax would run into a substantial sum of money. That is the sort of thing one would have to consider, if he were reducing the sales tax. To put it briefly, I felt I could not justify a reduction in both taxes this year, and therefore decided against it.

Mr. KNOWLES: It has been said that our efforts to persuade the government to change any items in the budget do not get very far. As a matter of fact, they do, over the years. We do find from year to year that points for which we have argued in the past have been given a little more consideration by the government than seemed indicated at the time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After public opinion has been created.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right. I can give my hon. friend examples—and may do so before the debate is over, but shall not take the time just now. In view of the slight progress we make, I rise to register the strongest objection I can to the continuance of so large a proportion of our federal revenue being collected by means of a sales tax, which bears no relationship whatever to the ability of our people to pay. This is not a sound principle of taxation. It means that those in the lower income brackets, brackets so low that they are not paying any taxes at all under the heading of income tax, are paying huge sums of taxation in this indirect form.

I urge that the minister give further consideration to this matter. I still hope that something may be done about it this year. If not, then at the next session let us have a repeal of the sales tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice that resolution 3 is confined wholly to cases where the sales tax is payable in instalments. Is it clear that this point cannot arise where the sales price is not payable in instalments?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, the law is perfectly clear, where it is not payable in instalments. As I said, legislation is being introduced because of the court's decision in the Dominion Engineering case.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My point was as to whether in a case where payments were not made by instalments, but where there was non-delivery of goods, the same point might arise.

Mr. ABBOTT: The point will be made clear when the hon. member sees the proposed amendment to the law. This is intended to cover those cases where, although delivery may not have been made, if the contract is there and the price is being paid, a proportion of the amount of sales tax goes with each instalment.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That payment of sales and excise taxes be required without refund in respect of taxable goods purchased or imported for commercial or mercantile purposes by provincial governments or agents or servants thereof.

Mr. KNOWLES: What does this mean?

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of this amendment is to remove what I think is an unintended exemption in the present law. The law at present does not impose sales or excise taxes on purchases by provincial governments unless the goods are for resale. The tax does apply, however, in respect of goods purchased by provincial railways, commissions, boards or public utilities. There are certain provincially owned commercial undertakings which, on the basis of the above principles, should bear tax but at present escape tax. The purpose of the amendment is to remove the existing anomalies in the law and to treat purchases by or on behalf of provincially owned industrial or commercial enterprises taxable.

Mr. BROOKS: Does this mean that provincial governments which buy road machinery through an outside agent place the agent in a position where he would be exempt from the sales tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: He would be exempt in that case. But a provincial government through its hydro electric power commission, for example, purchasing equipment for development of electricity, would be subject to tax. It is looked on as a commercial venture of the provincial government.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there a distinction made between machinery used for the development of electricity, taking the example the minister gave, and that which is purchased for resale to a consumer?

Mr. ABBOTT: That, I understand, is exempt. Production machinery would be exempt. But if a public utility—as, indeed, a great many of them do—were to carry on business in a retail store selling refrigerators and things of that kind, then those would be subject to sales tax, the same as they would be in any other concern.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the position with respect to corporations formed by the dominion government?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: They pay sales tax, and always have.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hydro electric power commission of Ontario, or of any other province, were to purchase equipment for the production of electricity—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is exempt from sales tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: If it is for the production of power?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. JAENICKE: I presume the provinces pay the tax in the first place do they; and then there is a refund?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. A provincial government which is carrying on a commercial or industrial enterprise so far as sales tax is concerned is treated exactly the same as any other individual or corporation carrying on a like business. Purchases by a province for purely provincial purposes such as stationery for the parliament buildings or government offices, would be exempt from sales tax, and always has been.

But, as I say, if they are carrying on a public utilities business, and are selling electric ranges or electrical equipment, then those transactions are subject to tax in the same way as their commercial competitors would be subject to the same tax.

Mr. JAENICKE: But do they pay it in the first place, and then apply for a refund?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told they do not, in practice.

Mr. STEPHENSON: What about motor vehicles bought by provinces; would they be subject to tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not if they are for their own use. If they are buying motor vehicles for use of provincial officials, they are exempt.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to read section 105(2) which states:

A refund of the amount of taxes paid under Parts X, XI, XII and XIII, of this act may be granted to a manufacturer, producer, wholesaler, jobber or other dealer on goods sold to His Majesty in the right of the government of any province of Canada, if the said goods are purchased by His Majesty, for any purpose other than purposes of resale or for the use of any railway, commission, board or public utility—

And so on. Does that mean that if it is for use of a railway or commission it should not be taxable?

Mr. HACKETT: A railway, commission, board or public utility.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not understand the use of the word "or". Does it mean when the purchase is made by His Majesty for any purpose other than the purpose of sale, or for use? I understood the minister to say it would not be taxable if it was taken for their own use.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told the short answer is that if a province buys for its own use, it is not taxable. If it buys for any of the purposes set forth in section 105, then it is taxable.

Mr. McMASTER: But if it is bought for the use of a commission it is not taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is taxable, yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it proposed to make any revision in the whole matter of sales and excise taxes? I note various items in the schedule. My hon. friend has mentioned the tax on soft drinks and on chocolate bars, and I understand the minister says he is going to do nothing about it. The poor children, of course, will not have any relief from that. It seems a pity. And not only the children, but a good many adults buy chocolate bars and pop.

It seems to me that the whole schedule should be revamped. Anyone who says that all toilet articles, for instance, are luxuries, is crazy; or all things for the use and care of the human body—and that includes the hair. I did not take enough care of mine.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps you took too much.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And surely no one would say that shaving soaps or antiseptics are luxuries. They are charged 25 per cent. A refrigerator is taxable; an ice-box is not. A vacuum cleaner is taxable; a carpet sweeper is not. An electric range is taxable; a coal range is not. Here is another question—

The CHAIRMAN: Might I remind the hon. member that the clause we are discussing relates to purchases by provincial governments.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Purchased for resale.

The CHAIRMAN: It relates to sales tax and excise tax on goods purchased by provincial governments.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They buy these things.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member is referring to hair tonic purchased by provincial governments he would be in order.

Mr. GRAYDON: They have as much need of it as we have.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I shall not talk about buying hair tonic for myself any more than you would, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman has bought enough of it himself.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think the government should have taken into consideration the revision of this whole schedule. Most of it is crazy. A lot of these things in the schedule are not luxuries. Flatware, for instance, is not a luxury, although sterling silver might be. There is not only a luxury tax but on top of that a sales tax as well, so that by the time you have bought an article costing $3 and paid all the taxes on it you have paid about $5.30 for something worth $3. That is ridiculous. I ask the government to take into consideration the revision of this whole schedule and also that the retailer be not compelled to show the tax that goes on because that is a great detriment to sales.

Mr. McMASTER: It is really not a luxury tax at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to make clear that it is not called a luxury tax in the act. It has never been referred to by my predecessor or by myself as a luxury tax. It is a tax on certain specific articles. Some of the articles mentioned by the hon. member for St. Paul's, such as electric ranges, and so on, have been removed from the list.

On the general question of excise and sales tax, I can only repeat what I said a little earlier in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that I could not undertake a revision of the sales tax and excise tax structure this year at the same time that I was proposing substantial reductions in the personal income tax. You cannot have it all ways. For reasons which I elaborated in my budget speech I could not recommend reductions in this tax and at the same time recommend reductions in the personal income tax. I know perfectly well the line of attack which would have been taken by my hon. friends opposite, in the Conservative party at any rate, if I had made substantial reductions in the excise and sales taxes and not made substantial reductions in the personal income tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: You do not take your lead from them, do you?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: He might go farther and fare worse.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are other things that enter into this, such as oil paintings, oriental rugs and many other items which could have been taken into consideration and which would have helped to make up the revenue lost by a reduction in the excise tax.

Mr. MERRITT: I have here the budget speech of the present Minister of Justice when he was finance minister in 1942 and imposed this tax which the minister has just said is not called a luxury tax. The Minister of Finance in 1942 said at page 3588 of Hansard:

I come now to indirect taxes. I would remind the house that, in the three previous war budgets, we have made a highly selective approach to indirect taxes. We have attempted to collect revenues on specific expenditures rather than on all expenditures.

And further down in the same paragraph:

I propose to follow again, therefore, a selective approach and recommend substantial increases in taxes which fall on luxury expenditures.

Then by the budget resolutions of that year all these nuisance and so-called luxury taxes were imposed. The next words I commend to the minister:

It is hoped that these taxes will discourage such expenditure. To the extent that they do, current savings will be increased. To the extent that such expenditures persist, the treasury will benefit from the revenue.

That was an understandable attitude in war time. The question I wish to ask the minister is this: Does he still hope that these taxes which the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Vancouver South have mentioned will discourage expenditure by the people on these items?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not necessarily. That was a general statement my predecessor was making. I would hope that it would be possible to remove this tax as soon as it can be done. But that was a general statement applying to a wide field of taxes. Obviously, some articles are less necessary, if I may put it in that way, than others. A short answer to the general proposition is that I felt I could not disturb that tax structure in this budget, because a very large number of goods with equal claims comes within that category, and you cannot pick out a particular article and say that the tax should come off that and not off another article.

Mr. MERRITT: May I correct the minister on that. It was clearly stated when the taxes were imposed that no general approach was being made to the problem. It was specifically stated to be a selective approach, certain individual items being picked out, and the then minister of finance said he hoped that these taxes would have the specific effect of reducing public expenditures on these items and thereby reducing their sales. There was no question of a general approach at all. Has the experience of the minister and his predecessor been that the hopes of the then minister of finance were fulfilled and that these taxes reduced public consumption of these specific articles? If they did, is the minister happy to contemplate that in peace time these special taxes imposed in war time should continue to have that effect on the people who produce and consume these commodities? That of course, is the objection taken by hon. members on this side to these particular taxes which were imposed during the war, in that they were put on, generally not for the raising of revenue, but specifically to drive out of production and consumption goods which were not considered necessary in war time. The minister said that he could not reduce these indirect taxes when he was reducing the income tax. By saying that, he is passing over the point that these taxes were specifically put on to be discriminatory among indirect taxes. I should like to have the minister comment.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only in part; they were put on, in addition, to obtain revenue, of course, as all taxes are. They have produced and are continuing to produce substantial revenue. As to whether they accomplished the particular object to which my hon. friend has referred, it is very hard to say. The cosmetics tax was referred to by the hon. member for St. Paul's. It was on a long time before the war; the rate was moved up a bit, but I do not know whether we need to stimulate the production or sale of these particular products as yet. Then, as to electrical equipment, stoves and that sort of thing, they were affected shortly afterwards by direct controls on production which simply did not make the material available for that class of goods. My reason for not taking them off this year, I say frankly to the committee, is based purely on revenue considerations.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that he does not think this tax affects the sale. I have definite proof—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. FRASER: I have definite proof that this luxury tax, as it has been called, has affected the sale of such necessary articles as alarm clocks, non-jewel watches, knives, forks and spoons that are plated. The drop in the sale of these articles has affected the livelihood of over two thousand industrial workers in Canada. It affects the lives of 625 in my own riding. There are 533 affected in one plant in Toronto, 175 in another plant in that city, 375 at Niagara Falls and over 300 in Hamilton. There is also a plant in Quebec manufacturing these articles, and there are similar plants in other provinces. The luxury tax on flatware, plated knives, forks and spoons applies when these articles are sold to hospitals, but the sales tax is eliminated. In the present circumstances I feel that the removal of this tax on necessary articles, such as knives, forks and spoons, not hollow ware or sterling ware, but on alarm clocks and cheap non-jewel watches, would bring more revenue to the government than the luxury tax does at the present time. There is no doubt that, because of the tax, the sale of these articles across Canada has dropped. Only about twenty per cent of the articles are sold in jewellery stores; over eighty per cent of the articles are sold to railways, hotels, hospitals; they are sold in hardware stores, drygoods stores, and general stores across the country. They are also sold in the five and ten cent stores. There is no doubt that an increased production in the country together with the extra work that the men and women would be doing if the tax were removed would bring in more money to the government, and I do hope that the minister will still change his mind with regard to these necessaries and do away with the tax. It is absolutely necessary that these people continue to work. Their work has dropped off in the last few months. People will not buy the articles. If you buy a knife, fork and spoon and the cost comes to a dollar you have to pay another 25-cent tax. I do not think that is right. On these articles alone the minister should drop the tax.

The CHAIRMAN: I wonder whether the committee would not revert to consideration of the clause under discussion. We have been discussing sales and excise taxes generally. The clause under discussion is No. 4. The principle there is whether or not it is advisable that provincial governments should pay sales and excise tax.

Mr. FRASER: Before we revert to that clause, will the minister say something in answer to my remarks?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Perhaps I might tell my hon. friend that I have given a great deal of consideration to the points which he has raised, and I will give some further consideration to them. As to the falling off in sales, it is a little difficult to arrive at what the real cause may be. It has been my experience, and I have been told by others that for some considerable time before a budget was brought down, where there was a prospect of some change in these commodity taxes, there was a pronounced falling off in sales. I think we shall find that the curve will go up now that it is known there is not to be this change. That undoubtedly has some effect on the purchase of these articles.

I will consider my hon. friend's representations, but I cannot hold out any real hope that I can start a revision of the sales and excise tax structure this year.

Mr. FRASER: On this same point, the minister has mentioned the sales. I have received letters and I have had travellers tell me that they have gone into drygoods stores, hardware stores and general stores, and as soon as they say they want to sell these articles they are told by the owners of the stores that they do not want them because they have a tax on them. They say that they do not want to have anything to do with articles that have a tax on them because it is a nuisance to have to make out so many forms. The retailer does not want to sell an article with a tax on it.

Mr. McMASTER: I presume there was a reason for this resolution. I presume some provincial authority objected.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not necessarily.

Mr. McMASTER: I happened to notice the peculiar language of section 104:

The taxes imposed by parts X, XI, XII, and XIII of this act shall apply to goods imported by—

I emphasize the word "imported." It does not say "purchased."

That seems to be the only section under which the provincial authority can be taxed, because the word "person" as defined by section 2 of the act does not say anything about the crown. If the object is to tax provincial railways or provincial commissions in the purchase of certain articles, on what basis do you tax these provincial boards and commissions other than under section 104?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the amendment will apply to section 104 as well as to section 105. If my hon. friend waits until he sees the bill he will find that the point he has raised is covered.

Mr. McMASTER: I want to keep the minister straight because I find it very hard to convince him after we get the bill before us.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think my hon. friend will find that it covers the case.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I apologize for again appearing as an amateur grammarian, and still more as questioning the minister who is a real lawyer because I am only a reformed lawyer of many years ago. I want to raise this question. Under section 105, subsection 2, I understood the minister to say that he construed that section to mean that a railway board or commission pays a tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I invite his attention to the wording, because I submit that is not what it says?

Mr. ABBOTT: We have been collecting it in the department for some time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Probably you might like to collect it legally.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the minister to follow me as I read the section, leaving out the irrelevant parts? It states that a refund of the amount of the tax may be granted to a manufacturer, and so on, and then we go down to the third line, "if the said goods are purchased by His Majesty for any purpose other than the purpose of resale or for the use of any railway commission", and so on. I suggest that the "or" puts the following words "for the use of any railway commission", and so on, in the same position as the other words "for any purpose other than the purpose of resale". That says that they do not pay the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: The interpretation argument, as I have had occasion to say before, is purely assertive, and I can only say that I do not agree with my hon. friend's interpretation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not asking the minister to pronounce upon it now. I am asking him to look at it when they are revising it, because I know one or two people, who, I believe, are compos mentis, who agree with me.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not been over the text of the bills and have not considered these sections very carefully, because the administration does not fall under my department. I make no pretensions to be an expert in the sales tax, though I know something about some of the other taxing statutes. I will take a note of my hon. friend's view as to how this should be interpreted and, when revising sections 104 and 105, will try to make it perfectly clear.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

5. That payment of excise tax be required in respect of any performance, exhibition or contest that includes professional performers, horse races or motion pictures when held, staged or operated by the institutions, boards or other organizations mentioned in subsection 2 of section 122 of the said act.

Mr. ABBOTT: With the permission of the committee I should like to drop this clause, and I will give the reason. The section now provides for the exemption of charitable organizations and for the exercise of discretion by the minister with respect to others. We had proposed to insert an amendment to try to prevent what we felt to be certain abuses of this exemption for charitable purposes, and there is no doubt that there are certain abuses. I do not need to go into the details of them. However, on further consideration of the question my colleague the Minister of National Revenue and I came to the conclusion that, in order to do this, we would have to give such wide discretionary power to the minister that the discretion was one which, in his opinion, he should not have to exercise. It was felt that it might well result in a great deal of unfairness, and under the circumstances we concluded that we would prefer to allow the law to stand as it is and use its provisions as far as possible to check such abuses as continue. We could not devise an amendment which we felt would not in some cases do an injustice to organizations which have been enjoying this exemption and which might not have the advantage of it in the future. Therefore with the permission of the committee, I would ask that the resolution be dropped.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad that the minister has dropped it, because I have had letters from a number of veterans' organizations and others.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had many representations myself.

Resolution dropped.

Resolutions 6 and 7 agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide:

1. That a tax shall not be imposed under the said act on profits earned after December 31, 1947.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think the clause should carry. I would agree that the present taxation structure with regard to corporations, in its twofold aspect, is not an ideal one at all. There should be a complete overhauling of the whole basis of our taxing of corporations and it should be put on a graduated scale. We are not going to get anything like that out of the minister this time, and in view of some of the changes that have already been made, raising the level at which excess profits taxation applies, I feel that it is too soon to drop the provisions of the Excess Profits Tax Act. I think the minister should do, with regard to clause 1, what he did with the other clause a few moments ago—ask permission to drop it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot do that. I do not propose to go into the matter now, but I have given reasons why this tax should not be continued. It was never intended to be permanent. It is already dropped in the United States and the United Kingdom, for the reasons I gave the house in the budget. It should be continued until the end of this year. There are differences of opinion as to that.

Mr. HACKETT: I compromise for the first of July.

Mr. ABBOTT: I realize that my hon. friend would like to see it continued, but I am not prepared to take his view.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to point out to the minister what does happen by the continuance of this tax, not that I have any hope of having it changed or even the time of its decease altered at this particular stage of the proceedings, but it does affect industry in this country, particularly branch plants of United States industries located here, and now that the excess profits tax is entirely done away with in the United States, while we retain it this year, it may very well mean that we shall be in a much more severe depression than the United States, should hard times come upon us at the end of this year or next year. The reason for my saying that is this. If a United States company has a plant in Canada, as hundreds of United States companies have, making up tremendous United States investment of capital in Canada, we shall find that in regard to the export business the United States plant will do its exporting from the United States side and not from the Canadian. Yet that was the purpose for which the Canadian plant was originally designed, so that the plant in Canada could take advantage of certain markets. But as the tax rates in the two countries now stand, the United States plant doing the export business from its own factory will be allowed to retain all its profits except thirty-eight per cent, which is the maximum tax on profits, or, in other words, sixty-two per cent. Should the United States concern give consideration to manufacturing for export through its Canadian plant, it will be faced with not only a thirty per cent federal corporation tax, but the additional seven per cent provincial tax; and if its business is at all in any volume related to the 1936-39 ancient history volume, it will be subject to a tax of fifty-two per cent altogether, which, as compared with the United States tax of 38 per cent, clearly indicates to any manufacturer where his business will be done. It will be done in the United States plant by United States workmen and United States materials instead of in the Canadian plant by Canadian workmen using Canadian materials, produced by Canadian workmen. It is a bad thing for Canada to have this tax retained, not from the point of view of the corporation itself but from the point of view of our general economy, and should hard times come upon us within the next six or twelve months, this will be one of the reasons why we have those hard times.

Mr. McMASTER: Like all other taxes, this should be kept secret until the day it is announced to the house, because otherwise people will take advantage of the knowledge. Yet here is a tax which it is announced ahead of time will expire at the end of the year and not now. We all remember what happened last year when charges were made throughout Canada and no one was in a position to refute them. The government did not take any means of finding out, or if they did, they did not let us know, that the manufacturers and wholesalers were wilfully holding back production so as to take advantage of the situation. The government are making the same mistake now. I suggest that they should either abolish the tax now or not announce the date on which it will be abolished. We are saying to the manufacturers, "Hold on, and after the first of January there will be no excess profits tax". Human nature is such that they are bound to take advantage of the situation. If the government desire to have manufacturing curtailed, this is a good way of achieving that end, and if they so announce and say that is their intention, I am satisfied.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say that I think my hon. friend's objection is a bit more apparent than real. I may be wrong, but if nothing had been said about the excess profits tax in this budget I think most concerns would have taken it for granted that it would not apply in 1948. So, while there may be some inventory question involved, I do not think it is too serious.

Mr. HACKETT: I always fear that the minister may accept my suggestions, and feel guilty afterwards. But here is one I am going to make to him which I hope he will consider very carefully. As I said a few days ago, I think "excess profits tax" is an unhappy name, a misnomer, and conveys the impression of unfairness and exploitation which should not find expression in a sober tax act. I was willing to compromise with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and suggest that the tax be abolished at the end of next month. But if that does not meet with the approval of the government I am going to ask that they take into serious consideration a change in the name and call it a special tax on profits or something like that, rather than excess profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: Excess tax on profits is the proper name.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not know whether it need be "excess tax on profits." It is a special tax on profits. I think the wording "excess profits tax" is an unfortunate one and has implications that one should not labour under.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend on that point. It is, of course, the difference between "excess" and "excessive". But in the public mind I think excess profits have come to be considered as being excessive profits, when such is not the case. However, with all due respect, I think it is a little late in the day to make any change in the name now. It was called "excess profits tax" in other jurisdictions, and it is a tax which is going to disappear. I think it is perhaps a little late to do anything about it now, even if one should have done it in the first place.

Mr. MacINNIS: I, too, was going to make a suggestion to the minister, but was afraid he would not accept it, if I may judge from past experience. The minister is not inclined to pay much attention to what he hears from this corner of the house. I am afraid he has been listening too attentively to hon. gentlemen on my right since the session began.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not paid much attention.

Mr. MacINNIS: I deplore the poor opinion of Canadian manufacturers held by the hon. member for High Park. Personally, I do not think they are as bad as he makes out. I think they are more patriotic than he has indicated and would not let Canada down in the way he suggests just for a few measly dollars. I hope that he will not allow that impression to get any farther.

Mr. GRAYDON: The manufacturers have a new champion.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. I am sure the manufacturers will appreciate it. I disagree with the hon. member for Rosedale in his contention that, because taxes are lower in the United States, they will take business from our industrialists, which is to result in a depression. I think everyone agrees that when depression comes it will come in the United States sooner than it will come here, because up to now in the United States there has been less control of profits and less control of business than in Canada. Business is running wild and rushing to a crash. There is no doubt about that. It is expected by everybody, and it is just a question of how soon it will come. It would be hard for Canada to maintain stability if an economic crash occurred in the United States, although we might lighten the effect of such crash. But if the government of Canada wants stability, it must take the most rigorous steps to ration or even out the fruits of industry in this dominion. If too much goes to one section, and if that section cannot make proper use of it, we shall be in difficulty. Those in that section are likely to come to the point where the proper use of such fruits will only be for reinvestment, as far as they are concerned. If they cannot reinvest, and there is no likelihood that they can do so except for a short period of time, we are bound for a crash. What the minister should aim at in his fiscal and tax policy is that the proceeds of industry are spread out as evenly as possible in order to keep industry functioning without booms or depressions.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That no taxpayer shall be entitled to make application for determination of his standard profits on or after August 1, 1947.

Mr. FLEMING: It will be observed that this clause appears to be general in its application, provided that no taxpayer shall be entitled to make application for determination of his standard profits on or after August 1, 1947. In other words, July 31 is to be fixed as the deadline for the making of application for determination of standard profits, regardless of the ground on which the application is based. The committee will have in mind that the statute provides different bases for making such application. There is the case of the taxpayer who belongs to a depressed class of industry or business. There is the case of the taxpayer who himself has suffered by depressed business, even though he does not belong to a depressed class. Then there is the case of the taxpayer who qualifies as a new business for certain purposes, either because he is a new business starting up, or because of a change in capital or because of reclassification. The present resolution, if one is to confine oneself to its terms, appears to make a blanket application of this new deadline of July 31 to all these cases. So far as the depressed industry or the depressed class is concerned, I do not think anyone will seriously contend that there has not been, or will not have been by July 31, ample time for the making of application in any case where application is warranted. But that does not at all apply to the other class of case where the reference is to companies which qualify as new businesses, either because of capital increase or recent reclassification. I suggest to the minister that the latter class to which I have referred should be excepted from the application of this new deadline of July 31; or, if that will complicate matters unduly or raise administrative problems, the simpler way might be to defer the application of the deadline until December 31 of this year when the imposition of the tax itself comes to an end. I happen to have knowledge of cases where hardship is likely to result if indiscriminate application is made of this deadline so as to make it apply to taxpayers in the class of new business. Real hardship may result because the time is not sufficient, as I am told by those who are dealing with these cases, for many of these people to put their SP-1 applications in proper form, and file them. I have made alternative suggestions to the minister, based upon what I am told are substantial grounds of justice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a perfectly open mind on the question of this date. When this matter was being discussed with the deputy minister of taxation he felt some deadline should be fixed within which applications for the fixing of standard profits should be filed. I am informed that there is something in the order of 1,500 applications still waiting to be dealt with by the board of referees, and the department are extremely anxious to know as soon as possible just how much work there is to be handled. Since notice of this resolution was given, we have had some representations that the period was apt to be a bit short. I should like to discuss the matter with the deputy minister of taxation, who is not here at the moment, and I can say to the committee that we will do whatever is felt to be reasonable. Perhaps December 31 might be a bit too far ahead; I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a deputy minister of taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; he is still very much there. As I say, personally I think most of the applications could be put in, even if only in temporary form and subject to amendment, by August 1; but if that period is a bit too short we could extend it, and I do not think it would require any amendment of this resolution. I will give that question consideration before putting a date in the bill. Perhaps we might say—I am just thinking out loud—August 1 or September 1, or such later date as may be determined by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. JACKMAN: How long will it take to dispose of the 1,500 cases?

Mr. ABBOTT: At the present rate of progress it will take the board about a year to clean up the 1,500 cases which have already been filed.

Mr. FLEMING: May I offer just one or two comments on the minister's statement, for which I thank him. In the first place, I think this idea of leaving some discretion in the determination of the deadline in the hands of the minister is not the best way to handle the situation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree.

Mr. FLEMING: I think it is agreed that the public who are to be affected should have knowledge of the date; and unless the date fixed is of general application and wide publicity is given to it I believe many might be misled by any such provision as the minister has suggested. I also took the minister to suggest the possibility of filing a pro forma return, as is sometimes done with ordinary income tax returns, just in order to comply with the deadline fixed by the act, with the thought that the details could be supplied later and perhaps the return amended to comply with those details. But I should like to leave with the minister the thought that you cannot file a pro forma return, in reference to one of these SP-1 applications, that will be any good at all. It may be that in some cases pro forma returns have been accepted, but I should be very much surprised if they would be of any use to the department, or if they are the kind of return that should be encouraged. I urge upon the minister that a much better way is to fix a later deadline of general application, certainly in case of those taxpayers who are applying under the new business section.

Mr. ABBOTT: My information is that there are very few applications still to come in. They were coming in at a very rapid rate up to two or three weeks ago, but relatively few now remain to be filed. From the point of view of administration, and so that the board of referees may know how much work they have to do, it is desirable to fix a deadline somewhere. If August 1 is too soon we should make the date a little farther away; but in the interests of getting the job done

I think we should make that date as early as it is reasonable to ask taxpayers to get their data together and file their applications.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister another class of case which seems to call for an extension of time. I refer to those small limited companies having profits of $15,000 or less in one year, in which case I understand they do not come under the Excess Profits Tax Act. Many of these companies have not had their final returns verified by the Department of National Revenue, and are going along with the thought that their returns are quite satisfactory. Should they find their returns increased to $20,000 or $25,000 instead of $15,000, they might find themselves in the position that they would like to apply for a ruling under the act.

An hon. MEMBER: This is all very interesting.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am glad it is; I am trying to make it so. In that case it is not the fault of the company but of the department, owing to the tremendous amount of work that has to be done. So I would ask the minister to consider that there are cases of this kind which might require an extension of time.

Resolution agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I call the Income War Tax Act?

Mr. ABBOTT: We will take that up at eight o'clock tonight.

The CHAIRMAN: Then it is agreed that when we resume at eight o'clock tonight the committee will consider the resolutions under the Income War Tax Act.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That, effective on and after July 1, 1947, payroll deductiones for taxes be reduced to conform with the following schedule of graduated rates of tax:—

On the first $100 of income or any portion thereof, 10 per cent per annum; or $10 upon the income of $100; and 12 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100 and does not exceed $200; or $22 upon the income of $200; and 14 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $200 and does not exceed $300; or $36 upon the income of $300; and 16 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $300 and does not exceed $400; or $52 upon the income of $400; and 18 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $400 and does not exceed $500; or $70 upon the income of $500; and 20 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $500 and does not exceed $3,500; or $670 upon the income of $3,500; and 22 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $3,500 and does not exceed $5,000; or $1,000 upon the income of $5,000; and 26 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,500; or $1,390 upon the income of $6,500; and 30 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $6,500 and does not exceed $8,500; or $1,990 upon the income of $8,500; and 35 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $8,500 and does not exceed $11,500; or $3,040 upon the income of $11,500; and 40 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $11,500 and does not exceed $14,000; or $4,040 upon the income of $14,000; and 45 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $14,000 and does not exceed $17,000; or $5,390 upon the income of $17,000; and 50 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $17,000 and does not exceed $25,000; or $9,390 upon the income of $25,000; and 55 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $50,000; or $23,140 upon the income of $50,000; and 60 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $75,000; or $38,140 upon the income of $75,000; and 65 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $75,000 and does not exceed $100,000; or $54,390 upon the income of $100,000; and 70 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000; or $89,390 upon the income of $150,000; and 75 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000; or $164,390 upon the income of $250,000; and 80 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to deal with these income tax resolutions, I wish to make a statement in regard to the special provision of the act which provides for the so-called carry-back of deferred maintenance. A week or so ago I explained to the house that the order in council which established any twelve months' period in the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 selected by the taxpayer as the period during which half of the expenditures on deferred maintenance might be charged back to excess profits taxes paid in previous years, was passed at a time when I was busily engaged in the preparation of the budget and was not attending council as regularly as I might.

Since that time I have given a great deal of study to this matter and the government on my recommendation has reconsidered the order which was passed on April 17 last.

In view of the existing shortages of various kinds of construction materials and of building labourers, we have come to the conclusion that it would be unwise to encourage by such an incentive provision still further concentration of this type of maintenance work in the present year or in the period immediately ahead of us. On the contrary, we think it desirable that scarce materials and labour of this sort should be devoted as far as practicable to residential housing in order to remedy the acute shortage of dwelling accommodation. The committee will recall that one of the two major reasons for inserting this provision in our tax legislation was to encourage the expansion of maintenance work at a time when under-employment rather than over-employment was threatening.

Under all the circumstances, therefore, the government has decided to rescind order in council P.C. 1502 and this decision has been carried out. In lieu thereof, I am proposing to amend section 5 (1) (v) of the Income War Tax Act in such a way as to provide that the period to be determined by the governor in council for the purposes of the subsection shall be a twelve months' period to be named by the governor in council ending not later than December 31, 1950. The bill which will be introduced when the house has dealt with all these resolutions will contain this amendment.

It will be noted that the governor in council will have a certain measure of discretion as to the choice of the period, but he cannot delay his decision indefinitely; under no circumstances can he name a period later than the year 1950. The end of the twelve months' period therefore is bound to come within about five years after the end of the war. This, it seems to us, is the most reasonable solution of what has been a rather difficult problem. It will enable us to avoid aggravating still further the shortage of material and labour that exists at the present time. It will make it possible to postpone the special inducement to expanded maintenance work until some time when conditions are at least "less tight" than at present and perhaps to a time when it may be desirable to have the increased employment which the special provision should encourage. It will, we believe, make it possible for taxpayers to do some advance planning and to defer certain less urgent types of work to be carried out during the twelve months' period to be named at a later day.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a suggestion to offer to get rid of the income tax altogether. Some articles have been published in a Montreal daily explaining the whole thing, and I shall try to summarize it as briefly as possible. The data is from the "Canada Year Book, 1945," because I received the 1946 issue too late to deal with it.

In 1944 the total income for national revenue was $9,200,000,000, earned by 5,000,000 people. One-half of them, or 2,450,000, earned revenue amounting to $4,767,000,000, or approximately one-half of the national revenue. The income tax amounted to $682,000,000, or fourteen per cent of the total yearly income of one-half of the working or earning population. That proportion of the earnings of the people came from the best class of people, namely the middle class and the poor.

To refer again to the "Canada Year Book, 1945," the government states therein that the banks submit regularly true accounts of every banking transaction they handle. According to these statements to the government, the banks during 1944 cashed cheques amounting to $60,000,000,000 and passed over counter currency involving $25,000,000,000. So it appears that banking operations in Canada attained $85,000,000,000 in 1944.

The banks are compelled to make a monthly report to the government. Why then should not the government avail itself of this opportunity to impose on the banks the obligation of deducting a fraction of their transactions, perhaps to the extent of one per cent. Taking as a basis the last statement of the banks, the state could derive from that tax $850,000,000. By the same process, every individual would recover the right to save or spend or invest his money as he wishes, among other things leaving him free to better his own position in life and to contribute more liberally to the social welfare and care of the needy.

Moreover this form of taxation would assess the taxes more equitably on the whole of the population fit to work, without setting a heavier ransom. Each individual would pay according to his means and according to the proportion of his business transactions.

The forms which the income taxpayers must fill out are real Chinese puzzles, and the law itself is so entangled that a great number of people are unable to get through its many riddles without help; while on the other hand the proposed new principle of taxation, to be levied as a duty on banking operations, presents no complications whatever, and is most easy to understand. In fact the main criticism that has been made by the press was that it was too simple to be adopted. If it were more complicated there would be a better chance of having it adopted. But under this new principle of taxation nobody would have to rack his brain any more or to employ accountants to prepare the yearly report which would be supplied to the state by the banks in the course of their routine business, for they are already compelled to make a daily statement on the cheques they handle, and thus time and worry would be saved to the people.

The monetary system of the country, as we know, is under the exclusive control of the federal government.

The proceeds of the special tax we propose would depend upon the commercial activities of the taxpayers and on the amount of money put in circulation therefrom. It is a logical result that the flow of money should increase in proportion to the commercial activities of the country. From 1935 to 1944, the approximate amount of the national revenue and the total of the rolling funds doubled in 1941 and trebled in 1944 from their levels of 1935.

The figures in connection with the national revenue are calculated only by approximation, but banking statements on fluctuation of credits reflect with much more accuracy the progress of our commercial situation.

These bank reports indicate that our economic progression is rapid and constantly moving forward. These healthy conditions should be a source of increasing revenue for the state without having recourse to an increase in the rate of the tax.

Now let us consider how notoriously inefficient is the collection of the income tax. In order to collect it, the government must stand as the censor of the expenditures made by all the taxpayers, of their family budgets, of their donations to charity and, in addition, it must reckon on the accuracy and the reliability of each individual making a report.

With the system we propose, which is in reality a duty on every cheque passed through a bank, all those hindrances should be non-existent. At the same time, it should yield to the state, as we have already shown, $850 million, if we take as a basis the 1944 report of $85 billion of bank clearings at the rate of one per cent.

Once more we insist on the fact that this indirect tax would be much fairer than income tax, because it would be paid by all, not by only one-half of the people. It would also be more logical, because the tax would be proportionate to the amount of the cheque. For instance, the beneficiary of a cheque would pay $1 on a cheque of $100; $10 on $1,000; $100 on $10,000, and so on. In short, the tax on bank credits would be spread over all the population, and everyone without exception would pay it proportionally to his commercial endeavours.

If the payment of the income tax were shared by all the ratepayers on this same basis the average cost would amount to six per cent instead of being, as it stands, fourteen per cent on the income of those who have paid their fiscal dues. This is figured on the amount of the income tax paid in 1944 and with reference to the total of the national revenue, only one half of the debtors having paid the income tax.

For the purpose of showing the mechanism of the proposed tax and making its working clear to everybody, we take as an example the case of a merchant who buys from a manufacturer some articles for an amount of $10,000. The manufacturer, creditor of the merchant, cashes the cheque he received in payment; the bank retains $100 on it as tax at the rate of one per cent. To help him sell his goods, the merchant employs clerks, to whom he pays $3,000 as their salary. These clerks, creditors of the merchant, deposit their cheques at the bank and are credited with the amount less the tax, namely $30, which is retained by the bank. Now the sale of the merchandise has yielded $16,000, which represents a profit of $3,000 on the original purchase price and includes the salaries of the clerks. So the merchant deposits $16,000 at the bank, and the bank withholds one per cent, which is $160.

In all these banking operations, the following taxes would have been paid on commercial transactions amounting to $29,000:

By the producer.....	$100
By the clerks	30
By the merchant	160
Tax on the bank credits.....	$290

Following this operation, the capital of the merchant has been increased by $3,000 less $160, making a net profit of $2,840; the tax taking only 5·3 per cent of the merchant's profit. This rate cannot fail to be maintained, with the increasing amount of business, whereas, with the present system of the income tax, the contrary happens.

If the business done by a merchant continues at the same rate every month, as shown here, we have only to multiply by twelve to obtain the total amount of the business done during one year and the total of taxes paid:

By the producer on $120,000.....	$1,200
By the clerks on $36,000.....	360
By the merchant on $192,000.....	1,920
Taxes on bank credits.....	$3,480

According to the actual rate of the income tax, the merchant who realizes an annual profit of $3,000 pays $506 if he is unmarried, and $278 if he is married with two children. If he makes a monthly profit of $3,000, or twelve times more, he pays $16,450 in the first case, and $15,670 in the second; whereas, if the proposed tax were in force, this merchant would pay only $160 in the first case and, in the second, $1,920.

We want to relieve the salaried men who are paying, at the present time, the greater part of the income tax. The method of taxation we are explaining does not apply exclusively to income, but extends to all banking transactions. Those who carry on the more numerous and more important commercial enterprises should pay proportionally to their financial activities, which is only right.

It is easy to figure that, under the new mode of taxation we are proposing, the tax affecting revenue would be much lower and more equitable than it is at present; because each creditor, or beneficiary of a cheque, would be charged a tax of only one per cent on each payment made to him by a debtor. The fact is that banking debits represent the total amount of negotiated cheques each day at the banks.

As we have already said, if this new method of taxation were adopted, private individuals and corporations, except banks, would not have to produce income tax returns. The banks would take care of that themselves by the simple process of retaining one per cent on every cheque deposited or cashed in future. They would thus become the government's agents for the collection of duties on the banking credits of the depositors. These would know immediately and exactly what they should have to pay. The following table shows a comparison of payments under the income tax and the proposed tax. It is most difficult to read a tabulation to the house and, if it agrees, I will put the table on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. The table is as follows:

Income Tax Rates For 1947

Earnings	Tax Unmarried	Tax Married 2 Children	Rates of Proposed Tax on Cheques
$1,000	$ 42	....	$10
1,200	83	....	12
1,500	150	....	15
2,000	266	$ 52	20
2,500	386	161	25
3,000	506	278	30
4,000	758	518	40
5,000	1,020	770	60
7,500	1,761	1,466	75
10,000	2,645	2,288	100

This proves, without leaving any doubt, that salaried men would be relieved nearly completely.

The paramount importance which the bank account occupies in our economic life is pointed out, each year, in the "Canada Year Book," published under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the latest issue, that of 1945, we find on page 1051 the following statement about the payment of accounts by cheques:

> In every progressive industrial community currency represents only the petty cash of commerce. The greatest part of all commercial exchanges, especially when large deals are involved, is done through the medium of banks. About six per cent only of all financial transactions of the country, it appears, are done by means of currency; the other 94 per cent are negotiated by cheques. Thus, if we are able to ascertain the global sum of all cheques paid by the banks, or charged to the accounts of their clients, we would possess a nearly complete estimate of the volume of business carried out, therefore an accurate knowledge of the commercial activities of the country.

Since 1924, the bankers' association has consented to give out, in a monthly report, the figures on the amount of business passing through the clearing houses in the most important centres of the country.

Based on these statements, the federal office of statistics publishes a monthly and yearly return of these figures comprising all cheques charged by the banks to the account of their clients. Moreover, a report on the credit and debit balances of the banks is made over by the manager of the clearing house to the Bank of Canada, the latter obtaining from every bank, through telephone or telegraph, a confirmation of the accuracy of the report. Then, the Bank of Canada enters daily this balance sheet on the account of each bank on the debit or credit side, whatever may be the case. This is how nearly all banking transactions of the country are compiled daily at Ottawa.

It is easy to see that the federal government has already in hand the necessary organism to collect the proposed tax on banking credits. If parliament should see its way to replace the income tax by this new tax, the simplicity and flexibility of which are striking, it could authorize the government to fix its rate which should never exceed the maximum established by law. By its adoption, the government would get rid of its present obligation of auditing the accounts of each taxpayer. What a relief that would be for them.

Another point in favour of the proposed tax is that it would put an end to numerous anomalies which are contrary to common sense and fairness. For instance, a large number of people who make big profits by the sale or the exchange of real estate property, by the promotion of companies, by the sale of corporation shares, et cetera, do not pay any taxes on these commercial operations. Under the new plan, that kind of business activity would be automatically taxed by one per cent. Speculation on the fall of stock and any business negotiated at a loss should also be taxed.

Now we come to the fact that ninety-four per cent of all commercial deals are made by cheques, and six per cent only by currency. So the practice which is already in current use could be rendered compulsory by law. Everyone would be ordered to deposit into chartered banks all the currency he possesses. This rule would be made effective by replacing all bank notes in circulation by a new issue completely different from the one actually in use. This new currency would become the only legal one in Canada. New issues of currency, at regular intervals, would force every ratepayer to apply periodically at the banks to exchange their currency for the new one. Without a special permit the banks would not be allowed to grant more currency than $100 at one time to any one person. Every person who would possess more money than authorized by regulations would be under the obligation to account for it, the over-plus being subject to confiscation.

In order to facilitate their clients in carrying on their daily business, the banks would deliver to them, on demand, a book of certified cheques of small denominations, that is, $1, $5, $10 and $20, similar to travellers cheques. These cheques would bear the signature of the bank and that of the client and would be perforated so that the value could not be altered. Whenever the customer wished to use them he would countersign them, enter the amount and the name of the beneficiary. On presentation of the cheque by the beneficiary the bank would deduct one per cent for the tax. If the beneficiary transferred the cheque to a third party the latter would have to endorse it, and then the bank would deduct two per cent instead of one and so on increasingly at one per cent each time for each additional endorser.

We hear very often that it is the rich man who pays the income tax. It is easy to prove this assertion as false and contrary to the existing facts. The statistics show that on 2,450,000 individuals who paid income tax in 1944, the latest year for which we have official figures, 2,270,000 taxpayers whose taxable income amounted to less than $2,000 contributed to the tax. So we cannot do otherwise than come to the conclusion that this tax hits the bulk of the population, by striking at the middle class and the poor.

Here is a list of those with earnings of less than $3,000 a year. A summary outlined in regard to the 2,270,000 persons who earned less than $3,000 and were taxed reads as follows; in 1944, 385,000; in 1945, 425,300 earning less than $1,000; in 1944, 1,290,000, and in 1945, 1,250,000 earning from $1,000 to $2,000; in 1944, 695,00 and in 1945, 478,200 earning from $2,000 to $3,000. In order to complete the table we must add that 80,000 individuals having an income from $3,000 to $4,000 and 35,000 with an income of from $4,000 to $5,000 paid the tax. Throughout the country, of a total of 2,450,000 persons who paid income tax there were only 65,000 with a taxable income of over $5,000. These were the figures for 1944.

In 1945 there were 144,000, instead of 115,000 in 1944, with earnings of from $3,000 to $5,000 who paid the tax. In 1945 there was a surplus of 500 earning over $5,000 who paid the tax. Consequently we are convinced that in suggesting to suppress the income tax we are defending the cause of the middle class as well as that of the poor.

We have heard friends confiding that they were unable to give to a sick wife or sick children the medical care they should have received precisely on account of their lack of money, a relatively considerable part of their earnings being withheld by their employer for the income tax. It is no secret that numerous heads of families are compelled to withdraw from schools their most promising children because, after having discharged their income tax dues, they are unable to save anything. So, when at the age of sixteen the child loses his right to family allowances the father is not left with enough money to keep him in school.

The thriftiness of the Canadian population is to be greatly admired, and it is deplorable that it has become nearly impossible for a man who is the father of a large family, and also for the unmarried man who has dependents, to provide for their old age. Especially since the last war, this fact is more obvious on account of the high rate of taxation. How many of our fellow citizens do we see working late at night so as to be able to pay their insurance premiums? More often than not, they must work on the sly, because the income tax act does not always allow them to keep for themselves any compensation for overtime work.

The income tax is a source of restlessness and worry for those who, despite the hardships they have to suffer, find it a difficult matter to make both ends meet. That form of taxation even perverts our population by inciting to heedlessness and laziness. We hear people saying, "What good is there to work harder if we get in return no benefit whatever from our overtime work?"

The income tax is also an indirect cause of labour strikes because, if the taxpayer were not deprived of that part of his pay, he would otherwise be nearly always satisfied by getting a fuller amount of his earnings.

During the war, when parliament was voting blindly billions over billions of dollars, we could not help thinking of the results on our economic system in the years to come.

We had many occasions to discuss the matter with that great Canadian, the lamented Mr. Cardin, for whom we had a profound esteem; and while we were exchanging together our views, which were rather gloomy, on our future, we could listen to the claim of a certain class of optimists insisting that we were amidst a period of transition, and that everything would be rosy and pink-coloured after the war. The war is over, and not even a tinge of pink is yet visible on the farthest distant horizon.

Well, after having heard the sighs of despondency, the demands, the complaints, soaring up from all classes of society, we have consulted leading businessmen and bankers; and we have tried to find the best means to lessen the burden which weighs on the people.

If this plan of a tax of one per cent on all cheques were adopted, the 385,000 taxpayers whose income is less than $1,000 would pay only $5,290,000 instead of $19,700,000 in taxes; the 1,290,000 having an income of from $1,000 to $2,000 would pay $19,620,000 instead of $146 million; and the 695,000 in the $2,000 to $3,000 bracket, $14,040,000 instead of $158,400,000.

No error is possible. The rate could be no more than one per cent of the total of banking credits amounting approximately to $85 billion. It would bring $850 million to the public treasury. Every individual would pay according to the number and the importance of his commercial dealings, and nobody would have to submit any form of declaration.

This tax would not in any way affect deposits at present in the banks, but would be applied in the future on cheques negotiated through the banks. Mathematically, it would apply on all the commercial activities of the country: profits on capital, exchange, rolling capital, profits, salary; contrary to the present tax which affects only new capital and earnings.

We have submitted only the broad lines of our proposal. It was impossible to do otherwise in the restricted frame of this sketch, but a careful study, with a view to ironing out possible objections relating to particular conditions, could easily render this proposed tax the most efficacious and reasonable, and certainly the most equitable of our fiscal measures.

I thank you, sir, and my colleagues as well for having paid so much attention while I was explaining the plan in as concise a manner as possible. People are under the impression that it is only the rich who pay income tax, but it is not so, and one effect of such taxation is not to take from a man what he can pay but to get from him all that can possibly come out of his pocket. Of course it is hard. It is pretty difficult. I will not insist on what happened during the war, when I was one of those who opposed reckless expenditures, but now we must consider the present as it is, and it is the duty of every member of parliament to offer suggestions.

I do not suggest that I am infallible; I do not contend that this proposal is a perfect cure. It is, however, a suggestion. What it is worth I cannot say, but I have offered the proposal in complete earnestness in a desire to relieve the people of the burden that weighs so heavily upon their shoulders, and I hope the minister will consider it in due course. I do not expect that it will be done this year. It may take years to do it; but the later it is done, the worse. Something should be done right away.

Everyone must use his own imagination in making suggestions. Are we to stay in the mud of the ditch without thinking of bringing the car on to the road of prosperity? I hope that what is proposed will come in due course. I thank the committee again.

Mr. FLEMING: Under the heading "Income War Tax Act", the minister has submitted a total of thirteen resolutions, not a large number as compared with other years, but it does raise at once the question which has faced this house in each of the sessions of the present parliament. When are we to get on with the task of revising the entire act?

The house listened with interest to what the minister had to say on this subject in his budget speech, and he concluded the two paragraphs containing what he had to say on the subject with these words, at page 2558 of Hansard:

> . . . the complete overhauling of our tax legislation, which the government regards as one of its major, immediate post-war objectives.

One of its major immediate post-war objectives; and the overhauling to which the minister referred apparently had reference to all the three taxing acts which have been the subject of resolutions considered in this committee of ways and means.

Two years have now passed since V-E day and the government is still talking about immediate post-war objectives. The house will be glad to know that at last the revision of our tax structure has become an immediate objective of the government. At the same time the house will be pardoned if it entertains a little scepticism on this subject, in view of the fact that these words have a familiar ring about them, if we recall what has been said by the then minister of finance in each of the two previous sessions of parliament.

In the first session in 1945, the then minister of finance admitted the imperative necessity for the complete revision of our tax structure, speaking with particular reference to the Income War Tax Act. He admitted many of the delays and abuses that have grown up in a tax structure which belongs to earlier years, which is fast becoming obsolete, and which is in need of revision from both the legislative and the administrative points of view. But nothing happened at that session. The then minister explained that, while he admitted the necessity for a complete overhaul of the tax structure, he was too busy to undertake it in time to bring down legislation at that session. So the house looked forward hopefully to some remedial measures at the 1946 session. But what awaited the house? Again it was the same thing. The minister of finance of that time again admitted the necessity for the revision of the act but pleaded that he had not had time to do it; and he was under criticism, certainly from this quarter of the house, because of his failure to address himself to a task which is of first importance and first urgency. So the house was invited then to wait for another year in the expectation that the overhaul of the tax structure would be announced at this 1947 session. We are now told that we are not to have any overhaul of the tax structure at the present session but that we are to wait for another year.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I said that we would introduce the bill this session.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, but the minister went on to say that there would be no thought of pressing the bill at this session; it would be introduced so that members could have some opportunity to examine it.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I said that the house would probably not want to put it through, but that would be up to the house.

Mr. FLEMING: Very well. Let us look at exactly what the minister said.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will find that is a large order.

Mr. FLEMING: I would be the last member in the house who would wish to do the Minister of Finance any injustice. I do not blame him for all the delays which have occurred because, after all, he has been in office for only the last five and a half months.

Mr. ABBOTT: Do not blame my predecessor either.

Mr. FLEMING: Well, I am blaming the government for not addressing itself to this task.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend had as much experience as I have had in drafting legislation and tax laws, he would realize it is not any simple matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sure the committee has noted with interest the liberties taken by hon. members on the treasury benches in getting up and making speeches in the middle of speeches being made by other members of the house. They do not even wait to ask the member who is speaking for the usual permission to put a question. They just take liberties, get up and interject, and interpolate speeches in the middle of other members' remarks. All I have to say on that score is that if the Minister of Finance wishes to make a speech, there is a proper occasion for it. I suggest that if we want to get on with the business of the house expeditiously it would perhaps be best for all members to observe the rules of the house.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I am not undertaking to put all the blame for this delay on the shoulders of the present Minister of Finance; but I am saying that this government has to take full responsibility for delaying a task which should have been given a place of first importance in any programme that this government claims to have for bringing our tax structure up to date and doing something constructive to remedy the situations which have arisen, the need of remedy for which has been admitted by the government in at least the last two sessions of parliament.

What the present Minister of Finance had to say on this was that he had been giving as much time to this subject as he could give to it. This will be found at page 2557 of Hansard. He says:

> We have been busy during the past year upon the rewriting of our basic income tax law in an effort to improve its arrangement, to make it clearer and simpler, and to remove ambiguities and anomalies.

Then he goes on to say that he thinks hon. members will be pleased to see that there is much less ministerial discretion. Again, the house will be pleased indeed, I am sure, if this document when it is submitted to our gaze does contain some restriction upon ministerial discretion which, as you will recall, under the present Income War Tax Act and Excess Profits Tax Act, can only be described as having been extended to most extravagant limits. The minister went on to say that officials of his department had been engaged on a detailed revision and that he has taken a considerable personal interest in their work in this field. Then there are these words, and I take it they are the ones to which the minister referred in his interjection a few minutes ago:

I hope to be able later in the session to introduce a bill embodying this general revision of income tax law with the intention of making it effective with respect to incomes of 1948. In all probability it will not be expedient or reasonable to ask the house to enact this new bill in the current session, but I believe it would be useful to bring it in this session in order to give members full opportunity to study it and mull it over, so that the country may get the full benefit of their consideration of all its details. We do not consider that this measure, when enacted as law, will constitute the final word, but we believe it will provide a framework within which further improvements can be made over the course of future years.

I should like now to say this in commendation of the minister. The house is glad to hear that some progress has been made with regard to this important subject. The house will be glad to see this bill when it comes in. The house regrets and deprecates the long delay in the introduction of this measure in the house, for which delay the government must assume full responsibility. In the meantime, for another long year, the people of this country must put up with the sort of thing which they have been putting up with for altogether too long, the sort of thing which has been the subject matter of proper complaints on their part. We are still complaining. The taxpayers are still complaining about delays in the making of assessments. With more men available to the Department of National Revenue with which to staff those branches where the staff was inadequate, surely it was fair and reasonable for this house to hope that by this time—nearly the middle of 1947—substantial progress would have been made with this great backlog in the work of the department in the matter of assessments. But these assessments are still going on. The backlog is still, in some cases, years and years behind. As long as there are these long delays in the making of assessments, taxpayers—whether individuals or corporations—will be labouring under handicaps because of the uncertainty that hangs over their heads as long as their returns are not yet the subject of assessment, and which may be the occasion of their being called upon subsequently—perhaps three or four years or more subsequent to the date of the making of the return or the earning of the income upon which the assessment is made—to pay substantial sums of money arising perhaps through error or for other reasons. As long as that situation exists, I submit that the house must apply the goad to this government to get on with the task, to see that this great backlog of assessment work is caught up with, and to see that the taxpayers are told promptly and within a reasonable time what their tax liability is in terms of the department's computation of their assessments.

In the next place, we must apparently for another year labour under the unsatisfactory situation arising from the existence of these vast ministerial discretionary powers. I hope the minister is not going to claim that the amendments which were made in the Income War Tax Act at the 1946 session had the effect of reducing ministerial discretions; because the house, I hope, has not forgotten that there was an actual increase in the number of ministerial discretions as a result of the amendments made to this act at that session. I hope the minister is not going to claim that any contribution has been made toward the reduction of these vast discretionary powers as a result of that legislation of the 1946 session which looked toward the establishment of the income tax appeal board and the income tax advisory board. The house has not received from the Minister of Finance any report whatever on the progress, if any has been made, in connection with appointments to these boards, or the steps, if any, taken by those boards to launch themselves on their work. Perhaps the minister has a good reason for not having made that reoprt during the course of his remarks on the budget. Personally I should have thought that was the proper place for a comprehensive report on this subject.

I am sure the house has not forgotten that the establishment of the income tax appeal board originated with a very useful senate committee, which did admirable work. Unfortunately all its recommendations in this respect were not given effect by this government, but at any rate in the 1946 amendments to this act provision was made for the establishment of an income tax appeal board. I am sure the house would appreciate receiving from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue a report on the progress made in the establishment of that board and in launching it on its work.

Then also, Mr. Chairman, I think the house would appreciate a report as to the progress, if any, made in the direction of the establishment and launching on its work of the income tax advisory board. It will be remembered that this was to be a board of reference from the minister in cases of the exercise of ministerial discretion, where the minister chose to invite the board to give an advisory opinion in respect of the exercise of that discretion. I am not going to delay the committee by going over the subjects that we discussed in the debate on that matter; I simply say at this stage that the house is entitled to a report on what steps, if any, the government has taken in the direction of the establishment of this board. I am, however, going to hark back to one incident in that debate. It had to do with the time when this advisory board would be launched on its work. The committee will remember that the jurisdiction of this board is confined to assessments for 1946 and subsequent years. I for one invited the minister last year to move that period back, because of the backlog and because there would be work for the board to do if the minister would move back the effective date of the first assessment in connection with which the board would have jurisdiction. Then the board might have started to work right away. If I correctly recall the minister's remarks, he hoped to have the board established early this year and at work by the middle of this year. He pictured to us a situation which I do not think exists, and which, I am sure, those who have had experience with the various local income tax offices of the Department of National Revenue find does not exist; that is, that the backlog would be reduced, and this advisory board would begin work at an early day. At that time I suggested to the minister that if conditions continued as they were then and as they had existed for some time, this board would not go to work before about 1949. I estimated that the present backlog had been running about three years in arrears, so it could hardly be expected that the board would have any work to do before 1949. The backlog still continues; and I think the committee would be interested to know when this board is going to go to work.

As far as the revision of the act is concerned, I renew to the minister a suggestion I made last year. It was not a novel suggestion then; I am sure it has been made often in this house, and it was repeated last night by the hon. member for Grey North in an eloquent and forceful manner. I refer to the title of the act. Surely, if the time has come—and I put this position before the committee because I am quite sure hon. members will appreciate the reasonableness of it—when the fiction attached to the title of the Special War Revenue Act should be removed, equally the time must have come to remove the fiction from the title of this act.

Mr. ABBOTT: It has come. We are taking "war" out of this act, too.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sure that announcement will be received by the committee with the utmost satisfaction.

In conclusion, I should like to invite the minister, if he will be so good, to make a statement on the matter of deductions. The first resolution before us, while it establishes the new scale of taxes, does so by way of fixing the scale of deductions. When deductions at the source with respect to salaries and wages were first decided upon, the house will recall that ninety per cent was the percentage of deduction, on the theory that ten per cent was the percentage allowed to any person in respect to charitable donations, so it was felt that would be a reasonable amount. The idea of deductions at the source was sound, since it enabled people to pay as they went along, and to avoid being faced at some later day with an accrued liability of substantial proportions which they might find it difficult to pay. That idea was sound. In a later amendment, I think three years ago, the percentage of deduction was increased to ninety-five per cent. The reason given at the time, if I remember correctly, was that ninety-five per cent was thought to be closer to the amount of actual liability, according to the experience of the department in connection with the returns filed in the following spring of each year.

In view of the time that has elapsed since then, I think the house should be given a report by the minister on the way in which the present percentage of deduction is working out with reference to tax liability; because, with what I think is a trend toward increased charitable givings, it may be—I can only conjecture this in the absence of any report of an official nature—that perhaps ninety per cent is as close to the actual amount as ninety-five per cent. In any event, if there is very little to choose I submit that the taxpayer should be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, when the margin is so narrow. I say that particularly because of the delay in repayment to taxpayers from whom more has been deducted than is required to meet their tax liability. As long as we are to have a backlog of work in the department which delays the payment of refunds for a year, two years or three years, then I say it is not fair to require the deduction of more than is reasonably necessary to meet the tax liability.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better answer the two or three points raised by my hon. friend, and I should deal first with the question of the preparation of the new act. I am not prepared to concede that there has been any undue delay in the preparation of that revised act. It has been really a tremendous task; I do not think that word is too strong to use. Officials of the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance have been working long hours during the last seven or eight months to prepare this revised text; and I am satisfied that even after it is brought into the house and has had the consideration of hon. members, when it becomes available for consideration by such groups as the association of chartered accountants and others who are specialists in this field, other desirable changes will be suggested. As I say, it is an important matter; but in the order of priority I think there are other matters which have been engaging the attention of the officials I referred to and of my predecessor during the last year or two, and which are of higher priority. For that reason I am not prepared to concede that there has been any undue delay; nor am I prepared to concede that our present income tax law is anything nearly as defective as some people would make it out to be. It is not perfect, certainly, but over the course of years I have had a good deal of experience in the practical application of that law, and I make the assertion with confidence that it is not nearly as imperfect, not nearly as obscure as some people would pretend it to be. Anyone who is familiar with the income tax laws of other jurisdictions, and particularly that of the United States, will find that our law has a good deal to commend it, even in its present form.

However, it is my intention to bring in this bill within the next couple of weeks, if possible, or probably in three weeks, and at that time the house will have an opportunity to consider it. As I said in my budget speech, I think they will find that it will be desirable to discuss it here for a time, and then to hold it over, and take it up early in the next session. But that is a matter which will rest with the house.

Then, as to the matter of the appeal board and the advisory board; in view of the fact that I think it will be possible to eliminate a very large number of these discretionary powers it may not be necessary to set up an advisory board as such. We shall be able to do away with that. We shall need the appeal board which, in effect, is a type of court, and will be between the minister and the exchequer court. That we propose to set up, and I hope it will be possible to set it up within the next few months.

The last point mentioned by the hon. member had reference to deductions. The basis followed now is that of a ninety-five per cent deduction. The experience we have had so far is perhaps not sufficient to enable us to form a final opinion. There have been a substantial number of refunds on the ninety-five per cent deduction. On the other hand, the objection to underdeduction and having to pay later, is equally strong, where the majority of wage and salary earners believe that their full income tax has been paid, by deduction at the source.

However I am glad to have the point raised, and I can assure the hon. member we are looking into it closely. If it is found that the ninety-five per cent deduction results in an excessive number of refund payments, then I agree it should be lowered to ninety per cent.

Mr. FLEMING: Do I understand that two bills will be introduced, one of which will deal with the amendments in the thirteen resolutions and, when that is disposed of, an entirely different bill is to be introduced which will contain the new act?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. I propose to introduce a bill which will simply contain the amendments necessitated by the budget proposals, to which these resolutions refer. Then, in addition, I shall introduce a complete new income tax bill, which will cover the whole field, and which will contain a number of provisions that are completely new, so far as the existing act is concerned. Some of those changes will involve important questions of policy which the house will have an opportunity to debate, and which, I hope, will be carefully studied by people throughout the country, including chartered accountants and lawyers who are specialists in these matters, and also by taxpayers generally. I should hope that when we get into committee on the bill we might be able to hammer out a bill, as I said in my budget speech, in connection with the income tax law.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I listened with great interest to what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton. Among other things he mentioned assessments. First, I should like to make an appeal to the Minister of National Revenue. I know something about conditions which pertain in the income tax office in Toronto. They are very much crowded at that point, and the conditions under which they have to work are bad for their health and for the efficiency of the office. I make the plea to the Minister of National Revenue that he do something about this condition, with a view to getting better quarters for them to work in, if it is possible to do so. I am sure the minister knows about the crowded conditions in the Toronto office, and I should like to see something done about it, so as to improve conditions at that point. I have no doubt that probably the staff could be cut down and a more efficient job would be done if the working conditions were improved.

I now wish to make a plea on behalf of married women who are working. The point is that a married woman is today allowed to earn only $250, without having an additional deduction made. In these days when drives are being made for nurses and schoolteachers, and for women to work in laundries, I think some change should be made in this law. These are places where, as a rule, single women do not work. There are many places where married women can work to advantage, and be most useful.

I said something about this in my speech on the budget. The plea I make is for the married women to be permitted to make a little more money, without having her husband penalized. At the present time all she can work is about 400 or 500 hours a year. As the children get older, the mothers can go out and do useful work; and want to. The children do not require so much attention, but they require more food, and more money is required to defray the expenses in connection with them—clothes and a few chocolate bars, and pop.

Is it not fair not to allow these married women to make a little more money so that they can help out their husbands, especially in view of the high cost of living prevailing today? The children need better food and better diet and, as I have said, these things must be obtained, despite the higher prices which prevail.

Why penalize a married woman who is in a position to work today? At this time $250 is only pin-money; it does not amount to a row of pins to the government. Why penalize them? If a woman earns $750, why place the man's income in a higher bracket? But that is exactly what happens. A man with a taxable income of $2,750 pays $218 this year and will pay $180 next year. If the wife works full time and earns $750, the net return is only $637. I cannot see any point in penalizing a woman who works like that with her hands. Hospitals are crying out for nurses, but married women are leaving the hospitals today because it is not worth their while to work in them.

Then, there are many women with nursing training who are married to doctors and others with fairly good incomes, but the fact that the wife is working, places the doctor in a 30, 40 or 50 per cent bracket. It is not worth while for the nurse to work under those conditions, and I should like to see something done about the matter. I make a plea to the government to raise the amount which married woman may be permitted to make, so that we may have their services. They would not be taking the place of other persons, or putting them out of employment. They would be going to places where others would not be going; and we need them more than we ever did. I plead with the government to do something about this.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Let him answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was going to say a word. There has been a good deal of talk about this penalizing of married women, so far as the income tax schedules are concerned. But people overlook the fact that the exemption to married women is given on the assumption that the man is supporting his wife. If he is not supporting his wife, then the exemption should be either eliminated or curtailed, depending upon the circumstances.

In no other country in the world that I know of is the full married exemption given to a married man whose wife is also earning. In the United States they have the option of joining their incomes, and taking the full marriage exemption, which, of course, would be far less favourable than the provision we have in Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: And dividing by two.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not "dividing by two" —paying the tax on the joint income. They can divide the income and take single exemptions. And practically the same rule applies in Great Britain.

Our rule with respect to exemptions for married women is more favourable than that of any other country I have been able to find. Therefore I think the criticism of the treatment of married women, so far as the income tax law of Canada is concerned, is unjustified. And the combined effect of the reduction last year and this year means that the actual increased tax paid, with the wife earning in addition to her husband, who is in receipt of income, is extremely small.

I do not want to clog up the record, or to take time to read these tables, but I have had tables prepared which show the actual increase in the income of a married couple as a result of the wife's earnings taking account of the effect on the husband's tax, in the various brackets, where husbands and wives are both in receipt of income. These tables show the situation under the new tax deductions coming into effect on July 1 and also the situation for the whole of 1947, and if the committee gives me consent I shall be glad to place these tables on record because I think they will be of interest.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ABBOTT: The tables are as follows:

*If at the end of the year a wife has earned this amount she could give $30 to the government and thereby prevent her husband's exemption going down from $1000 to $750 and also reduce her own tax from $4.80 a year to nil. This line has been worked on this basis.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to follow this up. A good deal of what the minister says is true, but the fact remains that we need nurses badly and schoolteachers and textile workers and we cannot get them to work. I am sure that the amount of money which would be lost by raising the exemption for women to $750 or more would not amount to anything. The minister talks about $250 being sufficient for the wife to earn for herself.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understood the minister to say that that was sufficient.

Mr. ABBOTT: We allow her to earn that much without interfering with her husband's exemption.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You cannot possibly keep a wife nor can she keep herself on $250.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nobody ever suggested that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Nor on $750 either. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and you are not getting these people to work. Nurses are leaving the hospitals—and I know what I am talking about—because it is not worth their while to continue working. This is just an arbitrary ruling and something should be done about it. The revenue you would lose by raising the exemption does not amount to a hill of beans.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have only one word to add. We did not do so before the war and, so far as I am concerned, I can see no justification for granting special income tax exemptions to special groups in order to persuade them to work.

Mr. McCANN: Just a word with reference to the office space situation in Toronto. The observations of the hon. member for St. Paul's with reference to that situation are reasonably accurate. Conditions are obvious to anybody who has visited the office in Toronto. It has been impossible to secure the required space. In addition, we have been short-staffed throughout the years and the volume of the work has greatly increased. However I am very glad to say that within the last two weeks we have leased an extra 47,000 square feet in the Tip Top Tailors building, which will be ready within the next three months, and that will meet our requirements in that city for the time being.

Mr. FRASER: The item we are on is payroll deductions, and I want to mention something in that regard. If I read this letter from the county clerk of Peterborough it will explain the situation better than I could. She says:

I find it almost an impossibility to comply with regulations pertaining to remitting income tax deductions on T.D.2 (employers) as at present demanded.

Most of our deductions come from the payroll from work on roads. We have a two payroll system here from the 1st to the 15th in the month, and from the 16th to the 31st. I find that the wages up to the 31st must come in here on pay sheets from foremen in outlying districts, to be checked here, paid and deducted, and the remittance has to be in Belleville before the 7th of the following month. If this is not done a fine is handed out.

When the snow conditions were bad this was was absolutely an impossibility, as the reports of wages from the foremen simply did not arrive in by the 7th of the month, due to mail service. Because this was not possible I had a letter from Belleville stating if it happened again I would be subject to a fine. One of our local clerks actually did have to pay a fine.

She is referring to a clerk of one of the townships. She goes on to say:

This time should be extended to the 15th of the following month instead of the 7th.

At times it is an impossibility for me to conform to these regulations, and I speak for our local clerks as well. If all our employees were on salaries we would have no worries. However, they are not and we must have time for wage reports to come in and be checked in the office before deductions are made.

Would it not be possible for the minister to have the regulations changed so that these returns can be sent in by the 15th of the month instead of the 7th? In this past winter, the snow has absolutely tied up all kinds of traffic, with the mail often being two or three weeks late. I do hope that the minister will do something about the matter.

Mr. McCANN: I shall be very glad to look into it. I recognized that there is some cause for complaint in that district and in like districts with reference to sending in these returns.

Mr. FRASER: That is perfectly true. I understand from the county clerk that this also was the condition in many townships, and no doubt the same is true of counties throughout the whole of Canada.

Mr. McKAY: With reference to payroll deductions for income tax, has the minister or the government given any consideration to allowing a five per cent discount for wage-earners who have had the greater part of their income tax deducted from their pay by the end of the calendar year? The government has the use of this money for at least four months and the greater part of it for ten months, and at present no interest is allowed to the wage-earners for the use of it. Businessmen and most professional men pay their income tax on the 30th day of April of the following year, so that they have the use of the money for four months after the close of the taxation year and no additional charge by way of interest is made against them for having had the use of this money for a period of at least four months. The wage-earner, who can often ill afford to pay income tax at all, is therefore penalized for being prompt in his income tax payments through compulsory deductions, which begin with the first month of the taxation year. The government has the use of this money for many months, and so I think that when the wage-earner makes his final return in April he should be allowed to deduct at least five per cent from the income tax payable on that date.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend has referred to professional men, doctors, lawyers and the like. They have to make quarterly payments, in March, June, September and December, so that by the end of the year they have paid or should have paid their income tax in full. There is a provision in the act that, if they have underestimated, they have to pay interest on the amount of the underestimate. I do not think there is any substantial inequality of treatment between the wage-earner and the taxpayer who is required by the act to pay by quarterly instalments. It is not quite accurate to say that the government has had the use of the money during that period. The circumstance is simply this. The taxpayer is paying the proper proportion of the tax as he goes along. It is a strict pay-as-you-go policy, and the country gets the needed revenue from the earnings as they are paid out.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is one obvious and unfair working of the income tax regulations which I should like to suggest to the government might be remedied in the present budget. This suggestion should, I think, meet with the support of all hon. members, and I believe it would apply personally to at least ninety-nine per cent of them. I refer in particular to the various sections of the act which allow an individual who comes under a retirement or pension plan set up by a company to deduct from his gross income before assessment the amount which he contributes under the plan.

Tomorrow we hope we may be on the old age pensions bill. We have seen that, even with the comparatively low income tax which we have had during the last thirty years or so, with the exception of the war years, the people of Canada to a substantial percentage have been unable to provide for their own old age, and that is why we have to give serious consideration to making some grants to ease their existence. Therefore, if our people, or a substantial number of them, have had difficulty in providing a competence for their old age under no personal income tax or a comparatively low rate we may imagine what our problem will be in the years to come when we are almost bound to have fairly substantial personal income taxes.

As I mentioned, if a worker comes under a company plan for retirement, which plan must be approved by the Minister of Finance, the company may make a contribution, perhaps four or five per cent or more of the wages which are paid the individual. A company is allowed a tax deduction for that amount. The worker is also allowed to make a contribution, which we will say is five per cent of his wages, to a plan leading to his retirement. This amount is also deductible from his income before tax assessment is made. Furthermore, the individual may, if he is just coming under a plan now and has been in the service of the organization or company for a number of years, make a deduction for the years of work which he has put in during which time he did not come under the plan, so that he has on two counts the possibility of making a deduction for his old age, and these deductions on the two counts are both subtracted from his gross income before the tax is calculated.

The great majority of Canadian people, however, are not fortunate enough to work for large companies or prosperous enough companies that have these retirement plans; therefore they do not have the same attractive and advantageous means of providing for their old age as this limited class of workers coming under the various plans. I shall read one section of the Income War Tax Act, so that members may perhaps more clearly understand the nature of these exemptions. I shall read from section 5, paragraph (g). These are deductions and exemptions allowed under the Income War Tax Act:

(i) An amount not exceeding nine hundred dollars in the taxation year, actually retained by the employer from the remuneration of the taxpayer for an employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan in respect of services rendered in the taxation year or paid by the taxpayer who is a member of a trade union as part of his union dues.

I am told that in negotiating contracts with their employers many trade unions insist that some retirement plan be put into effect before they sign with the company; so that it is clear that under the existing regulations there is a distinct, welcome and worthwhile advantage to the workers who come under these plans. Altogether it can amount to a total of $900 under each of the three counts which I mentioned, which is $2,700 deducted from a man's income before tax. Of course a person would need to have an extraordinarily large income to be able to set aside that amount. But may I just point out in connection with these regulations which we now have under review that if no personal income tax were applied until the married man reached an income of $2,000 there would be a saving of $70 a year in tax? If the man who at the present time does not come under a plan where able to come under such a plan, which I shall suggest later should be under government sponsorship, and put in his $70 which he now pays in tax, he would find that, starting at the age of thirty, when many a man wakes up to the fact that old age will eventually come upon him and that he had better start making some provision for it, and putting $70 a year into a dominion government annuity, he will at the age of seventy be able to receive an annuity of $700 a year; or if he prefers to retire at sixty-five, having paid until that age, he will be able to have an annuity of approximately $500 a year. It is obvious then that there is discrimination against the great majority of our people who are not fortunate enough to come under one of these company sponsored plans approved by the Minister of Finance.

The principle that is already contained in these plans is approved by the government but because of inertia or for some other reason, the government has not seen fit to devise a plan whereby these workers who do not come under the company plans may make some provision for their own old age.

I might say, in passing, that these amounts are not entirely free of tax. It is in a sense a delayed tax because, when the man retires and starts drawing his yearly amounts as annuity, if you like, under the plan, the whole amount that he receives is taxable year by year as he receives it. But this is fair to the government and also fair to the individual because, when the individual retires, he is not likely to have a substantial income and his tax on whatever he receives is likely to be moderate, just as exists under the plans now approved by the Minister of Finance.

At the present time, with the extraordinarily high tax rates that we have, it is almost impossible for a person, particularly in the lower brackets, to make adequate provision for himself or his wife or widow as the case may be, when he retires from work or dies. Taxation is already making too large an inroad into our personal incomes to allow many a person to balance his budget, much less look forward to a day when he is not a regular wage-earner. Therefore anything that this committee can do to make it possible for a man to provide for his own old age should meet with the approval of every hon. member.

What I am suggesting is that the government under the Department of Labour, where the annuities branch now is, or under some other suitable department, frame an over-all plan containing the various provisions which the Minister of Finance now insists upon when he gives approval to a company-sponsored plan. That over-all plan under the government could be made open to all individuals who wish to pay into it in order to provide for their own old age. I am not suggesting at this moment that the government make a contribution to it, although the idea is capable of that elaboration, and perhaps further consideration should be given it. But if we look at it entirely from the angle of personal tax, there should be an opportunity for the individual, under the government plan, to do as much for himself as the government now allows him to do if he is fortunate enough to work for a company having such a plan.

It may be that our insurance companies, who act as trustee for many of these company-sponsored plans, might formulate an over-all plan which would allow individuals who are not employees of these favoured companies, as I shall call them, to come under a plan sponsored by individual insurance companies, and the ordinary citizen could take his choice of the plan of the dominion government or of the insurance company. I suggest this, not only because I am a supporter of private enterprise, but also because many people will not save or come under a plan like this, no matter how favourable it may be, or how much they may save in tax this year to provide for their eventual old age, unless the plan is sold to them; and it requires selling. It may be desirable, therefore, to have private institutions formulate government-approved plans, as well as the government itself.

I should hope that if the government does formulate, under the dominion government annuities, a plan such as I recommend, it will allow the same rate now allowed in respect of annuity accumulations, namely four per cent, which is a somewhat higher rate than the artificially low rate at which the government is able to borrow at the present time. I would also suggest, because of the social nature of this undertaking, that the government would, as in the case of government annuities, bear the cost of administration.

There would be, of course, the usual provision which the minister now insists upon in the company plans in regard to a man on retirement not getting money out in a lump sum but spread over his life in the form of an annuity or some other form which would appeal to the minister. There would also be suitable provision made for the widow of a worker should he die and perhaps also for dependants in case they are still young.

This is a proposal to allow people who are not able to participate in the benefits now extended by the government under the company approved plans to look after, through the process of self-help, their own old age, so that they will not become dependent and so that they will have the feeling of self-reliance, which people cannot have if they must lean upon a paternal government.

Mr. ISNOR: What features does the hon. member's plan propose which are not included already in the group insurance annuity plan?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know whether I understand entirely my hon. friend's question. I do not know exactly what he means by the group insurance annuity plan. He must be a little more specific. I suggest that unless a person comes under a company-sponsored plan, of which there are a great many, particularly during the last five years or so, when a greater feeling of social consciousness has swept across the country, he cannot possibly get the benefits which are extended to the individual who does come under such a plan.

Take our own situation in this house. I should think that not more than two or three per cent of the members would be eligible to come under these plans. The ordinary citizen cannot do it. The man in a large steel mill or in a coal company or some other industry that has a plan like this can get the benefit of it. As a guess, I should think not more than fifteen per cent of our working population, or perhaps I might make it twenty per cent, are eligible to take advantage of these plans, and many small employers do not feel that they can set up such a plan, having regard to the additional cost of the company contributions. If the government approves a plan there is also a contribution by the employer as well as by the employee. Some companies do not feel that they can accept the added responsibility, but what I am suggesting now is that the government set up a plan whereby the individual at least can do all that he could if he were working for a company maintaining a retirement plan.

Mr. ISNOR: Apparently there are no new benefits suggested in the hon. member's proposal.

Mr. JACKMAN: I only want the benefit which the government has approved, so far as a particular section of the population is concerned, extended to the whole population.

Mr. BOUCHER: I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosedale, and I would point out to the hon. member for Halifax the scope of the proposal. It would, in fact, cover all those people, or make it possible for all those people not engaged in industrial enterprise, under an employer or corporation who had set up superannuation benefits, to get the advantage of such a scheme. It would be an opportunity for the farmer, who has not a full-time employer, to contribute five per cent of his income to the dominion government on a superannuation basis, to be paid to him in instalments upon his attaining of a certain age, and without taxation, and that could be deducted from his income, after the manner of compulsory savings collected during the war.

I remember when compulsory savings were first introduced into this house, the then minister of finance did not feel that those who contributed to the superannuation plan under the Department of Labour should be entitled to consider their annual contribution to that as part of compulsory savings. After some consideration, the minister did yield to our exhortations that that should be allowed as part of compulsory savings.

In further answer to the hon. member for Halifax, I would ask the committee to realize that only a small percentage—my hon. friend says fifteen or twenty per cent—of our population work for employers who have set up a superannuation fund. I know many big firms who have never set up such a fund for their employees. I have in mind several in my own city who have had employees for twenty, thirty and forty years, and these people find themselves too old to continue working and without any superannuation set up for them. Consider the case of the independent-enterprise man, the small tradesman, the mechanic, the seasonally occupied man, the man who runs his own business or runs a small business for someone else. These people have not the advantage of a superannuation plan where the employer pays half and the individual half. Such a man has not even an opportunity of providing for his old age, getting a reduction from his income tax or assessable income for the purpose.

If we were to realize how this would work out, I think we would feel that it is, in effect, the most advantageous policy for old age pensions that we could have. So many people have said that we in Canada have reached the stage where we should have a contributory old age pensions scheme. This is a scheme that would replace that to a large extent, because any man who felt provident enough, beginning life at the age of twenty-one years of age, to provide five per cent of his income for dominion government annuity payment, deducting it as expense of living from assessable income, would at the age of sixty or sixty-five have sufficiently established a superannuation benefit to carry him along on a substantial income, so that he would be entirely independent of any gratuity from anybody. Our civil service has the advantage of the superannuation plan. Many people have argued that the civil servant gets compensation by virtue of the benefit he gets in being allowed to contribute to the superannuation fund and having the government contribute a like amount. The government need not contribute to the individual, but they could contribute by way of administering the fund and by way of paying him in the same manner as is now adopted by the annuities branch of the Department of Labour, the amount being calculated mathematically on a four and a half per cent compound interest basis.

We all know that there is in existence in the Department of Labour a scheme under which individuals can make annual contributions until they are sixty, sixty-five or seventy years of age, and thus provide themselves, their wives and dependants with annuities ranging as high as $100 a month per person. That in itself is security against old age or mature age. If those who are not in industrial enterprise—and even those who are in industrial enterprise, if they want to take advantage of it—had an opportunity to contribute a small portion of their income each year, as part of their everyday living expense, and could have that exempted from income tax, they would become more self-sufficient and satisfied that they themselves were looking after their old age. They would not look to this government with anxiety for paternalistic legislation, as so many people would have us believe they do today.

I believe the fundamental spirit of our Canadian people is one of independence and thrift. I believe they want an opportunity to provide for themselves in their old age, and I believe the government should make that as easy as possible. I also believe that, in the long run, we would save a great deal of expense if that opportunity were given by way of annuity, if we were to give them the inducement so that they could set themselves up in that way with pride, independence and a feeling that they were getting at a later day something which they had provided for throughout their lives.

I highly commend the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosedale. Instead of thinking of a compulsory contribution to old age or retirement allowances, I believe the government would be well advised if they made it voluntary and gave the ordinary rank and file of our Canadian people who are in independent enterprise, assistance and cooperation. As the hon. member for Rosedale has said, I believe that this could be done through the annuities branch or through the insurance companies. I also believe that if this contribution were exempt from income tax, it should be made on the basis that it can be received back by the taxpayer only in annuity form in month to month payments and benefits at a time when he is most likely to need them. I believe the Minister of Finance would be well advised to take this matter into serious consideration, because I think the great mass of the Canadian people have not appreciated, or have not been encouraged to appreciate, the benefits of an annuity under the Department of Labour as it now stands; otherwise a great many more people would have taken out one, and we would not have the difficulty we have today, namely, that people feel they are about to face difficult days in the eve of their lives.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to branch into another field with respect to income tax, and ask the minister a question which I fear is somewhat of a perennial one; perhaps it is perennial because of its importance. It is a question which arises from a series of inquiries received in the mails, and it must have come to the attention of hon. members on scores and scores of occasions. It concerns the person who has a self-contained domestic establishment, who has all the expenses, all the outlays and all the overhead that married people have, but who at the same time is not entitled to the same kind of consideration under the income tax law and regulations. It is a matter which, I think, touches the homes of many worthy and deserving people in Canada. I have listened to the arguments of those who have gone before, but I have not been convinced by them. After all, what is the use of our changing finance ministers unless we can expect something better from the new one than was received from the old one? On that basis I feel somewhat optimistic and not a little encouraged to press my case again for that group of people who, I think, are deserving and have been long-suffering and kind—perhaps too kind—to their government in the past for not having given them a little more consideration. I should like to ask the minister if he will, after I resume my seat, deal with that matter and give us the reasons he has finally designed which apparently have prevented the change.

The other matter to which I wish to refer is one which perhaps some people may consider small. But after all, as most public men will find, the small things in the world are really the big things. Certainly they are big things to the people we represent. Today we are experiencing the development of education in a way that we have never experienced before. Our seats of higher and secondary learning in every part of Canada are bulging with students; and I suppose that applies to every country of the world where education is available. In many cases one finds that the ordinary middle-class person is struggling to make ends meet. I do not make any apologies for saying a word on his behalf; and it is no reflection on those who are making less money, either; because, after all, that middle class of our people who are struggling hard to make ends meet, very often at the end of the year have just about the same amount left over as those in even lower brackets. In addition to that, in trying to educate their children they find that, after the boy or girl reaches the age of twenty-one, their exemption with respect to that child, as a dependent under the income tax law and regulations, ceases. They are then on their own without any of those considerations being available to them. I have had this matter brought to my attention within the last few months by several deserving citizens in my own constituency, and not all of them have been of my own political faith either. I should like the minister to give some consideration to cases of that type. As a nation we are now reaching the position where it is not so hard to see that if, in the years which lie ahead, education advances as much as it has in the past, we might conceivably find that university degrees in Canada are almost as numerous as senior matriculations were some twenty-five years ago. That, of course, makes a situation which, I think, deserves attention by the government because of conditions we see developing. I should like the minister to give some consideration to that class of people, who, I think, are worthy and deserving Canadian citizens.

Mr. ABBOTT: Dealing with the two points my hon. friend has raised, as he himself has indicated the first is not a new one, I think I have answered it myself on at least two previous occasions. That is the suggestion that a person who lives in a self-contained domestic establishment should be given the same treatment as a married man who lives in such an establishment, or a man who has such an establishment and maintains in it someone connected with him by blood relationship or marriage and who is wholly dependent upon him. Personally I have never considered that there was justification for extending that exemption to groups other than those already covered. After all, living in a self-contained domestic establishment, in a house, is a way of life. The exemption is given to a married man as part of his married exemption; and it is given to a widower or a single man who is maintaining in that type of establishment dependents who are connected with him in the degree mentioned in the act, as a further concession. But to give it to all taxpayers who choose to live in that way, I felt, and my predecessor also felt, was never justified, and personally I would not feel that we should extend the law at this time. I think I have given a similar answer on previous occasions.

The other question my hon. friend raised, namely the possibility of extending the exemption for children who are attending university when they get beyond the age of twenty-one, has been brought to my attention by a great many hon. members. I have had a number of letters concerning it, and it has been brought to my attention by several hon. members on this side of the house. There again the justification for allowing the exemption up to the age of twenty-one—and it is an exception to the general rule—is that this is about the age at which children complete or at any rate nearly complete their ordinary arts course. If they are going on to take professional training as a doctor or lawyer, or to do post-graduate work, that is usually after they have reached the age of twenty-one years. I am not quite sure just what income bracket my hon. friend means when he refers to "middle class", but I would think he meant someone receiving up to about $5,000 a year, would he?

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not have in mind a figure that high. I think I used the words "middle class" where I meant the medium income class.

Mr. ABBOTT: If it is lower, so much the better, because under the new rates on an income of up to $3,500 the top rate is twenty per cent, so that the value of the exemption to a taxpayer with an income of up to $3,500 would be only $60 a year. I will concede that $60 a year is $60, and has some significance when you are sending a boy to college; but it is not a sum that is going to make the difference between sending him there and not sending him. I have never felt that we would really be justified in extending this exemption beyond the normal period within which a man is giving his boy or girl the initial university education.

Mr. CROLL: Following that up, did I understand the minister to say the exemption was given a widower with children in the same way as to a married man?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true, if they are wholly dependent upon him and under the age limit.

Mr. CROLL: In a self-contained establishment?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. CROLL: But what about the widower himself?

Mr. ABBOTT: The widower himself is the same as a bachelor. That is a way of life; he is living in a house instead of in an apartment or hotel or boarding house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say one word to the minister with respect to my observations on the educational point? I did not have in mind people making as much as $5,000. In the one instance I have in mind I believe the man's income is just over $2,000, which I think, generally speaking, is not a large income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably he would not be paying any tax at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, his income may be over $2,000, but in any event it is in one of the lower income brackets. When I said "middle" perhaps I should have said one of the lower income brackets, because that is what I had in mind.

Mr. ABBOTT: To a man with an income of $5,000, the value of an exemption of $300 at the marginal rate would be $66 a year.

Mr. GRAYDON: But take the person who is making something over $2,000, from $2,000 to $3,000. He has a pretty tough time trying to get his children educated.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he is a married man he gets an exemption of $1,500, and he would have an exemption of $100 for each child in receipt of family allowance and $300 for each child not in receipt of that allowance. My only point is that the value of the exemption is perhaps significant, but I should think it extremely unlikely that an individual with an income of $2,000 to $2,500 would be in a position, out of his own resources, to send his children to college. He could probably help them—

Mr. GRAYDON: He does the best he can, and he should not have any obstacles placed in his way.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course he does the best he can, but I think the children would have to help earn their way through college. The point is that he would get the exemption until his children were twenty-one, which is a very fair average age for completing an arts course at university, which covers a period of three to four years. If they are going on to post-graduate work, in the professions or otherwise, I do not think there should be an exemption which does not apply to other taxpayers.

Mr. TIMMINS: Following the remarks of the hon. member for Peel and the explanation of the minister on the first question raised, in regard to widowers, I should like to give the minister an example for his consideration. In this case in 1945 the widower had a pension of $624 and a small investment income which brought his total income to a little over $1,500. He is a widower maintaining his own home, with a housekeeper to whom he has to pay $40 a month. His taxes in 1945 amounted to $260. He is considered as a single person, even though he continues to maintain his home since the death of his wife. In 1946, on an income of $1,619, his tax amounted to $208.54. In that year, in order to help pay his way, his son had to contribute $300 out of his own income, and of course in turn the son had to pay income tax on his own income. This man is eighty-one years of age. By thrift and diligence he has made almost enough to maintain himself, but not quite; and I am asking the minister whether in a case of this kind, where a man is past the age of seventy years, we will say, some consideration should not be given him in respect of the exemptions, and whether the exemptions should not be increased from $750 to $1,500.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, consideration has never been given, as far as I am aware, to increasing the exemptions solely by reason of the age of the taxpayer. I should think it would be undesirable from a good many points of view.

Mr. TIMMINS: Then following the remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's with respect to the exemptions of married women earning salaries, my opinion has been that we should protect the exemption of $750 given a married woman, and maintain it as it was in 1946. I see the minister is not sympathetic to that point of view, because, as I understood him a few moments ago, he said he did not favour a special dispensation to any class in order to induce people to work.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say "dispensation." I said I was not in favour of income tax concessions to any group in order to persuade them to work.

Mr. TIMMINS: This year, 1947, we have certain problems to meet, and probably the most important of them is the question of production. Engaged in business as I am, it seems to me that the minister has lost sight of the fact that if we do not protect the exemption which was given to nurses, teachers and stenographers in 1946 we are going to lose these women from industry. As a matter of fact, I was interested in the table the minister filed, and I shall certainly be interested in perusing it, when I have a chance to do so, because in my attempts to find out what the tax on married women earning incomes in Canada amounted to, from questions which I asked of the Minister of National Revenue, I discovered that there had not been any statistics kept in respect of the tax paid by those married women in the years up to this date, although the situation will probably be changed from now on.

But I did get an estimate from a departmental official as to what the situation really was, and this is it. The total salaries and wages earned by women in Canada in 1946 is estimated at about $607,000,000. This does not include income from investments. It is estimated that twenty-five per cent of the women in business are married women, and seventy-five per cent are single. That is only an estimate. Therefore $148,000,000 represents the income earned by married women in 1946. For the most part these earnings were in the low-income group.

It is estimated that the number of married women who earned this amount of wages and salaries was 110,000, so that the average annual wage or salary per person was $1,350. It is estimated that the tax upon salaries and wages of married women paid in 1946 amounted to $18,000,000.

There is nothing very scientific about that return because, as a matter of fact, it is only an estimate, and apparently it is not taken from any statistics at all. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare will probably have something to say a little later on when he finds there are not enough nurses in the country to take care of the work to be done in the hospitals, if eventually we have a national health insurance plan.

I think the minister might very well give consideration to this matter of protecting the 1946 exemption for married women. I do not like to let his statement go unchallenged that he does not intend to give any special concession to any class in order to induce people to work, because, after all, production is the thing we are looking for this year. I think that is a fact the minister ought to take into account.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a few words in support of the two points made by the hon. member for Peel. In a sentence or two, may I say my interest in this matter stems, in particular, from a number of widowers living in Weston, a part of Winnipeg. These are men who are employees in the shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who have small homes. But even though they are widowers, they endeavour to keep those homes together as a place for the children to come, whether they be married or single. The suggestion that the exemption be granted is not only for the reason the minister stated, but because of our interest in this country in maintaining homes.

I rose not only to support the suggestions made by the hon. member for Peel, but to encourage him to carry on. And the means I shall use to encourage him is to make reference to something I now hold in my hand. As some hon. members may recall, in every budget debate since I came to this house—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not long ago.

Mr. KNOWLES: —I have spoken as strongly as I can with reference to a discrimination between railway train conductors and railway sleeping-car conductors. The minister will probably remember some of the discussion he and I have had across this floor. I had some discussions with his predecessor, and some with the present Secretary of State, who was then minister of national revenue.

I was told every year that it simply could not be done, and that, because of the distinction in the manner in which the incomes were received by these different employees, a line had to be drawn. The railway train conductors, being on a mileage basis, were allowed their away-from-home expenses as a taxation deduction; but the sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters, because they worked for wages or salaries, were not allowed their away-from-home expenses.

It would make interesting reading if I were to quote from Hansard the arguments used by the ministers I have mentioned when they told me that it simply could not be done. I am happy to say I hold in my hand a directive from the deputy minister, signed by F. H. Brown, deputy minister of taxation. This is directive No. 14, dated May 2, 1947, and the subject matter is the assessment of railway men's away-from-home expenses. It states:

> The same consideration will be given to claims for away-from-home expenses of those railway men who are paid on a salary or wage basis as is given to those paid on a mileage basis.

I wish to express my thanks to the government for having acceded to this request. It did not come from me in the first place, although I have been fighting for it here. It came to the department from the unions and brotherhoods representing the men. I am sure it is clear now that it was a discrimination which should not have been maintained for such a long time.

Speaking particularly for the sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters, and also for those other railway employees who are on a wage or salary basis, may I say that they appreciate the fact that they now have the same right as these other railway employees, namely that of charging their away-from-home expenses as part of the cost of their job.

So I say to the hon. member for Peel that probably his arguments are not in vain.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many times did the hon. member have to present them?

Mr. KNOWLES: Just four years.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have presented mine for only three; I have only one year to go.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of Labour will note that I said a minute ago that I did not start the suggestion. It came from the brotherhoods and the unions representing the men. However I did say that I led the fight on the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are more successful in fighting in other places than on the floor, sometimes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to take part in this discussion in order to say something which may seem to be in an entirely different vein from the views I have just expressed. What I shall say grows out of a statement made to me in Winnipeg two or three nights before I left home last January to come to Ottawa to attend this session of parliament.

The man who spoke to me was a carpenter named Gus Johnson, a gentleman I have known for some time. He was giving me a bit of advice about the session, and made this interesting suggestion: "Don't worry too much about trying to get taxes reduced, but give the government so-and-so for their failure to give us good value for our taxes".

I think it is really regrettable that the unfairnesses and injustices in the taxation structure, about which we have been talking during the course of this debate, lead us to a point where sometimes we consider that our main job is to try to have taxes reduced. I think the far more important thing is to find out what the government does with the tax moneys. I would say to the government of the day that their future depends not so much upon the taxation structure as upon the measures they take to achieve a really high level of economic activity, to raise the level of wages and the standard of income of all our people and to provide definite social security. It has been said a good many times in this debate, but it is well to repeat it, that one of the most striking remarks made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech was his admission that more than half of the income earning people in Canada receive incomes below the income tax exemption level.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but this is wandering a bit far from the resolutions we are considering, the schedule of income tax rates. It is probably relevant to discuss, under these resolutions, almost any feature of the income tax act which relates to personal income tax, but I would hope that my hon. friend would endeavour to keep within that field.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would hope that the minister would appreciate the fact that at least I did not get into the preview of old age pensions which we had a little while ago, which was stretching the rules a bit.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was close. There are deductions permitted from personal income tax for pension purposes and I think that was relevant. But to discuss the use which the government makes of the taxes it collects is going a bit far afield from the income tax schedules.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am quite prepared to abbreviate my remarks. I have made my point that the important thing is what the government does with the taxes it collects.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are in agreement there.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad that the minister agrees with me and I hope that by the time he relinquishes his post as Minister of Finance he will not still have to say that more than half of the people of this country are living below the income tax exemption level.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not fair. You are just kidding the troops.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am quoting what the minister said in his budget speech.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am prepared to leave it at that. When one reaches the point where he starts getting interruptions of this kind he realizes that he is making his point, and so I am quite prepared to sit down.

Mr. HAZEN: There is a matter to which I would direct the attention of the minister in the hope that something will be done. This is the second time that I have referred to it. I referred to it about ten months ago. It has to do with the income tax on domestic servants, particularly those in the maritime provinces.

In order to arrive at the income of a domestic servant for taxation purposes under the Income War Tax Act, the value of board and lodging provided by the employer is added to the wages the servant receives. When a domestic servant in the maritime provinces files an income tax return he or she is obliged to add to the cash received as wages the sum of $26 a month or $312 a year for board and lodging supplied by his or her employer; but when a domestic servant in the province of Quebec files his or her income tax return he or she is required to add to the cash income received, not $26 a month or $312 a year for board and lodging, but $15 a month or $180 a year. It is ridiculous to suggest that a domestic servant employed in the maritime provinces has board and lodging any better or at greater cost than a domestic servant who is living in a mansion in Montreal or vicinity, or in some luxurious apartment house in Montreal, or in any other city in the province of Quebec. These hard-working people who reside in the maritimes are being discriminated against. They are, in my opinion, getting an unfair deal. There is no reason why their income should be increased in this unfair manner and their taxes increased in consequence. Last year, on July 24, I brought this matter to the attention of the present Minister of Finance, and I was supported in the stand I took by the hon. member for Halifax who said that he also had received complaints. The present minister said then that he would be glad to look into the matter and he added:

> I agree with both members that there should be no discrimination between servants employed in the maritimes and those employed in other provinces. I shall look into the matter and see what is causing this condition.

I do not know whether the minister in the past ten months has had an opportunity to look into the matter or not, but I am informed that this discrimination continues. It should have been done away with long ago. In fact it should never have existed. I would ask the minister why this discrimination exists. I have given the amounts that are imposed on domestic servants in the maritimes and in Quebec for board and lodging. I have referred to Quebec, because that is the only other province for which I have the figures. I ask the minister to give us the figures that are imposed for board and lodging in the other provinces.

While I am on my feet, I should like to direct the minister's attention to another matter that was brought up last year by the hon. member for Halifax when he supported me on the taxation of domestic servants. At that time he said that he had brought to the minister's attention, then the acting minister of finance, the case of railway porters, stewards and waiters who operate on the Atlantic division between Halifax and Montreal. They complain that, whereas those who operate in the central and other regions of the Canadian National railway system are not taxed on tips, those operating in the Atlantic region are taxed to the amount of $300. I do not know whether that situation has been remedied or not, but it does seem to me unfair that that condition should have existed. I would ask the minister if that situation has been remedied and, if not, why it has not been.

Mr. ISNOR: Before the minister replies, may I say briefly that I support what has been said by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I very well recall bringing before the minister last July the case of the porters, stewards and waiters of the Canadian National railway system in particular. So far as I know, that situation still exists in the Atlantic region and does not apply either to the central or western divisions of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. ABBOTT: Answering both hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, following the statements which were made last year I took the matter up with the then deputy minister, Mr. Elliott, and was told at the time that there was no discrimination. My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will look into the matter at once. I doubt whether there is any discrimination. There may be some variation in the amounts which are reported by individuals as the value of board and lodging for domestic servants. If my memory serves me correctly, that was the information which I had been given on previous occasions when this matter was brought up; but I was informed—it is not in my department, of course—that there was not a case of a rate fixed for one district and a lower rate fixed for another. The question has been brought up again; and may I say that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has assured me that he will go into it at once and see exactly what the situation is and will be able to give my hon. friend an answer either when we come to the bill or when the bill is in committee.

Mr. HAZEN: When I get the answer I should like to have the information I asked for in regard to the other provinces. I said I referred only to Quebec because these were the only figures I had. The information I gave referred to the city of Montreal, which showed that it was $15 a month.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will get the full statement.

Mr. HAZEN: It was $15 a month for board and lodging, while it was $26 a month in New Brunswick and other parts of the maritimes. I should like to have the figures for the other provinces as well.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will give my hon. friend a full statement as to what is allowed in all the provinces. It may require consultation—I do not know; I am not the Minister of National Revenue—with inspectors in the various districts. But my hon. friend is entitled to the information which he has asked for, and I know that my colleague will see that he gets it.

Mr. SKEY: May I return the discussion for a moment to the subject brought up by the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Parkdale, namely, the meagre exemption of $250 allowed as an income tax deduction for employed married women?

Mr. ABBOTT: I know my hon. friend wants to be accurate. A married woman pays no tax until she earns over $750 a year. But if she earns over $250 her husband's exemption is decreased proportionately.

Mr. SKEY: I thank the minister for checking me up on that. That was the point I wanted to make. There are many husbands whose wives are employed to some extent or partly employed, making up to $250 or between $250 and $700 a year. The husbands of these women are called upon to inform their employers of their wives' income so that the proper deduction can be made from their pay. It may be a small point but I think it is fairly important, in that there are many men who do not care to inform their employers that their wives are working. For that reason it leads to a number of women giving up their jobs, a number of women who are in essential employment, and I shall refer to only one case, namely, that of laundries. I do not suppose there is an hon. member in the committee who, during the last year, has not had some difficulty in having his laundry returned to him. If they have not, I am sure that the wives know of the situation which exists today all across Canada with regard to laundries and that type of business which employs a high percentage of women. Laundries have been hit particularly hard by this tax ruling, as have restaurants, bakeries and other types of business employing women workers chiefly. You have only to walk down the street of any big city today to see the signs in the windows saying "waitress wanted" to know what is happening in the country. If one wishes to get an impressive illustration of the situation today he has only to refer to the want ad sections of the daily newspapers. I realize that this employment problem is bringing a large revenue to the daily papers, and I would be the last one to want to cut into their revenue, but you see column after column of advertising asking for women to take employment in all types of industry. I am one who feels strongly that this ruling which says that income tax must be paid by the husband on the amount between $250 and $750 on his wife's wages, has caused this situation to a great extent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have two examples of what appears to me to be discrimination so far as income tax payments are concerned. I had a communication from the widow of a doctor who lived in my part of the city. When the doctor died some three years ago he left not only his wife but two daughters. In the meantime both the daughters have married and moved out of the city. One moved to Hamilton, but I do not know to what place the other moved. It is necessary for this lady to retain the services of her servant or maid, and she has complained to me in the strongest language that it is impossible for her to carry on. She has lived in the home for thirty years and raised her family there. While that is only one example, there are many other such cases. I should like to know if the government has in view any amendment or regulation to give redress to cases such as that.

Earlier in the evening some hon. member mentioned widowers. I know of many widowers who retain their own homes. A few moments ago the minister said, well, if they cannot keep their home they can go to a boarding house or apartment, or something to that effect. That does not seem to me to be fair treatment to a widower who wants to keep up his home so that his family may come to stay with him or visit him for the holiday or longer in the summer time. Has the department additional allowance in view along that line?

Let me give another case which does not seem fair. Take a man in a position like the Prime Minister of this country. I have no right perhaps to mention his case, but he occupies a big home like many other men who keep up big homes. However, in the case of the Prime Minister he is under a tremendous expense because he must keep a home to receive and perhaps to take care of those who may visit him. In his case he is forced to pay heavy taxation and has little allowance, being a bachelor. There seems to be an acute need for improvement in our income tax set-up. The two examples I have mentioned do not seem to be quite fair. What is the real explanation of the treatment meted out to the widow or widower and to bachelors maintaining homes such as the Prime Minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, the exemption is based on married status or its equivalent. In the case of the widow to whom he has referred, when her husband died and she was supporting the two children in the house she had a $1,500 exemption. If her children marry and go away that exemption is reduced to that of a single person, $750, and if she is in the income tax bracket that I was discussing a moment ago with the hon. member for Peel she would pay something in the order of $100 to $150 a year more tax than she did before her husband died or while she was still supporting children in the house. But that applies to everyone who lives in a house. It is a way of life, and we do not assist in paying for self-contained domestic establishments by giving increased exemptions if the taxpayer has no dependents to support.

As regards the bachelor, I do not know that we should amend the income tax law to allow the Prime Minister to get an additional income tax credit. These are the reasons. The additional exemption is due to the married status or its equivalent. It is not an inducement, but a special concession handed out to those who are supporting wives and children or dependents.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to join with those who have spoken in disapproval of the income tax as a means of discouraging people from working. The minister expresses unwillingness to modify the income tax in such a way as to encourage people to work. I suggest to him that the country wants him to say whether or not he is equally unwilling to modify the income tax structure so as to discourage people from working. The Canadian people, generally speaking, need no encouragement to work if they are given the chance, but it is certainly unfair to discourage them from working, and I maintain that for the last several years the income tax structure has been such as to discourage them from doing work that needs to be done. The time has come to overhaul the income tax structure in order to see that such defects in it are corrected.

I wish to say one thing more and it has to do with production on the farms. I do not know whether it has been brought to the minister's attention, but if it has not I should like to point it out to him now. There is a serious falling off of production in western Canada, at least in the matter of hogs, beef, wool and a great many other things which are needed vitally in the life of the nation. This situation is bad and should be remedied. A few days ago I had a letter from an outstanding agriculturist in my constituency, who, speaking of hogs, said that the falling off in production was not the result particularly of the price of grain or the scarcity of grain or the scarcity of labour or the price of hogs, but simply of the fact that if a man came in after a hard day's work feeding hogs to produce food for the nation he was immediately penalized for doing so. Surely no intelligent group of people governing a nation will permit such a condition to continue. I hope that is sufficiently emphatic and does not need to be remarked upon again.

I would say this in conclusion. I think the suggestion this man made to me in his letter was sound. He said that the first $800 which a man makes from producing, on the side, food such as beef, pork, eggs, butter, potatoes and other needs of life ought to be exempt from taxation, regardless of what his taxation might be in respect of other activities on his farm. That may present some difficulties, but these difficulties must be met and overcome, because this tendency to discourage production of food in this country must be stopped.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tells me he did not finish his story in connection with Gus Johnson, his Swedish friend. Gus mentioned that he did not like the income tax particularly, but ten years ago he was on relief, and he is much happier paying income tax on an income than he would be back on relief. I think he was speaking for the great majority of Canadians. We do not like income tax very well, but most of us would rather have an income that places us in the income tax brackets than belong to the majority of Canadian wage-earners who do not receive an income high enough to be taxable. I will not pursue that line further.

Members of this group have repeatedly emphasized the fact that it is not the amount of income tax one pays that is important but rather the amount one has left after paying the tax. Ministers of finance have never been able to satisfy the members of our group but we persevere in our argument. It was the minister of finance of New Zealand, Hon. Walter Nash, who captivated the minds of members of our parliament when he was here early in the war, when he outlined the fiscal policy of his country. He said that no one who put on a uniform for his country should find himself in a worse position because of his service, and, second, that no one who remained at home should find himself in a better position because of having remained at home.

I thought that these opinions had been forgotten by members of the Canadian cabinet, but I happened to be in Montreal in January of this year and heard the Minister of National Defence speak at a public gathering, when he said that it was the policy of the Canadian government so to prosecute the war that no one who put on a uniform for his country would be in a worse position because of having offered his service, and he mentioned the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was doing everything in his power to see that those who served Canada in the army, air force and navy would not be in a worse position than if they had remained at home. The Minister of National Defence was given a warm ovation when he mentioned that his colleague from Montreal, St. Antoine-Westmount, the present Minister of Finance, was doing his job in seeing that those who remained at home were not to be in a better position financially because of having remained at home.

I am afraid, however, the record of performance will not support that claim. Recently the Minister of National Revenue tabled some information in reply to some of my questions. The information was given on May 26, indicating the financial position of our people in the top brackets. The minister did not reveal how many Canadians receive incomes of $200,000 or more. The Minister of Agriculture gave approximate information. Apparently he has information that is not available to the rest of us. He indicated that there are between twenty and twenty-five in that bracket and suggested it was not really worth while for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to raise this question.

Well, these twenty or twenty-five, after paying income tax according to the 1948 budget, will each have left a minimum of $67,657 a year, which appears to me to be quite a sizeable sum. Those who receive $100,000 will have left $43,987, which is not to be sneezed at in most parts of the country. Those receiving $75,000 will have $36,152 left; those who receive $50,000 will have to spend $27,067. Those who are down to $20,000 will have to get along on $13,960, and so on down the brackets. But we had 587 Canadians in 1946 who had incomes of $50,000 or more and who had left $27,067 or more to spend.

I have in my hand a Canadian press dispatch from London, dated May 5, to the effect that only forty-five people in the United Kingdom have net incomes of $24,000. The dispatch says:

> Before the war 7,000 persons in the United Kingdom had net incomes after taxation of £6,000 ($24,000) or more. Last year there were only sixty; and now there are forty-five.
> Yet in the same period the number of income taxpayers has about doubled.
> These figures are given in a white paper on national income and expenditure issued by Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I submit that in the United Kingdom, with their much larger population, if they have only forty-five persons who had incomes of $24,000 a year or more, there must be something wrong with our taxation policy when we leave 584 Canadians who have incomes of $27,000, $36,000, $43,000 and $67,000 after paying income tax, according to the 1948 budget.

In conclusion, can the Minister of Finance tell us what difference it would make to our revenues in Canada if all single persons receiving less than $1,000 and all married persons receiving less than $2,000 were exempt from paying income tax? Has the minister the information available?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that it would make a difference of roughly $200 million.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I hope the fact that the Minister of Finance made no reference to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosedale, and supported by the hon. member for Carleton, does not mean that he was not interested in it. Indeed I very much hope that he may say something about it. To me it seemed to be a most important and interesting suggestion, and I would think it has to do with something which, regardless of party, we in this house would approve, namely, helping people to help themselves. I appreciate that there may be difficulties. The difficulties of administration may be great. I understand that it is one thing to have a pension plan brought forward by an organization which can take care of all the details, which can practically assure the minister that the thing will be carried out in a businesslike way, and that it is another thing to deal with individuals. Nevertheless, it seems to me that there is basically an inescapable fairness in what the hon. member for Rosedale suggested. Once more may I say that it seems to me that, to whatever extent it may be made effective, the suggestion does move in the direction in which, as I said a moment ago, I believe we all want to go, namely, helping people to help themselves. Therefore I would earnestly hope that the minister would find it in his heart to say that the idea is of interest, that it will not be disregarded, that, in spite of the difficulties, the thing will be studied and whatever else he feels he can say with regard to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I was greatly interested in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosedale, and I intend to study carefully what he said. Of course, offhand I can see certain obvious objections. Any such government plan which was made purely voluntary would mean that some people would come in to it and some would not. I agree that it is desirable to get people to help themselves as much as possible; but if you have a government plan of that kind which is purely voluntary, you will be faced with some people who have provided their own social security and others who have been improvident and have not done so, but who, nevertheless, if in need, will insist upon being looked after and who will have to be looked after in their old age. So that offhand it would seem to me that is one objection. However, the subject is one which has a great many ramifications and would require a great deal of study. I was most interested in what the hon. gentleman said, and he can rest assured, as can the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, that I will study it carefully. Other than that, I cannot be expected to offer any comment this evening.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to mention two problems which were laid before me by the representatives of the halibut fleet in Prince Rupert. For the people in many of the fishing villages up the British Columbia coast the cost is quite heavy when they go to a hospital, especially if they have to take their families along with them for medical purposes. They wish to have the cost of transportation to a hospital included in the amount which is deductible for medical expenses. It is getting prohibitive for a man, his wife and family to live in these villages up the coast if medical attention is needed for the family. They cannot afford to go out to get it. I also found out that, owing to the fact that there is a shortage of accommodation in the hospitals at the present time, these people who come from Massett in the Queen Charlotte islands and go down to Vancouver to receive hospitalization are told that they must leave the hospital as soon as possible. Granted that while they are in hospital, the amount of their expense is deductible; but when they are discharged from hospital and have to live in Vancouver in order to receive treatment in the hospital each day, the cost of their board and room and their expenses while living in Vancouver is something they are not able to put in as a deduction. Further, if they get drugs through any other source than the hospital, they are not able to mark up their cost as a deduction. Therefore, on behalf of the small communities on the coast, especially where the fishermen live, in order that these communities may grow and become prosperous, I should like to have the benefits I have mentioned extended to these people.

Another matter is one which I can best outline by reference to a letter sent by the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Settlement Service to the inspector of income tax in Vancouver. It reads in part:

> In many instances we have cases where assessments are not made for three years after the return is filed, and any differences there may be are assessed and on this non-payment interest is charged for the full three years, and both the fishermen and myself feel that this is not fair and interest should be charged from the date of assessment.

In some cases the mistake may be made by the income tax office itself; yet the fishermen has to pay the interest on the amount he owes, even though it is not his mistake. Some rectification should be made in regard to this matter, because it has been a burning problem there, as many of the men have had interest charged against them where really it should not have been charged.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take note of my hon. friend's remarks and see what, if anything, can be done.

Mr. HARKNESS: I wish to refer to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. The minister stated that he would produce the figures for the various provinces as to the amounts which domestic servants are required to show in their income tax returns for board and lodging. I wonder if he would do the same thing as far as hired men in the various provinces are concerned. I have heard a few complaints in regard to the matter, and I think it might be well perhaps to have it cleared up at the same time. I have reference to hired men on farms. I do not know whether it is practical or not to do anything about the matter but in our part of the country at any rate the fact that the farmer has been required to collect the income tax out of the payment he makes to his hired man has been productive of a great deal of difficulty and a great deal of trouble. The practical effect of this requirement has been that the farmer who himself turned in an income tax return and in that return reported what he paid to his hired man and deducted from his hired man's wages the amount required, in most cases lost his hired man and lost him to the man who did not turn in an income tax return or who turned in an incorrect one, we will say, or something along that line. As I say, I do not know whether there is any practical means of correcting that situation, but I should like to bring it to the minister's attention, because it has been the reason why at least two farmers whom I know have had to cease business in our part of the country, owing to the fact that they could not get hired men. Their hired man said, "Well, you are taking so much a month away from me because of income tax. Nobody else around the country is doing it, and I won't work here". These people found it impossible to keep hired men, so they just quit. They were oldish people anyway, and could not carry on by themselves.

As I say, the average farmer is not in the same class as the businessman who keeps regular books and is in a position to make deductions from the wages he pays his employees. A large number of farmers do not know anything about this and just will not bother with it. As a result, I say it works out in a very unfair way to the people who do make an effort to comply with the law, and causes them to lose their hired men. It seems to me that, from the practical point of view, the amount of money the government would realize through collections made in its behalf by farmers from hired men would not be sufficient to compensate for the difficulty and trouble it causes, so I would ask that the matter be given some thought and consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. FAIR: I should like to get same information from the minister. Once before I thought we had this matter settled, but I see the administration entirely ignores some of the answers given by the former minister, so I would like to have this thing squared up and perhaps get some definite information so that farmers making up their tax returns may know exactly where they stand. This form I hold in my hand is the blue form used by farmers. On the back, under the heading, "Notes re farm receipts and expenses", I find this paragraph:

4. Produce used from "family garden" and small sums usually termed "pin money" obtained by the wife, sons or daughters, by their own efforts, need not be taken into account.

I understand that the practice, at least in the Edmonton district, is that all this has to be accounted for, even though in most cases produce of this kind is raised by the wife and children. They are allowed no wages whatever for the work they do, and the farmer is billed for income tax on all the income received from the sale of all produce, whether raised by himself, his hired help, or his wife and family. Then again under the same heading I see this paragraph:

Produce raised on the farm and consumed in the farm home: Include only commercial produce raised for sale as part of regular farm operations. Do not include produce of unsaleable quality or produce from family garden. Value at price you would ordinarily receive for the produce.

I understand that in the Edmonton district a charge of $50 is made against each member of the family for produce grown and consumed on the farm. I should like some definite information in connection with this clause, which, I understand, has been causing a great deal of trouble, because there is not uniformity of administration.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me, I shall have that looked into. It will not be possible to give an answer tonight, but I will try to give it on the section of the bill relating to the income tax schedules.

Mr. FAIR: I would be glad if the minister would do that.

Then, before getting away from some other points that have been raised, I should like to ask the minister some questions in connection with the brief presented not so long ago by the Alberta Farmers' Union and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section. On May 12, when I was speaking on the budget, I did not have sufficient time to complete what I wanted to say, so I am going to bring these points to the attention of the minister now so that he may give me the answers at the same time.

These organizations are asking for a four-year average for income tax purposes, for farmers. I realize that we now have a three-year average, but I believe that should be extended to four or even five years in order to give a fair average. Then they recommend that in the case of dispersal sales of live stock, an equivalent number of animals to those owned on January 1, 1941, be considered a capital asset and not subject to income tax. I believe there is just cause for complaint in this connection, and I should like very much to have the minister give this matter consideration also.

Next they ask that the exemptions be increased to $1,200 and $2,400 for single and married persons respectively. The minister has told us there will not be any changes in the exemptions this year, but I am going at least to request that further consideration be given this point.

The next request is that an allowance be made for the labour of farm families in connection with production on the farms. For many years those of us who represent agricultural constituencies have been trying to get some allowance or some exemption from income tax on account of the work done by farm wives and families. Up to the present time we have not been successful, but I am hoping that at last the government will see that some justice is done in this connection.

Then, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary East, these organizations request that the farmer should not be made responsible for income tax deductions from the wages of his hired help. As the hon. member has said, farm help is scarce; if a farmer collects the tax on the wages of his hired man, that man will just go to the farmer next door and get a job there, and the first farmer will be left without help.

Then they recommend that payments of arrears of principal on the farm home, and on machinery debts and all that kind of thing, contracted prior to 1940 when we were coming out of the depression, should be allowed as an expense of the year in which the payments are made.

They also request that the income tax form be simplified. If all the farmers were bookkeepers they would be able to get along with the present forms, but since they are not bookkeepers it is quite a job for them to make out these returns.

Then item No. 12 in this brief requests uniformity of interpretation and administration of the act, and I believe that request should be given consideration.

Another question which has caused some trouble is in regard to the expense incurred by farmers in brushing and breaking land. I find that in some cases a farmer who has hired an outside man, perhaps a contractor, to clear and break his land is not allowed that expense as a deduction. In one instance which I referred to the department, they did allow the cost of breaking, because that was ploughing, but not the cost of brushing; but before this particular piece of land could be ploughed, it had to be brushed. I believe that should be taken into consideration as an expense and allowable in the year in which payment is made. If the farmer hires a man by the month or by the year and has him do that work, there is no question whatever about the expense being allowed as a deduction.

Then I believe money expended in drilling or boring wells or excavating dugouts on the farm, together with all equipment for this work, should be chargeable as a current expense. That has not been done in the past; only recently, I think, have farmers claimed depreciation on wells and other things of that kind. I believe consideration should be given this request also.

Then I am going to give the minister a suggestion that was made by one of my constituents in Hughenden, a man named Nicholson, who discussed the income tax with me last fall. He suggested that the government include in its programme of public information some information dealing with the making up of income tax returns by farmers. If the government does not find it feasible to do this by way of radio programmes I would suggest that a booklet be made up setting out the things allowable as expenses and giving all other information, so that farmers may understand exactly what the department expects of them in connection with filing their returns.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take note of my hon. friend's questions and try to give him an answer later.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the special war revenue resolutions?

Mr. ABBOTT: What is the wish of the committee with respect to these income tax resolutions? Do we carry on, or could we pass them?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to press it, but we have had three hours of discussion on the income tax rates. There are a number of other resolutions we have to discuss, so I wonder if we could not carry these.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Which do you refer to?

Mr. ABBOTT: I refer to resolutions 1, 2 and 3. They are all together. Then, under the other ten resolutions, we could carry on with the matters therein dealt with.

Mr. FLEMING: I have one question in respect of resolution No. 3.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I could answer the hon. member's question on the next section, if the committee would agree to that procedure. I am anxious to make progress; that is all.

Mr. GREEN: Why not let the first resolution pass?

Mr. ADAMSON: The first two.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then I understand the committee is prepared to pass resolutions 1 and 2.

Resolutions 1 and 2 agreed to.

Resolution 3 stands.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCIVOR—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT ON LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, there appears on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen, and also of the Ottawa Journal, this headline: "Mentions McGeer To Succeed King". My correction, sir, is that while we thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) for his brain wave, we of the Liberal party will be satisfied for the next ten years with our present leadership.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my hon. friend took note that I did not choose the next leader of the Liberal party. All I suggested was that there was an additional man mentioned. I do hope that we shall not reach the stage very soon when it will be libellous to mention a man in connection with the leadership of a great party such as that.

MR. COCKERAM—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN TORONTO "DAILY STAR"

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I refer to an article in last night's Daily Star headed "Gold Industry Using Powerful Lobby in Ottawa". The article contains two paragraphs, as follows:

A powerful pressure campaign by gold mining and associated industries is under way in Canada to force the federal government to help them, informed sources said today.

Veteran observers here say nothing like it has been known since the days of the great railway lobbies in the pioneering era, when governments were made or unmade by these powerful interests.

As one who is actively engaged in the gold mining industry, and who has had much to say in the house on behalf of that industry, I deny absolutely that there is any such thing as a lobby. This article is, in my opinion, a figment of the imagination of the writer, and does much harm to an industry which at present is going through very difficult times.

MR. FLEMING—ERROR IN VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF MAY 28

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): On a question of privilege may I draw your attention, sir, to what appears to be an error in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday. At page 461 Votes and Proceedings records that resolution No. 5, Special War Revenue Act, was reported favourably by the committee of ways and means yesterday. As will be seen at page 3592 of Hansard, this particular resolution was withdrawn in the committee by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I think clearly there is an error on page 461 of Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have taken note of the remarks made by the hon. member and shall direct that the correction be made.

Mr. MAYHEW: I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. This resolution was dropped, and it appears in Votes and Proceedings in error; I would ask that it be changed.

[Mr. McIvor.]

CANCER

Mrs. STRUM:

From 1935 to 1945 what was the annual expenditure through the national research council directed at finding the cause and cure of cancer?

Mr. McILRAITH:

Note.—The National Research Council has not established medical research laboratories under its own auspices but since 1938, through an advisory committee on medical research, has stimulated and correlated research by medical scientists in the laboratories of the various medical schools throughout Canada, where the necessary facilities for such work already exist.

Any person qualified to direct medical research and having the required fundamental laboratory facilities at his disposal, may apply to the council for a grant in aid of a specific research project on which he desires to work, and if the proposed project is approved by the advisory committee, a grant in aid of the research may be awarded by the National Research Council.

OFFICIAL HISTORY OF WORLD WARS I AND II

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many volumes of the official history of world war I have been published? What periods are covered thereby?

2. When will further volumes covering the rest of the war be forthcoming?

3. Is a history of world war II being prepared, and if so, when is it anticipated that the first volume will be available?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Two volumes. One deals with medical services; the other volume comprises volume I—general series, Official History of World War I, covering period from the commencement of the war in August, 1914, to September, 1915, with another volume of appendices and maps relative to the same period.

2. No further volumes will be published but the material collected will be made available for qualified historians and others.

3. Yes. Histories of world war II are planned as follows:

Present plans are that the naval history will have three volumes, of which two should be published during the current fiscal year and the third next year.

The army has already published three popular accounts under the heading "The Canadian Army at War" of which No. 1 covered "The Canadians in Britain 1939-44", No. 2 from Pachino to Ortona "The Canadian Campaign in Sicily and Italy, 1943" and No. 3 "Canada's Battle in Normandy." A total of 33,000 copies of these three numbers have been published and distributed and they are now out of print. A reprint is now in the hands of the printer. The Canadian army historical section has in course of preparation a one-volume history of the Canadian Army during the war which will be published during the current fiscal year. It has also in course of preparation, a four-volume history to be published over the next four years. The final volume will contain a general account of the work of all three services and of Canada's war effort as a whole.

Two volumes of a popular narrative of the R.C.A.F. overseas have already been published. The first, "The R.C.A.F. Overseas: The First Four Years" was published in 1944. 13,000 were printed, 11,500 were sold. The second, "The R.C.A.F. Overseas: The Fifth Year" was published in 1945 and 3,500 copies were sold. These were published by the Oxford University Press with private backing and the proceeds went to the R.C.A.F. benevolent fund. The third volume completing this story is in course of preparation and should be printed this year.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GRANTS FOR EDUCATIONAL BUILDINGS, SCHOLARSHIPS, ETC.

Mr. PROBE:

What federal grants have been expended for each province of Canada in each fiscal year since April 1, 1936, under each of the following heads: (a) capital grants for educational buildings; (b) bursaries or scholarships; (c) apprentice training grants; (d) special grants for equipment or machinery used in vocational, apprentice or non-military or non-veteran youth training; (e) grants for equipment or machinery to retraining of veterans; (f) grants toward instructors' salaries for veteran training in (i) vocational subjects; (ii) pre-university academic instruction; (iii) university instruction?

IMMIGRATION

PRESS REPORT OF PROPOSED GROUP MOVEMENT OF DISPLACED PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Press reports this morning indicate that group movements of thousands of displaced persons at the request of employers in two Canadian industries are under consideration by the government and will probably take place in the near future. The reports go on to say as well that the government is considering an early movement of girls from the displaced persons camps in Europe to enter domestic service in Canada. Will the minister be good enough to give the house full information with respect to these press reports?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In the first place there is under way a movement of fourteen hundred men for the lumber industry in Ontario under the terms of a recent order in council—not a special order in council, but an enlargement of the basis of entry under the law. There is nothing new about that, of course. Other matters in connection with what my hon.

friend spoke about are under consideration at the moment, and when a final decision is arrived at a statement will be made to the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: From where are the fourteen hundred to come?

Mr. MITCHELL: From the displaced persons camps.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT PLANT—USE OF MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of a report in last night's Ottawa Citizen will the minister assure the house that the R.C.M.P. will not be used in the Ottawa Car and Aircraft strike?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Police are not used in a strike; they are used in the maintenance of law and order. I regret to say that no such assurance as that asked by the hon. member can be given, and I think my hon. friend is well aware why no such assurance can be given. If a request is made through the regular channels the request will be considered and dealt with in the usual way in accordance with well established practice.

FUR

REPORT AS TO UNITED STATES EMBARGO ON CANADIAN MINK PELTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): This morning I addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question which may be a problem for him or for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If the matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce probably the question will be considered as a notice. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been informed by the United States government that they propose to place an embargo on Canadian mink pelts? What action has the minister taken in this matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The short answer to the question is no. This rumour apparently arose out of testimony given before the subcommittee of the agriculture committee of the house of representatives, which is now investigating the fur industry in the United States. The hon. member will recall that there was a similar rumour current last December, and that it was denied by the state department.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER WITH RESPECT TO READING OF SPEECHES

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate on the budget has now been concluded. The house has taken steps by appropriate resolutions to facilitate its consideration of the business of the session still to be dealt with.

I thought, therefore, it would be opportune and meet with the approval of the hon. members if I drew attention to one of the rules of the house that has been frequently disregarded in previous debates, and perhaps particularly in the debate that has just finished.

Suggestions are frequently made with regard to amendments to the rules governing the business of the house, and I have no doubt these could be improved. However, I would point out to hon. members that rules are of little value unless they are observed, and that this can be achieved only by the cooperation of hon. members themselves.

The rule to which I have referred is that a member when speaking should not read from a written, previously prepared speech. As early as the year 1886, the House of Commons of that day adopted the following resolution:

> That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official report of the debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of parliament.

Long usage both in Canada and the United Kingdom has sanctioned the rule that a member while speaking must not read from a written, previously prepared speech—Bourinot, page 335, Beauchesne's third edition, page 102, May, fourteenth edition, page 417. I am sure hon. members will agree that the best tradition of House of Commons debates is served by a member using his own language and delivering his remarks in the form of an unwritten composition. If the rule were otherwise members might read speeches written by other people and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who are not the properly elected representatives of the people.

I have noticed that quite understandably non-observance of the rule by one or more hon. members encourages others to do likewise.

I urge therefore that hon. members give practical recognition to this rule, and in future, refrain from reading their speeches. I am sure that this will be in the best interest of the house and the proper conduct of its business.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask Your Honour whether that applies to Your Honour as well?

Mr. SPEAKER: A few days after I had been selected by this house as its Speaker I noticed a similar question in a newspaper, but I do not believe that the hon. gentleman who has just made that remark had anything to do with it. However his remark is not a contribution to the dignity and decorum of this house.

Mr. CHURCH: Our rules are like the domesday book.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE OF RATIO OF LOAN TO LENDING VALUE UNDER PART I, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I propose to make a few remarks on this bill to amend the National Housing Act. As I understand it, the bill is an attempt to bring down the costs and carrying charges of housing in Canada. The minister is of course approaching the problem by attempting to increase the amortization periods and lower interest charges, which is something for which we should give him credit. Certainly it is a step in the right direction and one might say, so far so good. But I wish to say to him, and I hope to say it in such a way that it will stick, that he will never get anywhere this way, and we shall never have the lower income groups in this country properly housed by picking at the problem as he is doing.

We have seen in recent weeks the failure of the Housing Enterprises scheme. We know that the wartime housing programme, although very valuable as a temporary measure in these difficult times of housing, offers no long-term solution to the problem of low rent housing. The minister himself has said it is a temporary measure and that he will withdraw from the field. The fact remains with us, as has been said so many times from the opposition benches since I have been in the house, that the housing of the low income groups requires houses for rental at $25 a month or less.

We have rightly been concerned in the past two years with the immediate problem of veterans housing, and that need goes on. I am not discussing that subject at this moment. I have discussed it many times before. But the fact that that need is with us is perhaps hiding from our gaze another important fact, that there is a long-term low-rent housing problem and a slum problem in Canada.

I have here a housing survey made by the Vancouver Housing Association in my own city in 1939 and brought up to date in 1946. It is a most excellent examination of housing conditions in Vancouver, prepared by experts who did years of work on it. It not only sets out arguments for slum clearance and low rent housing but does something else that is very valuable indeed. It gives some facts and figures on the bad housing conditions in a Canadian city. Too often we have to go to United States cities to get these figures.

I wish to give a few excerpts from this report, which will not be all inclusive but yet will give us some idea of housing in one Canadian city today. I will not refer to the particular areas I am talking about. Although they are set out in the report, I do not want to single out any area in Vancouver for unfavourable mention.

The first extract I want to read is this:

> No less than 59 per cent of the houses surveyed in this area were found to be in multiple occupancy, and over 40 per cent of the "rooming" population was living at a density of two or more persons per room. Compare this figure with the commonly accepted minimum standard of room occupation of one person per room . . . The majority of the rooms are rented as housekeeping units, but few of them have adequate facilities for washing, cooking or food storage. Under 10 per cent of the rented rooms had sinks or washbasins and only 5 per cent of the houses in multiple occupancy had more than one bath. Cases of twenty, forty or even fifty persons sharing one bathroom were found. East of Granville street over half the houses were heated by stoves only and a large proportion of the rooms in these houses were inadequately heated.

Referring to another area I read this:

> Fifteen per cent of the houses surveyed in this district required major structural repairs; probably at least half of these houses are beyond repair and should be demolished. Seventeen per cent of the houses lacked baths. Four per cent had outside toilets. Only twenty-five per cent had central heating.

Then referring to another area:

> The housing throughout this area is of very poor quality. In the . . . section, where conditions are worst, 18 per cent of the houses surveyed were in very bad repair, 19 per cent had no baths, and 7 per cent were badly crowded. Interspersed with industrial buildings and bisected by the interurban tracks, this area bears all the hallmarks of a slum.

The report goes on to describe the existence of numerous cabins, waterfront shacks and house boats, and there is reference to many houses the rooms of which have no access at all to outside air. Although I will not burden the house with this, there are listed also numerous cases, which the people making the survey found, of families living in the greatest hardship and under dreadful conditions.

I want to put my view on record as strongly as I can. I am certain that we shall never solve the housing problem in the low income groups without a subsidy on housing and without the dominion government bearing part of that subsidy and taking the lead in making the arrangements necessary to get this kind of scheme in operation.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member if this is his view or if it is the view of his party, when he speaks about subsidies on a federal scale?

Mr. TUSTIN: You speak for your party.

Mr. PROBE: It is a fair question, because he was putting forward his view and I am simply asking for amplification of it. Is it the view of the Conservative party or is it the view of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that subsidies on a federal scale should be granted?

Mr. MERRITT: I want to say to the hon. member who puts this fair question, that if he were as much interested in getting low rental housing for the lower income groups as he is in trying to make political capital, it would be more to his credit.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I asked the hon. member a question. I was not making a political speech at all.

Mr. GREEN: You got what you deserved.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was a fair comment.

Mr. PROBE: Let the hon. member answer the question. That is what I want.

Mr. MERRITT: I have answered the question, and I may say that is all the attention I am going to pay to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PROBE: It is a typical Tory answer.

Mr. MERRITT: And it was a typical C.C.F. question.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is trying to build houses with talk.

Mr. PROBE: That is all right. We can build them otherwise, too.

Mr. MERRITT: If I may go on, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that I am as certain as I stand here that this problem will never be solved until the dominion government takes the lead in bringing about a scheme of subsidies for low rental housing for those in the low income groups. I know that this session as well as in previous sessions, the minister has given his view against that. But I want to appeal to him again to change his mind and get after this problem. Faced as we are with the other problem of getting roofs over people's heads, there is some excuse perhaps at this moment for our not having such a scheme. But hon. members will recall that it was not until after a year of criticism and suggestions from this side of the house that the government got after the production of building materials so that we might deal with the present problem. They were a year late in realizing that necessity and getting after it. I do not want to see them a year late in promoting a scheme of low rental housing.

A programme like this cannot be developed in a minute. It requires cooperation at every level of government; it requires cooperation from citizens' committees, and it will require all sorts of work for whoever considers the setting up of a building company and getting going with the actual construction. When you think of the record of the government in bringing about any kind of agreement between the dominion and the provinces, you can visualize how they would be on the dominion, provincial and municipal level. That is why I am so anxious that they reverse their policy and make a decision to go after this now. I urge them not to be a year late again.

I am not advocating a sort of general wide-open building of houses by the dominion government for every person in Canada; far from it. All I am advocating is that cases of real need be taken care of. If we restrict any such scheme to cases of real need, the government will not have to worry about the cost which would be involved. It is not a question of making a hand-out to everyone in Canada; it is only a matter of dealing with the cases in which actual physical living conditions are now so greatly below standard as to imperil the health and the social security of the people. Any study I have made and any figures I have been given by responsible people indicate that if you tie your subsidized low rental housing scheme to slum clearance and see to it that the people you move into the houses are moved out of quarters which are unfit for human habitation, then you can keep your scheme under control and you do not let it get out of hand financially. Moreover, you have basic social security, a much better kind of social security, in my submission, than that provided by paying out cheques every month—even although measures of that kind may be necessary too. But I suggest that by this kind of scheme you are making a fundamental approach to the improvement of the health of the nation, and you are making a real contribution to the removal of juvenile delinquency. We have had one debate on that very important point, and we shall have another when we come to consider the Penitentiary Act again.

I want to give one more excerpt from this report on the contribution that would be made by a housing scheme to the solution of juvenile delinquency. Again I have actual figures obtained in this survey of a Canadian city, which will indicate what connection there is between housing conditions and juvenile crime. Again I shall not refer to the particular area. "In this area between such and such streets the average delinquency over the five years 1930-34 was fifteen delinquents per hundred of school population of comparable age as compared with under three per hundred in the outer areas of the city." I think that is a most striking example. The same report gives the costs of administration of police, social and other services in areas of the city, and it is shown that these figures are about the same in areas where housing is good, but that the costs are comparably higher in areas where housing is bad.

This matter has been discussed many times in this house, and my only reason for bringing it once more to the attention of the minister is that I feel that this is perhaps the latest time a scheme like this could be prepared and put into operation without again being late in meeting a real housing emergency. No doubt the agreement would be difficult to negotiate because three levels of government are concerned and each government would have to make some financial contribution. The proportions would have to be arrived at and of course the actual building would have to be done by a municipal or some other non-profit housing corporation. No city or province could go into it without the dominion giving a lead, because they would not dare embark upon that kind of expenditure alone. The matter is entirely in the hands of this government to do or not to do.

I conclude by saying that it would be more than inexcusable if the government were again late in embarking upon a programme which any government in Canada is bound to carry out in the next few years.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the house this afternoon, but I should like to make a few general observations as well as offer some earnest suggestions on this subject to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). My purpose in speaking is to draw the attention of the minister to the aspects of our housing problem which particularly affect the rural parts of the country. I feel that the government has been so busy and preoccupied with providing housing in the urban centres that it has done very little to assist in providing housing in rural parts. I know that there are difficulties to be faced, but the present legislation does provide for assistance in providing housing on farms and in rural areas.

Owing to conditions beyond our control the provisions of the act have not been applied to any extent to rural areas. They have been applied mainly to the larger towns and cities; I think I am quite right in saying that it has been found impossible to take advantage of them to build houses in the small villages and rural communities. I have analysed the act and the amendments provided by this bill and I feel sure that once he has been given these new powers the minister could carry out all the suggestions I am going to make.

The various government housing schemes which have been carried out in the last few years have been of great assistance to the cities. One needs only to go to Winnipeg or St. Boniface, to mention two cities in the central part of Manitoba, and he will see street after street of new houses which have been built in the last two or three years. That is a very happy condition and everyone who comes back to Winnipeg after having been away for a year or two notices it. It is all very well, and I rejoice with everyone else because these new houses have been built, but unfortunately this condition has had a counter-effect upon the rural parts of Manitoba.

There has been a siphoning off of people from the rural parts to the cities to a far greater extent than many realize. I suppose this is a natural consequence of the many new houses which have been built in the cities. As no houses have been built in our small villages or on the farms there is a tendency for people to move to points where houses are available. Contrary to common belief the people migrating to the cities have not been the younger people; it has been mostly older people. I know of many people who have retired from farms and instead of settling down in the village or town as they used to do in years gone by they have gone up to the city and bought a house. It is mostly these older retired people who have migrated to the city.

The provisions of this act have been taken advantage of in the larger towns and cities because the lending companies have felt that their investment was a little safer in those places and they were willing to make loans for houses. The small villages have been completely left out. In many of these villages there are no industries and the lending companies have felt that it would not be a good investment to lend money on houses. I hope that under the new amendments to the bill more assistance will be given to housing in the smaller villages. If this were done I believe that housing conditions in the cities would be alleviated. My suggestion to the minister is that more attention should be given to the small villages and unincorporated towns, as well as to the building of houses on farms.

Unfortunately very little has been done to promote better housing on our farms. So far the government has not even offered any suggestions to our farmers as to how they can get economical, decent and pleasant homes. I have here a booklet, containing a series of plans and designs, which was issued by the national housing administration. These plans are exclusively for homes for urban areas, although some of them could be adapted for use in larger towns. None of them could possibly fit the needs of any farmer, nor would they be suitable for homes on farms.

My further suggestion is that in order to fill that tremendous gap, to meet that pressing need, the minister at once conduct a competition in all the nine provinces to secure plans, designs and specifications for rural and, more particularly, farm housing. The minister has the power to do it. It is definitely stated in the act; all he has to do is to say the word and the thing will be done. If he does that, a great many people throughout Canada will be grateful and it will mean a service worth millions of dollars to that section of our country.

After all, in this country which is predominantly agricultural, a good third of the population are living in rural homes. There is a definite need for help, or for the giving of suggestions to the farmers, particularly when it can be done without great cost to the government, and would render such great service to all concerned.

Water is the one item which hampers housing operations in rural sections. This applies more particularly to my district, although it has some application generally throughout western Canada. I will refer to one instance in particular. In the Red River valley water is available, but unfortunately it is so alkaline that it cannot be used for household purposes. Under the heading of research, and at little cost to the government, the minister could give a helping hand if he were to send one or two scientists out there to make a complete analysis of the water supply in that area, which serves a large number of people. I would suggest that the water be analysed to see what can be done to improve it. Many companies have claimed that they could make first-class water out of it; but my understanding is that so far the cost has been prohibitive. I am sure that with a little research means could be found of purifying the water. This would mean a good supply of pure water for, I would say, half of the province of Manitoba. And I know this problem exists in many other parts of Canada.

If more attention were directed to housing in rural areas, the housing problem in the cities would be partly solved. As I said before, migration of people from the rural parts of Manitoba to the cities has been our greatest problem. I have made it a point to discuss the matter with individuals who have migrated to the cities, and the answer I received was that in most instances they had reached the age of retirement and had turned their farms over to their sons. They pointed out that they did not feel like entering into construction operations under conditions such as exist today. So much bother and cost was involved that they simply went to the cities and bought old houses.

Hon. members know that despite the housing shortage in various cities, anyone with cash can go to a city and buy a house. In the newspapers one always sees two or three columns listing houses for sale. That is exactly what these farmers have done. Young people who would have put up houses in towns have not the resources and cannot get the necessary assistance because, as I pointed out, the act is not applicable to smaller towns. Consequently younger people are in no position to put up houses. On the other hand the older people do not feel the urge and have reached an age where they do not wish to take the responsibility of building.

The result is that the younger people take the place of the older folk, and those older folk in turn migrate to the cities. Our rural population is decreasing, while that in the cities is increasing, and this adds to the headache of both federal and provincial governments.

I feel sure that if the minister will look into this matter he could render tremendous help to the people in rural areas, while at the same time give assistance to those in urban areas.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) upon the helpful contribution he has made to the debate. I share the opinions he has expressed so well with regard to rural housing in Canada. I have the doubtful honour of representing a constituency where, according to the 1941 statistics, based on such well known standards as availability of electricity, fireproof chimneys, electric lights and running water, we have the worst record in all Canada.

I have not been unmindful of the problems of the people I represent. In the past when discussing housing I have approached the problem from a broad point of view, realizing that there is not much likelihood of our solving the housing problem in Saskatchewan, and in Mackenzie constituency in particular, until we can get some machinery which will make possible modern low-cost housing all across Canada.

I am afraid I am not as optimistic as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) with regard to the usefulness of this particular bill. In the final analysis, of course, I shall support it, because it does offer some improvement. It does make it possible for direct loans to be made where at the present time it is impossible for people in many parts of Canada to take advantage of the machinery.

I should like however to devote the time at my disposal this afternoon to focusing attention on the critical situation still existing in Canada, which will not be improved by these minor changes in the National Housing Act. Indeed, if it were not for the outstanding contribution the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) made during the war, I would be pressing for his resignation, on account of the housing conditions in Canada. I want to say however that the people of Canada, and indeed those of the united nations, will always be grateful to the minister for the imaginative way he discharged his duties during the war. I hold in my hand one of the Canadian information service publications. These are publications which are sent to other countries and which reported on Canadian achievements during the war. All hon. members can be proud of this accurate record of performance. At page 27 we find a table giving the estimated value of war production—merchant vessels, naval vessels, aircraft, mechanical transport, armoured fighting vehicles, guns and small ammunition, small arms, chemicals, instruments, defence construction and government financed expansion. These costs are set down at a grand total of $11,501 million. Then at page 47 we find a summary of Canada's mutual aid expenditure. Again in this connection the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply must receive a good deal of credit for making available to our allies—to Australia, the British West Indies, China, France, India, New Zealand, U.S.S.R., and the United Kingdom—goods to the value of $2,575 million. This means that the minister was responsible for expenditures during the war years running over $14 billion.

All I am suggesting is that the responsible minister who was able to organize Canadian man-power and materials to such an extent, and to achieve such performance during the years of war, must be able to do better than the present development in housing would indicate.

I have another of the Canadian information service publications available in other countries which tell in a graphic way of what has been done. The minister of reconstruction is personally interested in many of these achievements. We find on page 9 pictures of the Shipshaw power development; on another page pictures of ships being launched; on another page pictures of shells that were manufactured, and pictures of elevators which were built by the minister before he entered public life.

I have here the white paper presented to parliament by the minister in April, 1945, and at page 14 under "Public Investment" I find this:

> The post-war employment problem is not to be solved by huge expenditures on "public works." Efforts to increase and stabilize employment and income must pervade all economic policies. On the other hand, it is the firm intention of the government to institute a system of managing its capital expenditures so that they may contribute to the maximum to the improvement and stabilization of employment and income.

The white paper makes it very clear that the Liberal government of Canada in no way is to be handicapped by financial difficulties in government financing, for at page 21 it says:

> In these circumstances, the government considers the post-war debt problem to be quite manageable.

There was no worrying about Canada's debt, and very few members from any part of the country took time in the budget debate to complain of Canada's national debt. The white paper goes on:

> Fiscal policy during the war has necessarily been based on economic as much as purely financial consideration. It is proposed to extend that practice into the post-war years and apply war experience to the problems of peace.

If this white paper means anything, now is the time for the administration to demonstrate that its observations had application to the problem of housing. Members of the house will recall that in the debate on the address on February 7 of this year the minister gave us quite a rosy picture of the housing situation, although there were a few discordant notes in his speech. He said:

> I also realize that the accomplishment of a target is dependent upon the ability of the Canadian people to absorb new housing at the present level of building costs. Further, the need for housing is so great that any target should be set at the very limit of possible accomplishment. In 1947 we will be making a vigorous effort to meet a target of 80,000 residential units.

Further on he said:

> As in 1946, we will continue to rely for the major portion of our new housing upon private endeavour. It is our policy to ensure that as much new housing as possible be built by private initiative. Towards this end we will lend every facility. If, however, for any reason the supply of housing by private initiative is insufficient, then and then only will the dominion government take a direct position in the housing field. I have already dealt with a number of operations in which the dominion is already participating for this reason. We would be very happy to withdraw from these activities, but, at the present time, this much needed type of housing would not be produced by other means.

That speech was delivered in the house on February 7. On May 15 the Ottawa Journal, under the heading "Government concurs with dropping of Ottawa housing, says Howe" carries this story:

> The 1946 programme now is well advanced, and it is apparent that practically every project will exceed the "target" price, and that correspondingly high rentals will result.
> It had been originally anticipated that rentals might be of the order of $35 to $40 for four-room units. Because of increased building costs, rentals calculated upon the formula are considerably higher.
> Even in the 1946 programme it would be extremely difficult to meet the rental level originally anticipated.

These comments were made at the time the announcement was made that Housing Enterprises Limited was abandoning plans for a $3,000,000 apartment project along Mann avenue in Ottawa and a similar undertaking amounting to $1,500,000 in Toronto. The Ottawa project was to house 408 families and the Toronto project another 200.

Recently I have received a report on the number of building permits issued in January, February and March of 1946 as compared with 1947. It is significant that there is a marked falling off in the first three months of 1947 as compared with 1946. In 1947, 4,807 building permits were issued for dwelling units, as compared with 5,512 in 1946. The reports from all parts of Canada indicate that there are not going to be buyers for a much longer period for houses selling at present prices.

I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that only a very small percentage of Canadian families are in a position to pay a monthly rental of $50 or more or to buy houses at prevailing costs. An analysis of taxation statistics published by the Department of National Revenue shows that there are only 183,318 taxpayers in Canada with an income of $3,000 or more. A rent of $50 a month is what might reasonably be expected from this group. Another 126,900 taxpayers receive from $2,500 to $3,000. They could afford to pay $45 a month, or if they were prepared to increase their rent payments and get along with older clothing and pass up the medical and educational expenses they would normally make they might be able to pay $50 a month. Those two groups total 310,218. They include single taxpayers with no dependents.

There are 293,500 making from $2,000 to $2,500. They could afford to pay $36.50 per month, on the assumption that one-fifth of one's income should go for housing. There are 903,930 taxpayers and non-taxpayers making between $1,000 and $2,000 a year. They cannot afford to pay more than $25 a month. There are 345,400 married men earning under $1,000 a year, and they cannot afford to pay more than $12 a month rent. So you see, Mr. Speaker, we have more than a million families who must find housing at $25 a month or less, and 345,000 who are getting so little income that $12 is the maximum they should plan for shelter.

In view of these statistics it cannot be denied that we have almost reached the saturation point in disposing of housing built at present prices in Canada. The situation throughout Canada is the same. I have received a copy of a letter which went to the Prime Minister from the Citizens' Housing and Planning Association of Toronto. I assume that all members received a copy of this letter. The chairman of the committee is

Mr. Clark, the vice-chairman Mrs. Luffman, and the secretary, Mrs. Donald Fraser. I am not acquainted with any of these people, but the committee comprises quite an impressive list of persons. In the committee's letter to the Prime Minister some caustic comments are made regarding Canada's housing situation. They say:

The housing policy of your government may be summed up in three points:

(1) Belief that private enterprise can and will build a sufficient supply of rental housing for Canadians. This conviction has been repeatedly asserted by Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Howe in parliament. It is contrary to the findings of your own experts in the Curtis report; it is contrary to the experience of every other country, and hence has been consistently opposed by this organization.

(2) Opposition to public housing authorities, as expressed in the interpretation of the National Housing Act by Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Howe, and only recently modified for Toronto.

(3) Denial of federal responsibility for a public housing programme, alleging this to be primarily a provincial responsibility.

It is pertinent to look at the Canadian situation in the light of this policy. and the recent decision of housing enterprises.

(1) The failure of housing enterprises to achieve rental housing plainly disproves the claim that private enterprise will build rental housing for the middle income group. Private enterprise was not interested in building such housing and considerable pressure has to be exerted by your government on the insurance companies to bring them into this field. Now they give up and say it cannot be done. Valuable time and effort have been spent to prove what was clear at the outset—that housing for a large section of our population has to be public housing.

(2) If we are to have public housing, we need municipal (or regional) housing authorities, as in England and in the United States. These must be allowed for and encouraged by the federal policy.

(3) The government of Canada can no longer evade responsibility for a positive policy of housing for Canadians. The need is national and urgent; many of the factors in creating it and meeting it are a national responsibility. Leadership and planning on a national scale are essential and urgent; the provinces are neither equipped nor prepared to operate in this field. Denial of federal responsibility only postpones action still further; some provinces could not act at all, and the cross-country picture would be one of gaps, unequal standards, delay, and confusion; of this we have had too much already. A clear national policy is required to meet this national domestic emergency.

Thousands of good Canadian families are trying to live under desperate housing conditions—in tents, in trailers, in factory buildings, stores and shacks of all kinds. Local health authorities have virtually ceased to try to enforce sanitary conditions in thousands of dwellings, clearly unfit for human occupancy, but crowded with hard-pressed Canadian families. Welfare authorities are at their wits' end to house the families daily being evicted.

The security of family life in Canada is gravely affected. Our divorce rate is rising, and authorities, lay and church alike, are alarmed at the causes. Housing is a common one. A young family today faces great difficulties and the lack of housing contributes to them. It is a hazard we can reduce by resolute policy and effective action. Further drift in the matter is a direct contribution by government to the further undermining of Canadian family life.

I submit to hon. members that this is a fair description of the situation in Canada. I must remind the house that the committee is not describing a new situation, not one that has been created by the war. I hold in my hand the report of the lieutenant governor's committee on housing conditions in Toronto, 1934. It is interesting to note that such well known persons as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who was then the general manager of the National Trust Company, president of the Board of Trade of Toronto and chairman of the board of trustees of Queen's university, was a member of that committee. The report, which I am sure is well known to most hon. members who have made a study of housing, contains a disgraceful picture of what is commonly known as Toronto the good, a description of the ward; pictures of the back yards there. There is a description of the housing shortage and a section on slums, a section on sanitation, a section on food storage, tuberculosis, infant mortality, juvenile delinquency, crime and family life. I submit that it is a very serious reflection on a great country, a great province and a proud city such as Toronto to have a report of this sort submitted in the year 1934, and now so many years later conditions are virtually unchanged. The same sort of report could be presented today in spite of the fact that Toronto is the second city in the dominion. Huge sums were subscribed for our war effort. Surely the people of this country can evolve a programme that will clear away the slums, that will build modern houses and improve the living conditions of the people of that area.

I hold in my hand a picture from Vancouver which has a heading, "Low rental homes or swimming pools. Vancouver has double-crossed its homeless war veterans". Here is a picture of Vancouver's disgraceful housing conditions on the one side and on the other a picture of a privately owned swimming pool which is being installed in one of the residential areas of that city. The failure of the federal government to retain some of their controls, to decide what is essential and what is not essential material makes it possible for people who live in one part of the city to use tight material and short labour to provide a swimming pool when they have the great ocean available for swimming at least for many months of the year, while other people have to live in the sort of housing conditions so well described in the report read by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt).

The last report of the chief inspector of the sanitation and housing division of the city of Winnipeg repeats the information that has been given by the health department of Winnipeg year after year. On page 5 I find a table showing the unlawful emergency occupation of certain premises as dwellings. From that table I find that there are twenty-three families living in stores; thirteen families in garages, one in tourist cabins, nine in unfinished dwellings and attics; twelve in cellars; one in a stable and one in a church. There are seventy-eight children in the group who were found to be living in emergency occupation, unlawful occupation. The health authorities of the city point out that it is intolerable that people should be living under these conditions, but it is a question of living there or living out under the sky, which is not so desirable in Winnipeg, certainly in the winter months. We find that there are 16,000 families who made application for accommodation in Winnipeg in 1946. Only eight per cent were able to be accommodated. Some very useful recommendations are made by the chief inspector, but the conclusion is significant:

> House hungry squatters have not so far appeared in this city, but let us not be complacent about this. All that is needed is the spark, a leader, and we are likely then to have some rude experiences. The labour, money and material bottlenecks were broken during the war. The same bottlenecks have come to life again in this, the post-war period. The force or power that broke the bottleneck of war supplies was the federal government, acting presumably by the will of the people of this country. This power, so effective for war purposes, is now apparently atrophied and useless, indicating unmistakably the indifference or apathy of the general public and certain of the politicians, to a situation that should cause them serious concern.

So much for Winnipeg. I have here a picture from the Montreal Gazette of May 8, which has the heading: "Family of eight, with sick baby and money to pay rent, evicted." Underneath the photograph the following appears: "Family evicted from north-end home." Here is a picture of the law officers and the family with two little children in arms who have no rooms to which to go. That took place in the great and wealthy city of Montreal.

In the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday of this week appears a story: "Low rental housing project proposed by Ottawa committee." In the article it says:

> Mr. Goodfellow told of fifty-nine families that had to be broken up because there was no room for the children.
> "The problem is growing daily," Mr. Goodfellow said. "Unless we get some homes I don't know what might happen this fall." Mr. Pickering raised the question whether it was the responsibility of the committee to continue working on housing. "I think it is the responsibility of this committee to shove the responsibility exactly where it belongs—on the shoulders of the city of Ottawa, central mortgage, private enterprise and labour," he asserted.

In the meantime men who fought for their country and who were assured that when the war was over nothing would be too good for them are finding it next to impossible to find shelter. Just the other day I was talking to a man who was still in the army and who bought a new house in Ottawa. He was desperate. The only place that he was able to find for his wife and baby was this house. I understand the price paid was $9,800. What chance has a man on army pay to meet monthly payments on a $9,800 house. Yet this house is not any better than a house in which a veteran should live, and I am sure in normal times it could be built for $5,000 or less. We cannot ask these young men who were able to use a $100,000 tank or a $250,000 plane to live in the hovels that are available, the only places that are available in many of these cities. I understand that just this week the mayor of Hull came out urging that something be done by the dominion government to provide low-cost public housing. I am sure that those of us who spend the taxpayers' money must take notice of the conditions which exist in the country.

The bureau of statistics, in analysing the statistics compiled in the 1941 census, compares housing conditions in Ottawa and Hull just across the river. We find that in Hull 34 per cent of the houses are crowded as compared with 17 per cent in Ottawa. The value of home ownership in Hull is $2,300 as compared with $4,600 in Ottawa. Monthly rentals are much higher of course in Ottawa, and the households with exclusive use of bathing facilities represent 43 per cent in Hull and 84 per cent in Ottawa. Households with four conveniences—radio, telephone, vacuum cleaner and running water—are 4.7 in Hull as compared with 27 in Ottawa.

I submit that while we have people, in this day and age, who live in cities where there is central heating, where there are modern conveniences, it is a matter of real concern to the nation and to parliament to find these conditions. This brings me to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, which should be developed. I think the only solution is for this government to recognize that at least one third of the people in Canada simply have no chance of getting housing under the legislation at present on our statute books; and further, that if the federal government does not give a lead, if it does not evolve policies which have not yet been evolved, we are going into a depression and we are not going to have a housing programme to provide a guarantee that there will be useful employment and a market for many materials.

In the United States they made a study which indicates that in 1939 19·9 per cent of the gross national product was used in housing. They came to the conclusion that in the two years before the 1929 depression, if they had faced the facts and realized that the falling off of housing construction was one signal indicating that they were headed for depression, and if something had been done with a view to working out a housing programme such as was worked out in Great Britain or Sweden, they could have prevented the depression having the impact it did.

I find in one of the "Housing Abroad" series published by the minister, volume 1, No. 1, a chart showing what happened to housing and the national income in Canada, Great Britain and the United States. In Great Britain, where they decided to carry out slum clearing and a low-rental housing programme, there was a rather slight drop in the national income, and they actually increased the number of houses built during that period. But in Canada there was a falling off in the number of houses being built before there was any indication that we were headed for a slump. By the time we got down to the bottom, however, in 1934 we were down to 16 points as compared with 100 in 1929, in house building. The same thing happened to a lesser degree in the United States; and now, as the falling off in building permits and the folding up of the programme under housing enterprises would indicate, we have reached the saturation point in Canada in disposing of houses under present terms. Now therefore is the time when the government should face the question of a subsidized low-cost housing programme as part of our post-war undertakings. If we could undertake that kind of programme immediately and enlist the cooperation of the provinces and the municipalities, I am sure it would be a major factor in preventing the depression from reducing our standard of living, as happened during the last depression.

In another publication with regard to manpower and material requirements for a housing programme, I find that to carry out a programme of 80,000 houses in a year it would require 403 million man hours; and on a rough calculation, using the basis of $1 per hour, there is an expenditure of over $400 million. There is also the list of materials used in the 80,000 houses unit, such as cement, bricks, tiles, lumber products, lath and plaster, roofing, paint, plumbing facilities, electrical equipment, glass, and so on, totalling $280 million. In other words, for less than one billion dollars, 80,000 houses could be built. In view of the fact that the minister during the war was able to spend over thirteen billions, representing man-power and material, surely this modest programme that has been outlined of 80,000 houses a year can be realized.

We propose therefore to move certain amendments as we discuss the clauses and we would like to introduce a preamble which would set out our Canadian objective, just as has been done in Australia and the United States. We suggest it be the objective of this parliament to provide a programme of housing for the Canadian people which would ensure a separate home in a good neighbourhood for every family that desires one. We must accept the principle that society has reached the stage where a house of good quality properly equipped is not only the need but the right of every citizen. Where a family cannot own such a house, it is the duty of the state to bridge the gap by a rental subsidy.

We also think it should be the objective, in realizing this principle, to provide for the replacement of slums and other substandard housing in rural areas, to obviate overcrowding and facilitate progress in an orderly manner towards a proper standard of housing for the entire Canadian people. Another objective is the systematic planning of cities and neighbourhoods so as to develop and redevelop communities, which will provide good surroundings for home life and adequate facilities for advancing the industrial and cultural welfare of the nation.

Consideration in undertaking the large scale housing programme envisaged by the act should be given to the undeniable fact that a stable level of construction throughout the years immediately ahead is one of the most necessary factors in ensuring a steady level of employment, which in turn would provide buying power essential to prosperity at home and abroad.

I submit that if the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not now prepared to take steps different from those that he has followed in the past he is going to be responsible for one of the most serious conditions we have witnessed in Canada, because we cannot expect Canadian citizens indefinitely, in view of our remarkable performance during the war, to be told that we have not now the ways and means of solving a little problem such as diverting a billion dollars' worth of man-power and material into the housing business each year.

I am not suggesting that all this should be spent under public housing. I think our expenditures could be divided roughly into three groups. One-third of our people will be able to build dwellings without assistance from anyone; one-third will be in the middle group who will need to take advantage of the facilities afforded by Central Mortgage and Housing, people in the middle income groups; and one-third of the people must be provided for by public low-cost housing, which will be built only if the federal government is prepared to guarantee that the necessary subsidy will be paid to bridge the gap between what the individual can pay and what is the economic rent to provide these services.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks on this bill as it is proposed to be amended. It is unlikely that anything new can be said in regard to the summary of conditions which such legislation should endeavour to meet. The previous speaker has placed on record a wealth of data which cannot help but impress those who have been listening. Everyone in this house will agree without question that the housing situation is desperate, and I am going to be critical of the government's policy in that regard. In doing so, of course I want to say that I have not the slightest doubt that the right hon. gentleman who administers this legislation has great capacity. He is a competent administrator, and if the results are not as we desire them, or as I believe it is quite possible to make them, I do not think the minister individually is to blame. He has been limited by the system under which he is working. His hands have been tied by practices and methods which cannot meet the situation. I hope that, after the discussion which is now going on with respect to this matter, the minister will take the bit in his teeth and do for peace what he did for war.

As I have said, the results are unsatisfactory, and that is putting it mildly. The bill which is now before us amends the previous legislation in the first place, by reducing the amount of the initial payment required to be made by the borrower who intends to build a house. In the second place, it extends the period of amortization to thirty years. In the third place, it brings duplex houses within the benefits of the act. Of course these are all minor improvements. Personally, I welcome them. So far as they go, and they do not go very far, I am for them; I am going to vote for that legislation. But I suggest, sir, that no possible amendment to this act could make it accomplish what the necessity of the moment demands that it should accomplish. I question whether anything short of an entirely new objective, an entirely new purpose, an entirely new piece of legislation, can possibly do the job. The chief purpose of this act appears as set forth in section 1 of the bill:

> . . . to protect the mortgage security the said lending institution and the corporation may join in making supplementary joint loans to the borrower and in taking such other measures and steps as may be required in accordance with normal mortgage practice to safeguard the interests of His Majesty and the said lending institution.

I have no doubt that this legislation will protect His Majesty. I have no doubt that it will protect the lending institution. But it should protect the homeless people of Canada. That is the essential purpose which is lacking in this legislation, and that is the burden of the criticism which I want to make with respect to it.

There are three criticisms of the housing policy of the government which I should like to emphasize. In the first place, there are not nearly enough houses being built.

Mr. PROBE: That is the big one.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, that is probably the big objection; there are not nearly enough houses being built. In the second place, those which are being built are often inferior in quality. This condition is brought about partly, no doubt, by the lack of materials and probably to some extent by the fact that, owing to the great need of men, skilled men are scarce. Very often contractors and builders have to hire at full wages men who may not be expert craftsmen.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Would you say that is true of national housing?

Mr. IRVINE: Probably it is true under all circumstances at the moment. No matter who is doing the building, those factors do enter into the picture and would tend to reduce the quality of the job.

Mr. JOHNSTON: There is a big difference between national housing and wartime housing.

Mr. IRVINE: I am now discussing the legislation which is before us and do not wish to complicate the matter by taking up other schemes.

In the next place, the cost of houses now being built is so high as to be out of the reach of more than two-thirds of the entire population of Canada. I happen to be living in a six-room house which was bought last week from the contractor at $9,500.

Mr. PROBE: Your house?

Mr. IRVINE: No, it is not my house; I am renting a room in it. It has been estimated—if I mistake not, by the previous minister of finance—that building a house will cost at least $1,000 a room. I think that is a conservative estimate. I say next, sir, that the average family of five needs a house of eight rooms; so that even if we accept the estimate of $1,000 a room, an eight-room house, which the average family of five needs, would cost $8,000 to build. Let me make an estimate of what such a house, under the present set-up, will cost the purchaser. I am taking into account the repayment of the principal and the interest, and the amortization scheme. I am taking into account also annual taxes and am estimating them at only $100 a year; and I think that is low. I am taking into account that annual insurance will cost about $13, at the rate of fifty cents per 100 for three years. There should be a depreciation of $200 a year for forty years of the life of the dwelling. That would mean a monthly payment of $66.42, which in thirty years would amount to $23,911.20. That is a figure far beyond the limitations of the financial ability of the average working man in this country. It means that he would have to put into the building of his home a proportion of his income so great as to impair the living of his family and himself in many essential requirements. The bill provides that a certain amount may be borrowed under certain conditions; on an $8,000 dwelling, 95 per cent of the first $3,000, 85 per cent of the next $3,000, and 70 per cent of the remainder may be borrowed.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) pointed out in his budget speech, and this has been emphasized a number of times during the budget debate, that over half of the working people of Canada do not receive a sufficient income to be taxable under the income tax scheme. The exemption figure for a married man with a family of two is $1,700. I think it is clear that no man with a family receiving less than $2,500 could ever think of building a home under the present scheme with any hope of ever paying for that home. All you have to do is to think about the possibility of a week or two of sickness, a month or two or six months of unemployment, or some other calamity and you realize that the interest begins to pile up, the principal is unpaid and you begin to go behind. That may be repeated until the payments cannot be made in thirty years; your children's children will have to finish paying and nothing but the ashes of the home will be left when the payments are completed. I suggest that those who accept the present arrangement will feel that they are compelled to take it. It will be a case of necessity, and not their wills consenting.

I agree with the hon. member who preceded me that the greatest need is for a scheme of low-rental houses. Possibly these could be built by public bodies and rented to individuals at a rate which would cover the replacement cost of the building in, say forty years. Whatever was the estimated life of the building, the rental cost should be spread over that number of years, so that when the building is no longer useful it will have been paid for and the money available to build the next one. Such a scheme is perfectly sound because there is no danger of loss.

There is no reason why a better method of financing than the one now suggested could not be devised. I want to register my opposition to the method of financing which has been adopted by the government and which appears in the present legislation. It may be presumed that eventually we shall catch up with the shortages in building material, but there is no man who will live long enough to catch up with four and a half per cent. That just cannot be done, and there is no use in thinking it can be done. If he is not in the low-income class he will not borrow; he will build his house and save the four and a half per cent, which would be the wiser thing for him to do.

I am going to suggest that the government devise a new scheme to provide homes at low rentals for the people of Canada. These homes could be built in a manner similar to that adopted for the great undertakings in the war period which were supervised by the right hon. gentleman who will be administering this legislation. We plunged into tremendous expenditures for war. All the materials that were created by our finance and our efforts were blown to hell and we were left with nothing but a debt. Here we are suggesting that for peace purposes the government undertake a constructive scheme for the building of homes which will leave the nation with an asset equal to every dollar that is put into it. Why there should be any hesitancy in proceeding to build the houses required is utterly beyond me.

I am going to suggest that we use the national credit to finance this housing scheme. Not only do I suggest that we use it for housing, but if I had the time I should like to suggest and do more than suggest that we use it for the establishment of new industries and for the provision of additional capital equipment for older industries which need to be brought up to date.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to housing.

Mr. IRVINE: If I had been checked up every time I have departed from the paths of righteousness as quickly as Your Honour has now checked me up I would have been a much better man. I shall not go beyond merely suggesting that I am not confining my proposal of national financing to the one project. However I am going to confine it to the one project as you have just suggested. The mechanism for doing this would be quite stereotyped. There is no need for any mythical scheme to be conjured up. It is easily understood how these things are done and how easily they can be set up. I suggest that it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance, under the guidance of the government, to provide such mechanism. It can be operated through the Bank of Canada, and perhaps it might be found necessary to set up a crown company to carry out the building of the houses required. But the main thing is that we can well afford to finance any real asset we are competent to create. In fact we cannot afford not to finance any enterprise in which necessity urges us to engage. And, as I have already said, every home built under such a scheme would represent a national asset equal to the amount of money expended in its building. So that there is no risk whatsoever. There is none to be incurred.

But that is not so now. Under the present scheme the government takes all the risk and the financial corporations take all the interest. It seems to be a sort of priorities field of investment for insurance companies, at a rate of interest which would be very difficult to get at the present time anywhere else, and with safety guarantees unequalled anywhere, any time.

The government might begin to launch such a scheme in a more or less orthodox way. If it is true that we are now experiencing an inflationary condition in Canada, there is no reason why the government should not sell bonds to build houses, and take up the surplus cash floating around so that it might be used to take care of the greatest need of the nation at the present time. That would be a perfectly orthodox procedure. If there are interest moneys paid, it would go to the people who bought the bonds, namely the people of Canada in general. If it were financed in any other way, and if interest were charged, the money would go into the public treasury and would not pass into the hands of private individuals. While money is plentiful, the financing could be done by issuing bonds.

I do not think that is the best way to do it; but since we cannot be expected to break away from orthodoxy overnight, that would be one way to do it; and it would be better than not doing it. I suggest that it be done in that way, since that is the only way of doing it that the government would be likely to consider, and that we should lend to home builders the money required, at the cost of administration. It would not be long until monthly rentals from such houses would begin to come in. After a while, all new houses would be built from moneys collected as rentals from those already built and in operation.

But when money is scarce, as it is likely to be after the inflation is over, these houses would be available. We must remember that there is always the drop backwards. We have never had a boom without its corresponding slump, and I doubt whether we shall have any different experience this time because I have heard no scheme advanced for preventing the usual thing from happening. I expect, therefore, that the usual will happen; and it will happen because the profits which have been siphoned off by the profit-takers of the nation have not been reinvested quickly enough to be paid out in wages, and thus to keep the flow of purchasing power running in balance.

When this happens it would be a good thing for the government to do what our hon. friends here are asking.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The social crediters.

Mr. IRVINE: It would be a good thing if the government were to create the money to build the houses. That is what the banks would do, if we borrowed from them; and there is no reason why we should not do it in a direct way ourselves, without interest. It could be done by the payment of only administration costs. That would check the deflationary tendency following a boom, although it would not be a cure. It would help the economic system as a whole.

I conclude by saying that, although the minister is a gentleman of much greater experience than I am in matters of administration and of government, he might do well if at least he were to take some notice of the ideas which hon. members have tried to present in respect of this great problem of housing. He knows as well as we do that the situation is serious; perhaps he knows much better than we do. No doubt he receives more letters about it, because he is face to face with the problem. He knows that not enough houses are being built, and knows perfectly well that the average working man cannot buy the houses being built under the present scheme. I am asking him to consider the possibility of devising a housing scheme which would make available low-rental houses, that such a scheme be financed upon the credit of the state, and at cost, and that we proceed to do it and continue in our endeavour until every Canadian family has a home.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly concerning the expression used by the preceding speaker—"the necessity of the moment", and I wish to address myself to those words.

Before doing so, however, I should like to refer to the observations of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), who spoke about Toronto and outlined some of the unfortunate housing conditions in that city. I am sure the hon. member will be glad to know that the city council, welfare institutions and all other agencies in the city have made every effort to meet the housing shortage. Last winter, although they passed through several critical periods, they did manage to keep a roof over everyone's head. Among other things, they reconverted Trinity Barracks and spent hundreds of thousands of dollars outside the city limits in the development of water and road services in the county of York in connection with housing developments in that area.

My one brief suggestion to the minister would be that, in company with the rentals administration of the government, he consider lifting the freezing orders on new accommodation opened after a certain date. I do not mean that the rentals administration order as it now stands should be changed, if the government insists upon retaining it. But I do suggest that if the government will consider lifting the freezing order and evictions order on new accommodation opened after, let us say, July 1, there will be a tremendous improvement in respect of the housing shortage in urban centres of Canada.

The minister has had the problem fully and ably presented to him. I am sure that has been done in his department, as it has been again in the house today, particularly in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). Mine is an urban constituency, with very small space available for further building. It is overcrowded, almost as bad in that respect as the constituency of Spadina, which is represented in this house by a Liberal member. This situation is found not only in Toronto, but in almost every other city in Canada. It is our "immediate necessity", and I think the freezing order should be lifted on new accommodation by the first of July. By lifting it early this summer, any difficulties which may arise, administrative or personal, could be ironed out before the extremely critical period of next winter, and I am sure the minister will agree with me that next winter the housing accommodation in Canada will be extremely critical. So, Mr. Speaker, with this brief suggestion and mindful of the tremendous amount of work that lies before the house I take my seat after urging the minister to consult with the rentals administration on the suggestion I have made to him this afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: It would be interesting if my hon. friend would elaborate on the benefits that would flow from his suggestion if adopted. I do not just understand them at the moment.

Mr. SKEY: I shall be glad to. Recently I attended a public meeting in Toronto at which all the difficulties, shortages of building materials, rising costs, labour difficulties and every other kind of difficulty facing builders were put before the meeting, and I was impressed with the facts given. When the minister announced to the house the other day that Housing Enterprises Limited had had to abandon some very large projects I knew he was faced with the same building difficulties. At that meeting a lot of prominent citizens advised me—and I believe they spoke with certain knowledge—that if the minister would lift the freezing order on new accommodation rented after a certain date, literally hundreds of people in every urban centre would be able to obtain accommodation. These would include veterans with families, single persons seeking rooms and perhaps board, and perhaps even large civilian families would find accommodation if the owners could be sure that their tenants, if objectionable, could be evicted. Eviction might be necessary in only five per cent or less of the new accommodation provided, and what I am asking is that the other ninety-five per cent who could be accommodated in this way should be given the chance to secure this accommodation. The real reason why people will not open their homes today is that they are afraid of having undesirable tenants come into their homes and be unable to get rid of them.

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister in bringing down the amendments in Bill No. 176 reminded the house that extensive amendments had been made to the National Housing Act in 1946, but that by reason of changed conditions further amendments were necessary in 1947. For the most part there seems to be a good deal of merit in the amendments. The minister proposes, for instance, in respect of national housing mortgages, that the lending value shall be increased, that there may be larger loans. In the second place, the amendments will bring about lower down-payments by purchasers which the minister said was necessary because there is less money in the hands of purchasers at this time. Further, in order that the monthly payments may be kept down to the ability of people to pay, he proposes that the loans be amortized over a period of thirty instead of twenty-five years. All these amendments are good in a sense. They do make it easier for builders to finance. But as a matter of fact, as the minister himself stated, the problems in respect to building in 1947 are not so much financial as they are physical. I do not know of a single builder or a single person who wants a house who has been unable to get a house built by reason of not being able to finance a loan. The loan does not have to be under the National Housing Act, because there are many other kinds of mortgages that one can get. So I do not believe that difficulty in financing is stopping any house building today.

We know there are four groups of house building which are in a sense government controlled and which are looked after under the system of priority of building materials.

> We propose that where there is some control on the end sale price of the house to the home owner, the ratio of loan on a $3,000 lending value shall be 95 per cent, grading down to 90 per cent on a $6,000 lending value.

I take it from that—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that he is referring there to integrated housing, because that is the only kind of housing in Canada that I know of in which the government takes any part in controlling the sale price of the house. I am pointing out to the minister, without disparaging the amendments he proposes, or minimizing the results he hopes to attain, that as a matter of fact, according to a recent return which I received from his department, only 1,691 integrated housing units were started in 1946-47. So, while the amendment which the minister proposes is to some extent proper and will bring some relief, I do not believe that the relief we shall obtain will put us very much ahead in the matter of housing accommodation. I would be prepared to gamble that housing accommodation will not be increased by more than one or two per cent by the changes which are proposed with respect to these mortgages. Of course, when you lend up to ninety-five per cent of the value of the property you are looking for trouble. We have had experience in days gone by when mortgages were made up to fifty and sixty and seventy per cent of the value of the property, but when you get up to ninety and ninety-five per cent you are putting the purchaser in a precarious position with respect to stability and the future holding of his property. However, it may be necessary that something along this line should be done. I am only pointing out that a dangerous practice is growing up.

The minister said that conditions have changed since the last amendments to the act were made. Even since this bill was brought down on the first of May—and now it is the 29th of May—many more serious changes in conditions have taken place. In the first place, so far as integrated housing is concerned there has been some hesitation by veterans in some parts of the country to buy houses under that scheme. We also know that, so far as Housing Enterprises Limited are concerned, they have dropped their projects in at least three cities. From a return which I received on March 31, I find that at the present time Housing Enterprises Limited are carrying on projects in some twenty-three cities. I suggest to the minister that economic conditions in respect of building are probably no different in the other parts of Canada from what they are in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto where these projects have been stopped.

Press reports tell us that because these projects are not to be continued in Toronto, some twenty thousand units which would otherwise have been provided will not be provided. I have read with a great deal of interest the comments which have been made by Brigadier Storms with respect to the obstacles which he found in housing. If there is any man who could get through a difficulty in housing or in any other matter it is Brigadier Storms. He is not easily stopped. He was my commanding officer in France during a considerable period of the first great war. I do not know of any man who commands more ability to get things done than Brigadier Storms.

One other feature of the amendment which I should like to touch on briefly is the amendment which appears on page 2661 of Hansard, about which the minister said:

> We will be seeking authority for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to convey property which it is administering for the crown. We have in mind particularly Wartime Housing units which are being sold to tenants.

Wartime housing was essentially and primarily provided for veterans. The houses that I have seen and inspected in various parts of the country have no cellars under them. I do not believe it is good business for this government or for any government to sell to veterans houses without any cellars under them, because it means that in the future these people will have to live in housing units which are heated by stoves or by gas or by whatever the local amenities may be. I do not believe that is proper housing for soldiers to have except as an expedient for the moment and temporary. I am not criticizing the government for what they have done in providing Wartime Housing. I am simply saying that some other form of ensuring the veteran his property might more properly be developed, because I do not believe that any of us should be a party to turning over to the veteran something which we know in the long run will be very much of an impediment or a detriment to him.

Turning for a moment to the next part of the act which has to do with the advent of the lending companies and the insurance companies into the field of providing scope for the development of land for building purposes, may I say that that particular venture has a good deal of merit to it. After all, we know, and the minister probably knows better than any of us, that in the larger cities practically all the land for building purposes is used up, and as you get into the townships and the municipalities you run into the difficulty of the lack of public utilities. For instance, it would be useless for a scheme to be developed miles away from schools, or miles away from water or without proper sewage facilities; and it will take a good deal of money to promote these land ventures.

Having regard to the projects which may be entered into, I should like to suggest to the minister that perhaps the department could give some leadership in seeing that in a sense these projects take the form of decentralizing communities. If I may use an illustration, surrounding Toronto on the north are three or four municipalities, Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora and Newmarket. In planning these projects, one should bear in mind that perhaps suburban life is superior to urban life in so far as bringing up children and families are concerned. I am of the opinion that these projects should be developed around communities which already exist.

In the past, experience has shown that companies subdividing and promoting land ventures have come to a disastrous end. I know of few throughout the Dominion of Canada that have really made a success of land ventures and come through with much of their money at the end of the time when they have their land sold. The work of developing these ventures includes surveying the land. They have to have the plan passed by the municipal authorities and by the provincial planning board. They have to plan recreation and park land and also arrange for the laying in of water, sewers, pavement and sidewalks.

The minister has told us—and I think the act provides for it—that the remuneration which will pass to those who are planning these projects will be in the neighbourhood of two per cent. If I understood the minister correctly, I think he said that if there were anything over the two per cent it would have to be returned to the crown. That strikes me as a very low amount for a venture of this kind, and for that reason I have been looking for a nigger in the woodpile in respect of how the costs are going to mount and where those who will venture the funds in the particular projects will receive their remuneration. I presume the minister will not allow large sums of money to be used in these projects for administration purposes. I can see that it will be quite easy for a huge administration to be set up in the way of an office, with secretaries, draftsmen, surveyors and a great number of other people who would in a sense run the administration high, which would, of course, all be added to the costs which, in the long run, the government might have to take over and pay.

There is this other thing to be looked at, and it has happened before. Before the lending company or the insurance company gets into the project, somebody has intervened and has become the owner of the property, and that has happened in a month or two or in a week or two before the project goes through. I suggest to the minister that some safeguards should be put in these projects so that they will not end up with this sort of thing going on. The remuneration to those who will be carrying on these projects will be small for the amount of work they will have to do. I understand that in the United States some of the large lending companies have already gone into this field, but I am told that the remuneration they receive is in the neighbourhood of 4·5 per cent and 4·7 per cent in respect of the money venture in the project.

It seems to me that these amendments will not go nearly far enough; in fact they will not go any distance at all in solving the housing problems of Canada. They are all expedients, but they all miss the mark, and the mark is that we have not a housing programme in Canada. All the projects which the department has worked out have been predicated for the most part on the priority system; in other words, the channeling of building material into a few hands who can in a sense control the kind of building that the government considers we should have. I think the government has missed the boat in that respect, because the statistics show—and we have used them before—that less than 12,000 homes were helped by the priority system in 1946, and according to the figures which we now have before us, we are going to be in a much worse position this year.

For instance, a release from the labour department of May 27 shows that construction contracts, mainly for home building, were down $23 million in April, 1947, compared with the corresponding period last year. No improvement was expected. According to the report, commercial construction showed little variation over last year, with the bulk of the decline showing in respect of certain industrial classes.

The minister and his department must take the responsibility in these matters. After all, some of us who have had some experience in housing think the measures which have been taken to date are not going far enough and we are really in a sense standing still. We point out to the minister, who has heard it many times before, that he must do something about the channeling of building material, in the sense that he has to call a halt to the business of so much material going into non-essential building, having regard to the fact that our primary problem today is housing for our people.

If, as a matter of fact, building costs have gone as high as they have, so high that the ordinary builder is stifled—and he built 48,000 homes last year in spite of priorities and everything else—and if, as a matter of fact, the minister is not prepared to say that home building shall get its share of material, then he and the department must assume the responsibility. One of the responsibilities he has to take is the fact that in the large cities, with the money received from the federal government, and the help of municipalities, for which I give them full credit, our people are living in conditions which are degrading and which will do a great deal in creating a demoralizing effect on the future of the nation.

We know that people are living in converted military barracks, in a converted air station barracks; they are living in buildings which formerly were munitions factories; the last project represents one that was formerly an engineering plant. These people have to use communal accommodations; in other words, washrooms together, public rooms together; and their children are mixed up in various compartments of the same housing unit. The people there are beginning to feel that in a sense they are wards of the country, that provision has been made for them now and that provision will be made for them again. That is contrary to the concept which Canadians have of our people. We feel that we should be able to stand on our own feet and make our own way, but we are demoralizing the people by permitting these conditions to continue.

Part II of the National Housing Act is a useful section. It has not been used to any great extent up to this time. In Toronto, when I was on the council, we started the Regent Park project for the purpose of clearing out a slum area and providing adequate and proper accommodation for the people there. I have visited the district myself and I must say I was ashamed of the conditions under which the people were living there. I know that the project was a necessary one, and within the last year the minister has seen fit to place the stamp of approval on the undertaking in the Regent Park district in Toronto. That is only a beginning. I believe that part II of the National Housing Act must be used and used quickly for those people who, in our own country, are displaced people. Something must be done for them.

The city of Toronto cannot carry the cost alone—I am dealing with the Regent Park project at the moment—but must have help from the province because, as a matter of fact, the provinces all have their planning boards, and these matters require some provincial assistance. In addition to that, they require a great deal of federal assistance, because, if people live in a group that cannot pay the economic rent, then we the people, as my hon. friend the member for Vancouver-Burrard put it, through the governments of various levels must all take our part in providing the necessary housing.

I predict that the minister will find, with building conditions continuing as they are at the moment, that something will have to be done along these lines, within the next couple of months, I would say, because I do not believe that the various municipalities will be able to cope very much longer with this emergency situation.

Much as I commend the amendments the minister has brought forward with respect to the National Housing Act, I do not think he has gone nearly far enough. The bright boys of the department are still thinking in terms of building priorities and we are away past that stage. I am suggesting to the minister therefore, as strongly as I can, that he give some attention to part II of the act, to see that low-cost public housing is started in this country, so that we may get back substantially to the recommendations of the Curtis report of 1943, which made provision for housing which, I think, is most necessary and imperative at this time.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): This house has threshed a terrific lot of old straw, it seems to me, in connection with matters relating to housing, and I think a great deal of credit is due to hon. members on all sides of the house for taking the responsibilities of their office sufficiently seriously that, after these arguments have been presented in brilliant form in many cases and so many times in this house since I have been a member here, they are not content to let the government rest until a better approach than our present feeble effort in housing is put forth by the one man in this country who is able to do the job if he would get on with it; I refer to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe).

The National Housing Act has been analysed in so many ways in this house that I simply want to indicate once more that under part I of the act the loans last year were 6,927. In housing emergency that is really a terrific national effort, is it not? Under part II of the act, which provides for rental housing loans, we were able to lay out money for 4,836 houses.

Part III of the act, which provides for federal funds for farm housing, is not even yet proclaimed by the government of Canada. Part IV of the act deals with the home improvement feature. Actually fifty-three units in Canada were repaired under the terms of that part. There was a certain amount of research carried on under part V, largely in the statistical field and none in the scientific field. There was spent $160,000 under this section, of which $85,000 was for economic research; $3,000 for architectural investigation; $70,000 for community planning; $3,000 for educational work and nil under technical research. All these figures come from the government's own factual summary "Housing in Canada", presented in January, 1947.

With respect to the whole matter of housing, I think the minister acts as though he intends that the government will just get out of the housing business entirely and leave it to free enterprise, because, while we have certain statutes on the books, the physical process of house building is not being accomplished. The amount of money which we have spent and the amount we are providing for next year indicates that the government is gradually getting out of the picture. I want to present two tables to the house. One is with respect to the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply for the coming year, dealing with housing.

571. To provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees pursuant to item 60 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act, No. 6, 1946 (and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts) to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses, such payments to be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, $1.

There is a nominal item of $1, owing to the fact, I presume, that the government has not anticipated any losses. Under home conversion plan, item 572, the government proposes this year to reduce the estimate of last year by $250,000, making an expenditure of $250,000 for the ensuring year. Under emergency shelter, administration, the estimate is $2,000,000, a reduction of $297,000 from last year. On Wartime Housing Limited in the ensuing year they propose to spend $27,500,000 by contrast with an estimate of $42,000,000 last year, a drop of $14,500,000. That is the financial picture under the plan of the department of reconstruction. They make provision for a potential expenditure of some $30,000,000 at a time when we have an admittedly serious crisis in housing.

By contrast I want to present a housing budget for another country which I was prevented from putting on the records here a month or so ago, because at that time it was not in order. I want to present from the department's own records, "Housing Progress Abroad", the Swedish housing budget for the fiscal year 1946-47, to indicate how other progressive countries are allotting their budgets in terms of housing. The figures are given in both kronor and dollars, and I presume they have been worked out on a proper par of exchange.

Operating Budget

Government housing loan office, salaries, appropriations	$ 314,479
Government housing loan office, expenses, appropriations	62,617
Reductions in rent for poor families with many children, appropriations	2,365,550
Contributions to promotion of housing in rural areas, reserve appropriation	5,566,000
Contribution to housing for retired people, reserve appropriation	2,226,400
Total	$10,535,046

That in the Swedish housing budget is termed an operating budget. Under their capital budget, they have the following:

Capital Budget
Government loan funds:
Loan for housing for poor families with many children (investment) appropriation	$13,915,000
Loan fund for promotion of housing in rural districts (investment) appropriation	3,339,600
Fund for assistance loans:
Tertiary loans for certain housing schemes, appropriation	41,745,000
Additional loans for certain housing schemes, appropriation	5,844,300
Loans for erecting and improving dwellings for farm workers (investment) appropriation	1,113,200
Loans for improvements to dwellings, appropriation	2,226,400
Total	$68,183,500

That is roughly double what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is proposing to ask this house for with respect to the ensuing year. It is interesting, of course, to note the way in which that budget is broken up with respect to provision for rental housing facilities for large families, for workmen's families and for rural families. The Swedish budget provides for the expenditure of money in manners that the Canadian government is not yet prepared to accept as an obligation of the Dominion of Canada.

I think we should examine as well the particular Bill No. 176 which the minister has before the house at the present time. I am willing to concede that there are one or two good features in the bill. But as has been said by everyone who has spoken this afternoon, there is a piecemeal goodness about it. There is, for example, the increased ratio of lending value to the cost of construction. However, that is not an unmixed blessing, because with the terrific rise in building costs —which the government has permitted by its decontrol policy—it simply means that the individual who is lucky enough to be able to make a down payment on a house is putting down approximately the same amount now, with rising costs, which he might have put down a year or two ago under lower costs; and at the same time, because of the high cost, he has increased his liability for years to come. Therefore I say that, while the fact is that a man is able to buy a house with a smaller percentage of equity under this new proposal, it will not in fact give him as great an equity in his house as could have been arranged by assuring that building costs remained down. The amortization period is extended from twenty years or, under certain conditions, twenty-five years, as it was before, to thirty years. That is a feature which should be commended. In my opinion, a third good feature is the provision for direct loans by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation where lending institutions may, for certain reasons, not want to lend money to a prospective home owner.

I consider it my duty to draw the attention of the minister to some of the bad features in this bill. The improvement of land is one of the main things provided for. Under that provision housing groups or mortgage companies or land companies may develop housing areas in suburban districts and the cost is guaranteed to those companies by the people of Canada. Such companies are permitted to make two per cent on their investment. In my opinion that, in effect, is a future subsidy to those companies and to the families to which they hope the properties will be sold. I can guarantee to the minister that, with present costs, those houses will not be houses that can be purchased by low-income families. I think he will have to agree with that statement. In my opinion that is a bad form of subsidy. I believe in the subsidy principle with respect to housing, but it should be applicable at the low-income and wage levels.

There is another feature which the minister and his officials have overlooked entirely and I should like to draw his attention to it at this time, because we propose to submit an amendment in committee to remedy the defect. As I see it, there is a danger that the maintenance costs for the suburban developments provided by this bill are likely to be loaded on the municipalities. The experience in connection with former housing developments in suburban areas has been referred to by previous speakers this afternoon. By this legislation, the development companies are protected from going bankrupt; we as the people of Canada are preventing those companies from going bankrupt, but many of the facilities which will be needed to make these areas habitable, such as streets, roads, water facilities, schools, utilities of various kinds, will have to be provided by the municipality. As far as I can see, there is no provision in the act to permit the municipality or the provincial planning board to take any part in the planning of this work.

I have here figures from the official United States records indicating that in 1935, when there was not a great deal of suburban development, the city of Boston found that its revenues per resident from the suburban area was $47 a year, whereas the expenditures on facilities for those suburbanites was $63 per resident. If this bill is permitted to be carried through and this work is carried on without consultation with the provincial or municipal government concerned we can envisage, not the bankruptcy of the speculators in suburban development, because they are protected by the government, but the bankruptcy of the municipality itself. Pressure will be exerted upon the municipality to extend public facilities, to build roads and all the rest of it, while the people who will exert this pressure upon the municipality will be protected against personal loss by the federal government under the terms of Bill No. 176.

Ancillary to this is the fact that there is no provision for the expression of opinion by local planning bodies with respect to the type of community to be built as a result of the enterprise which is being sponsored under this bill by the minister of reconstruction. As far as I can see, there is no provision for participation in any form by planning bodies which have been set up by municipalities or which are envisaged under the terms of different provincial statutes.

The final criticism—and this is an old one from the point of view of hon. members in this corner—is that there is no provision for participation in this fund by provincial or municipal housing authorities that have been set up or that may be set up in the future. As the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) said in the brilliant speech he made a few minutes ago, we are going to vote for this measure, but we are disappointed that it goes only such a short way to meet the problem facing us. We feel certain that this bill will not take us many further steps along the road to providing houses for the Canadian people.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two with regard to this subject. I do not think it is necessary for me to remind the house or the people of Canada of the urgent need there is for more housing. We are all aware of that fact, and the attention of the government has been directed to it on more than one occasion, not only at this session by hon. members who have spoken already but in previous sessions.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) referred to the fact that the government should continue the same type of housing programme in peace time as they used during the war. I hope I am not misquoting the hon. member, but that was what I understood him to say. I do not agree with that. I think the houses which the government built under the national housing scheme are much superior to those built under any other housing programme the government has instituted.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I did not understand the hon. member for Cariboo to say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think you will find that in his speech. Possibly what he had in mind was that the government should carry on that type of mass production which it carried on during war time. That was my understanding of it, anyway. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), who spoke a few minutes ago, suggested a continuation of the government's plan for mass production under government ownership. I should like to point out to the hon. members for Mackenzie and Cariboo that I have watched very carefully the different types of houses that have been built. It is my opinion that, except in one or two particular instances, the majority of the houses built under Wartime Housing or the veterans housing scheme do not begin to compare with the houses built under the national housing scheme. I have made the statement before and I do not hesitate to repeat it, that I believe it is better business; I believe it will result in more satisfaction to the men who receive these houses if we build one house properly rather than build two houses which inevitably will fall down in a few years. It is my view that in respect of a large number of the houses now being built by the government, such as those under Wartime Housing or under the Veterans' Land Act, the municipalities, both rural and urban, will be faced with a bad situation in years to come. I hesitate to refer to them as slum areas, lest some may take the wrong impression from my words. But I do not think one could use any other expression if he wished to convey a proper picture, and particularly when one thinks of the houses which were built in Hull, just across the river, during war time.

For the moment I should like to speak about the financing of these houses, and in that connection I would commend the hon. member for Cariboo upon the suggestion he made. That very thing has been in my mind. I do not think it is possible for the government to finance a large housing programme under the present financial arrangements set out in the contracts. I would assume that in respect of national housing the government is using exactly the same type of contract agreement as it is using in other types of housing. If I am wrong in that, the minister will correct me. I say that, however, because I believe it is a standard form of contract.

Under it, as I pointed out before, those who are purchasing or building these houses are required to pay 4½ per cent compounded half yearly. As the hon. member for Cariboo pointed out, on the incomes these people are receiving, including both civilians and veterans, it is absolutely impossible for them to pay those large sums of money at that high rate of interest over the period of time allotted in the contract, or the extended period allotted in the bill before us. I suggest that the minister should give careful consideration to devising some scheme whereby the national credit of the country could be used to give these people decent homes, and at an interest rate sufficient only to cover service charges.

I should like to refer to another aspect of the matter, and in this connection I again refer to the contract. The reference I am about to make would apply to veterans who are affected by different types of government housing programmes, as well as to those who are building houses under the National Housing Act programme. I believe every consideration should be given to the man who is purchasing one of these houses. It is a lifetime investment for him, and a tremendous amount of money that he is required to invest.

I suggest that every time a man makes a payment it should be recognized that to that extent he has a definite equity in the home. I do not believe the contract should be worded as it is today, so that the lending agency is in a position whereby, should the builder, civilian or veteran be unable to pay his required instalment, it can evict the individual affected. I know it might be said that the mortgage companies or lending companies would not do that. But I know of actual cases where mortgage and lending companies have done that very thing, although not under this legislation.

There should be some protection for individuals who are building these homes. When a man has made payments amounting to six or seven thousand dollars and then suffers some misfortune and finds that he must miss two or three payments, it seems most unfair that a lending company should be in a position to dispossess him of his entire property, and the equity therein.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Do they?

Mr. JOHNSTON: According to the contract they can.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): But they do not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is nonsense, if I may be excused for using that word, to suggest that we should leave a clause in the agreement under which such procedure would be permitted. If it is not done as the hon. member suggests, then why leave the clause in the contract? Why tempt those companies with a clause of that kind? I suggest that it should be removed.

I am not saying for one moment that a lending company should not have fair and reasonable protection, but I say that under this legislation the government is giving those companies that reasonable protection, and the financial interests of those companies in these undertakings would not be affected if that clause in the contract were removed.

I am not an expert on the wording of contracts, but it seems to me it would be a simple matter to prepare a clause whereby, if a man through misfortune finds that he has reached a point where all parties concerned are agreed that he cannot continue his payments, a clause could be inserted stating that the property could be disposed of to some other individual on the understanding that a man who had paid six or seven thousand dollars would have his equity in the property returned to him. The property should be resold, not just to anyone the company might select, or at any price it might set, but to the highest bidder and at a reasonable price. Then, after the actual expenses of the sale were deducted from the proceeds, the remainder should be returned to the man who originally entered into the contract with the company.

This would be unjust neither to the company nor to the man who bought the house. It would not deal unfairly with the government. If any of the three is financially able to take the loss, surely it would be either the company or the government, but certainly not the individual.

I have only a word more to say in the matter, and I have no desire to detain the house beyond six o'clock, particularly if it is the wish to have this measure passed today. I would however suggest to the minister that he review the contract. I draw it to his attention particularly as it applies to veterans under Wartime Housing, but not so much in respect of National Housing, which concerns a different class of people. I suggest that the minister might give this matter his consideration with a view to making some change in the contract so as to give a purchaser of one of these homes a fair and equitable share in the property he is acquiring.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak for a few moments on the housing situation, which still is critical, although I had hoped that before this time the problem would have solved itself as it often has done in the past. I should like to support the suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) that the notice given to tenants in shared apartments be shortened. The present notice is six months, which is a very considerable time. I know that in the city of Toronto, if the landlord comes before the judge who is in charge of rental administration and can show any reasonable ground for having the period shortened, that is done. But that means that the landlord has to take legal proceedings, which is something that should be avoided if possible. The fact of occupying shared apartments has a curious effect on both landlord and tenant. The fact that the tenant cannot be put out without extra notice undoubtedly makes him more independent, and it is strange how that reacts on the landlord or the man who owns the property.

When this freezing order first came out I knew a landlord who was a very fine man. He had upstairs in his house a tenant who shared his accommodation. The tenant had been there for two years, but almost as soon as the freezing order came out, just because the landlord could not give that man notice he wanted to get him out, and as a result there was bad feeling between the tenant and himself. If the landlord could have given him notice at any time the tenancy would have gone on for a considerable period or perhaps until some other arrangement agreeable to both parties had been made. This curious trait in human nature is an undoubted fact and cannot be lost sight of. I am sure that if two months notice could be given that would be fair to the tenant, because we must remember that the fact that a tenant moves from one place to another and somebody else moves in to his place does not make any less accommodation. It simply means that the tenant occupies some other place and the owner gets his own property. If two months notice could be given a condition could be added that the owner of a shared apartment must rent the place within two weeks or some other short period of its becoming vacant, so that it would not be kept vacant indefinitely; unless the landlord might be able to show that the accommodation was necessary for himself and his family.

Again, I think something should be done to allow a man under certain conditions to get into his own house. I know cases in Toronto where the tenant is living in a house at a small rent, and quite often he has only himself and one or two children, whereas the owner has a large family. Some rule should be made whereby the landlord could make application to the court to obtain possession of his own preperty under certain conditions. It would not be a great hardship on the tenant. Many of them are now paying a very cheap rent and could buy a house of their own, but naturally if they can live cheaply in another person's house they prefer to do so.

Another thing which I have often thought it would be wise for the government to do, is for the minister to decide on the type of house that should be built. Just before the war broke out, a popular type of house was the five-room bungalow. It is uneconomic. It can hold only one family. You cannot divide it up. You cannot rent rooms in it. The reason it was built was that the only people who were buying houses in those days were men in the prime or in the evening of life whose families had grown up and gone away, and they wanted to get into a smaller house. As the fruits of their labours they often had a certain amount of cash with which to buy a house. Strange to relate, the other type of people who bought that kind of house was the newly married couple, not thinking of the time when they would need a larger house. They bought the little house because it looked nice and appealed to them. Every few years produces its own type of house. In Toronto a builder of thirty or forty years' experience could look at any house and tell you when it was built. At one time the mansard roof was popular; at another it was the eight-room house with gables, and at another time another type of roof. When these houses are being built they are popular and the kind that people want to buy. It is most unfortunate that the popular type of house today should be the five-room house. I think the minister should insist on the semi-detached eight-room house being built. The other day the minister suggested, when I spoke of the cost of building houses, that High Park was a very high-class district. It is not entirely so. I venture to say that twenty per cent of the houses are semi-detached, and the great majority of the others, if they are not semi-detached, are built so close to another house on one side that they are practically in the semi-detached category.

I was interested in reading a heading—I did not read the whole article—in the Saturday Evening Post. It pointed out that in the city of Baltimore there are a great many semi-detached houses which, with a narrow frontage, provide a cheap economic house to live in.

I was surprised and somewhat gratified to read in the Christian Science Monitor of May 24, an article referring to South Africa's plans for housing. They apparently have the same critical shortage of houses in South Africa that we have, and they are apparently meeting it as well as if not better than we are. This is the part I wanted to read:

> New types of housing have been evolved. It was obvious that for the lower-rent houses, South Africa would have to depart from the "bungalow" type. Semi-detached double-storey houses could be built and serviced much more economically. The aim was to bring down the cost per dwelling to below £1,000; for rentals between £6 and £7 a month.

I suggest that a great deal could be done to relieve housing if the government would insist on these double semi-detached houses, because they lend themselves to being divided into shared apartments in a manner that no one-storey building, especially a one-storey five-roomed house, can be. I cannot agree with the new legislation that has been introduced by the minister with respect to the extension of the time of these mortgages. I have seen these long periods enacted before in the case of municipalities where they have thirty-year periods for the payment of schools and other local improvements. It is uneconomical. It would be all right if we were getting the money at 2 per cent, 2½ per cent or 3 per cent. I believe the rate of interest on the loans we are obtaining under the National Housing Act is 4½ per cent. If I am wrong I wish the minister would correct me. At 4½ per cent the quicker you get the loan paid off, the better.

When the minister introduced this bill I asked him a question, and I think he told me that the difference per thousand was that in the case of the twenty-year period it would cost $6.30 per thousand, and in the case of the thirty-year period it would cost $5.09 per thousand, a difference of $1.21 a month. In other words, on a $5,000 house, which I think is enough for the ordinary working man to pay for, it would mean about $6 a month extra. The sum of $6 a month would not be serious for the prospective owner. If he ever intends to pay for it he ought to make a special struggle to pay that $6, because, if he does not, at the end of the five years he has paid practically nothing on principal. I have calculated rather casually to within a few dollars how it would work out. If he takes the thirty-year term, at the end of five years he would have paid off about $450 on a $5,000 house. That is hardly enough.

Again I recall to the minister that in making these loans some time ago—I have not seen one lately—they did not, even though it was based on a twenty-year amortization plan, make the mortgage run longer than for ten years. At the end of ten years, even on the twenty-year amortization plan there was not very much paid on the principal. If the time is extended to thirty years the purchaser, even if he has paid for ten years, will have the very small sum of $1,000 paid on his mortgage, and that will be discouraging to him as well as very unsafe for the lender. I would suggest that the benefit which will be coming to any prospective purchaser, the mortgagor, by extending the term, is illusionary and not in his best interests.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Before the debate is closed, I wish to discuss briefly a matter which affects my own constituency, which is, I believe, of general interest to the country. Some time ago the minister announced in the house that the corporation known as Housing Enterprises had for the most part decided to drop its building project for this year. I hold in my hand a clipping from a newspaper that appeared the day after the minister's announcement. This article gives certain information on that. Here are some of the reasons that were given after the minister made his announcement. I am not sure which paper this is, but I think it is a reliable one. It says:

> Because of the continued high cost of material and labour and subsequent failure to provide low rentals, Housing Enterprises Limited, operated by the life insurance companies under the National Housing Act, has decided to drop its 1947 building programme, Reconstruction Minister C. D. Howe told the house this afternoon.

Then a little further on, the following appears:

> The situation was brought to a head when a firm bid was received for 400 units in Hamilton and which bid would result in rentals of from $55 to $75 for three, four and five-room units respectively.

Further on, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), the minister said:

> The rents being charged in the Toronto area were so high that they were not in the class of low-rental housing. They ran between $45 and $55 a month.

I put that on the record because it has a bearing on what I want to say about Housing Enterprises. I believe that the experiment which was perhaps entered into in good faith by the government with this corporation, which is a holding company for the life insurance companies of Canada, has not produced good results. I also wish to say that it is strange that the results produced were as meagre as they were when one realizes what concessions this company received from the government.

I have had a little personal experience with this corporation because it so happened that one of the concessions it received was the privilege of buying one of the airports at Dauphin, No. 10, and the terms of the sale, as well as the way in which it came about, created a great deal of interest and not a little indignation in the town of Dauphin and in the district. It appeared that before any of the locally interested bodies had received any notification or any warning that this airport was to be sold to Housing Enterprises, men were already on the job ready to tear down the buildings. However I am not going to labour that part of it because there may have been some misunderstanding there. But the part that is important is that this corporation has received from Central Housing Mortgage Corporation a concession which should have made it possible to construct many more houses than have been built and at a lower price, and houses which could have been let at lower rentals.

For example, in the case of the airport at Dauphin to which I have referred this company was given the privilege of buying thirty-two of the forty buildings that were sold. According to a return which I received, the original cost of these buildings was $799,450. Housing Enterprises paid for all these buildings a total of $64,120, or eight per cent of the original cost. In addition to this, the original cost of putting up these buildings—some of them were constructed in 1940 and some in 1941—was much lower than it would be at the present time because costs of materials were considerably lower. As a matter of fact, I happen to know that the contractors who took contracts to put up buildings in this airport went out to the farmers and, in some cases, under false pretences bought lumber from the farmers at as low as $20. After the company had received a concession of that kind, I was surprised to find, in the course of a conversation with one of its officials, that they had not contracted to build one building in Manitoba. They also bought an airport in the town of Virden. Another return I have here informs us that in the town of Virden they bought buildings that originally cost $463,730 at a price which worked out to a little less than six per cent of the original cost.

We find also that, while Housing Enterprises had not contracted to build any houses in Manitoba, they were given the privilege of coming in and buying up these airports and shipping the material out of Manitoba, some of it going as far west as Regina, Edmonton and Vancouver, and some of it going to Toronto. On top of that, we find that Housing Enterprises had the right to sell to the public on the spot any material which they did not require for their own purposes. Apparently the prices at which they sold were based practically on the prices of new material. We found that, in connection with No. 10 airport in Dauphin, people who came to buy space heaters, which the company bought at the rate of eight per cent of the original cost, which works out at from $31 to $33, were charged, first, $100 and then $150; then, when the demand was great the price went up to $200, and in the end these space heaters were selling for $225 each.

It was the same story with washbasins, sinks, toilets, linoleum and so on. For example, washbasins which were incomplete because the trap was missing were $13 each; sinks, $12.50; toilets, $16; linoleum, $1.75 a yard, and so on down the line. Shiplap, for instance sold at $45 per thousand and dimension lumber, the bigger sizes, up to $50 per thousand. When the citizens of Dauphin and district discovered that this company was tearing down the buildings at this airport and shipping materials out of Manitoba, at the same time making a huge profit on scrap material sold on the spot, they decided to make a protest.

I am not going to repeat the whole story here because the minister is familiar with it. Wires were sent in protest—I have copies of all of them—from the citizens of Dauphin and from such organizations as the branch of the legion, the board of trade of the town of Dauphin, the rural municipality, and so on, protesting that before the local authorities had had any opportunity to make provision for buying these buildings and supplying the material for local use, particularly to veterans who had begun building houses and had not the material with which to finish them, this company walked in and got a number one priority because they happened to be classified as a government agency under the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, having the privilege of making a huge profit on scrap material.

As a result of these protests, the officials in Winnipeg did make an arrangement with Housing Enterprises to release a certain amount of that material for the local use of veterans, and there again I have a protest to make, because we were given to understand that the prices to be charged by Housing Enterprises would be reasonable. No figures were stated at the time, but an estimate was given for lumber of from $25 to $30 a thousand. When the material was made available we found that the veterans were charged $45 or $50 for the same material. The same applied all down the line.

The objection I have is this. The government is going to spend millions. It is well known that Housing Enterprises have the privilege of borrowing up to $90 million on the dominion treasury, putting up $10 million of their own capital, being guaranteed the investment back again and a profit of at least two per cent. In other words, they do not take any risk whatever but are using the money of the policyholders of the life insurance company, investing it, and being guaranteed a profit. They are getting a return on their investment and are also given the privilege of buying up airports which could be made far more useful in local communities or in the provinces where they are. But in spite of all these concessions, we find that today the whole project has turned out to be one big fizzle.

I feel that if the government is going to be justified in spending $90 million or any amount of that size, the money would be far better spent if the government would do as was suggested this afternoon to my right—get in touch with the provincial authorities and the municipal authorities and offer them the same concessions as, or even better concessions than they offered Housing Enterprises. I believe that, because these authorities have some responsibility to the public, they would see to it that houses were built and rented at cost.

The more we study the agreement between Housing Enterprises Limited and Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, the more we realize that the whole scheme does not look genuine. The whole scheme is worked out in such a way that Housing Enterprises cannot lose; and when we realize that, after having received a loan, after having been guaranteed a profit, the houses which they build belong to Housing Enterprises, and after payments have been made for a period of fifty years they still own the houses, we can understand the situation. It is true that some houses after fifty years will not be worth much, but some will be worth a considerable amount of money, and there is no reason why a private company should be given such a plum at a time when houses are badly needed.

If the government had spent the same amount of money, or had risked the same amount of money and given the same concessions to the municipal and provincial authorities, we would have had houses at a lower rental price and it would have been more satisfactory all round.

I am particularly worried about the fact that in such communities as Dauphin and other towns of that size, where the local authorities were interested in doing something about houses, they found almost overnight that the airports which should have been made available to them were suddenly sold to someone else. Somebody comes along and takes all the material and ships it out of the province, and nothing is left for the local people.

The minister is aware that in the town of Dauphin there was organized a veterans' company, consisting of returned men, who were willing to buy either of the two airports there, tear it down, and make the material available to the local people for building purposes. That company was not even consulted or let in on the deal at all. The company knew nothing at all about the matter until Housing Enterprises walked in and took the airport over.

What was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), although it sounds like a new line of policy from that side of the house—

Mr. GREEN: He has advocated it several times before. That is a little bit political.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If you want to get political I will start in the right place. During the last two years, we have been hearing nothing but private enterprise from members of the Progressive Conservative party in regard to housing, but today they admit that it takes the government and the provincial and municipal authorities cooperating to get houses built. I have not heard the words "private enterprise" mentioned once in the whole debate.

I believe that if the line of action I have outlined were taken the government could retrieve something out of this muddle that has resulted from the breaking down on the project of Housing Enterprises. The government realizes today, as hon. members do, that the reason why low-rental housing will never result from the operations of private firms building houses is that these firms are not in the business of building houses for the use of the people but for making a profit.

I am not going to argue now the question whether making a profit is wrong, but the objective is more houses and lower rental houses, and it is up to the government to invest every dollar possible in this project on a non-profit basis. The experiment with Housing Enterprises has been perhaps a lesson. It has been a costly one.

I find from another return that during the past year this firm was advanced loans totalling over $16 million, and the result of all that has been that only a limited number of houses—I have not the figures here—were built, and houses which originally were planned to be rented at $35 a month have now to be rented at $55 or $65 a month.

I also want to register a protest on behalf of Dauphin and other communities in Manitoba where airports were bought and wrecked without the local people having an opportunity of receiving the materials they required.

I am not going to take more of the time of the house, because some of the other material I have can be used perhaps on the various sections of the bill. I want to say emphatically that the results of the experiment in the last two years have proven that if we are to have low-rental housing it will have to be done through public enterprise, through local authorities cooperating with the dominion government, with the objective of providing houses and not making profits.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I presume, when the minister speaks, he will close the debate. If I might have an opportunity to say or word or two I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not read my speech, which has not been my habit for two or three decades. I should like to make one or two general observations with regard to this question which seems to be gripping the imagination of the Canadian people. To my mind, broad enough consideration has not been given with regard to the real wants with regard to housing. It seems to me that our people—perhaps on account of the tragic war we have come through—having been brought to the large centres to ply their handicrafts in the art of making war material, are not desirous of going back to the place whence they came. If your department, sir, would give some thought to the reason for this shortage they would perhaps find that in yesteryear many of those now seeking housing accommodation in the large centres of population could find abundance of housing accommodation in the counties of Ontario, for example, or in the counties of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick. I cannot speak so well for what provision there is in western Canada to house our people. But no one in this chamber can gainsay the fact that there are scores of houses vacant in the back country, one might call it, or in the country portion of Ontario and the other provinces. They are nice houses, but are a little old, and need a little repair and attention. They are surrounded by an abundance of the best farming country anywhere in the civilized world, off which people could get a good living.

In spite of all the discussions which have taken place in this chamber, I have yet to hear hon. members advocating that these houses vacant throughout the length and breadth of our land should be utilized. No encouragement is being given to a movement to get our people back to those vacant properties. Why not, sir, within your department, have every county council within our province make an index of the number of vacant houses and vacant farms within their county and file that with the responsible party? Then instead of, as I sometimes feel disposed to say, wasting propaganda on our people in telling them what they should and should not do, let us have a little propaganda directed toward our people who are seeking housing, asking them to go back to mother nature, to go back to some of these good homes and lands which are lying vacant at the present time.

A quarter of a century ago, it was my high privilege to live on lot 30, concession D, Scarboro—if you will pardon a personal reference—on which there was a little four-roomed house where my family lived on some twenty-five acres of land. From there I took a seat in this honourable house. Looking back on those days, I say to the young men and the young women—part and parcel of the last war—who did so much for us, that after the first war I found myself in that position. Looking back, I say they were the happiest days of my short term of existence in this world. I enjoyed them immensely. Twenty-five acres and a four or five-roomed house built partly by my own hands helped me to understand how easy it was to make a living in this fair land of Canada.

I am saying this now, not for the edification of this honourable chamber but so that those many thousands who are looking for some place in which to live and eke out an existence in the urban sections of our community, may have their sights changed a little, may go back to the land and find how easy it is there, at their age, to make a living. Most of those about whom we are thinking tonight are perhaps between twenty-five and forty or forty-five. I want them to see how easy it would be for them to make a living and to find housing accommodation at very little expense. If they must follow a trade; if they must find their vocation in a city or a town, has there not been a tremendous development in the matter of transportation in the last quarter of a century? Is it not easy to get to town if the town is ten, fifteen or twenty miles away? If they cannot afford their own T-model Ford, as it were, they can still find, close to many of the large centres of population, all sorts of transportation services to take them to their jobs within the community.

With the least little bit of ambition, in these days when people are demanding an eight-hour day and perhaps working only about seven hours and getting eight hours' pay, much might be done. There are today sixteen more hours left in the day. Thirty years ago, while punching a time-clock at seven o'clock in the morning and again at six o'clock at night, six days in the week, more money was made by one individual in this chamber between the hours of six o'clock at night and seven o'clock the next morning on twenty-five acres of land than was made at the job he had at the factory where he punched a time-clock. Nowadays a job which pays good wages and this other little bit of endeavour after having put in eight hours a day—we need only eight hours' sleep—could give a bountiful living to those of our Canadian citizens who today find themselves looking for a house in which to live and looking, if they only knew it, for some little chore to help occupy those extra eight hours; not the eight hours that he works for someone else, not the eight hours which he requires for his sleep, but those eight hours of working recreation. My recommendation, sir, is that the eight hours of recreation should be spent in some of these thousands of vacant lands in the rural parts of Ontario and the other provinces, which are not too far away from where the individual can find a job. If that is done I think, in the final analysis, we shall have within Canada a stronger and better race of people.

I have trespassed on your time for no other reason than to bring to the attention of the Canadian people the fact that we are not doing right by our country when we allow thousands of farm homes to remain idle when thousands of our people are trekking to the industrial centres and are unable to find roofs to put over their heads. They are more and more becoming the type of people whom some of us in this chamber encourage to lean on the government instead of on themselves, instead of applying themselves in the grandest land that civilization has ever known, our country, Canada.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I had not any thought of entering into this discussion on housing, although I did spend some time this afternoon listening to the hardship stories of some of the hon. members of the opposition until I found myself on the verge of tears. I have been rather quiet on this subject; as a matter of fact, I have been rather quiet on all subjects during this session. Perhaps one reason is that I formed the habit of talking to my people every two weeks for fifteen minutes through the local broadcasting station. That may have acted as a safety valve and I have not found it necessary to take up much of the time of the house.

When I came back tonight and found that the discussion on housing was still continuing I started to tell a story about housing to one of my friends outside. This incident came to my attention not long ago and I had used it in one of my broadcasts. I went up to my office to get a copy of that broadcast and I found that it was even more like a Ripley story than I had remembered. Then I came into the chamber and heard the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) talking my language and that encouraged me to go on to tell my story of housing.

This incident happened this spring. I was driving along with a fellow and he told me that he had built a bungalow in Pembroke, twenty-five feet by twenty-five, complete with basement, full wiring, painting, decorating and all that. He had built this home while working a ten-hour, rather than an eight-hour day. I do not know whether his wife helped him with digging the cellar, but in any event it was dug by hand. He and his wife ran the cement for the cellar and they built their home without any additional help. This was all done while he was working at a well paid job ten hours a day. He did what is advocated by the hon. member for Danforth. He is a young, healthy, strong chap who came from the farm and knows how to work. He happened to have in reserve a bush lot from which he cut his own lumber.

When he finished his story I asked him if he had any idea how much cash he had invested in the bungalow. Believe it or not, this is what he told me. He said he could not be sure because they had not kept accurate accounts, but their best guess was $600. He said it was $600, not $6,000. I just wanted to give hon. members the details of this instance where a bungalow was built in Renfrew county, in the town of Pembroke.

I can give the house another incident. My wife and I live in a little cottage in Westboro. A little more than a year ago an air force man bought the lot alongside where we live. He was not a carpenter, but he was young and strong and willing to work. Occasionally he would get in one of his pals who knew more about carpentry work than he did. He has not a basement, but they got in their foundation and a roof over part of the building. His wife and son moved in and they lived there all summer. They accomplished enough to permit the family to live there during the winter. They are still working away at their home, but it is almost complete and it will be a beautiful place in which to live. I do not know how much cash it has cost him, but he has something to show for the work he put forth on holidays and nights, sometimes well up to midnight. As the hon. member for Danforth has said, if you are young it does not hurt you to work until midnight even at such strenuous work. This offers much in the way of a solution for our housing problem, this sort of effort on the part of individuals.

A few blocks over, another air force man did the same thing. He built himself a home and he moved there with his wife and child. Then he was transferred to Toronto and he sold his home for $3,500. I do not know how much of that was profit, but I want to endorse what the hon. member for Danforth has said. I wanted to point these incidents out as being, in part, a solution for the housing problem in this Canada of ours.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think I can compress what I have to say on this matter into the space of four or five minutes.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, there is nothing of any great importance in it. It contains routine amendments to the act and takes some of the strictness out of certain provisions. However, the bill has provoked a debate on some of the wider aspects of the housing problem. I am not going to review everything that has been said about housing conditions in Canada during the course of this debate, because all of it sadly is true. I think conditions are worse now than they have been at any time.

The fault does not lie in the terms of the National Housing Act; it lies with the administration. I think the time has come when we should have from the minister a comprehensive report on the housing situation in Canada. The house will remember that the minister made a comprehensive report on July 22, 1946, the first report of its kind for some months. All we have had this session is mere fragmentary reports.

The latest development is that Housing Enterprises Limited has come to a standstill.

[Mr. Warren.]

I should like to read three or four sentences of what I said on this subject on March 22, 1946, as follows:

> Housing Enterprises Limited has announced that its objective in 1946 is the construction of 6,000 housing units in various Canadian centres. That is rental housing. That is a drop in the bucket. Let us not delude ourselves that this will be low-rent housing. It cannot be. The cost of construction today is such that Housing Enterprises Limited cannot build low-rent housing as that term is properly understood. They will probably be medium-rental houses.

Now, in May, 1947, the minister has announced that, because Housing Enterprises Limited cannot build low-rental housing, it has brought its operations to a standstill.

Then, bearing on the matter of the need for a report, may I remind the house of what the minister had to say on this subject when he spoke on July 22, 1946, as reported at page 3672 of Hansard:

> As at March, 1946, our minimum immediate housing needs were estimated at 150,000 housing units. This figure is equal to the number of houses which under normal conditions would have been built during the war years to keep up with the increase in the number of families.

And farther on, he had this to say:

> I believe that these figures and estimates, although approximate, are valid and that we can anticipate by spring 1947, an immediate housing deficit of some 180,000 units, or a worsening of the situation by some 20 per cent.

I think the house is entitled at this stage to know what is the present estimated housing shortage, according to the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or of the department presided over by the minister. I would remind the house that the estimate of an immediate emergency housing shortage of 180,000 units as at March 31, 1947, was based on the assumption that there would be built in Canada the full 60,000 housing units set forth in the government's housing programme for 1946.

Then, may I say this word in conclusion. Some may complain about the amount of time occupied in discussions in the house with respect to housing conditions in Canada today. The debate today is an example. What has been said may not have been strictly on the bill, because the bill covers a very narrow front in so far as the general problem of housing is concerned. Only four or five amendments are contained in it, and they are not related one to another.

This emphasizes what some of us have been trying to say in the house in the past three sessions, namely, that there should be a committee of the house to deal with this subject. I suggested a standing committee of the house on health, welfare, housing and social security, before which reports could be had and where it would be possible to bring officials from the department and officials from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of securing first-hand information. This would save a good deal of the time of the house.

We do not save time in this chamber by refusing to set up committees of the house to deal with matters requiring intimate and detailed investigation. The housing problem of Canada is far too serious a matter to be allowed to await the time when the government chooses to open up a discussion on housing questions in the house, and to hand out to hon. members, at altogether too rare intervals, prepared statements respecting conditions.

The house has a far greater responsibility with respect to this crucial housing situation than can be discharged by methods of that kind. What we need is a committee before which can be brought first-hand information from officials who can be questioned, so that hon. members may inquire into what they consider to be wrong with the way things are done, and so that they may prod where prodding is necessary to see that proper remedial measures are undertaken. We are not dealing with this problem in the house in what I consider to be a proper and enlightened manner.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that when the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, having made somewhat lengthy remarks when the resolution preceding the bill was being discussed, it is not my purpose to speak at length on the second reading of the bill. I shall have something to say about the various sections of the bill when we reach committee stage. However we have had a most interesting discussion, and perhaps I should comment on a few matters which were raised in that discussion.

The National Housing Act, which is being amended in the present bill, is the backbone of the financing of house building in Canada at the present time. The bill was amended last year; it is being amended this year, and I have every reason to believe that it will be amended next year, and perhaps at every session of parliament for several years.

The purpose of the amendments is to introduce such changes as may be warranted from year to year to make the National Housing Act an effective method for the financing of house building in this country. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins), in his interesting remarks, suggested that he knew of no building held up for lack of financing. I understood him to say that he knew of no one who had been unable to build a house for lack of money, and that he knew of no builders who had been unable to build houses for lack of money.

That, I think, is an accurate appraisal of the situation. The fact that that is so is due, indirectly, to the National Housing Act. Obviously if borrowing on favourable terms is possible through the National Housing Act, private borrowing must be on a competitive level in order that such private borrowing may continue.

In any event, the result is that cheap and plentiful money has been made available for house building. We have heard the suggestion made tonight that the immediate answer to house building is subsidized state housing. I was surprised to hear that that suggestion came from all parts of the house, including the Progressive Conservative party. I am not closing the door to the possibility that subsidized state housing may be the ultimate solution of the problem; but I do say that if it is to be undertaken there must be quite a different chain of responsibility from the present one. Then, too, there must be a different supply situation, as to both materials and labour, from what exists at the present time.

I would remind hon. members that, under the British North America Act, housing is not a responsibility of the federal government. It comes in the field of property and civil rights, and is primarily the responsibility of the provinces. The federal government has recognized a responsibility for providing housing to take care of the dislocation in population arising through the war. It has been taking an active lead in providing housing for that purpose. But even though it is now taking the lead, it cannot proceed without the active cooperation of the municipalities.

There are great differences in various parts of Canada in the degree of success of housing programmes, and that difference is due wholly to the attitude of the various municipalities. Where a municipality has been cooperative, the number of houses has kept up fully to the requirements of the municipality. If a municipality is uncooperative the best efforts of the government can result only in a partial solution of the situation in that city or municipality. That is inevitable, and one of the handicaps of the department in attempting to provide adequate housing under present circumstances.

I know of no case in any part of Canada where the government has refused to finance housing under conditions that conform to the requirements of the department. Therefore, if any city, or any municipality, in Canada has not its required housing, the fault is largely in the hands of the municipality. Through its active cooperation, that housing could have been made available.

If subsidized state housing ultimately proves to be the solution—and I have said myself that it may be unfortunate if that must be the solution—then the initiative must be taken by the local authorities, by the provinces and the cities, with the help of the federal government. I think no one will quarrel with that viewpoint. That is the only possible way of carrying out housing of that type. That is obviously the proper chain of responsibility.

Mention has been made of slum clearance. There is a great job to be undertaken in slum clearance. But that job must be undertaken through the leadership of the provinces and the municipalities. Hon. members will appreciate that the federal government cannot go into a municipality and earmark certain blocks for demolition and reconstruction. That is a work for the municipality. I know of only one city which has undertaken any activity in slum clearance, and that is Toronto. As soon as the suggestion was made to the federal government that Toronto wished to undertake a project in slum clearance, part 2 of the National Housing Act was made effective, and assistance under that section was offered immediately to that city. At the present time Toronto, in undertaking that particular project, together with cities in Saskatchewan are the only cities in Canada empowered, under their charters, to enter into and to invest city funds in the housing field. I have seen no inclination on the part of the provinces to urge their cities to accept legislation that would entitle them to enter that field.

Slum clearance is a job that must be undertaken in Canada. It has been suggested that house building would be an effective method of relieving unemployment in time of depression. That is quite true, and it should be used for that purpose. In areas of spotty employment in Canada, the department urges that labour be absorbed in a housing programme. There is no more effective employer of several classes of labour than house building, and slum clearance is a splendid method of providing work where work is needed in low-employment areas. I hope that slum clearance will be used for that purpose. But obviously the time to undertake slum clearance is not at the period of highest employment in the history of this country, at the period when this country was never more prosperous.

Someone mentioned investment in housing in Sweden as compared with Canada. The difference is that housing in Sweden is state housing, and the figures given indicate the full cost of the housing, whereas the figures in Canada indicate only the government's share of housing investment, the bulk of the investment here is being carried by the lending institutions. The full expenditure in Canada on housing is vastly greater than the figures mentioned for Sweden. My department has studied house-building figures in all parts of the world, and we are unable to find any country which has built more houses per unit of population than has Canada during the post-war period.

We set a programme in 1945 for house-building in this country—I have mentioned it several times in the house—of 50,000 houses for the first full year after the war. We were able to improve on that. Slightly under 50,000 houses were built in 1945. The target for the second year was 60,000, and in 1946 we built 62,500. The objective is 80,000 for 1947. We have succeeded up to the present time in meeting our objectives. Whether we shall do so this year is in doubt at the moment. Progress of new construction must be much better in the next month or two if we are to meet that objective. The reason is that costs have risen to the point where a new orientation is required to provide houses within the reach of low-income families, and the purpose of this bill is to take steps in that direction. Means must also be found to overcome the shortage of serviced property in or near centres of population. That is another purpose of the bill.

A good deal has been said about Housing Enterprises Limited. I would point out that Housing Enterprises Limited was not a project of the federal government. It was a private corporation which borrowed money under the National Housing Act, just as any other corporation or private individual. It was formed to build low-cost housing. The government has never been happy about that phase of the project. Even in its early stages it seemed doubtful whether it was building a class of housing that this government should endorse as being in the low-rental area. However, the insurance companies had for years been bringing pressure on the government to end government construction. It was claimed that this was a field which should be left to private enterprise. The government has always countered with the answer: If that is your field, why not take some direct part in it? Housing Enteprises was started as a private venture with the support of the federal government and by invitation of the federal government. The results have been becoming less and less satisfactory. Rentals that looked reasonably favourable in the early stages became higher than could be regarded as favourable in the later stages. When the decision was made by the insurance companies —not by the government—that activity in this field should be ended, the government had no objection.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) mentioned special concessions to Housing Enterprises Limited. He knows as well as I do that the same price for buildings to be dismantled in the prairie provinces has been made to all priority holders. Practically all the buildings in Saskatchewan were bought by the government of Saskatchewan on the basis that he has mentioned, eight per cent of the original cost. A large number of buildings in Alberta were bought by the provincial government of Alberta at eight per cent of the cost. A few buildings in Manitoba were bought by the government of Manitoba on the same basis. The first priorities go to the dominion, the second to the provinces and the municipalities. For its operations in the housing field Housing Enterprises Limited was considered to hold a first priority. The transaction was perfectly in order and perfectly parallel with the disposal of every building of that type in the prairie provinces. I could continue and go into more detail but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that further discussion be in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Corporation may execute documents.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister say a word by way of further explanation of the scope of this section? Actually the section, as one reads it, confers on the corporation powers much beyond the purpose of the section as stated in the explanatory note. Has the minister a statement to make on this section? Can he indicate the concrete situation which has arisen, which in turn has given rise to the proposed amendment?

Mr. HOWE: Section 2 of the bill proposes an amendment to give Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation power to convey property of His Majesty and deal with other matters with respect to title. The need for this amendment is that we are embarked upon a policy of selling Wartime Housing units to present tenants. The granting of the power is desirable so that the corporation may effect these sales arrangements and, in making title, avoid the cumbersome procedure of letters patent. Hon. members will remember that for the same reasons similar power is held by the Canadian farm loan board and the director of the Veterans' Land Act.

Section 3 (b) is further amended to give the corporation power to sell properties either for cash or on a deferred payment plan, and to take an agreement for sale or mortgage for the balance of purchase price owing.

The section is further amended by giving the corporation the right to sell mortgages or agreements for sale which they may hold as a result of selling Wartime Housing units. The amendment also gives the corporation power to dispose of loans made under the terms of the National Housing Act and in particular, loans made under the amendment proposed by section 8 of this bill. When the corporation takes a mortgage loan which fits the National Housing Act pattern, it is proposed that if participation in such a loan is sold to a lending institution, the loan may fall under the terms of an existing agreement or contract between the corporation and the lending institution.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister detail the method by which the houses built by Wartime Housing Limited can be vested in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before the situation contemplated by the new section will arise?

Mr. HOWE: The title is vested in His Majesty. Ordinarily the title would pass by letters patent issued by His Majesty. This amendment will give Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the right to act for His Majesty in making the conveyance in the ordinary way.

Mr. FLEMING: The section says:

Where title to real or other immoveable property is acquired by the corporation in the name of His Majesty . . .

Where the houses are built by Wartime Housing Limited, I wish the minister would indicate in detail how the title situation is worked out where the land is, in the first instance, conveyed by the municipality to Wartime Housing Limited. How do they get into the title position where the conveyance can be made to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: Paragraph 3 reads:

Where title to real or other immoveable property is acquired by the corporation in the name of His Majesty or the corporation, either solely, or jointly with any other person, or where the corporation is authorized to sell or dispose of real or other immoveable property of His Majesty, the corporation may sell or otherwise dispose of such property . . .

That would be what my hon. friend refers to. The corporation is authorized to sell property of His Majesty.

Mr. FLEMING: That still is not clear. Where Wartime Housing Limited has entered into an agreement with the municipality to erect houses, the agreement is executed by Wartime Housing Limited. The reading of the section by the minister does not cover my inquiry. I am going back a step to ask the minister how the title at the present time gets into Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to enable them to exercise the powers proposed to be conferred by this new section of the act.

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing Limited acquired title in the name of His Majesty. Title to houses was never held by Wartime Housing Limited; it was held by His Majesty, so that all Wartime Housing titles are in the name of His Majesty. So far as the agreements with municipalities go, of course the agreements must be negotiated before any sale is made. A sale can take place only when title to the property and to the house is absolute in the name of His Majesty. After that, the amendment now being made will permit Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to sell the land of His Majesty by ordinary methods rather than by the method which is ordinarily used for conveying crown land, which is by letters patent.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it from the minister's answer, then, that in view of the terms of the agreements entered into by Wartime Housing Limited with the municipalities, it will be necessary in all cases to clear any individual sales to tenants with the municipalities.

Mr. HOWE: Not individual sales.

Mr. FLEMING: Many of these agreements that I have seen have given the municipality the option to purchase these houses from Wartime Housing Limited. Is that a uniform provision in all the agreements? Will it therefore be necessary in every case to obtain a release of interest on the part of the municipality before Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this section would be in a position to convey title to the tenant?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Joint loan repayable for a period up to thirty years.

Mr. PROBE: This section indicates that a loan is available to the prospective owner by an agreement up to 95 per cent of the first $3,000 of the lending value of the house or any part thereof; 85 per cent of the amount by which the lending value of the house exceeds $3,000 and does not exceed $6,000, and 70 per cent of the amount over $6,000. On the surface this looks as though on the first $6,000 is would be possible to get a mortgage of $5,400. In other words, by putting $600 cash on the line a person would have an equity established in the house. But the lending value is altogether a different thing nowadays from the cost, I presume, of the construction of houses. What is the yardstick used by the department in setting the lending value of houses with reference to present building costs? Could we have a statement on that, because there is much disappointment? It is felt that prospective owners with $600 cannot buy a house that costs $6,000 to construct.

Mr. HOWE: The lending value of the house is the cost of the house to an efficient builder. Under the integrated plan, there are builders who actually build houses under the lending value, and there are other builders who cannot build under but considerably over. It is the cost to an efficient builder.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where are the efficient builders in Canada? Where are they to be found?

Mr. HOWE: All across Canada.

Mr. PROBE: In practice, you would consider an official builder—

Mr. HOWE: Not official, but efficient. We have different lending values for almost every town in Canada and they are fixed by the efficient builder in that area.

Mr. TIMMINS: I have already pointed out to the minister what he said at page 2660 of Hansard:

> We propose that where there is some control on the end sale price of the house to the home owner, the ratio of loan on a $3,000 lending value shall be 95 per cent, grading down to 90 per cent on a $6,000 lending value.

Do I take it that the amendment in respect of increasing the lending value applies only to loans on houses which are being built under the integrated housing plan?

Mr. HOWE: The extra term is given only where the government can have some guarantee as to the selling price of the house. It applies to the integrated plan. It may apply in other cases if the government is satisfied that the selling price bears a reasonable relation to cost.

Mr. TIMMINS: It applies only where the government has some control over the question of what the sales price will be.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister explain subsection 6:

> The governor in council may by regulation prescribe additional terms and conditions under which a joint loan may be made pursuant to subsection 5 of this section, and in addition may fix and determine a date on and after which or a period during which loans shall not be made under subsection 5 of this section.

This appears to me to be an unusual clause to have in the statute. Will the minister explain why it is so worded?

Mr. HOWE: That refers to the point I have been discussing. The longer term is given only in cases where the government has some control over the sales price of the house, and the governor in council reserves the right to pass additional regulations as to the nature of the control required to obtain the benefit of that section.

Mr. PROBE: I am still anxious to get a further elaboration by the minister of what he means by an efficient builder with respect to lending value. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation maintains a list of some sort of recognized builders in localities, or is it following an inspection of the building site that the corporation sets the lending value, or how is it that a prospective home owner can decide that he has enough money on hand to go ahead with a house-building project if he comes within the apparent percentages stated here? This is a more important point than so far it has appeared to be.

Mr. HOWE: The departments with which I have been associated have been building low-cost housing since 1942 in every city in Canada. We believe we know what houses should cost, and the lending values are established accordingly. We find that efficient builders can often get below what we believe to be the fair cost of building houses in a locality. We call those efficient builders. Other builders have costs higher than we believe to be reasonable. We do not classify them as efficient builders. As costs vary, lending values are varied, and we believe we have sufficient experience to set the lending value at a fair cost for an efficient builder.

Mr. PROBE: Does the department set it on the plan of house which it receives—

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. PROBE:— or does it set it on the estimate of the builder's efficiency?

Mr. HOWE: We base it on plans and specifications.

Mr. FULTON: With regard to future building under the Wartime Housing scheme, is it possible to build houses with basements? In my own city they want twenty-five more wartime houses, but they want them with basements and they have been told that they cannot have them if basements are required. Why is that not possible?

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of Wartime Housing is to provide low-rental housing, and unless we can provide low-rental housing we prefer it to be furnished under some other government-sponsored plan. A basement costs from six to eight hundred thousand dollars—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Some basement.

Mr. PROBE: That is not efficient building.

Mr. HOWE: Five to eight hundred dollars. I am so used to millions, hundreds of thousands are small amounts.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What's a million?

Mr. HOWE: They cost from five to eight hundred dollars each and this adds several dollars a month to the rent. It often takes the house out of the low-rental area. Under Wartime Housing, we tried to have the rent from $22 a month to as high as $35. We have the integrated plan and there are several other plans. If a man wishes a basement we would like him to come under one of the other plans, which may not be more expensive than Wartime Housing, but we must keep Wartime Housing in its field, or we get out of our proper sphere.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Company may invest funds in purchase of land for housing development.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The explanatory note on the opposite page says:

> This new section 11B empowers life insurance, trust and loan companies to acquire land, improve it and sell it for residential purposes. The terms upon which any such land may be purchased, developed and sold under this section are set out in the section. The section also provides that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shall guarantee a company operating under this section a return of its investment, together with a rate of interest not to exceed two per centum per annum. The period of the guarantee shall not exceed five years.

Will the minister tell the committee whether discussions have taken place with the municipalities which would be involved? I gather that this section has been added because of the difficulty in acquiring land, particularly in the metropolitan areas. If we are now proceeding by act of parliament to set up machinery that will allow development to take place adjacent to a city, then naturally the municipal authorities are vitally concerned and will want to know where they stand in the question of providing schools, sewers, parks and driveways. When developments of this type are completed they place an additional burden on the transportation facilities of the area. If, for example, a large development were to be completed outside Toronto, the city transportation facilities would have to be used to enable the people living in that area to come to work. That certainly places a burden on the people in the Toronto municipality. Will the minister indicate whether clearance has been given with the provincial and the municipal authorities, to make sure that this is not an invasion of provincial and municipal rights? Further, what guarantee will be given to the local authorities if a programme of this sort collapses? I gather that this act is being drafted with a view to accommodating Housing Enterprises; if, after they operated for a couple of years, they decided that their project was not feasible, who is to take the responsibility for guaranteeing the people in that particular municipality that they will not be saddled with a white elephant in maintaining these services in the area? Can the minister make a statement on that?

Mr. HOWE: This act is not tailored to fit any existing situation. It certainly is not intended to fit Housing Enterprises. Their days of land assembly are finished, as far as I know. This is to make provision for the assembly of land by a financial institution.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What sort of financial institution?

Mr. HOWE: Well, a mortgage company or an insurance company. Under the Insurance Act, an insurance company cannot purchase land. It is not legal under the act to do so. This would make it legal. It would make it possible for an insurance company or other lending institution to finance a properly organized agency to assemble land and develop it for sale to individual builders or to large builders. The section provides that the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must be obtained for all phases of the transaction, and the metropolitan planning boards are required also to give approval to the proposed development.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where is that mentioned in section 6?

Mr. HOWE: The metropolitan planning boards have jurisdiction in any event, and no land assembly could take place without the approval of the planning boards.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Should that not be provided for in the act?

Mr. HOWE: It is in the provincial act. No authority can take that away. This is simply making financial provision to make it possible—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before you leave that point—

Mr. HOWE: Just sit down now, please.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Thank you.

Mr. HOWE: This simply makes it possible for the financing of land assembly by private agencies with the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The land assembly must be carried out under the laws of the province and the regulations of the municipality. That is necessary in any event. It is simply a private transaction. It is not the government using force majeure. It is simply the government lending money. We believe it is necessary to provide that type of financing in order that land assembly and land services may be kept ahead of the housing requirements of this country, particularly adjacent to large cities.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood the minister to say that Toronto was the only metropolitan area which had legislation that would enable the federal government to embark on this sort of thing.

Mr. HOWE: No; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then how many centres in Canada are there where there are metropolitan areas which have such legislation. The minister mentioned Saskatchewan. We have machinery there that would enable it.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend would listen instead of jumping up and down, he would appreciate what was said. I was not referring to the land assembly in any way when I made that statement. I was referring to the right of municipalities to invest municipal funds in building houses.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister has still not answered my question. This section provides for moving into municipalities to develop new lands. As I pointed out, it will place a burden on the transportation, water and sewerage systems in adjoining municipalities. What provision is being made to ensure that the municipalities so affected will not be worse off as a result of this development than they would be without it?

Mr. HOWE: If any municipality does not want it, it has a right to refuse its facilities. No municipality has to provide sewerage. No city has to provide sewerage for outside municipalities. This is not the government doing these things. The government is simply lending money, or guaranteeing the lending of money. These are private individuals assembling land under the laws of the province and under the regulations of the municipality.

Mr. FLEMING: As to this section, I think most of us in the house will be in agreement with the desirability of legislation of this type, having in mind what has been accomplished in the United States by some of the large financial institutions such as insurance companies and others in building housing. While this particular section does not go very far, perhaps it will help to bring about large-scale housing developments which have within them the possibility of good planned development in certain municipal areas. However, the thought that strikes me in reading this section is this. The power to be conferred by this section is hedged around with so many restrictions and conditions that I wonder if many of the financial institutions are likely to take advantage of it. When the legislation preceding this bill was under discussion, our socialist friends to the left made much of the fact that the guarantee of a two per cent return was to be given to these companies, together with the return of their capital investment, and the guarantee was to extend for a five-year period. In relation to the risks and other conditions which are attached, I do not think that can be said to be any great inducement to these lending institutions. The question was asked of the minister as to what conversations had been carried on with the lending institutions to see to what extent they would take advantage of legislation of this kind. I find that the minister said at page 2673 of Hansard of May 1:

> I am sorry I cannot give the conversations with the lending institutions because I have not talked with any of them.

I assume that the conversations were carried on between officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and these financial institutions. I think the committee would be glad to hear from the minister as to what indication has been given by such institutions as to the extent to which they are prepared to proceed with land assembly schemes of the type provided for in this section.

Mr. HOWE: I am informed by officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that considerable interest has been shown by the lending institutions since the resolution preceding this bill was introduced. There is every indication that several important lending institutions will take advantage of this section. My hon. friend suggests that it is restrictive. It was intended to be restrictive. It was not to invite speculation in land on the "heads I win and tails you lose" basis. It is framed for developments which have, as their object, making land available for housing rather than for real estate speculation. I think my hon. friend will appreciate the necessity for avoiding the encouragement of speculation in land, under government guarantee.

Mr. FLEMING: Quite so. I think we are all in agreement with that idea, and we are all in agreement with the idea of avoiding the land butchery which has gone on in some of the outlying sections of the metropolitan areas. But unless these financial institutions at the present time have such a plethora of money on their hands that they do not know what to do with it, it seems to me that a two per cent maximum return presents very little attraction to them. It may be that these land assembly schemes will, in turn, lead to building schemes, and the institutions which have entered into them will derive some benefit through lending and mortgage business.

Mr. HOWE: That is the answer.

Mr. FLEMING: It is only in a case of that kind that it would seem to me that two per cent would present any attraction to a lending institution.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to revert to the matter brought up by the hon. member for Mackenzie, and in this connection I should like to refer to page 4 of the bill. The new section 11B (2) (a) reads:

> (a) the land shall, in the opinion of the corporation, be suitable for a residential housing development.

Throughout the country are many urban and other municipalities which have planning boards of various sorts or master plans for their localities. In many provinces planning acts have been passed which give leads in the matter of planning. However, during the last few years and because of the great housing shortage federal agencies have been permitted to cut across the master plans of many municipalities. I think it is only fitting that I should refer at this time to my own city.

Regina is a well planned, pleasant, little city out on the prairie plains. As citizens of that city, we were proud of our accomplishments in the way of general planning. However, various emergency schemes of the federal government came into being and, by dint of necessity, we had to permit the placing of so-called temporary buildings in localities which were not at all suitable for housing. I think the minister and his department would be the last to say that they have furthered the over-all plan for the city.

The temporary nature of these structures does not take away from the fact that they create a situation which does not add to the attractiveness of the urban centre, and I am sure this situation applies in many other places. I should like to have the minister make an addition to the clause I have referred to and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton:

> That section 6, subsection 11B (2) (a) be amended by adding after the words "housing development" the words "and approved as such by the government of the province, the planning body and the municipal council for the area in which the proposed residential housing development is situated."

If that amendment is incorporated it would take care of such matters as were mentioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie in the sense that the municipality would express final approbation of the facilities that are to be used, and the planning authority will say whether or not they fit into the general plan for the area. We would not have the sort of thing that has occurred at Deschenes, near Aylmer, Quebec, where there is an enormous veterans development. Those houses were built in an actual swamp, and in many cases the basements have had to be serviced with pumps installed by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

That sort of thing could have been avoided if the local municipality had been drawn into the picture and consideration given to whatever provincial regulations existed in connection with the matter. If a particular municipality did not want to follow out a plan, that would be their tough luck, but it seems to me that there is a way through cooperation by which the true intent of a housing development can best be arrived at.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister seems to be filled with good will. This discussion has involved a lot of technicalities in which I am not interested, any more than the man on the street. All I want to know from the minister is what anyone has to do to get a small home. That is a simple question and I do not ask it in an effort to be humorous. I simply want to know how the man on the street can secure a roof to place over his head and the heads of his family. These amendments will change very little the set-up which was organized some time ago. The purpose is excellent, but I ask the minister—and he knows I am sincere—if he can put in a nutshell what the man who wants a small home will have to do to get it.

Mr. HOWE: I assume that my hon. friend is referring to the citizen who wishes to build a small home. All that he would need to do is, first, to obtain a good contractor and, then, through the contractor make application for a loan under the National Housing Act. If he could advance $600 he would be entitled to borrow sufficient money to build a home costing about $6,000. After he has built his home, he would have a mortgage which could be paid off in from twenty to thirty years, but he would have a roof over his head.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what the minister has said and I hope that there will be the least possible amount of red tape in this matter. This is a tremendous problem. During the war, many country people were induced to give up their homes to move to the cities. That caused congestion and that is the reason why some families have to live in single rooms. The minister, every hon. member and every citizen in the country realize the importance of this problem. I sincerely hope that the minister will not be handicapped in his efforts by the red tape of other boards which perhaps would put obstacles in his way. I want the minister to have the most complete chance to execute his plan. He has done all he possibly could to improve housing conditions. This is, of course, completely outside politics, and is for the benefit of the people. Therefore I hope the procedure the minister has summarized will be just as simple for everyone as he has described it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister has intimated that this is merely enabling legislation and that nothing can be done without the consent of the local authorities. The hon. member for Stanstead has also given me a little legal advice to the effect that this is enabling legislation.

But a reading of the section indicates that it is not merely enabling legislation. It commits us to guaranteeing a return on investment at a rate of interest not to exceed two per cent per annum for a period of years, and provides the conditions under which the investment will be made. It states that:

(a) The land shall, in the opinion of the corporation, be suitable for a residential housing development;
(b) the purchase price of the said land shall be satisfactory to the corporation;
(c) the improvements to be effected and the cost thereof shall be satisfactory to the corporation;
(d) the company shall submit to the corporation an application in a form satisfactory to the corporation containing such information and accompanied by such material as the corporation may prescribe;
(e) the investment shall first be approved in writing by the corporation.

In view of the unanimous opinion of the house that we must have fuller cooperation on the part of the dominion, provincial and municipal authorities in solving our housing programme, I think we should not pass legislation such as is proposed by the minister without making it clear in black and white just what the municipalities will be committed to, if an act is passed. I think there must be some guarantee that the local authorities will not be saddled with the perpetual cost of maintaining services if some arrangement is entered into between the federal government and the life insurance companies to complete a development outside one of our cities. Unless there is some agreement among the people who will be affected, I believe we are heading for trouble. I hope the minister will accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City.

Mr. HOWE: What the hon. member for Regina City has moved, and which has been seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie, is that we state in a dominion statute that a citizen of a province must obey the law of that province. It boils down to just that. It is a citizen of a province or a municipality that approaches Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to obtain a loan to carry on a real estate development in a town in that province. If my hon. friend suggests that there must be a federal statute which says that a man must obey the laws of the province and municipality, I do not agree with him. I think he must do it in any case.

Mr. PROBE: I agree with the minister in that respect, and I am not particularly interested in the legal phraseology. But I do know this, and I believe the minister will agree, that a real estate company can acquire land without the leave of any local municipal body, and can call it a development scheme.

Mr. HACKETT: Acquire land that it could not acquire without the statute.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend suggests they can acquire land. I suppose a man can buy it, but he certainly cannot build on it without the permission of the local authorities. The hon. member for Stanstead can give a ruling on that, too, if he wishes, if he sets himself up as an authority.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not only does it apply to the people in the municipality involved, but the people in the adjoining municipality are also concerned. It is quite conceivable that a satisfactory arrangement may be made with the authorities of a township adjacent to a city, without consulting with the city authorities. I think it is important that we must clear with all the authorities concerned; and unless some amendment is inserted here, we are headed for trouble if we give the federal authority the right to enter into negotiations with private companies to develop in one municipality property which will place unfair burdens on those in adjacent municipalities.

Mr. HOWE: Surely my hon. friend must appreciate that relations between municipalities is a matter for provincial regulation; it is not for a federal regulation. Again I say he is suggesting that we put in a federal statute a provision stating that the residents of a province must carry out the laws of the province. Surely that is not good legislation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: All we suggest is that federal funds should not be spent on any development which will create in years to come a local grievance which will make it more difficult.

Mr. HOWE: I agree that they should not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But we are guaranteeing against losses in connection with these developments. If you have developments such as Housing Enterprises have started it is quite conceivable that the people in a local municipality will be saddled with an unfinished development, and then the people in the adjoining municipality will have to provide services, bus transportation, light and power for people who have no other way of being serviced. It is not fair to commit the federal treasury to the losses which might result, without having this cleared before the development commences.

Mr. FLEMING: I entertain an even lower opinion of the amendment than that voiced by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who placed his objections on constitutional grounds. As I understood him, he said there is no use in putting in a provision to the effect that the institution concerned must obey the provincial law. It must do that anyway. It would be just as foolish and just as futile to enact a provision that a provincial or municipal law should be dispensed with, because it would not have any effect.

I do not believe in parliament putting itself in a position of legislating nonsense or meaningless things. But this amendment is objectionable on other grounds as well. I think in all cases the provinces have enacted legislation which places control over land development in the hands of the municipalities. The province does not attempt to regulate or control the development of land itself.

This amendment proposes to say that, in addition to all the other requirements laid down in the section—and, goodness knows, there are so many of them that I fear it will be little used—parliament should say to every such institution that, having obtained the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the company must go to the provincial government, which probably has no machinery for dealing with the matter and is not the least bit concerned. Parliament would be saying this, "You have to get the approval of the provincial government, even though the provincial government will not interest itself in the matter." That is why they have conferred jurisdiction on the municipalities. Then, why tie this thing up in reams and reams of red tape—we have enough of it in the section now—and make the situation worse?

Mr. PROBE: I am prepared to admit there may be a certain amount of red tape. On the other hand, we have a duty to perform, and that is to prevent the purchase of land ostensibly for housing development, and then find that nothing is done about it for four or five years. Then, in the event that it looks to the corporation interested that the development may prove to be a white elephant, they will dispose of it just before the end of the five years, to make sure that they have their two per cent profit. Or, if it is successful, they may hold it at the end of five years, at which time the government's interest in it expires, and they could make a fairly handsome profit out of it. I can foresee that situation developing.

I wonder if the Chairman would mind my asking the Minister of Veterans Affairs what municipality was consulted with respect to the Veterans Land Act development on Deschenes road. I realize that may be slightly out of order because it does not deal with the matter directly in hand, but it does deal with community planning.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The CHAIRMAN: Of course the question is out of order, and if I allowed it similar questions might be asked.

Mr. IRVINE: There is no reason why it should not be answered for all that.

The CHAIRMAN: There is some doubt in my mind whether the amendment is in order, because it makes provincial consent an essential part of the jurisdiction we possess. However, I am not going to rule it out of order, although there is some doubt.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. PROBE: I move:

That section 6 be amended by adding, after subsection 11B, subsection 11C:

"(1) Where a municipality has under appropriate provincial legislation power to invest its funds in the purchase and improvement of land to be used for a residential housing development analogous to the power conferred upon a company under subsection (1) of section 11B, and such municipality satisfies the conditions and enters into an agreement similar to that required of a company under subsections (2), (3) and (4) of section 11B, the corporation shall guarantee to the municipality a return of investment and interest in the same manner as guaranteed to a company under subsection (3) (c) of section 11B, provided that any lands intended to be included in such housing development which are already owned by such municipality shall be deemed to have been acquired by the municipality as of the date of the agreement with the corporation.

(2) Subsections (5), (6), (7), (11) and (12) of section 11B shall apply mutatis mutandis to an agreement with a municipality.

(3) For the purpose of this section "investment" shall have the same meaning as in subsection (9) of section 11B, saving that the purchase price of any land to be included in the housing development which is already owned by the municipality at the date of the agreement shall not exceed the actual cost to the corporation, as may be defined by regulation or the fair market value, as may be determined by the minister, whichever is the lesser."

The intent of this amendment is to put municipal public housing authorities, where such exist or may be set up at a later day, at least on a par with private development companies in the application of this section of the act. As the minister indicated a few moments ago, the city of Toronto has the legal right to take advantage of this act, and urban municipalities in Saskatchewan would also be in a position to take advantage of the act if they were enabled to do so by a section such as this. Many municipalities still own a great deal of land of their own, and they would like to have it developed along lines which they have in mind and which are not related to private development business. For that reason I move this amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon City.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that this motion is entirely out of order because it would place a potential tax burden upon the people, and therefore can be moved only by a member of the government, preceded by a resolution approved by the governor in council. Obviously it provides for money legislation and therefore is beyond the competency of the hon. member to move.

The CHAIRMAN: For the reasons given by the right hon. minister I must rule the amendment out of order.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—If loan not available under sections 4, 8 or 14 corporation may make loan.

Mr. FLEMING: This section purports to confer on the corporation power to extend loans in cases that are not covered by sections 4, 8 or 14. These three sections are taken from the first three parts of the act. Section 4 deals with the loan on the house owned by the occupant. Section 8 is taken from part 2 of the act, the rental housing section, and section 14 from part 3, dealing with rural housing. If there are any proper cases not already covered by those sections it seems to me at first blush that we should have appropriate legislation dealing with those cases specifically. It strikes me as anomalous that the government should propose a general provision of this kind saying: We have covered all the cases we can think of by sections 4, 8 and 14, but if we have left any out we are giving a general omnibus power to the corporation to make loans. The terms for a loan are not adequately defined, and the cases are not adequately defined. I question whether a provision of this sort is sound legislation for parliament to enact. I think the minister should have specific cases to lay before us.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose is to make sure that the provisions of the housing act set up by these amendments can be implemented. Certain of the insurance companies have so far declined to agree to lend under the thirty-year amortization plan, and certain others object to the ninety-five per cent provision. Since the terms upon which the government guarantees funds are terms agreed to by parliament, the government is taking power to make direct loans on the terms indicated if the insurance companies decline to lend on the terms set out.

Mr. McKAY: I think we are all pretty well agreed that everything should be done to encourage housing construction, particularly low-rental housing projects. I have been informed that some provincial governments and cooperative organizations might enter the field if they had some encouragement from the federal government. If it is within the purview of the federal government I believe that it should give the same financial assistance to the provincial authorities which wish to enter the housing field as is given to life insurance companies and other organizations. I feel that this aid should be extended to municipalities, societies and associations such as cooperatives and on the same terms as are being afforded to others under this act. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin:

That section 8 be further amended by adding subsection 31B, as follows:

"(1) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council may, on behalf of His Majesty, make a loan to a provincial housing corporation or to a local housing authority for the purpose of assisting in the construction of a low-rental housing project or in the purchase of existing buildings with the land upon which they are situated and their conversion into a low-rental housing project.

(2) A loan under this authority of this section shall be on the same terms and conditions as those upon which a loan may be granted to a limited dividend housing corporation under section 9 of this act.

(3) For the purpose of this section, local housing authority shall mean any municipality, society, association, corporation or commission having authority to construct, hold and manage houses built as a low-rental housing project.

(4) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may, on behalf of His Majesty, guarantee to the provincial housing corporation or the local housing authority a net return in any year after completion of the project of three per centum per annum of the cost of the project for a period not exceeding the estimated useful life of the project and in any case not exceeding fifty years.

(5) A loan or guarantee under this section shall, for the purposes of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and section 13 of this act, be deemed to be a loan under part II of this act.

(6) The governor in council may by regulation make provision for any matters concerning which he deems regulations are necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes or provisions of this section."

Mr. HOWE: I pointed out that the previous amendment was out of order. All I can say about this amendment is that it is outrageously out of order for the same reason.

Mr. NICHOLSON: To put it in order, I wonder whether the minister would consider introducing it himself.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN: It appears to me that it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that it is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Then, for the reasons I have previously given, I must rule this amendment also out of order.

Section agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before the title carries, may I say I think we should have a preamble, and I wish to say a word in connection with the preamble. In his remarks the minister mentioned that the Swedish performance was not as good as Canada's. I should like to remind him that in one of his publications, "Housing Progress Abroad," we find on page 1, "Purely on a population basis, Sweden would be about fifteen per cent ahead of Canada." I intimated this afternoon that I thought legislation of this sort should have a preamble that sets out in general terms the housing objectives of this parliament. I mentioned that in the United States and in Australia they have set out what would be considered a reasonable goal. Therefore I should like to move:

That the bill be further amended by inserting the following words before "His Majesty" in the preamble.

"Whereas, the purpose of this act is to provide a programme of housing for the Canadian people that will ensure a separate home in a good neighbourhood for every family who desires to have one.

And whereas, the principle must be accepted that society has reached the stage where a home of good quality and equipment is not only the need but the right of every citizen. Where the family's income does not permit the ownership or rental of such a home, it is the duty of the state to bridge the gap by a rental subsidy.

And whereas, an important objective in realizing this principle is the replacement of slums and other substandard housing, in urban and rural areas, to obviate overcrowding and to progress in an orderly and rapid manner toward a modern standard of housing for the whole Canadian people.

And whereas, another objective of great importance is the systematic planning of our cities and neighbourhoods so as to develop and redevelop communities which will provide good surroundings for home life and adequate facilities for advancing the industrial and cultural wealth of the nation.

And whereas, vital consideration in undertaking the large-scale housing programme envisaged by this act is the undeniable fact that a stable level of construction throughout the years immediately ahead is one of the most necessary factors in ensuring a steady level of employment which, in turn, will provide the buying power essential for prosperity at home and abroad.

Therefore,—"

I am sure it cannot be argued that the accepting of this general objective would, of necessity, commit the government to any definite expenditures until they saw fit to bring in a particular proposal. It is merely an outline of what I think should meet with the whole-hearted support of the minister. The cost over the next ten years would be much less than the expenditures the minister undertook in connection with carrying out his responsibility while Canada was at war.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is attempting to amend a preamble. May I point out to him that there is no preamble to this bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes. "His Majesty by and with the consent . . . "

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; that is not a preamble.

Mr. HOWE: In any event, my hon. friend knows, as does every other hon. member, that his suggested amendment is simply propaganda; it means nothing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is in line—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. HOWE: If it has any meaning at all it is out of order, because it adds a potential burden on the taxpayer, and if it does not add a potential burden on the taxpayer it is pure nonsense.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure that the minister's friends in the United States and Sweden will be interested in finding out that a preamble drafted along similar lines to the preamble to similar bills in the United States and in Sweden is pure nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend is endeavouring, I admit with the finest intentions in the world, to amend something that does not exist.

Mr. MacNICOL: Like many other hon. members, the hon. member knows nothing about housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My understanding is that we have a preamble before section 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; there is no preamble to this bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If not, we can make one. I find from Beauchesne that it is in order to have a preamble to every bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I tell my hon. friend that if he asked Doctor Beauchesne for his opinion he would find that he does not believe there should be a preamble to any bill.

Amendment negatived: yeas 18; nays 40.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

INCREASED SALARIES TO TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS—RAILWAY GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Railway Act to make provision, inter alia, for an increase in the salaries of the commissioners and for an annual grant of two hundred thousand dollars for a period of ten years towards the maintenance of the railway grade crossing fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister make a statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The bill which is based on this resolution will seek to increase the salaries of the members of the board of transport commissioners and at the same time, to pay into the grade crossing fund over a period of ten years the sum of $200,000 a year. I need not read the resolution; it is on the order paper. I think, however, the house will expect me to say something about the reasons which lie behind the decision to increase the salaries of the board of transport commisioners.

The board of transport commissioners was set up in 1903, and I think I can make this general statement, that with but one exception there has been no increase in the salaries of the commissioners for a period of forty years.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the salary today?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will come to that in a moment. I say this, notwithstanding the fact that the duties of the commissioners have increased considerably over the years, as I will indicate in a moment or two.

In 1903, when the board was set up, the salaries of the commissioners were as follows: chief commissioner, $10,000; deputy chief commissioner, $8,000; and the commissioner—because there was only one at that time—$8,000. In 1908, when the number of the board was increased from three to six, the salaries were: chief commissioner, $10,000; assistant chief commissioner, $9,000; deputy chief commissioner, $8,000; and each of the three commissioners, $8,000.

In 1913 the salary of the chief commissioner was increased from $10,000 to $12,500 per annum, and except for that increase having to do with the salary of the chief commissioner in 1913, the salary range stands today as it was forty years ago.

Over the years from 1903 to 1908 the judicial salaries in the different courts, as well as salaries of officials in other phases of the government service, have been substantially increased to meet changing conditions. The same upward trend over the years has been evidenced, perhaps to an even more marked degree in the salaries paid in various lines of private business and endeavour.

The government in 1930 set up a commission to study the salaries and organization of the civil service throughout Canada. It was known as the Beatty commission, and it brought in a report which recommended substantial increases in the salaries of the board of transport commissioners. However, it was not deemed advisable to follow the recommendations of that commission. Then in 1946 the present government set up the Gordon commission, which made certain recommendations. The recommendations of that commission were that the salary of the chief commissioner be raised to $13,500, that of the assistant chief commissioner to $12,000, and that of each of the commissioners to $10,000. The report made certain other recommendations having to do with superannuation, which I need not go into at the moment. But the government has seen fit to adopt that part of the Gordon report only having to do with salary increases, and has implemented it in the present resolution.

Mr. HACKETT: That would make the salary of the chief commissioner $13,500?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. HACKETT: The assistant, $12,500 and the others, $10,000?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The assistant, $12,000 and the others, $10,000 each. By the others, I mean the commissioners.

Mr. FLEMING: What about the deputy?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The same as the commissioners.

Mr. McKAY: Would the minister please name the commissioners?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not their names before me at the moment, but I think I can give them from memory. The chairman is Colonel Cross, the deputy chief is Mr. Hugh Wardrope; the assistant deputy chief commissioner is Mr. Sylvester; the commissioners are Mr. Stoneman, Mr. Stone and Mr. MacPherson. I should have said that the board of transport commissioners, by virtue of the provisions of the Railway Act, is a court of record. The jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners, when it was set up in 1903, was quite limited. Its powers had to do with the regulation, construction and operation of railways other than government railways within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. That was general in its terms. But since then the jurisdiction has been extended tremendously. For instance, it now covers express tolls, telegraph companies, telephone companies, international bridges and tunnels, maritime freight rates, the abandonment of operation of lines, the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, the Transport Act, certain agreements made pursuant to chapter 32, section 1 of the Statutes of Canada, the purchase of electrical energy from a person who has acquired water power under lease from the crown; the operation of the railway grade crossing fund, and so on. So that one can see that over that period of more than forty years the duties of the transport commissioners have been extended tremendously.

Mr. HACKETT: The volume of work has decreased.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; the volume of work has not decreased.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister give some indication with regard to that?

Mr. HAZEN: It has not obtained jurisdiction over air services?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. Jurisdiction over air service is given to the air transport board, which is an adjunct of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. KNOWLES: It comes under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: "Adjunct" is the right word.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I had better follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and simply say that it comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I could go into greater detail. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario asked in what way the jurisdiction of the board had been extended.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I make this explanation, because I had somewhat the same idea as the hon. member for Stanstead, that while it is no doubt exactly correct, as the minister has stated, that in one sense the jurisdiction has been greatly extended, in the early years of the century there was a tremendous amount of construction work going on, and the railway board, as I think it was called then, was an important part of our mechanism. I do not think one has, perhaps through ignorance, the same feeling about the board today.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not yet completed my statement, and perhaps I should. I do not want to go into too great detail. If the committee wants to get further information about the board of transport commissioners, I am quite willing and at liberty to give it, but I think my remarks on the resolution should be of a general nature. I have given the basis for the decision to increase the salaries. I should like now to turn for a moment to the other part of the resolution which has to do with the grade crossing fund.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the minister does that, would he answer one other question with regard to the commissioners? What is the pension or superannuation basis in their case at the present time, or what will it be?

Mr. CHEVRIER: None whatever. They have no pension.

Mr. HACKETT: Just a ten-year tenure?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Their salaries are quite high. They ought to be able to take care of themselves.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To deal now with the grade crossing fund, there has been no payment into the grade crossing fund since the beginning of the war. The grade crossing fund was set up in 1909, and it provided for a payment of $200,000 a year into the fund for a period of ten years. Those payments were made to cover three ten-year periods, namely, thirty years, and that provided for a payment of $6,000,000 into the fund. In 1939 the last ten-year period expired and no further payment was made during the war. When there were exceptional cases, they were dealt with by separate vote. There has been paid into that fund up until now, including the thirty-year payment, roughly speaking, $7,300,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: In view of the increasing number of fatalities at grade crossings and the enhanced cost of construction, has the government considered making a larger annual contribution to this fund?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was going to deal with that later on, but perhaps I had better do so immediately. The government deals with this problem, not only by means of the grade crossing fund, but also by special vote. At the moment the board of transport commissioners have been asked to make a survey and investigation of those projects which, in their opinion, demand immediate action or priority action. Although the survey has now been in the course of preparation for some months, it is not yet completed. When it is completed, those projects will be approved or disapproved by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Some of them will be marked with a top priority, and for those that are marked with a top priority I presume funds will be voted either out of a vote in the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply or out of a special vote of parliament. So that in answer to my hon. friend's question, I say that, over and above the payment into the grade crossing fund, additional contributions are made by special vote.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister permit a question which he may answer later if it is inconvenient for him to do so now? On what basis are grants made? Do the railways contribute? Is there a stipulation, or does the country undertake it entirely?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Are you referring to the grant going into the grade crossing fund?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I am talking about the elimination of grade crossings. When a grade crossing is to be eliminated the money comes out of this fund or by a vote of this house. Do the railways in any way contribute to that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. This is the position. Let us assume that the board of transport commissioners approves a certain project where the grades should be separated. They may order a payment out of the grade crossing fund not to exceed $100,000. They may order the municipality to pay a portion of the cost, the province to pay a share, or the counties to pay a certain portion. It depends upon the amount of traffic.

Mr. COLDWELL: But not the railway?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: You did not mention that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should have mentioned the railway; yes, definitely.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the point I was getting at.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. Unquestionably the railway has a portion to pay. I have not any particular project in mind at the moment, but a portion may be paid out of the grade crossing fund, a portion from the railway and a portion from the municipality or the province, as the case may be.

Mr. BENTLEY: The percentage paid by the railway would vary with each project, would it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and they vary in accordance with the importance of the road or the railway.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or whether the railway was there first.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I should like to go on with the reasons for these payments. A moment ago I referred to the $7,000,000 paid into the fund. Over and above that, there has been expended another $6,000,000 in connection with these projects. The proposal here is to continue payments into the fund as was done prior to the war. While the resolution deals with the two matters to which I have referred, the bill will provide for other amendments to the Railway Act which I need not go into at this time.

Mr. CHURCH: The resolution provides for a change of policy. I think I have had as much experience with the board of transport commissioners as any other member of the House of Commons. In 1909 this board was given jurisdiction over telephone and express companies. The bill is to provide for an increase in the salaries of the commissioners. They are now getting the salary of a high court justice and, in addition, they have their travelling expenses, private car and many other things like that. The commission is not carrying out the functions for which it was appointed. When the late Hon. Mr. Justice Mabee was chairman of the old board, it did so and got results.

One section of the Railway Act provides that the board of transport commissioners may, of their own volition, check operations of railroads, express and telephone companies and do other things. Is there any regulation of the railroads in this country today? During the war, a thousand people were killed at level crossings, and it is now proposed to spend $200,000 a year. This is only pin-money. The board is not functioning the way the founders of the board by statute law intended that it should. When Mr. Justice Mabee was chairman he followed the act and summoned the Bell Telephone Company, the express companies and other companies to show cause on complaints. The board should carry out the functions for which it was appointed.

It is now proposed to set up a commission to regulate water traffic which is now unregulated. The seamen want such a board. The city of Toronto was forced to spend a $12,000,000 contribution to build a viaduct and harbour and eliminate grade crossings across the whole water front. This $200,000 will largely be spent in one province and it is mere pin-money to help eliminate the level crossing peril. All that they will be able to do is to buy a few bells, wigwags, lights or other means of providing temporary protection. About a year ago the government said to wait until the war was finished and they would show what they were going to do about grade crossings, that they were going to work with the Ontario and other governments. They have provided for large expenditures of money, up to a million dollars, to link in some highways in some of the larger cities. But nothing is being done about grade crossings and these killings will go on just the same.

Another opportunity will be presented when the bill is before us, but I want to say that the railway commission should be doing something to protect the people travelling on our railways. When the late Doctor Manion was our leader, he referred to the government railway as the deadheads railway on account of the huge pass system. The railway commission should look into this whole system of granting passes to see whether there are any abuses. They are not doing it. It is only a minor thing, and I am not objecting to transportation for members of the House of Commons, officials and others, because that is allowed by the Railway Act. But there are many abuses, and I know of some myself from newspaper articles and complaints by letters. There will be other opportunities and I do not want to delay the passing of this resolution. This railway commission should carry out the functions for which it was appointed. We have already had a discussion on this matter of grade separation, during the debate on my bill to amend the criminal code, re deaths at level crossings, and the perils and injury there.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister indicated that there would be other amendments which are not referred to specifically in the resolution. Will any of those amendments relate to the railway grade crossing fund and the manner in which payments may be made from that fund to assist in the elimination of grade crossings?

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: The only amendment having to do with the grade crossing fund is the one providing for the payment of $200,000 a year for ten years.

Mr. BENTLEY: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand that the question period is on the bill itself and not on the resolution. I have no objection to answering questions, but if there is to be a series I would rather have them asked on the bill.

Mr. BENTLEY: They are simple questions. First, I should like to ask if the grade crossing fund is administered entirely by the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would that take care of these small diversions that sometimes are necessary in small villages when a highway is diverted, as well as overhead crossings and subways?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know what particular project my hon. friend has in mind. If he is referring to a grade separation, the answer is yes. He refers to a diversion of a road, and I am not quite sure what he means.

Mr. BENTLEY: Sometimes where a highway crosses a railroad going on one side of or through a village it can be diverted to run on the other side.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I would say that such a project could be covered by a payment out of the fund.

Mr. BENTLEY: Is there any provision for changing something that has already taken place?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, provided that one of the parties makes an application de novo before the board.

Mr. KIDD: I do not want to oppose the resolution in any way. It is in two parts, one providing for an increase in the salaries of the commissioners and the other for the payment of $200,000 a year over a period of ten years. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister something which happened last Sunday evening which has to do with the railway station at Kingston, and I shall discuss this matter again when the estimates are before the committee. There is a level crossing there, and a definite promise has been made to build a new station at Kingston. What I saw last Sunday evening is a shame and a disgrace. I think the minister will see the same thing at the station at Cornwall.

Last Sunday evening marked the holiday week-end, and crowds of people were taking the train at 6.30 o'clock that evening. At that time there was a downpour of rain. We talk about railway crossings, but on the proper occasion I intend to draw this matter to the attention of the minister, and, if necessary, to the attention of the Prime Minister. Women and children must hurry to catch these fast trains. The train running between Toronto and Montreal operates in two sections, one of which leaves Ottawa and joins at Brockville. Sometimes the first section will come in first, and sometimes the second.

But at 6.30 p.m. in this downpour of rain, these people had to run for the train. Let me pay a compliment to the train officials who do the best they can under the circumstances. But these trains are undermanned, despite the fact that there are all kinds of men wanting positions today, and among those are returned soldiers. The train officials do not lack in courtesy.

When the train pulled in on Sunday night, what happened? Women and children had to run the length of four or five coaches, past the dining car. Then, when they reach the point where they are to enter the car they find that there may or there may not be a stool to step on. On that occasion I saw a mother running along with a baby in one arm and with luggage in the other. Meantime, if they want to get on the train they must stand in line while forty or fifty people get off, and the others get on. Then, when they get on they go into a full coach, and they must carry their luggage through probably two or three coaches. Surely something should be done about this. Money is being sought for railway crossings, but this is a simple matter.

I think the Canadian National Railways, so far as the Montreal-Toronto service is concerned, needs checking up by someone. I am not referring to the officials, but I say they should have extra help, and the rights of the public should be respected.

There are plenty of nails, and there is lumber available. All that would be necessary would be the erection of what is known as a wooden umbrella to run the length of eight or ten coaches. When the railway estimates are before the committee I intend to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and, if necessary, to that of the Prime Minister. I have already put it in writing to the president of the railway company, and I am suggesting that something should be done.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When a grade separation is ordered and the various proportions of cost are fixed by the board, who carries out the work? Is it the railway concerned?

Mr. CHEVRIER: As a rule it is the railway concerned; but in certain cases it is by agreement between the parties.

I can think of two or three cases where it will be done by the railways. When an application is made to the board, the board serves a copy of such application upon the railway and municipality concerned. The railway thereupon sends its engineers to ascertain whether the grade can be separated, and the cost thereof, whether it should be an under-pass or an over-pass, and what the cost will be in each case. Then, when the municipality or other party replies, either for or against the application, the board has all the facts and renders its decision.

Mr. FLEMING: After a hearing.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. Then the railway builds the separation, generally by giving out the contract after advertising for tenders.

Mr. STEPHENSON: With respect to automatic signals installed at various crossings, it is my understanding that the materials which go into these signals are not made in Canada. Am I right in that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Some are and some are not.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Is there a company manufacturing and installing them in Canada?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot say.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I understand there is not. I believe there is no company manufacturing them, and yet when they are brought in there is a duty of forty per cent on the materials coming into Canada. Can the minister tell me whether or not that is correct?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot at the moment, but I shall try to give the information on the bill.

Mr. STEPHENSON: If they are not manufactured here, why should we have to pay that duty?

Mr. COLDWELL: That applies to a lot of other things, too.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I speak because I am in favour of the principle of the resolution, and particularly the last portion of it, with respect to the $200,000. I think that is a moderate price to pay for the many lives we shall save by grade separation.

I should like to ask a question with respect to the first part of the resolution. When the time comes, would the minister give us some idea of the amount of work done by the board? I speak with some diffidence because the chairman of the board is married to a relative of mine. I think I should be honest enough to state that.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words he is an in-law.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Outlaw, did you say?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, in-law.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think there is a great deal in what my desk-mate, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has said, namely, that in earlier years there were periods of construction, quarrels between the railways as to which should go here or there, expropriation proceedings, and movements by people in the various villages and towns to have stations established and agents placed. Then we went through another time when the railways took another view and wanted to close certain lines and certain stations, remove telegraphers, and so on. But my offhand view has been that in the last few years, and certainly up to the time of the undertaking in which they are now engaged, the work of the board has been more limited than it was in earlier days. I hope I am wrong about that, but perhaps the minister would give me a clear statement as to the amount of work going on. I know they do not go west anything like as much as they used to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are certainly working full time now.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is quite true; but this is the only major operation in which they have been engaged for a long time. I can certainly agree that they are busy now, and I agree that proper salaries should be paid to them, or to anyone else, but when we reach the proper stage I hope the minister will be prepared to give us some idea of the amount of work they are doing.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 255, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS

AMENDMENT OF ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1938—ADMINISTRATION OF PROJECT BY ANOTHER MUNICIPALITY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 256, to amend the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better read the explanatory note:

Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, authority was granted to make loans to municipalities to enable them to pay the whole or part of the cost of constructing or making extensions or improvements to or renewals of municipal water works systems, gas plants, electric light systems or other projects of a self-liquidating character. In some cases since a loan was made to a municipality it has become desirable to reorganize the municipality or to create a new municipality from part of the area previously included in the first municipality, for example, by reason of the growth of population to establish a village in the place of a local improvement district or in respect of part of the area previously included in a rural municipality. The purpose of the amendment is to permit the new municipal corporation to be substituted for the purpose of the loan for the former corporation in proper cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS

INCLUSION OF POULTRY IN DEFINITION OF LIVE STOCK

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 257 to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a very simple bill. The purpose is to include poultry in the definition of live stock as contained in the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE TO GOVERNMENT AND OPPOSITION LEADERS IN SENATE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to provide an additional annual allowance to the member of the Senate occupying the recognized position of leader of the government in the Senate and the member occupying the recognized position of leader of the opposition in the Senate.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION COAL BOARD

ADMINISTRATION OF SUBVENTIONS OR SUBSIDIES VOTED BY PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a corporation to be known as the dominion coal board to administer subventions or subsidies relating to coal voted by parliament, to exercise and perform certain other powers, duties and functions.

Provision is made further for the advisory functions of the board, for the employment of professional and technical advisers and assistants and their remuneration, and for all expenses of the act to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

MARITIME COMMISSION

PROVISION FOR DUTIES AND FUNCTIONS UNDER CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a corporation to be known as the Canadian maritime commission to exercise certain powers and perform certain duties and functions under the Canada Shipping Act, to administer any steamship subvention voted by parliament, and to exercise powers or perform duties and functions under any other act or order of the governor in council.

Provision is made further for the advisory functions of the commission, for the employment of professional and technical advisers and assistants and the remuneration thereof, and for all expenses under the act to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE TREATIES

JAPANESE PEACE SETTLEMENT—PRESS REPORT FROM LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. An Associated Press dispatch from London, published this morning in the Ottawa Citizen, states:

Britain and her four dominions have decided to stage a conference to formulate an empire peace policy for Japan, a dominions office spokesman disclosed today.

In addition to this, there have been dispatches, as the minister knows, during the last week or two with regard to a possible peace conference for Japan. It would be very helpful if the minister could give the house a statement with regard to the question.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The first paragraph of the dispatch as cited by the hon. member is certainly inaccurate. Consideration is being given to various proposals for preliminary discussions among the members of the commonwealth on the Japanese peace settlement, but no final decision has yet been taken in regard to any of these proposals. At a convenient time I propose to make a fuller statement of the attitude being taken by this government in respect of the Japanese peace settlement.

Mr. GREEN: If I may ask a supplemental question, is the minister in a position yet to say whether or not the reports that the conference will be an eleven-power conference are correct? Apparently the thought is that the eleven nations who fought against Japan would be represented in the conference.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot say that any determination has been made in that regard. The foreign secretary of the United Kingdom stated recently at Margate that it was his view that these eleven powers should be associated in the preparation of the treaty, and that is a view that is shared by the Canadian government.

CIVIL SERVICE

VETERANS' PREFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE IN CASE OF ERROR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LESLIE A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State, of which I have given him notice. Has the civil service commission, having assigned to a position in the civil service a veteran who is not entitled to the veterans' preference, the right to require his dismissal in spite of the fact that he has accepted the position in good faith and performed his duties satisfactorily, when they subsequently discover that he should not in the first instance have been accorded the veterans' preference?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Winnipeg South was good enough to send me notice of his question. I am informed that the general policy of the civil service commission is that where an error has been made owing to a mistake on the part of the commission, the veteran is not penalized; but where there has been an error owing to a misstatement or wrong information given by the veteran himself, he must assume the responsibility. If the hon. member wishes to give me information concerning any individual case, I shall be very happy to have it investigated.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY AS TO BREAKWATER PROJECT AT MORIEN, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I sent him notice of the question and fully explained it, so I shall be brief. When does the minister's department expect to begin to spend the $300,000 appropriation made last year for the breakwater project at Morien, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Perhaps the hon. member sent the question before the opening of the house. I have not seen it. If he will just wait until Monday, I shall have all the data.

Mr. GILLIS: I sent it to the minister's office this morning about ten o'clock.

TELEPHONE SERVICES

REVENUES COLLECTED—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 28

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): On May 28, as recorded at page 3510 of Hansard, I tabled an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). The question was:

What has been collected by the federal government in each province for each of the last three fiscal years as taxes on telephone (a) extension services, and (b) tolls and long distance services?

The answer would indicate, for the year 1946-47 and relatively so for the years 1944-45 and 1945-46, that out of a total tax of $152,833, the province of Quebec had paid $118,160, whereas the amount collected in the other provinces was very small. So too with the tax as to tolls and long distance, the answer would show that out of a total amount collected in taxes of $5,368,514, the province of Quebec had paid $3,451,707 and the rest of the provinces correspondingly low amounts. The explanation for that, which I should like to have put on Hansard, is this. The head office of the Bell Telephone Company, as is known, is situated in Montreal. When the tax came into effect an arrangement was made whereby the Bell Telephone Company paid its own taxes and that of some subsidiaries through the Montreal head office.

PRICE CEILINGS

INQUIRY AS TO REIMPOSITION ON NEW AND USED CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, notice of which I sent to him. In view of reports of widespread profiteering in new and slightly used cars, will the minister consider the reimposition of price ceilings in this field?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend has said, he was good enough to give me notice of this question. I am informed that new cars are being sold by dealers at the list prices. Officials of the wartime prices and trade board have seen reports in the press of some profiteering in used cars, but it appears to be spotty. I am informed that it is not felt that the situation is such as to justify the reimposition of price ceilings.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Golding in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

3. That for the 1947 taxation year the graduated rates of tax applicable to income of individuals be the average of the present rates and of the rates set out in paragraph one.

Mr. FLEMING: I have a question which I should like to put to the Minister of Finance with reference to this third resolution. In putting it I am bearing in mind that the resolution is stated in general terms, and the question is one of interpretation. What appears in the resolution is that the rates for the year will be the average of the present rates for the first half of the year and the new rates for the second half. In the case of a person dying in the first six months, is it the intention that the bill shall provide clearly that the rate applicable to the income received by such deceased person in the portion of the year during which he was alive and in receipt of income shall be calculated on the average method and that the income tax shall not be calculated on the rates in existence for the first six months of the year, during which period he may have died?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is yes. As the resolution indicates, the rates in effect for 1947 will be the arithmetical average of the rates existing up to July 1 and the new rates. For example, the rate for the first half of 1947 in the low bracket is 22 per cent. The new starting rate is 10 per cent. The sum of those is 32, and the arithmetical average is 16. The tax payable in the case cited by my hon. friend will be at the appropriate rate for the full year. The bill when it is brought in will contain a special schedule setting forth the effective rate for 1947, which will be a schedule made up of the average of the two rates to which I have just referred.

Mr. FLEMING: Then in any case where death has taken place and a T.1 return has already been filed by the executor on behalf of the deceased in respect of 1947 income, steps should be taken now to revise the return?

Mr. ABBOTT: To revise the return and obtain the appropriate refund, if one is due. That is correct.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to say a word or two about taxation in connection with teacher's contributions to the superannuation fund, based upon a letter which arrived just in time to be discussed on this resolution. The system of pension for teachers in Saskatchewan has been based on a double or triple scheme. It is partly a service pension and partly made up of the proceeds of whatever annuity certain contributions made throughout the teacher's earning life will buy. Up to the present, under the Saskatchewan Teachers' Superannuation Act of 1942, the amount of statutory deduction has been four per cent. To that act there has been an amendment by which the teacher is now allowed to pay in, in addition to his compulsory four per cent, certain payments which I suppose might be classed as voluntary. They are voluntary in regard to paying in but they are not voluntary in regard to taking out, because I understand that the amendment sees to it that the funds are kept in there until the teacher ceases to teach. It is the desire of the Saskatchewan teachers' federation, as expressed in this letter from the secretary, that this matter be brought to the attention of the minister for the purpose of discovering the position in regard to these extra payments. I might read a line or two from the letter:

This year's amendment to the act—

That is the Saskatchewan Teachers' Superannuation Act of 1942.

—provides that not less than four per cent shall be deducted at the source but a teacher may elect to have a greater percentage deducted at source, and we are asking that any amount deducted be exempt from income tax.

My correspondents point out that the dominion act provides for exemptions up to an amount of $900 per annum. They also point out that if a teacher contributes to the fund and withdraws those contributions, that amount is taxable as income for the year in which it is withdrawn. That is to say, under the new policy, which I think was initiated in 1945, if pensions are liable to income tax then contributions should not be; otherwise you have a system of double taxation. Perhaps the minister would comment on that. In the meantime, in Hansard for 1945, at page 3427, I found something said by the previous minister of finance on this matter:

We are now changing the law in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission to make all contributions to the pension plan deductible from income for tax purposes and to provide in general that pension payments shall be subject to tax.

That was where I got this idea of double taxation. On the previous page the former minister is reported to have said:

In the future it will not be possible to set up funds like that at all. The income of the fund will be free of tax, but the pensioner, the contributor, in every case will be entitled to deduct his contributions from his income for tax purposes and he will be taxed in full on his pension.

Perhaps the minister would comment on that so we can get some guidance for these people.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. Following the Ives commission report the law was amended to provide that payments to a pension fund could be deducted from the income of the person paying, for income tax purposes, but that the income payments when received would be taxed. That of course is subject to the general qualification in the act that the fund must be one that is approved by the Minister of National Revenue as being a pension fund eligible under the act. I am not familiar with the Saskatchewan statute or the practice to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I suggest that if there is any doubt as to the application of the statute the matter should be submitted to the deputy minister of national revenue for a ruling. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the matter can be best dealt with in that way.

Mr. GREEN: Just along the same line may I ask the minister to state the present position with regard to the pension, for example, paid by the C.P.R. to an employee who has retired? I have had a communication from one who has been on pension for nine or ten years, and who is being charged income tax on that pension. Is there no protection in a case of that kind?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that up to 1935 the C.P.R. pension fund was non-contributory, and of course in that case the total pension would be subject to tax when received by the pensioner. In 1935 it was converted to a contributory fund, and since that time employees of the C.P.R. have been making contributions. I am told the Department of National Revenue now apportions the pension payments received by C.P.R. pensioners as between the portion which was non-contributory and the portion which was contributory, and makes a proper tax adjustment.

Mr. GREEN: In other words if the man retired in 1934 his whole pension would be taxable?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Does not the minister think some adjustment should be made to meet that situation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I don't know why. It is a non-contributory plan; it is a free gift, and following the ordinary rule it is subject to tax when received. There has been no double taxation in that case, of course. The purpose of the law as it now stands, following the recommendations of the Ives commission, is that it should be so arranged that there will not be double taxation on these pensions. The general rule is that if the pension contribution may be taken as a deduction from income for tax purposes when it is paid in, then the pension is taxable; and that is the provision as it now stands.

Mr. GREEN: Is not the actual position this, that the man was receiving a certain rate of pay which, while it may not have been apportioned in such a way that part of it was shown to be a contribution to a pension fund, nevertheless probably was based on the fact that he was going to get a pension upon retirement? Surely some relief could be given these elderly men who are in that category.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course the short answer to my hon. friend's question is that if he had received his pension contribution as part of his pay, he would have paid tax on it. In fact he did not. Reasoning it in logic, he received pay on which he paid tax at the proper rate. If for the purposes of argument we say that in addition the company was paying into a pension fund a certain amount of money to provide him with a pension later, then that was something he was getting free of income tax, something which was not included in his income for purposes of taxation. Therefore following the rule I have just mentioned, when his pension is received it should be subject to tax.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, but even on that basis his increased income would have been very much smaller. It would not be right to tax him on his full pension, which is what is happening today.

Mr. ABBOTT: Generally speaking I think it is more favourable to the taxpayer, certainly under existing rates of tax, to deduct his pension contributions for purposes of income tax, than to have a tax-free pension at the end, because the pension, except in the executive groups, is relatively small and usually covered by the exemption, so the pensioner pays very little tax. Taxwise I think it is very much in the interests of the pensioner to claim the pension contributions as a deduction from income when he is earning at a fairly high rate and is subject to a fairly substantial tax, than to have a tax free pension. I am informed it works out that way.

Mr. GREEN: I quite agree with the minister, but all these men now would be well over seventy-five. They retire at sixty-five, and having retired before 1935 they are getting on in years. I would ask that consideration be given to providing some relief for men in that position.

Mr. FAIR: Just before eleven o'clock on Wednesday evening I asked the minister a number of questions in connection with farmers' income tax. I wonder if he has the answers for me today.

Mr. ABBOTT: I assured my hon. friend that I would get the information and give it to him. It requires a bit of time; I may not be able to do so while we are on the resolutions, but I repeat the assurance, which I think was the one I gave the other night, that at the latest I will give it when we are in committee on the appropriate section of the bill. It has not been overlooked.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to draw to the attention of the minister a matter somewhat similar to that which was brought forward by my colleague to my left a few moments ago. I want to recall the change made in the law last year under resolution 27 at that time, which is carried into the present consolidation of the act in clause 9, paragraph 7. Under that provision, in the case of payments pursuant to superannuation or pension fund or upon retirement, as the law stood immediately preceding last July such a payment was taxable spread over five years, one-fifth each year. This paragraph 7, as it stands, made the tax fall very much more heavily, although there is one alternative, because it is taxable in the year it is received. I want to suggest to the minister two things, first of all that that contravenes substantially what was suggested or recommended in the Ives report, and secondly that it creates a great hardship, particularly in the case of widows.

I want to read a brief statement here—I believe it is correct—which sets out a case of great hardship which I would bring to the minister's attention. It states:

> At the last session of parliament the government had changes made in regard to the methods of taxation of "lump sum" payments from pension funds and employer's gratuities to those retiring from service. When the matter was discussed in the house by the ways and means committee as reported at pages 3871 to 3876 of Hansard, Mr. Abbott, who was piloting the matter through, stated that the method then in vogue, i.e., taxation of only one-third of the lump sum, was "introduced during the war to moderate the effect of very high tax rates," and throughout his defence of the proposed change to revert to the system of taxing the whole of those payments, implied that taxation was now lower. This debate took place in July, 1946 . . . As Hansard will show, Mr. Abbott spoke only of men receiving lump sum payments during their lifetime; he did not make clear that this also affected widows, or other beneficiaries of a person who had made payments into pension funds and that as a rule the lump sum consisted entirely of the man's own payment into the fund.

And then this further:

> Prior to 1942, or thereabout, the taxation on lump sum repayments from pension funds was on the full amount. As the result of representations made by various organizations, among which was the international firefighters' union, the tax was reduced to one-third. When the Ives commission was set up the organization referred to appeared before them in regard to "lump sum" taxation.

The organization referred to was the international fire fighters' union, I might say.

The commission, in its report—

That is the Ives commission—

—commented on the difficulties surrounding the question and recommend the continuation of the one-third as being equitable. On page 3871 of Hansard, during the discussion on resolution No. 26, Mr. Abbott said: "The whole question was considered by the Ives commission and legislation was introduced last year following the recommendations of that commission."

I would submit that this finding of the Ives commission was not followed throughout, and in this particular it was disregarded.

I should like to bring one case to the attention of the minister, and then I shall have finished. This is a case respecting one of the members of the fire fighters' union in Toronto. It states:

One of their members, after nearly thirty years of service retired on pension; he died within a few months; his widow received as a lump sum repayment of his contributions to the pension fund about $3,200. Under the present regulations she has two choices in regard to the tax. One would mean, in round figures, a tax of $500 out of the $3,200; the other a tax of $780. But here's "the rub,"—this man during the first half of his service on account of income, was not taxable. It was only when his wages got higher and his family grew up, and more particularly when the government dipped much lower than formerly into low and medium incomes, that he became taxable and was exempted from such tax on the amounts he was then paying into his pension fund. As a result of these exemptions he saved $209. Now, owing to the taxation being on the whole $3,200, his widow received, and which amount represented all his payments into the fund, even those in the years when he was not taxable, his widow has to pay either $500 or $780.

I just wish to recapitulate at this point. It seems to me that the change which was made last year and which, I submit, made taxation on such payments so much more onerous, was a most unfortunate one. I hope the minister will be able to take this situation into consideration, and particularly as it affects widows.

And I just add this: I was informed—and this may be subject to correction—that actually a regulation has been made easing these cases where widows are affected. I should like to know if that is so. If it is so I would ask two questions: first, under what authority does that come, and, second, if it is proper to do it there, why should not the principle be extended?

I repeat that it seems to me the amount of the tax involved is, at any rate in the smaller cases, negligible so far as the crown is concerned, and a very great hardship can be and is being worked in many cases similar to the one I have just brought to the attention of the committee.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. ABBOTT: This question, as my hon. friend knows, is complicated. It is one which has been given a good deal of consideration by myself and by the officers of my department for the last three or four months. I have had a number of delegations to see me about it.

It is true that the law as it stands did depart in certain respects from the recommendations of the Ives report. That was done, I believe, for good and sufficient reasons. These lump sum payments can be made the subject of considerable abuse. And when I state that I am dealing with the general aspect of the problem, rather than with the specific case to which the hon. member referred. But I repeat that they can be made the subject of abuse. A man can accumulate a certain amount, and then leave the company he is with, get his payments, go to another company and get another lump sum payment.

Broadly speaking—and I think this is a view which is shared by many people—I believe that a pension plan which provides for single lump sum payments to widows is not a particularly good plan. As I say, I am only expressing my own personal view. I think it is a much better plan if the directors of the fund are given the option of paying the amount to the widow in yearly instalments. I advised some of these delegations, which came to see me and which discussed certain funds, that the department would have no objection to a fund amending its by-laws or regulations, or whatever they may be, to make the provision I have indicated; and, in addition, to provide that it could be or should be paid in instalments. I went further and said that the department would be prepared to look at hardship cases where a lump sum payment should be made—for instance in order to pay off a pressing mortgage obligation. I said the department would be prepared to look at those cases involving a particular remission under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

I feel that that is really as far as we should go in that field. However it is a question on which I have a perfectly open mind; and if it can be shown that another scheme might be fairer and better, we would be prepared to consider it. But this is a matter which has been given a great deal of careful consideration by myself—and I am not an expert in it—and also by departmental officials who are informed in these matters. It has been considered sympathetically, too, I may add.

Mr MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I agree it is unfortunate that this condition exists with respect to lump sum payments, and I agree with the minister's view that it would be wise to adopt a different course.

There are one or two respects in which I differ from the minister. I have no doubt there may be cases where people go from one place to another and may accumulate pensions —although I would think, and I suggest with deference to the minister, that the type of men who roll about are not the ones who are likely to accumulate much by way of pension. I should not consider that a very serious point. It is one which it seems to me could be taken care of by a suitable safeguard. Further, I deprecate the idea that we have to meet a situation of this kind, which I assume is a situation which will arise often, practically by charitable considerations. Perhaps I should withdraw the word "charitable" and say it is unfortunate that we must meet it by making special cases. It is most undesirable, first of all because people do not want to be a subject of charity; secondly because they do not know what their rights are, and thirdly because to some extent it depends on whether the minister had a good night's sleep. The minister being human, it depends upon that.

An hon. MEMBER: Is he human?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am giving the minister the benefit of the doubt. But I do come back to this, that I do not have to remind the minister that a year ago we departed radically from what the situation has been before. And looking back upon the debates which took place at that time, I must reproach those of us on this side of the house for not fighting it with more strength.

We departed radically because, as was pointed out in the Ives report, broadly speaking there was a practice—which as the report says was not logical, but which seemed to have common sense in it—of spreading payment out over five years. The report says that under the circumstances there seems to be no particular reason for changing the existing law. I must say that on general principle it does seem to me to be sensible. We have done it in various cases. When you get a lump sum payment of this kind I think it should be spread over some years. I think that carries with it the judgment of everybody as being just a matter of common sense. If there are difficulties in the way, that is a matter for the minister and his advisers. It may be, although I am not suggesting this particularly, that the minister and his advisers feel that this has to be limited to sums of modest amounts. I am not offering an opinion on that, but I do suggest most earnestly that what we did last year was a reactionary move. The case that I have given shows the hardship that may be involved. As I see it, we departed from this considered report of Mr. Justice Ives. For all these reasons I do hope that the minister, with that open mind which I am sure we all feel he has, will be able to take another serious look at this for early action.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a word in support of the representations made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I do not get many cases of this kind, but one has been drawn to my attention which seems to underline the point. This particular gentleman in Winnipeg, after serving a firm for a good many years, was forced to retire because of arthritis. The firm gave him a lump retiring allowance of $15,000 or $16,000. He felt that it would have been better to be provided with monthly payments, and so he arranged to buy a government annuity, spending about $14,000, or almost all the lump sum he had received. He is now in the position where the lump sum is being divided into five parts for taxation purposes and for the next five years he will pay income tax on one-fifth of the lump sum as well as on the $1,200 annuity which he purchased with the major portion of the lump sum. All told it will mean that in the next five years he will have to pay income tax of between $5,000 and $6,000 out of his $15,000. It would seem that in a case like that where a person takes a lump sum and turns it into an annuity for his life time, or for his life time with a guaranteed period of years, some consideration should be given. To give consideration to cases of the kind would encourage people who receive lump sums to invest them in life annuities.

Mr. CASE: We are now dealing with section 3. There was a time when the budget meant something to the Canadian people; it does even yet, but at one time it was a highly secret document. As you know, last year we departed from the accepted rule—possibly even before that—and in the main the terms of the budget did not apply until January 1, 1947. By this clause the taxation rates applicable to income of individuals will be the average of the present rates and of the rates set out in paragraph 1. I know that a great deal of thought and consideration has been given to this, and I believe the minister will be able to answer my question.

I am wondering why the income tax provided by the budget was not made applicable immediately. The budget was brought down on April 29, at which time about one-third of the year had passed. When you are setting up tax rates based on an average table you would know that one-third of the year had passed and two-thirds was yet to come. Was that taken into consideration, and what difference there would have been in revenues if the Canadian people had been given that added incentive of two months' advantage as compared to the present arrangement whereby the rates do not become applicable until July 1?

Mr. ABBOTT: The principal reason for not making it effective immediately was that under our pay as you go tax system, deduction tables must be placed in the hands of thousands of employers, and it was not possible to prepare and have those tables available and in the hands of the various employers in time. Secondly, it would have meant a large number of tax refunds because the deductions have been going on since the beginning of the year at the existing rates. There would have been a loss of revenue of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like the minister to revert to the matter I brought up a moment ago. I wanted to find out for my own information what is the basic principle of deductions in regard to these pensions. Is it the fact that the payment is compulsory, or is consideration given to the element that it must be a plan recognized by the province, the employer and the employee?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not a matter for the province; the pension plan must be approved by the Minister of National Revenue. The underlying principle is that the pensioner is entitled to deduct from his current income for taxation purposes the contributions which he makes to the pension fund, and then the pension which he receives at the end is taxable.

Mr. KNIGHT: If the four per cent deducted at the source is exempt and if an additional two per cent or four per cent is paid in on a voluntary basis as a main part of the pension plan and as a contribution to the annuity which this fund will buy when the man becomes pensionable, then this extra or voluntary amount should also be deductible.

Mr. ABBOTT: I really must ask my hon. friend to go to the administrative officials to get a legal interpretation. The statute provides that an amount not exceeding $900 may be actually retained by the employer from the remuneration of the taxpayer for the employee's superannuation or pension fund or plan. On the facts that my hon. friend has given, my personal opinion would be that they are probably included, but I suggest that he go to the deputy minister or the official in the department who is specially charged with administering the provisions of the act, put the specific facts before him and get a specific ruling. Then if he feels there is an injustice, the thing to do would be to come back and suggest that the act be amended.

Mr. IRVINE: I dislike to ask the minister a question in respect to income tax in so far as it affects farmers, but he promised a moment ago to give some information before the bill is passed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was going to answer some specific questions that were asked by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. IRVINE: The first specific question that I should like to ask is in regard to basic herds. I am sure the minister will know whether provision should be made in this bill for any alterations that might be needed in the present practice, or whether it is only an administrative matter. Second, I should like to ask whether there is to be any alteration in the present regulation which provides that a farmer who is selling out after long years of farming is taxed on the entire proceeds of the sale of his capital stock.

Mr. ABBOTT: In answer to the first question, my understanding is that it requires no amendment to the act. It is simply a matter of accounting practice and administrative decision by the Department of National Revenue. As to what the actual practice is at the moment I am not in a position to say. I think the whole question is being discussed at some length by deputy ministers and others. Perhaps my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, can elaborate on it, but I doubt it, because I myself have never been able to. I do not know whether he knows more about basic herds than I do; I do not believe he does. I do not know what the present day practice is, but it would be an administrative matter.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to say a few words on this matter. There has been a great deal of dissatisfaction regarding the way the matter has been dealt with. For instance, the recommendation of the federation of agriculture of last year reads:

> That breeding herds be recognized as a capital asset, and that a basic herd plan be adopted to distinguish between capital and income in live stock dispersal sales.

And then the brief of the Alberta farmers' union, which was referred to by the hon. member for Battle River, had this to say:

> That in case of dispersal sales of live stock, an equivalent number of animals to those owned on January 1, 1941, be considered a capital asset and not subject to income tax.

If the government do not like that proposal they should at least bring in one that does recognize the principle involved. For instance, let us say a farmer sold a piece of land and invested the capital in live stock back in 1939. From then on he would have paid income tax on any offspring he may have sold. It may be today that he desires to sell out. He should be entitled to recover the full thousand dollars for the sale of the live stock. Apparently that is not what happens. He is taxed on a set proportion of the amount. Then again he is not allowed to charge any depreciation against that stock, and in the meantime a certain number of the live stock may have died. Therefore when he sells out he should be allowed to include some of the offspring as part of the capital in order to recover the total amount of capital invested. That is not allowed today. That is why the Alberta farmers' union suggests a method by which a fair deal may be given to farmers.

We recognize that it is not an easy question to deal with. Again I should like to suggest to the minister that the proposal put forward by the Alberta farmers' union could very well be taken into consideration. May I read it again:

That in case of dispersal sales of live stock, an equivalent number of animals to those owned on January 1, 1941, be considered a capital asset and not subject to income tax.

If the minister is not prepared to deal with the question now probably he will deal with it when the bill is before the house. The question was raised time and again in the house by the late member for Portage la Prairie, Mr. Leader, who urged the government to take some action in this regard.

One or two other proposals were put forward by the federation of agriculture which I should like to deal with at this time. The recommendations of the Alberta farmers' union and the federation of agriculture are similar. The federation of agriculture, along with the other farm organizations, asked that the exemption for single persons be raised to $1,000 and for married persons to $2,000. All people, especially farmers, were disappointed when the minister announced that he was not prepared to take any action in that regard. First of all apparently he took the stand that already we had exempted over fifty per cent of the people who earned incomes, and second, he said that if we were to raise the exemptions to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons we would be reducing the taxes of those people in the high income brackets. Of course it would be a very simple matter to make sure that the people in the higher income brackets would not get any benefit from the raising of the exemption. It would merely mean an adjustment in the tax schedule. I was wondering just what the cost of such a proposal would be. I do not think that the answer which the minister gave on page 3560 of Hansard is quite correct. This question was asked the minister:

Can the Minister of Finance tell us what difference it would make to our revenues in Canada if all single persons receiving less than $1,000 and all married persons receiving less than $2,000 were exempt from paying income tax? Has the minister the information available?

The minister replied:

I am told that it would make a difference of roughly $200 million.

Surely that $200 million must represent the loss of revenue not merely from those who would be exempt from paying taxes but also from those who have incomes above the $1,000 and the $2,000 respectively. What I should like to know is, what would be the loss of revenue from these two groups alone? —as the tax schedule could be adjusted so that those above these amounts are not affected. I would say that the figure would be considerably below $200 million. As a matter of fact I would say it would be less than half the $200 million. I hold in my hand the taxation statistics of April, 1946. Pages 117, 118 and 119 give an estimate of the individual income tax payments. From that I tried to work out what the actual loss would be. I quite realize that there may be a mistake in my figures but I think they are substantially correct. From these statistics we find that the number of income taxpayers in the single brackets with incomes below $1,000 would be 593,100, with a total income of $533,172,000. They paid a total tax of $37,730,000. Married income taxpayers with incomes below $2,000 number 799,300, with a total income of $1,271,100,000. They pay a tax of $60,430,000. If all married persons with incomes of less than $2,000 and single persons with incomes of less than $1,200 were relieved of taxes, the government would lose $98,160,000 out of a total of $671,596,000. This class of income taxpayers represents 54 per cent of all income taxpayers. Therefore by relieving from taxes 54 per cent of the taxpayers in the lower income brackets the government would suffer a loss of revenue from income tax of 14 per cent. Of course that does not take into consideration the loss of revenue from people in the higher income brackets above $1,000, which greatly reduces the loss of revenue that the government would suffer from those who would no longer be paying income tax, and those are the people with whom we are chiefly concerned.

I should like the minister to answer this question—whether or not the $200 million referred to the people who would no longer pay income tax, or whether it was taking into consideration the total above the $2,000 or below?

Mr. ABBOTT: The total amount of the revenue, of course. In increasing the exemption I think that $8 out of $10 would go to those in the upper brackets. The effect would be that they would benefit by raising the exemptions. I suppose that approximately $50 or $60 million in tax would be lost by increasing the exemptions for single persons to $1,000 and married persons to $2,000. If one took into account only the loss of revenue from people in these brackets, what would be the result? You would give no reduction to the man who earns $2,001 or $2,500. You would have to start increasing the tax. In other words you have to increase the rates of tax on everybody above $2,000 to the extent of say $50 million; and the practice in other countries where income tax has been highly developed, including Great Britain which is under a socialist government today, and Australia which is under a socialist government, and New Zealand which is under a socialist government, shows that the exemptions are lower than they are in Canada. I feel strongly that the income tax level is fair, eminently fair, just as fair as if not fairer than the level in other advanced countries. I say that to increase the exemptions will create more unfairness rather than less. To use a slang phrase, I am convinced that this plea for increasing income tax exemptions is a phony in so far as it will benefit the vast majority of the people of the country who have to pay taxes. I do not suggest that the hon. gentlemen who put it forward believe that for one moment. I do not impute motives. I know they genuinely believe that it is in the interest of the lower income levels. But my contention is that it is not. I think there is a point beyond which you hurt them rather than help them, because of the fact I mentioned in the budget speech that, rightly or wrongly, or any way you put it, half the people who earn income are below the existing level. There is no use fooling ourselves. This tax revenue has to be got somewhere, and it cannot all be got from people of any figure you like, $5,000 a year and up, if you like, because there are simply not enough of them in the country to do it. If therefore we do not have a well worked out, well adjusted income tax schedule, we shall have to get the revenue some other way, and that means indirect taxes, which work much more injustice on the low income groups than on the high.

That is my view and I hold it strongly. I am a strong believer in a well thought out, graduated, progressive income tax scheme, and that is what I believe we have in this country today. I believe that in fairness income tax relief should be graduated in all groups in the community, naturally less for those with high incomes. But the method suggested of raising the exemptions would not in my judgment accomplish the purpose intended.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not see how the minister can argue that by raising the exemptions you do not benefit the majority, because the figures I have show that if you increase the exemptions for married people to $2,000 and single people to $1,200 you relieve 54 per cent of the taxpayers. In other words, the majority would benefit, and not the minority, by such action.

Mr. ABBOTT: The majority would benefit by unduly penalizing the minority. That is the fact. No man can convince me that the man with $2,500 or $3,000 or $3,500 is not entitled to just as much consideration, on a logical and reasonable basis, in the matter of tax treatment under the income tax act, or under any other act, as the man earning $1,500 or $1,800. It is true that taxes should be imposed in proportion to ability to pay, but you do not do that by an arbitrary exemption. I repeat what I said before. If the argument from analogy is of value, we are not doing too badly when our exemption levels are higher than those in any other country.

Mr. QUELCH: But it would be a good thing for this country to take the lead.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have taken the lead in many things, and we have done so in this instance.

Mr. QUELCH: There is no reason why we should not continue. If you raised the exemptions to $1,200 for single and $2,000 for married persons, from the figures I have obtained, on the basis of 1945, it would cost the government a loss of revenue of $98 million, not taking into consideration the amount lost in respect of people above the proposed exemptions. But in view of the fact that we are bringing about a reduction of revenue greater than $98 million, we could increase the exemptions and at the same time allow for a reduction in revenue from people in the lower income brackets above $2,000 and $1,200.

There are one or two other points that I should like to consider in regard to the brief submitted by the federation of agriculture and the Alberta farmers union. I refer to No. 7 on the list, which asks that payment of arrears of interest and principal on farm loans due in 1940 be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. That is from the farmers union, which is almost identical with the one from the federation of agriculture, which asks that payment of arrears of interest and principal on farms due for 1940 be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. I feel there is every justification for that demand. It is true that last year we introduced legislation to make it possible for the farmer to average his income over a period of three years. The majority of farmer members last year took the stand that the period should be increased to five, but there was a compromise on three years. That, however, was not made retroactive and therefore we find today that many farmers are having to pay tax on debts that were incurred in the past, and therefore the federation of agriculture and the farmers union ask that where payments are made on certain debts incurred in the past, no income tax be charged thereon. There is every justification for that position, for this reason. In the thirties the farmers, through no fault of their own, were forced into debt owing to the fact that they were having to produce at considerably below the cost of production. That was due to the policy of the government of the day.

At that time the farmers were told that they would have to accept world market prices, and that situation continued until 1942, and the farmers kept going into debt. Then in 1942 prices of agricultural products were increased, but at the same time the income tax was greatly increased. Moreover, it might have been possible for the farmers to get higher prices, but the government placed a ceiling on agricultural prices. The result was that we found ourselves faced with this situation. In peace time when prices were low the farmers were told they would have to accept world prices, and when the war came and prices went up they were not allowed to get the advantage of world prices but were told that they would have to take less. Nevertheless they were faced with the problem of having to meet debts that had been incurred in the period of low prices, and those debts unquestionably represent to a large extent unpaid expenditures.

Expenditures incurred in production should be allowed as cost and therefore deductible from taxation. But today, when the farmer tries to meet obligations incurred in the thirties, he finds that those obligations are increased to from 30 to 40 per cent as a result of having to pay income tax. I think the suggestion of the federation of agriculture is reasonable, that repayment of interest and capital on mortgages incurred prior to 1940 should be exempt from taxation.

There is nothing new in this principle. We have adopted it in regard to certain other corporations in the country, and if we can adopt it so far as those corporations are concerned, I cannot see why the principle cannot be followed in agriculture. Agriculture is probably one of the most risky occupations in the country. We have to realize, therefore, that although it is doing fairly well today it may run up against very great difficulties in the future—not as serious, we hope, as in the thirties; nevertheless we may run into a situation where it may be impossible for the farmer to recover cost of production in the prices he receives, and hence he will run into debt once more.

I suggest it would be a good thing if we were to allow the farmers to establish a reserve fund to offset future losses. We must help them not only to get out of debt but to establish such a reserve to take care of future losses. We do that in connection with the chartered banks. We allow them to set aside a certain amount as reserve; the public are not allowed to know what that inner reserve is, and the banks pay no income tax on the amount they put in that reserve. When they suffer losses they can draw money from such reserves to meet those losses, and the excuse given is that these losses are unpaid expenditures and therefore should not be taxed.

I contend that exactly the same principle should be applied to farmers. They should be allowed to meet losses which represent expenditures without having to pay income tax on them. The chartered banks have always argued that inner reserves are merely for the purpose of meeting losses, and they emphasize the fact that during the thirties they suffered heavy losses and had to use up a large percentage of those reserves. But I think it is more true to say that the inner reserves are not merely for the purpose of meeting possible losses but for the purpose of guaranteeing profits, because during the thirties the chartered banks averaged dividends of around nine or ten per cent on paid-up capital. I do not see therefore how you can say that they were having heavy losses when they were able to pay around nine or ten per cent dividends. The fact that they could pay such dividends proves that they were using inner reserves to guarantee profits; and yet they were not charged income tax on the reserves because it is claimed that those reserves were for the purpose of meeting losses. Apparently we are still continuing that policy. In 1943, what did we find? We found that in that year just two of the chartered banks set aside in their inner reserves over $2,000,000 too much. If in this one year two of the chartered banks can set aside in an inner reserve $2,000,000 too much, it makes one wonder just what the size of that inner reserve may be. I have in my hand a return to an order of the house. I asked this question:

What was the total of the transfers made to contingent reserve fund from the earnings of each of the chartered banks in excess of their reasonable requirements for each of the years, 1940 to 1944?

The answer was that in the case of two chartered banks the amount added to their general contingency reserves during 1943 was in excess of the reasonable requirements of the banks. In the case of one bank the amount was $1,965,566 and in the other, $324,000. Therefore I think it would be interesting if we could find out from the government just how much money had been set aside in the past by the chartered banks and put into these inner reserves which are exempt from taxation. If the chartered banks are allowed to set up reserves of that kind, without paying income tax on them, in order to make provision for possible losses in the future, I cannot see why the farmers who are in a business every bit as risky as banking —or much more so, because the bank has very often refused to make a loan to farmers because they said their business was too risky —should not be allowed to do the same. Therefore I think the farmers would be fully justified in asking that they get the same privilege as the chartered banks and be allowed to establish a reserve to take care of losses in the future, which reserve should be exempt from income tax.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member for Acadia spoke about what is generally referred to as the principle of the basic herd as far as income tax of farmers is concerned. I think he asked some questions, and I did not hear that he received any answers to them, but possibly I did not hear him very well. I spoke at some length on this subject in 1945, and again in 1946, as did several other hon. members; and it seemed to me that our arguments were having a considerable amount of effect on the previous minister of finance. As I remember it, he said that serious consideration would be given to incorporating in the act the idea or principle of the basic herd; that is, when a farmer or rancher had a closing-out sale—went out of business, for example, or retired—the live stock that he sold at that time would not all be considered as income but he would be able to set up what was the normal breeding stock of his farm or ranch and that would be looked upon as capital. I had rather hoped that some change would be made in the income tax act this year in order to look after that matter. I do not want to reiterate the arguments which have been made in former years, but just looking at this income tax schedule I should like to take one particular item, say the one on income of $100,000. On that a man has to pay a tax of $54,390.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are dealing with resolution No. 3. Resolutions 1 and 2 have been passed.

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes, but I think the schedule applies to No. 3, because that resolution refers to the schedule. This principle would be of particular benefit to ranchers; the injustice is felt chiefly by them as the law stands at the present time. Many ranchers are now getting to the age where they have to retire. They are too old to carry on. As a result of thirty or forty years' hard work they have accumulated a herd of cattle which is now worth, we will say—if they sell it on the market, in that particular case—$100,000. But the government in income tax takes more than half of that amount away from the man when he comes to sell out, which of course makes it impossible for many of these people to sell out and have enough money left on which to live the rest of their years. I should like the minister to indicate what consideration has been given to this, and whether there is any possibility of anything being done. As I say, it seemed to me that the former minister of finance was just about ready to make the desired change.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Acadia and the last speaker in this regard. The hon. member for Acadia presented the case of the farmer very well indeed. I am not going to repeat the arguments he used. The same arguments apply to a good number of the dairymen and beef cattle raisers in the southern part of British Columbia. I noticed that the minister this afternoon argued by analogy, and I want to reply in that vein in presenting another aspect of this case. At the present time we know there has been a tremendous increase in property and land values in all parts of Canada. Men have doubled their money in land or property values if they have seen fit to sell at this time. On the one hand these people are not taxed if their increased capital is the result of an increase in land or property values.

Mr. HACKETT: If they are in business, they are.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Pardon me; I am talking about real estate sales. At the same time the relatively static capital in cattle is taxed when the cattle are sold, if for any reason the farmer is selling out. My argument is this. The increasing values in real estate and property are increases not as a result of any effort on the part of the owner; they are increases as the result of the efforts of society as a whole. Increases in capital investment in cattle or the capital itself is the result of the work and toil of a person and his assistants. I should like the minister to explain to this house how he can give moral justification for the distinction between the methods of taxation of those who obtain and increase their wealth as a result of the action of society and those who produce wealth as a result of their own efforts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary East, one example that I know of comes to mind. Within the last one and a half years a farmer in Saskatchewan, who over the years had been engaged in the cattle business and built up a herd such as was referred to by my hon. friend, became seriously ill and was taken to a sanatorium, and his wife, unable to carry on, had to sell the stock. The man died, and the income tax authorities are proceeding to mulct the estate —that is all I can call it, even though it is within the law—on the basis of income in respect of the sale made in 1945. I feel that serious consideration should be given to this matter. If the whole amount could not be rendered exempt—and I realize that it could not—the entire income from the sale should not be subject to income tax.

The particular example I have in mind has resulted in a condition of affairs which is most serious. This man had practically his entire business in cattle. He built up a herd worth some $25,000, and all he had over and above that was an estate worth approximately $10,000. When illness overtook him and he found it necessary to sell he realized $25,000. Now that he has passed on, not only is the widow liable to succession duty, but she is being held liable to pay income tax on the $25,000, the value of the cattle sold in that one year, which has placed her and the family in a very difficult position. I realize that there were ways in which the matter could have been gotten around, by giving notice in advance; but surely under the circumstances something could be done in order to ameliorate such conditions and to remove anomalies which have resulted from the strict application of the law.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to add my words to those of other hon. members who have spoken in regard to this matter of farm income tax. We have been discussing these matters in the house for a number of years now; since 1944 we have been raising these questions of the basic herd, in regard to reserves, in regard to what deductions should be allowed in respect to interest, and various other matters. I believe we are making some progress, but we have still a long way to go before we give the farmer the same deal that is enjoyed by other groups in our economy.

I agree with the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Acadia, and there is one particular point I want to bring to the attention of the minister. That is the matter of allowing payments of interest as a deduction. During the thirties, in a great many cases in Saskatchewan and the other western provinces, and in fact all across Canada, people got behind with the interest on their mortgages. In 1937, 1938, 1939 and 1940 various agreements were reached with the mortgage companies whereby the mortgages were consolidated. In some cases the companies reduced the amount of interest due and then had a new agreement drawn up under which the remaining interest became part of the principal and the new agreement took effect as from that date. Now when a farmer makes a payment on that principal he is not allowed to deduct that portion which really represented interest and was consolidated with the principal. A farmer may have borrowed money at the bank. He may have had a crop failure; there may have been grasshoppers or something else may have happened so that he was not able to meet the note. He went to the bank and the manager said, "Well, we will just include that interest with the principal in a new note," and the new note is made out. The farmer is allowed to deduct the interest paid on the new note, but he is not allowed to deduct that part of the payments on the note represented by interest, and I think the government should give some consideration to that matter. I believe that where there has been a consolidation of a loan, the amount of that consolidation representing interest should be deductible with respect to income tax. I do not know to just what extent that is being done, but I feel that it could be done by regulation rather than by a change in the act, and I ask the minister to give consideration to this suggestion.

I would say also that there should be some uniformity in the administration of the income tax as between various districts in the country. I do not know just how much leeway is given the various district offices in the administration of the act but I know there has been a considerable variation in administration. I know that in my own district in 1945 and 1946 deductions were allowed for breaking. Then the income tax people became aware that certain people who were not farmers were hiding income by buying unimproved land and breaking it, and deducting the cost of breaking from their income before paying their tax. As a result the income tax people tightened up in their application of the regulations. I believe some publicity should be given the regulations so that the farmer may know just what his rights are in connection with income tax. I believe overpayments are being made by farmers in many cases through lack of knowledge of their rights under the act, so I would ask the minister to consider giving greater publicity to the correct manner of making out these returns, and the rights farmers have under the income tax regulations.

I fully agree with the hon. member for Acadia in his suggestion that farmers should be allowed to build up certain reserves against years of crop failure. There is no doubt that farming is one of the riskiest occupations, and farmers should be entitled to set aside certain reserves each year against crop failures, low prices, or years when they make no income. If some of these things were done I am sure agricultural production in this country would be increased. In my estimation there has been a great reduction in agricultural production simply because a great many farmers, though they have never paid income tax, thought they might get into that category. Certain farmers in the area who operated on a large scale were called before the committees, the various tax collectors who were sent out, and had to go back over their records for three, four or five years. Then, everybody in the community simply said, "Well, we are not going to get into that group. We are just going to carry on and make as little as we can. We are not going to try to produce," and as a result there has been a considerable reduction in agricultural production. I think every hon. member from an agricultural constituency will agree with that. Some time ago the Minister of Agriculture argued that so few farmers were paying income tax that this had no effect on production, but I say it has had an effect on production. Therefore I believe, if more publicity were given the exemptions a farmer is allowed, so that he would realize that he could produce without being seriously mulcted, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, in regard to income tax, we would get greater production. The government should take that point into consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might say just a word on the matter of farmers setting up reserves. That point was raised by the hon. member for Acadia, and he used as an analogy the fact that the banks were allowed to set up reserves. I want to make the point clear that, of course, the so-called hidden reserves set up by the banks are reserves of a completely different nature. They are set up to take care of possible losses or bad loans. A bank may not use them to pay dividends; it may not use them for its own purposes. Before it can do so, it must bring them back into profit and loss and pay the tax on them. With regard to the suggestion that the farmer be allowed to set up a reserve, so-called, for bad years, that has been taken care of, or we are trying to take care of it by the averaging provisions which were put in last year. That is in recognition of the fact that farming is a business which varies from year to year. But in my judgment there is no analogy between the special reserves which are set up by the banking institutions because of the special nature of their business, and a reserve which might be set up by a farmer or, for that matter, by any other type of businessman.

Mr. QUELCH: We are told that the banks, as the minister says, are allowed to set up an inner reserve to offset future losses. We were told in the banking committee that the banks had suffered heavy losses in the thirties, and had to draw heavily upon those inner reserves. The point I made was this, that, despite that fact, throughout those years the banks paid dividends averaging nine or ten per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: No.

Mr. QUELCH: How could they have losses if, at the same time, they paid profits.

Mr. LENNARD: I, too, am opposed to the method of taxation now in force in connection with the sale of herds and have voiced my opposition for the last several years. I know of half a dozen cases in my district where farmers who were advancing in years, during the years of war because of lack of help were forced to sell out their herds. And in selling those herds, which had been developed over a lifetime, they were heavily penalized.

I drew to the attention of the former minister of finance the fact that in my own locality I have known where one man, through the profits he has made over the years, acquired more land, to a point where probably he owned three or four farms. The day came when he wished to sell out and to retire to a village or town. He sold those farms and suffered no tax penalty. That was capital gain. On the other hand, I know of several farmers who have built up herds over the years and who, when they have reached the point where they sold those herds, have been heavily taxed. In my opinion that is an unfair condition, and I suggest that the minister should give it careful consideration.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to make some observations, but perhaps the minister wishes first to reply to what has been said by some other hon. members.

Mr. ABBOTT: When all those who are interested have finished, I shall deal with the basic herd problem.

Mr. BENTLEY: I had two questions to ask the minister. I understood the minister to make a statement which, if he did make it, amazed me. I was listening carefully, but I might have misunderstood him. Did I understand him to say that he did not believe in an arbitrary exemption figure?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I do not recall having said that. If I did, I did not intend to. Perhaps my hon. friend is referring to my statement that I did not think one could solve the problem of tax relief by simply placing—and I may have used the word "arbitrary"—an arbitrary figure, if you place it too high.

Mr. BENTLEY: That explains that. I wish this afternoon to deal with a matter which has not been discussed by other hon. members this afternoon.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to speak about the basic herd, before we leave that phase of the matter.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes; I am quite willing to give place to the minister.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is not referring to the opposition as a basic herd, is he?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I have listened, as a matter of fact, to speeches about basic herds for the past three or four years, but I do not know yet what a basic herd is.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not just about time you found out?

Mr. ABBOTT: And I do not believe anyone else does, really. However, facetiousness aside, hon. members are asking what portion of the sales price of a herd is capital, and what is income. I answered the hon. member for Cariboo a few minutes ago by saying that my view is that the determination of that question is not one which requires legislation, and that the question as to what is capital and what is income in respect of a farmer who sells his herd of cattle is one for administrative determination under the provision of the act as it stands.

I understand that some relief has been afforded in respect of dispersal sales—whatever those may be. Perhaps the term is more or less self-explanatory. However I am informed—and I believe my information is correct—that no amendment to the law is required to enable the Department of National Revenue to determine, in respect of the sale of a herd, what portion of the purchase price is capital and what portion is income. I should think that if a taxpayer feels he is aggrieved by the decision of the taxing authority, he should then lodge an appeal, because it is really a question of fact, pure and simple, and is based upon recognized accounting principles. As I see it, the only way to cure it would be to enact some specific provision of law which would depart from recognized accounting principles.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I should like to say a word or two at this point. I had intended rising before the minister, but I was too slow. The way I see the picture is this. Let us assume there are two men, one of whom bought a half section of land for which, we will say, he paid $2,000. Then his friend bought $2,000 worth of cattle, and grazed them on the first man's half section. The man who bought the cattle works hard and, before the years of heavy income tax, we will say he increased the value of his herd to $5,000, or to the point where he owns $5,000 worth of cattle. In the meantime, the value of the land has increased. These men put up the same amount of money, but one worked hard and the other did no work. The value of the man's land increased to $5,000, representing a capital gain of $3,000, and he pays no tax. The other man, who put up the same amount of money to buy cattle, and who worked hard with the herd, pays on the total increase.

Then the man who did the work becomes ill, or dies, and a sale must be made. In that event the tax is paid on the total increased value of the herd. On the other hand, the man who bought land has to pay nothing at all by way of taxation.

Do not misunderstand me. I realize fully the difficulties which confront one when he attempts to deal with this question. I fully realize that no one should be permitted to buy a couple of cows and let them increase until disposal time without paying any income tax. He has not paid any income tax because, owing to the fact that he has not sold any, he has had no income. Of course, if the minister were a stock man we would know that he would have to get rid of a bull or two, because they have to be changed now and again.

In the hypothetical case I have given, I can see that there might be some evasion; and I do not mean that it would be deliberate. However, there might be some injustice so far as the taxing authority is concerned. But I assure the minister of this, that in that ranching and farming country in which I live this is the greatest source of irritation.

As a suggestion, I do not see why the Department of National Revenue, the collecting department, cannot do something like this. Generally speaking, those men do not keep books. The big fellows do, but the intermediate and smaller men do not. I do not see why it could not be found, as a question of fact, what a man's herd was at a given date To use a word which is disliked, it could be done in an arbitrary fashion. Choose an arbitrary date, and put it on a basis that people can understand.

I should like to say one thing more; and in this instance I have a file from which to get the facts. The same principle is involved. My inquiry comes from a public administrator in the judicial district of Calgary in the province of Alberta. I have had correspondence with Mr. Brown, who is no longer there, and with Mr. McAdams. The correspondence is not complete, because, unfortunately, they lost the file which contained my original correspondence. I am not blaming anybody for that; I have lost files myself. Those things happen.

This man is a public administrator, and in an estate which he administers he has some producers' certificates, which are received from the sale of grain. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will understand that. They are treating those certificates as being both capital and income. I think that should be rectified immediately. What I am referring to is going on at the present time. It may be a mere incident; perhaps there are not many people who die and who have producers' certificates, but the thing is utterly wrong. Will the Minister of National Revenue please not think I am blaming any one in his department for losing a few letters. I am more likely to lose letters than he is.

To come back to this herd business and matters of that kind, these things are not only serious to the individual; they are most irritating, broadly speaking. It seems to me that a great improvement could be made in that subdivision or area of taxation of farmers or cattle raisers.

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister asked for a definition of basic and herd and I should like to give him one as understood by the average farmer. A farmer may have been going on from year to year without being eligible for income tax. He will have built up his herd. Then in 1944 he reaches a point where he is taxable on his income. He has at that time thirty head of cattle, the herd having been built up when he was not taxable. Then in 1946 when he has increased this herd to forty he sells everything. He is then taxable on the whole forty instead of just the ten he has accumulated since becoming eligible for income tax. I think that is the idea which the average farmer has in mind.

The federation of agriculture has a similar idea, but instead of doing it on an individual basis they take the year 1941 as being the year in which a number of farmers came under the income tax and they ask that the year 1941 be used as a basis. The department could use either method, but I think most people would prefer the individual basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am interested in my hon. friend's definition of basic herd. All I can say offhand is that it would change the size of the basic herd with the increased income tax exemption or because of the number of children a man might have.

Mr. BENTLEY: In spite of the minister's last remark, I still agree with those who have spoken. I am in favour of having some basis for establishing basic herds for the taxation of farmers. The other evening the hon. member for Battle River asked some questions and the minister promised to give replies. Before he does so, I should like to say a word or two about one of the things mentioned in the united farmers and the farmers' union brief, so that the minister may make provision for this when he brings in his bill.

It may not seem important to many people when I mention the digging of wells, but I would point out to the minister and to the committee that a well on a farm is of almost paramount importance. In many of the branch offices no allowance is made for deducting the cost of digging a well. Whether that is a principle adopted by the revenue department or whether it is a matter of administration, I do not know. I can quite understand that if a farmer were to dig a well costing $1,000 and got water, he would not be entitled to deduct the total cost of the well but he could depreciate it over a period.

But a farmer who is anxious to obtain water may dig four or five wells costing anywhere from $400 to $1,000 and sometimes $2,000 each, and yet strike no water. Such a man would not have improved his capital position. In fact he has depleted his income and his capital position, and no provision is made for that. That happens quite frequently. When it comes to the matter of exploring for petroleum a different method is used. Petroleum companies are allowed to deduct for income tax purposes a certain percentage of the amounts expended for exploration purposes, and dry wells come under that regulation. I am not complaining about that but I do say that the exploring for petroleum is no more important to those companies or to the people of the country than is the digging for water to a farmer. If it is fair to allow these deductions in connection with petroleum explorations, the same principle should be applied to farmers who are digging wells.

Many other points were mentioned in the brief of the farmers' union and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, but they have been dealt with and I shall confine my presentation to this matter of digging wells which is so important to the farmers of this country.

Mr. REID: While the time may come in the future when every one will fill out his income tax form with a great deal of pleasure, nevertheless the case cited by the hon. member for Calgary West is one of those things that irritate people, and the more irritation and inequality we can remove, the better it will be for all. I rise to mention one matter in connection with people doing work for government departments on behalf of the farmers.

A veterinary surgeon doing work for the Department of Agriculture is allowed nine cents a mile for driving his car. A rate of nine cents is not outrageous for driving through country districts. There is one veterinary in my district who sometimes covers 2,000 miles in a month and he will work six months in the year for the department. When it comes to making out their income tax returns these men are told that they will not be allowed nine cents a mile for expenses, that the allowance will be limited to four and a half cents a mile and that twenty-five per cent will be taken off the luxury driving.

Generally speaking, a man who drives 2,000 miles a month or 18,000 miles in six months on behalf of the Department of Agriculture is not going to do much luxury driving. I just want to draw the minister's attention to this thing which is so irritating. If the Department of Agriculture allows nine cents and that is a fair price—why should the income tax division not also allow nine cents. This thing has been going on for a long time and I am drawing it to the attention of the minister in the hope that it will be corrected.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I add one further word which I think will be helpful. We are really talking about cows. A man will have so much land which will maintain a certain number of cattle, and the number generally remains fairly stationary. If a cow becomes too old, he may sell it but he replaces it with another one. Let us take 1941 as the base period, assuming that that has been fixed. A man has forty cows worth $100 apiece. We will assume that in 1945 he still has forty cows, but they are now worth $150 apiece. We all know that cattle have advanced considerably. By 1945 the man has had a capital gain of fifty per cent.

If I bought land or stocks or shares or some machinery and sell it at an increased price, that is not taxable as income. The farmer with his forty head of cattle who sells them at an increase of fifty per cent, has had a capital gain just as surely as in the case of these other sales. Yet he is assessed with the sale price as income today.

Mr. GILLIS: I would not rise except for a definition which the minister placed upon the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, namely, that of exempting pensions for income tax purposes. In reply to the hon. member, the minister said that these pensions, voluntary or contributory, were somewhat of a gift.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I was referring only to non-contributory pensions.

Mr. GILLIS: One could classify the others as almost seventy-five per cent gift, because they are all three-way pensions. I want to put the minister right at the start. None of these things is a gift, because if one contributes to a pension on a voluntary basis or otherwise, the first charge on his wages in the negotiations is that gift.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree that the word "gift" should be changed.

Mr. GILLIS: He might have been receiving ten per cent or fifteen per cent more in wages were it not for the fact that a retiring allowance was established.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me, the reason I made the remark was that if he had received fifteen per cent extra on wages he would have paid taxes on it.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister might well consider exempting pensions for income tax purposes. If you calculate the amount I believe the government would lose very little money if they did not collect taxes from pensioners. Few pensioners are in the income tax brackets. Nevertheless there are a few, and we hope some time to raise the pensions above the exemption levels. We are trying to take time by the forelock and get ahead of the minister.

There is another pension or retiring allowance which, in my opinion, is treated rather badly. Take a civil servant who has contributed to a superannuation fund for fifteen or twenty years. There were some of them in the service who during the past war joined the armed forces. They withdrew their superannuation allowance in the form of a lump sum, and they were taxed on the lump sum payment, despite the fact that it was paid in over a period of fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that they were taxed only on one-third of the amount.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know; my information is that they were assessed on the whole amount.

Mr. ABBOTT: After the war rates came in, I am informed that they were assessed only on one-third.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister might check that. It was wrong to do it in the way in which it was done. Many of these young fellows came back to the service but could not return to their old positions. They took a lower position, and I believe that the payment should have been considered as a gift; there should have been no assessment against the superannuation. A man builds it up over a period of fifteen or twenty years with the expectation that it will carry him over the lean years of his life. He becomes patriotic and joins the services, offers his life to his country, and what he has built up to care for his old age is taxed. When he comes back he takes a lower position with no expectancy of comfort if and when he reaches the age where that is necessary.

These are the two points that I wish to mention. Because of the small amount of revenue that the department would be losing in taxes, the minister should make an announcement as soon as possible to the effect that in future pensioners of this country will be tax free.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am always tremendously struck with the voluntary assistance I receive in methods of reducing revenue and increasing expenditures, but I get few suggestions for increasing revenue. Of course, as hon. members know, my problem is to make ends meet if possible, so that I cannot—much as my heart is touched by a good many of these appeals—accede to them all.

Mr. KNOWLES: In answering certain arguments put forward by this side of the house, a while ago the minister used the word "phony". I realize that he was in a pleasant mood when he used it and had a smile on his face, but I fear it was—

Mr. ABBOTT: I will substitute the word "fallacious" if my hon. friend would prefer it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will accept the change. In other words, the minister regards as fallacious the arguments which have been made from this side of the house. After all, there was a solid vote on this side of the house on the matter of—

Mr. ABBOTT: As was to be expected.

Mr. KNOWLES: —raising the exemption levels. The minister said that it was the responsibility of the government to be fair to all members of society, and that consideration had to be given to the $3,500 man and the $5,000 man as well as to those in the $1,500 and $2,000 brackets. May I say to the minister that if he thinks there is anything phony and fallacious about the argument from this side of the house, then his argument fails to take into consideration all the facts of the matter. What one has to consider in these matters is not just the amount that is being paid by taxpayers, but the amount that they have left. According to the new rates, after the $2,000 man pays his taxes he will have $1,930 left in 1948; that is in the case of a married man. The $5,000 married taxpayer will have $4,330 left after he pays taxes, and the $200,000 married taxpayer will have $67,507 left. There are all the gradations in between. I suggest that the responsibility of government, yes, is to all its citizens, to the whole community, but its responsibility is greater to those in the lower income brackets than it is to those further up.

The minister just said that it is his problem to try to make ends meet. I suggest that it is also the responsibility of the government to try to help the people to make ends meet. Those who are down in the brackets of $1,500 to $2,000 simply cannot do it, let alone the thousands of people who are even below these levels, and therefore are not liable to pay taxes at all.

It seems to me that in the whole of this discussion about income tax, revenues and expenditures of the government, the government's approach is too much of a business one and not a human one. The government seems to think its job is simply to get such revenues as it can to discharge governmental responsibilities at a minimum. We feel that the budget of a country should be such as to provide for the welfare of all the citizens.

The minister has just said that he gets few suggestions as to how to increase revenue. My desk-mate, the hon. member for Mackenzie, will continue with the reply that I am making to the minister's statement of a while back and offer him a suggestion or two.

Before I take my seat I should like to ask the minister one other question about another subject on which I hope he will make a statement before this item passes. My other question has to do with refundable savings that were taken during certain years of the war. I know the act provides that the first of these savings shall be repaid not later than March 31, 1948, and then there is a sort of revolving-door policy from there on. But it also provides that the governor in council may make payments at an earlier day.

As the minister knows, there are people who, during the war years, were in the income brackets and were paying these refundable savings, who are now in straitened circumstances. A great many feel that some provision should be made to pay these savings back to them now, when they are needed. It would be desirable if the minister could make some statement as to the plans of the government in connection with this matter. Is there any chance of the first payment being made earlier than was anticipated? Also, when payments start, are they to be spread over a period of years, or is there some chance that people in straitened circumstances may be able to get back at once all that is coming to them?

Mr. ABBOTT: At the moment I cannot go farther than I stated before, namely, that, in accordance with the statute, refundable payments due by March 31 next will be paid by that time. This involves the sending out of several hundred thousand cheques and there is much mechanical and administrative work there. What it may be possible to do in future years with respect to accelerating payments, or possibly attempting to do something about payment on a selective basis in cases of hardship, is a question regarding which I cannot make a statement at the moment. There are tremendous difficulties in the way of making a selective refund of these refundable portions. One who reads the mail on it is struck, of course, by cases in which genuine need is demonstrated; but naturally, human nature being what it is, if refunds were made in anticipation on a selective basis, many people would apply who would not, strictly speaking, be entitled to get it, and this would mean that every case would have to be investigated. Briefly, I am not prepared to make a statement as to what the government might be able to do, other than the one I have already given, that this year's contractual obligation will be met, and we shall have to see later whether something can be done.

Mr. KNOWLES: The other matter is still being studied?

Mr. ABBOTT: That and other things like it are being continually studied.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As I followed the minister's remarks, I made a few rapid calculations as the debate proceeded. I anticipated that he would want information to indicate what might be done if the income tax brackets were raised. In answer to a question of mine the other night, the minister intimated that if all income tax payers receiving less than $1,000 for unmarried persons and less than $2,000 for married were exempt, it would mean a loss of revenue of $200 million, and those who are critical of government policy might fairly be expected to make some suggestions.

I think it is a sound principle of taxation that in a country as rich as Canada we should have a minimum below which no citizen should be expected to live. The Minister of Justice sets standards for people in the penitentiaries. It is a credit to Canada that we should provide medical services, dental services, adequate food and heated accommodation for criminals. I suggest that it is equally desirable that all citizens should have a minimum below which they should not have to live, and likewise we should have a maximum so that there would be a ceiling on incomes. I would not expect the Minister of Finance to advance this, but I think all members would agree with me that the Minister of Finance should possibly have one of the highest salaries in the dominion.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perhaps we should say that the highest income should go to the Prime Minister. That would be only fair The one selected by the people to hold the most important position should have the highest income that we are prepared to leave to any one individual. The Minister of Finance is required to perform exacting duties. He has no guarantee of employment for any particular time—

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear. Thank goodness.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think it is hard to understand why the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the cabinet should work as they do on the salaries they receive, while twenty-five persons in the dominion, under the taxation system we now have, will be left $67,000 a year after paying taxes. As I mentioned the other night, in Great Britain this year there are only forty-three persons who are left with $24,000 or more, after paying taxes. I am going to be very generous and suggest that $25,000 should be the maximum that any taxpayer should have left in Canada.

The minister earlier raised objection to arbitrary amounts, but we have arbitrary amounts now. We have arbitrary amounts at which taxation shall begin and abitrary amounts when we say that a married person receiving $2,000 a year will pay so much. But these other persons I have mentioned still have left, after paying their taxes, $67,000. On the basis of having 650 persons in Canada receiving $50,000 a year or more—the department will not break down the 650; the Minister of Agriculture gave some help, but let us assume that the 650 are divided as I shall suggest—there are twenty-five of them who receive $200,000, 100 who receive $100,000, 200 who receive $75,000 and 325 who receive $50,000. If you were to tax everything above $25,000 for those 650 persons you would have an additional revenue of $19,728,000, according to my rapid calculations.

Mr. ABBOTT: You soon would not have people earning that income.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I submit that if there are persons—

Mr. ABBOTT: You would get them one year and that is all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —who are now taxed as soon as they reach $1,500, having to pay rent and keep their families, there is something radically wrong if others cannot get by on $25,000 a year. I submit that it would be a fairly easy matter and a thoroughly sound proposition to go through the upper brackets and take an additional $200,000 a year from those who can well afford it and who would still have left, after paying taxes, more than what might be regarded as a reasonable amount. They would have the assurance of good housing, adequate food, and so on and they could make provision for old age.

While we cannot expect the minister to meet our position this year, I assure him that he will have a constant barrage from this side so long as there are taxpayers left with $67,000 a year or more, after they have paid income tax.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not propose to make an extended comment on the remarks that have been made. It is an old and familiar argument—"soak the rich". That is what it is, and I do not object too strenuously to appropriate taxes on men of wealth. I think our income tax scale is a pretty steeply progressive one when you take eighty cents on the top dollar. But no matter how hard you try to soak the rich in this country, or in any other country, you cannot get sufficient revenues from that group, because there are not enough of them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You get $19 million odd.

Mr. ABBOTT: I make that statement without fear of contradiction. If you want $90 million or $100 million from that group you cannot get it. That is the fact. My hon. friends can urge that argument as long as they like, but it will not work. I interjected, when the hon. member was speaking, that you would not long have people earning that income in any event.

An hon. MEMBER: It is unearned income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Moreover, we live alongside a country which is large and powerful and, as I have said before and repeat now, we cannot insulate ourselves completely from conditions as they exist in that country. I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable to maintain a certain minimum standard of living in this or any other country, but that depends on the level of production in the country, and you cannot legislate for any standard of living. People have to work and produce. You can, it is true, assist in the standard of living by sound fiscal measures, by not imposing a tax structure which deters production, which prevents the undue increase of wealth. That is perfectly true. But you cannot raise the standard of living in this or any other country by a purely "soak the rich" tax policy—

Mr. LOW: Hear, hear.

Mr. ABBOTT: —or talking about a minimum standard of living.

Mr. KNOWLES: But you can, by positive steps taken by the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, that may be true. But they are not in my judgment the positive steps suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: Before the resolution carries, there is one point I should like to place before the Minister of Finance with regard to income taxation. The war has now been over for nearly two years, and I think most Canadians are getting pretty well settled down to normal peacetime living. One of their big problems is that of planning their lives; including of course, their financial affairs; and the government—quite rightly, we in the official opposition believe—is relying on the individual Canadian to do just that—to plan his own affairs, to stand on his own feet. By having as many as possible of our people doing that, we believe we can have the strongest nation. But one important factor to be remembered is that in a plan of that type you must tell the people the facts. They must be given all the information available.

I suggest to the minister that the Canadian people should be given, at as early a day as possible, an approximate idea of the ultimate level of income taxation. The Department of Finance must have some thoughts as to what proportion of our taxation can be raised by the income tax and what percentage of a person's income should be taken from him in that way. Under the proposals of this year, the tax on the first $100 of taxable income is 10 per cent, as hon. members know; on the second $100 it is 12 per cent; on the third, 14 per cent; on the next $100, 16 per cent, and on the next, 18 per cent. Then for taxable income from $500 to $3,500 it is 20 per cent. That is really the rate that applies to the largest group of income taxpayers and I use it to illustrate my submission. Are we to be able to go below that rate? The minister, when he made his budget speech, said at page 2553 of Hansard:

> Had our taxes been raised gradually and under normal conditions to their present levels, had they been increased for the productive, peace-time purposes of national development and social security rather than for the unproductive purposes of war, then the present levels might perhaps have been acceptable and tolerable as continuing levels.

He went on to say that such, of course, was not the case, and I quote:

> Instead, however, they represent a position to which we have returned after a sudden and unpleasant excursion into painful war-time levels of income tax, and people are still smarting . . . from their war-time experience . . .

Then he uses these significant words:

> . . . one must reach the conclusion that those who must bear them—

That is, the income taxes.

> —are not ready to support income taxes on the present scale. In fact, I am sure that were our present levels of personal income tax to be continued, they would constitute a serious impediment to a full working effort and a brake upon the drive and initiative of men and women in all groups and classes.

A reduction has been made, and the minister said with regard to that reduction, at page 2555 of Hansard:

> I believe that the verdict of all responsible persons will be that we have gone as far as we can possibly afford to go under the present circumstances.

I think the people of the country still feel that the income tax is too heavy. I do not believe they are prepared to go on paying rates, for example, of 20 per cent in the income range to which I referred a few minutes ago. They feel that they are being heavily shackled even yet by the income taxation. I would ask the minister to let us know, if he can, what the Department of Finance consider to be the normal level for the income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I make no claim to being a prophet, as my hon. friend will appreciate. I assume that the Canadian people must continue to pay their bills, and the amount of tax which will have to be raised will depend upon the amount of expenditures and the amount of government services which the people of Canada, through their elected representatives, demand. I made reference to that in my budget speech. I pointed out that I get continual demands from hon. gentlemen opposite—and sometimes from my own party—for additional expenditures, but I never get any suggestions for reduced expenditures. The reductions in income tax which were made this year, as I said in my budget speech, were as much as I felt I could responsibly recommend with the commitments which Canada has to meet this year. It is true that a great many of those commitments are, I hope, of a temporary nature; and I refer particularly, of course, to the benefits for veterans and so on. But it is difficult to estimate with complete accuracy just what amount those will run to this year. I think the committee will find, when the supplementary estimates are brought in, that in that field as well there will be substantial additional amounts which will have to be provided for. With all these uncertain factors, I am not in a position to say today what I think the income tax scales may be next year or the year after. That, in my judgment, is something which has to be determined each year as we go along; and it will be determined by the demands made by the Canadian people for additional government services of one sort or another. It will depend on the extent to which this or any subsequent government is able to reduce government expenditure but without impairing the essential government services which the people of Canada, through their elected representatives in this house, demand. That is the only answer I can give to my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has hardly answered my question.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member has asked me to assume the role of a prophet.

Mr. GREEN: No, I did not ask the minister to assume the role of a prophet. He is the last one I would ask to do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: What does that mean?

Mr. GREEN: What I had in mind was this. Are the department not working toward some goal of a normal income tax? There must be some opinion as to approximately what the normal income tax rate should be in peace time in Canada. If the department have not formed some opinion on that; if they are working in the dark, then, of course, I cannot get any answer to my question. But I point out to the minister that while he emphasizes the people's demands for expenditures, in the final analysis the government of Canada must decide what the expenditures are to be.

Mr. ABBOTT: This house decides.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, well, the government decides; and the government must also decide what the tax is to be.

Mr. ABBOTT: This house decides. The people's elected representatives decide, and the demands for new services are the final determining factor.

Mr. GREEN: No. The government has to have the backbone to decide what is to be spent and what is not to be spent. All I am asking is whether the Department of Finance is working toward any target for the normal income tax in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am now going to answer for myself as Minister of Finance, because it is the minister, in the final analysis, who determines what the tax policy is; and that is as it should be. He is the one who comes before this house and makes tax recommendations and makes recommendations as to the proportion of the total tax load which will be raised by direct taxation—that is, by income tax on individuals or business concerns—and what will be raised by indirect taxes. I have certain personal views as to what is a fair proportion between the two. Personally, I should like to see the indirect tax burden reduced as much as possible because, broadly speaking, I feel that it is less fair than direct taxation. The proportion I have struck this year is the best I have been able to arrive at, as I have said to the committee before. I am not going to make any predictions as to what may be the situation next year; for all I know I may not be minister, probably will not be. This is not something on which I think one should try to make a long-range forecast. Today we estimate that the new income tax structure in a full year will raise something in the order of $425,000,000. My hon. friend can calculate as well as I can what proportion of the total budget is taken from personal income taxes. Then there is a further very substantial portion taken from income taxes on corporations and business concerns. I do not intend to make any predictions. I have views of my own, but I do not think this is the time to voice them. I can assure my hon. friend that the Department of Finance is not working in the dark, and I hope I am not working in the dark.

Mr. GREEN: Then I am afraid there is not likely to be much reduction in the income tax.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no wish to come to the minister's defence. I like him as an individual, but I do not like his economic and social outlook. However, I think he is working in the dark, and as a matter of fact I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South is working in the dark also.

Mr. GREEN: But not as dark as the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. HACKETT: Is he in the light?

Mr. MacINNIS: We shall see about that by and by. Here are people talking about long-term policies, who have washed their hands completely—until yesterday, when we were talking about housing—of directing the economic production of this country. They say production is something with which the government should not be concerned. The production of the country is the wealth out of which the people obtain their living; and that wealth is produced socially. Some get more and some get less of the total produced wealth. Income and other taxes are used to even out the distribution of the national income to some extent. A moment ago, replying to an hon. member over here, the Minister of Finance said the slogan of the C.C.F. was the old slogan of "soak the rich." The only difference between our slogan and his is that his slogan is "soak the poor."

Mr. ABBOTT: That is an easy generality. It is not soaking the poor, and my hon. friend knows better.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a moment, now. When someone hits at my hon. friend he does not like it, but he was hitting at us and we have every right to hit back. He says our slogan is to "soak the rich", and I say he is soaking the poor.

Mr. ABBOTT: I say, don't soak anybody; be fair.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right; now we can agree. Some people are definitely getting soaked, because the minister himself has said that more than one-half of the income earners of this country were receiving incomes below the present level of income tax exemptions. I tell you these people are being soaked, I do not care who is doing it; and because they are being soaked we have to provide various ways of helping them. I am always surprised —that is not correct; I am not surprised, but I wonder at it—when hon. friends to my right ask for a reduction in taxes and then for increases in government services.

Let us look at some of the things we are asking for at the present time, at this present session of parliament. We are asking for better old age pensions. If we are to have better old age pensions the funds to provide them will have to come out of the income of the country, out of the national income. Since we cannot possibly take it out of the people who are already below the income tax exemption levels, it has to come from the incomes of those above the exemption levels. Yesterday we asked for subsidized housing. It is realized that those receiving incomes less than the exemption levels cannot provide themselves with decent housing. If we are to subsidize housing the funds must be provided through taxation. Then we want better health services. If anyone comes along and says we should have better health services, everyone is agreed. Those who are receiving sufficient income to pay for health services can provide their own, but the more than one-half our population whose incomes are below the income tax exemption levels cannot provide health services for themselves. Consequently, if we are to give better health services that means further expenditures the dominion government has to take on, and it has to come out of taxes. Then several proposals were made that we should make grants in regard to education. I am not trying to be exhaustive in this list; I am just mentioning a few of these things. So, if we are to do all these things, is there any possibility of doing them and at the same time either reducing or stabilizing taxes?

I think we should be discussing how to increase the total income, the total produced wealth of the country. That is what we should be concerning ourselves with: more houses, more schools, more machines, more factories, more roads, more transportation. That is the wealth out of which comes the income of our country, which provides the people with their livelihood. The position we are in at the present time is that employers of labour, industrialists, commercial people, financiers, are frightened to death that they may expand their production capacity beyond what can be consumed under our present profit system. On the other hand, the working people are afraid that if they work too hard they will produce too much so that factories will close and there will be unemployment. That is the position in Canada today; that is the position across the line today. Until we assure people that the more they produce, the better off they will be, the happier they will be, the more prosperous they will be, we shall not get anywhere; and we cannot assure our people as long as we leave the production of wealth in the hands of people who are operating industry, not because they are interested in the things produced, but because they are interested in the profit made in the process of production.

I do not suppose there is any use in urging the minister to raise exemption levels, but I do not believe any hon. member will say that a single man can live decently on less than $1,000 a year and prepare himself for the future. If he is an ordinary single man he is only single until he can get himself a better position so that he can marry and bring up a family. Would anyone say today that a married man who is receiving less than $2,000 a year can bring up a family decently, provide them with the healthful living, give them an education which will afford them an opportunity to succeed in the community? No, no one would say that. Then, if we cannot say that, where is the logic in taxing people with incomes of only $750 for a single person and $1,500 for a married person? What is the basis for it? The basis, so far as I can see, is that if the government do not tax these low incomes they will have to take more from the people who get more. So that, in order that they will not have to take more from the people who get more, they gouge more out of the people who already get less than what is needed for a decent living.

Mr. KUHL: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how far I would be in order if I were to discuss at this stage of the proceedings the fundamental principles of economics. But I am very much intrigued by some of the arguments which have been made. So far as having light, or being in the dark is concerned, I beg to suggest that I think all three

hon. members who have spoken are in the dark. Of course everyone who speaks thinks he is in the light, and everyone else is in the dark.

Mr. HANSELL: Let the blessed sunshine in.

Mr. KUHL: All we can do is to continue working, and to have the best man win.

Mr. KNIGHT: You are away above the clouds.

Mr. KUHL: At least I have that advantage.

An hon. MEMBER: He has his feet on the ground, though.

Mr. HANSELL: He is closer to the sun.

Mr. KUHL: We seem to have come to this position, where the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Vancouver South have ended at a point where the only source of money they can see today is that which comes from the taxes they can extract from the people of Canada. That seems to be the only source of funds they can see.

For the last ten years or more we in this corner of the house, without contradiction or refutation by any hon. member, have stated that when a government takes upon itself the power of taxation, or when anyone advocates a policy of taxation to divert part of the national production of the public service, it is not distributing the whole of national production by doing so. In other words I mean that the government assumes, as a fundamental basis, that money and goods are always one and the same thing, and that therefore the only means whereby one can divert part of the national service is to tax somebody, whether it be the poor or the rich, or all of them.

We have challenged that premise again and again, and I do so now. I suggest to the minister that it is possible to reduce taxation and to increase services. Perhaps that sounds like an impossibility, and of course it is impossible under the orthodox policy of finance. But I suggest that there is a policy whereby services can be increased and taxation reduced.

Mr. ABBOTT: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend prefaced his remarks by saying that he did not think he was in order, and I must say I do not think he is.

Mr. HANSELL: He wondered whether the previous speaker was.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not interrupt, because it arose out of my attempt to answer earlier this afternoon the argument that the income tax exemptions were too low. That, admittedly, was relevant to a section which deals with rates of personal income tax. However I had hoped that the committee would not go too far afield, in discussing economic questions. I was drawn into it by being asked to make a forecast on tax policy, which I was not prepared to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was the word "phony" that started it.

Mr. KUHL: I do not intend to pursue it farther, but I did think the point should be made, inasmuch as others had represented their views.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is why I did not interrupt my hon. friend. I thought he was stating his point, and I was content to wait until he had finished.

Mr. KUHL: But I do wish to agree with those who suggest that there should be a basic minimum standard of living below which there should be no tax levies. It may be a matter of opinion as to what that basic minimum should be; but, as I said in my budget speech, I felt that at least every family of four should enjoy a tax-free income of $4,000. The Minister of Finance stated that the standard of living was limited only by the production of the country. Well, we have always ranted and raved about this being one of the richest countries in the world. If that is actually so, I cannot see why every family of four should not be more than able to enjoy an income of $4,000 or thereabouts, tax-free. Certainly this country is capable of producing that amount of goods and services.

So far as taxes are concerned, I have already said that can be taken care of in another way. I suggest again that it is possible to increase public services and, at the same time, to reduce taxation. The present economy is based upon the false premise that money equals goods. I suggest that it does not. Therefore it is legitimate for the government, through its own financial institution, to finance a great deal of government services of its own creation, and to issue its own money. To the extent that that can be done, taxation can be avoided.

I suggest that the government would do well to explore the limits of this field, because it will not be long before it will be up against it, so far as finances are concerned. There is no other way I can see than that of accepting some of the suggestions which have originated in this corner of the house.

Mr. LOW: I think the minister pointed out that he expected on the new level of income tax rates the income tax would yield, for a full year, something over $400 million.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was the estimate I gave, yes.

Mr. LOW: Is that not about equal to the amount of money the government is paying each year by way of interest on its national debt?

Mr. ABBOTT: A little less, I should think.

Mr. LOW: I am not going to take time now, but I suggest that the minister should look into the proposition we have offered time and again. If he were to do so he could save the major portion of the interest he is now paying out on the national debt; if he will just approach public financing with a little new vision, which I am sure he will have after he has been here for a year or two. But he will not have it after he has been here for five or six years, because by that time ideas crystallize along the old orthodox lines.

I suggest that he look into what we have offered, because I am satisfied that if he approaches financing this Canada by the use of national money through the Bank of Canada we have here, he can apply most, if not all of that $400 million of interest he is paying on a huge national debt, to a reduction of income tax, and he will not have to soak anyone on any level of taxation.

I would point out to him that when he begins relieving the burden of income tax of the people of this country he will find that, rich and poor alike, they will give him a lot more production. This country is today labouring under a heavy load of taxation. I have on my file dozens of letters from farmers who say, "If you will just get us a decent reduction of income tax we will produce hogs for you to fill your quotas; we will produce wheat, and other things you require". I believe if the minister will look into this process of using national money and getting that debt paid off, as he can get it paid off, and have the use of the interest, which is now being paid over to coupon clippers, for the reduction of taxes, he will be surprised at what this country will do.

Mrs. STRUM: I want to take this opportunity to urge the minister to include the cost of drugs as a medical exemption. Medication is becoming increasingly important in the treatment of disease, and almost every week we are introduced to some new costly and expensive drug which is capable of saving life. In its income tax exemptions the government assumes that an individual can carry four per cent of the cost of medical care in certain categories without an income tax exemption, and then the exemption applies to anything over four per cent. A man earning $2,000 is assumed to be able to carry $80 of medical expenses without exemption. On a $200 hospital bill he would have an exemption of $120. But that just includes the cost of the doctor, the nurse and the hospital. He may have expenses for X-rays and—

Mr. ABBOTT: X-rays are covered.

Mrs. STRUM: I am glad to hear they are, but there are many other incidental costs that are not listed. I have a letter from a person who tells me that he has to buy a very expensive drug for his wife. Surgery may occur only once in a lifetime, in an emergency, but drugs such as are mentioned by this man are taken day after day as long as life lasts. In his case it takes twenty-eight per cent of his earnings.

Mr. McCANN: What is it?

Mrs. STRUM: Prostigmine. It is a new drug used for intestinal activation; it is not yet in the dictionaries. I should like the minister to give consideration to including these drugs which are essential to life. I do not think we need to worry that people will include tooth paste and lysol and a lot of things as drugs. I think they could be prescribed by doctors and a listing obtained in the same way that hospital bills and surgery costs are listed. The cost of these things is a heavy burden and handicap on many people, and I should like the minister to give consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the resolution carries, I think there are some matters which it would be well to mention for the welfare of our C.C.F. friends and I do it in an absolutely kindly way. They do a lot of talking about things about which they know too little. I should like to refer first to the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie. We are in an age of very dangerous thinking. There is a tendency in Great Britain and other places to fall off in production. People there seem to be at their wits' ends to know how to get production in coal and other things which they used to be able to get. There is a reason for all that. Somehow motivation has been destroyed in those countries.

Surely intelligent people in Canada—and Canadians are intelligent—do not want to run into such difficulties. May I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie. There comes to my mind a story of the time when the bolsheviks first took over Russia. They went into a certain city, and in a factory there they found a man who was employed at $20,000 a year. They took that man out and liquidated him because he was getting too much money.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to try to deal with the section under consideration, section 3.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not understand why you did not call the hon. member for Mackenzie to order when he was talking as he was. Surely, if a man makes a remark in this chamber we should be permitted to level out matters in some way. I have noticed how one man will be able to present an argument without fault being found and then, when some one else tries to answer it, he is called to order.

I just want to say one thing with regard to this. That man who was getting $20,000 was liquidated, but the next year they were advertising in the markets of Europe for a man at $200.000 to take his place.

There is one thing our C.C.F. friends do not seem to be able to get through their minds. If a nation needs high class men in high places in production it must be ready to motivate those men; otherwise, as the minister says, it will not be very long until they will have no men like that, and will not have the incomes to tax.

I should like to make just one remark with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East. His remarks were excellent right up to a point, and then he advocated that if the government took over production we would solve the problems of money and distribution. The hon. member would have to make half a dozen long speeches in order to support that stand. Let us take the railroad situation as an example. Has the taking over of the Canadian National Railways by the government added to the money available in the hands of the people to increase their purchasing power? Would the taking over of the coal industry in Canada add to the purchasing power in the hands of the people?

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member is asking if the taking over of the Canadian National Railways added anything to the amount of money in Canada with which to run the railroad. I do not suppose it did, but I want to tell the hon. member that by taking over the Canadian National we have in Canada a railway system which we would not have had if the government had not taken it over.

Mr. HACKETT: That is real wealth.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just the kind of thing I had hoped the hon. member for Vancouver East would say. Just two or three minutes before, he was pointing out the fact that the producers in Canada and United States were in desperate alarm lest they have too much production. Those producers are private owners! How can the hon. member get any sense out of his stand?

We can get the production we need in Canada if we only motivate private producers. What we need is a financial system able to distribute our production at fair prices.

Resolution 3 agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we had passed resolution 3. We are now dealing with resolution 4.

4. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the deduction from income of an individual allowed in respect of persons supported by or dependent on him be allowed without regard to the country of residence of such persons.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better make the usual explanation. The present law does not allow a man to claim an exemption for his wife unless she is resident "in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in a country contiguous to Canada, or, residing elsewhere, was a subject or citizen of a country associated or allied with Canada in the conduct of the war that commenced in September, 1939, and was prevented by reason of such war, or prohibited by law, from entering or landing in Canada."

It is believed that a married resident of Canada should be allowed this status for tax purposes, regardless of where his wife resides, if he can properly establish the fact that he is supporting her. The same rule will apply with respect to children and other dependents.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the provisions allowing deductions from tax to taxpayers engaged in

(a) exploring and drilling for natural gas or oil,

(b) the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products, or

(c) mining or exploring for minerals, the effect of which is equivalent to a deduction from income of the whole of certain expenses in respect of 1947 operations, be amended to provide that such expenses in respect of 1948 operations may be deducted from income and that, in the case of such expenses in respect of 1948 operations in respect of deep test oil wells an additional deduction from tax be allowed of an amount that, together with the deductions from income, will correspond to the deduction from tax allowed in respect of 1947 operations and that the amended provisons relating to expenditures on deep test oil wells apply in respect of the 1947 and 1948 taxation years to expenditures on groups of wells drilled to locate stratigraphic traps.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall give a brief explanation. Then I expect that some hon members will have some questions to ask. The general purpose of this resolution is to extend, for the calendar year 1948, the wartime tax concessions allowed to oil, gas and mining operators. The special provision relating to deep-test oil wells has been broadened slightly to allow these benefits to those who will undertake extensive expenditure to locate stratigraphic traps. Hon. members who are experts in the field of geology will understand what this means.

The form in which these tax concessions will be given for 1948 will be changed as a result of the absence of the excess profits tax. In future the expenditure will be allowed as a write-off out of income rather than in the form of a tax credit appropriate to the prevailing tax rate. It is necessary, however, to continue a tax credit for deep-test wells over and above the write-off provision.

Mr. MERRITT: On this resolution I wish to refer to the repeal last year of section 8, subsection 5 of the Income War Tax Act, which allowed a deduction from tax of forty per cent of the contributions to prospecting syndicates prospecting for base metals and strategic minerals. As I say, that subsection was repealed last year. I wish to urge the minister to restore the provision and expand it. I suggest to him particularly that he expand its scope from base metals and strategic minerals to include all minerals and metals and more particularly gold. Second, I suggest to him that when he restores it he should remove the limitation of the section in two other ways. At the present time it is limited to partnerships. An individual grubstaking a prospector cannot take advantage of the provision which was in the act. There was also a limitation of $500 on the contribution which could be made to any one prospecting syndicate.

The minister and the committee know more than I of the value to the Canadian economy in having a high production of gold. He knows the difficulty under which the gold mining industry is suffering at present. Just recently the government announced an immigration policy, which, if it is to have any practical effect in line with the promises which it contained, will require a tremendous development to the north of our settled areas. Any such development would have to be primarily based upon the development of mines in the area. Once the mines are established, the other settlements that follow come in.

One of the great advantages of the restoration of this section would be that it would popularize our mining industry among individuals who are not engaged solely in the business of mining. At present a mining company gets, under the resolution the minister is proposing, some tax concession for exploration expenses, but those engaged in the industry are not so greatly in need of concessions to interest them in it as are individuals, businessmen, doctors, lawyers and private citizens who might, as a side issue, wish to offer help in the grubstaking of miners.

Briefly I should like to refer the minister to an article that appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of May 17, 1947, by Averell Harriman, Secretary of Commerce of the United States. He points this out in a long article which has an arresting title, and one which I think will hearten everyone in the house on another subject. Speaking to his own people in the United States, he heads the article, "We must import to live." He goes on to cite many examples of shortages in important industrial metals which have arisen in the United States owing to the tremendous drain they have put upon them. He says that the United States have to look outside their own boundaries for the supply of metals and minerals. If there is anything in what the Secretary of Commerce of the United States says, there should be a great future for new development of our mining industry in Canada if only to supply the increased market that he foresees by reason of their becoming a "have-not" nation in respect of minerals, instead of a "have" nation as they have been up to the present time. These reasons will commend themselves to the minister, and I am sure he knows them now. I just mention them in passing.

I want to turn to a particular reason I am suggesting why this provision, which stood for several years during the war, should be reintroduced. I have had correspondence from the British Columbia and Yukon Chamber of Mines, from the manager of the organization, Mr. Woodside, who is a man of more than fifty years' experience in mining in Canada and who has for the past twenty-nine years conducted a prospectors school in the winter in Vancouver. The number in the last class this winter was 150. I should think his opinion would be a valued one as to conditions in British Columbia. He says that this provision, to his personal knowledge, during the war was particularly useful in stimulating the contribution of money for grubstaking prospectors in British Columbia. He also says that it has been more useful in British Columbia, perhaps, than in other parts of Canada for two important reasons. First of all, the cost of prospecting in British Columbia is very high because of the difficult terrain and the difficult transportation conditions. I have three examples which may be of interest to the minister. In one area one prospector went out this year and his grubstake was $2,000. In another area not far away on the map two required $6,000 for their season's financing.

In the Yukon, which is, of course, just north of British Columbia, another party of two needed $16,000 for the supply of equipment and other expenses before they were able to go into the field. I understand that these conditions do not obtain to the same extent in eastern Canada. Second, prospecting in British Columbia is not done primarily by mining companies which already are provided for in the present regulations. In British Columbia, perhaps because we have not as big a money market as there is in Toronto, more than half the prospecting is done by individual prospectors who have to raise their own money and are not on salary from mining companies. That is another reason why this provision was particularly useful out in the west. I suggest to the minister that what is being done for an incorporated company might well be done for the partnership or individual who grubstakes a prospector in Canada and my specific suggestions to him are these:

1. That he restore the principle of the old section.

2. That he extend it to all mines and metals, including gold, and not restrict it, as it was during the war, to base metals and strategic minerals.

3. That he include not only partnerships but individuals who may grubstake prospectors by themselves. I do not see any tremendous difference between three or four men doing it and one man doing it.

4. That he raise the limit of the contribution for any single operation. It was, as I understand, a total of $5,000, with a limit of $500 on any individual contribution, and I suggest that perhaps he keep the limit of $5,000 and raise the $500 limit. I will not name the figure because I am not as competent as the officials to judge in that regard.

5. I suggest, finally, that he give consideration to helping the prospector who grubstakes himself by working in the winter in the mines or in some industrial employment in Vancouver, using the money he earns in the winter to go into the field during the summer.

I am aware of some administrative difficulties that would arise in the latter case, but very likely a scheme could be worked out if the principle were established.

Mr. ABBOTT: This exemption was a most unusual and exceptional one which was allowed during war time to stimulate the search for strategic minerals. At the time it was put in it was asserted that prospectors might not be willing to go out and search for this particular type of mineral unless they were financed, and I suppose that is natural. The provision was put in the law, therefore, whereby an individual who contributed to one of these prospecting associations, syndicates or mining partnerships, registered or otherwise recognized under the laws of any province or territory of Canada, organized for the purpose of prospecting for minerals, could deduct his contribution from his taxable income in the same way as he could deduct a contribution made to a hospital or a charitable organization. I am informed that it actually took the form of a tax credit. That was an exceptional provision, and it was felt that it was not one that should be retained in the permanent tax structure. I have voiced the view in this house on other occasions that I had serious doubts myself as to the wisdom of this particular form of tax concession. I thought it was so exceptional that it should not be maintained longer than the period for which it had been put in, namely the war, and it was dropped at the end of 1945. I am sure I would not feel justified in reinstating it at this time. Any encouragement that may be needed for prospecting for minerals, whether base metals or gold mining, should be given in some other form than this special form of tax credit or deduction.

Mr. GREEN: What form of assistance is there?

Mr. ABBOTT: I should think the ordinary incentive that exists in the case of any other businessman who goes out and looks for something he thinks is profitable. Frankly, I have a constitutional objection to setting up special classes of tax exemptions, and this is one that did not apply to any special type of enterprise. It was put in because it was asserted during the war that perhaps prospectors would not look for these minerals, which were badly needed, unless there was this inducement to investors to grubstake them. I think the investor who is now prepared to grubstake a prospector must accept the same tax position as any other investor.

Mr. MERRITT: I tried to anticipate the minister's known feelings on both these points. First of all, I did try to indicate that there was perhaps some continuing need in Canada on other than war grounds for stimulating the interest of the people generally in prospecting, and for seeing to it that prospectors did get out. Second, I knew his often expressed view that there should be as few exceptions from a tax as possible. I am not asking the minister to make any exception from the tax or to allow any tax credit which he is not already allowing under clause 5, as I understand it. If a company can get some relief because it is in the mining business—and I thoroughly approve that—I see no reason why an individual or partnership should not have, not greater, but similar relief. I do not ask that it be in the form of a tax credit, for instance.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but it is the business of the mining company to search for minerals and get them. The tax relief here is to you or me or any other citizen who may want to take a chance and invest a few hundred dollars in a prospecting syndicate. I have voiced the view before—and I still hold it—that this particular tax concession lent itself to the sale of stock in those prospecting syndicates about as much as it did to giving persons an incentive to go out and look for the minerals. It is completely different from the tax concessions given mining companies and oil companies actually engaged in the business of searching for and producing minerals. This is a concession that was given to anyone who wanted to put up a few dollars in a prospecting syndicate, which might be nothing but a syndicate organized by a stock promoter to go out and pound a few rocks or cut a few trails to see if he could find minerals. Probably it was justified in war time, but I have held the view very strongly—and I still hold it—that it is not the type of concession that can be justified in peace time under normal conditions. It was dropped at the end of 1945 and I do not think it should be continued.

Mr. MERRITT: One more word, then. There is no reason that I can see why the principle to which the minister has referred should be so rigidly applied as to stop one class of persons engaged in mining from enjoying the same benefits as another class.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not.

Mr. MERRITT: The mere fact that it is the business of the mining company engaged in exploration—it is their principal business—cannot be of as much importance as the need which I think exists, and of which I do not think there is any doubt, what we should promote the development of one of our chief natural resources. When the minister talks about administrative difficulties in working out one of these provisions, I must say I am not at all impressed. For instance, there are, I understand, provisions in the mining legislation for the issuance of prospectors identification cards. There are many ways, I feel sure, in which anyone who had adopted the principle could get over any of the administrative difficulties which surround it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not pleading administrative difficulties at all. I say that the concession is objectionable on other grounds.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister referred to the possibility that the provision might be used to promote the sale of shares in a syndicate rather than to do prospecting.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it could be.

Mr. MERRITT: I call that an administrative difficulty, and one which the minister could get around.

Mr. ABBOTT: Any mining syndicate or exploration syndicate which is registered as such can go out, sell stock and get contributions from individuals. If it does that, those individuals in a mining syndicate or in an exploration syndicate can claim tax credit on their personal income tax. That mining and exploration syndicate may not be so much interested in finding minerals as it is in selling stock. It might perfectly legally set itself up as an exploration syndicate and send some prospectors out into the bush to look for minerals, but its main purpose may very well be to sell stock to the public; and the public, with the inducement of getting something off their personal income tax, will buy the stock. There is no way in which the Department of National Revenue can check on an enterprise of that kind. I know that. I again repeat that I think this special and unusual type of incentive tax concession is not justified under peacetime conditions.

Mr. LITTLE: I should like to correct one statement which the Minister of Finance made with regard to mining companies going out and getting these claims. In my experience—and I have been in the north for a long time—you would not have had any mines at all if it had been left to the mining companies to stake these mines. It has been the prospectors and syndicates such as those which the hon. member spoke about, that found those mines in the early days.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say the mining companies were sending them out. My hon.

friend was raising the question whether they should get some tax concession. I do not want it to be understood for one moment that I am casting any reflection on the value or utility of the mining prospector. I agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming that, without these prospectors who go into the bush and find the mines, we would not have any mines. The only point I am making is that in peace time a man who is not a mining prospector should not get any special tax concession for grubstaking. That is my only point.

Mr. LENNARD: I merely rise to support the hon. member who has just spoken. I may say that he has taken the words out of my mouth. I am not interested in syndicates, but I am interested in the old-time prospector who went out and gave everything he had. I might remind the minister that, of the older, successful mines in Canada, I will guarantee that everyone was found by one of the honest-to-goodness prospectors who was grubstaked.

Mr. ABBOTT: But the honest-to-goodness individual prospector got no benefit out of this particular thing.

Mr. LENNARD: He should get everything there is to get.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LENNARD: Somebody said "carried." This session I have not taken up more than five minutes of the time of the house, and by those people to the left of me who said "carried" I want it to be understood that I do not talk by the hour; when I have something to say it takes me only one or two minutes to say it.

An hon. MEMBER: You have not said anything yet.

Mr. LENNARD: One more thing I should like to remind the minister of is that some of these small prospectors must receive some encouragement, because today they are not going into the bush in our northern country. Something must be done to encourage that individual effort which is necessary to make our mining industry the success it should be.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister given consideration to making that help available in the case of an individual prospector rather than a prospecting syndicate? Would that not get around the difficulty he mentioned of a possible sale of stock?

There is one other point. In British Columbia, at least, the provincial mines department officials, gold commissioners and mining recorders across the province are in a position to check carefully on any of these prospectors. It would be a simple matter to prevent any money from being taken for the wrong purpose. I feel confident that, in that province—and probably in Ontario and any other provinces where there is extensive mining development—great help can be obtained from the provincial department in carrying out some such provision. It is really tragic that there are so few men going into the hills to prospect. These metals are of the utmost value to Canada, particularly with our trade situation, in so far as the United States is concerned, in such a serious position. I hope the minister will not just say "no" tonight without giving the matter further consideration. He can say "no" when the bill comes down, but tonight he said "no" at once without hearing the case; and I think there was a good case here for consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me answer that right now. I am not saying "no" without consideration. In the first place, this tax credit is not now in force. It lapsed over a year ago. That is the position. I am not proposing to reintroduce it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has brought forward the suggestion that a tax which was in force during the war be now reinstated.

Mr. GREEN: Not a tax; a concession.

Mr. ABBOTT: That a tax concession which was given during the war be now reinstated. I have given reasons why I do not think we are justified in doing that. There is a good deal of confused thinking about the type of concession which is being sought. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggests that we consider giving this to the individual prospector.

Mr. GREEN: I said in the case of the individual prospector doing prospecting rather than a syndicate.

Mr. ABBOTT: All right. I want to deal with that. Let us see how we would give it to the individual prospector. The individual prospector is not taxed on his findings.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say to give it to him. I said to the person who grubstakes the individual prospector.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was the old system. That is exactly the old system which was in force for three or four years.

Mr. GREEN: You gave it to the syndicate.

Mr. ABBOTT: We gave it to the syndicate. And I explained at length either two or three years ago why we felt it was not practical, desirable or fair to give it to the individual prospector. I do not like to use the words "administrative difficulties", but there are serious administrative difficulties and there is a serious danger of fraud and evasion if you are dealing with large numbers of individuals. The question of this tax concession to a prospecting syndicate was discussed at some length in the house every time the tax concession came up for renewal, because it was a concession which was renewed every year. As I say, it was allowed to lapse at the end of the 1945 period. I tried to show why I think it is not a special tax concession which should form part of our permanent tax structure. Nothing which has been put forward here tonight has caused me to change my views. This is not a new thing to me. I considered this year after year when I was parliamentary assistant to my predecessor, and I am thoroughly familiar with this type of tax concession. I have tried to show why I personally felt that it was not a particularly desirable type. Of course I may be wrong in that, but I have voiced those views in this house before, why I had objections to this type of concession as such, and I still hold them. There is no use in my trying to say that I will give this matter further consideration and look at it before the bill comes in, because I do not think it is a concession which should be in the bill. So there is no use in my trying to fool the committee by just fobbing it off. I do not think it is a tax concession which should be in our income tax law. Perhaps someone else may think differently, but I do not.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I had no intention of speaking on this matter because I know very little about it; but two things the minister has said prompt me to mention two things and to ask him a question. It seems to me that the important question is whether or not we think we are, under our present laws, getting the utmost exploration and the utmost bringing in of new minerals. It does not seem to me to be important whether we are in peace time or war time. The question is whether we feel we are getting what we should get.

The second thing is, it seemed to me that the minister confused the issue by raising this question of stock sales. I am no more fond of stock promotions than hon. gentlemen to my left; they have no monopoly on a dislike for that kind of thing. But I want to suggest that I believe there are efficient organizations in the provinces trying to stop that kind of thing, and personally I should not have thought that was a conclusive reason. I am not offering any suggestions; I am not asking the minister to restore the tax. I merely say it seems to me that the important thing is whether we are to get the maximum amount of work done to bring new mines into production.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is, I agree, the important thing.

Mr. GREEN: That is the underlying feature.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. I do not think we should, but perhaps we ought to subsidize the prospectors who go into the bush. Then perhaps the provinces, which derive large revenues from the development of mines, should take some steps to encourage prospecting. My point is that this type of tax concession to individuals, not to the prospector himself, but to individual investors who are willing to gamble four or five hundred dollars in a prospecting syndicate, should not be given special tax concessions. I say they should not get that tax concession in peace time. I am repeating myself a great many times, but that is a view I have held for a long time.

Mr. HARKNESS: Perhaps I had better make it clear at the start that I am interested only in paragraphs (a) and (b) of this resolution, dealing with oil and natural gas, on which the minister made a brief statement when we first considered this resolution. It seems to me that the whole tax picture as far as the oil industry is concerned is needlessly confused; and I am sorry to say that, as far as I am concerned, the statement made by the minister this evening has only added to the opaqueness, or perhaps I should say the opacity, of that picture. At any rate I am just a little more confused than ever.

In addition to the general confusion that exists as far as the taxation of the oil industry is concerned, there is also the point that the taxes on that industry, or the concessions from taxes, are on a year to year basis, which makes it extraordinarily difficult for the oil operator to plan his future operations or to know where he stands. As an example, the exemption from duty of pipe and oil drilling equipment is provided at the present time under the omnibus bill and will continue until that bill expires. What will happen in connection with the duty on pipe and other oil drilling equipment after the omnibus bill ceases to have effect, nobody knows; and of course it is a matter of extreme interest to oil operators as to what the situation will be.

I have several questions, I am sorry to say, that I should like to ask the minister. The first is whether he is prepared to make any statement as to what the situation will be as far as duty is concerned on pipe and oil drilling equipment, as to whether the government have given that matter any consideration, and whether or not they are willing to make the present tariff concessions part of the regular tariff schedules. I must say I brought up this matter when the omnibus bill was being discussed. I thought that was the proper time for it, but I was ruled out of order and referred to the budget, and as a result I am bringing it up at this time. In that connection I should like from the minister, if possible, a statement as to whether or not a particular piece of equipment known as a heater treater can or will be included among the particular articles of oil drilling equipment that are exempt from duty at the present time.

The oil picture in Alberta is much brighter now than it was this time a year ago. During 1946 I think in the neighbourhood of 190 oil wells were drilled in Alberta, of which some fifty were producers. In 1947 a more active drilling programme has been in progress, owing to quite a considerable extent to the fact that the price of crude oil has been allowed to rise, following the removal of subsidies, by an amount equal to the subsidy which was withdrawn. Quite a number of wells have been brought into production in the plains area of Alberta and Saskatchewan, particularly in the Lloydminster area. More important than that, however, is the fact that a new field of high grade oil, at a fairly reasonable depth of something between five and six thousand feet, has been brought into production at Leduc, where there are three producing wells at the present time. From present indications it seems that we have at Leduc in Alberta another oil field comparable with the Turner valley and, we hope, exceeding it.

All this progress, however, has not removed the need for more incentive to encourage drilling. I think it is quite apparent to everyone that the finding of large oil fields would have several beneficial results as far as Canada is concerned. In the first place, it would bring down the cost of oil and oil derivatives such as gasoline and so forth, in which nearly all our citizens are interested. In addition, it would materially ease our foreign exchange difficulties as far as United States funds are concerned, because one of the chief causes of our loss of foreign exchange is the amount of oil we have to import. As a matter of fact, a fair number of reasonable oil fields would also do away with the difficulty the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply spoke of the day before yesterday, as far as the shortage of fuel oil is concerned.

Without going into that point farther, as I say I think it is quite clear that the discovery of oil fields in Canada is a matter of major importance to the country. The fact that we do not have more oil fields than at present is, at least to a large extent, due to the taxation and other policies which have been pursued by the present government. In other words, the tax structure has not been such as to encourage the drilling of oil wells, and more incentive along that line is still needed.

I should like to refer to the tax concessions which I suggested last year, and which have been suggested by the oil men for a considerable time, and to ask the minister what consideration has been given to these suggestions during the past year and why no action has been taken on them. First, it was requested that the fifty per cent tax drawback or deduction for deep-test wells be extended to apply to wells drilled in the plains areas. As far as I know, nothing has been done in that regard, and I should like the minister to say why nothing has been done and why that very reasonable request has not been accepted. The second request was for a greater depletion allowance. Last year and the previous year that allowance was 33⅓ per cent. In the United States, oil operators are given a depletion allowance of up to fifty per cent and, furthermore, they can carry it forward or backward. In a year when they have no net income they can save the depletion allowance on the oil produced and use it in a future year; or if their tax arrears have not been settled they can carry the allowance back. It seems to me that if we are properly to encourage the drilling of oil wells a depletion allowance at least equal to that received by our chief competitors immediately to the south, in the United States, should be allowed to our own oil operators.

Third, the request was that all drilling expenses including costs of permits and leasing, geological and geophysical exploration, and all that sort of thing be allowed as tax deductions. The fourth request was that all concessions at present allowed should be included in the permanent tax structure, so that operators would know where they stand and be able to make plans for the future.

I have a few more remarks to make on another related subject, namely in connection with natural gas, but I should like to have the minister answer these questions first.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Before the minister speaks, may I add a few words?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, if in the meantime I do not lose track of the questions asked by the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps I had better wait, then.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no, I believe I shall remember them. Proceed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What I shall say will be along the same lines as those followed by the hon. member for Calgary East. What I say is not so much by way of complaint, as to urge that I do not think the taxing authorities have ever had a complete and sufficient knowledge of our problem out there.

There is no doubt whatever about the importance of oil in our economy. I am sure no one would deny that, for a moment; and if we can but increase that production we shall have gone a long way. The Turner valley, our one large field, is on the downgrade, although last year it produced seven or eight million barrels; and those were 40-gallon barrels. After all, that is a lot of oil; and it is of high quality, about 40 gravity.

We have had a most intensive search and many wells have been drilled. They are seeking there, not only to continue development in the foothills, but to find oil in the plains area comparable, we will say, with the immense supply in the state of Texas. That drilling is much shallower.

For instance, today to drill a well in the Turner valley will cost at least $200,000. Wells at present being drilled are being drilled at a cost of anywhere from $25,000 up to roughly $60,000, as in the case of the Leduc field, which has been mentioned. That is exclusive of the production equipment.

It is fortunate that the Imperial Oil Company have discovered what appears to be a new field, in which they have drilled three wells. It is most unusual, but we find that all are excellent producing wells. Number two blew in during the course of the present week. But, as I have said, they have had three out of three. They can be drilled for roughly $60,000 each. That area is held largely by the bigger companies; none of the smaller independent companies are in there. They may have a half-section, but the greater part of the ground is held by these larger companies.

What is the tax position? Remember, we are dealing with something that is called an income tax. I am leaving out for the moment the concession on marginal wells or deep-test wells, to which reference has been made. We will put it this way, and say that a group of members in the House of Commons have formed a company and subscribed $200,000. We take that money and drill an oil well, and from it we get back the $200,000. Things are going very well, so we say, "We will certainly begin to drill another one." We drill another one and it is a duster—a dry well. The $200,000 we got out of the first well is taxed. We have lost it in the second well; and yet we have paid tax on income for the whole of that $200,000, less depletion allowance.

I hope the minister will correct me if I make a single mistake in what I am saying. Remember, I have said that I am disregarding depletion allowances at certain percentages, and I am not talking about deep-test wells, although I shall, later on.

So, we in the House of Commons who have formed the company have spent the $200,000 and we have got it back. Then we have put it into another well, but we have not got a cent from it. But we have had to pay income tax on that first $200,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but so that I may have it clear in my mind, may I ask how he could put the $200,000 into another well if he paid income tax on it when it came out of the first one?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let me put it this way. We naturally would put it in there before our income tax became payable, and then we simply owe you the income tax. In other words, we are not only busted; we are doubly busted, because we have nothing left with which to pay you.

Mr. ABBOTT: So we do not get it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, I will tell you that directors have certain responsibilities.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not for that, though.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Whether you get it or not, I am just speaking about the industry, and what takes place in it.

Let me add something to what was said a minute ago by the hon. member for Timiskaming. In western Canada until the other day, or at least until a few months ago at Leduc, no large company ever made a discovery of oil. Imperial Oil Company have made one now, and I hope they make a lot of money out of it, because that company alone has spent over $20 million in exploration, largely in Alberta, and some in Saskatchewan. Even though they are a big company disliked by hon. members to my left, I at least sincerely hope that they get back their $20 million which they have already put into dry holes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much have they got back?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know this, that they have not taken anything back on that exploration fund. The Turner valley, if you will remember, was discovered by an old friend of mine named Bob Brown. They went in there and bought and bought and bought. Their explorations—and that is not just tapping of known fields—in other places have cost them at least $20 million. I hope they get it back, and a lot more with it, because, after all, that is the way in which countries are developed; it is not done by legislation. Development is accomplished by people taking risk capital and spending it. I hope they get $60 million out of it; or $100 million, as far as that goes.

Mr. HARKNESS: The government will get the most of it, anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only thirty per cent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I thought you and I were friends.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, let me say—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Dave Lewis has broken his typewriter, so that these long written speeches are not here. Let me finish mine.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the insinuation?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What do you want?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do you mean he writes our speeches with his typewriter?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Dave Lewis writes all your speeches.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That's a lie; Dave Lewis does not write our speeches.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who writes them, then?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We write them ourselves.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): After what we call in French—and I do not speak it very well—this little contretemps, probably I can continue. What I was trying to say was—

Mr. IRVINE: Always trying to say it, but he never seems to get at it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There are a lot of fellows talking into their waistcoats; that is all they can use them for.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask hon. members to allow the hon. member for Calgary West to proceed without interruption.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member should not make insinuations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If I made an insinuation, I am sorry. I know you are one of the greatest speakers in the world, and I will compliment you and let it go at that.

Mr. IRVINE: That is as great a fib as the other one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will not admit that about you; you are about the worst.

Mr. IRVINE: Except yourself; I have not heard anyone worse.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: On a question of privilege.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Who said, "Sit down"?

An hon. MEMBER: I did.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Come over here and try to make me sit down. You are not big enough. The hon. member made an insinuation that some in this group read speeches written by others. I happen to be in this group and I have not yet read a speech in this house. I have not had one written by anyone else and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A lot of your members have.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to allow the hon. member or Calgary West to speak.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If I have said anything that offends I withdraw whatever I said or whatever the hon. member thinks I said. I am trying to get along but I am having a little difficulty.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to learn more about this oil business.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am trying to deal with the oil business in the province from which I come and from which many hon. members over here come. What has happened? We have a field called Turner valley. You may have read of great productions here, there or elsewhere, and at this great distance Turner valley has been regarded as a small thing. May I say that in itself it is one of the largest fields ever discovered in North America, and I know that will come as a great surprise to some people. The average cost of drilling a well there is about $200,000, and they are now drilling below 10,000 feet at the north end with the cost running $250,000 and higher. Imperial Oil drilled one up between Edson and Cadomin which cost over a million dollars, and it was a dry hole. They went down 13,000 feet.

What I am trying to show is that the people out there are not fiddling with this thing; they are trying very hard to develop something. I admit they are doing it for profit, that is the incentive; that is the reason they are there. If they make a profit and are able to supply western Canada with oil, then we shall all be infinitely better off. With a production of 8,000,000 odd barrels last year from the one field, they could supply only Alberta and part of Saskatchewan. Before the war, we had advanced as far as Brandon and were able to supply that part of the Manitoba market, but that is not true today. I should like the minister to explain paragraph (c), which reads in part:

. . . and that the amended provisions relating to expenditures on deep-test oil wells apply in respect of the 1947 and 1948 taxation years to expenditures on groups of wells drilled to locate stratigraphic traps.

Do I correctly interpret that as meaning that the same deduction, assistance if you like, which in times gone by was given to deep-test wells, so-called, will now apply to wells drilled on the prairie structures?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily. If my hon. friend wishes I will explain what is meant by this extension of the provision which existed last year. When it was suggested by the Department of Mines and Resources that the tax concession contained in the section which is now in the act and which is being extended for 1948 should include groups of wells drilled to locate stratigraphic traps I asked them what that was. They have given me an explanation which I shall be obliged to read to the committee because I am not a geologist. Probably it will be entirely clear to those who, like my hon. friend, have a knowledge of oil wells. This is the explanation given me by the Department of Mines and Resources:

The term "deep test" has been restricted so far to an exceptionally deep or costly well proposed to be drilled in potential oil bearing territory to prove or disprove the commercial productivity of a geological horizon on some deeply buried dome, anticline or other significant geological structure. The most probable productive part of such a structure is its summit, and the location of this can generally be determined from a detailed geological examination of the bedrock exposures in the area, from deep holes previously drilled, or from a seismic survey. The possibilities of such a structure can generally be determined from the results of a single deep well.

A "stratigraphic trap" on the other hand, is not a structural dome, but an oil or gas reservoir formed in a porous formation such as sandstone or clastic limestone as a lenticular bed, a pinch-out, or a somewhat similar type of deposit, formed along an ancient buried shore line, or as some deltaic or flood-plain deposit in potential oil bearing territory. The tilting of these strata causes a separation of the gas, oil and water by gravity, with the gas and oil rising to the up-dip side. The escape of these is prevented by the porous horizon being sealed off by an overlapping younger shale or other impervious sedimentary formation which was deposited in an advancing sea. Such porous reservoir sands have been deposited from various sources and are therefore apt to be very erratic, irregular and patchy in distribution, and inconsistent in composition and thickness. The location or outline of such deposits cannot be determined from a geological examination of surface bedrock outcrops or from a seismic survey, nor can this be established from a single drill hole, but only by the drilling of a series of holes, seldom less than six or nine in number. The production from any one hole is apt to be much smaller than that derived from the tapping of a structural high of a potential oil-bearing structure.

I do not pretend to understand the technical significance of that, but I understand that it is the type of exploration where one has to drill a series of holes, not so deep as deep-test holes, because of the particular formation, and it is proposed to extend the special tax concession to that type of test well.

Mr. HARKNESS: How does one know when he is drilling on one of those structures?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know. I would have to get another memorandum from the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Strange as it may seem, I understand what the minister has just read. However, there is one very great error in that. It says that when you are dealing with a dome, if you hit the top you get the best production. You do not; you get gas and that is all you get. The way oil is laid down in these anticlines is with water at the bottom, the oil next and the gas at the top. What you do is to drill down the edge and cause the pressure of the gas to force the oil up. There is that difference in what the minister has just read.

What I am talking about are areas like the Princess field or the areas around Brooks or Taber, where a comparatively large amount of money has been spent. It is not a question of single holes. Imperial Oil started off with at least a five-well programme and now they have a thirty-well programme. They struck oil in the first hole, but that was just their good luck.

If I understand aright what the minister says, if the company which I have formed in this House of Commons went down to the Gleichen reserve and started drilling where we thought there was a stratigraphic trap; if we started off with a five-well programme we would be doing exactly what the minister has said. What I am trying to do and what I hope the minister will see is that if we had that sort of thing, then we would receive the same concessions and assistance as is given to deep-test wells.

May I say one thing which is logical and which proves everything that I have been trying to say. We are looking for new oil wells. It does not make any difference if we find one below the other or if we find them side by side. Of course the side by side ones will be at less depth and much more inexpensive than the so-called deep-test wells. In other words, the whole logic of the situation compels me to think—and I have never heard any answer to it—I mentioned this last year, but I have not had any answer that if assistance is to be given in the seeking of new fields, new oil, it should not be perpendicular, that the fields should lie one under another. It seems to me to be infinitely more simple if we find them side by side and at shallower depth.

I was down here long before I became a member of parliament on this same question, and I was well received by Doctor Eaton, Doctor Clark, and some of these splendid gentlemen who belong to the minister's department. I have always felt and I still feel that you have one of the finest geologists in Canada right here in the person of Doctor Hume. His advice is well worth while; he is a splendid gentleman. He has a tremendous number of things to do in a geological way. He has an immense area of country to cover in charge of exploratory parties, and so on. He must cover immense areas of ground, but it does seem to me—and I wish someone would answer this question—that if we are to assist somebody who is looking for oil deep down, we should assist the chap, the company or the corporation who is going to find it at shallower depth. If you have two fields side by side they are just as good as if you had two in the form of one superimposed upon the other with this impervious rock in between. We can talk about these seismic surveys and all these other things. If you are drilling in a place where you think there is a stratigraphic trap you will find that there is only one discoverer of oil, and that is the drill. Everybody in the oil business knows that. You can shoot all the dynamite you like all over the place, but you will find that at depth you quite often get salt water. In that you are lucky sometimes, because usually you get nothing. Oil is found only by the drill. No greater boon could come to Canada than that we should become largely suppliers of our own oil.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall endeavour to answer some of these questions. I agree that it would be most desirable and helpful to Canada if we could discover additional oil sources, and it is for that reason that this particular tax concession, which has been in the law, was put in and is being continued. As to why it is not extended to other types of exploration, the reason is contained in the section itself. Whether it is an adequate reason is, of course, another matter. But this applies only, in the language of the statute where, under 10 (b):

> The taxpayer could not be reasonably expected to drill the oil well unless permitted to deduct at least fifty per centum of the expenditures in connection therewith from tax.

In other words, this particular type of well is, I understand, a very expensive operation; it runs, as my hon. friend has said, to a million dollars for one well. The other type of well, shallow well, does not cost anything like that amount, and it was felt that for that type of well the prospector, the oil company, the wild-catter would be within his financial means and could be expected to undertake it. This special incentive was given to induce the drilling of these very expensive wells which would otherwise not be undertaken. As the hon. members for Calgary know, the tax credit applies only where the particular project has been approved by the governor in council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and that would mean, of course, upon the technical recommendation of the distinguished geologist to whom my hon. friend referred a moment ago.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the minimum depth allowed for granting the concession?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know the answer to that. That is determined by the Department of Mines and Resources and the geologist in that department. The tax concession available in this section is made available upon the recommendation of the minister of that department. What his test is I do not know.

Mr. HARKNESS: There have been some difficulties over that matter. In fact I know of one oil company which is very much disgruntled over the fact that it did not get this concession. It would perhaps make everybody happier if there were some minimum depth which could be announced.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps that may be so, but it is a technical matter on which I, as Minister of Finance by the statute, have to rely on the advice of my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Resources, which, as I say, means the technical advice of his geologist.

Mr. HARKNESS: It leaves it very much open, of course.

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite so.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I add one word. I really think the minister is wrong. I know he will not think I am speaking at all critically. We want more help. Suppose you applied this assistance to the shallow wells on the prairie. What is the answer? If we drill a dry hole we do not get anything from the department except a tax concession from moneys we might have invested otherwise. But if we get some oil wells, then the dominion government will make more money by way of taxes than in any other way I know of, because oil wells go fast. When you knock the bung out of the beer barrel it empties itself; it does not renew itself. The paying life of an oil well is in the early stages. What you do today is this. You allow us a tax concession up to fifty per cent. Suppose we in this committee formed a company and we have no other sources of income; therefore there is no concession possible to us; but in the event that we succeed in getting something, then you indeed have a great source of revenue from the oil which is there produced. Really I am utterly unable to find any logical reason for confining this assistance to deep-test wells. I see what is going on, but remember that this can go only to producing companies which, of course, have other revenues. Let us assume that they have other revenue and let us assume that it is continued. If you would only let this go to the prairies I am as sure as I am standing here—because of all the people that are in there now exploring; we have not seen the like of it in the history of Canada—that this government would get more money by way of income tax than all the different contributions that they make to this wild-catting. The government would get infinitely more.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is aware that companies, if they have income, are allowed a 100 per cent write-off for the cost of dry wells.

Mr. HARKNESS: This is supposed to be incentive legislation. It is there for the specific purpose of encouraging people to drill wells and produce oil. As a matter of fact, this is absolutely no incentive to anybody to put new capital into the drilling of oil wells. The only people whom it helps are the companies which are sufficiently big to have at least $1 million income from producing wells. So far as the deep-test well is concerned, this concession does not do a bit of good to a company that has not an income of at least $1 million from producing wells. Otherwise they get no benefit really out of it. They are the only people who can have the well written off or fifty per cent written off under this so-called incentive legislation. If the government really wishes to put incentive legislation on the statute books to bring oil wells into production it should put in a type of legislation which would encourage you and me and everybody else in this chamber to put his money into a producing oil well. It is no good to give an incentive to people who are already producing and already have a large income from oil production.

Mr. ABBOTT: In this deep-test incentive legislation, the estimate I have been given is that something of the order of $4½ million has been spent in connection with sinking these deep-test wells.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was confined to marginal drilling.

Mr. ABBOTT: Never mind whether it was marginal drilling. I know one company that did it, because they used to be clients of mine in the old days. This expenditure, I am informed, ran to $4½ million. Of that, about half represents tax which would otherwise have been paid to the dominion treasury, and the other half represents the companies' own money.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is true. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Unfortunately, up to the present time, no oil has been found as a result of that expenditure. The two or three oil companies engaged in it are out their two and a half millions, and there is two and a half millions less paid into the treasury. It is apparently the type of terrain where this deep-test drilling is desirable and necessary in order to try to find oil, and this has been a type of incentive legislation which so far has not worked out, though perhaps it will.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister is talking around the point. This is supposed to be incentive legislation, but it is not because it is no good except to a very limited number of companies that already have large income. My point for the last two years has been that the government should put into operation legislation that is a real incentive.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we had better drop this. We were thinking it was desirable to continue it for another year, but perhaps my hon. friend suggests that we should eliminate it.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am not suggesting that for one moment.

Mr. ABBOTT: It must be some good then.

Mr. HARKNESS: It is much the same as sending a small boy to do a big man's job.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is arguing that it is not sufficient. That can be argued, but this is as far as we are prepared to go.

Mr. KNOWLES: I interjected what I intended to be a serious remark during the speech of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) a moment ago, but my observation was taken the wrong way. It had to do with the question of risk. I rise now to point out what seems to me to be a fallacy in the kind of appeal that the two hon. members representing Calgary are making. The hon. member for Calgary West in particular stated he felt that companies that put these huge sums of money in should not only get their money back but get a good return on it, and the figure he used in the case of one company that had put in $20 million was $60 million. He held that they should get $60 million back, and he suggested, as a justification for that, that they had risked their money. On the other hand, members rise in this house year after year and ask for assistance from the government in the form of incentive legislation to encourage these people to risk their capital, or, in other words, to remove a large element of the risk.

Mr. HARKNESS: On a question of privilege—

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that hon. members cannot have it both ways.

Mr. HARKNESS: On a question of privilege I do not think any member has risen in this house and asked for assistance from the government. All that we have asked for is a reduction in confiscatory taxation, not assistance. We have never asked for subsidies or anything else.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hansard will bear me out that the word "assistance" was used by the hon. member for Calgary West a number of times during his remarks.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): So what?

Mr. KNOWLES: He is asking for assistance because of the value to Canada of bringing in new oil wells, and I agree; but my contention is that you cannot have it both ways. If you ask for assistance to remove the element of risk, then there must be something less of these huge profits made. If they are to get huge profits by reason of the risk, then they need not ask for assistance from the government.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What I said was this. If I invest $200,000 in one well and I lose it in the next, I have lost my $200,000 and I do not want to pay income tax on the $200,000 which I have lost. You might catch up with that. That is the illustration.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was only one sentence in a long speech.

Mr. HARKNESS: After this long discussion, would the minister cast his mind back to my original remarks and answer the few questions I asked?

Mr. ABBOTT: First, on the question of customs duties, it is not relevant to this section, but I am not prepared to make a statement as to what the duties on pipe will be. As to the heater treater, that is an administrative matter which my hon. friend should take up with the Minister of National Revenue. I have answered the first point relating to the fifty per cent allowance for the stratigraphic traps as well as the deep-test wells. As to the suggestion that higher depletion should be allowed I can understand the desire for that. All enterprises, including mines, would like a higher depletion, but after careful consideration of the whole field of depletion we are of the opinion that the present rates which are allowed are all that should be given. As to the suggestion that it should be indicated how long this particular tax concession will last, in view of the hon. member's remarks, perhaps he is not very much interested. Joking aside, I am not prepared to say that this is necessarily a permanent part of the tax structure. It is proposed that it shall apply for the whole of 1948, which is eighteen months, so that there is reasonable assurance for any concern, which may contemplate applying for permission to avail themselves of it, to make their plans.

Mr. HARKNESS: Another question was whether any consideration had been given with regard to drilling expenses, including permit and leasing costs, geological and geophysical exploration and seismographic experiments. Would these be allowed as deductions for tax purposes?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that is not allowed on the deep-test wells, but it is allowed with respect to other wells. It is allowed as a write-off.

Mr. HARKNESS: I understand that permit and leasing costs and so on are not allowed on any mine, unless there is some regulation that I am not aware of.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to check that particular detail. I will look into the question and, when in committee on the section of the bill which continues this exemption for the 1948 period, I will see if I can give a definite answer as to just how these items are treated.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I take one moment to raise a question with regard to natural gas in another part of the country? I do this because the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) would have liked to raise it, but he is absent, being ill. With regard to the eight per cent sales tax on natural gas, which is widely used in western Ontario for heating purposes, there are two points that I would bring to the minister's attention. I understand that this tax was originally imposed as a special war levy, and there was great hope that it would be removed at the end of the war. Second, I understand that there is no sales tax levied on solid fuels of any kind, so that it is felt by those who use this gas that the tax is discriminatory. I mention this because of its great importance to the people throughout western Ontario.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall resolution 5 carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister make any comment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take note of my hon. friend's remarks. I am aware of the situation.

Mr MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Hopefully?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I always consider all these suggestions sympathetically, at any rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is one of those indirect taxes which the minister said this afternoon he did not like.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid it is not one that I can do anything about at the present moment.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That there be imposed an income tax of 5 per cent on a non-resident corporation in respect of dividends received by it on or after April 30, 1947, from a resident corporation where all the issued shares of the resident corporation having full voting rights under all circumstances, other than directors' qualifying shares, are beneficially owned by the non-resident corporation.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is imposing a new tax. I will give a brief explanation, if the committee wishes it. This resolution proposes a five per cent tax on dividends leaving Canada from subsidiaries to foreign parents. The general rule has been that dividends leaving Canada are subject to a fifteen per cent tax, although parent subsidiary dividends were exempt entirely from this tax. The present resolution, then, imposes a tax of five per cent where none was imposed before, but it still leaves the parent subsidiary dividends bearing a lower rate than that which applies generally to dividends leaving Canada. It is expected that the revenue from this tax will be $3 million to $4 million annually. It corresponds with a similar tax imposed by the United States upon dividends going from their subsidiaries to Canadian parents and is within the terms of our tax convention with the United States.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am glad the minister made that point about its being within the terms of the tax convention. Does he think it will have any deterrent effect on United States investment here, or does he think the amount is too small to have any effect?

Mr. ABBOTT: I inquired into that and I am assured that it should have no deterrent effect. There is a similar tax going the other way. The inquiries which I made indicated that the adverse effects would not be significant. Under our convention they can take credit for it on the other side.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the United States rate five per cent, the same as ours?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That, where a resident corporation owns over 50 per cent of the issued shares having full voting rights under all circumstances of a non-resident corporation and receives dividends (other than dividends that are not liable to taxation) from the non-resident corporation, the resident corporation may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by it for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years an amount in respect of income tax and excess profits tax paid to a government of a country other than Canada on the income out of which the dividends are deemed to have been paid.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say something about resolution 7?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give the usual explanation. The law at present allows a Canadian company an offset against its Canadian tax in respect of the tax paid to a foreign government by its wholly-owned subsidiaries abroad. The present resolution proposes to extend this principle and allow a tax credit where the Canadian company controls the foreign subsidiary; that is, the foreign subsidiary does not have to be wholly-owned. Provision will also be made in the law that the credit will apply in cases where the control is secured indirectly through the intermediary of a wholly-owned subsidiary. I think the committee will agree that the general principle of allowing tax credits is sound, and this present measure is a further step in that field. Generally speaking, it is in line with the practices followed by other countries.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have a question with regard to the wording of the resolution in the fifth line from the bottom, if the minister will read it with me. It reads:

. . . the resident corporation may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by it for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years an amount in respect of income tax . . .

Is that not a vague phrase? The section of the act itself, which I understand is comparable—that is, to say, section 8, subsection 2(a)—makes that specific.

Mr. ABBOTT: I repeat to my hon. friend, as I have done before, that the language in these resolutions is rather general and not as carefully drafted as the statutes will be. I have not yet seen the section in the bill which will be introduced, but I will endeavour to see that the language is clear.

Resolution agreed to.

8. That the period during which refunds may be made in respect of amounts deducted for tax at source from salaries or wages be extended and that where the period for refunds in respect of deductions heretofore made has expired, such refunds be permitted for a further prescribed period.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain resolution 8?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. This resolution represents an alleviating measure. Where tax has been withheld at the source from wages and salaries, for example, refunds may be made "upon application . . . in writing within twelve months from the close of the calendar year in which such money was paid," in cases where the amount withheld was greater than the actual tax liability. It has been found that many persons did not get their applications in within the twelve-month period, and it does not seem fair that this should preclude them from getting their money back. The proposed amendment will allow such refunds to be made even though the application was not made within the twelve-month period. For the future the provisions for refunding tax withheld at the source will be brought into line with the general provisions for obtaining refunds applicable to those who file returns.

Mr. GREEN: There has been considerable complaint about the delay in making these refunds. Can the minister tell us how far the department are running behind in making them?

Mr. McCANN: As I understand it, the position is that, although there is a considerable backlog, it is being liquidated. I think something like 1,300,000 refunds have been made in the year with reference to overdeductions.

Mr. GREEN: Approximately how long are they running behind now?

Mr. McCANN: Well, just the past year.

Mr. GREEN: They are a year behind in making refunds?

Mr. McCANN: No, I would not say they are a year behind. The refunds for 1946 are almost up to date.

Mr. GREEN: That brings up one other point. There has been reported in the press considerable dissatisfaction on the income tax staff. For instance, I have here a press clipping dated April 21, 1947, and headed, "Income tax staffs now talking strike." This is a press dispatch from Vancouver, I think. It states that there is apt to be a walkout in the Toronto office, that the dissatisfaction "may lead to a walkout in Toronto April 30." The complaint apparently was that there is too much red tape and interminable delay in getting wage and job adjustments. The final paragraph of the article reads:

Wages are the chief cause of complaint among tax staffs here . . .

That is, in Vancouver.

. . . Staffs have suffered heavy turn-overs because of offers from higher-bidding big business.

Can the Minister of National Revenue tell us what has been done to clear up that situation?

Mr. McCANN: That statement is entirely fictional. We have no knowledge of any such complaint. The first knowledge I had of it was the press report, which probably is the same as the one from which the hon. member has quoted. There has been no general dissatisfaction in our regional offices. An attempt has been made at an adjustment of salary and in procuring a further number of competent accountants and assessors to bring the work up to date. I can give the assurance to the committee that that has resulted in a much improved condition as far as assessments go.

Mr. GREEN: Action is being taken to meet these complaints which, by the way, seem to have some merit?

Mr. McCANN: Well, I would not say that they have any particular merit. As often happens in any government department when it goes about any reorganization, there are some employees who are impatient and, because they are not dealt with at the same time, they may make some complaint. But the planned reorganization and readjustment of salaries to people of merit and who are competent is going on. We are proceeding, as I say, as quickly as can be done.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to say a few words in connection with resolution 8. I understand that the persons referred to here who may make application for refunds are persons from whom deductions have been made at the source and have not received sufficient income to make a return.

Mr. ABBOTT: It applies to all taxpayers. They may be the greater number.

Mr. MacINNIS: The principle is the same, I think. I do not see why a person should have to make to the government application for a refund, or why, if he does not make that application within a certain period of time, he should be debarred from making it. I believe that the government checks all income tax returns. If they find that a person has not paid his income tax in full, they make a demand that he do so. That is the procedure.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer this very quickly. It applies only to people who have not filed returns.

Mr. MacINNIS: That was what I said in the first place, and I was told it applied to everyone.

Mr. ABBOTT: The provision applies to all taxpayers.

Mr. MacINNIS: If I am left alone, there will be at least less confusion. The point I wish to make is that when the employer makes the deductions he is acting for the government; he is compelled to make the deductions. The government or the department has the name of the person from whom the deductions have been made. The account should be followed up, and if it does not appear that the person has received sufficient income in order to make a return or pay a tax, that tax deducted should be returned to him.

Mr. ABBOTT: How on earth can we know? I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but if a man works for two or three employers how can the income tax department know if no return has been put in?

Mr. KNOWLES: You will find out very quickly if he owes money.

Mr. McCANN: You do when he makes a return, or if the time comes when he ceases to make a return. What happens if he works for six months and becomes ill? We have no knowledge of that, and the deductions cease then.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the deduction ceases, then you have an amount to the credit of that individual; at least it should be to his credit, and it is the duty of the department to find that individual and return it to him.

Mr. ABBOTT: We would do so if we knew about him.

Mr. MacINNIS: In any event, there must be an address which can be obtained from the employer. I cannot understand this high-handed way of saying that if he does not make a claim for refund within a year—I realize that the purpose of this change is to extend the time—he loses the money. I cannot understand a provision that a person who has a just claim should be debarred from getting the money to which he is entitled if he does not make application for the refund within a certain time. I am glad the government is going as far as it is, but it has not gone far enough until it makes at least some effort to find the individual to whom it owes money, and returns the money it owes.

Mr. ABBOTT: My only point is that the government does not know and has no effective practical means of knowing that it does owe money to such an individual. That is the point. If he files a return, yes; then the government assesses the return and sees that with his exemptions and so on he has overpaid his tax. But in the case of a man who has worked for three or four months, who has had deductions at the rate of, say $2,000 a year, who then becomes ill or moves away, the government has no means of knowing at what rate deductions may have been made by another employer perhaps in Vancouver or in the United States or somewhere else. Surely it is not asking too much of every individual Canadian to apply to the nearest income tax office if he believes he has overpaid his tax or that tax has been deducted in a greater amount than it should have been. That is not placing a very great onus on the taxpayer. I wish the committee would think of the additional staff that would be required to go through all the returns of employers which are filed and coordinate those returns to see that the John Smith who worked for one employer in Toronto for three months at a rate which made him taxable in the same John Smith who three months later worked for somebody in Vancouver. I think it would be beyond the bounds of reason, and this measure is to extend the period within which application may be made. I am sure my colleague the Minister of National Revenue will confirm that we get thousands of these applications for refunds. A man is pretty careful about claiming money when it is owing to him. I never find very much of an oversight in that connection.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have in mind a case which I could mention, though I am not going to, where money has been due for years, where a return had been filed as well, and where the money was not paid until a demand was made. What the minister says may be easy if you have the education of a lawyer and are practised in keeping books and doing that sort of thing. A great many of these people will have very little education, very little understanding of what they are supposed to do. Those who represent farmers here, particularly on this side of the house, have made the welkin ring on many occasions in regard to the difficulties and discriminations the farmer is up against in the matter of income tax, but I can tell them the person who never gets a break in regard to income tax is the wage-earner or salary earner who has his tax deducted at the source. As the minister says, if he works for six months at the rate of $2,000 a year the tax is deducted at that rate. Then if he does not work for the rest of the year he is out the amount deducted unless he applies for a refund. As the act stood, and as it still stands even with this extension, if he does not make application within a certain period of time he loses that money.

Mr. McCANN: There are very few losses.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are so many, in any event, that the time for making application for refund has had to be extended. I would say that a person should not be debarred from making application for refund, if the refund is coming to him, no matter when he makes it.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I think I am in order in asking the Minister of National Revenue a question under this section because, while it has to do with compulsory savings, it is in the nature of an overcharge. I have had several complaints from men over sixty-five years of age who say they had compulsory savings deducted from their income. I have in mind a man who returned to work in a factory after he was sixty-five years of age, and had these compulsory savings deducted from his cheques. I understand that he has written the Department of National Revenue on several occasions requesting a refund, so far without success. I should like to ask the minister why these incorrect overcharges are not returned to people of this type as soon as possible.

Mr. McCANN: If there has been fault in this particular instance it has been due to the employer. Anyone who is sixty-five years of age and who has a refundable portion of his tax to his credit may make application for it and have it returned, provided that he has an income of less than $5,000.

Mr. GILLIS: In the end of the country where I come from this is a pretty burning question. There it is not a question of chasing a taxpayer from one employer to another. All the people I speak of now are employed by the one employer, but some of them wait for two and three years for tax refunds. I think one principal reason is the lack of staff in the only office you have in Nova Scotia; that is, the Halifax office. Most of the people in my riding are employed by Dominion Steel and Coal. The tax is deducted at the source. The records are there, but apparently the comptroller of the company has the last say. The taxpayer makes applicaton for a refund of his 1944 tax, for example. I am still working on some 1944 refunds, and some go back as far as 1943. There are as yet no complete records for 1946. When the taxpayer applies for his refund, after going through all the necessary formalities, apparently the inspector in Halifax has to check the return and then send it to the comptroller in Sydney for a recheck, and in the process it gets pretty well mixed up. I do not expect the minister to cure this tonight, but I should like to see him break that machinery in Nova Scotia at least in two, by the establishment of an office in Sydney. That has been mooted for at least eighteen months, and I should like to see the thing get underway.

Mr. ISNOR: It is all ready.

Mr. GILLIS: Is the hon. member for Halifax answering me, or is he holding a private discussion with the minister?

Mr. ISNOR: You carry on with your part.

Mr. GILLIS: I have the floor and it would be courtesy for you to keep quiet while I am talking to your superior.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman, I did not interrupt the hon. member. He can go on and make a case, if he wishes.

Mr. GILLIS: That is clear.

Mr. ISNOR: He knows it is settled, or he should know.

Mr. GILLIS: Even now I do not know what the hon. member is talking about, and I am not particularly interested.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That applies both ways.

Mr. GILLIS: I was pointing out to the minister that for the past eighteen months or so it has been mooted that the department intended to set up an office at Sydney because the big tax deductions at the source in that province are in that end of the province. I should like the minister to tell me tonight. I have been told a dozen times at least by his department that they are all ready to start operations in that office. That is my first grievance.

Then, there is a great deal of difficulty in connection with the matter discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Perhaps it is not the fault of the department. During the war, thousands and thousands of workers were employed in war industries throughout the country, and perhaps they paid taxes during half of 1945 in a war industry which folded up, their books and records went with them, and in many instances it has been difficult to trace them down. For instance, in the shipyards at Pictou we found that difficulty, and I worked on it for a long time. Different companies operated there. The employees from the shipyards came back to work in the coal mines or on the farms and began to try to track down their taxes. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East, that is not a difficult matter if one is a bookkeeper or a lawyer, or one who can look into the future, but the workman finds that there are not many facilities to which he can turn to have this ironed out. Everyone backs away from an income tax return as if it were a rattlesnake. I know I do not want to see them, although on many occasions I have tried to trace down files.

I am not criticizing the machinery in Halifax. What the department have at that point is good, but they have not enough of it. I have found them cooperative. But it is difficult to find these records. Can the Minister of National Revenue advise me tonight when we might expect the office in Sydney to begin operations, because we shall not get the mess off our hands we have there with respect to refunds until such time as we have an office down there where the problem is. I think most of the difficulty is with the comptroller of the coal company.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister a question, and I should like to have it answered.

Mr. ISNOR: Speaking on the same subject as was raised by the hon. member—

Mr. GILLIS: As a matter of courtesy, might I have that question answered?

Mr. GREEN: Let the minister answer.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps the minister can answer both of us at the same time.

Mr. GILLIS: I would rather he would answer me first.

Mr. KNOWLES: What do you mean by "both"? Are you two people?

Mr. ISNOR: Speaking with respect to the question raised by the hon. member who has just spoken and the hon. member for Vancouver East, might I ask if I heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South correctly when I thought he said he did not understand what I was saying? Well, that is quite understandable. In his case when he refers, as he does, to the collection of refunds, in the same way as the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to deductions on salaries of $2,000 a year, I would point out that the deductions are made on either a weekly, semi-monthly or monthly basis.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know that. It is a waste of time to tell me that, because I know it.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not as a rule interrupt the hon. member. I allowed him to go along and build up his case.

Mr. MacINNIS: And I would not have interrupted the hon. member for Halifax, but he is giving an altogether wrong impression of what I said. I said it was made at the rate of $2,000 a year.

Mr. ISNOR: I thought perhaps I would clear that point up. The deductions are made on a weekly, semi-monthly or monthly basis; and if a person works for two, three, four, five or six weeks, as the case may be, his deductions are made only on his earnings during that time.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so; that is right.

Mr. ISNOR: So from time to time—once a month, as a rule—those deductions are returned to the income tax office, and at the end of the year a recapitulation is made showing the total deductions for the period in which the person was employed. A record is made showing the name, the amount and the days, and those are added in. Until the income tax office at Halifax, we will say, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, has a complete list of the earnings of that man, it is not in a position to make a refund to him. I think that should be clearly understood. That shows the position in the income tax office after the return has been made. It is not fair to criticize the income tax office at Halifax or any other place for not being able to take care of the refunds immediately after the returns are made. That is the first point.

Then, I am reasonably sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South must know—because he has been told time and again—that the office at Sydney is to be established. I have heard that said on the floor of the house. Like the hon. member, I hope the office will be established in Cape Breton in the very near future, so as to relieve the overworked staff at Halifax. May I add that the staff at that point is most efficient. I know many of them personally, and they are a fine body of men and women, doing the best they can to clean up income tax returns as quickly as possible.

Mr. GILLIS: May I say to the hon. member for Halifax that, personally, I was never advised that the office was to be established, and I never have heard it on the floor of the house. I had considerable correspondence with Mr. Elliott, while he was deputy minister, and the last I heard of it was that as soon as available space could be secured it would be set up. I do not know whether that space was secured or what stage it is in at the present time. That is why I should like the minister to answer.

Mr. ISNOR: I thought the hon. member, like myself, was a fairly regular attendant in the house; certainly I heard it on the floor of the house.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not, and you cannot show it to me in Hansard, either.

Mr. McCANN: The matter of opening an income tax office in Sydney has been dealt with before, and it was recommended in a report made with respect to the establishment of additional district offices in Canada. I tabled that report in November, 1945.

Mr. MacINNIS: No wonder it was forgotten.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

An hon. MEMBER: It is not established yet.

Mr. McCANN: No, it is not; and there are valid reasons why. There is no department of government which has grown as quickly as the Department of National Revenue in the same number of years. No department of government has lost to industry and to business generally throughout the country, and to other departments of government, as many of its trained personnel as did the Department of National Revenue. Those are some of the difficulties that we have.

What the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said with reference to the Halifax office is not according to the facts. The progress report shows that, as of May 1, 1947 there were 80,081 returns for 1945 made, of which 80,081 had been assessed. In other words, it was 100 per cent for 1945.

Mr. GILLIS: Assessments are not returns.

Mr. McCANN: The assessments had been made. The return for 1946 were due exactly thirty days ago, and they have hardly been sorted as yet in the offices throughout the country. You could not expect them to be assessed so that we could determine whether or not there was a refundable portion. There have been 86·4 per cent of the 1944 returns assessed. I submit that the work of that office is as good as in any office in the country, and better than in some.

Mr. ISNOR: Better than in most.

Mr. McCANN: Better than in most. We are proposing, for the convenience of people on Cape Breton island, to open an office in Sydney. It will require seventy-seven people to man it. Where are we to get these people? Probably the initial employees will be taken from the Halifax office, and the work there demands that we retain all the present staff in Halifax. The work of that office will not be reduced a great deal. As soon as we get the necessary space, the proper equipment and competent people to carry out the work, we shall proceed to open that office.

Mr. GILLIS: When I was speaking I think I made it quite clear that I have had as much to do as an individual with the Halifax office as any other member of this house. I was not criticizing the work of that office; I was simply complaining about the lack of personnel and the difficulties created by having to check off with the comptroller of the coal company. It is no problem if you are employing only twelve or fifteen men, but when you are handling weekly deductions for 13,000 people and it is necessary at the end of the year to check them all, a great deal of difficulty is created. I was not complaining about the office; my kick was the lack of necessary assistance for an office in that end of the country where a big problem must be faced.

I was informed at least two years ago that personnel was being trained for this particular work. I have had a number of people write to me making application for positions, and apparently they were qualified. I am reasonably sure that personnel will not be the main problem.

Mr. GREEN: Why would it not be possible to allow an applicant for refund the statutory period within which to apply? In British Columbia that would be six years. Is there any reason why such a person should not be permitted to come under the statute of limitations?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a problem which was raised by the administration branch of the income tax department. As my hon. friend realizes, this refers to people who have not filed income tax returns. Six years is quite a long time to wait, because it would be difficult to check facts after that length of time. Application has to be made and checked back against the employer's returns. In view of the congestion in the offices and one thing and another, I would think that would be an unreasonable length of time to allow people who have not filed income tax returns to make application.

Mr. GREEN: That is just the tragedy; the people affected are people with small incomes, people who are not taxable. Surely it will not hurt the government very much to allow them at least six years to apply? If they delay in their application it will be that much more difficult for them to prove their claim. I suggest that this is one case where the government could be lenient. I submit that the ordinary statutory period would be the fair thing to allow.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will notice, the resolution provides that such refunds be permitted for a further prescribed period. I do not think it is intended to prescribe it as such in the legislation. I have not seen the bill. If it is desirable to do that it could be done. This is really to remove the twelve months' limitation.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like again to bring to the attention of the minister the position of the fishermen on the west coast. During the war, income tax was deducted at the source, but this was not done in the case of east coast fishermen. That discriminatory practice has never been adequately answered by the department. The fishermen, especially those in the halibut fleet, are filing returns, but they do not get an answer for three years. If there is a deficiency, interest is charged. They are objecting violently to this.

While I am on my feet, I wish to say that the settlement service they have in Prince Rupert gets on very well with the departmental officials in Vancouver; in fact the relationship is excellent. However, to put it mildly, this overcharging of interest is getting under their skin. It is no fault of their own because they cannot get an answer from the department. I have received correspondence on this matter and it is still going on. This matter has been troubling them ever since I have been in the house. They cannot get an answer from the department as to whether they are squared away. In one case it was pointed out to me that it was the department's fault, and yet these men are continually being forced to pay interest on any deficiency in their taxes.

Mr. McCANN: The people to whom the hon. member refers deal with the Vancouver office, and there cannot be any great number because our reports show that the 1943 returns as of May 1, totalled 240,000, of which 230,000 have been assessed. For the 1944 period, as of May 1, 1947, 211,000 out of 248,000, or eighty-six per cent, have been completed. Seventy-five per cent of the returns for 1945 have been completed in Vancouver. I do not think there can be many of these cases. There may be the odd one, but to say that none of the people in the hon. member's particular district is getting service is beside the fact. If there is any particular case in which the hon. member is interested, if he will pass it over to me I shall try to expedite the handling of returns.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does the minister mean by "completed?"

Mr. McCANN: Fully assessed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does that mean that they will not be charged interest?

Mr. McCANN: I did not say that. The law states that the interest rates shall be so much from the time the return is made until it is assessed, and then a month after notice of assessment the rate shall be at a certain rate if it is not paid. I should like to say something about overpayments. Quite often when the assessment goes out it is indicated that the assessment is such and such and that the taxpayer has overpaid to the extent of $6, $8 or $10. The majority of these people do not ask for a refund, they ask that it be left as a credit for the following year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What interest is charged if there is an underpayment, and what interest is credited if there is an overpayment?

Mr. McCANN: There is no interest credited, and the charge is four per cent from the time the return is made until it is assessed, and thirty days after notice is sent out until it is paid there is an extra charge of three per cent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If there is a charge for underpayment, for the sake of argument using the year 1943, and a penalty imposed, and again for the sake of argument, in 1944 there has been an overcharge, who gets the benefit?

Mr. McCANN: The crown.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is there anything fair about that?

Mr. McCANN: In practice, with the small amounts involved, it would be difficult to work out the interest on $2 or $3 with the tens of thousands of individuals concerned. Where there are small credits like that involved we would require a large additional staff, and we are at present short enough of staff making assessments without having to compute interest on small amounts.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There are at the present time several hundred competent men unemployed in British Columbia who could be used in this work.

The minister refers to small amounts. It might be a small amount to a man making $5,000 or $10,000 a year, but to a man who is not making anything like that amount, a charge of $150 is not a small amount. To my mind, there is no excuse whatsoever for this or any other government permitting that kind of situation to exist.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: On May 28, I put on Hansard an excerpt from a letter received from the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Settlement Service which was sent to the Vancouver office. The minister said that there could not be very many cases. Here is the wording that I put on Hansard, which will be found at page 3561:

In many instances we have cases where assessments are not made for three years after the return is filed—

This is from a reliable source. The excerpt continues:

—and any differences there may be are assessed and on this non-payment interest is charged for the full three years, and both the fishermen and myself feel that this is not fair and interest should be charged from the date of assessment.

The minister has said that any cases we can get which are still hanging fire he will look into. I shall write immediately to the settlement service and the cases will be laid before him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to protest against what has been brought to the attention of the committee. Certainly there can be no element of fairness in the procedure which charges a man interest for two or three years before he knows what he owes. It constitutes such an outrage as must shock every member of the committee. Certainly a matter like that cannot be condoned.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am going to intervene here. We have discussed this question on numerous occasions when the income tax resolutions have been before the committee. Of course this is in no way relevant to the particular resolution which we are discussing, which is an alleviating resolution extending the delay within which the return may be filed. The question as to whether or not interest should be charged on underpaid income tax amounts not paid with the filing of the income tax return is not relevant. If my hon. friend wishes to make a speech on that when we are on second reading of the bill he may, of course, do so, and I shall try to argue the case with him then; I have done so before. On balance, the short answer is, unless there is some penalty for underpayment of income tax, then there is too great a temptation to the taxpayer to underpay his tax. The administrative practice, as I understand it, is, if there is an underassessment and a genuine mistake in the calculation of the tax and something is added, then the interest runs only from the date of the notice of the assessment when he should have made the payment. In any event, I intervened to say that if we are to embark on a discussion of this resolution as to whether interest should be paid or not paid, then we can discuss almost anything in the income tax act.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As I understand it, the matter we are discussing is the amount which is deducted at the source. That being so, the committee should be permitted to discuss the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no question of interest involved there. What we are discussing here is the question of income tax payment which is deducted at the source and on which the taxpayer is entitled to a refund. The section proposes that he have an extended time within which to file his application for it. When he gets his refund he gets it without interest. In other words, the crown does not pay interest on the overpayment. That has been the law with respect to the crown ever since there has been a crown. The crown does not pay interest on these refunds. Perhaps that is wrong. Nevertheless we have argued it out before. It is not a question of the taxpayer owing interest here; it is a question as to whether the taxpayer should get some interest on the amount of the tax that he has overpaid.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the Minister of National Revenue give us the returns and the assessments at the Saint John, New Brunswick, office from 1945? Apparently he has the figures.

Mr. McCANN: Yes, I can do that. The position with reference to Saint John for 1945 was as follows. There were 56,450 individual returns. We do not include the corporation returns there. The total assessed as of May 1, 1947, was 40,052, or 70·9 per cent. In fact, to give the whole picture in reference to 1944 in Saint John as of May 1, there was 93·7 per cent assessed, and for 1943 they were practically all assessed.

Mr. HANSELL: The question I wish to ask may not come directly under this resolution. I do not want to be out of order. If the minister thinks this is not the time for him to answer I shall be glad to ask it at some other time, but I do not know where I can ask it. It has to do with refunds, and my question is in respect of the refund of compulsory saving. My question is twofold. In the past there has been some discussion as to the possibility of paying back compulsory savings in necessitous cases. People take sick or something happens and they must have money. The government holds some of their money.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder whether my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him. I dealt with this question this afternoon under the general income tax section, but I do not think my hon. friend was then in his seat. I gave my views as to what could be done this year and what—

Mr. HANSELL: Was it in respect of necessitous cases?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall read it in Hansard tomorrow.

The second part of my question is this. I had some correspondence with a gentleman who needs money. He was quite willing to borrow the money if his compulsory savings could be assigned, but evidently the regulation will not permit banks or credit institutions to lend money and take compulsory savings as security. Has the minister given any consideration to that? There are necessitous cases where a person would not mind paying a little interest and borrow the money, but he has no security. The refundable portion of the tax is certainly just about as good collateral as anyone could desire, but the regulations do not permit it to become collateral. Could the regulations be changed in necessitous cases so that a person could borrow on his compulsory savings?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend knows that the law contains a provision which says that it will not be assignable. Consideration has been given to amending it, but the decision was against it for the reasons that I mentioned in answer to a previous question this afternoon. We do not feel that we can look into necessitous cases and pick these out and deal with them as distinct from others. My hon. friend will see the reasons I gave when he reads Hansard tomorrow. To extend the privilege, to enable the taxpayer to assign it, would involve some considerations of investigation and the ascertaining that it was a necessitous case. The reason the non-assignability provision is in the act is to prevent the exploitation of the taxpayer who may be willing to assign or sell at a ridiculous discount. On balance, it is thought to be a wise protection. The same reasons apply to assignability for collateral purposes. In other words, if we felt that we should look into necessitous cases we would turn over the money rather than allow it to be assigned. We would pay the amount. If one were to investigate cases and deal with them as necessitous, instead of allowing the man to assign we would pay back the money.

Mr. BENTLEY: I wish to revert to something the minister said a moment ago. He is a genial gentleman, but he startles me occasionally with his remarks. He said flatly that the crown does not pay interest. Never?

Mr. ABBOTT: The crown is not liable to pay interest in law and never has been. The courts, on a petition of right, will recommend in certain cases that it pay interest.

Mr. BENTLEY: Therefore the crown will pay interest when it feels like it. When it is a question of playing fair both ways it may pay interest or not. It can charge interest but need not pay it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is making a soap-box speech.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am making a statement of fact.

An hon. MEMBER: You know where "phony" got you this afternoon.

Mr. BENTLEY: And that is a phony statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will withdraw the statement.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was not speaking of compulsory payments but on the question which my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South brought up and which was followed by the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I did not intend any heat.

Mr. ABBOTT: I take it all back. No offence was intended and none need be taken.

Resolution agreed to.

9. That funding securities received in respect of an accrued right to interest, dividends or other payments of an income nature or in respect of the extinguishment of a shareholder's preference to the declaration of dividends for past periods be taxable as income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better explain this resolution, because I have an amendment to move.

Resolution No. 9 as amended makes provision for taxation in two directions. The first part of the resolution makes taxable in the year of receipt the value of a security received in respect of an accrued right to receive interest, dividends or other payments of an income nature. The house is aware that companies which have been in financial difficulties frequently issue what are commonly called funding securities covering arrears of interest on its bonds that the company has been unable to meet in the past. This interest, if it had been paid, would, of course, have been income to the bondholders in each year in which received. When the bondholder receives a new bond covering arrears of interest he has, in effect, received the interest in one lump sum, although it is received in the form of a promise to pay. There has been some doubt regarding the present law as to whether the recipient of the funding security is taxable on the receipt of the security or whether the tax liability is deferred until the time when the security is redeemed, that is, when the company actually pays cash to the bondholder. It seems clear that the practice should be to have the tax liability fall in the year in which the funding security is received by the bondholder, and this is what is being proposed in the present resolution.

The second part of the amended resolution deals with the premium received by a shareholder upon the redemption of his shares. At present the premium upon redemption is deemed to be a dividend. The proposed amendment is that the premium shall be taxable as income. The change in wording has the effect of making a corporation taxable in respect of premium received, whereas under the present law the corporation is not taxable because the premium is deemed to be a dividend and, as the committee knows, dividends paid from one corporation to another are exempt from tax in the hands of the receiving corporation.

In the case of funding securities, this will relate only to interest-bearing securities and not preferred shares and the like or shares which are issued in connection with arrears of cumulative preferred dividends. I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to move the amendment which I am proposing.

Mr. McCANN: I move, Mr. Chairman:

That paragraph 9 of the resolution to amend the Income War Tax Act now before the committee be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"9. That funding securities received on or after January 1, 1947, in respect of an accrued right to interest, dividends or other payments of an income nature and premiums received on or after May 31, 1947, on redemption of shares by a corporation, be taxable as income."

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Part of what I had to criticize has been removed by this amendment, but I think it is open to this criticism, if I understand the amendment which has just been proposed. It seems to me that what it means in simple language is this. Assuming I have a bond bearing interest and, we will say, the company has been unable to pay that interest for a period of ten years, and then some refunding is done for the accrued interest which is owing to me; had I received that interest through the period of the ten years it would have affected only my gross income or taxable income to perhaps only a comparatively small extent. But remember I have not had it, and now I receive the shock of getting it all at one time, not in money but in a promise to pay, so that my tax in that year, it seems to me, is unduly enhanced, if I may use that expression.

Put it another way. Suppose I had $100 a year coming to me during the ten years. At the end of ten years it is $1,000, and at that time there is a reorganization and a refunding issue is put up. I do not get the $1,000 but a new form of bond or preference share or security or something of that kind, and that is only a promise to pay. But that $1,000, added to my income in that year, since we have an ascending scale of income taxation, means that I am unfairly struck all at once. I am asking the minister if he does not think he might spread that burden over the period during which I otherwise would have received the money had the corporation been able to pay it, or for some lesser period. It strikes me as being unfair to the individual who has not received interest payments, on which perhaps he has relied during those years when he has had to borrow other money at a greater rate, it may be, to maintain himself and his business, or whatever it may be. It is severe that you should say, "In the year 1957 we are giving you a security, a promise to pay, in lieu of money you did not receive, which will be in the same amount, and you will add that to your taxable income during that year." That is something worth the minister's consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had already given it more thought, and I can give it more before the bill is brought in. I do not think it is really feasible. The position is the same as that in which any mortgagee is in where arrears of interest accumulate and he eventually collects them. The section we propose to insert in the act is almost identical in terms with a similar section which has been in the British income tax act for a number of years. I have perhaps omitted covering all the arrears of preferred dividends, because on investigation I found that there were great complications there, and I have not been able to see through all the various implications. That may have to be done at a later day. We do not intend to do it this year, so that the amendment this year will relate simply to interest-bearing securities. But I will give some consideration to the point that my hon. friend has raised; and when the bill is brought in, he can see the form in which the section is drawn.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to add a word along the line taken by the hon. member for Calgary West, and along the line of fairness. I want to add what seems to me is a further argument—the minister has hinted at it himself—that in the case of corporations where interest goes from one to another, the shock may not be anything like the same as it is with individuals. Take the individual about whom the hon. member for Calgary West spoke. He gets his interest at the end of ten years. Actually he does not get it. He gets a promise. I appreciate the fact that there is a mechanical difficulty here where the bond circulates from hand to hand, but I do not think that is insuperable. I think it can be overcome by stamping and in various ways. I should like to second earnestly what my hon. friend has said, and I hope the minister will reconsider this stringent provision, as I see it.

Mr. BENTLEY: May I ask the minister a question without his thinking I have an ulterior motive?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not a lawyer and—I say this earnestly—I do not follow legal phraseology too well. I tried to follow it when the Minister of National Revenue was referring to it. Does this in any way affect the revolving funds in a cooperative institution?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not at all. It is blocking what, we believe, might be a serious loophole and loss of revenue which should be received by the treasury. That is the purpose of it.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

10. That the provisions respecting the taxation of private companies in respect of undistributed income be extended to include companies having not more than 75 shareholders excluding shareholders employed or formerly employed by the company, as at present.

Mr. ABBOTT: Resolutions 10, 11, 12 and 13 all relate to the special provisions concerning so-called private companies which were put in the law following the recommendations of the Ives commission. The committee may recall that legislation was introduced in 1945 dealing with the recommendations of the Ives commission regarding the position of shareholders of closely-held companies. The problem arose out of the situation faced by the estate of the chief shareholder of these companies having to meet the liability for succession duties upon the death of the main owner of the business. The legislation made provision for the payment of a tax by the corporation on its undistributed income. Thereafter a payment of a dividend out of this accumulated surplus which had been specially taxed was free from further tax when paid out to the shareholder.

As the law now stands, a company with more than fifty shareholders cannot qualify for the benefits of the legislation. Resolution No. 10 proposes that the limit on the number of shareholders be raised to seventy-five. Cases have been brought to the government's attention where, through various reasons, the shareholding has been moderately widened with the passing of the years, although such company is still, in fact, a privately held corporation. It seemed reasonable, therefore, that the terms of the legislation might be made less rigid in order that many deserving cases which now are disqualified may be enabled to come under the terms of the law and pay the special tax.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I want to make objection, not to the increase to seventy-five, but to the increase to any specified number of shareholders. The minister has touched on the difficulties which the department has found in applying this to one or other of the various companies which have applied. But as I understand it, the number of shareholders is fixed as of April 29, 1941, thereby rendering an injustice to one company which happens to have had more of its shareholders die prior to that date than might die later.

Dealing with this amendment in 1945, may I say that I know of one company in which one man died leaving thirty-two heirs and in that fashion counted his company out of taking the benefit of this act. I suggest to the minister that the true purpose back of the act as passed in 1945 was to give certain rights to closely held corporations, provided that they had less than fifty shareholders; but instead of that date being fixed as of April 29, 1941, it should be fixed as of the original date of incorporation if at that time it conformed in other respects with the definition of a private company. Then, if thereafter any of the original shareholders remain as of the date of April 29, 1941, and if the remainder of the shareholders are successors to the original ones, that company might enjoy the benefit of the resolution; because, as years go by and the shareholders die off, this same company may still continue to have its surplus undistributed and each family in turn may make the strenuous efforts to avoid distribution to which the Ives commission referred. If that is the case, the last surviving man or his family upon his death, finds it even more onerous to face the difficulties. Therefore I suggest that the minister, between now and when the amendments come in, might give consideration to that. In the meantime I am going to ask the department to look at page 62 of the Ives report and let us have some facts as to the number of companies which have taken advantage of this amendment of 1945 and the amount of money collected from them.

Mr. ABBOTT: We can give that when we are on the bill.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

11. That the provisions making applicable in respect of income of the 1946 and subsequent taxation years the liability of a private company to pay tax upon undistributed income to which a personal corporation, estate or trust would have been entitled if the income were distributed, be amended to provide that the liability is to be deemed to have been imposed on and after December 18, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall resolution 11 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 12?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought the minister was going to say something about these items.

Mr. ABBOTT: These last three are almost purely technical. Resolution 11 represents merely a clarification of an amendment introduced last year. Last year's amendment took care of a purely technical omission in the original law. The date of coming into force of this amendment was stated in such terms as to render it ambiguous. The present proposed amendment provides that last year's amendment shall come into force as from the original date of the enactment of private companies' legislation. There was an interpretation argument there and we wanted to make it perfectly clear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can deal with these three resolutions together if the committee wish me to. They all relate to private companies.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May we have the minister's statement covering the three?

12. That there be deducted from the undistributed income of a private company on hand at the end of the 1939 fiscal period, the amount of dividends paid by the company before December 31, 1942, that were not subject to tax in the hands of the shareholders by reason of the company having been a family corporation.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Resolution 12 deals with a further purely technical matter relating to private companies. I am afraid the committee may have difficulty in following me in my explanations of these amendments relating to private companies. As the committee will have appreciated from listening to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, the law is intricate, and this is inevitably so because of the very nature of the subject being dealt with. In arriving at the amount of undistributed income, the law has to provide for the adding up of surplus earned since 1917. Since that date there have been many changes in our law, and the present amendment arises through the fact that at one time in the history of income tax there was a special provision relating to a class of company known as "family corporations". Shareholders of these family corporations were not taxable on the dividends received from them. The privilege of paying out of a family corporation dividends tax-free continued up to the end of 1942. It is necessary, therefore, in calculating undistributed income on hand at the end of 1939 for purposes of the present tax to exclude therefrom the amount which, subsequently to 1939, was paid out tax-free in the hand of the recipients. The present amendment gives effect to this exclusion.

Resolution agreed to.

13. That a tax be imposed on an individual who holds shares of a private company that paid tax on undistributed income in accordance with section 96 of the Act, which shares were held on December 31, 1944, by a corporation or other shareholder who would not have been liable to tax in respect of dividends on the shares so that the private company was not required to pay tax on the respective portion of undistributed income, such tax to be payable in respect of dividends paid to the individual out of the said respective portion of undistributed income, at the following rates:

(a) where the shares were acquired by the individual in the years 1945 and 1946—at a rate of 15 per cent; and

(b) where the shares were acquired by the individual on or after January 1, 1947—at the rate that the private company would have paid tax on the respective portions of the undistributed income if an individual had held the shares on December 31, 1944.

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of this resolution is to block a loophole in the legislation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say a word about the two different rates in (a) and (b)?

Mr. ABBOTT: One is at fifteen per cent and one is at some higher rate.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And the reason for the difference?

Mr. ABBOTT: The first rate was retroactive, and we did not feel it would be proper to impose anything higher than the minimum rate. On the subsequent one, we gave notice in January that we intended to do so, and that explains the difference in the rate.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE

ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. LaCroix for the second reading of Bill No. 133, to amend the criminal code (illegal organizations).

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wonder if, on behalf of the Minister of Justice, I might have the unanimous consent of the house to advert to this order. The house will remember that on three or four occasions, when we were dealing with public and private bills, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) declared that this one stood because it was the intention to move that instead of its being read the second time, the subject matter be referred to the committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms as soon as it was set up. If, on behalf of the Minister of Justice, I could have unanimous consent I would move:

That Bill No. 133 be not read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

That committee is to be organized early next week, it might be well if it had this bill before it in determining its agenda.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps the right hon. minister who is leading the house does not know that this matter is at present before the public accounts committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is the bill of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) dealing with the outlawing of communist organizations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That means illegal organizations, which were discussed all morning.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is a special bill dealing with the outlawing of so-called communist organizations. It was understood with the mover of the bill that, as soon as the committee was set up, we would ask that the subject matter be referred to that committee for its consideration.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs, for Mr. Abbott) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $46,723,000 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1947; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $46,723,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the parliamentary assistant going to make some statement about this?

Mr. MAYHEW: This bill is similar to bills that have been presented to the house annually for betterments and improvements to the Canadian National Railways. The bill to be founded on this resolution is for the purpose of providing authority for the financing of capital expenditures of the railway system and the retiring of miscellaneous maturing obligations, either by way of loan from the dominion or by the issue of securities of the company to the public and guaranteed by the dominion. The total amount to be provided for this purpose is limited to $46,723,000, divided as follows:

Additions and betterments (less retirements)	$18,000,000
New equipment	41,500,000
Barraute branch line	2,684,000
Acquisition of securities and retirement of capital obligations	1,057,000

That makes a total of $63,241,000, from which is deducted the amount available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization, amounting to $16,518,000, leaving a total of $46,723,000. The capital budget as set out above was approved by the standing committee on railways.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does that mean this has been before the standing committee on railways during this session, and that these items have been discussed and approved by that committee?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And when they gave this approval did they have before them the budget of the railway? In other words, are they satisfied as to the need for these moneys over and above the earnings the railway is able to make? I mean to say, if the railway committee has made its report, has it had available the estimated earnings of the railway company in order to know whether these additional capital expenditures which this resolution authorizes are justified, having regard to what the railway is able to provide itself?

Mr. MAYHEW: I understand that is correct. If the hon. member will look at page 144 of volume 3 of the proceedings of the committee on railways and canals, he will find a further break-down of these amounts.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. MUTCH: The budget and the estimated earnings, as well as the expenditures for the past year, were gone into thoroughly in the committee, and the expenditures here projected were discussed.

Mr. MAYHEW: All we are asking tonight is for the second reading of this resolution. Further debate may take place on the second reading of the bill. We should like to get that far tonight if we can. I am not barring any debate on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We can ask a question or two, can we not? As the resolution reads, it provides for this $46,723,000 for specific purposes. Among other things, it says that it shall be with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system. I understand that the first item in the break-down the parliamentary assistant has given was one of $18 million. What was that for?

Mr. MAYHEW: Additions and betterments to the road.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then there is an item of $41 million for equipment, $2 million for branch lines and $1 million for securities. And that amount is less $16 million depreciation. By taking those figures, we arrive, I understand, at the figure in the resolution. You have $73 million or $74 million in the break-down and you take off $16 million. I did not understand what it was for.

Mr. MAYHEW: That was depreciation and debt discount amortization for last year.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What portion of the amount is for financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system? That is a general expression; what does it mean.

Mr. MAYHEW: There is the sum of $1,057,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is not in the break-down we were given. Does it come under additions and betterments?

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member will find it in the break-down in the report of the railways and shipping committee.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have been unable to keep up with the reports of the committee, so that if I ask for some information I hope there will be no objection. Where does the amount for other companies come in the break-down we have been given?

Mr. MAYHEW: Some of it is for the Grand Trunk Western and some for the Central Vermont railway system.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Under which of the four items does it come?

Mr. MAYHEW: It comes under the $18 million.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): For additions and betterments?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In other words, the words "with authority to give financial aid" are included in these amounts?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: It would be interesting if we had a comparison between the amount asked for this year and that which was asked last year. I have the resolution before me. At that time $22,550,000 was asked and voted. This year the amount is $46,723,000, or over twice as much as last year. The minister said the first item for additions and betterments came to $18 million.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, the even amount.

Mr. HAZEN: Last year the amount was $14 million. This year the amount for new equipment was how much?

Mr. MAYHEW: New equipment was $41,500,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Last year, according to the figures I have here, it was $8,863,000.

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: So that there is a substantial increase there.

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: The next item was in connection with the building of the Barraute railway.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: How much was that?

Mr. MAYHEW: It was $2,684,000.

Mr. HAZEN: We had no such item as that last year; but we did have an item of $7 million for the acquisition of the Manitoba railway. The next item was for the acquisition of securities. How much was that?

Mr. MAYHEW: This year or last year?

Mr. HAZEN: This year.

Mr. MAYHEW: It is $1,057,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Last year the amount was $410,000.

Mr. MAYHEW: No, it was $840,000. That was for acquisition of securities and retirement of capital.

Mr. HAZEN: The amount for acquisition of securities, as it was given last year, was $410,000. I am reading from page 4312 of Hansard for August 5, 1946; is that correct?

Mr. MAYHEW: This $840,000 seems to be the correct amount. I am informed that is the amount which was submitted to the committee, and I understand the hon. member was a member of it.

Mr. HAZEN: I am reading from your own statement, of August 5, 1946, as it appears at page 4312 of Hansard for last year. You say there that the acquisition of securities was $410,000. Is that wrong?

Mr. MAYHEW: I am afraid I cannot answer that. I shall have to take a note of it, and see if I can answer it later.

Mr. HAZEN: Thank you. Then, the parliamentary assistant gave us this evening an item for retirement. Was there any retirement of securities?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, there is no retirement. That will be done under refunding.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the total amount you gave us this evening.

Mr. MAYHEW: It is $46,723,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Did you deduct something from that?

Mr. MITCHELL: Surely this is not cross-examination.

Mr. HAZEN: No, it is not cross-examination at all. I am trying to get information.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why don't you sit down when the parliamentary assistant is answering the questions.

Mr. HAZEN: I am putting questions and I have a perfect right to do so.

Mr. McCULLOCH (Pictou): The hon. member was in the committee.

Mr. HAZEN: I was in the committee; but it does not stop me from asking these questions.

Mr. McCULLOCH (Pictou): You could have asked them in committee.

Mr. HAZEN: I am asking them now, and I have a right to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL: You have a right to do so but do it properly.

Mr. MAYHEW: Probably the hon. member did not hear me.

Mr. HAZEN: It is difficult to write these things down, and I am trying to have it correct.

Mr. MAYHEW: If you wish to take them down I will give them to you.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I have them now, with one exception, namely the last one. May I have that again?

Mr. MAYHEW: The last one was $16,518,000.

Mr. HAZEN: What is that for?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is depreciation and debt discount amortization.

Mr. HAZEN: And what does the whole thing total? Do you add that $16 million, or do you deduct it?

Mr. MAYHEW: Naturally you take it off the total.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Two hon. members should not be standing at the same time.

Mr. HAZEN: I may be asking questions too fast; perhaps I should ask one at a time. I am not clear about the $16,000,000, and I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain whether that is added or deducted.

Mr. MAYHEW: That is the amount available from the reserves which is deducted from the amount which will be spent on the railroad of $63,214,000, leaving a balance of $46,723,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was not a member of the committee, and I should like to know where this branch line for which $2,600,000 is asked runs. Is that an estimated amount; has the contract been let, and is the work under construction?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is under construction and $50,000 was spent last year. It is planned on spending the amount which I gave this year.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is it on contract?

Mr. MAYHEW: The total amount for the whole road is $3,234,367.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that an estimate or a contract price?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is an estimated price.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is the railroad company building it?

Mr. MAYHEW: The Minister of Transport will probably be able to answer that. Most likely he will be here when the bill is up for second reading.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mayhew thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 258, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1947, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 2, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN

ARRANGEMENTS FOR VISIT TO OTTAWA, JUNE 10-12

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that the President of the United States of America will visit Ottawa on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week. The president will be accompanied by Mrs. Truman and Miss Truman.

The invitation to visit Canada was conveyed some time ago to the President, on behalf of of the government, both by His Excellency the Governor General and by myself as Prime Minister.

I am sure it will be gratifying to hon. members that, notwithstanding personal anxieties of recent weeks, the President has found it possible to carry out his visit as planned. Hon. members will likewise be delighted that Mrs. Truman and Miss Truman will be with the President.

The President and his official party will leave Washington on the afternoon of Monday, June 9, and will arrive at Ottawa at 3.30 p.m. on Tuesday, June 10. The President will be met at the Canadian border and be accompanied to Ottawa by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), and Mr. Atherton, the Ambassador of the United States.

On arrival at Ottawa, the President and Mrs. Truman will be met by His Excellency the Governor General and the Viscountess Alexander and by myself. Others present will include Madame St. Laurent and Mrs. Atherton, the Canadian Ambassador to the United States and Mrs. Wrong, and His Worship the Mayor of Ottawa and Mrs. Lewis.

The President's train will not be brought in to the Union station, but will be stopped at Island Park drive, to permit of the President and his party approaching the city and driving to government house by way of the experimental farm and the canal driveway, as was arranged at the time of the visit of the King and Queen. A guard of honour will be mounted at Rideau gate. On the President's arrival at Government house, there will be a salute of 21 guns.

In the evening, a state dinner and reception will be given at government house by Their Excellencies the Governor General and Lady Alexander.

On the morning of Wednesday, June 11, the President will address a meeting of members of both houses of parliament. Hon. members are asked to assemble in this chamber at 11.30 a.m. The proceedings will commence at 11.45 and will be broadcast over a national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

At 12.30, at the conclusion of the morning's proceedings, the President will leave the parliament buildings by the main entrance, and will drive by way of Bank street, Laurier avenue and Elgin street, to the national war memorial, where the President will lay a wreath at the foot of the memorial.

Following this ceremony, members of both houses will be afforded the honour of meeting the President at a parliamentary luncheon to be held at the Chateau Laurier.

The President and Mrs. Truman have kindly accepted an invitation to be my guests at dinner at Laurier house on Wednesday evening.

Thursday, June 12, is being kept free of official engagements so that the President and his party may have a day for relaxation. In the evening, the President and Mrs. Truman will be the guests of the United States Ambassador and Mrs. Atherton at dinner at the United States embassy.

The President will leave Ottawa, by train, later the same evening.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say a word on behalf of the official opposition concerning the announcement just made by the Prime Minister?

We are delighted to learn that President Truman is to visit Canada while parliament is in session. It is always a great privilege and pleasure to receive the head of the United States, our cousin nation and trusted ally. Particularly is that so on this occasion, because senators and members, representing Canadians from coast to coast, will be able to participate in the welcome and to hear the President speak on the floor of the Canadian House of Commons. His visit is one more indication of the good will prevailing between our peoples. Quite apart from the formal welcome to the President, we are glad to welcome him, his wife and daughter, as individuals. I am sure I speak for all members of the house when I say we feel that they are old friends. We have noticed their great capacity for friendliness, that trait which is so characteristic of citizens of the United States. We of the official opposition trust that our distinguished visitors will thoroughly enjoy their stay in Canada.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I immediately associate the C.C.F. party with what the acting leader of the opposition has so well said. I think he expresses the feeling of all of us when he says we are delighted to hear that the President of the United States has accepted the cordial invitation extended by the government and will be among us as the representative of a great people. I think we can all assure the Prime Minister that the invitation will be appreciated by the Canadian people—the acceptance of it even more so—and that they all will join in welcoming President Truman as the head of our great and friendly neighbour.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I take much satisfaction in joining with the two speakers who have preceded me in saying how much we appreciate the Prime Minister's announcement. We look forward with keen anticipation to hearing the President of the United States receive the welcome which I am sure the people of Canada will accord to him.

IDENTIFICATION OF CRIMINALS

EXTENSION OF ACT TO PERSONS CHARGED WITH EXTRADITABLE OFFENCES

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 259, to amend the Identification of Criminals Act.

He said: This is a short bill extending the provisions of the Identification of Criminals Act from those charged with indictable offences to those charged with extraditable offences.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT

PROVISION FOR CORRECTION OF ERRORS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 260, to amend the Interpretation Act.

He said: This bill cannot be explained in a sentence or two. It corrects some errors in the Interpretation Act and brings it up to date in several respects. It will be necessary to make these corrections before the work of consolidating or revising the statutes is undertaken, which should be some time within the next few years at the latest.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISPLACED PERSONS BROUGHT TO CANADA BY INDUSTRIALISTS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of the house to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the action of the government in authorizing certain Canadian industrialists to select individuals from displaced persons' camps in Europe and bring such individuals to work in Canada under contract, it being the traditional policy of parliament that the importation of indentured labour should be completely prohibited, which means that the selection of displaced persons and refugees and their admission to this country should be directed entirely by the federal government with a view to resettling these people as free human beings in such a way as to serve their best interests and those of the Canadian people as well.

Mr. SPEAKER: I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me a copy of the motion before the opening of the house. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman be given leave to move the adjournment of the house?

And leave having been given:

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I should explain at the outset that I am introducing this motion for the adjournment of the house in order that we may discuss this matter, which is of urgent public importance in view of the reports which have been appearing in the press that industrialists have proceeded to the displaced persons' camps in Europe in order to select persons for their industries in Canada. I should also like to say that I regret that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) is not in his seat this afternoon. I did send him a note before lunch telling him that I was going to raise this question, and I was hoping that he would be present this afternoon.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

If we look over the correspondence which has been tabled in the house and the various reports which have appeared in the press, it will be evident at once why it is that we have thought it well that the House of Commons should have an opportunity of discussing the policy which underlies the movement of these persons to Canada at this time. The other afternoon I asked a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and referred to the Alien Labour Act, which is chapter 109 of the revised statutes of Canada, referring him particularly to section 2. I said at once that I knew there were certain sections in that act which gave the government power to do anything that was necessary in order to promote immigration into Canada; but I would draw the attention of the house to what I believe has been the traditional policy not only of this parliament but of the parliaments of the British commonwealth. Section 2 in its principal words says:

> It shall be unlawful for any person . . . to prepay the transportation or in any way to assist, encourage or solicit the importation or immigration of any alien or foreigner into Canada, under contract or agreement . . . to perform labour or service of any kind in Canada.

So I submit at the outset that this action on the part of the government in permitting industrialists to go to Europe at this time and bring labour into this country under contract is a violation of the intent of this law. I say at once, of course, that I do not regard the bringing into Canada of persons by their relatives, under permission granted by this house through orders in council that have been tabled, as a violation of this law; but I also want to say that from time to time we have had individuals asking for the admission to this country of their relatives, and we have found it very difficult indeed to obtain permission for them to bring their relatives to this country, for a good many reasons. Yet in this particular instance, and in the instances now under discussion in the country, every facility is being given for medical examination, immigration inspection and so on, in order that these people may be brought into the country under contract.

I would draw the attention of the house to the letter written to the then Secretary of State on October 9, 1946, which was included in the correspondence tabled at my request, and to which there was no reply. In that letter the hon. member for Beauce said:

> We are producing about two carloads, nearly one-third of the machineries are idle and there is such a turn-over of female help that we are practically operating with learners most of the time. For instance, last year we had a turnover of 555 girls in this plant.

At the time that struck me as being a large turnover. If we turn to the Montreal Gazette of Saturday last, May 31, we find a statement attributed to the hon. member for Beauce, I think in error, since I believe it should have been attributed to his manager who was making the statement surrounding it, as follows:

> There are about 425 employees in the plant, and all seem to be quite satisfied with their working conditions.

If there are only 425 employees in the plant and in the previous year, according to his own words, there was a turnover of 555, I submit that careful investigation should have been made before this permission was granted. In the same letter to which I have just referred we find this statement:

> The situation here is very bad regarding female help. Last year I built ten nine-apartment houses to take care of large families. I have kept a man with an automobile travelling all over the province since a year to gather poor families that could not find their living in the agricultural places, and which had four or five girls for a family. Up to date I have been successful to bring only seven families.

Then this very interesting sentence follows:

> The trouble seems that the people have too much money to spend.

That should have immediately warned the government that the reasons for bringing in these girls might not have been those which have been stated across the country. "The trouble seems to be that the people have too much money to spend."

It is our opinion that under no circumstances should the government permit an individual employer to go abroad and import contract labour into this country. We want to see every facility provided for bringing to this country displaced persons who are suffering in the displaced persons' camps; but we think that should be done under the most careful supervision of the department of immigration, of the proper officials of the government and of this House of Commons, and not left to any individual or group of individuals who have a vested interest in the labour of distressed people, who may desire to go overseas and bring back contract labour. In the Montreal Gazette of last Saturday I find that the manager of the plant made this statement to the press:

> After the girls have paid back their fares, approximately $300 each, they are free to leave at any time.

One of the girls stated:

> We signed a contract to work for Mr. Dionne for two years. We are not allowed to leave or get married during that time.

The statement of the girl herself is that this is part of the contract. I say immediately that I saw a denial of that in the paper today.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is a married man. He should know you cannot make a contract like that.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend the minister says you cannot make a contract like that. I want to say to the Minister of Labour and the acting minister of immigration that the contract should have been tabled in this house. I asked for it, and I expected it to be found among the papers that were tabled; but the contract was not there. If this is not part of the contract, we would have known it immediately had the contract been tabled in the house. I quite agree with the Minister of Labour that if this is in the contract it is not or should not be an enforceable clause; but the very fact that this girl stated it was part of the contract lends colour to the belief that they think it is in the contract, in any event, whether or not that is so. Of course the two statements I have just read are conflicting. According to the first one, after the girls have paid back their fares of approximately $300 they are free to leave at any time. With regard to the marriage provision, in the Toronto Star in its night edition of May 31, 1947, which is in the parliamentary reading room, the manager of the plant, a Mr. Adams, is quoted as saying:

> It is a disgrace for a married woman to work down here no matter how great her need.

This may lend some colour to the suggestion that these girls were warned that they were not to marry within the two-year period.

Now I come to another very serious side of this whole matter. What are the conditions under which these girls are to work in that plant? What are the conditions under which the men will work who may be brought in by industrialists who are said to be going to Europe to choose people for the logging industry? Are these conditions to be agreed upon with representatives of the workers, or are the conditions to be laid down by an individual employer, or between employer and employee only? I notice that one of the employees in the rayon industry, Gedeon Rancour, is quoted as having said:

> There are local girls who asked for jobs two weeks ago at the Dionne mills and were refused.

Apparently the conditions in the plant are such that the local girls will not take jobs there. The same man, Rancour, who was an employee of the plant, said that—

> After working six years as a machinist at the Dionne mills, he was fired early this week, for his union sympathies. "After six years I was making only 47 cents an hour, or $28 a week."

"I have heard of only one man in the plant who is making 50 cents an hour," he continued. "Another, a machinist makes 55 cents an hour. The highest is a maintenance man who makes 60 cents an hour. Last week Lucien Pelletier, the plant superintendent, called me into the foreman's cloak room and said: 'You have kicked about the Polish girls coming here. Two union men have been here and you seemed happy about that. You had better leave'."

If that statement is true it gives a clue to one of the reasons why the employer is anxious to bring this type of labour into the plant, and why it is that there is no union in this particular plant.

The organizer for the Textile Workers of America, Bob Gareau, is quoted as follows:

"I have never been in a town where I have been so enthusiastically received," he said. "I have talked to most of the Dionne employees and I have had men who are heads of families tell me they are making no more than $14 a week. One girl told me she is making $11 a week and that her father is making $15 a week. I haven't spoken to a man yet who makes more than $28 a week. Most of them make from $11 to $15."

If these conditions are as outlined in the public press then I say the government of Canada, and particularly the department of immigration, have been derelict in their duty in not going into this matter more carefully than apparently has been done, and seeing to it that these girls were not brought into the country under the conditions which have been described.

It is true that arrangements have been made for their reception. I have no doubt that the conditions under which they will live will be good morally, but that does not in any way mitigate the situation.

No one can accuse me of having religious prejudices. By way of preface I should say that back in 1920 and 1921, when I was an officer of the teachers federation in my province, my own church, the Anglican church, set out to bring in a number of teachers on the basis of their being members of that church. I opposed that, because I did not think religion should in any sense govern the entry of a person into Canada or his employment when he gets here. It is unfortunate that the religious angle enters into this matter at all, and that the people who come in are chosen for their religious faith. It is a mistake, and it is something the government and all of us will regret.

I say again that we are not opposed to the bringing of persons to this country from displaced persons camps. We have urged it. We have urged it publicly across the country, and in this house. We have joined with others on all sides of the house and in the country in urging that Canada should do more for these suffering people than she has done up to the present time. I repeat that now. But, sir, we have an obligation to the people in displaced persons camps who are to be brought here, to see to it that conditions under which they come are such as we would expect a free Canada to provide for them on their arrival—people who should have come here, as the motion to adjourn says, as free human beings and not as contract labour.

The history of this parliament and of parliaments of nations of the commonwealth associated with us are filled with discussions of indentured labour, and over the week-end I looked up some of these discussions. In the discussions which occurred in 1905 and 1906 in the British House of Commons I saw how repugnant indentured labour was to the Liberal government which was elected in Great Britain in 1906. Indentured labour should be equally repugnant, not only to a government which calls itself Liberal—with a capital L—but to those in this country who share what we call the liberal tradition, with a small l—that condition of freedom of thought, freedom of action and freedom of association we all prize so highly.

The Minister of Labour has entered into agreement regarding another group of people who are now in camps. But when one contrasts the agreement which has been entered into with respect to this other group with the understanding or the contract under which these girls are entering, and the guarantees which the men are to receive in the logging industry, one sees immediately the great difference. I understand that there is a shortage of skilled labour, for example, in the three needle workers trades. The manufacturers and the three unions involved I am told have cooperated and have seen the Minister of Labour, have come to an understanding among themselves—and I believe the Minister of Labour has approved that understanding—for the relief of that shortage of labour in the textile or needleworking trades by the entry into this country of suitably skilled persons.

The international ladies garment workers, the hat and millinery workers, and the men's garment workers organization—the amalgamated clothing union—entered into negotiations which the manufacturers and with the minister, with the result that they unanimously agreed that the government should permit the entry of several hundred skilled persons recruited from displaced persons camps for the industry. They are to be screened by the government, and the government is bringing them in. The government is to supervise the immigration of these people in every particular, although it is suggested, I am told, that liaison persons representing the unions and the industry might accompany the officials in order to see that the persons so chosen are skilled labour as required. But the agreement is that such persons as come in under this arrangement shall not be called upon, I am told, to assume any responsibility, personally, other than that which any other immigrant would assume in coming to this country—not even repayment of their travelling expenses. It is laid down that the employer shall provide union wages and conditions for the workers who come in for entry into these trades. That is an entirely different kind of agreement from the one under which these girls are coming in. There is no stipulation that they shall join unions—although I say frankly it is quite likely they will, because it so happens that the trades I have just mentioned are pretty well organized, and in all probability they will join their unions.

I know it is said that we run the risk of bringing communists into this country. Well, there has been careful screening of those in the displaced persons camps in Europe, and in the main I would say that practically in all cases the people who are communists have returned to their countries of origin, or, if fascists, have been evicted. The communists have governments with which they agree. In all probability the people who remain in the displaced persons camps are those of various political views, many of them similar to the views held by hon. members on various sides of the house, including those of the party for which I am speaking today.

The understanding I have just mentioned is the kind of planned entry into Canada of which one can approve. It is filling a need in Canada; it is extending to people who have been given asylum and refuge an opportunity to find a home under proper conditions in this country, and to become, as we all are, free citizens of a free country, free to associate and to do as they please as long as they turn out their day's work according to the best of their ability and observe the law.

Should anything go wrong with any one of the Polish girls, and should the department of immigration be called upon to deport her—perhaps not for a violation of the contract, because that could not be done, but for some other misdemeanour under the regulations—to what country is she to be deported? These girls are not German citizens, even though they come from Germany. They are Polish nationals. May I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) that it would have been at least the kind of courtesy for which the right hon. gentleman is so deservedly known to have notified the minister of the Polish government in this city that this large group of Polish nationals was coming into this country.

Mr. BRADETTE: A farce.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say it would have been a courtesy to do so. Others may not agree with that point of view, but if any one of these girls has to be deported to Poland, what will happen? May I say to the hon. gentlemen who are objecting, the Polish government is a government friendly to this country; it is a government with which we maintain friendly relations. I am a little bit tired of hearing friendly governments—I may disagree with their ideology, but a year or so ago they were our gallant allies and they were praised to the skies for the sacrifices that they undertook in the common cause—being met with the kind of response that we have just heard when I said it would have been a matter merely of courtesy to let the Polish minister know, because at some time or other one or more of these Polish nationals may have to be returned to the country of origin.

The bringing of indentured labour into this country is against all the traditions of our democratic institutions. I could find no precedent for it in recent years. In order to find a precedent I had to go back to the early days of this century when employers brought oriental labour into this country for their railroad operations. I am not comparing the conditions under which these girls are being brought in with the conditions under which that labour was brought in, but I am saying that this is a violation of our traditional position; it is a violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms; it is a violation of the principles we approved when we signed the charter of the united nations. These people should have come in under the control of the government of Canada and under conditions which had been carefully looked into to see that they were to be given every opportunity of being integrated into the life of this country as Canadian citizens and finding happy homes here.

I have moved that we adjourn in order to discuss this matter which is of particular urgency because of the press reports which tell us, first, that if this experiment is satisfactory as far as the owner of this mill is concerned, other girls will be brought into the country under the same conditions; and second, that other industrialists are going over on the same sort of mission. We say that if we are to have a planned immigration policy for the relief of human misery it should be carried out by this parliament; it should be done according to the best traditions of Canada. As members of this House of Commons we should say in no uncertain terms that we disapprove the manner in which this deal was undertaken.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to tell you that I rise to speak on this motion without any notice. Obviously there is no notice of a motion of this kind. May I congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Coldwell) who has just taken his seat. I agree heartily with him that this is a matter of urgent public importance, and I am pleased indeed that he moved the motion he did.

In dealing with this matter we find that there are two desirable things which to some extent are in opposition to one another; hence our thinking may be a bit confused. I am sure we are all agreed that this country should do all it possibly can for the people in displaced persons camps in Europe. On the other hand we are aware that certain industries are short of labour; certainly labour is very short indeed in some of the heavier industries. So we want two things: We want to assist these persons, who are living under conditions which are far from favourable, and at the same time we want to supply our industries with necessary labour. It seems to me that the only place where there is any room for logical difference is as to the methods employed to bring about those two most desirable objectives.

I must say that I go a long way with the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) on the broad statement that he made, that this should be a matter of general government policy. I realize that it must be government policy, and I use the word "general" for this reason: it is not so long ago that we in this House of Commons were discussing and dealing with a general immigration policy. It seems to me that if at that time there was in the mind of the government the idea of bringing in contract labour, it should have been disclosed then. We should not have been left in the position of having an announcement made as a fait accompli, having the order in council already passed and the announcement made that the man was in Europe, that being the first we learned about it in the House of Commons.

I make that criticism, sir, with very great respect. I fully realize that many things have to be done quickly in order that any government may operate, but it does seem to me that this is a sharp departure from the policy which has been followed in this country for a long time, and that it should not have been done without the house first having been taken into the confidence of the government. I realize that the minister of immigration has been ill, and that it may take some time for other persons to take over his onerous duties, but it is at least unfortunate that the house did not have an opportunity of discussing this sharp departure in policy until after the thing had actually been done.

I turn to another side of the picture, and that is the legal question. I am not going to decide it at the moment; I think that is probably the government's headache. Offhand I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is a little wrong in his law and that he will find an exception in the act which bars its application to the circumstances we have at the present time. I am not going to say anything more with respect to this particular problem except to emphasize once more what we have tried to emphasize all along in this house, and that is that major changes in policy are matters for the House of Commons, and we should not be told about them after they have taken place.

With respect to the separate issue in the mills outside of Montreal I intend to make no comment. I feel that I have not sufficient facts on which to comment. I am sorry that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) is not here, because it seems to me that he could have had many things to say which might have cast a different light on the reports we are getting through the press. So with respect to that I say nothing by way of either criticism or commendation, except that I relate it as a glaring example of a change in traditional policy, to use the phrase used by my hon. friend. With respect, sir, may I suggest that matters of this kind be brought before the House of Commons where we can do a bit of digging when a change in policy is contemplated? I agree with the change. We are all flooded with letters from persons who want to come here but who perhaps do not come within a certain degree of relationship and so on, but we shall never fulfil our industrial needs with that class. It seems to me important that we shall not leave here without having something more definite than farm work regulations in order that the industry of this country may be able to carry on, and in order that we may not have the type of unfavourable newspaper publicity that we have had in the past two weeks in respect to these one hundred poor girls who think they may be moving into heaven and who certainly have come from almost unbelievable hell.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house very long, but I do feel that I should say just a word. I believe that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party, has performed a real service to this country by bringing before the house this question of the importation of indentured labour; for that is exactly what it is. It has no relationship whatever to an immigration policy; it is strictly the importation of indentured labour, and I speak for this group when I say that we are opposed to that practice. It does not relate itself in any way to a well-defined democratic immigration policy.

I believe, too, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has said, that there are grave doubts in the minds of the people across this country whether the practice may not become a fixture. I do not want to see anyting like that in this country.

The purpose of an immigration policy, it seems to me, should be twofold: in the first place to help populate this country with desirable people and in the second place to do our share at least in assisting these unfortunate souls who find themselves today in the displaced persons camps in Europe. I want to see Canada do her share in that, of course, but I should like to see those who do come to Canada brought here under the careful supervision of this government and of this parliament, and not under contract to any industrialist. I am definitely opposed to immigration by vested interests. Our group in this house are united in demanding a well-defined and comprehensive immigration policy that will be operated in the interests of the people of Canada and of the people who do come to Canada. We certainly cannot hold up our heads with pride in what we do unless the people who come to our shores come as free men and free women.

I am surprised in the extreme, Mr. Speaker, that the government of this country has permitted an industrialist to go over to Europe and to select, to screen by himself, to inspect or to arrange for inspection and obtain transportation for substantial groups of workers and bring them to this country in a comparatively short period of time. I have had considerable dealings with the Department of Immigration in an effort to open the door to desirable Europeans, and I find excuses being given all the time, excuses like this: Oh, we cannot do anything now because we have not the facilities for inspection; we have no facilities for gathering these people and seeing to it that they have no communicable diseases; furthermore, we cannot possibly get transportation to bring them here. That is what is said when applications are made to bring in men, women and children, relatives of those who originally came from Europe and have been good citizens of Canada for many years. I say it is a reflection on the government and it certainly is a condemnation of the lack of definite immigration policy, that these worthy people have been denied entry to our country while at the same time industrialists are able to go from this country to Europe and gather together the people they want and bring them here under special contract, and in a very short time. I am not at all satisfied that the sort of thing that is being done by the member for Beauce is in any way in the interests of this country.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, while this is purely an immigration question and comes under the jurisdiction of that department, my department is to some degree tied up with the present immigration policy. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke this afternoon of indentured labour and referred to conditions in Britain in 1906 under the Liberal party. No one knows better than my hon. friend that you cannot compare this policy with the conditions that existed in South Africa at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking of the principle of indentured labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking of the same thing. I have a vivid recollection of what happened in 1906.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So have I. I was there, and I know it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was in Great Britain at that time. This is just a red herring that my hon. friend draws across the trail—purely propaganda.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Socialist nonsense.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not use it in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL: You cannot blow hot and cold on this thing. People in this country who are great champions of the displaced persons in Europe, when a move is made by this government, at once throw up a political smoke-screen to destroy the policy set in motion.

Mr. LOW: This is not a policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: You can call it what you like.

Mr. COLDWELL: We appreciate a proper policy.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend talks of slavery and the Polish people in these displaced persons camps. Why do they not want to go back to Poland? Let him ask himself that question.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not want to send them back from this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: I listened to my hon. friend when he was making his speech; I did not interrupt him when he talked about the Polish people. I agreed with him that we should not take too seriously what we see in the newspapers. The other fellow has a right to be heard. My hon. friend, who has a sense of justice, should have at least waited a couple of days and held the inquest when the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) was in his seat.

Mr. COLDWELL: I expected that he would be here.

Mr. KNOWLES: He is a member of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is a member of this house; his place is here today.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has he permission to be absent all this time?

Mr. MITCHELL: He got back only yesterday.

Mrs. STRUM: How long has he been away?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend had travelled as many miles as the hon. member in question has travelled, she would not be here either. There are people in the House of Commons who have something else to do besides play politics.

Mr. COLDWELL: He was elected to do a job in the House of Commons.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was he on government business?

Mr. MITCHELL: You can't take it. You were in Winnipeg a week attending a convention.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind hon. members that an hon member who has the floor should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mrs. STRUM: The minister is drawing a red herring across the trail.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is an element of what we sometimes call British justice. I am convinced of this, when the hon. member is here and after hon. members have listened to his side of the question they will not be so severe as they have been in the last few days.

My hon. friend talked of precedents. I do not think there is a precedent for the displaced persons camps in our lifetime. When we bring these people to Canada in large groups the government has some responsibility.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a minute.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what we have been saying.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am glad to hear my hon. friends say "hear, hear."

Mr. COLDWELL: Assume that responsibility.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have some responsibility in that regard.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What are you doing about it?

Mr. IRVINE: What are the responsibilities?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my genial friend from Cariboo will keep quiet for five minutes we shall get along in what I am trying to do. I think we have some responsibility in this regard. Recently under the jurisdiction of my department there was a movement of Polish soldiers from Great Britain and Italy. In connection with that, of course, there was an understanding. You can call it a contract if you wish. There was an understanding. Why should there be an understanding? I do not know what this contract is at the moment.

Mr. COLDWELL: You should.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know I should know everything, but unlike the hon. member I do not. There was an understanding. When you bring people into this country in the mass or in large groups there is responsibility on the government of the day.

Take my hon. friend's province of Saskatchewan.

An hon. MEMBER: You take it.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, you take it; I do not want it. You may have it. My hon. friend knows there was a recent case of ill treatment of a Polish soldier in Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Fortunately it is the only instance that has come to my attention since the movement of these men to Canada.

but we have some responsibility to that young Polish soldier to see that he is placed on another farm where he will be assimilated into the life of this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: He was not under a contract to stay where he was.

Mr. MITCHELL: You cannot blow hot and cold on this thing; you have to assume some responsibility. How did these people come into Canada under the terms of the order in council? It is perfectly clear that they came here under the minimum wage laws existing in Quebec. Let me say this about wages. I do not know what it costs to live in this town of St. Georges in Quebec. Do not forget this: I have been a high wage man all my life: I think that is well known in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did the minister say "highway"?

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought better of the minister than that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to say to my reverend friends and school teachers across the way that at least I worked in industry for my living.

Mr. COLDWELL: The rest of us did.

Mr. MITCHELL: When I left Hamilton I belonged to an organization that was the highest paid of its class in the trade in the dominion. I have always been a high wages man; I believe in it. But do not forget that wages are relative, as I shall indicate before I get much farther. I do not know what it costs to live in St. Georges. I am not defending the minimum wage laws of the province of Quebec, not for one minute. But I would guarantee that the cost of living in that community is somewhat different from what it is in New York city or in the city of Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Or in Ottawa.

Mr. MITCHELL: Or even in Ottawa, as my hon. friend knows quite well. What is the policy? My hon. friend talked about precedents. What is the policy of the British government in this regard? It is not any different from our own.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it is; the trades unions are helping to bring these people in.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a minute.

Mr. COLDWELL: No one comes in without the consent of the trades unions.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let the record speak for itself. May I say this about the trade unions and the criticism which has been directed to my department and the department of immigration in connection with this matter, and about some of the statements made over the air by a half-wit who sits in this gallery. What was said yesterday afternoon does not add anything to the problem.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Which gallery?

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us take the question of a contract.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why attack a man who cannot reply?

Mr. MITCHELL: He attacked me yesterday afternoon when I could not reply.

Mr. COLDWELL: I heard it. I thought it was a defence of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are attacking Dionne when he is not in the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: He ought to be here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He should be in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Your own men were away at Winnipeg for ten days.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Half the C.C.F. are away today.

Mr. COLDWELL: Look around you and see how many of your own followers are away.

Mr. McCANN: Ring the bell and see where they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Ring the bell.

Mr. COLDWELL: Four complete rows of empty seats.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You were beaten last week; you just cannot take it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hold in my hand a leaflet for issue to displaced persons of the British Minister of Labour and National Service which reads:

Volunteer scheme for recruitment of displaced persons for employment in Great Britain.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is from whom?

Mr. MITCHELL: The British Ministry of Labour.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not some employer?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, the British Ministry of Labour.

Mr. MARTIN: A socialist government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I read:

Conditions of work and rates of pay. The general range of weekly time rates of wages for unskilled men in Great Britain varies according to the occupation from 80s. to about 100s—

Mr. COLDWELL: A week.

Mr. MITCHELL: A week. I continue:

—and for skilled men from about 90s. to about 120s., for unskilled women the range is about 50s. to 65s. Skilled workers in a number of industries are paid at piece rates which enable the average worker to earn more than the minimum time rates. Normal full-time hours of work generally range from 44 to 48 hours per week.

In the case of female domestic workers in hospitals and similar institutions in England and Wales, the minimum wage is 64s. for a forty-eight hour week, with a deduction of 23s. a week for food, accommodation and laundry, leaving a cash balance of 41s. In Scotland the deduction for food and accommodation is 25s., leaving a cash balance of 39s. If my hon. friends wish to do so, they will be able to work that out for themselves; I think the rate of exchange is about $4 to the pound. These are the conditions of entry. Workers will enter Great Britain for an initial period of twelve months subject to good behaviour and to the specific condition that they undertake only employment selected by the Ministry of Labour and National Service—

Mr. COLDWELL: By the Ministry of Labour!

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. That is just what we are doing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. COLDWELL: No; that is just what we object to.

Mr. MITCHELL:

—and on the clear understanding that they will only be allowed to change their employment with the consent of that department.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is getting pretty close to indentured labour, I would say.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no; that is the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: What difference does it make whether it is the government or anybody else? When we are talking about freedom, let us be frank about it. You cannot have a socialist freedom and another kind of freedom.

Mr. COLDWELL: What kind of freedom is this?

Mr. IRVINE: What is the minister reading from?

Mr. MITCHELL:

This period of permitted stay will be extended further if the individual complies with the employment conditions set out immediately above and behaves as a worthy member of the British community.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

There you are. I do not think there is a great deal of difference. Mind you, I am not offering any criticism of that. I am here; they are there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They will never be over here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. That is too plain for my hon. friends to understand. I believe that we have an obligation in this country, particularly with regard to these mass movements which at the moment are necessary from the displaced persons camps in Germany. I am one of those who believe in people emigrating under their own steam. I came to this country under my own steam.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. Some of my state-planning friends who preach pie in the sky do not understand the realities of life. I was one of nine children—if I may be allowed to make this personal reference—and my father died when I was eleven years of age. I came to this country when I was eighteen. I never took a nickel from anybody in this country, and I went to work the day after I got here. I did not go to some theological college.

Mr. COLDWELL: Neither did I.

Mr. MITCHELL: I went to work as did my hon. friend. It is a disadvantage, in my judgment, when you have—as we have today—in any country or any clime, immigration en masse. When these people get to the new country they are different from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself, who went out to work and made our own way in life. The first thing they do is to form an organization and pass a resolution, "Therefore be it resolved" that somebody else do the resolving.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do say this, Mr. Speaker—whether you like it or not—that this nation has been built by people who came to Canada irrespective of race, colour or creed, under the conditions I have just mentioned.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Not to work at twenty-five cents an hour.

Mr. MITCHELL: Probably the hon. member has never done a day's work in his life.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): That is what you think.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I want that remark withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member if he rises to a question of privilege or to a point of order.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, to a point of privilege. I ask that the remark just made be withdrawn.

An hon. MEMBER: Which one?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): The one to the effect that I never did an honest day's work in my life. I demand a withdrawal of that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether you got me correctly. What I should have said was, "before you came into this house".

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the minister that before I ever came into this house I worked as hard as he ever did and perhaps a lot harder. These hands of mine have had callouses on them from the work I did.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Any callouses the minister had were not on his hands.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not believe that the conduct of the members of the House of Commons just now is such as to make a contribution to the debate. I would ask hon. members to address the Speaker and to be silent when another hon. member has the floor. If anyone wishes to interrupt and ask a question, he should first rise in his place and ask permission to do so.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): As a matter of privilege, I ask for the withdrawal of that remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We have listened to the hon. gentleman. If he wants to rise to a point of order or a question of privilege, he should do so, state it briefly and resume his seat.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): With all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I did, and I am still waiting for the remark to be withdrawn. I asked for that on a point of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What do you want withdrawn?

Mr. HOMUTH: Callouses.

An hon. MEMBER: They are not withdrawn; they are cut off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MITCHELL: To keep peace in the family, Mr. Speaker, after seeing my hon. friend's hands I withdraw any implication I might have made against him. However, I think I am entitled to make my speech without these interruptions—although, mind you, I enjoy them.

An hon. MEMBER: So do we.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not like some people who can dish it out but can't take it. I enjoy it. But I do say this, Mr. Speaker, by the very nature of things we must in every way possible protect these people who are coming from Europe. I believe that every province in Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island has fair wage laws. The order in council which permitted these girls to enter the province of Quebec and work in Beauce recognizes the jurisdiction of these minimum wage laws.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister permit a question about the order in council?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask the question only for the purpose of obtaining information. On April 1, 1947, an order in council, P.C. 1193, was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen):

> . . . that as there is a shortage of textile workers in Canada, the provisions of order in council P.C. 695, dated March 21, 1931, . . . be waived in behalf of one hundred immigrants as herein described.

Those are the one hundred textile workers. It has been stated that similar applications have been made by other industrial concerns. Has any other order in council been passed waiving the order in council of 1931 which would deny these persons admission to Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the last one?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the only order in council?

Mr. MITCHELL: As far as I know. I am almost convinced of it, but I will say it is the only one as far as my memory serves me, if my hon. friend will accept that for now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There has not been one since April 1?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not trying to mislead my friend; not intentionally, anyway. To get back to my argument, as I say the girls in question are being brought to Canada within the four corners of our immigration legislation. As the order in council states, the prevailing rates of wages, as laid down by the minimum wage laws of the province of Quebec, will apply; and as I believe I indicated a short while ago every province of Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island has legislation of that description. It may be unfortunate that it has become necessary, as they have found in Great Britain, to move people from these displaced persons camps in groups. No one knows the difficulties and complications of an undertaking of that kind. The emotions of people from one end of this country to the other are aroused by such a policy. That is inescapable, but I am convinced that these girls certainly have found a better home in Beauce that they had in Germany. It was my privilege to visit those parts of Europe in peace time, and I know something of the conditions that existed in eastern Europe at that time. Yesterday, I think it was, one of these girls told a newspaper man she had a varicose vein caused by pulling a plough. Women do not do those things in any province of Canada, to my knowledge; nor do they do those things on the continent of North America. By the pictures this morning I noticed that these girls were well dressed, and I understand the clothing was provided by their employer.

Mr. HOMUTH: The men won't even push a plough.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true, too. I do believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are under an obligation to pull our weight on the oar in connection with the movement of these displaced persons from Europe. Let me say also that people of my own blood are concerned about immigration into this country of people of British stock. At the moment the door is wide open; let us be frank and honest about that. Let us not throw out a smoke-screen in connection with these unfortunate people by suggesting that we are treating one race in one way and another race in another. All they have to do is get passage from Great Britain, and provided they are healthy they can come to Canada. The same applies to South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and the United States; and I think the country should know that. When you begin to move people, however, there is always objection. When you move the Poles, some other racial group objects. When you move the Jews, some other racial group says, "We should not have Jews in this country." When you move the Ukrainians or any other European group, somebody in this dominion, under a free press and freedom of speech, will take objection. I believe we have to be big about this thing, that we must be humane about it, and take these people out of real slavery and let them be absorbed and assimilated into the life of this dominion. That is what my hon. friend urged at the united nations. I know quite well that if he were in charge of the immigration policy of this country there would be people who would criticize, from their own points of view, any policy he might set in motion. I have had many wires, as all members and ministers get wires, in connection with the movement of these displaced persons to this country. They are all couched in the same language; and those of us who understand the labour movement know something about the phraseology used by these people who think anyone who is not a communist is a fascist; and that goes for every party in this house. If our judgment is to be influenced by such people, how are we to fashion an immigration policy?

I hope that when the history of this movement of this year and next year is reviewed we may find that these Polish soldiers who fought so nobly on the side of the allies during the war have been absorbed into the life of this country; and that goes for all the displaced persons that we are ready to receive into our family circle. So let us argue it on that basis. Let us argue from a humanitarian point of view and get it on that plane, so that after the years have rolled by these people, like tens of thousands of others in Canada, will be able to say they are glad they came here and worked their way and raised and educated their families.

Mr. HOMUTH: And didn't grouse about the country all the time, either.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course not. I am not unmindful of the forces in this and every other democratic country, whether it be Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Great Britain or the United States, that are working to create confusion of the worst kind. Those of us who have been raised in that atmosphere know something about it. So today I would ask hon. members to suspend judgment in the case of the member for Beauce until he is here to answer for himself in this high court of parliament. I do not know the hon. member intimately, but I have spoken to him and he always struck me as a kindly person, as a high type of Canadian. Viewed in the light of conditions as they exist at the moment, his judgment and our judgment may have been shortsighted; I don't know. I do not believe it was, but we should not take a short view of this thing. Let us wait a year or two and see the position of these girls in our society at that time. For goodness sake don't throw cold water on every Englishman, Irishman and Scotsman who wants to come to Canada, or on every Jew, every Ukrainian, every Pole or other European who wants to come to this country. Let us be big and broad about this question of immigration. I believe the vast majority of the people of Canada want to assume all their obligations in connection with these displaced persons in Europe.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has spoken about the lumber operators. Let me tell him that there will be immigration officials and officials of my own to do the screening. That has already been arranged. Let me say this, too—and I have said it before—that nothing my department will do will consciously endanger the wage standards of Canadian workingmen.

I know some of those people at the head of the lakes who have been making statements in the last few days. They are not members of the Progressive Conservative party; they are not members of the C.C.F.; they are not members of the Social Credit party or of the Liberal party. They are members of another party. Perhaps that is some indication why these Polish people and people from other countries in Europe do not want to go back to the place from which they came. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) knows about the Ukrainians; he knows that people from Germany do not want to go back to the place they came from. He knows it, and every hon. member in the house knows it. No; they want to come here where there is a measure of real freedom, notwithstanding the expression of opinion of any member of the House of Commons or any person in Canada. They want to come here where there is an opportunity to live their lives in an atmosphere of freedom—freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, those great freedoms which have made this country what it is.

I would ask in conclusion that we suspend judgment on the hon. member for Beauce until he has had his day in court.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to the motion before the house; and in doing so let me say at the outset that I speak for myself only.

If my memory serves me correctly the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F., has not so far risen in his place and spoken on the subject of immigration. I presume he felt that that question was too dangerous politically to tackle—

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. HLYNKA: —from whatever side you take it, so he delegated some of the lesser lights in his group to take up this question. Of course he was just watching the developments.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. First of all, I did speak on immigration. And may I say this, that this is not a one-man party, and when one of this group leads off on a particular topic he speaks for all of us, myself included. But I spoke on it. Let me say again that this is not a one-man party.

Mr. HLYNKA: It is true that the leader of a group has the right to assign certain topics to his followers; but what I would point out is that the leader of the C.C.F. considered the question of immigration less important than his present motion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Rubbish.

Mr. MacINNIS: He spoke on it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I spoke on immigration, as a matter of fact.

Mr. HLYNKA: Let me continue with my remarks, and hon. members may rise in their places and speak for themselves, or, if they wish, contradict what I am saying. But I should like to say this, that if the leader of the C.C.F. had a sister, a daughter or a mother in a displaced persons camp, he would not have made the motion. It is fine to stand in the House of Commons and criticize the government for the little which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and one or two other ministers have done in agreeing to bring in a few of these people to Canada. But the fact remains that the question of displaced persons is one of the most acute questions facing the United States government, the British government, or any other government which has anything to do with this matter.

The leader of the C.C.F., I presume after reading the statement made the other day by Mr. Mosher, and thinking it would be a popular stand to take in the House of Commons—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, apart from the fact that that is untrue, the hon. member has no right to impute motives to any other member in the house. He is doing that, and I ask that it be withdrawn. That sort of thing is pretty contemptible.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) must not impute motives to any other member.

Mr. HLYNKA: I have no intention of imputing motives, but I do presume that the leader of the C.C.F. must have read Mr. Mosher's statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact I have not.

Mr. HLYNKA: It was exactly along the lines which the hon. member has adopted.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact I have not read it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) read it as well?

Mr. HLYNKA: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not read it, then it is a strange coincidence.

May I say at once that I am not defending the immediate immigration policy of the present government. I feel it has been at least a year and a half too late in any action it has taken. Therefore I say that I am not defending the government's immediate immigration policy. But I must say this, that if we have individuals within this nation who are willing to undertake to bring in a number of persons whom they can employ, then, I say, such individuals are rendering a great service, both to the displaced persons and to Canada. And the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) from the very fact that he has undertaken to bring in about a hundred girls, has done so much for these people that I am certain his name is now known to every person in the displaced persons camps.

As I listened to the ramblings across the floor this afternoon, when hon. members were poking fun at one another while discussing this tragic issue, I concluded it was nothing to be proud of. This is one of the most tragic situations that has ever faced the defenceless and homeless people of Europe. And yet the leader of the C.C.F.—

Mr. NICHOLSON: And the leader of the Social Credit party.

Mr. HLYNKA: Will the hon. member allow me to speak for myself, please? I know that the C.C.F. group believe in dictating their views to everybody else, but I want to speak for myself. Perhaps it was the intention of the hon. member to throw me off my line of thought. Just the same, I think I can make clear what I have in mind.

If the leader of the C.C.F. were sincere in this issue he would have risen in his place and placed a proposition before the government asking it to pass an order in council to guarantee that these girls will not be underpaid. That would have been a noble stand on his part. He did not do that. Oh, no, he wanted to create an issue and raise the bogey of these people coming in, in order to hinder public opinion on the question of immigration. Hon. members who have constituents who have mothers, daughters, sons and other relatives in displaced persons camps have been endeavouring to prod the government ahead a little so that something might be done to protect these people. When the order in council was placed on Hansard we immediately heard the cry from the C.C.F. group. For two or three weeks they have been heckling the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). At first it looked as though they just wanted to find out from the minister certain information, but the fact remains that they are showing opposition to the relief of these unfortunate displaced persons. That is the stand of that group. For too long has that group been appealing to people of other than Anglo-Saxon origin for support. They have now shown their true colours as to where they stand on this issue.

I travelled through Europe for several months and I found that these people did not have a friend in the world. They have been moved around from place to place. It was admitted in the senate committee on immigration and labour that the directors of displaced persons camps had moved people from camp to camp as many as five times in three months, in order to force them to go back under soviet rule. It is an awful state of affairs when people are moved so often and made so miserable. As soon as they had built up their little churches in the camp, as soon as they had suitable places in which to sleep and study, as soon as they had places in which to teach their children, the order to move would come from headquarters run by gentlemen with the same mentality as those who are sponsoring this motion.

Mr. BURTON: That is a lie.

Mr. HLYNKA: I want to thank the hon. gentleman for his kind word. That was the first word that came to his mind and it indicates the range of his vocabulary. These people have been made so miserable for two years that it is time we had a few more Mr. Dionnes. I should like to see hon. members of various groups rise in their places and say that if the Dionne mills exploit these girls they will protest and demand that the government do something to protect their interests. But instead we are having the issue confused so that labour will not want to have these people come in. That is not the right thing to do. These displaced persons have no money, and surely it is a noble thing for some one in Canada to be willing to pay their fares in order to save these people. A certain portion of their pay will be deducted, but that will work no hardship on them and in the meantime their lives will be saved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HLYNKA: My friends can jibe. If they want to get me warmed up, I will get ready. The best of the displaced persons are being creamed off by the South American countries and others. If we do not hurry we shall not get the best type of people. I am glad that there are industrialists who want to bring in these people. It seems to me that by moving the present motion the C.C.F. group is taking a slap at private enterprise. Perhaps some hon. members did not notice it, because the motion was couched in such a way that they felt it was a good thing to support it. But the facts of the situation are that it is a slap at industry for trying to bring in these people,. As far as I am concerned I want to congratulate industry upon trying to bring in these people.

In the British zone in Germany people are supposed to be fed 1,550 calories a day, that is, members of the adult working population. However, in reality the military authorities and UNRRA have been forced to cut that down to between 1,000 and 1,100 calories a day, which is one-third of the calories required by a working man. Can we let these people starve? Can we let them be faced with slow starvation? Surely we must take them out. In the United States zone they would like to feed the people 2,000 calories a day, but in reality they are able to give them only from 1,500 to 1,600 calories a day, just one-half of what a normal adult requires to keep healthy.

If anyone agrees to bring in one or 100 or 1,000 of these persons it would be only right to let him do so. I asked the head of the camp at Hanover where I visited, how many children there were in the camp. He told me there were 900. Then I asked about their health and he told me that ninety-three out of the 900 were T.B. cases. I think hon. members will agree that that is a high proportion. Are we to sit back and attack the minister for allowing a few of these people to come in and thus reduced the problem in Europe?

It is in the interests of Great Britain; it is in the interests of the United States; it is in the interests of Canada to reduce the displaced persons problem as quickly as possible. You cannot sign a peace treaty with Austria and leave displaced persons there. You cannot sign a peace treaty with Germany and leave displaced persons there. The pre-war population of the United States zone of Germany, if my memory serves me correctly, was 13,000,000 people, but today, on account of the number of Germans who have been expelled from the territory held by Poland and Czechoslovakia, there are 18,000,000 people. That area simply cannot support that population.

The food required by some of the displaced persons in the British zone is derived from German sources. Surely we should realize that. I cannot understand how mature men —some of them are at least big enough physically—cannot see through the problem and hope to have this European problem solved. Surely it is about time they studied the situation. Time is running on; this is one of the most acute problems of today, and it must be solved.

A number of my constituents and others whom I know across this country have asked for my assistance in trying to get permission from the government to bring in their children and other relatives. A few months ago I asked the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Glen) for permission for certain people to come to Canada. The thing dragged on for months and months. Today I have three letters on my desk saying I need no longer bother because the three girls who were to be brought into Canada are dead. I could give you their names, Mr. Speaker. This is not something to wrangle and joke over in the house; it is serious.

I sincerely congratulate the Minister of Labour and other ministers who have consulted with him on having agreed to issue permits to bring in some of these displaced persons. The lives of these unfortunates are so miserable that I plead with hon. members and with all groups in the house not to use this issue cheaply, not just play around with it, because it is too tragic.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to deal particularly with one point on speaking to the motion moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). However, since he took his seat there have occurred in this debate a number of incidents to which I wish to refer before proceeding with what I had intended to say.

May I say this—and I say it with a considerable degree of sadness—that I regret that any member of this house should consider it necessary for him to stoop to the depths of misrepresentation and misinformation that the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) did.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. HLYNKA: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his remark that I misrepresented anything. Having seen these people, I know the problem a little better than the hon. gentleman does.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw:

Mr. BURTON: In support of my statement, I have in my hand Hansard of Tuesday, February 11, of this session, where at page 330, my leader had this to say:

> Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am going to join those tonight who have expressed regret that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) has not presented something of a policy to the house, when we are discussing the important measure which is before us. I think the time has come when this country should have a policy in regard to immigration, and more particularly that phase of immigration to which Canada is committed by her signature, namely the relief of those persons in displaced persons camps in Europe, who are known as refugees and sufferers from the war.

That, I think, is sufficient to support the statement I made, and I shall not withdraw my remark. Any person who is so busy trying to think up ways and means of devising twists and turns to slander those with whom he does not agree is using words that are not worth the paper they are written on.

Mr. HLYNKA: Let the people read them.

Mr. BURTON: I have nothing to be ashamed of in the stand taken by my leader and this group on this or any other question that we have debated. I realize that some hon. members do not agree with what we from time to time advocate, and I take off my hat to them and acknowledge they have a perfect right to their opinions, but I deny to them and anyone else the right to question our motives.

I was astounded to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) endeavour to explain the government's immigration policy. I am sure that, by the time he was through, the people of this country will be just as much confused over the government's policy as they were before, if not more so. The minister said that we were attacking a man who was not in the house to defend himself. We are attacking no man. We are attacking the policy of the government which makes possible things of this kind. If the hon. member is not present today I should like to know why he is absent.

An hon. MEMBER: That is cheap.

Mr. BURTON: I have my responsibility to be here and so have other members. But it is not the man who is guilty; it is the government whose policy makes these things possible. I will go farther and say that apparently, under the government's so-called immigration policy, this is the only way you can get anything done for the refugees. Otherwise there has been no action at all.

The Minister of Labour referred to the Polish soldiers who were brought into this country under the jurisdiction of his department. When mention was made of one of them who was ill-treated in Saskatchewan—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That whole province is ill-treated, with the government they have.

Mr. BURTON: If the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) would listen a little more and keep that other organ shut a little more he might learn something. Apparently the Department of Labour had no way of finding out what was being done to some of these Polish soldier immigrants, because no action was taken until the case was finally dragged into the courts. Apparently this unfortunate immigrant had nowhere to appeal until things came to such a pass that he could lay a criminal charge. It was only then that the Department of Labour acted. I say that that is not good enough.

I wish to have it distinctly understood that I am just as much in favour of having as many people from the displaced persons camps in Europe brought into this country as any other hon. member. In fact I consider it a disgrace to this country that we have not thousands of them in at this time. These people should have been brought in and given sanctuary under a proper government plan. I am distinctly opposed to any industrialist or corporation being allowed—or, as it appears now, being the agents of the government—to bring people in to work under contract labour. I contend that we have had experiences enough in the past to be a warning to the government that this en bloc immigration is not desirable when it is brought about by people who can make use of them for their own selfish ends. Especially do I object to that apparently being the government's only policy under which we can help these people in the displaced persons camps. When we find, as I have no doubt other hon. members have—and I would not be surprised if every hon. member has had considerable correspondence from people in his own constituency who are endeavouring to bring people over from the central European countries—people writing us letters about their relatives in Europe we have to stop and think. I have had letters from people in my own constituency who have been endeavouring to bring relatives over from France, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Germany and all the other countries of continental Europe. These people have been willing to undertake that they will take care of their relatives in displaced persons camps, but they simply cannot get any action from the immigration branch.

Mr. PROBE: You cannot get an answer to a letter.

Mr. BURTON: I have in my files hundreds of letters from people in my constituency who have been trying for the past three years and more to get people from the displaced persons camps, but there is no action. I will cite one as an example. This man wrote me a letter and later he came to see me. He had been in correspondence with the immigration branch for months, and after he came to see me I took the matter up with them on his behalf again. This man had a niece who was born in Czechoslovakia. She was the only living person left in the family. The only relative she had was her uncle in this country. All the other members of that family had been killed during the time that the German army overran that part of Czechoslovakia. At the time this girl was between sixteen and seventeen years of age. She wandered from pillar to post and from one part of the country to the other until finally she landed in Sweden. There, either through the Red Cross or UNRRA, I forget which, she was able to establish contact with her uncle who was living in my constituency. As I say, that man had for months and months tried to get action. Since then, more than a year has gone by and there is still no action.

Just the other day I received a letter from a friend of mine who, by the way, was himself an immigrant from England years ago. He wrote on behalf of another person who emigrated to this country from Hungary. After a considerable amount of correspondence with the immigration branch, the other day this man received a letter from the Winnipeg office of the immigration branch as follows:

Dear Sir:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of May 7 in connection with your application for the admission to Canada of Mr. and Mrs. John Weiss and Mr. and Mrs. Peter Reiter and family.

Your applications were acceptable at the time they were submitted but the immigration regulations have since been amended and, as your relatives are of enemy alien citizenship, their admission to Canada cannot be authorized at the present time.

At the time their applications were submitted, the immigration branch says that they were acceptable. I want to read a few lines from a letter of the man who wrote me and sent me a copy of the letter I just read. He said:

. . . the fact that these people are a son and grandchildren of a Canadian who came to Canada and was a pioneer of this district, 1906, his homestead was—

He gave the location of it.

—where he lived and died but not before receiving his citizenship papers. Mr. Weiss the applicant for entry of his brother is living on and farming this land today and will turn dwelling and land over to his brother as a home immediately he is allowed to enter Canada. He will as also stated give bonds or any required security guaranteeing these people will not become a public charge in any way.

I contend that when citizens of this country who have proven thmselves to be honest and worthy citizens are trying to obtain permission to have relatives of their own come to Canada and are prepared to go bond for them and cannot obtain that permission but find every turn that they make tangled up with a snarl of red tape and the immigration branch bogged down with a bunch of rulings so that no one seems to know what to do, it is time that we protested. When conditions such as that exist I protest against the fact that the government by order in council can set aside a previous order in council and authorize certain industrialists to bring people in for their own benefit.

This morning I read in the paper that some of these girls were interviewed and are alleged to have said that they looked on Mr. Dionne as a benefactor. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when we go to any length—and I contend that we should go much farther and faster than we have gone in bringing in people from displaced persons camps—to bring people into the country they should look to Canada and to the people of Canada as their benefactors, and not to certain individuals.

In closing, I should like to ask a few questions. I wonder how the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) likes what has been going on. Judging by what he has been saying in connection with this matter, I wonder how he can sit quietly by and see things of this kind going on. I ask all hon. members on the government side to stop and consider whether we have done our duty to displaced persons in the past. If they do that I am satisfied that their answer must be no.

Mr. MARTIN: What country has done more?

Mr. MITCHELL: What country has done more?

Mr. BURTON: As a nation we should get busy and do something about the matter. We should do it as a nation, and not have to depend on individuals.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he deny that this nation took a lead at the united nations assembly in trying to bring about an international organization that would bring perhaps more relief to the displaced persons than any other known method or organization, and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation took part, along with other hon. members, in that suggestion? No other country has a better record in this regard than has Canada.

Mr. BURTON: In answer to the minister's question, if you can call it a question, I will say that had the united nations organization accepted the plan submitted by Canada, I am quite prepared to admit that we would have had a much more effective immigration policy in that respect. The minister at least was a little fairer than the hon. member for Vegreville, because the hon. member for Vegreville criticized the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for doing what he did. We in this group are proud of the fact that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did whatever he possibly could, as a member of the Canadian delegation, to encourage that.

Mr. MARTIN: And so did the government of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: But they did not carry it out.

Mr. BURTON: I want to tell the minister this, that if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar were sitting on that side, leading the government, and found that the united nations had not been prepared to go along the way that the Canadian delegation had asked them to go, he would have asked his government to carry out that obligation in so far as Canada was concerned, to the limit of its ability. That is my answer to the minister's question. I say to the government: You have not done what you could do, and this makes you guilty of a crime, having regard to the fact that these people at the present time are dying without someone extending a helping hand to them. It puts you in this position, that apparently the only effort made in this country to help the people in the displaced persons camps who are coming to this country is when some industrialists are prepared to do it. As I said, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion that is not good enough.

I regret that I took up more time than I had originally intended to take.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. BURTON: It may not suit some members on the government side.

Mr. BRUNELLE: We do not care.

Mr. BURTON: I would say this much, that the time has come when we must pull the mask off some of the people who profess to believe in freedom of speech in this country. All I ask is that we look at this question and deal with it in a proper manner; and if we have any criticisms to make about the attitude of any other persons toward it, the least we can do is to be truthful.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I do not wish, by silence, to give consent to this style of contract. I am not interested in criticizing the government, because the same head-on collisions and conditions of affairs with regard to these industries prevailed after the last great war and have resulted after all the wars. Business has been upset, and we have had industrial destruction and the evils of industrial cut-throat competition and all that kind of thing. I am interested in seeing that the proper safeguards are placed in this labour contract.

In the first place, we had the very same kind of conditions after the last war. Cheap, shoddy Japanese goods were coming into this country. Many goods came in here, notwithstanding the tariff of the United States and the countries in Europe. The result was that an Alien Labour Act was passed in this country by a Conservative administration. Another Conservative administration appointed a committee of the House of Commons, known as the Stevens committee on price spreads and mass buying, the report of which was later adopted and evils adjusted. That committee found that a dreadful state of affairs existed in the textile industry and many of the other industries, and in some of the largest stores. It held many sittings and brought in a report. Safeguards were recommended to parliament. I think some of them were adopted by the present government and some by the late government headed by Mr. Bennett.

How does this particular contract come about? I ask that question simply for information. I sympathize greatly with the government in having to solve these problems which have grown out of the war and for which we in the House of Commons are to some extent responsible. In the first place, we have had the Alien Labour Act placed on the statute books of this country. What for? To protect us in case of peace or of war, to protect our industries and both capital and labour. The responsibilitity for the enforcement of the law is on not only the federal government but the provincial attorneys general as well. This Alien Labour Act is a federal statute, but as I see the operation of it, the enforcement is on the dominion and on the provinces as well. I do not like the method and manner in which the contract before us for this industry has been proposed and entered into. I have for many years, in peace and war alike, espoused the cause of the Polish nation. I believe I have on many occasions brought to the attention of this house the sufferings of that great nation in the last great war and also in the one which has just closed. I am not objecting to a reasonable number of these refugees being brought into this country, because it is at the request of the British government. The United States has done little or nothing up to date, but I understand that the President—who has had a large number of important matters to deal with—has now consented to take 100,000 refugees into that country.

I wish to point out some of the other features in connection with this contract. First of all, I believe it is improvident from the point of view of the poor girls who are coming out to this country. They will no doubt make good citizens. I have known a great many Polish people in our city and in other places, and I have no criticism at all to make of them. They have always been good citizens and most of them or nearly all have never been in any trouble. I also want to point out to the government that the textile industry—and this contract deals with a particular branch of it in the province of Quebec—was one of the matters dealt with by the Stevens inquiry. If you are to allow contracts with regard to priorities in shipping, ocean and air, to be made in connection with this particular industry, are you to repeat that for every other industry that wants a cheaper form of labour from Europe and Asia? You will have a large number of these applications. There are some thirty or forty different nationalities, according to the "Canada Year Book," who will want equality of treatment. The same treatment which is given the Polish girls in one industry in the province of Quebec will have to be extended to other races as it is for refugees as to farming and logging. Many of those who come in have no practical experience in these industries. Some have admitted, since they came in, that they have not any experience in farming or in logging. If hon. members will read report No. 6 of the senate committee on evidence given before it re immigration and labour, they will find that what I say is correct. Some admit they were never engaged in farming or logging.

The next point I wish to make is that, in an economic sense, industry in England is in the most awful state it has ever been in at any time in the history of the country since the industrial revolution, the textile industry included. The people of England have lost their foreign investments. They are losing their cotton trade with India. The United States has taken their place. Today much of industry has collapsed and is practically ruined in the old country. Many of those engaged in it are leading skilled people whom we should have had in the textile and other skilled industries in this country. I would point out that some of the heads of Eaton's and Simpson's, some of their departmental managers, and many of the directors of other great industries in this country, have come from Belfast in Ireland, from Scotland, Wales and England and made a success here. I find that some of them later, on promotion, became heads of these great industries and departmental stores in this country. I just mention that to show that, while the proposal is to bring in people from almost every other country on the same basis and grant a contract on different priorities, we are forgetting all about our own people in the old land, in Great Britain, at a time when they are down and out. We forget all about the fact that they could meet the need in many of these industries and do the very work which we want done, as leaders and developers, in the great industrial development which this country should have after the war and in the period of reconversion. Also girls for nursing and as housekeepers and maids are wanted. Are we to allow these people to go to Australia and New Zealand? There they are getting assisted passages to work in textile woollen industries. This form of assisted passage in this Quebec contract is one which I do not like, under which you are going to take out of the pay envelope a certain amount of money for the passage and a certain amount more for clothing, leaving a mere pittance for the individual to live on. You will remember that one of the abuses mentioned in the Stevens report was that under these somewhat cheap labour conditions some people were not able to make enough to pay for their food, and were starving on a pittance of wages. Many of them could not get a loaf of bread in the house under the intolerable conditions which were revealed in that report, and as a result changes had to be made.

I am not here to justify anything that has been done in this member's Quebec contract, and certainly I would not try to justify these contracts. The responsibility is upon the government of the day. If this policy is going to interfere with competitive labour; if it is going to lead to cut-throat competition between this company and other companies throughout Canada who get no similar or adequate protection along these lines, I say the responsibility is upon the government. We have an Alien Labour Act which these other companies must obey. They must conform to dominion labour laws, provincial laws and all the rest of it, and they can get no labour aid from the mother country at all on account of the lack of shipping. I know of two or three industries which have been trying to bring in a few people from the old country, but they cannot get them. The premier of Ontario has just returned and told us there are a hundred thousand in England who would like to come to this country but who cannot get shipping accommodation.

I regret that our very fine minister of immigration has been ill. It is no wonder, with all the hard work he has had to do in connection with this troublesome and other after-war problems. I sympathize with the government in that respect, because the ministers are bearing a heavy burden in connection with these after-war problems. But I do say there should be some equality of treatment in regard to shipping accommodation, and we should bring skilled workers from Britain before it is too late. Many industries in this country would like to have labour of this kind, such as this Quebec company got the government to aid them to bring in, to enable them to undersell their competitors, because this great textile industry is very much diversified today, and was largely expanded as a result of the war. So I plead with the government not to forget about the mother country, which has been a pioneer in this kind of textile work since the industrial revolution, and to aid those skilled in it there, who are out of work, to come here. Many people in Britain would take a chance and come to this country today if they could get accommodation and shipping; but here we are sitting around forgetting all about them; and we see very little in the press and hear very little over the radio about the suffering in that country. They are suffering more than anyone else. Many thousands would like to emigrate to Australia and New Zealand because they believe that to be a white man's country where they would have a fair chance, in the woollen textile and other industries there, to carry on after the great battle they put up in England. Conditions there are far worse than after the battle of Britain. The working classes are starving at the present time, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary. If you do not believe that, just read the British papers; read the white paper that was tabled in the British House of Common, and see the condition of affairs there. The suffering in that country is deplorable.

I should like to see proper safeguards included in the contracts we have been discussing today. I call upon the minister of labour of the province of Quebec as well as our own Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to take the necessary steps to protect these girls who suffered so much during the war. We in this country were very fortunate; we did not suffer an invasion. It is true that during the first two and a half years of the war we were pretty close to it, and our own province of Quebec and the maritimes and Ontario might have know what it meant to be invaded, but fortunately we escaped. So we should have some regard for those who suffered so much, and I urge that these workers should receive some further contract protection. I believe the contracts are ultra vires under the Alien Labour Act. If it were looked into I believe it would be found that the contracts should have been made with the government, not with any private individual or firm. When a contract is made with a member of parliament it borders on the rights and privileges of members of this house. The member may lose his seat over it, because he cannot make a contract or be party to any contract containing consideration with the government of the day or any department of the government or any commission connected therewith. I believe that is a fair interpretation of the law as it stands; and I think it is going pretty far from that act when an industry has to rely upon influence, because no doubt some influence has been used; you cannot get shipping space without influence. I know; I have tried at some of the shipping companies to bring one or two individuals out here, and I have been told that their space is sold for nearly a year ahead. I believe that in many ways charity should begin at home. I have no doubt that the men and women who have come to Canada from all these other countries have made good citizens; I believe many others would do well here if they had the chance, and I do not oppose a reasonable number being brought in. But I believe the United States should have led the way, and here they are taking only one hundred thousand. We have made a start, but I do believe these girls should have all the protection and safeguards the government of the country can give them.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, for the past four days I have been Acting Minister of Mines and Resources, so at the moment I am responsible for the administration of immigration policies of this government. Therefore I think I should say a few words in this debate, even though my background in immigration matters is not extensive.

This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved the adjournment of the house in order to pillory another hon. member who has undertaken to move some displaced persons to this country. I should like to examine the position in the light of the government's immigration policy. In the first place, the government has announced that it is favourable to absorbing into this country our fair proportion of the population of the displaced persons camps in Europe. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been one of the loudest advocates of that policy. At the united nations he advocated the formation of international committees to move these people from camps in Europe to various countries which are able to absorb them.

The government is favourable to the reception of a very considerable number of immigrants. I believe it is the wish of all parties in the house that an active immigration policy should be pursued, and with that in view the government has been liberalizing the immigration laws of this country for many months past. In January, order in council P.C. 371 was passed which considerably broadened the class of immigrants who could be received in this country. Among the classes to be admitted were "a farm labourer entering Canada to engage in assured farming employment"; "a person engaged in mining, lumbering or logging entering Canada to engage in assured employment in any one of such industries." The assured employment provision has been in all the liberalized regulations, the purpose being to see that immigrants brought here are assured a fair chance to establish themselves in this country. In spite of the liberalized regulations, however, immigrants have not been coming forward. In respect of persons in displaced persons camps, the reason is obvious. These people have no money, and there is no way in which they can get to Canada without assistance. There is no way in which they can conform to the requirements of the act, unless someone will undertake to employ them.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister permit a question? Does he think it gives the immigrants to this country a fair chance, when they are saddled with a payment over—

Mr. HOWE: Oh, you can ask these foolish questions after I get through.

Mr. SKEY: That is not foolish. These girls have to pay it, and it will take them years to do so.

Mr. HOWE: As I say, in spite of the liberalized regulations, immigrants have not been coming to Canada. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) undertook to put into practice the liberalized immigration policies of the government. He undertook to provide transportation for people who could not themselves provide it. And he undertook to provide assured employment, as is required by the act.

A good deal has been said about the contract for these people. I have not seen the contract, and I think no other member in the house has seen it. And until we know something about it, I think it is premature to discuss the question as to whether or not it is a fair contract.

The hon. member for Beauce spoke to me about transportation. He explained his mission in Europe, and he explained that he was going there to select displaced persons who could reasonably be expected to be happy in the county of Beauce. He explained that it was a Catholic locality and that persons who settled there would be better off if they were members of the Catholic faith. He explained, too, that he had made provision for living accommodation. He had obtained a building which was operated by an order of the Catholic church, where the immigrants would be housed, fed and looked after until they could learn the language of the country. He wanted transportation. I asked him what kind of transportation, and he said he wanted the best transportation. He thought the best kind available was transportation by air. I explained that there were charter companies which could offer various types of accommodation, but he said he wanted the de luxe accommodation, and he suggested that the new aircraft operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines would be the class of accommodation that he wanted for these people. The result was that he made a contract with Trans-Canada Air Lines to send its luxury air liners to pick up these people. I may say that before these prospective immigrants were granted entry, they were screened by the immigration branch, medically examined, and found to be persons who would comply with the immigration laws.

They have now been transported to Beauce, and I think no one in the house would criticize the manner in which they have been treated up to this time. It has been suggested in the house that they are expected over a period of two years to refund the cost of their transportation. I do not know whether that is so or not. I understood, from one statement I read in the press, that they were expected to refund a part of the transportation costs, and that may be so, or they may be expected to refund the full transportation costs.

However it may be, I see nothing extraordinary in that. These people, we must assume, were exceedingly anxious to come to Canada, exceedingly anxious to leave the camps in which they have been living. I have no doubt that they entered into the contract freely, if the contract provided that they should pay back their transportation moneys over a period of time. Whether the contract is enforceable or not, I shall leave to anyone in the house to determine. I presume that, if any one of these girls decides to move away from Beauce, no police officer is going after her to bring her back to serve out the contract. It is simply a civil contract, perhaps calling for the repayment of $300 over two years.

On the other hand, there is another side to the contract. It is that the hon. member for Beauce has undertaken to provide employment for these girls over a period of two years. That contract is enforceable; and, so far as the girls are concerned, I think it is a valuable contract.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have you seen it?

Mr. HOWE: No, and neither have you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But you just tell us what the terms are, although a few minutes ago you said you did not know anything about it.

Mr. HOWE: The reason I am sure of the terms is that the Immigration Act provided in respect of the Polish veterans, and in other comparable cases, that there will be assured maintenance for immigrants for a period of two years. And, knowing that the hon. member for Beauce was required to meet the regulations of the immigration branch, I can say with some certainty that the two-year provision is part of the agreement. I say that with much more certainty than the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) can say that it is not part of the agreement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, the minister knew more than the house does, because no information has been given.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He knows more than you do.

Mr. HOWE: You have contributed your five cents worth; will you let me finish?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked a simple question, but the minister does not want to answer it.

Mr. SKEY: It is more than $300, too.

Mr. HOWE: Well, you succeeded in your purpose, that of throwing me off my line of thought.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I asked a question; that is all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You certainly like to play politics over there; you are expert at it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The voice of authority.

Mr. HOWE: In any event, the immigrants brought in by the hon. member for Beauce are now residents of Canada. As such they are entitled to the protection of the laws of Canada. If it is possible to grind down Canadians in employment in industry, then it may be possible to grind down these immigrants. But if it is not—I believe it is not—then I believe Canada has labour laws entirely adequate to maintain the Canadian standard of living. If that is so, the immigrants concerning whom we are now talking will have every protection those laws can afford.

No objection has been made in the house of the immigration of Polish veterans. May I point out that they, too, are under contract, and that the people who are employing them are under contract. That contract provides that the men will be employed for a period of two years, and also provides that they will remain in the employment covered by their contract for a period of two years.

Mr. GREEN: There are no transportation charges against Polish veterans.

Mr. HOWE: Well why?—because someone paid the transportation charges of these men. In this case it happened to be the British government. Therefore there is no charge accruing.

Other displaced persons will, we hope, be brought to this country. Hon. members of the C.C.F. group probably would be quite happy to do nothing for at least a year, until the international agency charged with the movement of these people is able to function. And I am told that it is a year away. My hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F., went to Lake Success and advocated that Canada should take displaced persons, and advocated that this international agency be asked to bring these persons to Canada. He is ready to give that great lip service to immigration and to the making happy of all displaced persons. In the meantime, displaced persons are not coming to this country; they are going to other countries. Why are they going to other countries? They are going to other countries, because citizens of those countries are going to Europe to select immigrants suitable for their countries and are paying the cost of taking them to their countries, doubtless under contract.

It is all very well to advocate great reforms, to advocate that things should be done by some intangible person who does not exist at the moment; it is all very well to say that we are great humanitarians, that we will look after displaced persons if and when some international agency sends them to us, and that everyone should be happy. The hon. member for Beauce happened to be a realist. He believed that displaced persons should be brought to this country and he went over and got them and brought them here and paid for their coming. He has undertaken to look after them for two years. If that is a crime, then he deserves the pillorying that the C.C.F. party is attempting to give him today. But before accepting opposition criticism as valid, I should like to look at the accomplishment. I would rather hear the defence of the hon. member for Beauce of his position when he comes to this House of Commons.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a very simple subject to discuss, but every attempt has been made to confuse it. It has been suggested that we should wait until the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) is here so that we can discuss the matter with him. We are not concerned with discussing this matter with the hon. member for Beauce; we are concerned with government policy. The Acting Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Howe) has said that the government is liberalizing its immigration policy. I suggest to the government that it stop liberalizing its policy if this is to be the result. This is not liberalizing any policy.

Let us look at the picture. On April 22, on the orders of the day, I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) a question about a report appearing in the papers of that date, that a member of parliament had gone to Europe to select people for his factory from the displaced persons camps. The minister replied, as reported on page 2279 of Hansard, as follows:

> I have not seen the newspaper item to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I would repeat what I said the other day to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). So far as any new policy on immigration is concerned, it will be announced in due course.

That was on April 22. But in a return issued at the request of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), being sessional paper 678, among other items I find this:

> Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 1st April, 1947.

On April 1, three weeks before I had asked my question, the government by this order in council had set aside its former policy on immigration as authorized by P. C. 695 since 1931 and had adopted a new policy to permit the hon. member for Beauce to bring in 100 persons from displaced persons camps in Europe to work in his factory.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) painted a very good picture of the desperate condition of those in the displaced persons camps. We are all agreed that their position is desperate, but let me tell the house that their desperation was not the reason why they were brought to Canada. I should like to quote from a letter written by the hon. member for Beauce to the deputy minister of labour under date of November 26, 1946, in which he said:

> I know that this permission can be given to me if you care to talk the matter with the minister, and I would like you to do so. I know Mr. Mitchell and I am positive he will do everything he can to help me.

Not to help persons in the displaced persons camps, but to help the hon. member for Beauce.

> I hope that you will reconsider this situation in the light of emergency on which I am placed and will act accordingly.

That was not an emergency facing the persons in the displaced persons camps; the emergency was the position in which the hon. member for Beauce was placed through not being able to get people for his mills. It has been suggested that these people would be glad to get away from the displaced persons camps. There is no doubt in the world of that, but it is equally evident that the girls who worked in the Beauce mill were also anxious to get away, because 555 out of a total staff of 425 got away from there in one year.

An hon. MEMBER: Seasonal work.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is time that we stopped talking about this thing having been done on the basis of humanity. It was not done on the basis of humanity; it was done on the basis of pure, cold, business.

Mr. HOWE: The C.C.F. should talk about bringing in immigrants.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are quite pleased to have immigrants brought in, but we will not, without protest, allow them to be brought in by industrialists going over to the displaced persons camps in Europe where these people have been congregated, where they are anxious to get away from their misery and distress, and feeling their arms and muscles, examining them to see if they are fit to work. I should like to quote from another letter by the hon. member for Beauce. This letter is addressed to the Minister of Mines and Resources under date of March 26, 1947, and he says:

> As I am going across myself, I will visit these girls personally so that I can make sure that they are fit for the work that they will have to perform in my mill.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course that is right. I am saying that is the reason they were brought here and I say that is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You want to leave them there.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend was brought up in the cradle of Liberalism, but it seems to me that he must have fallen out of it early in life when he is willing to approve conduct like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do you want them to remain where they are?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not want to leave them where they are, but I do not want anyone to exploit their misery.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What are you exploiting now?

Mr. MacINNIS: Nothing, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I know no such thing. It is the contrary, I should think.

Mr. MacINNIS: These people are refugees. A refugee is a person who is seeking sanctuary. When you provide refuge for a person seeking sanctuary you do not consider how much gain you can get out of it. You consider what help you can give to that refugee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The main thing is to give him sanctuary. You would keep him in slavery.

Mr. MacINNIS: These girls have actually gone into slavery now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. MacINNIS: The turn-over in this plant of 425 employees in a year is great. There were 555 taken in and left in a year.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know the hon. member wants to be fair—

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course I want to be fair, but you people don't.

Mr. MITCHELL: Don't accuse me of that. Will my hon. friend not admit this that in the small town industries there is a great deal of seasonal employment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What is seasonal employment?

Mr. MITCHELL: I know what I am talking about. My hon. friend does not. There is a greater turn-over by the very nature of things in the small town industries of Ontario and Quebec than in other provinces where they have not the same amount of seasonal labour.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have read the whole of the file, and nowhere has the hon. member for Beauce said that this was a seasonal industry. If it is a seasonal industry, how is he to guarantee employment to these girls for two years if he could not guarantee employment for two years to the citizens of Quebec?

Mr. HOWE: Regardless of how he can, he is guaranteeing it, and the immigration branch will hold him to his contract.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether he is or is not, and I do not think the minister knows, because he said a few minutes ago that he did not.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that. I said I had not seen the contract.

Mr. MacINNIS: My understanding is that the contract was not made with the government of Canada or with anybody in Canada, but with the officials of UNRRA. I have here the Montreal Standard of May 31, containing an interview with Mr. James Adams, general manager of the plant. This is what Mr. Adams says:

> This business of the two-year contract, that wasn't Mr. Dionne's idea at all. The allied commission insisted upon it. He is responsible for the welfare of the girls for the next two years.

So this government does not know anything about it, and it is not on the record that the government ever demanded a contract. It goes on:

> After that, if they want to go somewhere else, they can. But their contract is for two years.

Outside of that, no minister on the other side of the house can say with any assurance that there is anything in writing that will protect the interests of these girls.

Mr. BELZILE: There is the law of the land.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is very little law of the land in the province of Quebec so far as the workers are concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the fact. What we object to is not the bringing in of these people. We have asked that the government of Canada bring these people into Canada as free people, giving them a chance to make their own way and go their own way whenever they want to. We will not allow people with commercial interests to serve to go into these camps, pick out whom they want and leave those they do not want, and then say they are performing a public service. It is nothing of the kind. It is pure, straight commercialism, and it is something this government should be definitely ashamed of.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): As one who has been interested in the question of immigration and the plight of displaced persons and refugees, and who has had something to say about it from time to time, I wish to say a few words on this occasion; my main purpose being to point out what, in my opinion, is the shortcoming of the present policy of the government, and second, to clear up some of the charges and misunderstandings that have been created in the house this afternoon. Before doing that, I wish to remind the house that we are discussing the motion moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), leader of this group, and to read a line or two from the motion to set out its purpose. These words will, I think, set out what we are trying to impress upon the government and the house:

> The selection of displaced persons and refugees and their admission to this country should be directed entirely by the federal government with a view to resettling these people as free human beings in such a way as to serve their best interests and those of the Canadian people as well.

That is the object of bringing before the house this motion which started this discussion. I wanted to place that on record, because some of the charges and some of the statements that have been made this afternoon have beclouded the issue. It was not our purpose to make any political capital out of the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, never!

Mr. ZAPLITNY: And we have not attempted to do so.

Mr. IRVINE: If there is something to be made, why not make it?

Mr. RINFRET: That is frank.

Mr. IRVINE: It means something, too.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: But if other members insist on having it on a political basis, then, of course we have nothing to hide and are quite willing to put our position before the house. However I have never personally felt that this is a question which should be placed on a political basis, certainly not on a partisan basis, because it is a question which affects all parties in the house and all the people of the country. I do not think anything can be gained by making charges which cannot be supported or by making statements which are contrary to the facts. My criticism of the government is with regard to the policy which is now being followed; and I gather from the speech of the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Howe) today that that is the present government policy; in other words, that it is not an isolated incident, but is a step along the line of government policy. If that is so, I wish to say, in all earnestness and without any acrimony whatsoever, that it is not the best way to go about the matter.

For example, as the government and the acting minister know full well, there have been thousands of applications waiting, some for two years and some for longer, by people in Canada who have relatives in displaced camps in Europe, people here in Canada who, on their own initiative, are willing to take the responsibility of bringing these people to this country, paying their passage if necessary, and guaranteeing employment and a home for them here. The relatives in Canada of displaced persons in camps in Europe are anxious to bring these people here, not because they want to exploit them. Let it be clear that they want to bring them here because they feel, having had the privilege of entering this country themselves and being now in a position to help their compatriots who are not in as good a situation, that they are willing to sacrifice something of what little wealth they have in order to help their brethren. It is in that spirit that the applications were made and submitted to the government. I have had some personal experience, as other hon. members have had, and know something about what is going on behind these applications. I can say, without any fear of contradiction, that ninety-five per cent or more of these applications were made from a purely humanitarian point of view, trying to help somebody out. Under these circumstances it would appear that the government should be prepared to cooperate in the same spirit by putting the whole question on a humanitarian basis; that is, by allowing refugees and displaced persons to come to this country to find sanctuary, not because of what they can add to the immediate wealth of the country, but because they are in great need. In some cases, if their health is impaired, they might even be a liability to the country for a little time, but that should not deter us from assisting them.

As I said, these applications have been lying by the thousands in the hands of the immigration branch and very little has been done about the matter. The results have been disappointing. I think everybody will admit that. At the moment I am not criticizing anyone in particular when I say that. The government have had reason, perhaps, why they were not able to expedite the disposal of these applications as they should have done. But while that is going on, while thousands of people in this country who have relatives in Europe and who have submitted applications and made every guarantee that was asked of them to the government and were waiting for action, they find that other persons who are not doing it on the same basis—let us be frank about that; it is not done on a basis of bringing in relatives for humanitarian purposes; it is done to bring in labour for certain industries—are getting priority so far as transportation and permission are concerned. Special orders in council have been passed to give these people priority over those who are attempting to bring in their relatives. That is the basis of my criticism.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. member a question? What is the priority that has been given?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is quite clear from the order in council which was quoted today, which set aside the provisions of the general order, 695, and gave this particular person the privilege of bringing in a certain group of immigrants while others under the general immigration order have to wait.

Mr. HOWE: The T.C.A. service is open to all. Anybody can buy seats on the T.C.A.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not want to get into an argument with the acting minister about this. It so happens that not many relatives of displaced persons in Canada are in a position to hire T.C.A. planes to bring their relatives here. I think that is one good reason why they have not done so.

Mr. MacINNIS: And they would not think of charging it back.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I now for the first time have the contract in my hand, and I refer to clause (d), which reads:

No deduction from the wages will be made by the company for the cost of transportation of the worker from Germany to destination in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not what they said.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But that is what the contract says.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker, I hope before I am through saying what I have to say, we shall be able to get on the record other facts with regard to the contract.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister has read from a document, and I am asking that the document be tabled.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly. I was waiting for the opportunity to table a copy of the document.

Mr. BURTON: Why was it not tabled earlier?

Mr. HOWE: I received it just this minute. It comes from overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member has a suspicious mind; that is all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We asked for it.

Mr. MUTCH: Hon. members over there have a good sense of publicity.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that those who would like permission to bring relatives to Canada should have been given consideration. The report made last year by the senate committee on immigration and labour bears out that contention. I wish to quote from page 311 of the report submitted by that committee, at which there will be found these words:

Immigrants who come to Canada on the responsibility of relatives or friends already here enjoy a real advantage over those who arrive as complete strangers. The right to bring relatives and friends here is a privilege which our government may well extend to Canadian citizens. This principle has already been recognized by the government in an order in council dated May 28, 1946, P.C. 2071.

But unfortunately, although that principle was admitted by the passage of that order in council, we find that it is only too easy to pass another order in council setting aside the provisions of the former one in order to make special conditions or to apply special privileges to some persons. I wanted to say that, because I believe that the present action of the government, whether it is deliberately taken or not, is short-circuiting our immigration policy. It is not carrying out the intent of parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend talks about short-circuiting, would he say—

An hon. MEMBER: Not a speech; just a question.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a minute. You asked me enough questions this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: But we did not get any answers.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not to my disadvantage. But when my hon. friend talks about short-circuiting, would he say that bringing to Canada people who are in these camps is short-circuiting the regulations? I know what my hon. friend is trying to do. He is trying to play both ends against the middle.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to assure the minister that I am not playing the two ends against the middle. What I am trying to do is to point out that by making these special provisions for privileged persons—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Privileged?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —the government is providing a safety valve for not having to do anything about the general question of displaced persons.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) is privileged.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I hope that is clear enough. There are, as I said, thousands of those, within the knowledge of the immigration branch. It is not a matter of bringing in one, two or three hundred; it runs into thousands. And the people of this country are, I think, entitled to expect action on the part of the government on that point, because all parties in this house have agreed. Surely that is all that is necessary in parliament. If all parties are agreed on a principle, the government should take action. All parties are agreed that the question of displaced persons and refugees should get some priority. In fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, in making a statement in the house not so long ago, made the statement that displaced persons and refugees would get priority, and the senate committee recognized that, as I just quoted a minute or two ago. I do not know whether the minister was in his seat at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I call the attention of hon. members to a matter of procedure and ask them to confine their remarks to the motion before the house. This afternoon the leader of the C.C.F. party asked for leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31. Standing order 31 says:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance)—

The motion of the hon. gentleman says:

> —for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action of the government in authorizing certain Canadian industrialists to select individuals from displaced persons camps in Europe and bring such individuals to work in Canada under contract—

I would ask hon. members who take part in this debate to confine their remarks to the motion before the house, which is the matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action of the government in authorizing certain Canadian industrialists to select individuals from displaced persons camps in Europe and to bring such individuals to work in Canada under contract.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that the other words should also be taken in conjunction with what you have just read, namely:

> —it being the traditional policy of parliament that the importation of indentured labour should be completely prohibited, which means that the selection of displaced persons and refugees and their admission to this country should be directed entirely by the federal government with a view to resettling these people as free human beings in such a way as to serve their best interests and those of the Canadian people as well.

Should these words not be included?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member looks at standing order 31, subsection 6 (b), he will find these words:

> Not more than one matter can be discussed on the same motion.

This afternoon I accepted the hon. member's motion because I thought it was urgent and of public importance. I took that attitude because he said, ". . . namely the action of the government in authorizing. . ." this and that. So I would ask hon. members who take part in this debate to confine their remarks to that main subject.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what I am going to do. We are discussing the action of the government in their application of their immigration policy. It is difficult to discuss the action of the government without bringing in the lack of action, as we see it. We, according to the terms of the motion, disagree with the way in which the immigration policy is being implemented, and are trying to set out the reasons why. We believe that those people in Canada, practically all of them citizens of Canada, who made application and gave guarantees to the government to look after relatives who might be brought to this country, should have been given at least the same privilege of bringing them in as was given to other persons who are interested in obtaining labour for their industries.

I wish to refer now to another phase of this matter, and I do so with a certain amount of sadness because it is most unfortunate that a member of this house should have made the kind of speech that was made this afternoon. I refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), with whom I have so often agreed on matters of this kind, but with whom I must disagree thoroughly this evening.

I said at the outset that this is a non-partisan issue, and to bear that out I wish to remind the hon. member who spoke today in such vigorous terms, as well as other members of the house, that in 1945 certain members of this house, representing all four parties in it, signed a document which was presented to the Prime Minister and which read in part as follows:

> We the undersigned members of parliament appeal to you in name of humanity to use full moral force of Canada's position with all other allies to effectively and immediately relieve plight of displaced persons in British and American zones, especially kin of Canadian citizens.

As I say, that was signed by members of at least the four major parties in this house. The Liberal party across the way was represented; my Progressive Conservative friends signed; members of both this group and the Social Credit party signed it, which establishes quite clearly that at least this question started out on a non-political basis, and I would hope that it might be kept on that plane throughout. Some of the charges and statements made by the hon. member against the leader of this group were most unfortunate, particularly because, to say the least, they were inaccurate. He evidently disagreed with the terms of this motion, and I want to make it quite clear that I have no criticism in that regard, because it is his privilege to disagree just as much as it is our privilege to agree. But when he went out of his way to make personal insinuations and charges as to the intentions of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I think the hon. member overreached himself; and I believe that when he reads his speech in a quieter moment and more meditative mood he will have reason to regret ever having made such a speech in this house. Today the discussion started off on a non-political, non-partisan plane.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I hope hon. gentlemen across the way are not going to take that attitude; otherwise it may make things a little difficult. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who followed the leader of this group, stated his position and agreed with the motion. The next speaker was the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who leads the Social Credit party. He stated his position, and also agreed with the motion. As I say, it is the privilege of any member of any group to disagree with any motion; but when the hon. member of Vegreville rises in the house and accuses the leader of this group of having ulterior motives in moving this motion, and at the same time makes statements to the effect that my leader had never spoken in this house or elsewhere on behalf of the displaced persons and refugees of Europe, he is, of course, quite a long way from the truth, and I believe he will regret those statements. One part of his speech in particular was, I think, very unfortunate, when he attempted to link up something said by Mr. Mosher with the motion before the house today.

Mr. BOUCHER: Are you ashamed of that connection?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am not a bit ashamed of any connection that may exist, but it so happens there was no connection at all. I have only a passing acquaintance with Mr. Mosher, but in testifying before the senate committee on immigration and labour he put forward the position of the organization he represents in terms very favourable to displaced persons and refugees. For that I think the hon. member for Vegreville, who, I know, is deeply interested in the matter, should be thankful instead of attacking the very people who are trying to help him. This is what Mr. Mosher had to say last year in presenting his brief to the senate committee, at page 208 of the proceedings of that committee:

> The admission of refugees, though it has, of course, economic aspects, is primarily a humanitarian question. Canada is under an obligation to humanity to admit her due share of refugees even if it costs her something. It may actually bring her important economic benefits, but even if it does not, she must do her part.

I believe that statement sets out clearly that Mr. Mosher and the organization he represents are not opposed to bringing displaced persons and refugees to this country on a humanitarian basis, the basis of helping out those people, even though it may cost Canada something to do so. Having set that out before the committee, having made that plea for the very persons for whom the hon. member for Vegreville made his plea, I think the hon. gentleman should have spoken of Mr. Mosher in kinder terms than he used today. I should also like to remind the hon. member that members of this group whom he saw fit to attack on this question have pleaded this cause in this house on various occasions. As early as 1945 the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), pleaded in this house that at least fifty thousand children of the displaced persons be brought to Canada for adoption by Canadian people. I could go on and quote from one year to the next, to show that members of our group contributed to the debates of this house asking for consideration on behalf of these people. In saying that, I am not asking that this party be given any credit for having done so, because we were not seeking to capitalize on it politically. We were doing what we thought was right, just as members of other parties were doing their bit to help out in a difficult situation. But having done that, I thought we deserved kinder words than we heard from the hon. member today. I want to quote also what the leader of this group said in this same connection during the course of a radio broadcast in November, 1946:

> As long as this problem of displaced persons is allowed to continue unsolved, so long will there be misunderstanding, distrust and difficulty. No nation can afford to wash its hands of the problem and those lands where populations are sparse have a special responsibility in this matter.
> Because of this the Canadian delegation has given much attention and support to the proposal to establish a special international refugee organization to deal with this distressing problem. But if I may say so attention and support are insufficient when action is expected of us.

There again the hon. member set out in clear terms his sympathy for and his plea on behalf of refugees and displaced persons; and for that I believe he deserved kinder treatment than he was given today. I might also remind the hon. member for Vegreville that as early in 1937 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was a member of the national refugee committee of this country. That was three years before the hon. member for Vegreville entered this house. My leader has done very good work on that committee; he has taken a keen interest in refugees and, I believe, is regarded by all hon. members as a man of broad and sympathetic views on that question. I am not saying these things because I think the record of my leader requires any defence from me; but after having listened to a speech this afternoon which, I am very sorry to say, did no credit to the hon. member who made it, I considered it my duty to make my position clear in this regard.

Mr. HLYNKA: The hon. member read a telegram which was addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) while he was overseas in London. Did the leader of the C.C.F. group sign that telegram? If not, why not?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There again, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my hon. friend takes a very narrow view. He asks whether my leader signed this telegram.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Before they start ohing and ahing, I might remind my hon. friends that this telegram was drawn up hurriedly, and all hon. members did not have an opportunity to sign it; in fact I do not believe all hon. members saw it. It so happens that it was I who circulated a copy of the telegram in my own group. Everyone I approached signed it, but it was not possible to see everyone in the group. I might also remind my hon. friend that not all the members of his own group signed it. As a matter of fact, I believe it was signed by only one member of the party to my right. That was not their fault; perhaps they were not given an opportunity of seeing it and giving it consideration. The point is that the general idea was supported by members of every group in the house. It was put on a non-political basis, and I am amazed that my hon. friend, who so often has made eloquent speeches on this subject in this house, should have taken such a different line entirely today and put the whole thing on a political basis.

I want to say, before I conclude, that what we in this group are anxious to see is that the people who come to this country as immigrants, whether they come as immigrants or displaced persons, will be able, five or ten years from now, to say that they were treated as well as the other people in the country. I am not criticizing the government for having allowed refugees to come to this country, and neither is my leader. In fact, we congratulate them upon having made any provision at all under which these people can come in. But I believe it is our duty, as members of the house, to see to it that immigrants who come to Canada come under conditions which will make it possible for them to become good and satisfied citizens in the future.

There is a great deal of talk about the dangers of discontent and communism. We hear it in the house and outside the house. But let us be careful that we do not create conditions in industry, and have our people working under such conditions that communism will become attractive to them. Let us treat them in a decent, Canadian way, and we shall make good Canadian citizens of them. That is our belief.

We are prepared to make the same plea for anyone entering Canada. I do not want what I am saying this evening to sound as if I am condemning the government for any isolated instance. It so happens that one of the Canadian government's policies is what we are discussing today. I do not want it to appear that I am referring to any particular person in derogatory terms. What the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) has done was perfectly in order, so far as we are concerned, because the government gave him permission to do it. Therefore I do not attack him in any way.

But I do say that we in parliament have a responsibility to bring persons in under proper conditions, both for the good of themselves and for the good of Canada. It is the duty of members of the House of Commons to protect the interests of the Canadian people, and of any future Canadians in this country.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few remarks in the discussion which has taken place with respect to—

> . . . the action of the government in authorizing certain Canadian industrialists to select individuals from displaced persons camps in Europe and bring such individuals to work in Canada under contract, it being the traditional policy of parliament that the importation of indentured labour should be completely prohibited, which means that the selection of displaced persons and refugees and their admission to this country should be directed entirely by the federal government with a view to re-settling these people as free human beings in such a way as to serve their best interests and those of the Canadian people as well.

I believe that is the wording of the motion now before us, and it deals with a situation which has caused debate across the country. I realize that many people are not actually conversant with the pros and cons of it. But to many people it does seem strange that the government of the day should pass an order in council setting aside certain provisions of order 695 so as to assist an industrialist, who happens to be a member of parliament, to bring in these hundred Polish girls to assist in his mill at Beauce, Quebec.

Something is added to the confusion when we find that many applications are coming asking that people from the British isles be allowed to come to Canada at this time.

These are people who are relatives of Canadian servicemen who gave splendid service in the past few years.

I am not directly blaming the government for the situation at this time, but it is a difficult situation. I have received many applications from my own constituency respecting people from the British isles who want to come here, but who cannot possibly obtain passage at least during the coming year.

Something is added to the present confusion when these people, with relatives in this country, cannot make arrangements to come out to Canada and establish future residence in this country. It was said this afternoon that the government has been derelict in its duty, and that it has tended to encourage slave labour in Canada by permitting such a contract. That charge was, I believe, made this afternoon.

On the other hand, I have here a newspaper article which states:

> The entire exodus was arranged by mill owner Ludger Dionne, who is Liberal member of parliament for Beauce.
> Taking note of the fact that union officials have condemned the emigration, Mr. Dionne said that his plant had tried without success to obtain girls "all over Canada." He said that his mills capable of giving work to 700 hands, were running at about a third or half that number "most of the time."
> "We tried to get employees in Quebec City, St. Malo, Thetford Mines and Sherbrooke, among other places, and we just couldn't get enough," he said. "Let the unions find us some labour, then they'll be in a better position to talk."
> Mr. Dionne said that he didn't care "what unions try to organize my plant, they are all free to try." He added that the mills already had an agreement with the National Catholic Syndicate, remarking: "I think the Catholic Syndicate is the proper union out there, you know we are a Roman Catholic community."
> Mr. Dionne said that two Polish priests from Chicago, together with priests at the displaced persons camp where the girls were located, had undertaken to select the girls for jobs in the St. Georges de Beauce mills. He said that they had compiled a preliminary list of 150 names.
> Mr. Dionne said that 50 of the girls had been rejected by the British medical authorities.

I am sure there are not any of us who can state right now whether this movement will be entirely satisfactory, or beneficial to the girls. We all hope it will be. It is only after they have been here for some time that the success or failure of the venture will be proved to the satisfaction of all concerned. It is a trial which, we sincerely trust, will work out for the benefit of the girls themselves, and all concerned in this country.

But this does bring clearly to people's attention the fact that we have a real industrial problem with respect to help in various parts of Canada. Something must be done; and I am sure we are all opposed to what has been termed "slave labour." We want to see proper remuneration given to everyone who works in this country. I trust that will be taken care of.

There are many people throughout Canada who are today wondering why so many articles are in short supply. I know that last fall, and again this spring many producers on the western prairies could not understand why they could not get more of the implements of production. I maintain that one of the chief reasons was the length of the difficult steel strike we had last year. Steel enters into these various products, and I believe that strike had more than anything else to do with the shortage of supplies so essential on the farms today. There are many other articles in short supply, and the consumers of this nation are wondering why this situation should exist.

In today's issue of the Ottawa Journal, that of June 2, 1947, we find at page 14 a photograph headed "C.C.F. M.P's. in Picket Line at Ottawa Car Plant", and the explanation of the picture reads:

> Alistair Stewart, C.C.F. M.P. for Winnipeg North, third from left, joined the picket line at Ottawa Car and Aircraft plant this morning because of the "sympathy we have for the strikers." Mr. Stewart said he was accompanied by Thomas Bentley, C.C.F. M.P. for Swift Current, Saskatchewan, four girls from C.C.F. national headquarters and Jean Holman, stenographic pool secretary to M. J. Coldwell C.C.F. party leader. Mr. Stewart said his party was "not interfering in any way with the strike but felt the men had a just cause." He said there would be other C.C.F. M.P.'s in the picket line during the week.

I will admit we are living in a free land, a very free land; but I do not think that is a good example for members of parliament to set. I believe they should place themselves on a different plane, a more judicial plane, and should not be taking sides one way or another. My sympathies are just as much with the under-privileged people of Ottawa or of Canada as are those of any member of the C.C.F. party in Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: On a point of order, I should like to have Your Honour relate what the hon. gentleman is now saying to the subject before the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As I read the motion, we are discussing the bringing into this country of industrial labour, and there is a distinct action to prohibit workers from going to work who might increase the production of this country. The people mentioned in this article are a party to that action. That is the only relationship there is, but to the consumers and citizens of Canada it is an important relationship. So much for that matter.

I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house in following up this argument. I want to repeat the hope, so well expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), that we get around as quickly as possible to the point where the government will be responsible for all immigration. We should have a policy; we should not be passing orders in council to assist this or that particular group, no matter how well they may deserve it. This should be a matter of government responsibility and government policy, and I trust we shall arrive at that point in the near future.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, considerable time has been taken in discussing this matter, which is regarded, I think properly, as one of urgent public importance. It is a matter with respect to which I have been much interested, especially since attending the last meeting of the general assembly of the united nations. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was also interested in the problem which was brought so vividly to our attention during the course of that meeting. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) said that he had no fault to find with what the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) had done in this matter, because the government had given him permission to do it. That is the whole question. Is the government blameworthy for having given permission to do a thing which has resulted in 100 persons from the displaced persons camps being here in Canada at this time? It seems to me that that is the whole question.

Over a period of years we had regulations and the administration of regulations designed to keep people out of Canada. For a great many years that had become both the written policy and the practical application of the policy by the officers of the department. One of the first things done after our return from the meeting of the assembly of the united nations was to provide an amendment to P.C. 695 to authorize persons resident in Canada to bring in persons related to them who happened to be in displaced persons camps. That amendment was adopted on January 30, 1947.

That did not have any immediate result. Although the obstacle which theretofore had existed as a legal obstacle was removed, there were still many physical obstacles that had to be overcome. It was necessary for these people to get to someone representing the immigration branch and satisfy him that they were in good health. Travelling teams were organized to visit the displaced persons camps. An arrangement had been made with the government of the United Kingdom to admit into Canada 3,000 Polish soldiers who had fought with the allied armies and who were not disposed to return to Poland under the regime that now exists there. They had to be examined; teams were organized for that purpose and, if they were found to be in good health, visas were issued which enabled them to enter this country. The same teams were authorized to examine other persons who came within the rather narrow terms that had been adopted in January.

It must not be forgotten that, over all these years, everybody in Canada was against immigrants coming in. We were proceeding cautiously, perhaps too cautiously, but it was the result of the long years of the other attitude. Not many were coming in. Three or four times the provisions with respect to relatives were broadened to include a larger number of persons. It so happened that transportation conditions were extremely difficult. We felt—and I think that feeling was pretty generally shared—that such transportation as there was should go in priority to persons in the displaced persons camps.

That did not affect immigration from the British isles or from any commonwealth country; there had been no obstacle in the regulations with respect to such persons beyond the requirement that they had to be able to take care of themselves. In application that did prove to be an obstacle. The officers were requiring these people to show the possession of a certain amount of money in order to satisfy them that they would not become a charge. That obstacle was removed and instructions were given that there was no other requirement than that of good health. It was felt that, if one could get to a Canadian port, and was able and willing to take a job, he was not apt, under present economic conditions, to become a charge upon Canada.

At that time representations were made that labour for agriculture was very short and that that part of our population engaged in agriculture could, without putting any further strain on the housing situation, which was and still is acute, bring in a certain number of agricultural workers and take them into their homes. A provision was seriously discussed, for perhaps too many days or too many weeks, and finally a decision was reached that if one wished to take agricultural employment and have an assured job in Canada there could be no objection to his coming in. That was provided for in the regulations. It was provided also at the same time in January that the same rule might be applied to men who wanted to work in the mines, in the forests or in logging operations, that if they could establish they were in a fit physical condition to do that kind of work and were going to an assured job in Canada a waiver of the general excluding provision would be made in their behalf. There was another provision made for bringing in, under the agricultural classification, workers for the sugar beet industry. Representations had, of course, been made that logging companies and mining companies were prepared to undertake to house and employ men who would come in for forestry operations, or for mining operations. Then the hon. member for Beauce comes along and says, "I have work that I can give to persons now in displaced persons camps, and I am prepared to provide them with assured employment and proper housing if you will permit me to bring them in". An order in council was passed, I think on April 1, in that behalf.

The question now before those who have to consider it is: Are we blameworthy for the fact that 100 such girls or thereabouts are now in Canada instead of in displaced persons camps? That reminds me of an incident which came to our attention just recently. A young Jewish girl arrived here in the month of April. She had been one of a family of nine, comprising her father, her mother and her six brothers and sisters. They had all been confined in concentration camps and had been moved from one camp to another, and she was the last survivor of those nine. She was the niece of some well-to-do people who had been living in Quebec for some twenty years. They had heard of her plight. I do not know how they managed it, but they did manage to get her a visa to go to the Dominican Republic or Haiti; they did manage to get her transportation on a plane from Amsterdam to New York, and they did manage to get her permission in New York to come up to visit her relatives in Canada for a period of thirty days. There was an application that she be allowed to remain here. We were told that that would not be fair. Why should she be allowed to remain here because her relatives in Canada were able to arrange things that other people could not do? Why should she be allowed to remain because well-to-do relatives in Quebec had been able to do these things? There are people in these camps who have not the advantage of having relatives who can arrange matters of that kind, and we were told that that would be an unfair exception to make.

Why should she be allowed to stay here when there are so many hundreds of others who have gone through as much as she has and who cannot get out of these camps? It seems to me that that is nonsense. She was here in Canada, and it was nonsense to take the view that she should not be allowed to remain here because there were others who could not get here.

That is exactly the same situation with respect to the 100 Polish girls. They are here, and it is nonsense, it is inhuman, to say they should not be allowed to be here because there are others who cannot get here. That is exactly the situation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Nobody said that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Nobody said that? Here we have been told that unfortunately there are persons in these camps who have relatives here who are not in a position to provide air transportation. That is unfortunate. But there are 100 girls here for whom air transportation has been provided. They are here, and should we not be pleased rather than otherwise that there are at least that many who are no longer undergoing the agonies of those displaced persons camps over there? I have read in the papers that negotiations are in process to provide fourteen hundred with air transportation to come to assured work in our Canadian forests. Will it not be a good thing for these fourteen hundred to get here and to have an opportunity to work in our Canadian forests instead of languishing in these displaced persons camps?

It is said that all this should be under the control of the immigration branch. It is under the control of the immigration branch. No one person gets here that is not examined by the officers of the immigration branch and who does not comply with all the other conditions. It so happens that the hon. member for Beauce and others engaged in the lumber industry are going to overcome the remaining difficulties to allow those persons to get here. It is not the form of the regulations that prevents their entry; it is the other material difficulties.

It may be unfortunate, I think it is unfortunate. that there is not transportation available for a larger number. But that is the situation. There are other matters that are being considered and other provisions that will be announced. But I think the attitude has been that wherever anyone can establish that there is a place for him in Canada where he will not put added pressure on our housing situation which is keeping some of our veterans out of accommodation at the present time, wherever he can establish that there is a place for him that will not add to our present housing difficulties, and that he can get here, he should be allowed to come.

With respect to the working conditions at the plant of the hon. member for Beauce I do not know what they are. I do know that the last time I was at St. Georges de Beauce it was a little country village. I do know that there were established by the present member of parliament for Beauce and by his predecessor as member of parliament for Beauce embryonic industries in St. Georges, and that they were established for the purpose of providing employment for the people of St. Georges and other parishes of Beauce without their having to go to the big cities to get work. Apparently that is what the people of Beauce like because they elect the people who do that.

I do not know what the conditions are, but I do know that 99 per cent of those who work in those plants established by Mr. Lacroix and the present member for Beauce are from the families of the county of Beauce and I know that those families are interrelated. I know it would be pretty poor politics for a politician to maintain a sweatshop for the people of his constituency, especially if the people of his constituency were all as closely related as they are in the county of Beauce. That is the broad outline of the situation.

The Acting Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Howe) has just tabled this contract, which appears to be in the form of a letter addressed to the secretary of the intergovernmental committee on refugees, dated April 14, 1947. Because of the widespread interest in this matter, perhaps it would be well for me to read the text:

London, 14 April, 1947.

The Secretary,
The Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees,
19 Hill Street,
London, W.1.

On behalf of and in the name of the Compagnie Dionne Spinning Mills Co. of St. Georges de Beauce, province of Quebec, Canada (hereafter called the company), I am undertaking the following obligations:

(a) The company will employ single women who are the concern of your committee and who I select in Germany with your assistance and help, for at least 2 years, and observe all labour conditions which are in force in the province of Quebec with regard to workers of such qualifications or usually granted to them.

(b) The company will pay to all persons recruited in Germany with your assistance and help. not less than the current wages paid, in the province of Quebec, to spinning mill workers with the same qualifications as these persons have on condition that the worker stays in our employment for 2 years unless the contract is terminated by agreement between the company and the worker or for any other reason (except rightful dismissal by the company) lawful in spite of the fact that the contract has been made for two years; otherwise the company will pay to the worker only the minimum wage which is due to the worker of such qualifications under the laws of the province of Quebec.

(c) The company will pay to the worker weekly only the minimum wage which is due to such a worker under the laws of the province of Quebec. The company will retain the difference between these minimum wages and the current wages, pay them into a separate account, and pay the sum so retained as a lump sum after the period of two years has expired, or prior to that date if the contract has been terminated by agreement between the company and the worker or for any other reason (except rightful dismissal by the company) lawful in spite of the fact that the contract has been made for two years.

(d) No deduction from the wages will be made by the company for the cost of transportation of the worker from Germany to destination in Canada.

Compagnie Dionne Spinning Mills Co.
(Signed) Ludger Dionne,
14 April, 1947.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I rise on a matter of privilege? I was the one who stated this afternoon that costs were to be deducted. Had this contract been placed before the house, it might have put a different complexion on the matter except that in the letter of March 26 containing the request to which the minister of immigration acceded on March 27, this clause appears:

I will make a contract with these girls to refund me their transportation charges at about 25 per cent of what they will earn weekly in my plant.

I asked for the tabling of this contract; it was not tabled until tonight. The letter upon which the government acted is dated March 27.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to that, I would make no apology whatsoever for the action of this government. If I were in a concentration camp or in a displaced persons camp and someone offered to provide me with air transportation to Canada on condition that out of my earnings in the future I would repay it, I would gladly consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not the question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The question may arise, why does the hon. member for Beauce do this? I asked him myself why he did it. I told him that a contract for two years would never be enforceable. He said: "For a certain time these persons will wish to remain with me and will remain with me. During the summer season most of the girls I have from the farms in Beauce go back to their homes." I felt that that was probably true. My wife is from the county of Beauce. For a great many years we had maids from the county of Beauce, and I know from experience that it was not easy to keep maids from the county of Beauce during the summer season. That appeared to me to be a plausible explanation.

These mills would not very much appeal to me. The hon. member for Beauce explained to me that the working hours were in two shifts, one from six o'clock in the morning until two o'clock in the afternoon and the other from two o'clock in the afternoon until ten o'clock at night. Well, those who start to work at six o'clock in the morning have to go to bed pretty early in the evening. There is not much night life for them. And those who work until ten o'clock at night in St. Georges, unless it has changed very greatly since I was there, would not find anybody else up when they got off from their work. I then said to him, "You know, this idea of saying that you are going to take only Catholic girls is something that is difficult to explain," because there is a lot to be said for the attitude expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this afternoon as to his feeling when he was recruiting teachers, I think it was. The explanation that was given to me was that there had been established there a hostel at considerable cost. I have not seen it; I am told that it is well fitted out, quite a comfortable building, well provided and equipped for the residence of these girls, but it is under the direction of some nuns. He said, "None but Catholic girls would be at all happy in these surroundings." I think that is true. I do not know how happy the Catholic girls are. From the pictures that have been published in the papers they were at least happy on arrival. I hope that that joy will continue. But that is the situation, and I was impressed by the fact that these girls were to get the same kind of treatment that a member of parliament provides in his own constituency for the daughters of his own constituents. It seemed to me that that would be nothing very deplorable and that, in any event, it would be fortunate for these persons to get from these displaced persons camps to the kind of hostel under the conduct of a religious community of Catholic nuns, which is operated in the town of St. Georges.

There is this other group that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to as being something with respect to which he was quite in accord, a group that would be brought out because not only the employer but the representatives of trade unions would assist in the selection or in the making of arrangements That may be all right. I do not see that the presence of representatives of labour unions will make the situation very much better.

The whole problem is this. Is it a bad thing that there should be an additional number of people willing to work coming into this country? That is the question. If they are willing to work in the kind of jobs for which enough workers are not available I think they will be improving their own position, and I am not at all scandalized if they also at the same time improve the economic situation of the country. I think that if all the displaced persons in these camps could get into places where they would be contributing to the economy of the lands to which they will go they will be far happier if they are brought into lands where they are not a charge upon the rest of the community.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I know it is often said that one did not intend to participate in the debate—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member cannot say that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I can. I have listened all afternoon to the arguments advanced, the argument of the affable Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) when on behalf of the government he raised the defence that the house should wait until the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) was in the house to explain the situation to the country. That argument was not effective because, Mr. Speaker, so far as the hon. member for Beauce is concerned he enters into this question only to the extent that he happens to be the employer. The responsibility—and the minister who has just taken his seat has admitted it—does not rest on the hon. member for Beauce. The responsibility for what took place, if there be such, rests upon the government and not upon the hon member. To that extent, at least, some of the underbrush during the course of the debate has been cleared away.

Matters have been brought in which have aroused animosities and antipathies and which have no place in this debate. The question, sir, is that the house be adjourned to discuss the question as to whether the traditional policy of parliament that the importation of indentured labour should be completely prohibited, shall be departed from. Do we in Canada want to establish an immigration policy by which employers in our country will be able to go over to Europe, there select displaced persons and make arrangements with them to pay their transportation out of the wages they will ultimately earn—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —and then bring them over to Canada? That is the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friends say it is not, and to prove that statement I shall read from the records. The government agreed to just that. The government entered into an arrangement with the hon. member for Beauce in consequence of a lengthy correspondence. I am not going to read very much of the record, but I am going to read from the correspondence that is before the house one or two bits which indicate what the plan was. There is first the letter to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), in which the policy and the reasons for it are outlined. The reason for asking for a departure from the ordinary immigration laws in effect in this country—and I quote from the letter—was as follows:

> The trouble seems that the people have too much money to spend. They work for three or four months and then they go away and live on unemployment funds for a while and go to some other place when they are through with unemployment help.

The purpose behind the application was to assure that when these people came to Canada they would not be free to leave at the end of three or four months but would continue as employees for the period for which they were indentured, namely, a period of two years.

My right hon. friend has dealt with the humanitarian side. No party has any monopoly on that. All of us believe that displaced persons, those who suffered as none of us may ever dare to understand, however one tries, should receive assistance. These unfortunate persons want to get out of camps and go to various parts of the world. Other parts of the world are welcoming them. Canada has been notoriously deficient in performance of what we should have endeavoured to achieve in this regard. We know what our Polish allies did during the period of the war. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) spoke with understandable feeling. We know what our Ukrainian allies did. In the province of Saskatchewan family after family have relatives of those two racial origins whose contribution has been great in this country as has been that of those left behind in the old land. They are fine citizens. The question is: shall we in this parliament approve a makeshift system designed apparently to meet the needs of one employer in this country? Other employers are in a different position. The Minister of Labour said today that this order in council of April 1 is the only one of its kind. There may have been one or two subsequently—

Mr. MITCHELL: Not of that nature.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not of that nature, we are told. So what we are asked to approve is an order in council passed on April 1 and what has taken place thereunder. How was that order in council passed? What policy did the government follow? Is it a policy of welcoming to our country, by selective immigration, men and women who would make good citizens? No. It may be only the thin end of the wedge, but it is a policy that will either be continued or discontinued, and we have not any assurance with regard to that point. Upon what is the policy based? Here are the terms of the agreement as contained in a letter of March 26, 1947, from the hon. member for Beauce addressed to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen): That letter reads as follows:

Pursuant our conversation of this afternoon, I respectfully ask you to give me a permit to import 100 foreign girls or widows to work in my spinning plant "Dionne Spinning Mills Co." at St. George, Beauce.

These girls will take their headquarters at the convent—

Then it sets out the exceptionally fine circumstances under which they will live.

Mr. MITCHELL: Read all the letter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Very well.

—which is situated five hundred feet from the mill and is under the direction of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

And with that there will be no argument. To continue:

I will pay the transportation of these girls from their homes to Canada. I will see that these girls or widows are healthy morally and physically. I will comply with the rules and regulations of the Canadian government.

The next paragraph is the significant one. It reads:

I will make a contract with these girls to refund me their transportation charges at about 25 per cent of what they will earn weekly in my plant. I will pay these girls, when they begin to work, according to the ordinance No. 5 regulating the salaries and conditions of work of textile industries in the province of Quebec.

May I point out at this point, "I will make a contract" and "25 per cent of what they will earn weekly" will be deducted. The girls say they made that contract. In the last few days they have given to the press interviews in which they said that they made the contract that the hon. member for Beauce had in mind when he notified the government of his plan on March 26, 1947. The letter continues:

As I am going across myself, I will visit these girls personally so that I can make sure that they are fit for the work that they will have to perform in my mill.

I expect to bring these girls and widows by aeroplane because I understand that the shipping boat facilities are not available presently.

If there is any other regulation that you would like me to comply with I will be glad to do so.

Hoping you will give this matter preferred attention, believe me,

Yours truly,

That is the offer following correspondence over a period of approximately five months. The acceptance is in a letter from Mr. Jolliffe, dated March 27, 1947, which reads as follows:

I would refer to your letters addressed to the minister relative to the admission of young women from Europe for employment by your company. The minister has had two interviews with Mr. Dionne, M.P., and has agreed to the admission of 100 young women. Particulars of the requirements have been given to Mr. Dionne, who will no doubt be communicating with you in due course.

The letter is directed to James A. Adams, Dionne Spinning Mills Company, St. Georges, Beauce, province of Quebec. The order in council, which from its date I take it was based upon the letter, is dated April 1, 1947, and reads:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated March 27, 1947, from the Minister of Mines and Resources, representing that the Dionne Spinning Mill Company of St. George, Beauce, Quebec, have applied for the admission . . .

And so on. That order in council has already been read into the record. It concludes with these words:

The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources advise that as there is a shortage of textile workers in Canada, the provisions of order in council P.C. 695 dated the 21st March, 1931, as amended, be waived in behalf of 100 immigrants as herein described.

What does this all add up to? It means that the government consented to and approved a policy under which these girls would be brought to this country and twenty-five per cent of the amount they might earn each week would be deducted from their pay envelopes. It never lies within the right of anyone, when later he is asked to face what he has done, to say, that while he agreed to one course, later on he agreed with someone else not to do so. I point out, sir, that the order in council was passed on April 1. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked about this matter on April 23 and got no information. Nothing was said about the order in council; not a word. It was just another of those orders in council that get passed and are sometimes forgotten by the members of the government. They must have forgotten, because on April 23 they did not know anything about it. Parliament was in session, but the order in council in regard to a matter of immigration was forgotten and no information was furnished with regard to it; nor in all the discussions concerning immigration was it referred to, until after the matter had been brought to the notice of the country through the press. Why? The members of the government who have spoken have not explained the strange situation, in that the government forgot to tell parliament about the order in council and forgot to table the order in council until all arrangements had been completed and concluded. This afternoon production of the contract was asked for by various hon. members. The so-called contract is dated April 14, 1947. It was not in the record. It was not available. It came to light only tonight. Whence it came, nobody knows. All we know is that today, just before the dinner recess, the ministers denied that they had it, and tonight it appears. And how the government grab hold of that so-called contract! The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said transportation charges were not going to be deducted, according to the contract. But that is not what the contract says.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would like anyone in this country to try to enforce a contract between A and B, with A saying, "I had this contract with B but C, who had nothing to do with it, made a different arrangement with me." That is the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let me read a portion of the letter of April 14 to the secretary of the intergovernmental committee on refugees, 19 Hill street, London, which says:

> No deduction from the wages will be made by the company for the cost of transportation of the worker from Germany to destination in Canada.
> (Signed) Dionne

How is that enforceable in Canada by the girls, who were not party to it and who came to Canada under a different arrangement made between the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) and the government of this country? My hon. friends found at last a straw upon which to lean, but when it is looked into—

Mr. HOWE: Complete drivel.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My right hon. friend is more qualified than anyone in this house to speak about quibbles.

Mr. HOWE: Because I have listened to so much of it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He has listened to so much; but we have never been able to change him during a current session. We have often changed him in a subsequent session, when he has had opportunity to think the matter over and realize that we were right. I say, sir, that this was just an out for the government. They did not know it existed until late this afternoon. They did not act upon the so-called contract of April 14. Their contract and the agreement they acted upon was the arrangement they made on March 27, ratified as it was by the order in council. I am not going into further details, but when a contract has been made between certain parties I ask, is it possible to change it subsequently as between one of the original parties and a third party? The only way a government can make an arrangement is by order in council or formal agreement. In this case they made it by order in council; and the explanation given this evening is a mere exculpation found after the event. If the debate this afternoon has succeeded in convincing the government that this question of immigration should be faced in this country as a serious problem—

Some hon. MEMBERS: And in the open.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER—yes, brought into the open so that we may know what is going on, and not be hidden behind the doors of a council chamber or yet under a secret order in council, it will have been time well spent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My right hon. friend ridicules that, but, after all, parliament has the right to know what is going on, though he has never believed in that doctrine. During the war the government used to hide behind the cloak that it was not in the public interest. Those days are past. It is now in the public interest that each of us should know what is going on in the immigration branch and what is to be done. We had a lengthy debate on immigration but learned nothing about this. The contract, ratified by the order in council, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, denies the principles of the united nations. We talk about fundamental freedoms and human rights. The first human right mentioned among the many forms of human rights in the several submissions were placed before the committee of the united nations was that nowhere in the world, directly or indirectly should there be established contracts of servitude or voluntary slavery.

While these girls have secured their freedom from the awfulness of the camp, they come to Canada with their freedom two years delayed, a freedom they must buy with the sweat of their brows. I say, sir, that is not immigration; that is no immigration policy; that is no substitute for an immigration policy.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will agree that there is in Canada great sympathy for the suffering and displaced persons of Europe. There is a universal desire to help these people. I was pleased today that the plea of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gained the support of members of the Progressive Conservative party, and the leader of the Social Credit group; but I was sorry that the spirit and objective of the debate was more or less violated by the introduction of a political issue.

Through its inaction I believe the government has permitted a bad situation to develop, a situation which is creating a bad odour in Canada. The whole press is airing it, much to our discredit, and no doubt it is being aired in the United States and throughout the world. I do not think it improves our standing in the united nations to have appearing in our daily papers reports which sound like descriptions of scenes from "Uncle Tom's Cabin", which remind one of the old slave markets where girls were put up at auction with someone looking at their muscles and someone else looking at their teeth.

The result is most humiliating, and the whole problem is not being met, because it is a problem of taking care of several things, namely the need for labour in Canada and for a policy of immigration, and the further need of doing something for the displaced persons who require refuge. We are going back, instead of ahead. We are not being creditably represented by our actions—and I think we have brought this on ourselves.

However I believe the government is grateful to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) for doing something about a situation which the government itself has failed to meet. Now the government is taking credit for its high humanitarian ideals in receiving these people. I do not believe it has any right to do that. Personally if I must choose between letting the hon. member for Beauce do something and no one doing anything, I would say, "Let Dionne do it." But I do not think that is a choice we should have to make. The choice is between Canada's facing up to her responsibilities, and letting someone else face up to them. Personally, I am glad someone is doing something, but I do not think the right people are doing it or that it is being done in the proper way.

The government should not now be sensitive about criticism, after all these months have passed and no one has done anything in particular. I have on my desk Hansard for 1945, and I open this volume at the proceedings of November 20 of that year where I raised the question with respect to bringing children from Europe. I asked this question of the then minister of national health and welfare:

> I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am sorry that I did not have a chance to give him notice of this question. In view of the appalling conditions prevailing in Europe, and the certainty of death from starvation facing millions of children there, what steps are being taken to give refuge to the children of the stricken countries and bring them to this country?

And the then minister said:

> I do not know that the question properly falls within the scope of the Ministry of National Health and Welfare.

Then I persisted and asked the question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who replied at some length, telling me that there was no transportation, that we had to bring men home from overseas and that that was not the time to think about saving children in Europe.

That was on November 20, 1945. I have another reference, so that my skirts are clear, so far as this thing goes; and so far as I was concerned it was not a political issue. And I, personally, have undertaken the responsibility of keeping ten children alive in Europe, myself, this year.

I believe that we do have a responsibility, and that there are a number of things concerning which all are agreed:

1. We are agreed as to the misery;
2. We are agreed as to our responsibility;
3. We are agreed that Canada can take people; and the fact that one person has been able to take 100 indicates the truth of that assumption, and
4. I believe we are agreed that there is need for immediate action, because every member has evidence that people who once had filed application forms are now dead. That is because we have not moved quickly enough.

I am sure every hon. member has in his desk files of letters from people in his constituency who wish to bring in cousins, nephews, nieces or in-laws, but who have not been permitted to do so because of the regulations of the government. While those regulations were improved, they were not implemented with proper machinery for screening people out of these depressed areas.

It was left to the hon. member for Beauce to find the machinery, and I think he deserves a lot of credit for being able to do something the government would not do. I, personally, am glad that 100 people are coming; but I think there should be a thousand.

And hon. MEMBER: Thousands.

Mrs. STRUM: It should be the government that is bringing them, not one industrialist. Personally, I am glad that the nuns have taken care to look after them, for God knows there is not enough housing in this country for Canadians, themselves. People who have been here for many years cannot get housing. There are families living in chicken coops, families living in improvised garages, and there are thousands of families doubled up with their in-laws, and tearing their hair every day. And then we wonder why we have broken homes! We are short of housing, and I do not know what these girls would do if someone did not do something about housing them. I, for one, have no objection to anyone taking these people in who will take them. But I want to remind the house that we had thousands of families asking to bring relatives into their homes and to assimilate them in their communities, but the government did not find the means or the machinery to enable those people to come. We could have had them today, if we had taken the necessary action.

There are some aspects of the matter which have not yet been considered. Not only must we justify our action, but we must justify our motives and our methods. I believe that our whole development in law has to do with method, and that parliament itself is a monument to method in conjunction with a certain thing we call procedure, based upon justice.

I believe that we have an excellent example of our development in law in the Nuremberg trials. Not only were we interested in justice; we established the most elaborate machinery to carry out the method to see that the ends of justice were served. It is not that we object to people coming into this country—I resent those who get up and say that the C.C.F. is making a political issue of this when they are simply covering up their own failures—we welcome people coming into this country; we have urged for two years now that we bring people in, give them refuge and assistance. But we do say that we must use methods which are compatible with our British traditions of justice, and we must not violate those things which we have built up over the decades and centuries. That is what we object to.

We say that we have not met the problem by letting the hon. member for Beauce do what we should have done ourselves. I am not so much interested in whether that hon. member is paying the passage of these girls. I think it is pretty well established, after we have read the evidence leading up to the contract and the contract itself—this may not be clear but we suspect it—that the difference between the minimum wage and the lump sum will somehow be worked out to consider the passage money. The correspondence is misleading and not reassuring.

If the hon. member for Beauce is paying the passage, then we are at fault. In the case of the Polish soldiers we let somebody else pay the passage. We let the impoverished British government pay the passage of those soldiers and now we are letting the hon. member for Beauce do it. We are sitting back and refusing to do our share to help the displaced persons of Europe find a home. That is the crux of the situation. We still have not met our obligations, and the government must see to it that the machinery which was made available to the hon. member for Beauce to examine these people in regard to their health is extended so that more people can come in more quickly.

I hope that we will canvass the people who need labour because I am sure there are many having labour difficulties. In some industries there is a shortage of labour. I am sure there are many homes which would take these people. I have a file of letters I received when I went on the air last year during the time placed at the disposal of hon. members to speak to their constituents. At that time I made a plea for the displaced children of Europe. I asked my listeners to write to me and tell me whether they would take a child into their homes and raise it as their own child. I had letters by the dozen, not only from German people wanting German children and from French people wanting French children, but from Scotch people wanting Polish children. Some people wrote in and said that they thought Poland had suffered the most of all and they wanted to help those who had lost more than others. We could have placed thousands of children if we had the machinery to allow the gratitude and sympathy of the people of Canada to flow to Europe and to bring back people who needed help and refuge.

Not only have we a responsibility to the people who are strong and most able—if we take only those who can work in our factories and our mills we still have not met our obligations as a Christian nation—but we have also obligations to the people who are broken and ill and we should accept our share of that part of the displaced persons camps. We should not take only those who are able to work in our factories. Having certain industrialists go over to screen off the healthy people and bring them back here is not meeting the situation.

I urge the government not to try to make this a political issue. One thing I am getting awfully tired of in Canada is the practice that began to get popular after the last war. Every time anyone complained about rising prices, every time anyone raised the question of employment or old age pensions he was called a communist. It was thought that by washing him out you could wash out his objections. That is a petty, silly and childish move, but a few people still swallow it and a few people are still willing to use it. I hope that the government will not attempt it. I hope that members of other parties will not use it, because it is a pretty thin and weak argument.

We have a moral responsibility that we should meet. We should not leave this matter to the hon. member for Beauce; we should not leave it to private individuals or industrial concerns. Canada as a nation has the responsibility of bringing the people who need homes into touch with the people who want labour. Canada should provide the transportation, the medical facilities for examination and, through the immigration branch establish citizenship rights for these people whom we hope some day will be grateful not to the hon. member for Beauce, but to Canada as a great Christian nation because she has met her obligations.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not going to intervene in the debate, but I wonder if the hon. member for Vancouver East would move on behalf of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the motion be withdrawn? That would be following the usual procedure.

Mr. MacINNIS: Since the debate is finished and the purpose for which the motion was moved accomplished, I am sure that the hon. member would wish to have the motion withdrawn and I would ask that it be done with the consent of the house.

[Mrs. Strum.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Coldwell) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. ARGUE:

What is the present method used by the Department of National Revenue in calculating a farmer's total income tax for the years 1941-1946 in the event of the farmer not previously having filed a return?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

If the farmer has kept full financial records of his operations, the income tax assessments are based on such data.

Where the farmer has kept inadequate or negligible records it is necessary to reconstruct his income by examination of the growth in the surplus of his assets over liabilities, by analyses of such data as to income as can be secured from reliable sources and from such partial records as to income and expenditure as he has actually maintained. There is no one method of doing this which can be applied uniformly in all cases, but the procedures conform as closely as possible to recognized accounting principles.

Mr. BRADSHAW:

1. What was the cost of the land on which the V.L.A. houses at Stratford, Ontario, were constructed?

4. Caretakers, $1,200; land $3,628.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. REID:

What steps have been taken by the government with respect to offering a second series of Canada savings bonds this year?

Mr. MAYHEW:

The question of a second series of Canada savings bonds to be offered in the autumn as a continuation of similar offerings last year and of victory loan offerings in previous years, has been under consideration. It is clear that the Canada savings bond received a welcome and widespread response last year as an avenue for encouraging and assisting regular savings programmes of individuals, and of providing a safe and readily redeemable small savings bond. It appears desirable to continue to provide facilities for such purposes, and it has been decided in principle, therefore, that a second series will be offered this autumn, on much the same basis as last year. Details of the issue have not been finally worked out, but will be announced at some appropriate time in the future.

DIONNE SPINNING MILLS—LABOUR SHORTAGE

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Did the Deputy Minister of Labour, Mr. Arthur MacNamara, communicate with the regional employment office in Montreal, on or about November 23, 1946, regarding alleged labour shortage in the Dionne Spinning Mills of St. George, Beauce, P.Q.?

2. If so, when will the minister table a copy of the report?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. It is not the intention of the Minister of Labour to table a copy of the report, which is considered to be a privileged document. It is a report of an employee to a superior officer, and it is not customary to table such reports in the House of Commons.

EMPIRE DEFENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government been consulted or advised of the proposals as made May 16 in the parliament of Great Britain by the Foreign Secretary, the Right Honourable Mr. Bevin, that Britain will withdraw her empire defences and military bases in the Mediterranean, Suez and Middle East and such areas considered a United States responsibility?

2. If so, what action did or will Canada take in the matter?

3. Has a survey been made of the grave danger to Canada's defences by this action?

4. Did the so-called Canada-American defence board suggest it or approve of all this?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. The Canadian government is not aware that Mr. Bevin on May 16 proposed the withdrawal of empire defences and military bases in the Mediterranean, Suez and Middle East and such areas as are considered to be a United States responsibility.

2 and 3. Answered by 1.

4. No.

INDIA AND SUEZ CANAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any action been taken by Canada with respect to the proposed abandonment of India in 1948, the Suez canal and the situation in India?

2. If so, what stand did Canada take herein?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. It is assumed that the words "the proposed abandonment of India in 1948" are intended to refer to the proposed transfer to India in 1948 of complete powers of self-government in domestic and external affairs.

Canada has appointed a high commissioner to India who will have the duty of keeping in touch with the government of India; of keeping it informed of the views of the Canadian government on questions of common interest and of keeping the Canadian government informed of the views of the Indian government on such questions; and of watching over the interests of Canada and of Canadians within India.

2. As regards the attitude of the Canadian government to the transfer to India of self-governing powers, the Suez canal and the situation in India, there is nothing which can be added to the replies which were made on February 10 and February 24 to similar questions by the hon. member.

IMMIGRATION—ADMISSION OF EUROPEAN RELATIVES OF CANADIANS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

How many applications have been received by the immigration branch from September 1, 1945 to March 31, 1947, from residents of the province of Saskatchewan for the admission of relatives in Europe to Canada?

Mr. McILRAITH: No statistics are kept of such applications and therefore the information is not available.

UNITED NATIONS—PALESTINE COMMITTEE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has Canada any representative on the united nations committee dealing with Palestine? If so, who is it?

2. Has anybody been appointed as adviser? If so, whom; what experience has he had in foreign affairs and has he ever travelled in Palestine?

3. What function, if any, has Canada to perform in dealing with this matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes. The Hon. Mr. Justice I. C. Rand of the Supreme Court of Canada. Mr. Leon Mayrand of the Department of External Affairs has been named alternate to Mr. Justice Rand.

2. No.

3. Canada having been chosen as a member of the special committee on Palestine, the Canadian government was invited by the secretary-general of the united nations, in a communication from which extracts were read by me in this house on May 22, to name a representative and an alternate to serve on the committee. The Canadian representative has not been instructed by the Canadian government concerning the policy he is to advocate or support. The Canadian government associates itself with the principle defined in the communication of the secretary-general that members of the committee should act impartially and conscientiously, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the charter of the united nations.

*WHEAT—ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS —INITIAL PRICE

Mr. BURTON:

1. Has the government received a request from the interprovincial farmers union council of the united farmers of Canada (Saskatchewan section) and the Alberta farmers union, regarding increasing the initial price of wheat?

2. If so, what action has the government taken in the matter?

Mr. MacKINNON: I might answer this question verbally. The first part of the question is:

Has the government received a request from the interprovincial farmers union council of the united farmers of Canada (Saskatchewan section) and the Alberta farmers union, regarding increasing the initial price of wheat?

A letter came in from Mr. Bickerton, of the provincial farmers union council, and it is possible that the Alberta farmers union have made a similar request but I have been unable to locate any letter.

The other part of the question is:

If so, what action has the government taken in the matter?

The answer to that is: No action to date.

PASSPORTS

Mr. POULIOT:

Why is a passport a confidential document?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, the answer would, of course, be that a passport is not a confidential document. The application for a passport contains statements which are made by the applicant to the department in order to obtain the passport, and it is considered, unless there are special reasons for publicizing such information, that it should be treated as confidential. Likewise the fact that an applicant has requested or obtained a passport is generally regarded as a matter to which publicity should not be given under ordinary circumstances. The document itself is, of course, not of a confidential nature and the holder is free to disclose its contents to any person.

RUBBER

INQUIRY AS TO POLYMER CORPORATION OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MURPHY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In view of statements in the press today to the effect that the drop in the price of crude rubber may affect operations at the Polymer Corporation, is the minister prepared to make a statement to the house at this time? I learned about this just before three o'clock.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I have seen only one press report of the kind referred to and that was in the London, Ontario, Free Press, reading as follows:

Ottawa, June 1. Despite a break in the price of crude rubber, reflecting a rebound in production, operations at Polymer Corporation at Sarnia, a crown-owned synthetic rubber plant, will be unaffected.

During the past ten days or so, prices on far eastern natural rubber have slipped sharply, and this gave rise to reports that the great Sarnia industry would be closed down.

Today an official government source said flatly that any such stories were untrue.

Admittedly the decline in the price of crude had affected that of the synthetic product, but, said the official spokesman, Polymer still could face competition from natural rubber.

The break in crude had been expected this year, but it had not been anticipated that it would come quite so soon. Unless cut-throat price tactics developed, there was little to fear in the market trend, it was stated.

The Polymer concern is operated in the manner of a private company, but comes under the jurisdiction of Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Reconstruction. This coming week directors of Polymer are expected to confer with the minister. Doubtless the market trend will be discussed, but the Free Press was assured that the meeting was to be "entirely routine."

I did not prepare this press report, but I would consider it wholly accurate.

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

The house resumed from Monday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, when consideration of this measure was adjourned on the 26th of May I had just commenced to speak on penitentiary reform.

I was dealing first with a few suggestions in connection with penitentiary reform, and my first was that the system now in effect requiring regular reports to be made each month should be discontinued in so far as it requires reports to be made almost indefinitely. Some restriction should be placed on reporting, limiting it to a period of, say one year, and so far as those who have served in the armed forces are concerned the requirement in that direction should be removed.

Again, when we discharge men from the penitentiaries they go out equipped with a suit—

Mr. TUSTIN: A suit which everyone recognizes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A suit which everyone recognizes, as the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) points out, and a pair of shoes which can be identified by all. The result is that the man goes out into civilian life ostracized by his own appearance, with the mark of Cain definitely upon him. Why not equip these men with a suit of clothes and a pair of shoes that will not reveal the fact that they have but shortly before been discharged from the penitentiary? I have spoken to men who have expiated their crimes, and that is one thing they have asked for above everything else, the opportunity of going out into society without being branded by their appearance.

I have taken occasion, as hon. members in all parts of the house have, to read in Hansard the debates during the last fifteen years dealing with the question of penitentiary reform. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) throughout the years has made a great contribution and has repeatedly asked that the grand jury have the opportunity and privilege of visiting penal institutions on each occasion prior to the assizes. The grand jury does not exist in many parts of our country, but there should be some form of inspection.

Over the years the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has made his contribution, and as I read the records I think of one who, over the years, made her contribution. She is no longer a member of this house. I refer to Miss Agnes MacPhail. All these members, and many others who are here today but who were not here ten or fifteen years ago, have made their contributions.

Never was I more impressed with the necessity of there being some form of inspection than by the information which I have received in recent weeks regarding one Canadian institution which does not come under the control of the Department of Justice. I am referring to detention institutions. If the information brought to my attention in respect of one of these is in accordance with the facts it deserves the earliest possible inspection by a man like the gentleman who now presides over the penitentiary service. I refer to Nacnab island near Halifax. It is a naval and army detention institution. The information I have received reveals depressing stories of severity which deserve inspection and consideration by our penal authorities. I should like to see this institution inspected by General Gibson. He should be allowed to go through the place and interview all those confined there as is the case in the other detention camps. He should be permitted to do it confidentially, so that each individual will feel free to report on the conditions that he wishes to report on without having his identity revealed by the fact that he was interviewed by General Gibson.

There was a matter mentioned the other day that had to do with a question asked by a most distinguished practitioner at the criminal bar, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). In the course of his speech he asked the question whether or not consideration was being given to a law such as is to be found in the state of New York where, after four convictions for a definite type of crime, a man is removed from circulation. To this the minister replied:

The hon. member will find that consideration was given to that recently.

I do not know what the result of the consideration was but, having regard to its operation, I hope the answer was in the negative, although the answer given by the minister would indicate that favourable consideration had been given to it. To accept the necessity for a measure such as that at this time when the work of reformation has not been given a chance and the new plans as set out by General Gibson have not been experimented with, if you like, would be a retrograde and defeatist attitude. It is true that that law is in effect in the state of New York. It is known as the Barnes law. In Britain as well there is a similar law known as the Habitual Offenders Act, but it was brought in only after about twenty-five years of reformation having been undertaken, when it was definitely assured that, so far as repeaters were concerned, there was no hope of reformation, regardless of what the state might do.

In any event, my reading of Cohen's Criminal Cases in Britain reveals that the court of appeal views with the utmost care the application of that law. I find, too, that when juries come to realize that a conviction for a fourth offence will mean imprisonment for life, or, as in Great Britain, for a period of ten years, they do what they do everywhere in the world when they realize that a law is unfair and unjust; they interpret that law, not in the light of the law, but in the light of their desire to carry out the principles of justice. Regardless of the evidence, they will, in the circumstances, acquit.

If the minister has looked into this question I suggest he will find that now is not the time for such an act. We are twenty-five, thirty-five, forty years behind in Canada in comparison with other parts of the world in the matter of penitentiary administration. In a large proportion of the cases we have failed to provide reformation. I mention the inspection because, after all, inspection shows what can be done. I mentioned that the other evening. But let us first bring in this new system that General Gibson suggests. Then, after a period of ten or fifteen years, if it is found that reformation will not operate in certain cases, consideration might be given to bringing in an automatic life-term forfeiture piece of legislation.

I cannot quite understand why the government saw fit to depart from one of the major recommendations of the Archambault commission, namely, that of a commission of three. On May 3, 1939, the hon. member for Broadview asked the then minister of justice, the late Mr. Lapointe, what action would be taken to appoint a commission under the law in that regard which received royal assent on April 25, 1939. The answer was that it would be constituted in due time. Well, years have gone by. During the war the excuse was that a war was on, and I am not saying that it was not a good excuse. That was the explanation. Then, by an amendment to the Penitentiary Act, we set up a commission to reinvestigate what a commission had already spent a long period of time investigating. It recommended that the royal commission which heard evidence all over Canada and throughout various parts of the world and based its recommendation on a commission of three, should be departed from. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) that this is not the time to make such a change. The commission of three, composed of outstanding men, one of whom is today the Chief Justice of Ontario, trial division, Mr. Chief Justice McRuer, apparently has not changed his mind in that regard. However, the recommendation is to be changed.

I suggest that even yet the government should return to the principle of a three-man commission rather than adopt that of a one-man commission with two assistants, whose work will be of a scientific nature. Some say to me, what difference does it make? The other day the minister asked my hon. friend what difference it would make whether it was a one-man or a three-man commission. What the minister is trying to do is to lay the foundations for a new and better penological system than we have ever had before. With one in charge, in the nature of things he is more or less hampered by the attitude of the department or the minister. With three, there is a division of responsibility. Three are in a position to say, "We are going to carry out what we think is right. We are being placed in charge and we are going to administer the system." But with one man, the responsibility falls on him; and whatever his views may be and however desirous he may be of carrying out the best system and bringing into effect the latest in scientific penological knowledge that is available, over and above him he has a stratum which he must break through, namely a group of individuals who have been administering the law over the years. All of us, being human, believe that what has been good enough for the last twenty or thirty years should not be changed all at once. I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to that matter and place before the house and the country in the fullest possible way the reason why he has seen fit to depart from a recommendation which has been made by the Archambault commission and which has been generally accepted everywhere in this country by gaol and penitentiary welfare associations, by penitentiary chaplains who are close to the problem, and also by the wardens of the several penitentiaries.

I now pass on to the next phase. One of the recommendations which the hon. member for Davenport has pressed for over the years has been the bringing into effect of the Borstal system. He has visited the great gaols in the United Kingdom. He has studied the operation of the Borstal system. He has added the weight of his authority and experience to the recommendations of the commission. But we are today no nearer having that system than we were in 1938. Of course the reason for that is that under the British North America Act there is a division of power regarding penological institutions, whereby gaols and reformatories are under provincial jurisdiction and penitentiaries are under federal jurisdiction. But the Archambault commission recommended that the Borstal system be brought in. That recommendation must have been made after consultation with the attorneys general of the various provinces. That recommendation could be carried out by agreement between the federal authorities and the provinces. When the minister replies, I think he should frankly tell the house and the country whether he has been in communication with the provincial attorneys general and what has been done in this regard; because it is a matter of only a few years ago when—according to Mr. McRuer, K.C., as he then was, and as I understand the speech that he made—without exception the various provincial authorities were willing that this be carried into effect.

This is one of the matters which should have come before the dominion-provincial conference in any event. If the government or members of the opposition realized that this was a problem, the solution of which would have a bearing on determining the number of votes, more attention would be given to it. Under those circumstances, this would have been a problem which would have come before the dominion-provincial conference. Apparently it never did. It is true that it concerns the welfare of some 3,600 convicts, but they are human beings too. We talk about recidivists and how they keep coming back three, four and five times. But, sir, where the kind of treatment is accorded which can be given by a warden who is moved by humane feelings, the number of recidivists is always greatly reduced.

I personally have had some little experience over the years with regard to criminal jurisprudence, and I have not seen, in my experience, one instance of an individual who was either convicted and sent to the penitentiary or acquitted after being charged, who ever again became involved in the commission of crime. I think it is a matter of the personality of the individual. There is a difference in wardens.

When you take prisoners from one jurisdiction and move them into another, the statistics of the jurisdiction into which they are moved do not show the true facts.

With regard to the Saskatchewan penitentiary, amongst the convicts from those two provinces who have come into that institution there have been few recidivists. When you place dangerous criminals and repeaters in those institutions, you not only undermine the discipline of the place, but also destroy the possibility of reform on the part of many with whom the experienced convicts come into contact.

Now is the time to call a dominion-provincial conference in this regard, so that once and for all we may settle this problem, and the dominion may go as far as it can in carrying out, in association with the provinces, the recommendations of the Archambault commission. Unless you bring that system in, you are building from the roof down. While you may be able to build some kind of place in that way, you can never build as you could if you laid a foundation. You are starting in on the superstructure and using the old foundation. But you cannot hope to achieve the results that could be achieved if you started out once and for all today to bring in a system which has been recommended and which has been found successful in other parts of the world. As a matter of fact, the United Kingdom tried this thirty-nine years ago. They brought in a new system. They departed from the Old Testament principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Cruel and unfair punishments were abolished 100 years ago, but unfairness still continued, and cruelty was perpetrated on prisoners. Then came the new era and the result has been this. There have been few recidivists, and 17,000 individuals who committed the most serious offences against the criminal law of Great Britain have in the last twenty-five years been completely reformed and become first-rate citizens in that country.

I am just advancing suggestions that have come to me as a result of my own small experience. You put a man in jail; he serves his term, and the mark is on him. At the end of his term he comes out, and over the years his record comes up. These men become cowards, fearful of a revelation being made. If they go to an employer, unless they have assistance from some organization, and tell of their prison records, they are under suspicion. If they are discharged from prison and have to report regularly, finally they have to let the employer know. There is no one to care for them after they leave the penal institutions. Sometimes that information being given an employer results in the dismissal of the individual, and he is on his way back to another penal institution because there are few reformative institutions available to him. That brings me to the next point. Our criminal code is, in large measure, outmoded. The last major amendment was in 1892, when codification took place. Punishments totally out of keeping with present-day conditions are still provided. Modern scientific developments in psychology, psychiatry and sociology have no place in the administration or application of the criminal code. The law of insanity is still the law of 104 years ago. In the report, reference is made to provision for taking mental cases out of the penitentiaries and sending them to mental institutions. That may be so today, but it was not a fact two or three years ago; for in Prince Albert penitentiary there was a criminal with homicidal tendencies, mentally deficient, who the authorities were warned over a considerable period of time was dangerous. He was kept there; the authorities did not pay any attention to the objections raised. Finally he brutally stabbed one of the warders, Mr. Charles Chisholm, who was saved by one of the lifers who was prepared to give his life for the warder. After that a change was made; but I could name a prisoner, though I am not going to, who was found to be mentally deficient and dangerous fifteen years ago, but who is still confined in that institution along with the other prisoners.

I suggest that each prisoner, as General Gibson has stated, should be carefully examined and, where there is serious doubt—not assumed doubts—he should be transferred to the care of an institution where psychiatrists will be able to study his case and perhaps bring about a restoration of his mental faculties. In the mental hospital at North Battleford great work is being done in that regard. Today when we were speaking of immigration I thought of the man there who, under the leadership of Doctor Nelson, is doing that work. He was a Czech refugee in 1939, and started a system of psychological experimentation. He was educated in Vienna under Freud, and has brought back quite a number to a realization of their wrongdoing and a desire for reformation, through the removal of fears which originally drove them to the commission of crime.

I spoke about a start. I suggest to the minister that the criminal code be amended to provide that no man may be imprisoned by reason of his poverty, because of his inability to pay a fine. I have spoken about this on previous occasions. One sees it regularly. You have seen it in your practice, Mr. Speaker; every member of this house who is a member of the bar has seen cases where fines are imposed with jail terms as the alternative. An individual who is unable to pay because of poverty is liable to imprisonment, and in many cases suffers imprisonment for this one reason.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ILSLEY: Go on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall not deal with the other matters I had in mind, but I have one other suggestion in that connection. Imprisonment because of inability to pay a fine has been done away with in Great Britain. Let us do away with it in Canada. Failure to pay a fine should not give poverty a compulsory passport to imprisonment. The individual who is imprisoned for some petty offence serves his term and is marked, and from that point many of them start on the downward path on account of the ostracism which is shown to individuals who have suffered incarceration because of the commission of offences. People do not separate the different offences and say, "Well, it was a picayune matter." All they understand is that the individual has served a term.

My concluding words are in reference to the staffs. However well disposed we may all be toward the matter of reformation; whatever our desire may be to improve the administration of criminal law, the work finally will rest upon those charged with that administration. As far as the two commissioners who will operate along with General Gibson are concerned, there should be available outstanding psychologists, penologists or educators. Advances are being made by the provinces. Ontario has made great advances in the last two years under the Hon. Mr. Dunbar. I pay tribute to what has been done in Saskatchewan even in the last few months as a consequence of the momentous report which was made by the Doctor Laycock commission in regard to the question of penal reform. We should recruit for these institutions men and women trained in social and penological science. The universities have many students, overseas men who have returned to this country, who would be only too willing to undertake that type of study, if they were given the opportunity. If this plan of reformation is to be set up, and if we do not have the proper personnel, we are again in the position where, while we have the letter of the law, the spirit will not and cannot be carried out.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I am glad that, under the report, consideration is to be given to increasing the salaries of guards. Major consideration should be given to that matter. There may be some who will say, "You advocate cutting expenses, but at the same time you advocate increasing salaries". I have never advocated increases before. I have never preached both ways. But if we are to make the penal institutions of this country worthy of the responsibility which will rest upon them, I submit, first, that we shall have to come back to the system which prevailed prior to the thirties, whereby the employees will be placed under the Civil Service Act.

I know what the arguments against this would be. But these employees want permanency. If the government wants to recruit the best men it will have to meet the rate of salaries. The present system has its shortcomings, in that efficiency is not always the basis upon which appointments are made. First, we should give opportunity to the servicemen of this and the last war, second, a training course should be provided for so as to encourage young men who have been discharged from the armed forces to go into this work. Salaries should be made attractive enough that the best may be recruited, and permanency must be assured.

I wish to thank the house for its consideration in allowing me to do what ordinarily I do not do, namely, go over the forty minutes allowed. I have endeavoured to place these few suggestions before the minister, based as they are on some knowledge of the subject. General Gibson's report is one which shows that he has devoted himself to the responsibility which has been his. It is the place of parliament at this time, when we are making changes in the Penitentiary Act, to go as far as we can to the end that we make it worthy of the challenge which must come to all of us to make those who are discharged from penal institutions reformed individuals, worthy and willing to take their place in the battle of life.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, during the past I have had the opportunity of listening to lawyers, preachers and teachers deal with agriculture, so that tonight for a change I think it would be all right if a farmer were to deal with justice.

The farmers in my constituency have been waiting for justice since June, 1945, and we have not got it yet. One of the reasons I rise tonight is that in my constituency two young lives have been ruined, and one has been lost. I feel, in one case particularly, it was probably on account of lack of cooperation between the dominion federal prison at Kingston and the mental institutions of the province. I have some references to make later, and probably at that time I shall have an opportunity to develop this matter more fully.

I have had an opportunity to meet and talk with Mr. Allan, the warden of Portsmouth, Doctor Crawford the psychiatrist, and Mr. Sauvant, acting superintendent of penitentiaries and the remission service, and I have no fault to find with them. They were doing their best, under the conditions laid down for them. They did their very best to help these cases to which I have just referred.

In my opinion, federal prisons are post-graduate schools in crime. The two young men to whom I have referred were sent there as first offenders and put in with hardened criminals. The Archambault report states that 188 recidivists were convicted 3,434 times at a cost of $25,453 to the country. It seems to me that it is a crime to put these young first offenders in prison with the hardened types of criminals.

Long ago a man named John Galsworthy, an English apostle of justice, said that "in prison, as in life, a man can be reformed only by kindness". Nothing can be done about the young man who lost his life. I hope that he will not have lost it in vain, and that this circumstance will create in the minds of our government officials and in the handling of our prisons a better condition. If this develops, his sacrifice will not have been in vain.

Another young man of whom I spoke was caught in a stolen car. He was not in charge of the car himself; it was being driven by another man. He refused to give evidence or to talk, because he felt it would embarrass his people back home if they found out he had been caught in this act. He was given six years in prison. There was no one to defend him, and when he came away from that institution he was bitter toward society. Perhaps we would feel the same way, had we been in the same position.

I quote the following from Everybody's magazine of December 7, 1946, where it deals with prison reform:

> A sensitive and intelligent public opinion combined with the efforts of experts, led to the prison act of 1898, in which work in association was allowed, a most important measure, remedying one of the glaring defects of the old system. In 1911, Mr. Winston Churchill, then home secretary, after seeing a performance of Galsworthy's moving play "Justice," which deals with the subject of solitary confinement, abolished this relic of the dark ages and put the civilized world in his debt.

It is a long article in Everybody's, and I suggest that those who are interested should get the article and pursue it further. I have here the letter from the warden's office regarding the particular case to which I referred a moment or two ago, and this illustrates the lack of cooperation between our dominion prisons and the mental hospitals of the province. This reads:

> You have also raised the point in regard to having your son transferred to a mental hospital. We all agree here that this would be the proper place for him in his present condition. However, due to abnormal conditions it has not been possible for us to arrange for the admittance of mental patients to a provincial institution for several years.

And then the letter from the doctor reads:

> What should be done is that he should be transferred to a mental hospital for further care.

I do not want to take up a great deal more of the time of the house. I feel sure that if we act on the recommendations of the various commissions and other bodies which have investigated prison affairs, surely in this day and age we can work out a better system. I have appreciated, and I think the house has appreciated what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just said. When I talked with Doctor Crawford at Kingston he told me that there were some six other inmates who really should be in mental hospitals rather than in a federal prison.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into supply.

He said: Last week the house was kind enough to consent to call some items in supply. We asked for four, but, after discussion with the leaders, we agreed to call three items tonight, not for discussion, but just to get them into committee. That would give us thirteen out of twenty.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO FULFILMENT OF CONTRACT WITH BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he inform the house if Canada is fulfilling her contract for wheat delivery to Britain in accordance with the terms of the contract?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member sent me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I wish to state that the total wheat contract for this year is for the shipment of 136 million bushels. Of this amount, 99 million bushels were shipped to the United Kingdom to the end of May. That leaves 37 million bushels which will be shipped, I have no doubt, during the last two months of the year. As to flour shipments, all these have been made or are on the way.

Mr. BENTLEY: Making the full contract?

Mr. MacKINNON: Making the full contract.

FISH

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PROTECT FOREIGN MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have given him notice. In view of the increased general competition for export markets, and press reports that the United States congress has received representations to increase tariffs on Canadian fish, will the government take whatever steps are necessary to protect our foreign markets for fish by reciprocal tariff adjustments, trade agreements, favourable freight rates, or otherwise?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian delegation to the international conference at Geneva, where such matters are being considered, was fully and carefully briefed with respect to all phases of our fish trade with the United States and other markets abroad, and can be relied on to see that any developments affecting this trade are given the care and attention they deserve.

PUBLIC WORKS

BREAKWATER PROJECT AT PORT MORIEN, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): On Friday last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked the following question:

Can the minister tell the house when work will begin on the breakwater at Port Morien, Cape Breton, for which an appropriation of $300,000 was made last year, or have the tenders been called for, for this project?

The answer is that plans and specifications are in the course of preparation. It is expected the department will be ready to call for public tenders within the next three weeks. In view of the shortage of technically trained personnel this slight delay was necessary.

BOY SCOUTS

TRANSPORTATION TO ATTEND JAMBOREE OF PEACE AT PARIS—SUMMER PLANS FOR H.M.C.S. "WARRIOR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): In view of the fact that I have been receiving a great many letters and telegrams asking if arrangements could not be made for the transportation of some boy scouts to the post-war jamboree at Paris, I should like to ask either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of National Defence if such arrangements can now be arranged.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Representations have been received from the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) and other hon. members. Perhaps I might take advantage of this opportunity to make a statement on the plans for the summer for His Majesty's Canadian Ship Warrior.

On June 8 she will put to sea from Halifax on the first of two local cruises lasting until June 24. These will concentrate on the training of reserve personnel. An annual leave period for the first watch will follow.

On August 2 Warrior will sail for the United Kingdom to ferry personnel of No. 803 and 825 squadrons. These are the men who will man the new Sea Fury and Firefly IV aircraft of H.M.C.S. Magnificent when she is commissioned. A number of R.C.N. (reserve) men, doing annual training, will also be carried.

On this crossing there will be 25 R.C.N. sea cadets who will be visiting the United Kingdom under the sponsorship of the Navy League of Canada. It has also been possible to arrange accommodation on Warrior for the specially picked Canadian boy scouts who are attending the international jamboree of peace in Paris. This group will probably consist of one complete scout troop numbering about 35. Accommodation could not be arranged for these groups on passenger vessels, and as the Warrior was making the trip anyway their passage could be undertaken without additional expense.

Warrior will return to Halifax, at the end of August, when the annual leave period for the second watch will begin. Between October 1 and October 21 she will be at sea for deck landing training. This will be carried out by No. 883 and 826 squadrons, manning her Seafires and Firefly I's. Later in the year the carrier will again sail for the United Kingdom to act as depot ship for her successor Magnificent prior to being paid off when the latter commissions.

HOUSING

PRESS REPORTS AS TO PLANS FOR MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply relating to a report appearing in this morning's Journal, to the effect that the government is bringing down a new housing plan which is to be placed before municipal governments for study.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I read the report in question, Mr. Speaker. I have had no direct communication with the mayor of Ottawa, and therefore do not know to what his comment refers. The housing branch of the department of reconstruction is constantly placing new housing plans before cities, and it is quite possible the department has placed a plan before the city of Ottawa; but if so I am not familiar with the details.

TIN

STATEMENT AS TO ALLOCATION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Perhaps I might give some information which was promised at an earlier sitting in reference to tin. With the concurrence of my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), under whose jurisdiction the non-ferrous metals administration of the wartime prices and trade board comes, I wish to make a statement to the house on tin supplies. Hon. members will recall that last week I made a brief reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) on the subject and promised to add to it later.

The current shortage of tin in Canada arises out of sharply reduced output from the Malayan field which is the principal world source of the metal. When Japan controlled this area during the war a great deal of damage was done to tin mining facilities and it is expected that not until well into 1949 will production in Malaya be up to standards prevailing before the Japanese occupation.

Allocation of available world tin supplies is determined by the combined tin committee, an international body which sits periodically in Washington. Canada became a member of the committee in the session of March of this year. At that session the Canadian delegate was Mr. Clark Wilson, then deputy administrator of non-ferrous metals, a capable and dependable officer with many pre-war years of experience in the metals industry.

At the March meeting of the tin committee, because of the gloomy outlook for supplies, the committee was able to allocate to Canada, for the first half of this year, a bare 55 per cent of our minimum estimated requirements. This quantity, to correct my statement last Tuesday, represented only about 40 per cent of our allocation for the corresponding period of 1946, when world stocks were heavily drawn upon.

In the face of this situation it has been necessary to maintain a careful supervision over releases and uses of tin. Hon. members will realize that our food pack and dairy industries are heavily dependent on supplies of this metal. It is absolutely indispensable in modern industry. As may be imagined, the authorities concerned have been hard put to it to look after essential consumers as well as to keep the less essential manufacturers supplied at least on a minimum operating basis. Nevertheless, for the first four months of this year, Canadian industry received more tin than in the same period last year. This was accomplished, of course, by drawing upon stocks. To date, so far as we know, nobody has had to shut down.

Our purchases in past weeks have been rather more encouraging and we have reason to hope that the position will gradually improve. The next meeting of the combined tin committee is the middle of this month and our delegate is being instructed to press strongly for a greatly increased quota.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF EUROPEAN RELATIVES OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the acting Minister of Mines and Resources, in view of the reply given yesterday to a question I asked. Is there any possible means whereby a member of this house can obtain figures or approximate figures of the number of applications received by the department from the people of any province for admission to Canada of their relatives from Europe?

Right Hon C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall be glad to investigate the situation and give my hon. friend a reply at a later sitting.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY

FREIGHT RATES BETWEEN BORDEN AND TORMENTINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of a special report which came from Ottawa to the maritime provinces on May 28. I had an urgent call from a man who is anxious to go into private enterprise, namely the truck transfer business. My question to the minister is, at what date are the freight rates on the Borden-Tormentine car ferry to be brought into line with the Wood Islands-Cariboo freight tariffs, namely a nominal charge for vehicles and no charge for freight load of any class of commodity.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The matter to which the hon. gentleman refers has been receiving the attention of the officers of the Canadian National Railways as a result of representations received from the members from Prince Edward Island and other sources there. I am not in a position to tell the hon. gentleman what the situation is at the moment, other than to say that the Canadian National Railways are giving particular attention to this subject, and I hope will be able to make an announcement very shortly.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CLAXTON

WRONG NAMES GIVEN IN CONNECTION WITH A PHOTOGRAPH PUBLISHED IN "LE SOLEIL"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A photograph showing Canadian army officers has appeared in a Quebec newspaper, Le Soleil, under the caption "For the amalgamation of labour unions". Besides that title, we could read the following details:

Representing about 13,500,000 workers, the leaders of the main labour unions in the United States have recently met for the purpose of discussing the amalgamation of their organizations. Reports from Washington indicate some progress along that line at that labour conference. The labour leaders are, from left to right: William Green, president of the A.F. of L., Philip Murray, president of the C.I.O., Daniel Tobin, president of the A.F. of L. Teamsters Union, and John L. Lewis, president of the A.F. of L. United Mine Workers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the persons appearing on that photograph were the following: Lieut. Colonel Roberge, commanding officer of the Royal 22nd Regiment, Colonel Charlebois, director of infantry, as well as other Canadian army officers. These persons are not better than the others, but they are different.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

CROP FAILURE PAYMENTS—AWARDS TO FARMERS WITH MINIMUM PRODUCTION

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend The Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to provide that the two schedules of payment now provided under the emergency year section and the crop failure section be merged and become payable in any year without specific authority from the governor in council and without requiring that a minimum number of townships be eligible before the crop failure schedule of award is payable; that the restriction in respect to the payment of awards to farmers with a certain minimum production of wheat may be removed; and that certain provisions be clarified in order to facilitate administration.

He said: The resolution on the order paper is one providing for the introduction of a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I believe there will be general agreement in the house with regard to the amendments proposed.

Sections 3 and 4 in the present act provide for payments of certain amounts on an acreage basis, in a year when the government declares it an emergency year, under section 3, and when it is declared to be a crop failure year, under section 4. The proposed amendments do away with the necessity for the government's declaring any year an emergency year. They also do away with the necessity for there being any number of townships over and above one in order to have it declared a crop failure year.

The provision for two different ranges of payments is entirely done away with, and the measure will operate automatically. If there is one township or more in which there is a yield of eight bushels or less, payment will be made on the basis provided in the amended act. The only difference in the basis of the provision is that section 3 did provide for payment in the lower category, or from four bushels down, while section 4 provided for payment from five bushels down. Payment as it was made for five bushels down, in the act as it was, will now be made from four bushels down and will go into effect automatically in every township in which there are four bushels or less. That is the principal change made by the amending bill. The provision now in the act whereby any farmer in a township where payment was made, who had over three thousand bushels of wheat, was denied payment, is taken out, so that no matter what bushelage he has, he is entitled to payment.

Some other amendments are designed to clarify the meaning of the act and to bring into effect the provisions of which I have spoken. These, however, are the two main amendments.

It is my intention that as soon as the bill is printed and prepared for second reading it will be referred to the committee on agriculture. Any questions which hon. members desire to ask or any proposals they wish to make with respect to the measure may be discussed fully in committee and of course can be discussed on second reading of the bill if the house so desires. However, the suggestion that the bill go to a committee would perhaps provide a reason why the principal discussion, for the time being, might take place there. I would suggest that the resolution go now to the committee of the whole.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to enter into a debate on this resolution. I just wish to say that the time for amending this act is now long past. The house will therefore welcome the amendments suggested by the minister. The proposal that the discussion take place in committee is a good one. Hon. members in this party are prepared to let the resolution pass now, and to have the debate not so much in committee as on second reading after the principles of the amendments are made clear by the minister.

I shall not take any further time now. But I might ask the minister if it is his intention to refer the amendments proposed to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question. I know he has been receiving representations from many parts of the country for the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to other sections of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: This is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon, and I believe we in this group can approve the changes he has intimated are likely to take place in the act. I had a resolution placed on the order paper this year asking that the provision of the act be extended. I believe when we are considering prairie farm assistance we should consider making it applicable to other parts of Canada—for instance to the fruit growers in the Niagara peninsula of Ontario, the fruit growers of British Columbia, the tobacco growers of Ontario, and the fruit growers of the maritime provinces. All these would receive a good deal of benefit if the act were extended, and if benefits were paid on account of crop failures to all farmers in Canada suffering such failures.

This year, on account of the lateness of the season, many counties in Ontario and Quebec are likely to experience widespread crop failures, perhaps the worst in the history of the area. I should hope that consideration might be given to the extension of the act so that farmers throughout the country may have adequate protection from crop failures.

I am interested in this legislation, too, because I represent a constituency in the Palliser triangle, the area in which this act has been of greatest benefit to the farmers.

It has been stated in the house on various occasions that the settlement of that area was a mistake. Let me say that large production of grain and dairy and meat products has come from that area, so that the whole of the Palliser triangle forms an important part of the agricultural producing area in Canada and contributes heavily in agricultural products for the nations of the world.

There are many faults in the present act and certainly the changes that have been suggested will be welcomed. We hope that more changes will be made when the bill is presented to the house.

This act now provides some measure of security to the farmers. The government stated many times at the dominion-provincial conference that it would do everything possible to provide the people of this country with security. For instance, one of the statements in the government proposals was this:

> In familiar terms, our objectives are high and suitable employment and income and a greater sense of public responsibility for individual economic security and welfare.

And again:

> The dominion government feels it has a responsibility to assist the industry (meaning agriculture) in making the necessary readjustments to peace time circumstances and to work in cooperation with the provincial governments to provide for a greater degree of stability in farm income and a greater measure of security than has prevailed in the past.

The bringing of this legislation before the house at this session will give the government a chance to show the people whether or not they are really going to give the farmers security. The present provision for a possible payment of $2.50 per acre on half the cultivated acreage, or a maximum payment of $500, is not giving our farmers security. We in this group recommend that the benefits be increased to at least $6 per acre, that they be paid on an individual basis and that if necessary the deductions be increased so that more money may be paid into the fund for extending these benefits.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ARGUE: There may be a lot of "carrieds", but I do not care where they come from. This is an important resolution and I intend to speak on it.

I have made a calculation of what I consider to be the minimum cost of carrying out farming operations on an average farm in southwestern Saskatchewan. The cost of farming is cheaper per acre in this part of the province than in any other part, but the cultivated acreage is larger, so I have no doubt the total cost per farm will compare reasonably well. The average size of farm is 325 acres. Under the act a farmer can receive $2.50 per acre on half of his cultivated acreage, which would make his payment approximately $400. It will take at least 200 bushels of wheat to seed 162 acres at a cost of $240. It will cost not less than 75 cents per acre, or $121.50, to seed those 162 acres. Summer-fallowing operations will cost 75 cents per acre and for two operations $243. The total seeding and summer-fallowing costs are more than $600. On the basis of the payments received under the P.F.A.A. on a crop of less than four bushels per acre this average farmer will be $200 in the red on his seeding and summer-fallowing operations. He would not have one dollar from the fund to provide for the payment of taxes and interest on his debt, to say nothing of providing for the cost of his own living and the maintenance of his family.

To increase the payments to $6 per acre would provide a maximum payment of $1,200, or a payment to the average farmer of approximately $1,000. If that increased payment was provided for in the act it would be little enough in view of the great increases which have taken place in farm costs. These increases have taken place because the government saw fit to remove the price ceilings. The increased farm costs are directly a result of the action of the government. Therefore I contend it is the responsibility of the government to see that the farmers are protected in time of crop failure.

There is another reason why the payments should be increased. I refer to the decision of the supreme court outlawing the Saskatchewan farm security act. The Department of Justice of this government took that act to the supreme court where it was declared to be ultra vires. That act meant a lot to the farmers of Saskatchewan in time of crop failure. If a man had a $5,000 mortgage and his interest rate was six per cent, the farm security act would have saved him $300. Many farmers are going to have increased expenses in years of crop failure because that act has been disallowed. If this government believes in giving the farmers security then it must give some additional compensation. It took that act to the supreme court and by doing so was instrumental in having it disallowed.

I contend that the payments under this act should be made on an individual basis, because making the payments on a township basis is not fair. I have had dozens and dozens of cases brought to my attention in which farmers have had complete crop failures and perhaps lived just across the road from a township in which payments were made, but they did not receive payment because there were not enough other farmers in the immediate vicinity who were also in the unfortunate position of having crop failures.

The present act provides that payments will be made in an area of one-quarter of a township provided that it is a rectangle and provided that one side lies along a township receiving the bonus. I had a case brought to my attention this year in which there were nine sections or one-quarter of a township with less than eight bushels per acre. Eight of those sections formed a rectangle but the ninth, which was necessary to bring them under the act, made it impossible to form a rectangle and therefore the farmers were not eligible for payments. Because of that regulation those farmers who justly deserved payments were discriminated against. The only way that situation can be overcome is to provide for payments on an individual basis.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but a few days ago I called the attention of the house to a well known rule which forbids the reading of speeches. I realize that a member is permitted to consult his notes, but I wonder if the hon. member who now has the floor is consulting notes or reading his speech. I should like to again call the attention of all hon. members to the fact that I gave perhaps too much latitude in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the budget debate. From now on I think it is the desire of members of the House of Commons that an hon. member should not be allowed to read his speech.

Mr. ARGUE: I agree that an hon. member should not read his speech. I have not read a speech in this house, and I am not reading a speech today. I will show you these notes, and if a speech could be made by reading them, I am sure it would be completely incoherent.

Mr. HOMUTH: They are very copious notes.

Mr. ARGUE: My hon. friend is also very copious.

I wish to make some specific recommendations. One is that the twenty-mile provision under the regulations be abolished so that any farmer, whether or not he happens to live twenty miles from the farm he operates, shall be eligible to receive the bonus; also that the twenty-year age limitation be removed. A young man eighteen years of age was conscripted, or almost conscripted, into the service of this country. Surely a young man of that age should be entitled to receive the benefit of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I think that payments should be made to anyone whose primary occupation is farming, even if the individual does not live on the farm. Consideration should also be given to the zoning of the area now under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, so that the benefits from the act may not be less over the years than the deductions that are made.

Again I say, I am glad that the resolution has been brought in for discussion by the house, and I trust that these recommendations will be carefully considered and that the new act will make provision accordingly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I want to make an apology. When I am wrong I believe in publicly admitting that I am wrong. I said the other day that Dave Lewis wrote all the speeches of the C.C.F. party. I want to apologize publicly for that statement, because obviously Dave Lewis would not write some of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This kind of gibe I think is beneath the dignity of parliament. Let me say this, that my hon. friends are not reading their speeches, and no one has ever written a speech for me.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I never said that the leader of the C.C.F. ever read a speech. He does not. But let him go up in the gallery and look down on some of his followers—

Mr. COLDWELL: No. There are occasions on which I read a statement to the house which has been approved by my followers. I want to make it clear that I occasionally do that; but I think these gibes are too cheap to be used in this house.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, as the bill to be based on this resolution is to be sent to a committee, I shall be brief. This group is glad that the government has seen fit to bring in the resolution at this time. We were very much disappointed last year when owing to pressure of business the government decided not to bring it in then.

Seventy-five per cent of my constituency might be classified as a semi-permanent drought area. Therefore the people in that district are dependent upon the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and I think will continue to be dependent upon it until such time as the government sees fit to construct the irrigation projects which have been promised for a number of years but which the government seems reluctant to begin. Irrigation has been constantly in the minds of those people since the early settlement days, and year after year the government has promised that these irrigation projects will be constructed, but so far the people have looked in vain for their commencement.

In spite of all the criticism that has been made of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and its administration, I believe it has served the people well. To many farmers it has made all the difference between being able to carry on and having to give up. Most of the criticism I have heard has been of a constructive nature and directed chiefly against the method of determining whether or not certain land is eligible for payment of the bonus. That is the main criticism in the area I come from. The minister will agree that the method is far from satisfactory. When the act was first introduced the minister suggested that after a while it might be possible to determine eligibility on the basis of the type of soil a farmer owned, but so far that method has not been introduced, and I can see that it would not be an easy way of determining eligibility for the bonus.

The two points the farmers criticize are these. In a township that is not eligible it is possible to take out a minimum of nine sections of land, provided they are contiguous to a township that is eligible, and provided further that the sections are in a rectangular block. There may be sections right alongside the block with yields of less than four bushels to the acre, yet because they are not within the rectangular block they are not eligible for the bonus. This year I ran into a peculiar case—it may not happen very often—which showed how unsatisfactory this method of determining eligibility of the land is. I had a township referred to me that was declared eligible. Then the inspector found within the township six sections which had a high yield. The act does not provide for taking six sections out of a township. It provides for taking out only nine. So they included three sections which had had a total crop failure along with the six, and then took those nine out. Naturally the farmers on the three sections which had suffered a crop failure within a township that had been declared eligible felt bitter when denied the bonus by reason of being included in a block of nine sections, only six of which had a high yield. That may not happen very often, but it should not be necessary for the inspector to include three sections which had a total crop failure along with six others which had a good crop.

We in this group welcome the changes proposed by the minister, and I hope that when the bill is before the committee he will allow a full discussion of other points which we think should be dealt with.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, we have no thought whatever at this stage of continuing the discussion. The resolution makes clear the government's position with respect to the amendments it proposes. So far as we are concerned the general position of our party was put before the house by the hon. member for Lake Centre on April 28, in his remarks as reported in Hansard beginning at page 2473. In view of the clear position of the government as expressed in the amendments proposed and in view also of the objections which have been raised from various parts of the house, we have no thought of delaying this measure now. We will offer any constructive suggestions we have before the committee on agriculture, and if the bill as reported from the committee is not satisfactory to us we shall continue the discussion on second reading of the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to finish the question I started to ask the Minister of Agriculture when the Speaker was in the chair. The provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as well as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, are applicable to the prairies only. Representations have been made from many sections of Canada to have the provisions of this legislation become national. Is it the intention of the minister at least to give consideration to expanding the legislation so that all farmers of Canada may receive the protection which the prairie farmers are receiving under this legislation?

Mr. GARDINER: It would have to be entirely different legislation from this if the government of Canada were to attempt to provide a form of so-called insurance to farmers generally across Canada. This legislation is based entirely on drought and on nothing else. I am sure the people who live in Ontario know that they do not need drought insurance here, particularly this year. This legislation is based entirely on giving assistance where there is drought and if we were to have legislation brought in to provide assistance—the federal parliament have not authority to provide insurance—similar to that provided by the legislation we are discussing, it would have to be an entirely different act from this one. We could not enlarge this act to cover Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): First of all may I say that I am wholeheartedly in agreement with what my leader has already said on this measure. I think we might, where measures such as this are to go to a committee, speed up the business of the house if we save a lot of the discussion on the resolution stage, because we rehash the same arguments in committee. Then we come back and discuss the committee's report. Surely we should be able to speed up the business greatly if we carry on our discussion in committee.

This act was brought in in 1939 and amended in 1940 and 1941. As a result of experience it is now universally admitted that more amendments are required to the act. The question just raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South in regard to the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is a case in point. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the measure we are now discussing often do conflict. Like the hon. member for Wood Mountain, I represent a riding which is considered pretty much in the Palliser triangle. I know a great deal of past administration. I do say that in its operation this measure has contributed a great deal to the farmers, but it needs amendments. When these amendments come forward I imagine they will receive the proper consideration by the agriculture committee. What I want to ask the minister is this: Shall we receive the bill and then after second reading will it be referred to the committee on agriculture? Is that the procedure.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that when the resolution passes we have authority to introduce the bill, which will be ready for distribution tomorrow. I thought it was ready today, but I found it was not. It will be distributed tomorrow provided it has had its first reading. On second reading I presume we shall send it to the committee. It has been done both ways. At times it has been given second reading and then sent to the committee. At other times it has been sent to the committee and has come back for second reading. The bill will go to committee in any event.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to say a few words in view of what the hon. member for Souris has just said in regard to remarks from various members upon the resolution stage of this bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Or any other bill.

Mr. WRIGHT: Or any other bill, as he says. The only chance that a member of the opposition has of putting his ideas before the government so that they can be incorporated in a bill is on the resolution stage.

Mr. GARDINER: No, second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT: We cannot move any amendments on second reading because they will mean an expenditure of money, and therefore, they can be moved only by a member of the government. What we are trying to do is to place before the minister the amendments which we believe should be made to the act, and we have to do this at a time when they can be made, before the bill is introduced. Of course if the principle is accepted that the government does not intend to adopt any of the suggestions of the opposition, then there is no use of our making them, but I do not think that is so. The Minister of Agriculture is a reasonable man. He knows the conditions under which the Prairie Farm Assistance Act operates. In the first place he recognizes some of its shortcomings or its failure to meet certain conditions. We are trying to assist him in seeing that the act is made a real measure of security to the western farmers.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I agree entirely with what the hon. member for Melfort has just said. If we are to make any proposals we have to make them before the bill is finally drawn up. I wish to say a word or two on how this act affects Manitoba. The minister will remember that last year, I think it was, there was some discussion in the house about the way in which the act operates in connection with agriculture generally in Manitoba. I believe one hon. member suggested that there was a movement afoot in the province to withdraw entirely because the benefits paid out to the farmers under this act do not come anywhere near the amounts that they paid in.

I might quote from a return I have received as of May 9, 1946. This return gives the payments made into the fund to the end of February, 1946, and the payments out of the fund to the end of March, 1946. The return shows that from 1939 to 1946 the farmers of Manitoba paid into the fund a total of $3,472,984. During practically the same period, within one month, they received from the fund only $1,731,284, which is practically half of what they paid in. At the moment I am not complaining that they did not receive the full amount they paid in, because that is not the objective of the act. As I understand it, the objective is to provide some form of emergency insurance so that in the years of exceedingly bad crops farmers may have something to fall back on. It is quite natural that in some years they will pay in more than they will receive. However, in Manitoba the farmers have consistently year after year paid in much more than they have received out of the fund.

I do not advocate and I have not advocated withdrawal of the farmers of Manitoba from this act, because I believe it is at least a form of protection which, although of a temporary nature, has its value. I do believe that whatever agitation there may be in the province for withdrawal from the act would be avoided if some amendment were made to make it more applicable to the type of farming and the climatic conditions of Manitoba. As the minister well knows, there are parts of Manitoba where we have never had anything approaching a real drought, but we have often suffered losses from hail and flood. In fact there are parts of Manitoba where over a period of years flood has done much more damage to the crops than either hail or drought.

As the act now stands it is applicable to drought conditions but in the case of hail or flood damage it does not apply properly. As a matter of fact I do not think it applies at all to flood damage. In hail damage it is hard to make it apply because of the way in which hail damages crops. It may completely destroy one-third of a township but the other two-thirds may have a bumper crop, and that makes the one-third damage negligible under the legislation. I would therefore suggest that an amendment be made to the act so that in Manitoba it would apply to flood damage, and that the unit or the basis on which payments are to be made be on a smaller scale so that farmers individually can benefit under the act in hail damage. I do not know what the smallest unit can be in order to make it administratively possible, but I am sure that the township unit could be reduced or some arrangement made so that, in the case of hail or flood damage, payments would be made regardless of whether or not the whole township fell below a certain crop yield limit. These are the two suggestions I wanted to present in the hope that the minister will take them into consideration and incorporate them in his amendments to the act.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 261, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, is the bill to be referred to the committee now?

Mr. GARDINER: No, at the next sitting of the house.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. HOMUTH: It will be referred to the committee at the next sitting?

Mr. GARDINER: Second reading will be at the next sitting.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will it be referred on the second reading or before?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be a question whether we submit it before second reading is given or after but it will be submitted while the second reading discussion is on.

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

The house resumed from Monday, June 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 177 to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Approximately eight years have elapsed since the former minister of justice told the house of the deplorable conditions associated with penitentiary administration. How much has been done since the house, at his request, passed a bill for the appointment of three commissioners, I do not know; apparently very little. We have been told that the reason for that is that there is a certain amount of dual responsibility as between the provinces and the federal government in the matter of prison care and reform, and all matters pertaining to criminology. But I cannot see why the federal government itself, in the interim of the past eight years, could not have set apart one of its own penal institutions for the adoption of what the minister of that day strongly recommended, namely, the Borstal system of reform. The Borstal system, of course, is nothing more or less than the reclamation of prisoners, and that is an important feature.

I have made an exhaustive study into the operation of the Borstal system, but I am not going to talk about that today; I have done so before. I have visited in the old country many prisons in which this system is in operation.

I spent eight or ten hours in one of the Borstal institutions, thoroughly surveying everything pertaining to their programme. While there I made it my business to inquire from the various prisoners, with the permission of the guards who were taking me around, why it was they were there. Many of them were fine looking, and it was amazing to me to see such well set-up young men incarcerated in a penal institution. On my return home I made a survey following up what I had learned from the few prisoners with whom I discussed the matter. Anyone representing in a large city a riding such as mine, containing approximately 60,000 to 70,000 people, has had the experience which has been mine, over the past eighteen years, of being interviewed by fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, sisters and brothers in reference to their dear ones who had in some way fallen afoul of the law and been sent to prison. After I came home from my last investigations into the Borstal operations in the old country I started to make inquiries of everyone who called to see me about getting this one or that one released or the term of imprisonment shortened. In many cases I went to the prison itself where the person the people had called to see me about was incarcerated, and I asked him—they were mostly males; in fact I do not remember having talked to any females—how he had fallen from grace, and I began writing down the reasons which were given. One of the main causes was that the prisoners came from homes which were broken up, for one of the many reasons why such things happen, and therefore they did not have a proper home training. I pursued that study, because I felt that while the Borstal system is essentially a reclamation system, it would be much better if we could get behind that and get back to the time before the young man was sent to prison and required reclamation through the Borstal system.

Mr. GRAYDON: An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Mr. MacNICOL: Having in mind a programme of prevention, I studied each individual case with which I came in contact; and it was not an easy matter. It took a long time to do it, but I have been at this a long time, Your Honour. Prison reform and reclamation of prisoners have been studies of mine for many years. I have always been interested in the solving of human troubles.

As I said a moment ago, the broken home was number one reason given for young men being sent to prison. Therefore whatever programme the new commissioner puts into operation, as a beginning I hope he will study the question of how to get back beyond the reclamation period to the school days.

This brings me to my second thought. In addition to the lack of a desirable home environment in which a boy or a girl would receive the good advice and instruction of happy and contented parents, I found that there was lack of education. I was amazed to find that so many of our young offenders have so little education. I took that matter up with one of the Ontario reformatory boards, and was astonished at the account they gave of the lack of education and mental deficiency. Speaking of mental deficiency, which goes along with lack of education, I had a conversation with the head of the mental hygiene council, as I believe it is called, to which this house every year—and rightly so in my judgment—votes a matter of $10,000. The head of that council is Doctor Hincks, who is perhaps one of the best versed men in America in mental hygiene. I learned from him that in his judgment from thirty to forty per cent of the young folks going to school today are to a certain extent mentally deficient. That condition can be cured or arrested if the proper facilities are provided. The deficiency in mentality of youth, which results in their being sent to prison, is a problem which should be studied by the new commissioner. How it is to be overcome I do not know. We might spend ten or perhaps twenty million dollars in building new penal institutions for reform, but if it is not too late we might do better to spend $20,000,000 in looking after our youth before it became necessary to be concerned about their reclamation. One way of doing that would be to assist such institutions as the mental hygiene board and that celebrated authority on mental hygiene, Doctor Hincks. In this way we might do something to lessen crime on the part of our youth.

In the Ontario reform reports I find the statement made that 10·03 per cent of those incarcerated in penal institutions are mentally deficient. That is a tremendous toll. Not only are they unable to return any benefit to their country, being mentally deficient; they are a cost to the country when it becomes necessary to send them to a reform institution, following the commission of some crime. That is another side of the prevention programme. It was stated also that 14·9 per cent were right on the border. I have observed that myself in my own humble investigations. I have often said to myself, "Well, it is a wonder this one did not commit murder or some grievous crime," instead of some misdemeanour that was not so serious. That makes a total percentage of 24·12 either mentally deficient or right on the border. There is something wrong with our institutions if these figures are correct, as I have no doubt they are. It would seem that we are far behind the programme of the Borstal reclamation system. Further it is stated that 32·79 per cent were dull, and we have all seen that. I have made it my business to speak to many young men in prison, in the common gaols and from there right up to the penitentiaries. I have visited their homes and talked to their parents, who in too many cases also are dull. Of course often a dull child comes from dull parents, though that is not always the case since many of the very finest parents have dull children. But if they are dull they should have some chance to attain efficiency and understanding, so they will not commit crimes. That makes a total of those dull, on the border and below the border of 56·91 per cent. That is simply incredible, and I can only say that a proper system of training probably would save many of them from going to gaol. I believe that if mental hygiene were properly carried out and extended, many of the youth of the land could be kept from committing crimes.

I find further that of the people who are normal, 62·8 per cent did not receive any further education than the sixth grade. I found that too in the prisons in England, in talking to the young men there. Their education was woefully deficient. That is a pretty serious situation. How it is going to be overcome I do not know, but as the former minister said, it is a staggering problem and costs the country a staggering sum. But the cost is far greater when such people make no return. If they can be saved before they commit a crime that will send them to gaol, whatever the cost to the country it will be money well spent.

Then take a look at our book stands, and see the literature for sale there. Much of what you see is very light literature; but in addition to what is on the book stands there are many other places where youth can get literature that is not fit for anyone to read. If this is not a federal matter I wonder if the provinces should not take note of the fact that much of the literature offered for sale today certainly is not fit for our youth to read. When we were young we had many excellent books to read. Those books are still available today, and if their cost could be reduced by printing thousands of them so that every youth in the land could read them, it might have a very wholesome effect. I do not think any child could read the like of "David Copperfield" or "Barnaby Rudge" or "Edwin Drood", or other works of Dickens and other equally well known authors, without a beneficial effect. Many of these books, however, are rather high priced, so our young people buy a cheaper book or a magazine which adds nothing at all to their intelligence. I feel that we may be derelict in our duty to this country in not seeing to it that our young people have proper literature to read, for I believe this would reduce the number who later might be sent to our gaols and penitentiaries.

There is another example connected with my own youth about which I was not going to say anything, but I have decided to mention it after all. That is the lack of family worship, which is nothing short of monstrous. In my home the bible was read every morning; one or other of my parents would lead in prayer, and naturally this had a wholesome effect on each member of the family. We respected them the more because of their desire to see that we walked the right way of life. Today, however, that is lacking to an extent that is nothing short of shocking. What can we expect but an increase in crime when too many of the youth of today have little direction along the right path?

Then where can our children play today? Where are the playgrounds in our cities? If a child of my neighbourhood wants to play in a park he has to go at least half a mile; and that is in the city of Toronto. It is all right if the children live next door to the park or in the next street but in my neighbourhood it is a long way to a park. Yet children must play. If they play in the streets they hear many things they should not hear. Of course many of them go to the supervised school playgrounds, but the children do not like to play on gravel or on hard cement, so those playgrounds are not very popular and the children play anywhere they can. In England, even though their population is very much congested and they have not anything like the land we have here, on a holiday you will find all the roads leading from London and the other cities filled with people either in motor cars or on bicycles going to what they call the commons. There are commons everywhere; that is one thing I like very much about the old country, and those commons are full of people. I suppose the name "commons" has come down through the centuries, but these open spaces are full of people enjoying themselves.

I often say to myself: If the fathers and mothers of Toronto want to go out on a Saturday or a Sunday afternoon, where can they go? If they come to a shady little spot with a creek running through, and some sand, they find a fence around it with a sign, "Trespassers prohibited." I would like to see throughout Ontario and in all the other provinces for that matter, hundreds of the areas like the "commons" they have in England. They would call them commons; here they might be called something different, but the purpose and use would be just the same.

They would be recreation areas to which fathers and mothers could drive on a Saturday or a Sunday. They could enjoy being out in the fresh air with the children. There is nothing like God's great outdoors to make people think rightly.

I have travelled far and wide in remote areas. I have gone over mountains and rivers. I love to travel there because I see God and His handiwork everywhere. And so would the children see it, too. But they have to get out of the cities to see it.

In a constituency the size of mine there are many boys and girls who get into trouble. Many parents, sisters and brothers come to see me about those who have gone astray. I always try to find out the reason for their having made these mistakes.

I hope the new commissioner and those associated with him will take these things into account. At the moment their job may be one of reformation. But can we not start earlier than that, and set up a system of prevention? There are ways of preventing crime. Better to spend $10 million on prevention, on places for children to play, on parks; better to spend $10 million on slum clearance, where people are living under such congested conditions that their children have no place to play. Far better to spend those millions of dollars for prevention than to have to spend an equal amount—as we will have to do—on the building of prisons, to put boys and girls where they cannot do any good for their country or for themselves.

I often wonder what would happen in this country if it were not for that mere handful of men and women, that small number of devoted men and women throughout the country, some of whom are to be found waiting at the prison gates for the prisoners as they come out. And when I say this I think of the Salvation Army and those associated with other religious organizations who assist those who are being turned out of the prisons. I often wonder what this country would be like if that handful of men and women did not give some attention to those who leave our prisons.

I had a case brought to my attention recently which caused me considerable concern. It was in connection with a fine man with a wife and family. He had been a bookkeeper, and for some reason—the reason is neither here nor there—he took some of his employer's money. He had been in that man's employ for twenty-one years, and that was his first lapse. It should not have occurred, of course; but some impelling motive forced him to take that money, with the result that he was sent to the reformatory at Guelph for some length of time. Had he been sent to the penitentiary it would have been even worse.

I have often thought we should have some fund or some system through which those who have been guilty of some misdemeanour, probably committed out of desperation, could be helped instead of being sent to some institution. I am not in favour of criminals being at large, of course; and I believe in the principle that corrective punishment should be meted out where it is due. But I have in mind some method of prevention whereby, so that instead of a man being sent to a place where he can do nothing to help his wife and children he would be prevented from getting into trouble in the first instance. Perhaps that aspect of the matter has not been studied to any great extent by crime preventionists, but it is worthy of diligent study, and something might come of it.

I know of a fine young man who did something foolish. Certainly he should not have done it; he should have stood his ground rather than run away. Upon being captured, as he rightfully was, he was sent to prison. After serving eighteen months he was released. This young man had not committed what could be classified as a crime; he was not that type of man. Upon his release from prison, with the knowledge that up and down the years I had obtained jobs for many young men in like circumstances, he came to see me. On many occasions young men who have come from prison have asked for my assistance, and I have always been delighted to try to get them jobs. I would stake my own reputation on their behalf, and if necessary I would give a guarantee that I would be responsible for their good conduct. I spoke about this young man to some people I knew well, referring to the time he had served in prison. I have forgotten how long it was—perhaps twelve or eighteen months—but I could not get him a job. Finally I went to a manager and told him it was just as much his responsibility as mine to give this boy a chance to start life again. If I could not have got him a job soon after his release from prison, what could he be expected to do? He had not committed any great crime in the first instance, but there was no telling what he might do if everyone turned him down.

There is another point to which the Minister of Justice might give some thought, and which would give help to those coming out of prisons. It has been shown in England that from 60 to 70 per cent of first offenders who obtain positions upon their release from prison, and who thus have some money coming in to take care of their personal necessities, do not engage in crime again. It must be understood however that first of all they must get a job. I know many men and women in Toronto who are engaged in trying to secure jobs for those who come out of the prisons. I have done a considerable amount of that work myself.

I always tell young men who are released from prison not to pass by a policeman as if he were going to give chase or make an arrest. I urge them to stop and talk to the police, and to tell them their problems. The police in Toronto are anxious to prevent crime, and I have no doubt that the same would apply to other cities. Our former chief of police in Toronto, Chief Draper, spent years doing that kind of work, and he did a fine job in assisting those who were released from prison. Surely this would be another means of prevention of crime.

I hope that whoever is in charge of the programme of reclamation will give some thought to suggestions of this kind. The only reclamation system in operation today is the Borstal system. It is doing a mighty fine job, but it does not apply to hardened criminals. First offenders should not be put in with hardened criminals. The penitentiaries branch might well set apart one of the penitentiaries where first offenders serving sentences up to five years, we will say, could be incarcerated, so that they would not come in contact with the hardened criminals who cannot be reformed.

I do not know what should be done for these later. Perhaps I am too soft-hearted to wish severe punishment to be inflicted upon anyone. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. I am firmly convinced that the Borstal system can do a big job in reformation of prisoners, but I want to get behind the necessity for reclamation. I want to get to the youth of this country. I do not know how it is going to be done, but I certainly would like to participate in it myself.

The Ontario government is doing a good job at the present time. The provincial secretary, under whose jurisdiction these matters come, was sent to England. As far as I could see from the press reports he pretty well followed the trip I made. He visited Leeds prison, the prison at Glasgow, the original Borstal prison and different prisons in the London area. I felt complimented when I saw that. I do not say that he followed my itinerary, but it looked like it. He came back convinced that as far as first offenders go the Borstal system can do a grand work. I know it can, because I have seen it in operation.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I notice the Ontario government has purchased 600 acres in the vicinity of Ottawa which I presume will be used as a boys' farm, a first offenders' farm or something like what they have outside of Glasgow. It should do a good work. The Ontario government have schools at Galt and Bowmanville and other places to which first offenders are sent. I say again that the federal government cannot enter any field in which the province now is but can make their own application of the Borstal system to first offenders sentenced to two years imprisonment and over. I was glad to read a few days ago that the Quebec government is also starting to promote reclamation, perhaps along the same lines as they are doing in Ontario, with schools and farms. I wish them every success, as I wish Ontario every success.

I am sincere in what I have said, and I am intensely earnest in the belief that there should be some means of prevention to reduce the number of those who are sent to prison. If that does not prevent crime, there should be some such system as the Borstal system which has proven so satisfactory and which has been adopted almost universally throughout the world for the reclamation of first offenders.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the hon. member sits down I should like to correct him. He has made the statement two or three times that the Borstal system applies to first offenders. It does not. On page 201 of the report it is stated:

> It should be emphasized that no first offenders are as a rule sent to Borstal institutions. They are not for novices in crime but for those young offenders who have failed to respond to other courses of treatment.

Mr. MacNICOL: How old is that report?

Mr. ILSLEY: 1937.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think you will find they have advanced since then because I was informed by the officials in charge of the prison at Glasgow that many of those there were first offenders. I am only taking the information given to me by those associated with the reclamation work. I do not see why it should not apply to first offenders sentenced to two years and over, as well as to first offenders sentenced to eighteen months.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just to get this right, I quote again from the report:

> Youths between 16 and 23 years of age, when brought before the court, are divided roughly into three classes: those who are not bad enough for Borstal, i.e., who can be dealt with by probation or other non-institutional treatment, those who are too bad for Borstal, and the balance, mostly proved recidivist offenders, who are selected for Borstal treatment. It should be emphasized that no first offenders are as a rule sent to Borstal institutions. They are not for novices in crime but for those young offenders who have failed to respond to other courses of treatment.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I visited the Borstal institution in England they gave me pamphlets dealing with the reclamation of those who were brought to their prisons. In those pamphlets it was pointed out very clearly that this one or that one was a first or a second offender. They stated that the number of third offenders had been reduced. In any event, those who are sentenced to the penitentiary for two, three or more years might be reclaimed if kept apart from hardened criminals and given the benefits of the Borstal system. What is there about the Borstal system that they should not have? There is nothing that I know of. I watched it at work in the various prisons; I discussed the matter with their teachers, and I cannot see anything but benefit that would derive from the application of this system. Most persons who commit a crime are reformable, leaving out of consideration the hardened criminal, through the application of the Borstal system.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the bill at present under study deals only with the change in the set-up of the penitentiary commission as provided in the Penitentiary Act, 1939. It is intended to change the number of commissioners from three to one and to provide for the appointment of two deputy commissioners. The sections of the 1939 act concerning the appointment of assistant commissioners are not changed, as well as other sections of the act. A single authority of one commissioner is to replace that of a board of three commissioners, but two deputies are to act directly under him. That appears simple enough and it might call only for an expression of opinion as to the merits of a one-man show or a three-man board. The debate which has followed the introduction of this legislation has covered the whole question of penitentiary administration and penal reform. I think that is most commendable because, with the introduction of the present bill, is brought forward again the whole problem of our penal system in Canada. I do not think too much can be said about the urgency of bringing it in line with improvements in penology throughout the world. Hon. members who have spoken from all sides of the house have shown a public spirit and a keen sense of appreciation of the gravity and urgency of the situation.

It may be distasteful to hear anyone speak of his previous experiences and make personal references during the course of the debate, but I find myself in the awkward predicament of having to do this in order to justify myself and to substantiate certain opinions which I may express. During the last six years I have received numerous letters from people who have devoted much of their lives to this question. They have expressed their disappointment at my silence over the years. I must confess that there are letters which I have not dared to answer because I would have had to admit the opportunism which had prompted me to stay silent.

The people who wrote to me, and others, knew of my long association with the Department of Justice and my great interest in such questions as the handling of prisoners, the reform of criminals and the general administration of our penitentiaries as well as the necessity of reorganizing our whole penal system. Many of these people were in contact with me at the time when my efforts were directed toward the entire remodeling of our penal set-up. Therefore I feel it my duty to acquaint the house with some aspects of the problem as I know and understand them.

I do not want to pose as an expert in such matters but, as the solution of this problem should be the concern of all of us, I think we must all contribute within our limitations our share to its solution. The present bill providing for a reorganization of the administrative set-up of Canadian penitentiaries is intimately connected with the vast problem of how can we best organize and administer our penal system; how can we best deal with those who have violated our criminal laws; how can we act to curb recidivism and orientate our penal system so as to reform criminal offenders and liberate the country from the burden of mounting costs of handling those whose first incarceration has failed to reform them, if it has not launched them in a career of crime?

As I proceed with my remarks I trust the minister will be able to dissociate himself from a common ministerial habit of considering as personal criticism any remarks made about a branch of his department or about the civil servants or officials who are responsible therefor. During my long association with ministerial activities and observing the house under other governments, I have found that this is an attitude which is unfortunately too often taken by some members of cabinets. It is an attitude that is not conducive to good government, which demands free and open discussion of any and all angles of the administration's policy, not only from the opposition parties, not only from different groups who try to find something wrong with the government, but from government supporters. Yet the latter, faced with such an attitude, are often prone to hesitate to utter remarks which, while critical, would be in the interests of better administration. It is a well known fact to most of us that many departmental officials rely on the popularity and respect enjoyed by their minister to save them from any severe scrutiny of their acts. That does not apply particularly to one department but to most of them. The speed with which a minister's estimates or bill is passed is considered a great feat by his officials and as more or less of a criterion of the popularity of the minister. But I am convinced that the Minister of Justice has not that unhealthy attitude and that it will never be a part of his mentality.

Before I go on with my remarks, I should like to congratulate the minister upon having at last brought this measure before us, which means the reorganization of the penitentiaries branch. This is only a first step and it took a long time to come, but at last we are getting moving and, I think, in the right direction.

If I may be permitted I should like to read from a lecture which I myself gave some time ago. If I did not explain that I might be reproached for reading my speech.

In 1910 Mr. Churchill, who was then Home Secretary in Great Britain, laid down the proposition, which received the approval of all those qualified to speak on the question, that the degree of civilization to which a nation had attained could be measured by the way in which it treated its lawbreakers. By that test Canada does not stand as high as it should. For a full understanding of Canada's situation respecting prison administration I might be permitted to review a few historical facts.

Shortly after the Act of Union in 1842, a prison board was created to inspect and administer all gaols, prisons, and hospitals in the united provinces, including the penitentiary at Kingston. This board found an almost unbelievable situation, even for that day and age. I am making that reference to 1842 and afterwards shall compare conditions then with conditions in 1947. Even if I might be thought to be going too far back in history, it is relevant to the problem, because some of the problems brought before that prison board have not yet been solved after 105 years, and are still receiving our attention. As I said, this board found an almost unbelievable situation, even for that day and age, to exist in the local gaols and prisons of the provinces, and a great unwillingness on the part of local authorities to invest any money in improving conditions. After a bitter struggle and the exercise of considerable patience, however, the board finally achieved its purpose. It then turned to the improvement of the penitentiary at Kingston. In the performance of these two tasks, it became obvious that the great problem was the reclamation of young offenders, for whom no fitting quarters were then available. The board turned, therefore, to the establishment of reformatories, which in those days were places devoted to reformation and not, as now, merely places of incarceration.

I say that, because some of our institutions have been called reformatories when to all intents and purposes they were just still gaols or penitentiaries as all the others were.

In Lower Canada, a reformatory was established at Ile aux Noix, which was later moved to St. Vincent de Paul. In Upper Canada, a reformatory was established at Penetanguishene. A hospital for mental cases was also constructed at Kingston, Rockwood hospital, which is still in existence. The period was one of awakening social consciousness in all countries and by 1867 the board had made the Canadian penal system one of the best in the world, at least as compared with Great Britain and the United States.

The British North America Act brought an end to many of the hopes of the penologists of that time. The architects of that act were engaged in the attempted solution of much greater problems and, in seeking this solution, lost sight of the effect on penal administration of the division of powers made between the federal government and the provinces. Jurisdiction over gaols, reformatories, and hospitals was given to the provinces, while the federal government was given jurisdiction over the penitentiaries only. An arbitrary distinction came to divide these institutions. Any sentence under two years involved imprisonment in a provincial or local institution, and any sentence of two years or over involved imprisonment in a penitentiary. This arbitrary division of jurisdiction destroyed the uniformity of treatment applied to lawbreakers.

The royal commission which reported in 1938 realized the fatal defects of the division of jurisdiction brought about by the British North America Act and recommended that all penal institutions be replaced under one authority, the new penitentiary commission. This is, of course, a matter for constitutional amendment based on agreement between the provincial and federal governments. Whether or not it can be realized remains to be seen. Reading the report of the new commissioner, General Gibson, one realizes that his conversations have not been such as to give him much hope that most of the provinces will agree, except perhaps the maritime provinces. Yet this is something we should be working upon to try to attain and it may be attained in the years to come, even if it is not of immediate concern to us in the matter of the reorganization provided for in the bill.

Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice from September, 1885, to December, 1894. Almost alone among ministers of justice until the advent of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, he was interested in penal reform. I am making this reference to a man whom I have served and with whom I have been in the Department of Justice. Prior to Mr. Lapointe, Sir John Thompson was the Minister of Justice who gave the most personal interest to this question. Sir John Thompson was aware that Canadian penitentiaries were not properly equipped to deal with the reformation of young offenders and he conceived the establishment of a reformatory institution for this purpose. To this end he purchased a site near Cornwall, Ontario, had blueprints drawn and approved, and arranged for the purchase and manufacture of building supplies and equipment. Before the completion of the project, another minister of justice supplanted him, through what historical fact I do not know. The new minister referred the matter to the deputy minister of justice of that day and asked for a report on the inception and progress of the new institution. It has been my experience that reports of commissions are prone to die or lie a long time on the desk of a deputy minister or some other official. That is what happened in this case. I think the deputy minister reported to the new minister that this was a whim of his predecessor, and the whole project was scrapped. This was the last attempt to have special reformatories under the federal government up until the time when the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe in 1926 announced his intention of doing something. He said in the House of Commons on May 31, 1926:

> There is another thing which is not made the subject of the resolution, but to which I am giving a good deal of thought, and that is the possibility of segregating the young convicts who are sentenced for the first time. If we could find a way to build a special institution, or even two institutions for the purpose of receiving and keeping these young men rather than put then with hardened criminals, I think that would be a good reform to undertake.

Three years later funds had been granted by parliament for the construction of two institutions, one of which was Collins Bay and the other Laval building near Montreal. I might say that work started to proceed on both these institutions, but after the short Liberal eclipse of 1930 to 1935 when the late minister, Mr. Lapointe, came back to the house, little had been done. Twenty years after the project was started, Laval is not completed. Collins Bay was completed but has served not directly for the purpose it was intended. I will discuss later, on an item in this year's report of the superintendent, the claim that Collins Bay has been made a reformatory or that it has reclaimed people or made it so that they would not be sentenced again; in fact that they will be reformed better than under the Borstal institution. We shall have these figures in a short while. Today, 105 years after the first penitentiary board reported on the unsatisfactory conditions of penitentaries for the treatment of young criminals we are exactly or, let us say, 99·9 per cent where we were 105 years ago. We are still discussing the opportunity of segregating reformable persons. We are told that we shall have real reformatories. That is why I am so glad to see that this measure is brought before the house now. I repeat, this is the first good move made in a long while.

If anyone thinks, after a survey or a close study of our penal institution systems, that they have been operated according to the discoveries of experienced penologists throughout the world and in comparison with those of the United States and especially Britain, I cannot see how he can arrive at this conclusion. The two major trends concerning the administration of penitentiaries are based on different theories of penology. The first that prevailed up to the last part of the nineteenth century was purely the punitive aspect of incarceration. The second that has gained more supporters throughout the world since 1875, and especially since the beginning of the century is that the punitive is only one aspect, but the reformative is the essential one if one wants to avoid the curse of recidivism. As the Archambault report states at page 9:

> Entirely apart from humanitarian grounds, and from a purely economic point of view, and for the eventual benefit of society, the task of the prison should be, not merely the temporary protection of society through the incarceration of captured offenders, but the transformation of reformable criminals into law-abiding citizens, and the prevention of those who are accidental or occasional criminals from becoming habitual offenders.

Although in Great Britain, as well as in certain parts of the United States, much has been done toward the efficient reformation of the inmates, it is sadly to be admitted that to many of those who have visited and inspected the Canadian penal system, in Canada little has been done in that regard. That is said, despite the statement which I mentioned a moment ago, and which I shall look into, about the claims that Collins Bay has reformed the people who were sent there.

In last year's report of the superintendent, figures are given which were ably analysed by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), which still stand, and are ample evidence that we have not yet advanced far in the right direction. I shall avoid going into any details of the royal commission's report, but I commend the reading of it to all those interested in the problem. After reading it, few I am sure would not come to the conclusion that it is a splendid piece of work.

In my opinion there are three main sources of inefficiency in our penal administration. The first is the wrong or the punitive attitude of the penitentiary officials and of the departmental authorities, up to a very recent time which could be counted in months; second, the incompetence and lack of vision of most of the men connected with the administration; and, third, the wrong attitude of all authorities as well as of succeeding governments throughout the years for the building programmes of the penal institutions, and also toward the implementing of recommendations which have been made by different commissions from time to time. This may appear to be simplifying the problem too much; but I think all that goes wrong in the system can be traced back to one of these three causes. Had we the proper reformative attitude, coupled with the necessary punitive methods, many of the wrongs outlined in the report would soon be corrected, provided that the second cause was also corrected and that the incompetent officials were removed or that some of the departmental attorneys assigned to penitentiary matters were removed or reassigned to other duties. There would remain then the necessity for the government to understand that to erect a building by convict labour on antiquated plans cannot be coupled with an efficient tackling of the penal problem, and I shall deal with this in the final recommendations I shall make at the end of my remarks.

For a number of years prior to 1932 the penitentiaries were administered by General Hughes. I was in the department while he was there, and I think I can say that I seldom agreed with the recommendations he made, many of which I did not find in the proper and right reformative spirit. Nevertheless I would pay this compliment to him. He was the only one who had a system and a method and operated it. He was succeeded afterwards by General Ormond, a most promising, hard working and sincere man, but not cut out for this type of work. Despite his effort, during his administration the mistakes of the past brought about serious conditions of unrest, and we know all the sad happenings, the riots, fires and so on. We owe, in fact, a great deal to a former member, Miss MacPhail, who, assisted by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who spoke today, the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, and a few others, aroused public opinion to such a point between 1930 and 1935 that there came about a general feeling that an investigation of our penal system was necessary.

I well remember in 1935 the late Norman Rogers, who was then a Liberal candidate in Kingston, telephoning me in Quebec to meet him in Kingston to discuss certain aspects of the problem. The moment he arrived there he had been faced with the question as a large number of his constituents in Kingston were interested directly in the penitentiary because they were employed there, or indirectly because some of them had relatives working there.

I had been in the department from 1925 to 1930, but at the time I was out of the service. Mr. Rogers subsequently pledged himself to look carefully into the problem and seek information from people who had been connected with the service. A few days after our meeting Mr. Rogers pledged himself to insist on a full investigation. It was the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, in 1935, promised the people of Canada that if his party were elected a free and impartial investigation of our penal system would follow.

The history of the penitentiary system of Canada has been one of recurring cycles. Neglect is followed by disturbances. Disturbances give rise to investigations, which are made and reported. The public believes, quite naturally, but erroneously, that once the causative evils are exposed they will be rectified. The officials of the Department of Justice, however, take it merely that they have weathered another storm and continue in the same old way until another cycle is started. We had investigations in 1876, 1913, 1920, 1937 and 1938. It is now time to stop going around in these vicious circles, and this can be done if the present commission or the present new set-up understands the situation fully and sets to work immediately in the right direction. There is no reason why the penal system of Canada should not be the best in the world. We have the example, which has been given to us by the British, of a system which has been called a character reformer, and we have the example of what has been done in the United States. We could couple both with a better understanding of our problem and by drawing from the experience of these people, we could have one of the most efficient services in the world.

To revert to the history of our system, within six months after the present government came back to power in 1935 a commission of three men was appointed, consisting of Judge Archambault, who had been a criminal lawyer in Montreal, a crown attorney for a number of years, a prominent jurist and a judge of great experience; Hon. Mr. Craig, a former attorney general of Manitoba and a man thoroughly acquainted with all such questions; and the present Chief Justice McRuer, who was then one of the most prominent attorneys in Toronto. These people made a report which, as I said a moment ago, everybody should read. This report is one of the milestones in the progress of penal reform. When the report was tabled, the minister asked to have changes made in the act. They were accepted here but refused in the senate. In the next year, 1939, he came back again. Unfortunately, the royal commission's report was more or less tabled and made inoperative, I would say, because of the strong influence of the departmental officials of the time, who did not believe in it. Some of them had been reproached by the report for their way of running the affairs of the penitentiaries. None were accused of ill faith, dishonesty or anything of that kind, but the report concluded that the attitude of these men was not a proper one to be held by those who were to run the penitentiary system. Yet these men were there, and they stayed there and prevented the report from being implemented. It may be said that the recommendations were not carried out on account of the war, and there is some ground for that. I would not want to go on and give the details about the prospective appointment of a commission in the first days of 1940, an attempt which failed because the one selected to be chairman finally changed his mind, and the one selected to be vice-chairman decided to run for parliament. Then at the end of 1940 another commission was under consideration. Again the prospective chairman, at the last moment, said his doctor advised against his acceptance of the appointment; since then he died. In 1941, the then Minister of Finance, who is the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) was rightly pressing the department to curtail expenses that were not of the utmost importance. That gave sufficient ground to the departmental officials who were for the status quo to keep matters in abeyance and prevent anything from being done.

Last year, fortunately, an aroused interest in the country with regard to this question brought the matter to the attention of the then minister of justice, who decided to appoint a commissioner to look into the report of another commission. We now have that report before us. Between the bringing in of the report in 1938 and the present time, eight or nine years have elapsed. A great deal could have been done in that time. During that time we were most fortunate, in a certain way—although I suppose it cannot be said to be fortunate to have a war, but my remarks apply to the penitentiaries—in that people found employment, a large number of men went into the armed forces, and the penitentiary population was small, as was the case in most other wars.

Immediately at the end of the war or toward the end of it, a new crime wave started; our penitentiaries started to fill up again, and we were faced with the same situation as obtained before the war. But in that time, shall we say—and the commissioner himself mentions it in his report, but, of course, in diplomatic language—the former superintendent who had been blamed by the commission, was withdrawn from the service by the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, in 1938. The commission was not yet appointed. One of the inspectors, Mr. Sauvant, acted as superintendent, and he was one about whom the commission had said they could not say much, that he had had no chance to prove what he could do, but on the other hand had not shown any special ability. One of the other inspectors, who had also been blamed by the report, was withdrawn. The third one had only accountancy experience and was more or less going around looking after the accounts; he was also supervising to a certain extent, without being experienced in that field, the industrial end of the penitentiary system. Soon after the war started, Mr. Sauvant, the inspector who was acting as superintendent, asked leave of absence to join the Free French forces. The remaining official, the accountant, asked leave to join the royal air force, and the third commissioner, Doctor George Shortt, who had been appointed on a temporary basis by Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe also left the branch. He had served as assistant secretary to the Archambault commission, and was brought into the picture to help start a reorganization of the system. He was brought in because of his long and intimate connection with the Archambault commission and his experience with social problems and investigations. He had been with the combines investigation board and others of the kind. This gentleman also was seconded, some time afterwards, to the wartime prices and trade board; so at one time during the war, instead of a commission approved by parliament, instead of a superintendent and two inspectors, we had only a chief engineer running the whole show.

Today at last, after nine years, the minister brings in a resolution providing that we shall finally have a commission. It will be a one-man instead of a three-man commission. Our first reaction might be to see what General Gibson has done up to now. I must say that it seems to me he has made a thorough survey of the problem and has carefully read the files of the department and many of the memoranda prepared. In the interim, after the royal commission report was brought in, when I left the department, and when Doctor Shortt, who had been charged by Mr. Lapointe to deal especially with that problem, was left in the background, the old crowd gained influence anew and prevented any reform from being brought forward. General Gibson seems to have made a thorough survey of these reports and the suggestions made by Doctor Shortt and by the commission, and I think his report has much to commend it. Last year many people smiled when the then minister of justice recommended that a commissioner be appointed to look into the report of a commission that reported on conditions in penitentiaries. But this year, after seeing General Gibson's report, I do not think it will be necessary to appoint a new commissioner to look into the report of the commissioner who looked into the report of the royal commission. So finally we have something on which we can work.

I do not think I have time enough to analyse the whole of General Gibson's report, but there are a few things which might be pointed out. The commissioner states at page 5 that the establishment of separate reformatory institutions for young offenders can be done only with the consent of the provinces. I think this is just partly true, because there is nothing to prevent the penitentiary commission, if they wanted to put into effect one of the most important clauses of the Archambault report, from establishing a Borstal type of institution for young offenders. If such institutions were set up, well staffed, were as well organized as possible and were superior to provincial institutions, there is nothing to prevent judges from sentencing young offenders to these institutions in which they would be reformed, instead of sentencing them to two years, less one day, which means a sentence to a local or provincial gaol, while a two years' sentence would send them to these new federal institutions. Then the parole board could take charge, if we got one that would also be revamped, as has been suggested by the Archambault commission, or even if it remains as it is, because I believe it is much better than the penitentiary administration and is working very well under the present system, though not with the proper facilities for following up these people after they are released from gaol. However I believe this part of the department works well even under the present system, and this would permit these young offenders to be released when their reformation had reached the proper point, which would be at about the same time as they would be released from the gaol, and we would have in the country a sort of Borstal institution that would be worth while.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the hon. member not think it would be advisable that every possible means of reforming these offenders should be attempted, while they are still young?

Mr. PICARD: Of course, and I do not see that what the hon. member says conflicts in any way with what I am saying. I am advocating an institution for young offenders, a reformatory, instead of sending them to gaols. I want to give them a better chance to reform, and not continue as criminals.

The report itself states quite frankly that the reorganization has not been undertaken. Up to the present the yearly reports of the superintendent would lead us to believe that something had been done. They always included such words as "when possible", "if possible", "to the extent possible", and so on; but I think the present commissioner is frank when he says it has not been undertaken. He gives a list of about twenty improvements having to do with the treatment of convicts which have been introduced as a result of the report of the royal commission, but I believe all these improvements were brought about within eighteen months after the report was presented and mainly through the efforts of Doctor Shortt and myself. These changes have not been made since 1939 or 1940; they were made in 1938 and 1939. Paragraph (f) states that convicts are now provided with lighters at public expense, and I understand that this was an improvement brought about by the acting superintendent, while all the others were the result of the study made by the temporary inspector, Doctor Shortt, who had knowledge of the work of the commission and was eminently qualified to do these things in the right way.

The report goes on to deal quite frankly with conditions in the penitentiaries; but many of the improvements indicated, while they make a good showing, deal with such matters as new pigsties or new barns at this or that penitentiary, and have little bearing on the question of the reformation of criminals and the reorganization of the whole penitentiary set-up. They do nothing to decrease the incidence of crime or to help in the reformation of criminals, which my hon. friend mentioned a moment ago. These improvements have bettered the farm production and others have contributed, to relieve the harshness of the regime, but they are not improvements that will affect conditions in the penitentiaries for the betterment or reformation of individuals. In my opinion the present report is a great improvement over what we have seen in the past, and I have great confidence that General Gibson will get things done. Now is the time to get to work; but I hope the new commissioner will not let some statements that can be found in this year's report of the superintendent pass unnoticed. On page 47 appears a statement which has been commended by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) as showing a great improvement. He read the statement and believed it; but let us compare the facts with the report. The report states:

> One thousand four hundred and eleven convicts out of 1,779, being apparently reformed and leading a normal citizen's life is, I submit, a most interesting achievement. As already stated, the percentage of repeaters—

But here is the catch, in the next eight words:

> —as far as penitentiary sentences are concerned, is 20·68.

That would be a really extraordinary record if it applied to all sentences, but it is not so. This would make us believe that, after being discharged, these people were reformed, but it is wrong to compare this figure with the English and United States statistics. When the English reports say that many people have not been sentenced, they do not mean to penitentiaries only but to any gaol or any other penal institution throughout England. Here the acting superintendent gives the picture in the words "as far as penitentiary sentences are concerned." Then later he says:

> Figures show that 79·32 per cent of those discharged went straight.

I do not think that is a fair statement, because of every six men throughout Canada sentenced for crimes, five go to county or local gaols and one goes to the penitentiary. I am sure the superintendent could not bring in the records of these men after investigation and prove that they had not been sent to other institutions, though they might not have gone back to a penitentiary. Here he says they went straight, because they did not go back to a penitentiary. In England, when they say such men were reformed they mean they were not sentenced to any institution. The same thing applies to the statement made in the report about the El Reno reformatory in the United States. There the records of these men are followed, and if they are said to have reformed it means they have not been sentenced anywhere. In this report, however, we are asked to believe that a man has reformed because he has not been sent back to a penitentiary. I am sure the new commissioner would not make a statement of that kind, to judge by the report he has brought in this year.

To get back to the bill, however, the point remains whether we should have one man or three men to start this work of reorganization which is so badly needed. At first, after a few years in that kind of work in the department, I had the idea that a one-man commission might work along the lines of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Then I realized that in the past we had been very unfortunate in most of the men to whom we had given these considerable powers. On one occasion the three members of the royal commission were in my office, unofficially, and we discussed that point. At that time I understood from them plainly that their survey of the whole penitentiary set-up in Canada had convinced them that three men would be better than one as far as this type of work was concerned. That was not because they had recommended that provincial gaols and other institutions should be included in the set-up but because they felt strongly that it should be a three-man board. The man the minister told us he would recommend to council for the approval of the governor general appears to be a better man than those we had previously. I have never met him, but his report impresses me favourably. It may be that there will still be the danger suggested by the commission, of giving a man too much power so that he may run these institutions in a dictatorial way, which the penitentiary commission was definitely against in its report; but I am willing to support the bill as it now is in the hope that the man will do what we expect him to do. It has been said that the commission favoured a three-man board because they wanted to include the other penal institutions; but hon. members may believe me or not, as they wish, when I say that when I spoke to the commissioners they were definitely against the one-man system, even in regard to the penitentiaries themselves.

I could talk on this subject for hours and perhaps bring in a good deal of other material that would be of interest to those who concern themselves in such matters. I believe much has been said up to now in this debate that is good. In my view the new commissioner should be given every opportunity to begin work as quickly as possible.

In conclusion, let me say that the most important thing he has to look into is the matter of staff, the question of obtaining proper staff both in respect of higher officials and even with regard to the lower ranks. The improvement which has been made in the lower ranks can be continued, because some improvement was attempted immediately after the report was brought in.

I would point out that paragraph 12 at page 8 of General Gibson's report states that a group of men was sent to the British training school at Wakefield, and the establishment of a training school in Canada was foreseen in the near future. That was done in 1938 and 1939. It cannot be said it was done between 1940 and 1947. One of the main points is that all preparation and selection of personnel were then made by Doctor Shortt who also recommended the appointment of a special officer, Colonel Megloughlin, to pursue that work.

First of all, I hope those men who will be commissioner, deputy commissioners and assistant commissioners will be chosen very carefully. Few people who had anything to do with the previous administration, at the head office should be included in that. I do not say that the wardens do not deserve to be given a chance to prove good under the new methods of improving the system and their institutions, because I consider they have been handicapped until now.

But at the head office let us clear the ground; let us clear away the dead wood. Let us have men who will understand the problem and who will be able to support the commissioner who has been appointed, or whose appointment is pending.

Then, let us plan for the penitentiary system the buildings which are to be built, and for the repair of others. Old buildings have been readapted, but much has still to be done. It has been done in England, and there is no reason why repairs cannot be made in Canada to some extent on old buildings. But this should be done by people who know better than those who have been handling it up to now.

[Mr. Picard.]

With respect to new ones, I would advocate that they be built by contract, instead of by penitentiary labour, as has been done in the past. As I stated earlier, a building was started at Laval twenty years ago but has not yet been completed. A penitentiary building which has been planned by experts, whether it is at a cost of $3 million, $6 million or $10 million, will cost less than the institutions we now have throughout Canada. And I would dare any accountant connected with the penitentiary system, or any man from the auditor general's office, to dig out what the penitentiaries branch has paid in the last fifty years in connection with the building cost of the penitentiaries we have had in that time. The cost has been staggering. Yet it does not show, because it has been a case of repairing this and repairing that, and only small amounts each year are included in the estimates. But the total actual cost of each building would frighten the house.

Recommendations which have been made by the Archambault commission show that our building methods are now outdated, according to new theories of penology. Let us see things a little more broadly, and if the new commissioner dares—and he will, if he is given support by the minister, and if the house gives him a chance to bring in his new policy—let him have these institutions built as the modern institutions they should be. They will cost less in the end. They will be better.

Someone will ask what the men will be employed at during that time. There are many things to be done. Prisoners are not confined to the crushing of stone, the laying of bricks, or the putting of one stone on top of another.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order; I must inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. PICARD: With the permission of the house, I should like to conclude. The next item should be the classification of prisoners, something which the commissioner sets out as being most desirable, but which he admits has not yet been done properly. The segregation of prisoners is another point. Then, there is the treatment of the reformables and the incorrigibles. Much is made in the report as to the need of having a reformatory institution in the maritime provinces built after agreement with the three provincial governments, and three other such institutions, one in Quebec, one in Ontario and one in the west, which would be in addition to the regular penitentiaries.

This is far from being a Borstal system. As the minister said, some magic seems to attach to the word "Borstal" in the minds of many people. But Borstal does not apply to all cases. The fact that we would have a Borstal institution does not mean that all our evils would be corrected. The minister was right when he made that statement. It is only part of a system, and people should not place too much magic in one word. There is a limit to what it can do; it cannot perform miracles, and our system can be vastly improved even if we do not have immediately Borstal institutions.

In connection with the building of these institutions there is one further point, and that is: What will you employ your men at? We could do the same thing as is done in the United States penitentiaries. We could incorporate a crown company which would administer the institutions. We could have workshops and turn out products which could be sold to the government. They could be operated at a profit. At the present time, when the department gets in any money it goes to the receiver general. The institutions could make money from year to year and become self-supporting. In the United States an independent state company has been organized. It is administered independently, but it is under the supervision of the department of justice. This company operates shops in all the institutions. The men are taught trades in the shops, which are operated just as a manufacturer would operate them. They do not compete with outside manufacturers who are supplying the public. But they do sell to the government at a profit, receiving the same prices which are received by private manufacturers.

The prisoners are employed in this way. They are allowed fair salaries to be given to them when they leave the institutions. I suggest that the idea of a crown company should be surveyed.

Now that we know that General Gibson will be appointed, I am prepared to give him full confidence and encouragement. It matters little whether he is accompanied by one man, two men or three men; if he is the right man he can do the job. I am willing to support the bill, and to recommend it. The commissioner should not procrastinate. He should put into operation as soon as possible either the whole report, or whatever portion of it he intends to make effective. I have great hope that he will prove to be the man who can give proper leadership, and for that reason I am willing to support the bill.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I am glad to see the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) back in his seat. I always listen to him carefully, and read his speeches, but an hour is too much for anyone to speak here on this subject at the present stage of the session. I shall occupy only about ten minutes of the time of the house.

I have sympathy for the minister who has started out in his new department to try to clean things up in connection with prison reform. Nothing was done during the war; although what the war had to do with it, I do not know. I believe those who were in charge of the department were largely to blame.

Prison reform is not connected with a war. I wish to compliment the minister because he has started out actively to clean up in the matter of law reform. I would thank him for what he has done thus far. I believe that in the minister we have a man who is sincere and one who has rendered splendid service to his country. He is now in a position to do something by way of real prison and law reform.

It is one of the cardinal principles of magna carta that the people should take a large share in the administration of criminal justice. Whether these institutions are managed rightly or wrongly, they are managed solely and entirely by crown officers. Nobody knows what is going on in them; nobody knows night or day what is happening to the poor unfortunates in these stone piles.

This debate has been going on and I noticed there were only eleven members on the government benches, but there are two or three more now. Last night there were twelve on the Conservative benches; there were eight government members up until 10.30 o'clock; there were six C.C.F.; there were two Social Credit members and one or two other independent members; a total of twenty-nine. The number has not increased very much since that time. Is it any wonder that so little is done in connection with this work? Is it any wonder that these things are going on?

The whole question of reform started in Toronto back in 1908 and 1909 when Mr. Hanna was provincial secretary. Three of the newspapers took it up and they kept it consistently before the public. One was the Toronto Telegram; the second was the old Globe under the editorship of the late Harry Anderson, a former member of the press gallery, and the third paper took a great deal of interest in it. What kind of inspection do we have? Members of the House of Commons and of the Senate are on the board of visitors, but how many of us have visited these institutions?

We all know what Mr. Hanna did to clean up the situation in Ontario. The city of Toronto established two gaol farms, one on Yonge street for men and the other at Concord for women, to help close up the Mercer reformatory. The latter is there yet. Many of these institutions were built before confederation. The Don gaol, which is in my riding, was built just a little after confederation. The late Doctor Hastings, the medical health officer, and I visited it, and we both condemned it as being unfit for human habitation, but it is still in use today. Thousands of prisoners go through that gaol every year, many of them who have never been in trouble before. It is not the fault of the fine officials there. The system and plant are to blame. It is a public scandal that prison reform is nowhere. We talk about the magna carta and freedom, but in these institutions there is nothing but fear. They should have the motto over their doors: "Abandon hope all ye who enter here."

Let us look into this problem. The attendance in the house was only twenty-nine up until 10.30 o'clock last night, 216 members being absent. It is up a bit today, but it has never been over thirty-five while this discussion has been going on. The first thing we should do is to appoint twenty-five members to visit these institutions and find out if this report has given value for the expenditure of the money that was made. I have a great deal of sympathy with the gentleman who has been appointed. He has taken hold of this thing. He is a good citizen and a likeable and able man. I shall give him any support I can, and to the two gentlemen the minister has chosen. The report has recommended changes that should have been made twenty-five or thirty years ago but forgets to get on with the Borstal system federally and do something now.

Some sections of the country have been getting relief in connection with these matters while others have not. I remember when the Hepburn government was in power in Ontario in the thirties and early forties. The federal government enacted a measure to assist in the building of municipal institutions by provinces in order to relieve unemployment. In Quebec, Three Rivers got a court house; other places in Quebec and other provinces got new schools, new gaols, new roads, new sidewalks, parks and many other things. These were paid for one-third by the federal government, one-third by the province and one-third by the municipality. We did not get a cent of that fund in Ontario because the premier would not permit the municipalities to accept it. The result is that we have a lot of old, dilapidated gaols, some of which are not fit for pigpens. The late Doctor Deslauriers, then member of parliament for St. Mary, Montreal, who was here before His Honour the Speaker, said that he found some of these places to be public hazards, and I can say the same myself. After inspecting them, he said they were operated contrary to all known laws of public hygiene.

If these things were known to the general public they would not be permitted to go on for five minutes. This problem was nearly solved in Ontario and it would have been solved had it not been for the two wars. Penal reform by Howard really started one hundred years ago. After that time Mr. Thomas Fowell Buxton, M.P. in 1818, said:

> I am well persuaded that the penal evil exists only because it is unknown; that it arises not from insensibility, on the part of the nation, but from ignorance; and that a faithful disclosure of the scenes which may be witnessed in almost every county jail in England, would speedily be followed by an impulse to prevent them.

You would think that the public of this country, in modern days like these, even after two great wars when everything is topsy-turvy, would know what is going on in these institutions. If they did know, do you think they would approve? We know how some businessmen try to get off from serving on juries. As I say, Mr. Hanna did a lot toward solving this problem in Ontario. The premier of Quebec has announced the formation of a committee in Montreal to consider conditions there. The provincial secretary's department in Ontario are doing something. Mr. Dunbar opened a school for youthful offenders at Brampton and there is one also at Bowmanville.

A lot of these people should never be in gaol. Unfortunately we have many magistrates today—I am not referring to those in my city—who like to remand accused persons. They are then sent to gaol until the magistrate takes one or two weeks to make up his mind. Many of these people have never been in gaol before. There should be some change made. I had a bill before parliament which would have remedied this condition, and I hope the minister will do something about it.

I have visited many of the county gaols in Ontario and in many cases the people were too poor to pay their fines. We should adopt the law which was passed in England twenty years ago. Their summary convictions act closed half the gaols in the old country. That act gives a person a chance to find the money with which to pay his fine. All over this country people are in prison because of debt, a thing which Dickens wrote about when he wrote about Little Dorrit. We have the same condition here in this country. Everybody knows it is wrong, but nothing is done about it. In England when a man is convicted for some petty thing and fined they give him time to pay his fine and he goes home the same night. The bill which I introduced this year had the support of the John Howard society in Canada. They wrote several letters to me commending the bill, and I hope the minister will give consideration to that bill and the clause regarding time to pay fines, because many people are in gaols who should not be there at all.

Many references have been made in this House of Commons to the Borstal system. I can remember when I first came here; in fact one of the reasons for my coming here was to get something done about this penal institution business. The old gaol in my riding was to be torn down, but I am sorry it has not been. We had the promise of the Ontario government that the moment the two gaol farms were ready they would close it up, but it has not been closed up at all. The excuse is that there would be no place to which to remand prisoners. We could have had a fine new one, if Ontario in 1935 had allowed our city to get funds the way towns and cities in Quebec did, as I mentioned before.

There should be some changes in the law. We have judges complaining about people not wearing hats. Ladies in the House of Commons and in the galleries are not wearing hats. I have seen all kinds of ladies' hats. As I said the other day in the house, some of these hats I see on women are not much larger than the size of the little cartons you get containing a spoonful of marmalade. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said that these hats would be too big for certain justices in courts. The other day a boy of thirteen fainted in the witness box in a Toronto court after being obliged to stand in the box for one hour. Why should witnesses have to be in the box at all and not be given a chair? I think the House of Commons should be in the box to find out modern reform.

Regarding some of these other offences, as we are talking about the other fellow, what about the poor fellow who tries to commit suicide? In Rosedale it was a popular occurrence for people who wanted to commit suicide to jump off one of the bridges there when they got that tired spring feeling or were out of work and nobody wanted to be bothered with them. A few days ago a magistrate sent one of these would-be suicides to gaol for thirty days because a section of the criminal code says that a would-be suicide must be committed to gaol. He needed a hospital, not a gaol. I hope that things like that will be eliminated from the criminal code.

We should long ago have had a legal committee here to consider legal bills, as they have in the provinces. I hope the minister will bring down an amended criminal code. There should be a decennial revision of the code just as there is of the Bank Act, to bring it up to date. We should not leave it the way it is, where nobody knows the law.

Here we are in this House of Commons within two hours of one of these penal institutions and within three hours of another one. Surely twenty or twenty-five members could go through one of these institutions and see what the actual conditions are. The Archambault commission on prison reform came about because of Toronto and other members, aided by Toronto newspapers, keeping before this house the need of prison reform. This report, after three years, cost half a million dollars, and only for a few recommendations, still not law.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to this debate and have learned a great deal. I listened with much interest to the speech of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) and to the brilliant speech made last evening by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I represent a large number of people and a good number of organizations who are much interested in this problem, and for that reason I wish to make a few comments at this time. I would not for a moment suggest that I could speak with the same authority or knowledge possessed by some other members. But I can say this. I speak personally and for many persons in my district who are much concerned about what is to be done about this problem.

This is not a spectacular bill, not one that creates a good deal of ferment in the country, and apparently not a great deal of interest in the house, but it is an important bill because it is one aimed to do something to assist our unfortunate Canadian citizens in a new way. In doing that, I say that we are taking a step forward in the development of Canadian civilization. In my opinion this bill, together with the remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), the report of General Gibson, and the speeches of hon. members, indicates that at last something is to be done to implement some of the provisions of the Archambault report.

Over the years I have made it a point to visit some of these institutions and have visited in them individuals whom I had known previously in civilian life. I have talked with them and come away somewhat sad because I realized the unfortunate circumstances that do prevail in some cases. I have felt up until recently that the great majority of the Canadian people were very remote from this problem. I think it has been a question of their not seeing the problem because they were not thinking about it, and those who were concerned were a small number who were interested in it from humanitarian motives, and the relatives of the unfortunate inmates. But I think that situation is changing. I have noticed that appreciably in the last year or two and in this debate in this house, which I think will do a great deal to inform many people in Canada who have not been interested to date in this great problem.

As far as my own experience in my constituency is concerned, I have a personal knowledge of several unfortunate cases, the result I should say of a mixture of impulsive youth, excessive drinking, and in some cases unfortunate companions. I have visited some of these people in the institutions and have talked with their relatives, and more than ever have I become convinced that the time is right to adopt new methods in our penal institutions. I have discussed this question with senior police officials, judges, magistrates and many other people, and the general opinion expressed by those competent and responsible people was that there was a great need for segregation. That is one thing which impressed me in visiting these institutions. There is also a great need for training while in the institution and a great need for after-care. The hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned an unfortunate person who spent some time in a penal institution and reformed and returned to civilian life. For some reason or another there is a stigma attached to those who have paid their penalty to society in a penal institution. I have known several men who could not regain positions because somehow or another some person was mean enough to remind someone that they had served a prison sentence.

I do want to support the plea of urgency that has been made by several members. This is an urgent matter and action should be taken as soon as possible. I am not in accord with some of the severe criticisms that have been made of the proposals in General Gibson's report or the outline given to the house by the Minister of Justice. I prefer to wait for a year or two and see what happens as a result of this legislation.

In concluding, I say that many of us have great hopes, and I hope that, after the passing of a year or two, we shall be able to commend the minister and his officials upon the results which have been obtained in that time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the house that if the Minister of Justice speaks he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): It will not be necessary for me to say very much in concluding this debate. The bill before the house is a simple one, as I said when I introduced the resolution. The debate has taken a wide range. I am not sure whether the rules of the house permit so wide a range, but I did not wish to take any exception to the latitude of the speeches, because I thought the discussion was so useful and I preferred to have it at an earlier stage rather than at a later one in the session.

Much of this discussion would ordinarily have taken place on the penitentiary estimates. Other parts of the discussion would have taken place in the normal course on amendments to the criminal code. However I am grateful to hon. members for expressing their views on so many subjects connected with the administration of the penitentiaries, and for expressing them so frankly and so fully as they have in this debate.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to reply seriatim to the points which have been made by various speakers because, as I have indicated, there will be occasions later in the session when these matters can be discussed more properly than they can be on this bill.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) somewhat sharply challenged the principle of the bill. I think he was the only member who has spoken in the debate who did. He took the position that he was opposed, and that the house should be opposed, to the setting up of a one-man commission instead of a three-man commission. On the resolution I gave the reasons why the government took the view that in the circumstances a one-man commission was preferable. It may be that if all the recommendations of the Archambault report could be carried out the argument for a three-man commission would be stronger; but the main recommendation of the Archambault commission cannot be carried out.

Recommendation No. 1 reads as follows:

> The Canadian penal system should be centralized under the control of the government of Canada, with the federal authorities taking charge of all the prisons in Canada, the provinces retaining only a sufficient number to provide for offenders against provincial statutes, prisoners on remand, and those serving short sentences.

I am not convinced that that would be a desirable thing to do. There are a great many opponents of centralization in this country, and a great many who believe that decentralization, even in matters such as this, is preferable. The arguments for decentralization in this field are about as strong as they are in a great many other fields where they are admittedly strong. I am not convinced that that recommendation should be carried out, but even if it should be, I have no reason in the world to think the provincial authorities would be willing to have it carried out.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister permit a question for the purposes of information?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have the provinces been communicated with recently with a view to ascertaining their position in that regard?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not so far as I know. After all, that would involve the taking of a decision by the federal government to press for centralization and the control of all the prisons of Canada. We have been pounded during the greater part of this session whenever we allegedly approached anything like centralization. We have been attacked for desiring to centralize authority by some of the provinces and by a great many hon. members. As I say, I am not convinced that it would be desirable to attempt to vest in ourselves control of all the prisons in Canada. If hon. members wish to advocate that I should like them to take some responsibility for advocating it. I say that if the provinces of Canada desire to discuss that with us we shall be glad to discuss it. They will not find us the least bit stubborn on this point. If they want to discuss the matter we have an open mind on it. But under the constitution theirs is the responsibility, and instead of our reaching out to get more responsibility and vesting it in ourselves, it seems to me it is for the authorities who have the responsibility and who think they should divest themselves of it to approach us, rather than for us to approach them.

As I say, if we could carry out the main recommendation of the Archambault commission's report, maybe the argument would be stronger for a commission of three, but we cannot. I think one-third of the prisoners of the country are under the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament and approximately two-thirds of the prisoners are under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, so our field of activity is hardly one that requires an elaborate organization. It is a field of activity where, in my judgment, one commissioner provided, as I said, that he is a good man, is better than three.

In the late thirties we were going in for these three-man boards, five-man boards, seven-man boards and so on. All over the country it was said that they were the salvation. It was said, let us have a board; put the board outside of the control of the government if possible, and certainly well away from the control of parliament, and let it function, as it was said, without any political interference; then we would get efficiency. Now we have had a lot of experience with these boards, and personally I do not believe in going too far. There again the opposition in the house has criticized us for our boards, our commissions, our controllers and so on. If I am to be responsible for the administration of the penitentiary system of Canada I want to be dealing with one responsible official, not with a board. When something goes wrong I do not want to have to find out, if I can, which man or which two men or who it was that was responsible for its going wrong; I want to be able to hold one man responsible instead of an aggregation, which is very much harder to put your finger on. You cannot say that three men are three times as good as one man; you cannot say, the more the merrier, the more the better in these things. You have to pay some attention to the human factor. If you get one good man who is responsible to the minister who, in turn, is responsible to the government and to parliament, in my judgment you get a more efficient organization in a matter such as this than if you set up a board.

The reasons for setting up boards in some instances is to give all the parts of the country representation or something of that kind. There is no such reason here. Therefore I ask the house, which I think it is prepared to do, to support the recommendation of the government in this regard.

It was very interesting to hear the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) say this afternoon that the former minister had difficulty to get men to accept appointments in this field. It may very well be that if we stuck to the idea of a three-man board we would have a little difficulty getting appointees. That will not be a difficulty with this legislation, because we have the commission set up as soon as the legislation is passed, and at least we shall not have much of an excuse if we do not make some progress in the very near future, as the house and the country expect us to do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister permit one simple question? He mentioned that in the late thirties the practice of establishing large commissions came into vogue. Would he mention what commission he has in mind which started that tendency?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so. I do not want to mention any particular one. If I did it would be thought I was criticizing a particular one. I do not want to do that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. JAENICKE: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administrative service—

1. Departmental administration, $191,314.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not know whether the minister intends to make any statement on this item. If he does, I shall wait.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that it is necessary to make any lengthy statement at this time. Matters having to do with agriculture have been under discussion on more than one occasion since the beginning of the session, and I do not wish to cover ground which has already been covered. Probably I should say, however, that there have been some changes in the estimates, as hon. members will see. The general or ordinary vote has been increased by $1,224,135.34, while the special vote has been increased by $1,125,000. The items which go to make up these increases are shown in the estimates, and I do not intend to go into them in detail, but I think I should call attention to two because they do have some bearing upon other items.

It will be noticed that there is an increase of $451,340 in the vote for experimental farms, but I should explain that this represents an amount which was previously in the prairie farm rehabilitation vote and which is now being extended under the experimental farms vote. The amount which has been voted for the St. Mary river dam project, $1,500,000, is a new vote in these estimates. This work was commenced last year and is being carried on this year, with a larger amount being expended.

The only other point I wish to make at this time in regard to the agriculture estimates is that through the administration of the agriculture department we are attempting to carry out the policies which have been laid down during the last few years. In 1944 we brought in legislation which tended to indicate the direction agricultural policy would take throughout the transitional period. I think it was generally agreed that during the last three years of the war agriculture had experienced conditions under which the returns from the activities of farmers throughout Canada were at least as satisfactory as, if not more satisfactory than, they had ever been in the history of Canada. That being so, there was considerable concern as to whether we would be able to maintain that position throughout the transitional period. The government brought forward legislation providing that floor prices might be established under farm products; and during the time the discussions were taking place many hon. members were concerned as to the level of those floor prices in the years immediately following the war. We are able to say definitely that the floor prices which have been maintained are at least as high as the prices of any of our products during the last three years of the war, and much higher than the prices of most products during that period. As a result, the returns from agriculture across Canada on a cash basis have been higher than the average of the last three years of the war, and that condition has prevailed in spite of the fact that the quantity produced has been smaller. In other words, we have had a lower production of dairy products, animal products and feed grain during the years immediately following the war than the average of the period I have mentioned toward the end of the war; yet we have had a higher average return during the last two years than during the preceding two years. The average cash return for farm poducts disposed of by famers during the last three years of the war was about $1,600,000,000.

The return for each of the last two years was considerably over $1,700,000,000. So I say that as far as returns from farm products are concerned, on a cash basis, in spite of the fact that production was down, the returns themselves have been higher than during the years which we undertook to attempt to maintain our position in relation to them.

The other objective set at that time was to attempt to stabilize prices for farm products, or the returns from farm products, over as long a period of years as possible. That matter has been discussed, in considering other measures, at such great length that I do not think it is necessary to say more than that prices have been stabilized at a higher level in the months since the end of the war and for some time into the future than was maintained during the last three years of war. That being the case, we feel that the policy as laid down at that time in relation to stabilization has been carried out.

One point I should like to make at this time is that we have also made provision for enlarging upon the plans for rehabilitation. I believe it was two weeks ago I brought down in the house a statement dealing with rehabilitation, not only in relation to the rehabilitation act itself, which applies to the drought area of western Canada, but with regard to rehabilitation in general across Canada. Under the provisions of that statement it is intended to carry on rehabilitation in the drought area with expenditures at least equal in actual amount to the amount expended in the years immediately preceding the war. We intend to set out the amounts in the experimental farms vote that will be required for certain of the work which previously was carried on under expenditures from the prairie farm rehabilitation vote. To that extent the amount which may be expended on the usual works which have been carried on under prairie farm rehabilitation has been increased.

In addition to that, it was provided that a certain sum would be set up from time to time, either in the general or in the supplementary estimates, to take care of special projects. It was mentioned that among those projects would be some development in connection with marsh lands in the maritime provinces, some development in connection with special projects in British Columbia, and some expenditures in the other provinces across Canada in order to deal with certain developments which were thought necessary for the promotion of agriculture.

I repeat that the first vote of that type which we have in the estimates, which is in the same form as others to be passed, will be found in item 31, under which vote we have set apart an amount for the St. Mary river dam project. Money will be provided in the same way.

At the time I brought down that statement I was asked a question, I think by the hon. member for Swift Current. Afterwards, when I saw the question and the answer in print, I realized that I had not really answered the question which had been asked. We have set up certain methods of dealing with problems which arise in the drought area of western Canada, or what has been known as the drought area. I was asked the question as to whether the last proposal made in the statement issued at that time covered such projects as that which might be put into effect around Elbow on the Saskatchewan river.

Elbow, on the Saskatchewan river, is in the drought area. It might be correct to say that any project which might be undertaken at Elbow would be taken under a vote similar to that with regard to the St. Mary river dam. There is, however, this difference between the two projects, that all the waters controlled by any projects which may be brought into being on the Saskatchewan river are projects having entirely to do with waters having their origin in Canada; whereas the project on the St. Mary river is one which has to do with waters which come directly under the international waters commission. So that the two are not on all fours, but they are both within what is known as the drought area.

The other projects to which I referred in what might be called number 3 in the proposals set out in the statement were projects which were intended to be carried on outside the drought area altogether—along the northern part of the three prairie provinces, anywhere in the province of British Columbia, where it might be considered desirable to proceed with projects, and in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the maritimes, where it might be considered advisable to proceed with projects. The only projects specifically named were those having to do with marsh lands in the maritimes, and some special projects, which were not determined, in British Columbia. But the third item was intended to cover the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the northern areas in the three western provinces, and then any other developments of a similar nature which might be brought about in the maritime provinces or British Columbia, all of which would be outside the drought area.

Mr. COLDWELL: What progress is being made with the Saskatchewan river project? I have a reason for asking the question, because the possibility of building a bridge across the Saskatchewan river at North Landing depends upon the project. One is anxious to find out what is being done with regard to this project in order that one might know something to tell one's constituents upon returning to his constituency.

Mr. GARDINER: I would rather discuss that situation when we reach the proper item, but perhaps I can give information sufficient to serve the purposes of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The present position of the project is that the engineering necessary to determine whether a dam which can be maintained can be built on the Saskatchewan river has been completed. While I was out west a week ago, I made inquiries as to when we might expect to receive the report in Ottawa. I was told that the report was then with the consulting engineer, who was in Washington, that it was being considered by him and that it was expected back within a short time. I returned to my office in Ottawa only this morning, and have not yet had an opportunity to go into all the matters concerning the department; but, so far as I know, the report has not yet reached Ottawa. I am hopeful, however, that it will be here before we reach the item in question.

With regard to the general question having to do with the bridging of the Saskatchewan river, I have some knowledge on the subject because I think nearly all the bridges on the Saskatchewan river which were built in Saskatchewan were built during the time I was in the government of that province.

Mr. COLDWELL: But by joint project, federal and provincial.

Mr. GARDINER: But financed largely by the province. The projects they have there which permit persons to cross the river by car or by horse were projects considered to be the responsibility of the provincial government. I believe that is still true. The attachments which were put on the railway bridges were also considered to be the responsibility of the provincial government. And where bridges were built to serve both the railway and highway traffic, those projects were financed by the railway and the province.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the Borden and Outlook projects?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the federal government took any part in financing them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Or any considerable part. If they did, it was a very small part. The Outlook bridge was one which was built when I was not in the government. It was built in the days of the Anderson government; but the others were built during the time I was in the government. And during the greater part of the time they were being built I was minister of highways. Those bridges were largely financed by the province with the help of the railways.

Mr. COLDWELL: The reason I asked the question was that what is done with respect to the bridge at North Landing depends upon what is being done on the Saskatchewan river.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, if the dam is built as it has been projected by the engineers, it will mean that the bridge at Elbow—not the bridge at Outlook—will have to be raised, or will have to be placed on a different location. In so far as the bridge north of Swift Current at Saskatchewan Landing is concerned, my understanding is that if the dam is built to the height to which the engineers consider it should be built—the depth of the river is to be increased to fourteen feet—there would be some additional cost of building the project, but it would not be very great. The abutments and all that kind of thing would cost more, but otherwise the expenditures would not be much greater.

Mr. COLDWELL: My understanding is that a high level bridge will be required.

Mr. GARDINER: It depends on what you are going to do, whether you are going to sail boats under it. I believe the hon. member for Davenport did hope that boats could be sailed through there. If you have a lake 100 and some odd miles long which is fourteen feet deep at its shallowest end, there is a possibility that boats could be sailed there and that would have a considerable effect upon the kind of bridge you would want to build at that point. To the extent that we might have increased costs if we undertook to build a dam we might then be required to add something to what the province and the railroads would spend on a bridge, but I think it is still the responsibility of the province to finance the building of the bridge.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the same basis as it was done before?

Mr. GARDINER: On the same basis as it was done before. Those are the only remarks which I desire to make at the present time with regard to the estimates. As is usual, we shall be able to discuss any point that may be raised as we go along with the different items.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister referred to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which will come up under another item. Since the commencement of this session, I have had on the order paper a resolution reading as follows:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of expanding the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act into a national soil conservation and farm rehabilitation act and extending its activities to all the settled farm areas of Canada.

As the minister knows, there has been quite an agitation, not only this session but during the past couple of sessions, from the maritimes to have the provisions of this act applied to the reclaiming of their marsh lands. There have been similar requests from British Columbia and from other sections of the prairie provinces which do not come under this act. Is it intended during the present session to make this act a national measure?

Mr. GARDINER: No. I announced at the time I made the statement that there was no intention of doing that at this session. In looking at my book, I believe I stated the position in relation to the $451,340 the wrong way about. The amount spent has been transferred from the experimental farms vote over to the other.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to make a few remarks on this general item, following what the minister has stated. I do not think the minister needs to offer any excuse for the increase of some $2,349,000 in the estimates of his department this year, especially in view of the facts which he has just related with regard to the development of irrigation projects under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. As a matter of fact, I think he would have been justified had his estimates been considerably higher.

In 1939 we were spending some $18,000,000 under the agriculture estimates, and this year we propose to spend $23,202,000. However we must realize that with the increased cost of materials and labour today we shall probably be able only to supply services somewhat below those which were supplied in 1939 with $18,000,000. There have been great shortages of food throughout the world and today Canada is one of the greatest reservoirs of food in the world. In view of that fact, our expenditures might have been increased to provide an impetus to increase food production in this country.

As the estimates indicate, the increase in expenditures is largely on irrigation projects in western Canada. However, there are many other items in connection with which I think increases would have been justified at this time. I refer to health of animals, the enlargement of T.B. free areas, more inspection work in connection with Bang's and other such diseases. I think we would have been justified in making much greater expenditures than we are.

The world position today with regard to food indicates the necessity for increased production. Sir John Boyd Orr, speaking at the food conference held at Virginia Springs in 1944, stated that, while science would win the war, food would win the peace. I think we realize today the truth of that statement. We won the war through advances in science, and the conditions in the world today indicate that it will be food that will win the peace.

Canada had a remarkably good record for food production during the war. We increased our production of meat products, dairy products, and various other farm products tremendously during those years and at a time when there was a scarcity of help on our farms. But today we find that the increases in production which we made during the war years are slipping away. In my estimation we should at least be holding the gains we made. I realize, as the minister has stated before in this house, that our increased production of meat and dairy products during 1944 and 1945 were due to quite a large extent to the fact that when the war started we had surpluses of grains in storage and that during the early years of the war we increased those surpluses until in 1943 we had probably the greatest storage of grain in Canada we had ever had or probably ever shall have. It was through the use of those grains that we achieved an increased production of meat and dairy products during 1944 and 1945.

However, as I say, that production has dropped seriously. Last year the drop was some thirty-three to thirty-five per cent in the production of bacon, and there was also a reduction in the production of beef. According to the Department of Agriculture marketing services for May, there was a decrease this year to date of 33·8 per cent in the production of hogs in western Canada, and a decrease of 12·3 per cent in eastern Canada. In beef there was a decrease of 27·2 per cent in western Canada and a decrease of 1·3 per cent in eastern Canada. That reduction in production is serious.

It has come to a point, at least in the area which I represent and which is one of the better stock producing areas in western Canada, where our production today is less than it was in 1939. That is a serious situation and one which cannot be justified. To a large degree it has been brought about by the policies of this government. I remember the minister stating in 1940 that the policy of the government was to see that we had a diversification of agriculture in western Canada. That stock should be fed on the farm where it was produced, that was the place to finish them. Yet we find that that is not being done today, largely because of policies initiated by this government. These policies are not economically sound. They are not good so far as our western agriculture is concerned, and I doubt whether they help eastern agriculture to any great extent.

This drop in production is, in my estimation, due to two or three definite things which the government has done or failed to do. One of the reasons for the drop in agricultural production in western Canada has been that agriculture is not holding its own in our Canadian economy. I may be asked why I make that statement in view of the fact that, according to the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada, using 1935-39 as the base period, agricultural prices in 1939 were 91·8, while in 1946 they had reached 183·7, or a rate of increase of 100 per cent in the returns to agriculture. But when we give those figures we must take into consideration that the cost of production of agricultural products in 1939 was 99·1, while today it is 149, or an increase of some 50 per cent. We must also take into consideration the fact that in 1939 the average farm income in Canada was only $743. That is a pretty low base from which to start, and even when we have doubled that amount we still have not got very far so far as the returns to agriculture are concerned. The result is that fewer people are prepared to enter agriculture today than at any other period in our history.

In 1941, when we were discussing the Veterans Land Act in the veterans committee of this house, a survey was made to find out the number of boys in our army who would prefer to enter agriculture when the war was over, and out of the first 200,000 who enlisted some 70,000 indicated their desire, when that survey was made, to go into agriculture, even though agriculture had gone through a very much depressed period during the 1930's. But today, now that our boys have actually returned, a much smaller number of them indicate their desire to enter agriculture. That is an indication that, after their return to Canada, they have looked around and decided that there are other occupations in which the returns are greater than in agriculture, in spite of the fact that the returns to agriculture have doubled during the last six or seven years of the war. Notwithstanding that the returns have doubled and that, according to the bureau of statistics, the net farm income in 1946 was $1,925, we must remember that to earn that net income it is necessary for the farmer to have a capital investment of from $10,000 to $15,000, and when we subtract the interest on that capital investment from the net income we find that the net income is quite small as compared with that of any other group in our Canadian economy. The result is that fewer young people are prepared to enter agriculture today, and the government feel that they must go to Europe to secure people to come to Canada to work on our farms here, because farming is not a sufficiently paying proposition to our own people to induce them to remain on the farm. That is not a healthy condition. It is a condition which, in my opinion, justifies a larger appropriation in our agricultural estimates than is indicated by the increase proposed in these figures tonight.

Another reason why our production of live stock products in western Canada has dropped is the price relationship which grain bears to live stock products. That relationship today is such that it is just not interesting to the farmer to go ahead and produce meat and dairy products, and consequently we find less of them being produced. I am convinced that the new prices announced to the house by the minister on March 17 for coarse grains during the coming season will not get the production that is required. The coarse grains situation in eastern Canada has been indicated today over the radio and in the press. It is forecast that there will be a serious shortage of these grains in eastern Canada. I do not believe that the increased acreage in western Canada, if there is any increased acreage, will supply that deficiency. Take barley, for instance. The price of barley to the farmer today is ninety-three cents a bushel f.o.b. Fort William, and with the present price of hogs and the present price of wheat, I do not think we shall get the increased barley acreage we should have if we are to have the increased meat and dairy production that we need in this country. The government should give serious consideration now to raising the malting premium on barley. We have the lowest malting premium on barley of any country in the world. The premium in Great Britain and the United States varies from thirty to fifty cents a bushel, whereas in Canada we have a ceiling of 5 cents a bushel on the malting premium that can be paid to our producers. That is not enough to get the increased production we should have. Some may ask, why do you want an increased production of malting barley if it will be made into beer? My answer is that last year when we were trying to get an increased production of meat and dairy products the brewers got all the malting barley they wanted and they will not use any more for such purposes if the premium on malting barley is increased. If it were increased it would induce more farmers in western Canada to produce barley, and more barley would be left over for feed purposes. I am convinced that, until the premium is increased, you will not get the increase in coarse grains that is necessary for an increased production of meat and dairy products in Canada.

Another factor that has been curtailing production in western agriculture is the shortage of machinery in this country and our large exports of farm machinery. Last year I gave the house figures which indicated that our exports of farm machinery had increased tremendously, and that increase in exports has continued this year, with the result that there is a real shortage of equipment in many parts of Canada for the production of agricultural products.

Just before I came here at Easter I visited the local offices of the Veterans' Land Act people. They told me that they had 200 tractors on order which they could not supply. Returned men who had their farms had everything ready to go to work this spring, and yet at Easter they were, in that one area, 200 tractors short of being able to supply what was needed by these men. That is only one small section. There were hundreds of other farmers as well who needed new equipment and were unable to obtain it at that time. In spite of that, we are exporting the largest amount of farm machinery that we have ever exported in Canada's history. I have no objection to exports so long as they are not hindering the production of food in Canada. I do not think machinery shipped to any country in the world will produce more food than it would produce on Canadian farms where we know how to use the equipment and have as good land as there is any other place in the world. By increasing these exports and selling our own market short, we are not serving either ourselves or the interests of other parts of the world for greater food production.

Another matter which I believe should be dealt with is that of tariffs on farm machinery. The minister may say that we have no tariffs on farm machinery, but that is not a fault. If you look at the old tariff schedule you will find that it was made up at a time when much of the modern equipment which we are using today was not on the market. There are a number of items of new farm equipment which have power attachments which are paying tariff. I need only mention some of the newer implements used for the production of sugar beets in this country or the modern hay press which bales the hay as you take it from the windrow, or some of the modern tillage equipment which has a power unit and attachments to operate it, to illustrate my point. This new equipment has come on the market since our tariff schedule was made up, and today it is paying a tariff of up to twenty-five per cent for entry into Canada. Until we are prepared to modernize that tariff schedule, we shall not be giving agriculture in Canada a fair deal; we shall not be giving it the machinery which is necessary for it to compete with production in other parts of the world. They have this equipment in the United States and we should be able to get it here. These are a few of the things that, I believe, should be dealt with if we are to get a greater agricultural production.

Another matter is that of the use of fertilizers in this country. We can increase our agricultural production tremendously by the use of fertilizers. In 1944 I visited England, and I was on a farm where the man was threshing his twenty-fifth consecutive crop of wheat; he was threshing fifty-two bushels to the acre. His statement was that all he required the land for was to hold the plant; that he could feed the land with fertilizer containing everything that was necessary to grow the crop. I did not agree with him entirely, but I do know that they have increased their production in the European countries tremendously by the use of fertilizer. Of course you must have plenty of moisture to do that. In western Canada we can use fertilizer to a limited extent, to the extent only that we have moisture to grow the crops as well as the fertilizer to feed them; but in eastern Canada I am sure that we could, to good advantage, increase the use of fertilizer and thereby raise larger amounts of grain, vegetables and other farm produce. Yet in spite of that, we find the government disposing of plants that during the war, were used to produce fertilizer. I shall not go into that matter at great length now; we shall have an opportunity to go into it further when we come to that particular item, but that is one of the methods which can be used to increase agricultural production. I am sure that, until we have increased our production, until we have seen that our farmers have equipment, until we have seen that the agricultural economy of this country receives as large a share of the national income as any other group we shall not have successful agriculture in Canada.

The farmers of this country compose 17·3 per cent of the working population, and yet they receive some eleven per cent of the national income. As I said, until some of these things are rectified we shall not have increased agricultural production. I believe that the Minister of Agriculture has the direct responsibility for that. Through these estimates he is the man who can and should direct our Canadian agriculture to greater production.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I butt in for one moment? I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question regarding some figures in which we were interested. I hated to contradict him because I did not know whether my memory or his was at fault, but I should like to put the figures before him with regard to the two bridges which were mentioned. The one at Outlook cost a total of $345,690.27.

Mr. GARDINER: That was relief work.

Mr. COLDWELL: The provincial government paid $36,653.37, or 10·6 per cent. The Borden bridge cost $322,120.94. The provincial government paid $32,212.09, or 10 per cent. The Saskatoon bridge cost $713,673.19. The provincial government's share was $178,418.25, or 28 per cent. I remembered that. When the minister said that the provincial government had paid the greater part of the cost of these bridges I was astonished, but since I had not the figures before me I did not care to contradict him. But in view of the statement the minister made and my memory of the transaction, I thought I should put these figures on record. I do not want to enter into this discussion tonight. We shall discuss bridges on another occasion. I quite agree that three of the bridges were built during the years of depression, but the facts are that the federal government bore the major cost of these undertakings.

Mr. GARDINER: Just to keep the record straight, the statement I made a few moments ago was that most of the bridges which were built across the river were built while I was in the government and were the responsibility of the provincial government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I asked about the Borden bridge.

Mr. GARDINER: There were two exceptions built in the days of the Anderson government; Borden I was not certain of at the time but I understand that it was built during the time of the Anderson government under the same programme and, I may say, during the time Mr. Bennett was in office in Ottawa. These bridges were built as part of the relief programme. They were carried out during that period and were, like many other things which were done at that time, provided by the dominion government, in spite of the fact that the responsibility was that of the provincial government. It will be found that the other bridges were built under arrangement between the provincial government and the railways. I do not think the federal government put anything into these bridges. The province and the railways built the Nipawin and the Dunblane bridges, and the province placed the attachments that they put on three or four of the other bridges across the Saskatchewan river. The general policy has been that the provincial government is responsible, but on these relief projects it is correct that the federal government did put up a considerable part of the money.

I wish to reply to one or two of the remarks made by the hon. member for Melfort. The first has to do with hog production. It is perfectly true that down to six weeks ago hog production was on the decline across Canada as compared with the same period in the years immediately preceding; but there was a turn in the production about six weeks ago. I wish to place on record, alongside the statements that have been made, the present position in relation to hog marketing. Hog marketing showed a remarkable recovery throught the month of April. Eastern Canada, as a whole, marketed 28·6 per cent more hogs than during April, 1946. The marketings for the province of Quebec increased by 41·9 per cent; for Ontario, twenty-six per cent. Total marketings for the dominion during April, 1947, were approximately the same as those in April, 1946, notwithstanding the fact that marketings in western Canada were approximately thirty per cent below the same period a year ago. During April, over sixty-five per cent of total marketings originated in eastern Canada, Ontario supplying 48·5 per cent of the hogs marketed. During April, 1946, the province of Quebec marketed approximately 1,000 hogs as compared with 45,000 from Saskatchewan and 30,000 from Manitoba. During April, 1947, the province of Quebec marketed over 55,000 hogs as compared with 46,723 from Saskatchewan and Manitoba combined. So the general statement is that the production has been going up very rapidly during the last month in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and it has been going down still in the provinces west of the great lakes. That is the general picture in relation to hog production.

Beef marketings have also been up during the last six weeks. On total, from January 1 down to the present they are lower, but the fact is that they have been going up recently. I may say that I made this statement when I was out in western Canada recently, and I was very much astonished to find that the Winnipeg Free Press, which is an old friend of mine—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A new friend.

Mr. GARDINER: —took up the story with regard to this hog production and made the definite statement that the reason why hogs had gone up so rapidly in eastern Canada as compared with western Canada was the fact that on March 17 of this year we had made an announcement to the effect that the cost to the farmer in western Canada would be higher as compared with the cost to the farmer in eastern Canada; that is, to the man who fed the hogs on the farm. I was astonished to realize that we have such remarkable sows in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec that inside of a month from the announcement of the new policy we could be producing and marketing so many more hogs than we had produced and marketed in the preceding period. That is typical of some of the criticisms which are made of agricultural production by people who apparently do not know much about the history of breeding.

That is all I wish to say with regard to that one matter.

The other question I wish to say a word about is the fact that we spent $23 million in 1939.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. GARDINER: Please sit down till I finish placing this on the record.

Mr. FERGUSON: It is a very short question. Do you think there is any significance in the fact that Ontario is being run by a Conservative government, and in Saskatchewan where there is a decrease, the province is being run by the C.C.F.?

Mr. GARDINER: That might produce more hogs; I do not know. Anyway, the statement was made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Melfort that in 1939 we spent about $23 million on agriculture.

Mr. WRIGHT: I said $18 million. That is what I meant to say, if I did not say it.

Mr. GARDINER: It was actually $23 million, and it is about the same this year. I presume that what has been quoted is the main estimates but there was added to that some $4 million in supplementaries.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes; the main estimates were what I quoted.

Mr. GARDINER: There was added to that some $4 million for relief. That is included in the $23 million.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: All of which means that, while the expenditure in 1939 was approximately the same as it was in 1946, or the same as we are proposing to have in 1947-48, $4 million of the expenditure in 1939 was for relief. We are avoiding making similar expenditures by what is contained in these estimates. I think it will be found that, by spending almost a similar amount in the estimates under the special votes, we are having farmers maintained on their farms without the necessity of spending money on relief. For example, last year in the two western provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan we had as great an area which required payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as has required payments in any year since the act came into being. As a matter of fact, I think our payments were higher last year than in any other year since 1939, and the area requiring prairie farm assistance was just as large as it was in some of the worst of what we are pleased to call the depression years; but still there was nothing in the nature of what we generally call direct relief. In other words, our rehabilitation expenditures are having some effect in these areas.

Something was said with regard to the costs of farming in Canada in relation to the returns from it in 1939 as compared with 1946. I have the official statement here which I think I should read into Hansard, in order that we may have the figures as prepared by the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture. It is estimated that the net income of Canada's farmers has increased from $387,058,000 in 1939 to $1,004,299,000 in 1945. In the case of Saskatchewan the increase in net income over the same years was almost $194 million, from $26,032,000 in 1938 to $219,931,000 in 1945. This increase—I am speaking now of the dominion—is due to higher prices and higher output. Let us look at the picture for Canada as a whole. Cash income from the sale of farm products increased from $664,-317,000 in 1938 to $1,685,846,000 in 1945. Income in kind over the same period increased from $184,781,000 to $285,967,000. This meant that the gross income increased from $884,-989,000 in 1938 to $1,738,161,000 in 1945. That is, it almost doubled in that period of time. What about expenses? Operating expenses and depreciation charges increased from $497,-931,000 in 1938 to $750,592,000 in 1945. These operating expenses include:

1. Taxes on all farm lands.
2. Net farm rent.
3. Wages paid to labour.

Mr. BENTLEY: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. GARDINER: Let me put this on Hansard first.

Mr. BENTLEY: I wanted to find out what the minister was reading from.

Mr. GARDINER: I already gave that, if the hon. member had been listening.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was following the report I had.

Mr. GARDINER: I am giving the findings of the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have the bureau of statistics report.

Mr. GARDINER: Going back, these expenses include:

1. Taxes on all farm lands.
2. Net farm rent.
3. Wages paid to labour.
4. Interest on mortgages, agreements of sales and unsecured debt on all farms.
5. Feed and seed purchases from marketing channels.
6. Tractor fuel, oil and grease.
7. Truck expenses, including licences and operating.
8. Farm automobile expenses.
9. Blacksmith and machine shop charges.
10. Binder twine.
11. Fertilizer.
12. Fruit and vegetable supplies, sprays; boxes; crates; sashes, etc.
13. Fencing.
14. Repairs to buildings.
15. Machinery repair parts.
16. Water rent.
17. Nursery staff.
18. Miscellaneous, including veterinary expenses, rope, salt, hardware, etc.
19. Depreciation on buildings.
20. Depreciation on machinery.

I think it will be agreed that this pretty well covers the costs of operating. This picture is, of course, for all farmers. Different farmers in different regions will show different results. Final results will be influenced not only by the price a farmer receives but also by the weather and by his managerial ability.

The next question is: What has happened to the prices received by farmers for the sale of their products? The answer is that a good way to measure this is to use a percentage figure called an index. This simply means that if we say that in November, 1946, the index of farm prices of agricultural products is 182·9 we are saying that prices of all farm products as reported by farmers have gone up since the years 1935-39—that is, the 1935-39 average—by 82·9 per cent. The figure given a few moments ago I think indicated that costs had gone up by about 58 per cent. If we take the figure given by the hon. member for Melfort, then, costs have gone up by 58 per cent and returns have gone up by 82·9 per cent. Thus the index of farm prices of agricultural products in January, 1940, was 100. By December, 1946, it was 183·7, or an increase of 83·7 per cent. Different commodities, of course, showed different gains.

The next question is: What about costs? Here again we have an index, but this index does not measure total operating costs. It is a measure of how much prices of commodities and services used by farmers went up. The price index for commodities and services used by farmers for Canada as a whole was 106·8 in April, 1940. By January, 1946, it was 124·6, and by August, 1946, it was 130·5, or an increase of 24 per cent over April, 1940. This means that prices received by farmers increased more than prices paid by farmers. An important question that must be answered is, what commodities and services are included in a prices paid index? There are eleven groups, as follows:

1. Farm implements.
2. Building materials.
3. Gasoline, oil and grease.
4. Feed.
5. Fertilizer.
6. Binder twine.
7. Seed.
8. Hardware.
9. Wage rates.
10. Interest rates.
11. Tax rates.

These figures give the latest information with regard to the relationship between the farmer's returns and the farmer's costs, and they indicate that he is in a much better position today than he was prior to the war. I may say his position has been improved in the period since these records were made up, covering 1945. It improved in 1946, and is improving again in 1947. So that the relationship today is even better than it was at the time these records were made up. I just wanted to put these statements on Hansard in order to reply to some of the statements that are being made in this discussion.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think the minister's statement rather heads up what I had to say. Hon. members will notice that he carefully avoided stating what was the farmer's income in 1939, on which these increases are based. That is the point I was making. The average farm income for Canada in 1939, according to the bureau of statistics, was $743. The average by provinces was:

Prince Edward Island	$400
Nova Scotia	420
New Brunswick	349
Quebec	611
Ontario	837
Manitoba	678
Saskatchewan	942
Alberta	816
British Columbia	552

Mr. McIVOR: What year was that?

Mr. WRIGHT: That was in 1939; but you have to take what you started from in order to find out whether or not agriculture is prosperous today. Certainly it is more prosperous than it was in 1939, and I admitted that. Goodness knows it needs to be, or you would not have anybody farming. As the minister has stated, the farm income has approximately doubled, while the increase in costs has been approximately fifty-eight per cent. So we are better off; but we are still not as well off as other economic groups within our country.

The minister had a word to say with regard to the increased production of pork. He admits that this increase is in eastern Canada, and that it is due to the assistance given by way of freight rates and subsidies on feed grain to the east. I have maintained that the increase in production in eastern Canada is not economic. It is costing the government of this country $3 for every hog produced in eastern Canada, through freight assistance and subsidies on feed grain. That pork should be produced in western Canada, where the grain is grown. That is where you can get the most economic production of pork and poultry products in Canada; and until we get an agricultural policy under which we shall have economic production we shall not be able to compete in the world markets; we shall not be able to give our own people food at an economic price; and until we change our policies so that we can do these things we shall not be any better off.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I might make just one further observation. The farm organization which markets a great many of the hogs produced in Alberta has an advertisement going out over the radio and appearing in every Alberta newspaper, stating that farmers can make twenty-five per cent more at present prices by feeding their grain to hogs and selling the hogs than they can make by selling the grain. So, if they really want to feed hogs I cannot understand why they do not feed the grain under those circumstances. There may be many reasons, but certainly one of them is not the fact that they cannot make more by feeding the hogs than by selling the grain.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to suggest, on behalf of several hon. members in this corner of the house, that it would be to our advantage if the minister would kindly move down more toward the centre of the chamber. We can hear him quite well when he is offering a rebuttal, but it is very difficult to hear when he is dealing with ordinary items.

Mr. FAIR: I thank the minister for moving this way. I hope he will continue his movement, and that he will meet us half way or a little more in our requests for a better agricultural policy in Canada. Tomorrow, when reports of this discussion are sent out over the radio and in the newspapers, it may be that once more people will be contending that the farmers all over Canada are becoming millionaires, and I am afraid the figures given tonight will be taken as an indication of a prosperity that does not exist among our agricultural population. A number of people have the idea that living on a farm is all milk and honey, but many of us here in the house tonight realize that farming, particularly this year, is a tough proposition for those actually engaged in it. At the present time I understand not more than ten per cent of the crop around this section of Ontario is in the ground, and I understand that in Quebec the percentage is still lower. So that the farmers of those two provinces particularly, and other provinces throughout the dominion, are facing losses amounting to millions of dollars, because of weather conditions over which they have absolutely no control.

Many people tell us that farmers are much better off than they have ever been before and I am willing to admit that to some extent. But I am still quite conscious of the fact that the farmers are not in as good position as many other occupational groups in Canada. While the improvement in income of farmers shown by the minister is apparent, it must not be forgotten that at the beginning of the war farming was in a depressed condition, and remained in that state until 1942. To realize that, one has only to look at the amount of debt charged up against farmers at the present time. In addition, we have only to look at the state of farm buildings, particularly dwelling houses, and the need for improvements in those buildings.

Then again one must consider the situation with respect to the replacement of farm machinery. During the past five years we were not able to buy many machines. By the time the farmers of Canada have reequipped their farms, their financial position will not look nearly as good as it does at the present time. Prices of farm machinery are almost double what they were at the end of the last war; but I do not think anyone would claim that present prices of farm products are double what they were after the last war.

It might be interesting to note that in the period 1915-19 the farmers of Canada, comprising approximately one-third of the population, received thirty-three per cent of the national income. At the present time I understand that we are receiving about nineteen per cent.

Then again, while some people undertake to compare present prices with parity prices, such a comparison is made on a false foundation. The period used is that of 1926-29. At that time the average income received by the farmers of Canada was 16·6 per cent, which is not nearly sufficient for one-third of the population to receive.

I understand that many questions which have been discussed this evening will be discussed again when the different items are called. While it has been the custom for hon. members in different parts of the house to make long statements when departments are opened, I feel that we in this corner are prepared to desist from that practice on the present occasion. Long speeches would only be repeated when the different items are called. For that reason I do not intend this evening to speak at length.

We in this group shall have something to say when the different items are discussed. May I repeat that agriculture is not yet in as healthy a condition as it should be. Until agriculture is a healthy industry, the whole of Canada cannot prosper, and we cannot have that degree of unity to which the people of Canada are entitled. With a prosperous agriculture we could look forward to general prosperity throughout the country.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to speak briefly on the hog question. A discussion has been carried on between the minister and the hon. member for Melfort. While both set out interesting figures, I believe they have thrown a misleading light on the present situation of the Canadian farmer. While those figures may be true, so far as domestic markets are concerned, or revenue from within Canada, everyone will agree that the agriculturist of Canada is the only producer who is tied down in respect of his export market.

Even the farm implement producers export a percentage of their output to other countries of the world at prevailing world prcies. Our lumber producers do that. But the farmer, whose wheat or live stock is exported, is on a control basis, and he does not receive the same percentage of income from his export of goods as does any other producer in the Dominion of Canada. There is still that great difference.

Then, in the matter of hog production, I stated earlier in this session—and no one has refuted it—that the eastern hog producer did enjoy about $9 per hog advantage. That is, the producer in eastern Ontario or Quebec enjoys that advantage over the producer in western Alberta. If it took twenty bushels of barley at twenty-five cents a bushel subsidy to produce a hog, then the eastern producer had an advantage of about $5 in the matter of feed alone. Then there is the difference in freight rates which has not been evened up, and which amounts to about $4 a hog, as between the cities of Edmonton and Montreal. That is another advantage which I do not think anyone will refute.

I wish to ask the minister what control the board, or those in charge of meat, have over hogs marketed and slaughtered in the abattoirs of this country. I believe the board has still some control in order to supply the bacon market of Britain. If it has, I want to know how far that control extends. I ask that because when I was home last Easter, at the St. Boniface stockyards across from Winnipeg there were a great many sows heavy with pig at those abattoirs at that time. I also read reports in the Regina press to the effect that the same thing was taking place in Regina; and I read reports from other marketing centres where people were marketing their brood sows heavy with pig at that time. So I presumed that if the government had the control over this situation it was supposed to have—and I understood it still had that control—it would be able to tell me approximately how many of those brood sows were marketed at each centre. But the answer I got was that the Minister of Agriculture had no information.

I say the meat board should be able to obtain some approximate information on the question I asked. I trust the minister will tell me to what extent these controls exist today, and why it was not possible for the department to get at least approximately the information for which I asked. I know that in April of this year a great many brood sows were marketed in western Canada, probably for various reasons to which the minister has referred. All this does not come within his own department.

My colleague, the minister for Portage la Prairie—

An hon. MEMBER: The minister?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should say the member; but I am satisfied he will be a minister, at the first opportunity. However, he is still the member for Portage la Prairie. In his maiden speech he asked that farm producers in Canada should be exempt to the extent of $500 for the production of hogs and dairy products. In my view that was a worth-while suggestion, and, while it does not come within the purview of the Minister of Agriculture, it is under the control of one of his colleagues. I know there are some difficulties in the present situation.

There is another matter which will be discussed more fully under the marketing item, which arises from the fact that we have been prevented from marketing our beef cattle in the United States, the greatest natural market Canada has ever had. True enough, we do ship to the market in Great Britain, at a controlled price; but if we were able to market our cattle in the natural market offered in the United States we would be obtaining over fifty per cent more for those cattle than we are allowed by exporting them to Great Britain.

The point I should like the minister to deal with is that of the control on the marketing of hogs, in order to supply the British market; and I wish to know why I cannot have information with respect to the marketing of brood sows in western markets.

Mr. GARDINER: With respect to the first question, the extent of the control at present is that the meat board are taking from the inspected plants about eighty-five per cent of the amount delivered in 1940, and that amounts to about forty-five per cent of the marketings at present. They are taking about forty-five per cent of the marketings in the inspected plants; they are not enforcing any regulations with respect to uninspected plants. That product from the inspected plants is being sent to Great Britain.

With regard to the record of the sows marketed while in pig, I doubt very much if it would be possible to provide any record which would be useful. There is an estimate made from time to time, which shows that the number being marketed is not greater and has not been greater during the early part of this year than in normal times, if these times could be called anything but normal. If anything, they are a little less. Of course, that does not bear out the suggestion that sows which had been bred were being marketed in great numbers in the early part of this season. Again I would say that I do not think any check can be made which would be sufficiently close to be able to say that across Canada there has or has not been five or ten per cent more or less marketing of sows. I say that in view of the fact that records cannot be kept, or they have not been able to keep records which were reasonably near the facts; such records have not been kept and hence have not been made public.

These are important questions in relation to production. While I had not intended to get up to say it, while I am on my feet I will say that I agree with the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Souris that certain statements put out, if not followed up by other information, give a wrong impression with regard to the prosperity of farmers. For example, thirty mortgage companies put out a statement a short time ago that the mortgage owing to those companies on farms in western Canada had been reduced twenty-one per cent last year as compared with the year before, and that the mortgage indebtedness was down to a level lower than it had been for a long period of time. Those statements are both true.

But what is of as great importance is the fact that statements with regard to farm income do not bear out the suggestion that farmers in the Dominion of Canada are well off as compared with other people. I have before me a record of farmers' income tax payments which was partly placed on the record in reply to questions asked. I think this should be put on a little more fully and if the committee will permit me I will place this on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. GARDINER: Before doing so, I should like to use a few illustrations. This gives information from 1942-43 down to 1945-46. The number of farms in Canada is given as 732,832. On many of those farms there would be two or three farmers. There might be a farmer and his son, and then, if you called his daughter a farmer, there might be more.

Mr. MacNICOL: A farmerette.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, a farmerette. There would be possibly three, four or five farmers on many of these farms. In 1942-43, only 3,569 paid income tax, or one-half of one per cent. In 1943-44, 7,571 paid income tax, or one per cent. In 1944-45, 15,714 paid income tax, or 2·14 per cent. In 1945-46, 27,411 paid income tax, or 3·7 per cent. A return was brought down the other day giving the number of inspectors that have been put out in the different provinces to bring in income taxes. The putting out of those inspectors brought in a great many more returns. The number has been placed on Hansard before and I do not think it is necessary to repeat it.

While the number of returns brought in have been greatly increased it has been found that not more than seven per cent of all the farmers in Canada were making an income which the inspectors thought sufficiently large to pay income tax or to be checked further with regard to whether or not they should pay. With those facts before us, I do not think there is anyone in the committee who will say that our farmers are rolling in wealth. They are not rolling in wealth.

There is no question about it that ninety-three per cent of the farmers did not have a net income of $1,200 in those years. Now that the net income has been increased to $1,500 for a married man on a farm, the number will probably be less rather than more. We are not in position to say that our farmers are rolling in wealth. This brings me to the suggestion made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Souris that an additional $500 exemption should be given to those producing hogs, and, I presume, to those producing dairy products as well. If ninety-three per cent are not now making enough to pay income tax, I do not think that would do any good. I think you will find that the ninety-three per cent are the ones who are producing nearly all the hogs and dairy products.

There are a few large producers near the cities who are making good profits selling milk or perhaps raising hogs when they are able to get refuse as feed from the city. Some of them are making enough to get into the income tax brackets, and all of those will be found in the 3·7 per cent of farmers I have mentioned. The others who are questionable and who would raise the percentage to seven per cent, if the statements turned in by the inspectors are correct, would probably include many more of the same group. The producers of great quantities of wheat provide part of the number.

Only ten per cent of the beef produced in this country is produced on what would be considered large ranges. Ninety per cent is produced by the farmer who raises two or three or a dozen steers—you might go as high as twenty steers—but he is not the man who is paying income tax. The large ranchers produce only ten per cent of the beef produced in this country, the remainder is produced on the small farms. As one goes out through Ontario it is an exceptional thing to find a farm with more than two or three sows. They do not grow enough feed to feed more than the pigs from two or three sows and at the same time feed a milking herd of, say a dozen cows. Even to feed that number of animals they have to buy half their feed grains from western Canada. Half the grain fed in this province is shipped here from western Canada in order to produce that stock. But it is on those farms with those small herds and that small number of sows that nearly all the cattle and pigs marketed are produced. So, when we talk about getting more production by doing something with the income tax I think we are talking about a condition which does not exist. I am sure that the expected results would not be obtained.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the percentage of these cattle in eastern Canada and on the prairies?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the figures before me, but I shall be glad to give them when we come to live stock production. I think there are more in eastern Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Has the minister available the comparable figure for Alberta in relation to the ten per cent?

Mr. GARDINER: There would be a higher percentage than that in Alberta, where most of the large ranches are. I can get that information.

Mr. FULTON: The minister said that somebody behind him remarked that all the farmers who were paying income tax must be in western Canada. I think that what he said about the producers of beef cattle certainly applies there, because it is a very sore point in the district from which I come that the farmers have to pay taxes on the sale of their herds. Has the minister changed his mind, or has the department changed its minds with regard to the principle that the breeding or basic herd is a capital asset?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FULTON: May I explain why I am in order, Mr. Chairman? Last year the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Finance submitted a brief on this question, and this is the only opportunity I have to ask the minister if he is still of the same mind.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That matter should be discussed with the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. FULTON: I just wanted to ask the minister if he was still of the same mind. I think that is germane to the discussion, and it is the only opportunity I have.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We do not wish to go off on that tangent. If we allow one member to discuss that matter we are in trouble if we try to stop somebody else.

Mr. FULTON: I do not want to discuss it. I just wanted an answer to my question.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the shortest way to answer it would be for me to say that a submission by the Department of Agriculture to the other departments concerned is not necessarily the last word on a question of that kind. We have made a submission of our point of view, and a decision was reached and has been applied by the department concerned. I think the first decision reached and applied was not found to be entirely satisfactory, and they worked on the matter still further. I am sure it is not yet satisfactory to the persons concerned, and they are still working on that question.

Mr. BRYCE: A few minutes ago the minister said that the meat board was taking forty-five per cent of the hogs. How are they doing it? Are they doing what they did last year, taking fifty per cent of No. 2's from the eastern provinces and taking all the A's and B's from the western provinces?

Might I say that what hon. members have said about the income tax is quite right. About $500 is quite feasible. I have advocated something like that myself. In fact I advocated that there be no income tax on the hogs raised or the cream produced. It is not the income tax the farmer has paid or what he is likely to pay yet. When you send a bunch of inspectors around you scare the daylights out of the farmer. He is producing hogs and butter as an overtime job, just as the industrial worker in the city gets paid overtime for after-hours work. Hog production on a small farm, where most of the hogs come from and where most of the cream for butter is produced, is done by the farmer working fourteen hours a day. If you assure that man who is producing these necessities of life that he will not be taxed on his overtime production, the production will go up by leaps and bounds. Would the minister answer my question?

Mr. GARDINER: To answer the last question first, I do not think the government should attempt to tell the farmer just what he can do on his farm. If we attempted to do that we would get into a great deal of trouble. I think most farmers know—I am sure they do, because I talk with them when I go out—they are nowhere near the income tax brackets on a basis of $1,500 of net income. All one needs to do is to take the figures I have given of the number of farms and divide that into the gross income, leaving aside the fact that there is more than one man working on a farm, to find that the whole cash income plus the amount of produce which is used on the farms only produces an average of about $2,300, and all the costs of operation have to be taken out of that $2,300 to obtain the net average on farms all over Canada.

Mr. BRYCE: These inspectors have the minister's ability to make black look white.

Mr. GARDINER: Let me go back to the figures. One-half of one per cent paid income tax in one year, one per cent in another year, and 2·14 per cent in another year. The highest number ever was 3·7 per cent. If the farmer has not the income to pay income tax on, there are not many of them going to pay it, and I do not see how any inspector can collect it. He may make the farmer very angry, but that does not mean he collects the money, and the records show that he is not collecting the money.

With regard to hogs, a certain percentage remains for domestic use and all the others go to the British market, as has always been the case since we entered into agreements to market hogs in Britain. In so far as east and west are concerned, practically all the A's in Canada and the greater part of the B-1's go to the British market, but the percentage of B-1's which go from the west is higher than the percentage of B-1's which go from the east. The reason is that the domestic market in eastern Canada is very much greater than it is in western Canada.

Mr. BRYCE: You would not say they are better hogs in the west?

Mr. GARDINER: I would not go so far as to say that, although I might think it.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I am always pleased when we reach the agriculture estimates and have the minister on the other side of the house, because he conducts his department with great ability, and I say that without meaning any reflection on the other ministers. When I heard the minister reply in such vigorous terms to the hon. member for Melfort I felt that he was trying to decry that hon. member's statements. The hon. member for Melfort had indicated that the farmers were not well off, and the minister came back and put figures on the record as to income tax. I want to go farther and substantiate that the farmers today are not well off. I have here a report of the research department of the United Farmers of Canada, which gives figures for the province of Saskatchewan taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. In 1944 farm capital was $1,152,826,000. The average per farm was $9,036. The value of farm buildings in 1941 was $152,286,600. In other words, the value has increased until in 1944 it stood at $172,705,946. This gives us an average per set of buildings of $1,235. The value of farm implements and machinery, including trucks and cars, was estimated in 1940 at $142,754,000, or an average per farm of $980.50. I just made a flight out west and I saw a lot of buildings on that flight. The condition of our farm buildings is deplorable. I also drove across two of our prairie provinces. Western agriculture may be in the best position that it has ever been, but we have a long way to go to rehabilitate our farm people before we can be in a position to say that we have done an adequate job.

The chief thing I wish to say tonight is that I feel sure that many parts of the western provinces will have a small crop this year. In the southwestern parts of the provinces continued blowing and drought conditions exist. When I first came to the House of Commons I advocated the principle of an ever-normal grant. At that time the minister of agriculture rose in his place and said that the Liberal party had talked about this principle before there ever was a C.C.F. May I say that so far no plans have been made for adequate storage of feed grain to take us over the lean years. Because of the conditions which exist in eastern Canada today where there are flood conditions and where, according to press reports, we shall get only a thirty or forty per cent normal crop, and since we are already scraping the bottoms of our bins, it is high time that we had a little bit of statesmanship in our government to realize that in good years everything should be done to store in vital places seed and feed to carry our live stock and to provide seed for next year. Nothing along this line has been done. It is not sufficient to talk about it. We have to plan; we have to put a real plan into effect where these things would be integrated.

Another reason for my rising tonight was to say that something should be done to increase production in this country. During the war the government asked our farm people to produce supplies of food and grains, not only for our own armies, but for our allies. The results were marvellous, not because of particular planning by the government, but because the Canadian people put their hands to the wheel. The older people and all our people really went to work; but the fact remains that little has been done to make sure that we shall maintain a sort of scientific production or stability in agriculture.

In the other departments of our natural resources we have developed our assets; we have cut our forests; we have gone into the bowels of the earth and taken out our resources of minerals and depleted them. We have done the same with our soil. All these things were put here, as some of us believe, by God as a trust. In the last forty or fifty years we have depleted the fertility of our soil. It is not that we have not scientific data from the departments of agriculture in this country. If we properly conserve our soil we can maintain its fertility, but we have not instituted a policy to maintain that fertility.

On February 10, 1947, I spoke on the fertilizer situation in this country. There is a background to that whole problem. One of the chief reasons why we are not using fertilizer today is that the price has been too high for farmers in western Canada. It is true that they have got along one way or another without it, but in eastern Canada, where it is used generally for the production of feeds and other things, the reason it has been used is that it is a necessity. The soils are such that certain ingredients have to be added to them to build up the fertility to grow these products. What is happening in the west? We are depleting the soil. Unless we can get a policy which will conserve the soil for posterity, we shall have deserts in many of these places. I state candidly that this government have betrayed the organized farmers, in fact all the people of Canada by the way in which they have handled our war plants and by selling them out to private industry. It seems to me that the government have been seduced by capitalism and have gone down the path and sold out to them rather than keep the interests of the Canadian people at heart. It is not only the farmers' problem; it is the problem of everybody who eats in Canada, because unless we can produce food and supply our people with cheap food not only will it be too bad for our own people in the low income brackets, who are today undernourished, but also statesmen realize that, unless we can produce food and supply the other nations, we shall not have peace. That is the only way we can help to establish peace, because so long as you have starvation and hunger you will not have any sort of stable peace in the world. Therefore I say we should have established the principle of maintaining one of these fertilizer industries to produce cheap fertilizer for the farmer.

I wish to put on record the situation with regard to fertilizer in Canada. There are three ingredients which enter into the manufacture of fertilizer. Before the war, the compound which is most costly, nitrogen, was obtained from our coke plants and other steel industries. When the war came, the government built three large plants, one at Trail, one at Calgary and one at Welland. The government gave an undertaking to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that, after the war, one of these plants would be kept to produce fertilizer for the farmers. One of the facts which have come out is that, before the war, sulphate of ammonia, which is a by-product of the coke mills, was sold for $21 a ton. This was chiefly handled by Canadian Industries Limited. All that the company did was to take this material from central Canada and hand it over to the mixing plant at $33 a ton. Therefore, even though the cost of transportation would be about $2 a ton, they made around $10 a ton. The mixture was sold at around $44 a ton, with the nitrogen going into fertilizer.

During the war through experiments it was found that the Welland plant, the Calgary plant and the Trail plant could produce a new type of nitrogen for fertilizer. When I pointed this out in the earlier debate on February 10 the minister said that we would have to export a lot of this nitrogen if we kept one of these plants. I wish to ask him now what is wrong with exporting some of it if we could produce cheap fertilizer for our own people in Canada? The government sold the plant to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at a greatly reduced price. The original plant of the North American Cyanamid cost approximately $19 million, and it was sold for $4,750,000. Is it realized the profits that this private company is making? I hold in my hand a list of the profits that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company showed in 1946. They amount to $23,323,168, or $7.12 a share. This was an increase in profits of 100 per cent over 1945. Then it goes on to say that the chief reason for the increased sales was the greatly increased use of fertilizers. In the investigations which have been made by university men, to whom we pay good money to find out what these fertilizers can mean to us, it has been found that, by using them, we can produce eight to ten bushels more per acre. That being so, I wonder why it is not good business for this government to see to it either that our farmers are subsidized so that they can use fertilizers, or that we at least keep a plant and provide fertilizers to our farmers at cost. This has been dealt with by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Even one of the hon. members to my right, as far back as 1941, asked the Minister of Agriculture at that time why the price of fertilizers had been "upped" $12 a ton. I understood the minister to say he was going to look into that and see what the reason was but, as I understand it, he has never given an answer to the house.

Mr. GARDINER: We subsidized the use of fertilizers after that, during the war period.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Yes, but why did the price go up at that time? That is the point. As I indicated in this house before, prior to the war we had a world cartel in the production of fertilizer, and today here we have the government selling the Canadian farmer and the Canadian people out to these cartels, so that once again we have the growth of monopoly in this country. I feel this has been a sell-out. Here we have the North American Cyanamid people and Canadian Industries Limited who control the production of fertilizer in this country. I think I should put on record part of the agreement which this government made with the Welland plant and Alberta Nitrogen Products Limited. I am going to read it into the record, if I may. Hon. members will recall that when the minister was approached by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and asked that one of these plants be maintained, he stated that his understanding was that one of them would be kept; and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said the same thing. Going back as far as the recommendations of the war expenditures committee, a request was made that the contracts with these companies be renegotiated, so that these plants might have been kept by the government. Nothing was done about that. As I said before, I am just going to read this into the record. This is the disposal of plant clause in the government contracts regarding the fertilizer plants at Welland and Calgary, and reads as follows:

If hereafter for any reason the (U.K.) government at any time or times within twenty (20) years from the date hereof shall desire or determine to lease or dispose of said plant or any department or part thereof except to "any government within the British empire or North America," N.A.C.L. shall be given the first opportunity (for a period of ninety days after receipt of written notice stating the determination of the government to lease or dispose (as the case may be) of the same and the material terms upon which such lease or disposal will be made) to lease or purchase (as the case may be) the same upon as favourable terms as the government is then willing to accept therefor before the government shall lease or sell the same to any other party except as aforesaid and the government will not at any time during the twenty (20) year period lease or sell said plan or any department or part thereof to anyone (except as aforesaid) on terms less favourable to the government than offered to N.A.C.L.

This is article XII of an agreement between the United Kingdom government, the Canadian government and the Chemical Construction Corporation and the North American Cyanamid Limited dated August 26, 1940.

I might say that a similar agreement was made with Alberta Nitrogen Products Limited. Another clause of the agreement was that this plant would have free use of patent rights on everything which had been discovered during the war. As I said at the beginning of my speech, I think this government has failed organized agriculture and has failed the citizens of Canada by not keeping one of these plants, at this time when we are scraping the bottom of our bins and when we may be facing a tragic situation this fall in the way of having no feed for our live stock, loss of seed and lack of production to feed a hungry world. If we had done this, I think it would have been one really constructive step toward maintaining production in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: I judge, from the trend the discussion has taken up to the present, that the C.C.F. party are carrying out what their leader announced the other day was an organized plan in the party; and I compliment them upon carrying it out, because of its effectiveness. But the representative of the Social Credit party stated a few moments ago that they intended to carry out what is the recognized and proper procedure in connection with this discussion, and would discuss each one of these matters on the appropriate item when it came up.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And the official opposition.

Mr. GARDINER: And the official opposition, while they have not announced it, have carried it out in practice all evening.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Which is more important.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to suggest that an address like the one to which we have just listened is an appropriate one to have in connection with these estimates, but the place to have it is on the item of fertilizers. I do not want to start in to answer the speech which has been made, and I presume there are others in the different groups in this committee who would like to answer the speech, agree with it, or say something about it. I think it is hardly fair to the rest of us to have this organized plan carried out on a general discussion. I have no objection at all to its being carried out as the items come along and each item being dealt with by any hon. member. But I hope we can get on with this general item on administration without that type of speech which takes up only one item in the estimates.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. FULTON: Before it does, I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Did he indicate that he would not object to a general discussion on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, embracing the question of its extension to British Columbia, when the item is reached?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. That is the proper place for any general discussion on any particular item. A general discussion on fertilizers is proper when the fertilizer item comes up, and a general discussion on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is proper when we come to that item. But if we carried on as we are doing now, other members who have said nothing so far have now a perfect right to start discussion all over again, and we shall have it twice. I think that takes up too much time.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to ask the minister one question with regard to hog production in western Canada, upon which I am far from clear after listening to his arguments. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that he has argued himself around in a circle and down into a gopher hole which has no back door.

Mr. GARDINER: All gopher holes have a back door.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is occasionally one where the gopher has not had time to build a back door, and I think that is the kind the minister has got into. The minister has stated, and produced a great many figures to show it, that the level of income tax has nothing material to do with the reduction in hog production in western Canada. He also produced a great many arguments to show that it pays the farmer about twenty-five per cent better, I think his figures were, to feed his barley and other coarse grains to hogs rather than to market them. In spite of all those arguments, the fact still remains that the farmers of western Canada have been going backwards steadily as far as the production of hogs is concerned. The thing has apparently been falling off for the past three years. If the arguments the minister has advanced are correct I should like him to explain why this reduction has been going on so steadily. In other words, what is the reason that we are not producing more hogs, or anything like the number of hogs we should be producing in western Canada?

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to say a word on this same question. As the minister knows, before the war the people of eastern Canada were continually urging the farmers of the west to go into live stock more heavily, but at that time government policy and the price situation did not encourage this. Then, during the war there was a tremendous increase in the production of hogs in western Canada, partly as a result of government policy and partly as a result of price increases. A few years ago, however, the farmers of western Canada got the idea that the government actually wanted a reduction in the production of hogs. I do not say they should have got that idea; the minister quickly made it clear that this was not government policy, but the farmers had that idea. The point I should like the minister to clarify is this. Is it the policy of the government today that the production of hogs in western Canada should be maintained at the present level rather than increased, thereby making a greater percentage of the coarse grains available to eastern Canada? I ask that question because, in spite of what the last speaker said, I believe that we shall see an increase in the production of hogs in the west. I know that in my own part of the country all the farmers seem to be increasing the number of their brood sows once more, and I am wondering whether or not that will be a wise policy. Does the government think it is wise to bring about an increase in the production of hogs in western Canada during the next four or five years? Will the result be a glut; or would it be better to maintain the production of hogs there at present levels and allow more coarse grains to come to eastern Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: The policy of the government and of the Department of Agriculture is, the more hogs produced in Canada, the better for the farmers. Too many people are circulating the idea that we are producing these hogs for the purpose of feeding somebody. The purpose of the farmer is to make as much income as he can on his farm, while producing food. The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Calgary East that I had used figures and arguments to show that the farmer could make twenty-five per cent more by feeding his hogs in Alberta than by selling the grain. I did not produce any such arguments. I said there were advertisements over the radio in Alberta, by a farm organization, in which this statement was made. There were advertisements in Alberta newspapers, of which I have copies. In those advertisements the farm cooperative is saying to the farmer, "You can make twenty-five per cent more feeding your grain to hogs than by selling it. Feed hogs." Those are not my figures; they are the figures of the farm organization in Alberta.

On the other question, as to why hog production has been down, that has always been so obvious to every farmer in Canada that I cannot understand why even people who do not feed hogs should not understand it as well. The reason is that it takes grain to feed hogs; and I do not know of any better reason than the fact that there is not enough grain to feed any more hogs.

Mr. HARKNESS: There was always enough in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: There is not enough there if western Canada sells it. On the question of whether or not we want the western farmer to produce grain for the eastern farmer, the answer is definitely no. We want the western farmer to feed hogs on his own farm; at least we are suggesting that it would be a good thing for him to do so. We are not pleading with him to do it; we are simply saying to the western farmer that his own cooperative is saying, "It will give you twenty-five per cent more return, even as far away as Alberta, and it will give you a higher return the closer you get to the market, if you feed grain to hogs instead of selling the grain." That is what the farm organizations themselves say, and we repeat it, using their figure. After we have said that, however, if the farmer still continues to sell a considerable part of his feed grain, we shall not criticize him for doing so. After all, a great deal more is involved than merely the question of having the grain. A man must have labour, and he must be prepared to divide up his day in a different way from the way in which he would divide it up if he were selling grain. I said last week in Saskatoon, and I am going to repeat now, that I went west, as did many other farmers out there, because I had become tired of getting up at half-past four or five o'clock in the morning, milking from half a dozen to a dozen cows, feeding the pigs, getting a team of horses ready and out in the field by seven o'clock; then working until five o'clock in the evening, having my lunch and going back to the field again to work until sundown; then coming in and feeding the pigs again. That is why a lot of us went west. We felt that we could grow grain out there and would not need to milk the cows or feed the pigs.

Some of us kept to that opinion pretty well until 1942. Then we had a crop of coarse grains twice as large as any we ever grew before, with just as much wheat as we grew in the best years we ever had; and nobody wanted it. No one except Britain wanted the wheat, and Britain wanted 200,000,000 bushels of it. We produced 560,000,000 bushels in one year, and at the end of the season we had in the elevators 600,000,000 bushels for which we had no market, with another crop about to be marketed in August of 1943. Under those circumstances we said to the farmers, "If you want cash now, feed your grain to hogs and cattle. But if you can get along without cash now, keep the grain stored. Call it an ever-present granary, or whatever you like, but keep the grain stored either on the farm or in the elevators. At the end of the war you will be able to sell every bushel of it at a higher price than you have sold your grain for a long time." The farmer did just that. He fed an enormous quantity of pork and beef in 1943 and 1944 on grain he could not sell on the market. He could not get any price for grain at the time, except what the government gave him by way of allowance when he put it in the elevators. The government did not sell the wheat until years later.

Then someone says, "Well, why didn't we keep the ever-present granary?" There is not a member in this house who did not get up in 1945 and 1946, or who did not agree with those who did get up, insisting that this government ship every bushel of wheat, every bushel of oats and every bushel of barley we had in the country to Europe in order to feed starving people. There is no house of commons that would have permitted the government of any country, under the circumstances existing in 1945 and 1946, to keep grain in its bins and elevators. So of course the grain was shipped out to feed starving people, and you could not feed as many hogs in this country with our elevators empty and our bins on the farms empty, with only a month's supply of feed in the middle of the summer of 1945, about the same in 1946, and a little more at the present time. You could not produce any more hogs and cattle than have been produced; you could not produce any more dairy products than have been produced. I repeat that I do not understand why people keep on arguing the point. They are just as bad as the editor of the Free Press was in connection with the pigs. You cannot breed pigs in March and have them on the market in April of the same year; and you cannot finish pigs unless you have grain. We have not had the grain. Only this morning Mr. Kennedy made the announcement that, unless something unforeseen happens, unless something happens that has never happened before, Ontario will have only one-third of a crop of feed grain. Out west, fortunately, we have been able to get in our crop in fairly good condition, two weeks later than usual it is true, but it is not yet impossible for us to have a good crop. And to anyone who asks me in this house, "Are you going to plead with farmers out west to feed all the grain they grow this year", I say that so far as I am concerned, if the condition develops which Mr. Kennedy says is going to develop in Ontario, we shall not insist on any such thing. We shall ask the farmers of western Canada to help the farmers of eastern Canada to finish their live stock. And I have no doubt that when the western farmer requires support and assistance again, as he did in the thirties—if indeed he ever requires it again—because of a continuation of crop failures, the people of eastern Canada will be just as helpful to him as we shall ask the people of western Canada to be to Ontario this year, if there is a shortage of feed in Ontario.

Mr. HARKNESS: The first part of the minister's argument was one which personally, coming from the west, I resent very much. It actually came down to this: His statement really was that the farmer in the west is too lazy to feed hogs, and that that is why production has gone down. As a man from the west, I am surprised that the minister, who also comes from there, would make that argument. I am very much surprised, because in my opinion that is not the reason for it at all.

What the minister is trying to cover up is his own wrong oat and barley policy, a policy which convinced the farmer in the west that it paid him better to sell grain than it did to feed it to hogs. The farmers saw their neighbours feeding hogs with grain which they bought at ten or fifteen cents less than the western farmer could sell it for, or feed it for; and the result was that western farmers refused to feed their grain to hogs. They preferred to sell it.

In my opinion one of the reasons the farmers of western Canada are still not producing anything like the number of hogs they did produce is that they are still convinced, despite the advertising the minister has mentioned, that it pays them better to sell their grain than to feed it.

In other words, this government policy, so far as grain is concerned, is responsible to a large extent, and not the laziness of the farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Does he believe a man is lazy who does not wish to get up at half-past four o'clock in the morning and work until as late as ten-thirty o'clock at night?

Mr. MILLER: But they all do it.

Mr. GARDINER: But he does not need to be considered lazy if he does not want to do it.

Mr. HARKNESS: That does not enter into the matter at all. If the farmer of western Canada, as I know him, can secure twenty-five per cent more through feeding his grain to hogs, then he will certainly feed it, as soon as he is convinced that that is so. The whole thing is that he is not convinced of it. Whether it is so or not, I do not know. The minister has been most evasive about it. I suggested he had stated that farmers could make that much more. Then, however, he got up immediately and said that he did not say that.

Another argument he put up was that we did not have the grain. So far as the western Canadian farmers are concerned, they certainly had the grain. We might not have had it in Canada as a whole, but so far as the Alberta farmers are concerned, they had it. They could have fed it, and finished the hogs right there. The reason they did not do so was the government's coarse grain policy. The minister should be prepared to admit that it was his policy to a large extent which has driven the farmer—and particularly the farmer in Alberta—out of hog producing. He should not try to put the blame on the farmer for not being willing to get up early enough in the morning.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Chairman, usually I am a mild mannered man, and only rarely is that fact abused by some people. I had not intended to say anything in the general discussion of the minister's estimates. But when a few minutes ago he went out of his way to see if he could pick a scrap, I felt I should say something. And I want to tell him this much, that if he wants one we are here to give it to him.

No sooner had he resumed his seat after accusing some of us in this group of taking part in a deliberate plan which was not according to the best principles of the house, than those who agreed with him carried on the discussion.

Let me say this much, that the short speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia was just as much in order on this item as was anything we have heard since, and a good deal of what we heard before. I could point to a number of places in the discussion which has just concluded where the minister could have taken the same exception. After the hon. member for Assiniboia had spoken as briefly as possible in giving a general resume of the situation in respect of agriculture, he concluded his remarks by referring to one subject to which he had given special study. The minister thought that was the time to pick the quarrel.

We are just as pleased as anyone could be that we have an opportunity to discuss the estimates on agriculture with a man who has given considerable thought and attention to the department of which he is the head. As I have said in previous sessions, when I have complimented him, even though we do not always agree with him we are prepared to credit him with knowing his department. But we do object to his trying to tell us when and where we should question the administration of his department.

The minister referred to the reason a number of people had gone to the west. Let me say that I was born in the middle western states and I did not need to go west; I went north, along with my parents. The part of western Canada in which we settled, and in the area for many miles around, extending up into the district represented by the hon. member for Melfort, up into the Prince Albert district, into the northwestern part of the province, and right down into that part of the province represented by the minister himself, has never been a straight grain-growing proposition.

There are too many people with the false impression that farmers in western Canada are only grain growers. Ever since I have been in the area I have described, we have had mixed farming. During the years in which we opened up and developed that country, we produced enormous amounts of foodstuffs. We did not mind the hard work; we were prepared to put in long hours. But we did object when the rest of the nation was not prepared to give us a decent wage for the work we did.

I contend that that is where the great difficulty has been all these years. As I have said before in the house, even in the times of so-called wartime prosperity the farmers of this nation have not received a fair share of the national income. Even during the time when they were not receiving a fair share of the national income, no matter what branch of agriculture they are lending their efforts to, you find that in between there is no attempt made to have a proper relationship of the commodities that are produced.

I have contended all the time that we should have a system of parity prices which would give the farmers a fair share of the national income and provide a fair relationship between the prices of the things they have to buy and the things they have to sell. There must be a fair relationship between the various products the farmers produce. I contend that when the minister and his department lend their efforts to providing a fair and square deal for the farmers, when they make that parity price possible, then it will be found that the farmers will go to work and produce the things best suited for the farms that they have.

I contend that it would be foolish to urge the man who has a wheat farm and who possibly cannot afford to spend $1,000 to drill a well to obtain water to go into hog or cattle raising. In many parts of the west there is land more adaptable to the raising of coarse grains than to the raising of stock. The farmers have common sense enough to know what is the best thing to do with their own land if they are only given a decent chance. The trouble is that there is continuous jockeying, an effort to get the farmer to produce as much as he can for as little as you can get him to take for it.

The farmers have made up their minds that they are going to have a different deal from what they have had in the past. The estimates of the Department of Agriculture are the most important that we have to consider in this session. Whether it is considered on this first item or on the last item, in so far as I and my colleagues are concerned we are prepared to cooperate with the minister if he wants cooperation. But I contend that "cooperation" to be effective must be used both ways.

2. Publicity and extension division, $170,439.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is an increase of $15,635 in this item, and I notice on page 81 of the main estimates there is a new chief, press services. Can the minister say what this covers?

Mr. GARDINER: The greater part of the increased expenditures for publicity is in salaries, this totalling $20,829. There is a decrease in unemployment insurance, proficiency allowances and other payments which are down $7,694. Express, freight and cartage are up $500; supplies and materials are up $11,000; travelling is up $1,000, the net result being an increase of $25,635.

Mr. FRASER: Has the department asked the civil service, either this year or last year, for additional help in connection with publicity?

Mr. GARDINER: The increase is largely caused by the adjustment of salaries which was made last year when we had the different branches gone over.

Mr. FRASER: There is no new help in this section?

Mr. GARDINER: The details on page 81 show the number of persons employed in the different branches, and it is actually down two for this year.

Mr. FRASER: Does the department work with the Canadian information service? Do they help you at all?

Mr. GARDINER: It really works the other way; as a rule we help them by supplying information as to what conditions are.

Mr. FRASER: I noticed, in a return tabled, that $627 was provided for a broadcast, either this year or some time in the past. Does the department carry on any broadcasts or is that done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. GARDINER: We have no broadcasts, but we do supply information to the CBC for their farm broadcasts.

Mr. FRASER: Are you putting out any new pamphlets this year? I believe most of the ones you put out date back pretty far.

Mr. GARDINER: Publications which have been published, some for as long as fifty years, are rewritten from time to time and brought up to date. We have farmers' bulletins, household bulletins, technical bulletins, circulars and what we call other publications. There were 770,100 publications mailed in 1945-46 on personal requests and 363,402 mailed in bulk for redistribution; 1,753,037 copies of market reports were mailed on request and 8,993,831 copies of mimeographed, multigraphed and multilith jobs, comprising press releases, market information leaflets, et cetera.

Mr. FRASER: That would include your monthly reports?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: When I spoke during the budget debate on May 12 I suggested that either the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue put out a booklet to inform the farmers of the proper procedure to be followed in making out fairly accurate income tax returns. Would the minister consider putting out a booklet of that kind? When discussing the same question previously the minister referred to a number of expense items that could be included and he also enumerated other items that could go on the other side of the farmers' account.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the Economic Annalist does give a considerable part of that information. I would suggest that probably this is not the department that should be putting out information with regard to income tax or the manner in which the forms should be filled out. That is really the task of the national revenue department, and I am afraid that we would be exceeding our functions if we were to go into that field. The other night, when I was out west, I did put out what I would suggest is the proper procedure to be followed. If our farmers generally would do what some farmers do, keep a very simple record themselves, they could save themselves a lot of money. I am told that farmers are being charged from $5 to $25 to have these forms made out to prove that they do not need to pay income tax. There is a much simpler method of doing it than that. I know the difficulties. The trouble is that the farmer puts in long days. But if he could sit down each evening or once a week and put down what he has paid out and what he has taken in, and then glance at the list of items that are properly chargeable to expenses as indicated in the statement I made tonight, which is put out by the department from time to time, I would say that in ninety-nine out of a hundred cases the farmer himself would find out whether at the end of the year he would be liable for income tax. Most of them are $200 or $300 away from having the necessary income. They can determine with a system of accounting that is very simple whether they are in the income tax brackets, and I think that is the only way in which a farmer can save himself expense in connection with income tax returns. I did say this, that I was certain that if a farmer did that and sent in his statement of what his position was to the income tax authorities in his own district he would save the department the expense of sending out inspectors.

I did not quite finish the statement I was making a while ago and I should like to finish it now. I think the department has done the farmer a good turn in sending out twenty-five inspectors from the different offices in western Canada. I run into persons all over Canada, some of them members of this house, whom you just cannot convince that a farmer is not making enough to pay income tax. People hear stories about the farmer selling so many thousands of bushels of grain, so many cattle and so many hogs, and they conclude that the farmer must be in the income tax brackets. I do not know how they figure it out. The inspectors have gone out and proved to their own satisfaction that the farmer it not. That is a good thing for the farmer, and I think that the more often we repeat the facts that have been found by the inspector, the better. Eventually we may come to the conclusion that it does not pay to send out so many inspectors. An experienced inspector just requires to take a look at many of the farms to see that they could not make enough to pay income tax.

Mr. FAIR: I have already made my suggestion to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Agriculture, and perhaps the three departments will cooperate to put out this booklet. I am satisfied that the farmers are quite willing to pay their fair share of income tax, but I am not satisfied that the farmers should pay a tax on the basis on which it was levied during the years 1941 to 1945, and I am speaking from my own personal knowledge. If they were given the information in a small booklet it would not cost very much and you would have far better co-operation from the farmers and a lot less hard feeling, but of course that must go hand in hand with proper prices for the things the farmer has to sell.

Mr. GARDINER: We put out a booklet which the farmer can get for ten cents, and if he just fills in the columns and puts down the items weekly he can make a complete report.

Mr. FAIR: What is the name of that booklet?

Mr. GARDINER: The Farmer's Account Book.

Mr. HARKNESS: At page 81 of the details in the main estimates I find provision for a supervisor of race track betting. What does that fellow do? I have been intrigued by that detail for some time.

Mr. GARDINER: That gentleman is Mr. Higginson. I am told by those who have knowledge of horse racing, about which I know very little, that he is the best expert on horse racing in Canada. We get a considerable revenue from the pari-mutuels in connection with horse racing. Our department has the administration of that operation and Mr. Higginson has charge of it.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $3,000.

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Chairman, if I may revert to item 1, with the permission of the committee, are all the employees mentioned in the details given on page 81 dealing with problems concerning the country as a whole, or are they limited in their work to geographical sections of the country?

Mr. GARDINER: The first item deals with the administration of the department for the whole country.

Mr. HAMEL: My second question is this. Would the minister give the names of the officers from the deputy minister down to principal clerks? They are only about seven or eight of them.

Mr. GARDINER: I could give that information in a return. I have not the names here.

Mr. HAMEL: May I have the information tomorrow?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. We could get these names for the hon. member. I could give some of them offhand, but not all of them.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. BURTON: The details of item 3 for the advisory committee on agricultural services state that $3,000 is for miscellaneous services, including travelling expenses. I would ask the minister how many people are on this advisory committee and what their names are, if that is not too much trouble.

Mr. GARDINER: I put them on the record about two weeks ago when they were appointed; the names are all on Hansard.

Mr. BURTON: The same committee?

Mr. GARDINER: The same advisory committee. I can put them on again; I have them here.

Mr. BURTON: Are there as many as last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Is it the national committee on agricultural services? Which one is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. BURTON: The advisory committee on agricultural services, item 3.

Mr. GARDINER: The committee consists of the provincial ministers of agriculture as follows: Hon. F. H. Putnam, Victoria, British Columbia; Hon. D. B. MacMillan, Edmonton, Alberta; Hon. I. C. Nollett, Regina, Saskatchewan; Hon. D. L. Campbell, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Hon. T. L. Kennedy, Toronto, Ontario; Hon. Laurent Barré, Quebec, Quebec; Hon. A. C. Taylor, Fredericton, New Brunswick; Hon. A. W. Mackenzie, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Hon. W. F. A. Stewart, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

Then there is the national advisory committee on agricultural services which is as follows: H. Barton, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa, Chairman; W. R. Reek, acting president Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, Ontario; C. D. Graham, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Toronto, Ontario; Jules Simard, Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Quebec, Quebec, P.Q.; E. S. Archibald, director, Experimental Farms Service, Ottawa, Ontario; K. W. Neatby, director, Science Service, Ottawa, Ontario; A. M. Shaw, director, Marketing Service, Ottawa, Ontario; R. S. Hamer, Director, Production Service, Ottawa, Ontario; L. C. McOuat, General Agricultural Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal, P.Q. Mr. McOuat has recently died, and someone will replace him. C. G. O'Brien, General Secretary, Agricultural Institute of Canada, Ottawa; W. H. Cook, National Research Council, Ottawa, Ontario; S. R. N. Hodgins, General Executive Assistant, Ottawa, Ontario, Secretary; J. B. Munro, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Victoria, B.C.; F. M. Clement, Dean, Faculty of Agriculture, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, B.C.; O. S. Longman, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Edmonton, Alberta; R. D. Sinclair, Dean, Faculty of Agriculture, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta; R. Newton, Director, Alberta Research Foundation, Edmonton, Alberta; M. E. Hartnett, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Regina, Saskatchewan; L. E. Kirk, Dean, Faculty of Agriculture, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; J. H. Evans, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Winnipeg, Manitoba; J. W. G. MacEwan, Dean, Faculty of Agriculture, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba; H. B. Speakman, Director, Ontario Research Foundation, Toronto, Ontario; A. L. MacNabb, Ontario Veterinary College, Guelph, Ontario; W. H. Brittain, Dean, Macdonald College, P.Q.; M. l'Abbe L. P. Garon, Director, Ecole Superieure d'Agriculture, Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, P.Q.

Rev. Fr. Leopold, Director, Institut Agricole d'Oka, La Trappe, Quebec; J. K. King, Deputy Minister, Department of Agriculture, Fredericton, N.B.; F. W. Walsh, Department of Agriculture, Halifax, N.S.; W. R. Shaw, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Charlottetown, P.E.I.; G. Bouchard, Assistant Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa, Ontario; T. W. Grindley, Secretary, Canadian Wheat Board, Winnipeg, Manitoba; D. G. MacKenzie, Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada, Winnipeg, Manitoba; J. S. McGowan, Director, Department of Colonization and Agriculture, Canadian National Railways, Montreal P.Q.; J. B. Rutherford, Chief, Agricultural Branch, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa, Ontario.

Mr. BURTON: How often does the committee to which the minister has referred meet in a year?

Mr. GARDINER: They both meet at the same time, once a year.

Mr. BURTON: Judging by the imposing list which the minister has just read, I would suggest that the gentlemen are not overpaid or overfed, because the amount set aside for their expenses appears to be skimpy. The minister is sure they are worth as much as they get.

Mr. GARDINER: They are already paid; we pay their expenses while they are here.

Item agreed to.

Administrative service—

4. Contributions to Empire Bureaux, $86,139.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is an increase in the contributions to empire bureaux of some $38,000. Can the minister explain the organization and its functions?

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that the leader of the house desires to have the committee rise at 10.50 o'clock for some other business, probably we should leave the item until we meet again. It would take some little time to go over it all.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move that the house do now adjourn. Some hon. gentlemen have been asking whether the house will sit on the king's birthday. It is the intention of the government to ask the house to sit on June 9, because we believe the finest respect we can pay to His Majesty the King is to be about the king's and the country's business.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, June 4, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING POLISH VETERANS—DISTRIBUTION OF THOSE ADMITTED

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I table a copy of order in council P.C. 1746, by which the government has increased to 4,500 the number of single Polish veterans to be admitted to Canada. In the first movement last year 2,876 of these veterans came here and have been settled on the farms. Recently 481 more arrived and proceeded to western Canada. They arrived on May 25, according to the memorandum dated June 3 which I have before me. Of this number 187 proceeded to Manitoba and 282 to Alberta. Word has been received that all the veterans in Alberta have been placed, and we expect word at any time that all the veterans in Manitoba have been placed also. That gives some idea of the expedition with which we sometimes move.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HOSPITAL FACILITIES

Mr. BLAIR:

1. Is there a shortage of hospital bed accommodation in Canada at the present time? If so, how long has this shortage been apparent?
2. How many hospital beds for short-term illnesses, convalescent cases and chronically ill are estimated to be required to meet present estimated needs?
3. Can national health insurance be implemented with present hospital facilities?
4. Is there a shortage of nursing, technical and hospital maintenance staff in Canada? If so, how long has this shortage been apparent?
5. How many nurses, technicians, ward-aides and maintenance workers are estimated to be required for present estimated needs?
6. Can national health insurance be implemented with present hospital personnel available?
7. What is the average ratio of patients to doctors in each province and their distribution in rural and urban areas?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. In mental hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoria, hospitals for chronically ill, hospitals for acute diseases and convalescent hospitals there is a definite shortage of beds.

The shortage of beds in mental hospitals, sanatoria, and for chronic and convalescent cases has existed over a period of years, but as regards hospitals for acute diseases the shortage has become acute only since 1940.

2. For hospitals for acute diseases, it is estimated that there is need of an additional 8,000 beds to meet present needs, as calculated on the percentage of bed occupancy in those hospitals which in 1945 was 73·0 per cent.

As there were only ten convalescent hospitals in Canada in 1945 with a bed capacity of 800, and 17 hospitals for the chronically ill with 3,280 beds, there is great need of an increase in the number of hospitals in these two classes in order to release the beds now occupied by these classes of patients in hospitals for acute diseases.

According to hospital authorities beds for convalescent patients should form ten per cent of total beds in public hospitals. On this basis there should be an additional 5,000 beds for use of convalescent patients and 3,000 for the chronically ill.

In 1945 there were 13,614 beds in tuberculosis institutions, and as the minimum standard of beds is based on three beds per death, at least 5,000 more beds are needed to meet present needs throughout Canada.

The number of beds reported for mental hospitals in 1945 was 45,124, while the number of patients in residence on December 31, 1945, was 48,056 (exclusive of patients on parole and in boarding homes, whose number amounted to 4,190). It is estimated that a minimum of 6,000 beds is needed to reduce the present overcrowding in mental hospitals.

Not including private hospitals which had a bed capacity in 1945 of 4,113 beds and dominion hospitals under the departments of national health and welfare, veterans affairs and national defence the total of beds in all other hospitals as on December 31, 1945, was as follows:

	Beds
Acute Diseases Hospitals	58,940
Convalescent Hospitals	800
Chronically Ill	3,280

3. Integral parts of the proposals for a comprehensive health insurance programme to be introduced by progressive stages are the planning and organizational grants. These are to enable the provinces to establish staffs to study and report on local requirements in the field of medical services generally. The following paragraphs appear on page 36 of the Proposals of the Government of Canada, August, 1945:

"In the dominion proposals outlined at the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, it is recognized that the provision of complete health insurance services would require a considerable extension in hospital facilities throughout the country. Much of this expansion would be required even for the first stage specified. It is also recognized that this expansion would be desirable quite aside from health insurance in order to provide the proper facilities for treatment and research.

To make a hospital extension programme less burdensome to the provincial governments and to local communities, it is proposed that the federal government should provide loans to the provincial governments entering health insurance agreements, and through provincial governments to municipalities and other organizations, for necessary expansion of hospital facilities, at a rate of interest equal to or only slightly above the cost of such loans to the dominion, and that the interest and amortization would be payable out of the hospital care benefit under the health insurance grant, or out of the tuberculosis grant, or the mental health grant, as the case may be."

4. Yes, increasing since 1940.

5. The latest estimate of the Canadian nurses association, September 1946, is as follows:

Hospital requirements	7,000
Private duty requirements	1,200
Public health requirements	500
Total	8,700

There are no figures available for ward-aides except for Ontario, the estimated requirement there being 178.

Other figures are not available.

6. See answer to question 3. The statement under the heading (a) Planning and Organization Grant on page 31 of the Proposals of the Government of Canada, August, 1945, recognizes the necessity of training additional personnel for the implementation of health insurance.

3. What power companies other than the Beauharnois L. H. & P. Company divert water from Lake St. Francis, and what is the amount of water diverted by each?

4. To what extent would the increase of the amount of water diverted for the purpose of developing electric energy, interfere with the future use of the Beauharnois canal for the purpose of navigation?

5. Will an increase over a certain point in the amount of water diverted for the development of electric energy, affect the use of the canal for navigation purposes?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. The Beauharnois canal is approximately 15 miles long, 3,200 feet wide at the water line over most of its length and has a depth varying from 27 feet to less than 10 feet. The 600-feet wide navigation channel is excavated to 27 feet over all but about 1 mile of the total length.

2. A statement showing the average daily flow through the power canal is furnished the department once a week by the power company. The average flow is checked by the department's engineer once a month.

3. (i) Provincial Light, Heat & Power Company.—Authorized to divert from the Soulanges canal "all the surplus water flowing through the said canal which may from time to time be available after all the requirements of the canal, whether for navigation, for lighting, for power, or other purposes in connection with the operation or maintenance of the canal have been fully satisfied." The maximum velocity to be set up in the canal is limited by the terms of the lease to 1·25 miles per hour which limits the diversion of water to approximately 3,400 cubic feet per second; (ii) Montreal Light, Heat & Power Consolidated.—Authorized to divert 75,000 cubic feet per second; (iii) Canadian Light & Power Company.—Authorized to divert through the old Beauharnois canal (the old navigation canal abandoned for that purpose in 1900), "all waters now or hereafter passing through the said canal." The actual diversion is limited to approximately 6,000 cubic feet per second.

Note: The actual amount of water diverted varies from time to time.

4. No interference with the future use of the Beauharnois canal for the purpose of navigation will be caused if the total amount of water diverted for developing electric energy is limited to the inflow into Lake St. Francis, less whatever water is required from time to time for navigation purposes.

INDIA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING SELF-GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to give the house a full statement with respect to the situation in India?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a tall order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I would hesitate very much even to pretend to be able to make a full statement with respect to the situation in India. I believe it is one of the most critical and delicate situations existing in any part of the world today. However I was asked yesterday by the press if I had any comment to make with respect to the statement of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom as to what was proposed between the British government and India. I did give the press a statement, and I think perhaps I could not answer my hon. friend's question better than to give the house just what I said at that time. I said this:

> The peoples of India may be assured of the sympathetic understanding and good will of the government and people of Canada in their efforts to achieve self-government.
> It is of the utmost importance to the future peace and prosperity of other countries, as well as of India, that this end should be peacefully achieved.
> It may be taken for granted that once the Indian people as well as their leaders, have reached agreement on their future political status, they will find Canada generously predisposed towards self-government. The result may be to enlarge the number of states within the British commonwealth.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think the house should associate itself with that sentiment, which says in effect that Canada would be pleased to do everything she can to welcome into the family of the commonwealth the nation which we hope will now emerge in India.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. An answer was given on Monday with respect to this same matter. I was told by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we had a representative in India now, and that we would be informed if anything happened. Now we find that everything was consented to by the government of Canada; is that correct? Is the statement made by the minister at page 3708 of Hansard a correct statement?—because at that time the minister indicated the government had no knowledge of the matter at all. Surely the government must appreciate that the House of Commons cannot know anything about it unless it is informed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) may wish to say a word about this. If I understood my friend the hon. member for Broadview correctly he said there had been a statement to the effect that everything that had taken place in respect of developments in India had been consented to by the government of Canada. He wishes to know, as I understood him, whether that is correct and, if so, why the house was not informed. May I reply by saying that our government was kept informed by the government of the United Kingdom with respect to certain negotiations between the government of the United Kingdom and representatives from India. After what has now been made public as the agreement reached between them, our government was asked if we wished to make any comment. It would not be correct to say that we had been consulted during the negotiations because we were not consulted, but we were asked if we wished to make any comment. I have no exception to take to that method of procedure, because I do not think any other method would have been possible in the circumstances.

The reply which I have just given to the house will indicate the attitude which our government took in replying to the government of the United Kingdom as to what Canada's position would likely be in the event of new dominions being formed in India as a result of the negotiations that have been taking place.

Mr. CHURCH: It is going to cause civil war there, because they will not be ready for dominion status for years.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out to the Prime Minister that the Canadian Press dispatch says that the Canadian government did approve the changed status in India.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what dispatch my hon. friend has seen or has in mind, but I noticed when I picked up the morning paper that there was a statement to the effect that some high official had said that the government of Canada had been consulted. Speaking to one of my colleagues I drew attention to the fact that the particular word "consulted" had been used. I stated that that was what had repeatedly been said in regard to previous negotiations affecting the relations between different parts of the empire, but that what was really meant was that we had been kept informed of developments and had been asked if there was any comment we wish to make. This, however, was not until after the announcement had been made of the results of earlier negotiations. That to my mind is something different from consultation. As a matter of fact I doubt if it would have been possible for the government of the United Kingdom in making the arrangements with its dependency India to have tried to carry on those negotiations by consultation with the dominions.

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the house will allow me to supplement the remarks I made in reply to the hon. member for Broadview. I think it is important that the house should understand exactly what is expected of dominion governments in matters of consultation with the government of the United Kingdom. I find that the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered a question asked on February 10 by the hon. member for Broadview with reference to possible negotiations concerning the Suez canal and Egypt, and the reply brought in the attitude and the relations of governments of the commonwealth in dealing with matters of this kind.

Again on February 24 the hon. member for Broadview asked:

Can the government inform the house of the present situation in India and Palestine?

Other questions were asked. One of the answers made at that time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was as follows:

The present situation in India was outlined in a statement made on February 20 by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. The present situation in Palestine was outlined in a statement made in the United Kingdom parliament on February 18.

Commonwealth governments keep each other informed on matters of foreign policy in accordance with the practice described by Mr. Attlee, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in the House of Commons in London, on May 8, 1946, as follows:

Then follows the paragraph which I wish particularly to draw to the attention of hon. members. It is the statement of Mr. Attlee, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, made in the House of Commons in London on May 8, 1946. He said:

It is our practice and our duty as members of the British commonwealth to keep other members of the commonwealth fully and continuously informed of all matters which we are called upon to decide, but which may affect commonwealth interests. The object is to give them an opportunity of expressing their views in confidence, if they so desire. These views are taken fully into account, but the decision must be ours, and the other governments are not asked, and would not wish, to share the responsibility for it. Dominion governments follow the same practice.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say:

This practice has been followed with regard to United Kingdom policy in India and Palestine.

I understand that on Monday the same answer was given to the hon. member for Broadview by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to a similar question.

PORK AND BEANS

PERMIT FOR PROCESSING AND PACKING—SHORTAGE OF TIN—TOPPER INDUSTRIES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and I am sorry that

I did not send him notice of it. It arises out of a press dispatch which in my opinion casts considerable reflection upon his own good judgment. I should like him to comment upon this. The press dispatch bears the date line New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, June 3, and it appeared in today's Ottawa Journal. It states that the minister had sent a telegram to a branch of the Canadian Legion there to the effect that his department had refused permission to a firm which employs 60 people to go ahead with the processing and packing of pork and beans. This firm was previously packing chickens.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that a question asked on the orders of the day should be to the point.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to ask the minister if this press dispatch has been called to his attention and if it is true that in that telegram he refused a small industry which is particularly needed in the province, an industry which had been put out of business previously, permission to get back into business?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): A wire was sent to Mr. Fox who is president of the Legion in New Glasgow. A certain concern in New Glasgow, Topper Industries Limited, had obtained a permit to can chicken. They acquired a considerable quantity of seven ounce tin cans for that purpose. As the house knows, tin is in short supply and tin cans are strictly under allocation by the proper agency of the wartime prices and trade board. For one reason or another it was found that it was not commercially feasible to can and sell chicken, and an application was made to the board to use these cans for the purpose of putting up pork and beans. Permits for the canning of pork and beans have been strictly controlled for a number of years because of the shortage of tins and because of the large quantities of dried beans which we have to export to the United Kingdom. Manufacturers who were canning this particular product in 1941 have been held down to 50 per cent of their previous production and so far as I know no new canners have been allowed to go into this particular business. Everybody would like to go into the canning of pork and beans because there is a ready market and they can be easily sold, but there are not sufficient tins to enable that to be done. As I say, there has been considerable control over people putting up this particular product and the wartime prices and trade board has had to refuse constantly applications of this kind.

There was no discrimination in this case. I gave the matter careful personal consideration because I would have liked to have been able to ask to have this permission granted. However, I found that it could not be done after similar permission had been asked elsewhere and been refused. I have written to the gentleman in New Glasgow explaining the circumstances fully. That is the story. There has been no discrimination against this particular industry. I would have liked to see them get permission to do it, but it just could not be done. Incidentally, a seven ounce tin is not suitable for the canning of pork and beans.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the fact that the press statement states that this company has 400,000 tins on hand as well as the necessary beans and molasses? They claim that permission was refused because they were not doing business in 1941. They claim also that their chicken canning business went out of operation because they were refused an export permit.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have given an explanation. I went into the situation very carefully. I am fully aware of the circumstances, but the same claim could be made by dozens, or probably a hundred other canners throughout Canada. That is the situation. We cannot issue permits for the further canning of pork and beans for the reason I have given.

POSTAL SERVICE

AIR MAIL TO TELEGRAPH CREEK, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General of which I have given him notice. It arises from a telegram received this morning from Telegraph Creek, British Columbia. They have not received any of April's mail and no air mail has been received since April 1. Is there any way that the Post Office Department can speed up the delivery of this mail as it is essential to this summer's business?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): A copy of the question was given to me today in my office. I am making immediate inquiry and will answer later.

MEAT RATIONING

INQUIRY AS TO SUSPENSION FOR JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. B. BARRETT (Norfolk): I would ask the Minister of Finance if he is ready to answer a question I asked a few days ago regarding the suspension of meatless day regulations on July 1.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The matter is still being considered. I hope to be able to make a statement in a few days.

Mr. FRASER: Before July 1?

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 177, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. JAENICKE: I presume that General Gibson was appointed under the amendment to the act in 1945 and that he is to be the commissioner. Would the minister state the qualifications of the new commissioner already appointed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No commissioner has already been appointed.

Mr. JAENICKE: Was he not appointed under the amendment of 1945?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. JAENICKE: I think we should know his qualifications.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is difficult to give a complete statement of any person's qualifications. I do not know just what General Gibson's life history has been. He is a barrister and solicitor of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He practised law in Toronto, and he was in the army during the war, where he displayed, so far as my relations with him disclosed, excellent judgment and executive ability. I do not know what to say on the military side, of course, because I would not be qualified to judge, but he is a man who I think impresses everybody with his breadth of outlook and his good judgment. He has a certain humane and liberal type of mind. I cannot say very much more than that. Those who have come in contact with him, the associations of Canadians who are interested in criminology, penal reform and prisoners' aid, seem to think well of him and speak highly of him.

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. JAENICKE: Was he engaged in an actual theatre of war or was he retained in Canada in an administrative capacity, and if so, in what capacity?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am unable to answer that question. When I knew him he had a highly responsible position at national defence headquarters, but there again I cannot say what his executive responsibilities were. I came in contact with him from time to time, and I know he had a very responsible position there.

Mr. GREEN: The minister yesterday made a short statement. If he will remember, when the resolution was up for consideration, he promised to make a statement about several different phases of this problem. For example, at page 2683 of Hansard he was asked:

> Will the minister give us in some detail what his plan is for improving the penitentiary system?

His answer was:

> I think it would be more appropriate to do that at a later stage.

Again, at page 2686, he was asked about classification, segregation and after care, and in particular about the Borstal system. He said:

> At a later stage I shall be prepared to discuss the Borstal system, and how far it is possible for the dominion government to do anything in the application of that system here in Canada. The whole problem is complicated by the division of responsibility between the federal and provincial governments, but probably it will not be impossible to apply certain features of the Borstal system, even in connection with some federal institutions.

At page 2687 he was asked how far the commissioner would be going in carrying out the recommendations that he had made in his report, and the minister replied that he would have to make a statement on that at a later day. There were also questions about calling a conference of the dominion and the provinces, and about giving aid to the prisoners' aid societies, and the minister said in respect to both these matters that he would make a statement later. Could he deal with these different aspects of the problem today?

Mr. ILSLEY: What I had in mind was doing it on the penitentiary estimates rather than on this bill. This is a simple bill, as I have said. The principle of this bill can be summed up in just a sentence or two. I would prefer to discuss most of those matters further with the commissioner after he has been appointed commissioner of penitentiaries. Thus far that is not his position. He has prepared a report which was placed on the table of the house, and in that report it is recommended that in due course the construction of an additional penal institution in the province of Quebec be proceeded with, where the principles of the Borstal system in so far as possible would be applied. The division of constitutional responsibility as I understand it is something like this. Under section 92 of the British North America Act gaols and reformatories in and for the province are under the jurisdiction of the province, and by section 91 penitentiaries are under the jurisdiction of the dominion. If the dominion were to construct and administer an institution which is not a penitentiary it would have to be one which would not come within the words "in and for a province." It would have to be an institution which extended to more than one province. Within these limitations it is thought that it would be possible to undertake the administration and control of reformatory institutions. I take it that these Borstal institutions could be described as reformatories; I do not think that they can properly be described as penitentiaries. Of course the situation is complicated by the fact that simply because the dominion may have the power to administer reformatories, provided the scope of their operation is extended to more than one province, it does not mean that they should do so if they are to duplicate the work of provincial institutions directed to a similar object. Therefore I am sure it would be necessary to work more closely in cooperation with the provinces.

The only institution as to which there is any degree of definiteness about the plans is the one mentioned for French-speaking convicts. I gather from what my hon. friend says that the province of Quebec is making plans for a reformatory institution. If there is a duplication there that is something which would have to be considered between the dominion and the provincial authorities so that we would not be covering the same ground.

With regard to the prisoners' aid societies, General Gibson came to the conclusion, after making a study of plans for after care, that the simple and probably the most practical plan for providing for that care was by financial assistance to prisoners' aid societies. From conversations with him my impression is that they are not far enough advanced; that is, they are not quite in a position to establish that their activities would be effective, that their activities are the kind of activities that we would want to assist them in financially. When I say that the financial plans are indefinite I mean that the matter of finances, as I said before, has to be authorized by the governor in council and by the treasury board; but so far as I am concerned I would be disposed to accept and act on, as a very practical measure of advance, of progress, the report which I secured from General Gibson and which was placed before the house some time ago. Without reflecting upon the Archambault report, I think this report is a more practical one than the scheme for an over-all inclusive centralization and an elaborate organization. The Gibson report is the report that I think we should proceed on for the time being, and I would recommend that we do so.

Mr. GREEN: I notice that by section 1 of this bill there is to be added to section 2 of the Penitentiary Act the words "prison reformatories." I suppose that is because the department have in mind setting up the Borstal system.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is based upon the theory that we can deal only with penitentiaries. For the reasons that I have stated it may not be strictly true. It may be that we have jurisdiction also over penal institutions which are not penitentiaries, provided that they are not penal institutions in and for a province. I think this section is based upon the safer ground that we can administer only penitentiaries. This gives the governor in council power to designate certain prisons, prison reformatories and public institutions as penitentiaries.

Mr. GREEN: The minister thinks it would be impossible to establish the Borstal system without some arrangement having been made between the dominion and the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I am sure that we could do that. Apart from any constitutional power we should do that for the purpose of avoiding duplication.

Mr. GREEN: Will the government be calling such a conference at an early date?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have in mind no plans for such a conference. My recollection is that some such conference is suggested in General Gibson's report, but there is another conference which it seems to me should be held first, namely, a conference of wardens which is recommended in the report. There has been no conference of wardens for a long time. I think it should be held at an early day.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to make one comment on the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Like him, I am disappointed that the minister has decided that more extensive remarks by him should be made when the estimates come up, and I venture to hope that we shall not find that it is hurried or crowded, because I do feel that we want what I might call a full dress speech from the minister on this subject. It is a matter in which a great many people in this country are interested, and a great many should be interested and will be interested if it is given the prominence that it should have.

There is one further comment that I should like to make. I share with the minister the feeling that General Gibson's report was a good one, but I suggest that it was a kind of appendix to the Archambault report, because it really took certain things out of the Archambault report as the immediate objective. I would hope that the result will not be that we accept the Gibson report and shove the other report in the background. I hope when the minister speaks that the people of this country will have from him what I submit we very much want, namely, a statement as to what the real attitude of the government is on this question and how earnestly it intends to press forward with the reform that has been so long recommended.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want the house to expect too much from the minister on the estimates, or too much in the way of a blueprint, because the matter will have to be worked out by the commissioner, and I do not want the house to discount what has been done already. The report that we placed on the table in February covers a great many subjects. I think that I am going a considerable distance when I say that I am prepared to support the recommendations in the report. I do not know just how far I am expected to go on the estimates or how detailed I should be. Of course, I understand that the further I can go the better so far as giving information to the house is concerned; but I do not want the house to expect too much.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not trying to tie the minister to a lot of detail, but I really want a statement from him as to the objectives which he is pursuing. We know that it cannot all be achieved over night.

Mr. MacNICOL: I for one will be tremendously disappointed if the federal authorities cannot introduce in their penitentiaries some programme for the reclamation of what I called yesterday first offenders who are sent to the penitentiary—I am not referring now to persons committed to gaols in the provinces. The minister has not explained to me why the Borstal system canot be put into full operation for the reclamation of those who are sent to Kingston penitentiary for anywhere from two to five years. I cannot understand why it cannot be done. There has been a delay of about eight years in introducing this new programme. If nothing is going to come out of it in the way of reclamation of early prisoners—if first offenders is not the correct name—those who are sentenced to a penitentiary for the first time for two, three or four years, I shall be greatly disappointed. Did I understand the minister to say that such a programme cannot be introduced into the penitentiaries? It might necessitate one penitentiary being selected for that type of criminal. A conference of the provinces is not necessary.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there are variations of this Borstal system. Some institutions are more restrictive than others. It is for offenders between sixteen and twenty-three years of age who have been convicted two or three times before. That is the type. That is what I read in the Archambault report.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a long time ago; it is ten years ago.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not too old. The system was in operation then, and that is the system. I believe first offenders are sent to a different type of reformatory. The hon. gentleman asks whether we can just pick out that class of offenders and, if they are sentenced to a long enough term, treat them in institutions set up for the purpose. After the matter was looked into it was thought that we could make a start on it in the province of Quebec; but if that province is itself setting up a similar type of institution perhaps we shall have to take that fact into account.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I have in mind is the reclamation of a young man. He does not need to be twenty-one, nineteen or eighteen to commit a crime serious enough to be sentenced to a penitentiary for over two years; it may be for three or four years, depending on the offence. What are we going to do in this programme to reclaim these boys; those who have never been in prison before? They are there for the first time, but their crime was sufficiently serious to necessitate their being sent to the penitentiary. They may have been convicted of armed robbery or something of that kind.

Mr. JEAN: I think that is what is proposed to be done by the Gibson report. We propose to start in that way. But first offenders, if they are not sentenced to the penitentiary, are under provincial jurisdiction. In the province of Quebec there are reformatory institutions for those young offenders. As far as we are concerned here, we contemplate doing something for these young offenders, putting them in some other institution and beginning with the application of the Borstal system.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand from the hon. member that he is referring to some convict who has been sentenced to the penitentiary for more than two years?

Mr. JEAN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is under the federal government.

Mr. JEAN: Yes, that is under the federal government.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not pursue it further. I myself have visited a number of these prisons. What I suggest to the minister is that a competent official be sent forthwith to England with instructions to make a survey of all the prisons using the Borstal system. There you will find prisoners who are sentenced to more than two years, which are the type that go into our penitentiaries here.

Apart from that, I was going to ask two or three questions under (f). I presume all the instructors mentioned under (f), which include bakers, blacksmiths and so forth, are of the type we have now in our penitentiaries. Have we not all those now in our penitentiaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: In connection with such employees may I ask the following questions? I am not particular whether I get an answer now or not. I will just read them as they are written out here:

1. What, if any, are the civil service regulations respecting applicants for appointment to the civil service who have criminal records?

2. If there are no such regulations, are such applicants accorded the same rights as others?

3. Are applicants required to disclose whether they have criminal records; if so, for what purpose?

4. What is the policy and practice in this respect in relation to government positions outside the Civil Service Act?

After all, somebody has to give jobs to those who are released from prison. I myself have spent many hours trying to find jobs for men who have been let out of different types of penal institutions. If they cannot get a job and an opportunity to earn their living, they will go back to what they were into before, or worse. I have obtained many positions for men of that type, and the vast majority of them have made good.

I have asked four questions, but they do not need to be answered now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not in a position to answer those questions. I do not know what the rules of the civil service commission are.

Mr. MacNICOL: An answer at some future time will suit me just as well.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no doubt the Department of Justice is sincere in trying to improve our penal system. The whole question is whether the legislation now before us is going to effect any important improvement. I think the question asked by the hon. member for Kindersley requires a little more attention than the minister gave to it. It is not a question of the qualifications of General Gibson. I doubt whether any individual could possess all the qualifications required for the performance of the duties he will have to perform. No doubt he is a competent executive. No doubt he is an honest and able man. But he is not likely to be a psychiatrist, and he is not likely to be a philosopher. He is not likely to know a great deal about the social background from which crime emerges, and would not be in a position to make decisions either with respect to general policy or with respect to individuals who may come under his attention. I think it is important that there should be a commission rather than an individual, so that we may have represented on that commission all these important sciences and the whole question may be considered in its fullest scope. I think that is, in the main, what this legislation lacks. Has the minister given his last word with regard to enlarging that commission?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That matter has been fully considered, both by myself and by the government, and we decided that this was the most efficient way in which to set the commission up.

Mr. JAENICKE: I understood the minister to contend that if a man is convicted and sentenced to less than two years, even under the criminal code, he must be sent to the provincial prison.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. JAENICKE: Surely we could establish our own prisons to which persons could be committed who had been found guilty of violations of the criminal code or some other federal law. I know we do not wish to duplicate these prisons, but as far as the constitutional question is concerned, surely we could establish our own prisons for these people who are convicted under federal law. Is that not the true situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: We could take the two year rule out? Is that what the hon. member means?

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That if we wanted to we could amend the criminal code?

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: We could do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Commissioner.

Mr. McKAY: As I understand it this section amends the Penitentiary Act, 1939, to provide for the appointment of a commissioner of penitentiaries and two deputy commissioners, who are to perform such duties as are assigned to them by the commissioner. In other words the commissioner is to be in complete charge of our penal institutions and the deputies, if I read the act correctly, are to be responsible to the commissioner and not to parliament. This change in the act of 1939 fails to follow the recommendations of the Archambault royal commission, which suggested that a commission be set up in Canada similar to that which operates in Great Britain. There the prison commission is composed of a chairman and two commissioners, one of whom is an administrator while the other is a medical expert. Each member in turn is responsible to the British parliament for the work of his department, and is not responsible to the chairman of the commission. This section of our act leaves the responsibility of operating our penal system in the hands of one man. It is indeed a very heavy responsibility. At page 342 of the report of the royal commission to investigate the penal system of Canada I note the following comment:

> In our present system the problem of penal administration is too large in scope and too serious in results to be left in the hands of one man.

The report made by that commission is considered by penologists to be an excellent piece of work. I am no authority on the subject, but I have read what others have said. These men were experts in their own fields. They must have been qualified or the government would not have appointed them in the first place. Their report was based on experience and information obtained by visiting penal institutions not only in Canada but other countries as well. This amendment is based on the report of one man; that is, the present commissioner of penitentiaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, he did not recommend that the board be reduced to one man.

Mr. McKAY: That may be so, Mr. Chairman, but the fact remains that the Archambault commission did recommend that the penitentiary commission be set up on the lines of the commission in Great Britain. In view of that fact I feel that an attempt is being made here, as it has been made throughout this whole bill, to sidetrack the recommendations of the Archambault commission; and I feel that any amendment to the Penitentiary Act should be in keeping with the recommendations of that commission, because I believe these men made a thorough study of the situation and spent a good deal of time on that study. I cannot conceive of one man devoting such a short time to the study of penal institutions and submitting to the minister a report which would be accepted so readily, unless there is some reason for it; and I suggest the reason is that the recommendations of the Archambault royal commission did not meet with the approval of the government. Therefore I must register my protest against this contemplated change, and I shall certainly vote against it.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to direct attention to subsection 4, which provides that the commissioner and the deputy commissioners shall be paid such salaries as are approved by the governor in council. I am not so much interested in the salaries of the heads of the branch, and then working down; I would like to start at the bottom and work up. I have in mind the junior officials of the penitentiary branch. I hold in my hand a copy of the Gibson report, in which at page 9 I find this statement:

> As a result of increases granted by the government in 1945 and the recent incorporation of the cost of living bonus in the permanent salaries of the lower brackets, the pay of prison guards now has a range of $1,704-$2,004 per annum.

Then listen to this:

> There has not, however, been a proportionate increase in the middle and higher ranges of salaries of penitentiary employees, and in your commissioner's opinion a revision of salary rates is necessary to extend to these groups a similar proportionate increase and to provide a rate of remuneration that will attract to and retain in the service the necessary qualified senior officers, professional personnel and trade instructors required for the efficient administration of the penitentiaries and the carrying out of the reforms contemplated by the royal commission's report. This recommendation has already been submitted for consideration in connection with the survey of salaries in the government service now being carried out by officials of the treasury board.

Can the right hon. gentleman inform the committee whether those recommendations have been put into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they have, but I am not sure. The salary scale now is as follows. An officer entering the penitentiary service as a guard now receives an initial salary of $1,740 per annum, rising by annual increases to $2,040, as compared with a range of $1,200 to $1,500 prior to 1945. Provision has been made for a higher grade of guard, representing twenty per cent of the total, who may receive salaries up to $2,280 per annum. A corresponding increase for all grades of the service has been authorized. For example, keepers now range from $2,220 to $2,580; chief keepers from $2,700 to $3,300; instructors from $2,100 to $2,580; chief trade instructors from $2,700 to $3,300; deputy wardens from $3,600 to $4,500, and wardens from $4,800 to $6,000. These new rates came into effect from January 1, 1947.

Mr. KIDD: What date was that put into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: They came into effect as from January 1, 1947, and they were put into effect by order in council P.C. 66/1050 of March 22, 1947.

Mr. TUSTIN: Has there been any change in the hours of labour of these guards? They used to be on two shifts, and I wondered if that had been changed to three shifts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get that information for the hon. gentleman and give it to him on the penitentiary estimates.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Application of Civil Service Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to congratulate the minister on the fact that subsection (1) of section 13 provides that the provisions of the Civil Service Act shall apply to all officers, clerks and employees on the staff of the commission. Of late all our acts have not given the civil service commission the right to make the lower appointments.

Mr. ILSLEY: To be fair I think the congratulations are due my predecessor, because that was a provision of the act formerly.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I observe that there is a definite difference between subsection (1) and subsection (2) of section 13. They read:

> . . . the provisions of the Civil Service Act shall apply to all officers, clerks and employees on the staff of the commissioner.
> (2) The provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to the commissioner, deputy commissioner, assistant commissioners and all officers, clerks and employees employed in the penitentiaries.

In one instance the act applies only to the staff of the commissioner, whereas in the other instance the superannuation act applies to everyone connected with the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Transfer of convicts to reformatory.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the significance of this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing new in it. I would have to look into the Penitentiary Act to give a full answer. This amendment simply substitutes the word "commissioner" for "commissioners".

Sections 8, 9 and 10 agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

ASSOCIATE CHIEF JUSTICE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to change the title of the Superior Court judge in and for the province of Quebec, who is appointed to perform the duties of the Chief Justice in the district as constituted for the Court of King's Bench sitting in appeal within which the chief justice does not reside, Montreal or Quebec, as the case may be, to "The Associate Chief Justice"; and to provide a salary for an additional judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, some members have asked for an explanation. The first part of the resolution is rendered necessary by a recent change in the statutes of Quebec which provides for the appointment of an associate chief justice in that province. Until that amendment was passed by the Quebec legislature in 1946 there was an acting chief justice in that province. Now the acting chief justice is to be known as the associate chief justice.

There are two districts, the Quebec district and the Montreal district. If the chief justice resides in one district, the acting chief justice is appointed to reside in the other district. Under this provision the acting chief justice is to be called the associate chief justice. There is no difference in the pay he is to receive under this legislation, beyond that which he received before. This measure simply makes our legislation conform with that in Quebec.

The second part of the resolution is to provide the salary for an additional supreme court judge in British Columbia. Strong representations have been made that another judge is required in that province. While these representations are made often, and are not confined to British Columbia, and while I hope every minister of justice will be hard to convince when he receives these representations, I have been convinced that an additional judge is badly needed in British Columbia.

Mr. JAENICKE: Is this judge in British Columbia to be a judge of the trial division?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JAENICKE: How many judges have they there now?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was under the impression that there were five, and that this would make six; but the hon. member for Vancouver South informs me they have six, and this will make seven.

Mr. JAENICKE: Are there any British Columbia judges engaged on commissions or boards at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sure there are no trial judges so engaged, and I do not think any appeal judges are either.

Mr. GREEN: Has this been asked for by British Columbia?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it has been urged by the chief justice and the attorney general of the province. Upon inquiry, the need has been confirmed. I may say it is common for provinces to ask for enlargements of their courts. The moneys are provided by the dominion parliament. I am not saying that that is a relevant factor; but if there is much demand for an additional judge it is fairly easy to request the dominion government to appoint another one. That is why I say that in a great many cases the demand for enlargement of provincial courts is resisted.

This is not the only place where additional judges are asked for. But I have come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that this is the only place where there should be an enlargement of the court—at least during the present session.

Mr. GREEN: I think the legislature passed an amendment to the Supreme Court Act providing for an additional judge. There has been a tremendous growth in the population of the province.

Mr. McKAY: Have any other provinces a similar position of associate chief justice?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know of any.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Rightly or wrongly, the general public are of the opinion that at present judges are able to attend to their duties without any great strain upon their health. In Saskatchewan, for example, Mr. Justice Davis has been absent for a great length of time. Can the minister satisfy the committee that the situation in British Columbia is such that there is a reasonable demand from the members of the bench that additional personnel should be provided?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is difficult to settle the question whether there is real need for another judge, but in the case of British Columbia I have had letter after letter from the chief justice of the trial division and I have a considerable volume of correspondence with the attorney general. It would only tire the committee if I put all the facts on the record that have been put forward in support of this request. There is no objective test that you can apply to determine whether there is a need. The proportion of judges to the population or the proportion of judges to the members of the bar and so on is not a correct test to apply. A certain proportion may be proper for one province and not proper for another. There is really nothing you can do except to inquire and find out whether they really need one. In this case we have an abundance of material which I can show to my hon. friend if he would like to see it. It consists of long lists of cases, information as to when they will be reached and what will have to be done if they are to keep within a mile of transacting the necessary business. Rightly or wrongly, I have been convinced that one is really needed in British Columbia.

Mr. IRVINE: In view of the immigration from Saskatchewan and other provinces to British Columbia I have no doubt that we do need one or two more trial judges to look after the extra business. One way of arriving at the need would be to give us some idea of the number of trials which each judge conducts each term, how long each trial lasted, and so on. I wonder where the new judge will reside. Will it be in Cariboo, for example? We ought to have a new judge up there, because it is a long way from Victoria or Vancouver and there is a tremendous country to cover.

Mr. ILSLEY: He will probably reside in Vancouver or Victoria and then go out on circuit. Speaking for my own province, I know that is the system. No matter from what part of the province the judge may be appointed, he resides in Halifax and then goes out through the province.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister consider appointing the hon. member for Vancouver South?—because that would be a good way to get rid of him.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister has not been very long in the department but I should like to call his attention to a great injustice that exists in Ontario as compared with our very fine sister province with regard to judges' titles, style of work done, volume of work done and so on. The senior judge of the county of York, His Honour Judge Parker, has seven or eight judges under him. He is doing the same type of high court work as the judges in Quebec and Montreal district are doing, but there is a difference in the title and the salaries paid. I should like the minister to see if something cannot be done about Judge Parker. He is handling a volume of work which is similar to that done in the Montreal district where the judges have higher title and salary, as well as other emoluments. I ask the minister to consider my observations and see what can be done. Judge Parker was a very fine lawyer and he has given excellent satisfaction. Other hon. members know all about his work and comparisons are made in the bar association about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is talking about county court judges in Ontario. I shall look at his remarks tomorrow in Hansard and if I think they make a prima facie case for an inquiry to somebody, of course I shall be glad to make it.

Mr. CHURCH: There are anomalies there that should be looked into and corrected.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to discuss two matters which are raised by the resolution. Perhaps the minister will let me ask a question which will dispose of the first. Is the change which is suggested for the superior court judge for the appellate districts of Montreal and Quebec, who performs the functions of the chief justice in the appellate district in which the chief justice does not reside, being made in accordance with the wishes of the Quebec provincial authorities?

Mr. ILSLEY: The legislature passed legislation providing for the appointment of an associate chief justice. Previous to the legislation the provision was for the appointment of a judge to perform the duties of the chief justice, and I think he was called the acting chief justice. Hereafter he will be called the associate chief justice. Our amendment will provide for his compensation in such a way as to conform with provincial legislation.

Mr. HACKETT: It is merely to provide for the payment of salary to the judge who is described in the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. HACKETT: I shall discuss another aspect of the resolution, and I hope that the minister will not think, because I have been unable to agree with what has been the policy of the government in the use to which judges have been put, that I wish in any way to make a political issue of this question. I am a lawyer and have spent my life in the courts; I am interested both as an active practitioner and as a citizen in maintaining by all possible means the integrity of the courts and the high level of justice which prevails in this country. To do that, it is necessary, not only that substantial justice be rendered by the courts, but that the people as a whole have confidence in the judges.

The resolution provides for the appointment of another judge in British Columbia. I am desirous that there should be at all times a number of judges adequate to the proper administration of justice. As hon. members know, I have always believed that judges should be well paid, because the type of man secured and his qualifications for the office depend to an extent upon the emolument which attaches to the office. It will always be possible to find men who will accept judicial office, regardless of whether the salary be low or high, but I believe that able men, men of knowledge, men of experience, and men of wisdom will be attracted to the position only if it carries with it adequate remuneration. In Britain, where for centuries the courts have dispensed even and impartial justice in a way which is the envy of all civilized peoples, the remuneration of the judges has always been high. In 1800 or shortly after, ordinary high court judges received £5,000 a year in Britain, without taking into consideration any of the incidental emoluments of office, and in those days there was no income tax. I merely point that out to show that, in the land where justice is dispensed in a way that all peoples admire, judges have been well paid and for that reason I was happy some months ago to support legislation to increase the salaries of the judges.

Turning to British Columbia we must be guided, I suppose, by the information which the minister has as to the necessity of appointing an additional judge for that province. I wish, however, that the minister could assure the committee that this judge and the judges in the other provinces are required for work that is strictly judicial. In my opinion the tendency of the last few years has been to use judges for the solution of problems which are not, in their nature, judicial but highly political, and in my view that has tended to lessen the respect and confidence of the people at large in the judiciary. That is a great misfortune, and if I have found it necessary to express these views more than once in the house it is because of my intimate knowledge of the situation and because of my conviction of the degrading tendency that this practice has upon the good repute of the individual judge and of the bench of which he forms part. My remarks have as their sole object to preclude any further use of judges as part of committees or commissions dealing with other than legal problems, because the rule of law depends largely for its efficacy upon the respect and confidence which the people repose in the bench.

To be altogether objective, I must refer to what is called the spy case. Two judges of our highest court, the Supreme Court of Canada, were asked to act as commissioners. Their appointment denatured them as judges. They ceased to exercise judicial functions. They were put at tasks which were not judicial. I think the minister is familiar with what is known as the O'Connor case. O'Connor when acting as a commissioner did something which was reprehensible and I believe that the highest tribunal, the privy council, found that in that instance he was acting as a persona designata. Certain immunities went with the task, but it goes to show that there is a distinction between the role of the judge and the role of the man who acts, as these two gentlemen did; when they presided over the spy investigation. We have heard these men criticized; and again I say that I do not wish to be critical of the government in that particular instance. We were just emerging from a war; we were not accustomed to spies in this country. More is known of them in older and more developed countries. The government appointed these two men to that task. I do not blame them. They accepted what they undoubtedly conceived to be a call to duty; nevertheless the fact is that two judges of our highest court have been criticized bitterly. They have not been criticized by irresponsible people; they have been criticized by the press of the country; they have been criticized from the pulpits of the country and—I do not know whether the minister is aware of it—they have been criticized from the bench of the country, from the appeal benches of at least two provinces.

It is extremely unfortunate that a condition should be created in which men who hold such important positions, whose impartiality and integrity must at all times be beyond reproach, should be so criticized. It is because of the practice of setting them tasks which are not judicial that this criticism has come about, and the result has been, and must necessarily be, a loss of dignity, loss of confidence, loss of respect by the individuals themselves as well as by the bench of which they form a part.

Let us suppose that one of the men or women was found—I do not know that I should say guilty, but as a result of the finding of these two judges, was prosecuted and was later found guilty—and the case went, as many of them have, to an appellate tribunal, and there was a further appeal to the supreme court. There is an appeal to the supreme court, but it is a limited one. I ask, hon. gentlemen, what would be the feeling of a person so accused finding himself before the supreme court? I am certain that neither of these honourable judges would sit upon the case. Nevertheless their brethren, those who labour with them and who have respect for their feelings, for their integrity and for their wisdom, would be called upon to determine a case on which two of their brother judges had already pronounced themselves. To admit this possibility establishes that the practice is indefensible.

A few days ago when the hon. member for Winnipeg North was making some comment, which I thought was most unfortunate, on the conduct of these gentlemen I had something to say on this topic. An attempt was made to stop the hon. gentleman because he was exceeding his privileges as a member of parliament. I besought the hon. gentleman to desist from further criticism, but I was forced to argue that he had the right to say what he was saying, and I doubt whether any Speaker could, after consideration, hold otherwise. Nevertheless a few days afterwards another gifted and able member of the supreme court was appointed to a committee whose task is the hearing and the determination of one of the most highly political questions that has tortured this country in the last century. I yield to no one in my respect of Mr. Justice Rand, but I consider it a tragedy that he should be lifted out of his judicial office and asked to participate in an investigation and settlement of a political question. Whatever the decision, he cannot return to his judicial function without some people believing, and unfortunately some people saying that he has been influenced by this or that motive, that he has sided with this or that political faction. It is not fitting such sentiment or words should be provoked by a judge.

In Canada we have not many institutions that have not been shaken by the events of the last few years. Our civilization, like all civilizations, rests on great institutions: the Christian home, the school, the church and the law, and they have all been very much manhandled in the last few years. The result is that civilization has crumbled in many parts of Europe and in many parts of the world. Even if we did nothing more than expose one of these fundamental institutions to weakness by the appointment of members of the judiciary to duties which are beyond their scopes, it seems to me that the hazard is too great to be taken by a responsible government. It is clear that the hon. gentlemen who have appointed judges to these tasks do not share my view. Can it be that their present occupations are so manifold, that they are so remote from the common touch that they do not appreciate to what extent this great institution of the law is jeopardized and imperilled by the action which has become the habit in the last few years?

I have said previously that other governments have appointed judges to perform tasks of this kind. I thought it reprehensible then. The courts did not benefit by it, and a number of judges still suffer as a result of services which they rendered off the bench.

I am going to appeal again to the Minister of Justice, with whom I cannot always agree but for whom I have immeasurable respect, to consider most carefully the result of discrediting the judiciary. We cannot afford to do it at this time. The rule of law has never been so seriously challenged as it is today. If we cannot, here in Canada, maintain the fullest confidence in our judiciary, we are heading for unnecessary evils. We have all kinds of difficulties. I know the government has to meet as many complicated and seemingly insoluble problems as any government that has ever occupied the treasury benches. While it is the function of the opposition to criticize and endeavour to improve administration, this is a matter which really transcends politics. I ask the government to desist from this practice. We have labour troubles, financial difficulties, and problems of great variety. I cannot help feeling that the appointment of judges to solve all these problems does not rest solely on the fact that all the able men in Canada are on the bench. I cannot believe that. But I do believe that the great reputation of the judiciary—the confidence the public has in its members—has prompted the government at times to shield itself from criticism by naming a judge to such a commission.

Again I say to the Minister of Justice that I have not heard many judges approve this practice; I have not heard many lawyers approve it and I have not heard many people who understood it thoroughly approve it. If another judge in British Columbia be required for the purpose of administering justice, let him be appointed; but let us keep him within the ambit of his judicial function, and let us terminate once and for all the submission to members of the judiciary of questions which are not legal and which do not come within the proper performance of their duties.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was going to say a word with regard to the appointment of the additional judge in British Columbia, but I think the hon. member for Cariboo has said pretty much what I would have said, namely, that the only criterion which can apply as to whether there are sufficient judges is the amount of court work that is behind schedule, as we might say. If cases are being held for a long time without coming to trial, or if judges are overworked in the matter of trials, then, of course, a case could be made out for the appointment of an additional judge. However, the decision to appoint one has been made by the present Minister of Justice, and I do not know of anyone less likely to give way to pressure than the right hon. gentleman. I have come to that conclusion from watching him resist pressure in this house over a long period of time. Therefore I have no misgivings on that point.

I know it is presumptuous on my part to say anything in regard to the matter referred to by the hon. member for Stanstead, but I think it would be a retrograde step for the government to take if it were to decide that members of the judiciary should not function as commissioners in certain instances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear. They have done it in Britain for hundreds of years.

Mr. HACKETT: That is where you are wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, I am not wrong. I can prove that you are wrong about that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Jacob and Esau.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whether a mistake was made in appointing judges in the espionage investigations is open to question, and I am not expressing any opinion in regard to it. It is a case of a kind which I think has never before arisen in this country. From my association with the labour movement over a long period of time, I believe that organized labour has, in general, more confidence in a judge as chairman of a board than it would have in any person from almost any other walk of life. Generally speaking, I think the judges have, in the discharge of these special duties, given satisfaction and have done so without affecting their position as judges. I am afraid that the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead—who is, I may tell him, a man for whom I have the greatest respect—is old-fashioned. I do not think it is wise today to keep the judiciary separate from what we might call the hurly-burly of everyday life because they are not just dispensing law; they are dispensing justice. It may be justice according to the law, but I think it should be justice as far as they can go, even if they went beyond the law. However I imagine that is not good law.

Mr. WEIR: It is common sense.

Mr. MacINNIS: If you keep the judges apart from the ordinary, everyday interests and trials of the people, how are they to acquire the understanding to make just decisions in the cases which come before them? Judges I believe, follow precedents in cases which have gone before, no matter whether those decisions were right or wrong. I do not think that is good enough. I think it would be a great mistake if this government took any action which would prevent judges from acting on commissions where their position carries weight. I think that is so for the very reasons advanced by the hon. member for Stanstead. When they are appointed to the bench judges are given a reasonable standard of living; they are given security; they are given a standing in the community, and it is a lifetime appointment. Consequently, when a judge is made chairman of a commission, or a commissioner, he can act without any hope of reward from the outside or any fear of punishment from the inside. So I think we should consider carefully before we change that situation.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to make a few comments on this resolution. First, I want to say I am pleased that provision is being made for the appointment of another judge in British Columbia. I remember that this matter came up when I was in the provincial house, and some three or four years ago the former attorney general told me of the great need for another judge in that province. I think anyone who has followed the work of the courts there is aware of the need for another judge in British Columbia; and in this case, as the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested, I think the Minister of Justice resisted pressure for a considerable time.

I was very much interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Stanstead as to the use of members of the judiciary on arbitrations and so on. To some extent I agree with the spirit of his remarks; I can see the point in some of his arguments, but I do not believe you can make a fixed, general rule in these matters. Over a period of years I have had occasion to act on behalf of labour on several quite important arbitration boards in British Columbia, in connection with shipyards and so on, which dealt with difficult and, at times, trying situations. In that case I may say I went straight from the farm to represent labour, without any former experience in that regard. All hon. members know, when arbitration boards are appointed the representative of the employers and the representative of the employees are supposed to meet and agree on a chairman; otherwise I understand the chairman is appointed by the Minister of Labour. In the first place, of course it is necessary to have someone who has some knowledge of the rules of evidence, someone who can be of assistance to laymen in directing the work of the inquiry. I was quite surprised to find that in each case with which I was directly connected organized labour expressed great satisfaction over being able to secure a judge as chairman of the tribunal. I remember one board on which I served; I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will remember the shipyards case, with which it dealt. We agreed on one of the judges, who was appointed chairman. Those negotiations went on over a period of three months, under conditions which at times were difficult and trying. I was interested to note that at first many of the representatives of labour and members of unions were inclined to look upon the representative of the judiciary as someone apart, someone possibly not quite human. But as the arbitration went on I saw that they became impressed with his fairness, and their confidence in the impartial attitude of the judiciary was greatly increased.

So in my view, far from the appointment of judges to boards of arbitration and things of that kind lowering their position or lessening the respect felt by people generally for the judiciary, my experience has been that, during recent times by these rather unusual contacts with the judiciary, such appointments have brought about increased respect for members of the bench on the part of representatives of labour and others throughout this country. Many of the men engaged in these investigations were not Conservative, to say the least, in their politics, but they expressed to me their confidence in and appreciation of the work done by these gentlemen. So, while I am sure none of us would wish to see members of the judiciary used for these purposes too extensively, I am also sure that under certain conditions in this country it is necessary and to the advantage of the parties concerned and the community at large that the services of these gentlemen be made available. To that extent I believe it would heighten respect throughout this country for the members of the judiciary.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to speak on the amendment to the Judges Act, 1946, which provides for the appointment of an additional judge in British Columbia. Under the British North America Act, the provinces have responsibility for the organization of these courts. The year before last Ontario had two additional judges appointed. In my opinion the Judges Act should be revised and brought up to date. It was first passed a very long time ago and, with the exception of minor changes, has not been revised since about the time the Supreme Court Act was passed in 1875.

I want to point out that the work of the provincial courts has been greatly increased, largely as a result of legislation passed by this parliament. For example, there is the matter of divorce. Immediately that act was passed Ontario applied for two or three more high court judges, and their salaries have to be paid by the dominion government. Some of the judges have been sick; others have been away on commissions. When Saskatchewan applied for an additional judge we found that one of those already appointed had been away on commissions practically all his time. Some change should be made in that regard.

Then all the judges appointed under this act are governed by the doctrine of stare decisis, which means by decisions of the privy council or court of last resort; but in one province they have not followed that law. There will always be a privy council, notwithstanding the bill introduced here the other day, because that legislation binds only the dominion. It does not bind the provinces, which can give the right to appeal direct to the king as a matter of grace. These privy council appeals are by statute or by grace, and the subject has always had the right to appeal to the throne as a matter of grace. That, of course, is not to the judicial committee of the privy council, which is delegated by the sovereign to hear such appeals.

Great care should be exercised in connection with these matters. In the United States they are having the same trouble. In that country, once you are sworn in as a lawyer you are immediately called "judge." You may not be a judge today, but probably you will be one tomorrow, so down there everyone who is a lawyer is called a judge. I would like the minister, in considering judicial appointments, not to make them from a purely political point of view. Sir John A. Macdonald often appointed people from the other side, and he made some very good appointments. It is difficult to get some of the judges who are appointed to carry on the work. We have twelve high court judges on circuit in Ontario, some of whom have not been out on circuit as much as others or are sick or at times on commissions. As a result, the work devolves on a few of the more experienced judges, so I suggest to the minister that great care should be exercised in these appointments. I do not believe it would be necessary to have these additional judges if the Judges Act were brought up to date and consolidated, which I hope may be done in the recess and divorces transferred. I believe divorce cases could be handled by the county court judges with better results, since they meet more frequently, and that would take a great deal of the work away from our high court judges and prevent congestion of cases. I believe the minister should consider these suggestions, because he has been most appreciative of any suggestions made.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was some confusion a while ago about the present number of supreme court judges in British Columbia. I said there were five, and the number was being increased to six. The hon. member for Vancouver

South said there were six. In a sense we were both right. I find there are five judges and a chief justice at the present time. After this amendment, we shall have to make provision for paying six puisne judges and the chief justice.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask a question respecting judges in the category of those mentioned in the resolution. My question has to do with the matter of fixing for them a retirement age. This matter has been discussed in the house on a number of occasions. In fact I had a bill on the order paper during a number of sessions in an effort to focus attention on the matter.

I understand there are arrangements for the retirement of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the exchequer court, and also for the retirement of judges in the lower courts. But in this middle bracket of provincial superior court judges there are no such arrangements. The minister's predecessor expressed interest in having something done about this matter at the earliest possible day.

My concern is not that judges get munificent pensions, but rather that men shall not stay on the bench to too advanced ages. I would appreciate it if the minister would indicate whether consideration is now being given to this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a question of privilege. I made a statement in committee a few minutes ago when the hon. member for Stanstead was speaking as to the practice in England. I find in this book about ten instances where most eminent lord justices in England were chairmen of commissions. So I wish to state that I was correct in my earlier statement.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What is the name of the book?

Mr. MACKENZIE: "Royal Commissions of Inquiry."

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister answer my question as to whether the consideration his predecessor was to give with respect to the retirement of judges will be continued by him?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am in the embarrassing position of having to say that I cannot inform the hon. member respecting the state of the law in that particular. However I have always understood that parliament did not have the power to retire judges of the high courts and superior courts of the provinces at any particular age. It is my understanding that such a change would require an amendment to the British North America Act. However I cannot substantiate what I say by offering any argument this afternoon. My understanding is, however, that because of the attitude of certain provinces it was virtually hopeless to get any such amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the matter was discussed at the time the minister's predecessor was in office, reference was made to section 100 of the British North America Act. The previous minister raised the same question, but he thought there was a possibility of doing what was suggested, and indicated that he was prepared to discuss the matter with the provinces.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 262, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF SALARY TO REGISTRAR

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act to authorize the payment of a salary to the registrar of the court not exceeding six thousand five hundred dollars as the governor in council may fix.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Exchequer Court Act provides that the registrar of that court shall receive a salary of $5,000. The purpose of the resolution is to provide for the payment of a higher salary of not more than $6,500. It is the view of the government that, at $5,000, the pay is low, and is not comparable with the compensation paid in positions involving similar responsibility and similar amounts of work elsewhere in the government service.

Mr. GREEN: May I bring to the minister's attention a request which has been made by the bar of British Columbia, for setting up in that province a registry office of the exchequer court, and for the appointment of a deputy registrar. They also ask that one of the four judges be stationed on the west coast.

As was stated earlier this afternoon, there has been a great increase in population in British Columbia, and in the legal business transacted in that province. At the present time it is particularly awkward and difficult to have cases tried by the exchequer court. In normal practice the court sits on the west coast only once a year. This means that if a case is of an urgent nature, counsel and witnesses must come to Ottawa to have it heard. There is also the difficulty of having to file all the documents with the registrar here in Ottawa. I believe the request by the British Columbia bar is a reasonable one.

Has the minister given consideration to setting up a registry office at the coast, providing for a deputy registrar there and providing also that one of the judges shall live on the west coast? I can understand the reason for the present provision that the judges must reside in Ottawa when there were only two judges, but now that there are four it should be possible to decentralize the work of the court more than is being done at the present time. Our province, because of its remoteness from Ottawa, is not getting fair treatment under the present arrangement, and I would ask the minister to give consideration to meeting this request.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would request hon. members again to deal with the resolution. The resolution is a simple one, reading as follows:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act to authorize the payment of a salary to the registrar of the court not exceeding six thousand five hundred dollars as the governor in council may fix.

The suggesting of setting up courts and all that kind of thing may develop an argument along lines which would be foreign to this resolution. I believe hon. members are anxious to get along with the business of the house, and if they will cooperate with the chair and confine their remarks to the resolution or the item before the committee I believe we shall make better progress.

Mr. GREEN: With all due deference, I would point out that this resolution deals with the registrar of the court, and my question had to do with the setting up of a registry office on the Pacific coast and having a deputy registrar there. I am sure both the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General will agree with me when I submit that I was entirely in order in asking that question. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that you are interpreting the resolution in a much too narrow fashion.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The chairman is always in the hands of the committee, but I believe it is the duty of the chairman to direct discussion along the proper lines. I cannot agree with my hon. friend, but as I say I am in the hands of the committee. If the committee will support the chair in trying to keep to the items before the committee, I repeat that I believe we shall make better progress.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we need to discuss this very much. The hon. gentleman wants to request publicly that this step be taken. The same request has been made by other members from British Columbia, and my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, has forwarded to me requests and representations that have been made in British Columbia. I am quite content to give the matter more study than I have been able to give it up to the present time. I would point out that this is quite a departure in the organization of the Exchequer Court of Canada, because British Columbia is just one degree removed from the other provinces, and certainly the same request would be made by the maritime provinces and probably by the prairie provinces. The first thing you know we would have a different kind of court from the one we have at the present time. I would hope it will not be necessary to take that important step.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there a retirement allowance attaching to the position of registrar?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot reply with absolute certainty, but I feel sure the position is subject to superannuation.

Mr. HACKETT: The registrar at the present time receives a lesser remuneration than that of county court judges, for instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but the registrar is not a judge.

Mr. HACKETT: He has quasi judicial functions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Possibly so. His salary is not as great as that received by the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, although the work is fully as great and perhaps greater. Nevertheless there is a difference in the status of the two courts.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to remind the committee that for a number of years the Minister of Justice was concerned about maintaining price ceilings and keeping down wages. While the sum involved is not large, there is an increase of thirty per cent. Now that negotiations are under way to have increases all across the country, it is important to know why the government is presenting a special bill to provide a sizeable increase. Could the minister indicate something of the qualifications of the registrar and the nature of his duties which makes it imperative to bring in this sort of legislation at this time?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to send for the Exchequer Court Act in order to get the qualifications, and it is a question whether my hon. friend should expect me to do that. He could have looked at the act and found out what the registrar does.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How about his qualifications?

Mr. ILSLEY: The registrar, Mr. Henry, is an excellent man, and I think he is known to nearly all members of parliament because he has been in the public service for a great many years.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 263, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD

PROVISION FOR SCIENTIFIC, TECHNICAL AND OTHER OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act to provide for the election of a vice-chairman, the appointment of an executive director who shall be the secretary of the board, and for the employment of such scientific, technical and other officers and employees as may be necessary for the proper performance of the board's work; and for the emoluments, salary or remuneration, as the case may be, of such officers and employees, also for the application to them of the Civil Service Superannuation Act as well as of the benefits enjoyed by civil servants.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister going to give an explanation?

Mr. BRIDGES: Mr. Chairman, I might briefly outline the object of the resolution. It is intended to provide in the bill to follow, first of all, for the election of a vice-chairman to act in the absence of the chairman. At a recent meeting the chairman was ill and we found that we had no statutory authority for a vice-chairman. The second and most important amendment is the selection by the governor in council of one of the members of the board from the Department of Fisheries to be the administrative officer and secretary of the board. The need for this position has arisen from the enlargement of the scope of the board's work and from the necessity of having a responsible officer to supervise and administer the work of the board. This officer, being a member of the department, would effectively provide the essential liaison between the department and the board. The third amendment is to authorize the board, subject to the approval of the minister, to employ the scientific, technical and other personnel necessary for the work of the board. Since its inception, the board, with the approval of the minister, has employed any personnel required for its work. The authority to do this under the existing act is not considered sufficiently clear, and the bill is intended to cure this deficiency. Another amendment provides for the continuation of the benefits under the Civil Service Superannuation Act and all benefits, except salary, of a civil servant who might be employed by the board; as, for example, in the case of the administrative officer of the board, to be selected by the governor in council from the members of the department.

Mr. FRASER: How many inspectors will the board have to employ?

Mr. BRIDGES: I have not the exact figures in front of me as to the number of personnel, but we operate experimental and biological stations across Canada. The most important part of the whole bill is that which provides that some one person is to have the position of executive director of the board. In the past there has been no one person devoting his full time to the work of the fisheries research board as a whole throughout Canada.

Mr. FRASER: That was under the minister's guidance before?

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes. I could take time to give the constitution of the board but perhaps that might be saved for discussion later.

Mr. PEARKES: Is it the intention to refer this bill after second reading to the fisheries committee?

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I am a little confused over a certain point. Each year we vote so much for research on the west coast and so much for the east coast. Will expenditures such as that come under this board and the money be allocated through the board, or will it be voted and appropriated by the house as before?

Mr. BRIDGES: There will be no change so far as that is concerned. The vote will go through the house in the same manner as it has in the past.

Mr. MacNICOL: The vice-chairman will not receive a salary, will he?

Mr. BRIDGES: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the west coast get an equal grant with the east coast for research?

Mr. BRIDGES: The amount of money is spent through the various stations, and when the estimates come before the house my hon. friend will be able to see whether or not the west coast is getting its share.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bridges thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 264, to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (for Mr. Abbott) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MAYHEW: Mr. Chairman, the bill based on this resolution is to provide for the refunding of Canadian National Railway securities in the years 1947 to 1954. The last refunding act was passed in 1944 for the same amount, namely $200,000,000. Canadian National Railway bonds that mature and are callable up to the end of 1954 total $221,304,943.61. The procedure outlined in the bill for meeting these maturities is either by refunding issues or by way of loan from the government. Since the outbreak of the war, only one railway issue, that of January 2, 1947, has been sold to the public. Other maturing issues have been met by loans from the government. The January 2, 1947, issue consisted of $50,000,000 twenty-year bonds at 2¾ per cent and was sold at 100·68, to yield 2·7 per cent. The resolution provides for the renewal of these loans.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Of course it is desirable that this refunding should be done. The only question I wish to raise is as to giving authority for refunding operations for the next five, six or seven years. You may argue: Why not do it because it is only giving authority which will not be abused? On the other hand, I myself cannot see why we should now give authority extending over several years. I notice that in the railway committee the question was asked whether the reason why this authority should be given was that it was proposed to take advantage of the present low interest rates and go out and get the money, but the official of the company said no. I quote from page 149 of the report of proceedings, where he said:

We shall only issue new securities as of the date the old securities maturing are called. We will not secure funds in advance of need.

I am not making any comment as to whether or not it is wise; whether they would be well advised to go out and get $200 million now. There are complications in the way of it and I think reasons given against it may be quite valid. I do not criticize that. The point I wish to make is this. It seems to me a free and easy way of dealing with this matter, to give authority now which is to extend over five or six or seven years. If I am asked what difficulties can arise I confess quite frankly that I find it difficult to answer that. There may be changes in rates of interest. There may be reasons why this refunding later on may not appear as desirable as it is now. The minister may well say that if that occasion should arise, do I not think the railway officials are as competent as anyone to deal with it? My answer would be that they are very competent indeed. Nevertheless I can see no reason for it at the moment. By looking at page 149 of the report, I observe that there are only some $45 million callable as early as 1948. There are two amounts of $25 million and $20 million. Then there is a large issue which is callable in 1949 and another in 1950.

Without labouring the point further, I raise the question, first of all, whether it is necessary to do it. It seems simple to come along next year and bring in another resolution to give another authority. That is very simple indeed. We have to do that, of course, in connection with the amounts which are to be raised for extensions and improvements. That is done as a matter of course each year. I suggest to the committee that this is an unnecessary free and easy way of giving wide-open authorities to authorize $200 million now, when actually up to the end of 1948, if my reading is correct, only $45 million is necessary.

Mr. MAYHEW: I can give the dates on which these moneys mature. The hon. gentleman is right; in 1948, $20 million mature. The callable date is February 1, 1948. On February 15, 1948, the amount callable is $25 million; on October 1, 1949, the amount callable is $57,728,500; again on February 1, 1950, $17,338,000, and on April 2, 1950, $798,055.48. I can give the table if the committee desires it. Some $86,980,000 is payable in Canada; $2,607,443.61 payable in London and $8,629,000 payable in New York; payable in Canada, London or New York, $123,088,500. I would think it would be advisable to leave the government in a position to use its own judgment as to when it was the best time to call these moneys because of the condition of the market.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to labour the point unduly. I observe that the minister is not in the house. I wonder whether this could be held over for the minister to consider it. I realize that precedent is against me. I realize that measures of this kind are brought in to cover several years; therefore the practice has obtained in the past. I question whether there is any need of authorizing these huge unnecessary amounts. I question whether it would not be sensible to deal with the requirements, say to the end of 1948. Therefore I would ask whether it might not be referred to the Minister of Finance and the question considered.

Mr. MAYHEW: The matter has been discussed with the Department of Finance and this is what they are asking. However, all that we are doing at the present time is to ask for first reading of the bill, and the minister can give further consideration to the matter and answer the hon. gentleman on second reading of the bill.

Mr. FRASER: What will be the saving in the interest rate to the end of 1948?

Mr. MAYHEW: That would depend entirely on what we would be able to renew the money at; that cannot be answered at the present time.

Mr. FRASER: It has not been calculated?

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not know what it would be.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mayhew thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 265, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces.

He said: The purpose of this legislation is to make provision for the discipline of United States forces when visiting Canada. Hon. members know that there was passed by this parliament in 1933 an act, chapter 21 of the statutes of that year, making provision for the discipline of forces of commonwealth countries visiting Canada. At the outbreak of war, by an order in council under the War Measures Act this was extended to United States forces, and by a subsequent order in council under the War Measures Act much broader provisions were made for the service courts of the United States, even to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of our Canadian courts.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister a question? Did that order in council extend the powers under the Visiting Forces from Commonwealth Countries Act or under what was called foreign forces order?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The first extended the provisions of the visiting forces of the commonwealth to foreign forces present in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: By a foreign forces order?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: By a foreign forces order. Then there was a subsequent order in council giving more extensive jurisdiction to the service courts of United States forces than was provided by the foreign forces order; but both these orders lapsed or were repealed in compliance with the undertaking that had been given in the house, on April 1 last, because they were not included in the schedule to the so-called omnibus bill. Since that time, there has been no authority under which commanders of forces of the United States visiting Canada, on invitation or with the consent of the Canadian government, could exercise disciplinary powers, and the bill is to give the commanders of these forces powers similar to those which are provided in the act of 1933 with respect to the commonwealth forces, and particularly not to exclude the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts.

The purpose of this bill is to give the commanders of such visiting forces rights to exercise such jurisdiction as our own service courts can exercise in our own domestic armed units. But on the same principle, our own service courts do not oust the ordinary jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of the land. This provides that the jurisdiction given to the service courts of the United States will not oust the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of the land. The service courts of the United States will have exclusive jurisdiction in connection with such breaches of discipline as would not be offences under Canadian law. But with respect to anything which, though a breach of their military orders, would also be a breach of Canadian law, they get no exclusive jurisdiction. The statute also provides that such jurisdiction as they may exercise will be only over members of their forces, and that their decision as to who is a member of their forces will not be conclusive. If they attempt to exercise any of those powers in Canada with respect to an individual, and he claims not to be a member of their forces, the question as to whether he is a member of their forces will have to be determined by our own courts.

Mr. LOW: That was, essentially, the arrangement which existed during the war, was it not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. During the war we went farther than that. Under United States law, their service courts have exclusive jurisdiction over their own personnel in their own country, to the exclusion of their own ordinary courts of justice; and they tell us that under their law our service courts would have, in their country, over personnel of Canadian forces visiting their country, jurisdiction that would be exclusive of their courts. But we told them that was not the principle which applied in British countries. We told them that in British countries the personnel of the army, like all other citizens, were amenable to the courts of justice of the country and that, although we did, because of the special conditions which existed during the war, make them that concession, it was only for the duration of the war. They have made representations to us, but we have told them that we could not give their service courts exclusive powers which our service courts did not have over the personnel of our own Canadian forces, and that they would have to be satisfied with exercising the jurisdiction they have by virtue of their law, but not to a greater extent than our laws recognized the jurisdiction of our own service courts. Moreover, we made it a provision that this jurisdiction would, of course, apply only to members of their forces, and that the question as to whether or not, in a concrete case, a person was amenable to their jurisdiction would have to be one which was triable by our ordinary courts of justice.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the statutory or other source of power for the government to admit to Canada the armed forces of other nations outside the commonwealth?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it makes any difference whether they be within or outside the commonwealth. We made with the United States government the informal arrangement which the Prime Minister described in this house on February 12, 1947, in a statement on defence cooperation. In that statement the Prime Minister outlined the programme of post-war cooperation between the armed forces of the United States and Canada resulting from discussions which had taken place in the permanent joint board on defence. This programme calls for the interchange of selected individuals so as to increase the familiarity of each country's defence establishment with that of the other country. It also calls for general cooperation and exchange of observers in connection with exercises and with the development and tests of material of common interest. It encourages common designs and standards in arms, equipment, organization, methods of training and new developments. It provides for such extension of reciprocal military, naval and air facilities in each country as may be agreed upon in specific instances. It also provides, of course, that everything which is done by one country in the territory of the other is subject to the full control of the other country, recognizing the full sovereignty of the other country.

As an illustration of what is taking place, there is a small detachment of United States observers who have been stationed at Churchill taking part in the tests of material under the climatic conditions which exist there, but they are all under the supreme command of the Canadian commander of the post. He does not, however, attempt to exercise authority over the individuals. He does that through the normal chain of authority. It is the commander of the United States detachment who is responsible for the discipline of the men under his command.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the arrangement always continue on that basis?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the arrangement at present existing by virtue of this recommendation of the permanent joint board on defence which the Prime Minister described in the house on February 12 last.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a question just here? I am sorry to interrupt him, but I do not think he quite answered the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), namely, as to wherein lay the power to invite visiting forces to Canada under any circumstances. Is it not in parliament rather than in the governor in council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I think not. Parliament can, of course, control it. Parliament could provide by legislation for the exclusion of any forces; but I think His Excellency, as commander in chief of the Canadian forces, can do such things as are not contrary to Canadian law and which he thinks are advisable for the preparation of the defences of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Where does he derive that power from? It must come from some statute?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From the prerogative. The hon. member realizes—he knows it as well as I do; I am just reminding him of it—that we have not in this dominion adopted the constitutional practice of the United Kingdom whereby there can be no armed forces established for more than a year; the authority must be renewed yearly. We do, in fact, carry out that principle by virtue of the fact that there are no appropriations made for more than one year. But I do not conceive that an act of parliament is necessary to allow groups—whether, in fact, they be an armed force or not—to enter Canada, if there is nothing positive to exclude them.

Mr. GREEN: Does that mean the government could invite divisions in?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think that would be a matter for which there would be responsibility to this house and to public opinion.

Mr. GREEN: But if they can invite groups in, they can invite divisions in.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the commander in chief of the Canadian forces can take such measures as his ministers are prepared to assume responsibility for the parliament, and to the country, so long as they do not infringe any enactment made by parliament. They cannot give them any privileges that individuals would not have, and that is why this act is necessary.

Mr. GRAYDON: But wouldn't they—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If we are to have this system of question and answer I think we had better have it in committee, rather than when I am trying to make a statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: We were just interested in trying to get the information.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It occurred to me that since there had been so many questions, probably the house would prefer to go into committee now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess for dinner, or just before that time, I had been asked on what authority invitations could be issued to members of a force of another country to visit this country. I had said I did not know of any statutory authority. I have been giving the matter some thought since, and I must say I do not know that there is any statutory authority, or that there is any need for statutory authority to allow those gentlemen, or ladies and gentlemen as the case may be, to visit Canada, any more than there is need for statutory authority to welcome the President of the United States when he visits this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there not this difference: These are armed forces of another nation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will just let me continue my exposition, there will be opportunity later for criticism. It is difficult when the house is not in committee to deal with these questions as they arise.

There is no statutory authority for the admission into Canada of the diplomatic representatives of other states. These are matters which are governed by the comity of nations; and I think it is the same with respect to the penetration within our country of the armed forces of another friendly state. If we resented it, it would be an unfriendly act for them to come. If we do not object to it, there is no need of statutory authority to enable its being done.

But of course they have no status as military units in this country, unless that is provided for by statute. And it is for that reason precisely that this bill is submitted to parliament. It is submitted to parliament, so that they can, when in fact here as a unit, be treated by those who are commanding them in the manner provided by military law, without that being an assault on, or with its being an interference with the individual liberty of the persons concerned.

Without something of this kind, no attempt, for instance, to arrest one of their members would be anything but a common assault. No attempt to restrain the movement of one of their members could be upheld in the face of a writ of habeas corpus. They would be merely a certain number of individuals, each recognized as individuals, and no one of them having any right to interfere with any movement of any other one of them. It is to take care of what is required for the proper discipline of a group coming under the command of officers that it is necessary to have some provision of this kind.

The provision to be made is that when United States forces are present in Canada the service courts and service authorities of those forces may exercise within Canada, in relation to members of those forces, all such powers as are conferred upon them by the laws of their own country; but not to the exclusion of the exercise by the ordinary authorities in this country of our own laws, and not to the exclusion of the rights of any person over whom they attempt to exercise that authority to apply to our own courts to determine whether or not he is a member of their forces.

This bill is to be concerned only with United States forces present in Canada with the consent of the Canadian government. United States forces present in Canada without the consent of the Canadian government would be committing an unfriendly act. This bill will have no application to civilians, or to any others than members of an organized unit of the United States present in our country with the consent of the Canadian authorities.

That is the same situation which had to be dealt with, or which it was felt should be dealt with by the Visiting Forces (British Commonweath) Act of 1933. Prior to that act, any group of persons from another part of the commonwealth could come here; there was nothing to prevent their coming here. But there was no right of anyone conducting such a party to exercise any authority in this country over the members of the party he was conducting. It was for that reason that the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act of 1933 was enacted, so that when groups came here—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is, armed forces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, groups of armed forces under the command of officers. It was enacted so that those officers could exercise here the powers which they would have over the same men in their own country, but not to the extent of preventing Canadian authorities from dealing with them while they were here in accordance with the laws and procedure of our own Canadian administration. And it is the same thing, in substance, that is contained in this bill, to which I suggest the house might well give second reading, and consider in detail in committee.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. minister has stated, this bill makes provision for those troops of the United States forces which are visiting Canada, so that their code of discipline may be applied through such military courts and through such other means as are expedient. It also enables the exercise of the internal administration of those forces.

In section 2, the expression "United States force" is clearly defined as one which is here in Canada with the consent of the government of Canada, and is lawfully present in Canada or on board any of His Majesty's Canadian ships or aircraft. This clearly indicates that the troops or individuals who would be visiting Canada would be here with the consent of Canada, and that some provision has been made for them to be here lawfully.

The minister has explained what he considers to be the lawful requirements, so far as issuing the invitation for the troops to be present is concerned. I understand that this bill is really to implement the policy announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on February 12 when he informed the house that steps had been taken, as a result of discussions by the joint board of defence, to ensure closer collaboration between the forces of Canada and the forces of the United States. In that statement the Prime Minister also emphasized the fact that this in no way imperilled the relationship which exists and the close collaboration which was to continue between Canadian forces and the forces of the rest of the British commonwealth of nations.

In fact I believe it is a joint plan of Canada, the United States and Great Britain that this collaboration and cooperation, this joint study of defence problems should proceed and that there should be unification as far as possible of the weapons and equipment of the three countries. The Prime Minister stated that both governments, that is the Canadian and United States governments, believed that the decision which had been reached, namely to continue close collaboration, was a contribution to the stability of the world and to the establishment, through the united nations, of an effective system for world-wide security.

There are in this land today many people who believe that one way of ensuring world stability in the future, one way of avoiding a third world war, is for the peace-loving nations to have a reasonable degree of unity and a reasonable strength. We have had the bitter experience of the late thirties with its policy of appeasement, a policy under which we hardly dared to say "no" if somebody else shouted loudly "yes"; we had the bitter experience of that policy, and therefore I think a policy of ensuring that we have maximum cooperation and strength in order to maintain a peaceful world by cooperating with other nations which we know to be friendly is a sound and practical course to take.

We come now to the question of what type of individual or troops is to be permitted to come into Canada in accordance with the announcement made by the Prime Minister. He emphasized the fact, as reported on page 346 of Hansard of February 12, that they could come to the extent authorized by law. It may be that a request of the government is sufficient or that an invitation of the government may perhaps be considered as being authorized by law. Perhaps the minister will go into that in greater detail when we get into committee on the bill. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> The collaboration will necessarily be limited and will be based on the following principles:
> (1) Interchange of selected individuals so as to increase the familiarity of each country's defence establishment with that of the other country.

That would probably mean a few staff officers and instructors.

> General cooperation and exchange of observers in connection with exercises . . .

No doubt there will be certain manoeuvres, exercises and experiments carried out not dissimilar to the Musk-Ox expedition of a few months ago. I can picture United States observers and perhaps the observers of other countries coming here to gain from the experience of such exercises. Then the Prime Minister went on:

> Encouragement of common designs and standards in arms, equipment, organization, methods of training and new developments.

There again one may readily understand the necessity, if we are to have a uniform system of equipment, of the Americans testing out those new weapons and that new equipment over our terrain and under our climatic conditions. We do not want to think only in terms of ground armament; there is the armament of the air as well. I am quite certain that it will be necessary for new equipment to be tested in our northern clime, but there again only a few men would be required to carry out those experiments. Then the Prime Minister went on:

> Mutual and reciprocal availability of military, naval and air facilities in each country.

That would be placing, shall we say, stations in the north at the disposal of the United States, so that they may come up and study conditions and, if necessary, operate from there. In those principles as laid down there, no mention was made of units. I suggest that the first time the possibility of units of the United States forces visiting this country was mentioned was when the minister referred to visits of United States units. That is putting a different complexion on the matter; that is going one step farther than the principles enunciated by the Prime Minister on February 12.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If by using the word "unit" I conveyed to hon. members to whom technical military language may have special significance, something different from what was in the Prime Minister's statement, then I must apologize. The word was not used with the intention of signifying anything other than what was contained in the statement made by the Prime Minister on February 12. It may be my fault in using an expression which has a technical military significance which I did not attach to it.

Mr. PEARKES: I understand the term to mean a unit under the command of an officer. The definition of "unit" is given in the military textbooks, and I would certainly put that interpretation on the word. A battalion is a unit; a battery of artillery is a unit, and a regiment of tanks is a unit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I must confess my ignorance. I thought the term could be used for any number who were under the command of an officer who had disciplinary powers over them under the laws of his country.

Mr. PEARKES: As long as it is understood that the principle here refers, shall I say to small detachments which are here for the purpose of carrying out some experiment or demonstrating the value of some new equipment to our Canadian troops, then I feel that no change has been made. But if the term "unit" is meant to exceed that, then I feel that this house should be advised of the number who may be coming into the country. One can readily appreciate the necessity of a few men coming here, and as long as it is understood that there will only be a few at any time, then personally I can raise no objection to the principle because I feel that it would be a detriment if we put obstacles in the way of further collaboration.

As for the administration of discipline, when we have these visiting troops here I think it is fair to say from the experience of the last war, when I definitely had close contact with United States troops in this country and with Canadian troops serving on United States soil, that it is in the interests of both forces that offenders who have been guilty of breaches of military discipline should be tried by military courts under their own officers. When we go farther we find that provision is made in this legislation so that our own courts are not affected. If I remember rightly, during the war that provision was not in the act and that caused some difficulties, although on the whole the relations between the United States and the Canadian forces were most happy. As will always be the case, little incidents sometimes occurred which possibly could have been cleared up had it then been possible to have brought these cases before our Canadian courts.

As to the question of the removal of certain ancient clauses in our criminal code, if the United States detachments are to come here they must march, and if they are to demonstrate their new equipment they must be allowed to carry that equipment and those explosives, provided always that they are under discipline and are carrying out their lawful procedures.

There is one clause in this measure which makes it retroactive until the first of April, and I presume that is because of the United States detachment now at Churchill, to which the minister referred before the dinner recess. I think it would be a fair question to ask him whether there are any other United States detachments here similar to that one in the northland. I have heard stories that there are some in connection with the air navigation posts in the north. I think the house might reasonably be informed as to the extent of the United States detachments which are now in Canada, particularly since the measure is to be made retroactive to the first of April.

Regarding these detachments which are here, the minister pointed out that the detachment at Churchill was serving under the orders of the Canadian commander in that area. I presume that whenever an invitation is issued to United States troops to come here there will have to be a special agreement drawn up to fit each particular case. I do not think it would be practical to have an over-all statement as to how the chain of command would be exercised. I mention that point, because I think it is important that when the invitation is issued and the agreement first drawn up it be definitely stated what the chain of command is.

Finally, I would ask the minister to tell the house whether any reciprocal agreement has been made, because it is a fact that there are Canadian observers in the United States, and there may be Canadian detachments visiting the United States. Has the government of the United States granted similar agreements to our troops? I think that also is a question which perhaps the minister would answer.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, the implications of this bill, No. 253, now before the House of Commons are, in my view, most serious. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), in introducing the measure before the dinner recess referred to the fact that the permanent joint defence board had come to certain understandings with respect to training and the defence of this hemisphere and with regard to projects involving a study of hemisphere defences. In so doing he stated that we had on the statute books of this country no legislation by which a foreign military force could be excluded from this country or by which it could be permitted to enter Canada; that it was the prerogative of the governor general of this country as the commander of the Canadian army to make whatever arrangements he thought necessary for defence cooperation in conjunction with other powers, and that parliament at the moment had no jurisdiction. I think that is an exceedingly serious implication. We know by virtue of the statement of the minister himself, and of course it is fairly common knowledge in this country, that there are in Canada at the present time, in peace time, foreign troops. Granted they are friendly troops at the moment. Nevertheless we have foreign troops in Canada now. By this measure they are permitted to be in uniform. By this measure they are permitted to be under arms and are permitted to carry on whatever military manoeuvres their own commanders consider necessary, although I hasten to admit that in all probability it will be by collaboration between the chiefs of staffs of the two countries.

This bill, No. 253, specifically makes provision for the setting up of military courts by which these foreign troops on Canadian soil may be disciplined by the army or service acts applicable to the services in their own country and without regard to Canadian law at all. I know, of course, that the minister will assure me that Canadian law will be observed by the troops of any foreign power which are in this country. As a matter of fact it is likely to be true that in the ordinary course of military or civil offences the offenders will be turned over to their own provost corps, which will make arrangements with their own military commanders to try the offenders under their own military laws, and that civil prosecutions for civil or criminal offences may or may not follow.

The set-up here is very nearly akin to the old days of the absolute monarchs who employed mercenary troops, foreigners, whom they commanded and the dispositions of which they arranged by collaboration at their own pleasure. Let us just put the shoe on the other foot for a moment. I know that since the early part of the nineteenth century Canada and the United States have been at peace. We are the closest of friends. The restrictions in movement back and forth between this country and the United States are minor. There is very little restriction with respect to free intercourse across the international border. The Rush-Bagot treaty, which limited the border defences of the two countries by agreement in the early part of the last century, has never been contravened. We are literally close friends from a national point of view. Let us, however, in the light of the international situation at the present time, assume that it is not United States troops to whom we are extending the privileges that are implied in either the actions of the permanent joint board of defence or in the bill that is now before the house; let us assume for a moment that we extended those privileges to Russia. Judging by the present tenor of public opinion in the United States, I have no doubt that there would immediately be an outcry on the part of the government across the 49th parallel, and rightly so, that Russian troops were training, shall we say, on Musk-Ox or on a similar expedition. And I say that the United States of America would have every justification for complaining of the fact that in peace time we were permitting foreign troops in uniform, on manœuvre and under the supervision of their own officers, to drill and train in Canada.

The fact that at the moment we have a friendly neighbour to the south does not alter the principle of this discussion one iota. I want to make that perfectly clear. I feel, too, that the fact that these exercises and manœuvres are taking place on Canadian soil, and that there is such close inspection of our northern terrain is not accidental. For that reason, and by virtue of the fact that we have just barely emerged from a great war world conflict and that we are trying to lay the foundation of an organization which will prevent future wars, I say that we are going off literally half-cocked.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) praised the government for the fact that we had a form of defence arrangement with our powerful friendly neighbour to the south, and gave as his view—and I respect his view because he is an outstanding military man, but only as the view of a soldier—that world peace and stability were being assured by virtue of the fact that we had such a cooperative arrangement between Canada and the United States for the defence of this continent. Let us go back about thirty-five years ago. At that time we also had two very large world alliances, the entente cordiale and the triple alliance. The fact that there were powerful neighbours associated with one another did not prevent war. In my opinion it may even be argued that war actually resulted from the military alliances which were formed prior to 1914.

Mr. POULIOT: It was called the balance of power.

Mr. PROBE: Let me say one thing further while I am referring to that alliance. France and Britain were involved in the alliance at that time, and I feel that the hon. member for Nanaimo can verify what I now say. Before the war, but when it was almost certain that war was imminent, he knows, as do I, that British and Canadian officers went over the battlegrounds in France and in Belgium not in uniform and not on manœuvres but as civilian tourists on bicycles.

This is a serious matter which is before the house, not because the bill deals with the discipline of troops. I feel that in this bill we are surrendering some of the sovereignty of Canada to army courts of a foreign power. But that in itself is not the worst feature of the bill. It is the fact that the bill is premised on the presence in this country of foreign, if, at the same time, friendly forces. If we are to live up to the obligations that we undertook a year and a half ago at San Francisco to all the nations, large and small, then we must not enter into an arrangement with the United States permitting their troops to come across to Canada, and ours to go to the United States. This makes for a virtual alliance. On the contrary we should hold out for and live up to article 47 of the united nations charter to which we are signatories, which reads that "there shall be established a military staff committee to advise and assist the security council on all questions relating to the security council's military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security; the employment and command of forces placed at its disposal; the regulation of armaments and possible disarmament."

As a member of the united nations and as a free and independent country, if we are ever to surrender all or part of our sovereignty, which in my view is what we are doing at present, it must be to the united nations. There will come a day; conceivably we are on the threshold of it now, because we have our eyes looking forward to world government, when we may have to consider, and undoubtedly will consider, the surrender of a portion of our national sovereignty. If that sovereignty is to be delegated, it must be only by knowledge of and by agreement with the united nations assembly.

Mr. COLDWELL: And with the consent of this parliament.

Mr. PROBE: And with the consent of the parliament of Canada. Even such a partial surrender must be a negotiated one, not by Canada alone as is the case now, with some single country, but with a higher power and by other nations surrendering equal sovereignty with ours, as and where such surrender is applicable.

Some of us served in His Majesty's uniform. Once we were in the conflict, there was no question as to what we were to do; we did as we were told. The forces that put us into the position of volunteering for service and volunteering to die were at work long before we put on the uniform. Most of us in this house are too old to be concerned for our selfish skins, but we have children and we have neighbours. This house of parliament has a responsibility, not just to our neighbours in our communities, but to the Dominion of Canada, to the United States, to Russia and to every country in this world. I, for one, will not consent to foreign troops drilling on this soil except by consent and agreement with the united nations. I wish therefore to move, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay):

That Bill No. 253 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I congratulate the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) upon the able speech he has just made, although I differ with him on one point. I do not believe in the united nations. But his exposé was remarkable. I cannot understand the legislation which we now have substituting United States law for our own. Where will it end? What will happen when the Chinese are here? What will happen if the Russians come here? We belong to the British commonwealth. We have great regard for the king's regulations and orders of Great Britain, but they become the law of the country only if they are accepted by this country and are made our own law. The British army regulations are not in force in Canada unless they are accepted by us. Yet here we are ready to accept United States regulations without knowing what they are. Where are we going with this idea of the united nations business? It is the summit of absurdity as I said today before a social club in Montreal. Who are the united nations? The united nations are not the small nations; they are not the so-called middle powers, which do not exist as the Secretary of State for External Affairs told me in answer to a question last year. The united nations are the big powers. Who are the big powers? One is the United States of America, which may crumble at any time. They are a big power at the present time, but how long will that last? I hope it will last for a long time. I hope the United States is a country which will last for a long time. It is powerful and rich. I am not anti-American, but I do not see what business we have to accept the law of the United States regarding troops, without knowing what it is. What about the conflict between United States legislation and ours? What about the laws of the French army? They are another of the big five. Take all the big five together: Great Britain, the United States, Russia, France and China. Is it true that each army will have a separate kind of law while it is in this country? There is no country in the world that has been going as far as Canada has been in accepting everything that comes from the outside.

I have great fear about the united nations. We hear the ministers and some members of the opposition saying, "Fight socialism; fight communism." I have nothing against the nations represented by the governments of the five united nations. The Russians may be good people. The British are good people. The French, the Chinese and the Americans are all good people. But I do not believe in their form of government at the present time. Everybody is complaining about communism. One member of the house was a communist and he was ruled out of the chamber for cause. No communism! Yet we are ready to accept the rule of a communistic government. No socialism! Yet we are ready to accept the rule of a socialist government in Great Britain. Peace, order and good government! Yet we are ready to accept the rule of an unstable government in France. Peace, peace! Yet we are ready to accept the rule of China which is still at war.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Quite right.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Now let us take the United States. There are very few members who would be ready for annexation. But the worst form of annexation is the blind acceptance of the laws of another country. I cannot understand how we can allow the laws of the United States to jump across the border. What I say is not at all unfriendly to any one of the big powers, but I would not support with my vote any one of the big powers separately. How then can I accept their rule jointly for the soldiers of my country or for anybody else who will be here? It will be some kind of soviets in the army. What is important in the country is for everybody to know the law. There is a principle of law which is known by everybody. It is that no one shall ignore the law. During the war we all ignored the law. We had to do so, because no one could be familiar with all the edicts of the minor clerks who exercised the power of parliament for the duration. But now that the war is over, will the students of law be obliged to learn the army regulations of each one of the united nations? That would be some problem for them, and I do not know how many would be able to pass their examinations. We are internationally minded now. During the first war everything was national. There was the Canadian National Railways, national shoe shine, national boot blacks, national luncheon, national everything. Since the recent war we have turned international.

An hon. MEMBER: International breweries.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, International breweries, international shoe shine, international lunch counter, international beauty shop, international everything.

Mr. FULTON: International Nickel.

Mr. POULIOT: And we think we are doing better for mankind. No, sir. What was the slogan against which all the boys were fighting during the first war? They were fighting against the slogan "Might is right." They were fighting for the self-determination of peoples. I remember the fourteen points of President Wilson, and other declarations he made. It was for the emancipation of the world. When the last war started it was for the liberation of Poland. But what was the result of the second war? Now we accept as ours the slogan, "Might is right," and right is ignored. The right of the weak is the same as the right of the strong; otherwise there would be no right at all. Right is not a question of power; right is not a question of the number of men; right is not a question of the atomic bomb. Right must be justice, and justice shall be the same for the weak as for the strong, for the poor as for the rich. The acceptance of the theory of might against that of right is a simple negation of right.

I cannot understand how intelligent men can come here and be in favour of the disunited nations which parade as the united nations of the world. That is beyond my understanding. Ministers and members of parliament of all parties can take a boat or a train or an aeroplane to attend conferences and shake hands with Mr. So-and-So, the great Mr. So-and-So, the very great Mr. So-and-So, the super Mr. So-and-So. They come back and we have nothing in return. So much was this the case that on August 2 of last year, when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in Paris, he said, "We ask for nothing. We ask for no concessions." It was not surprising that after this statement the Big Five said to him, "You do not want anything. Stay at home." It was logical, because the Big Five are dividing the spoils among themselves. They have created an atmosphere of fear, fear of the atomic bomb, fear of the destruction of the world. If the world is destroyed it will be through the greed of the mighty of today. It was almost destroyed by the greed of the mighty of yesteryear.

When I think of that, Mr. Speaker; when I think of all the silly legislation that has been suggested by the united nations organization, which has gone nowhere, which has not accomplished anything, which is not able to settle reasonably the case of even one Italian town, the town of Pola, I also recall that we are to stand for their rule, that we are to subject ourselves to their government. No, sir; never. What is the propaganda? It has been to combat the idea of patriotism. Patriotism has been called names all the time. During the war it was called isolationism. The man who was a patriot was an isolationist; and afterwards we had lectures in Toronto about racial narrowness. There is a phrase which is well known; it is "petite patrie" or small country. Patriotism is born in the family. The man or woman within the family is amongst dear ones. Then there are the surroundings, the friends of the neighbourhood, those who live in the same place, those who live in the same county, in the same province and in the same country. Patriotism is the extension of Christian charity. The basis of patriotism is love of thy neighbour and the assistance that is given by people who are close to each other and who try to help themselves. Is it a crime to love one's family? Is it a crime to love one's friends? Is it a crime to love one's own place, one's own county, one's own province and one's own country? But those who have spoken in that way have been pointed at and have been told they were no longer good citizens when they did not believe in the silly organization which is the united nations; an organization that has done positively nothing, that has cost millions of dollars in travelling expenses. Perhaps it has satisfied the personal feelings of some people, but nothing has been done for the good of the world.

Some ministers may laugh, but what I shall tell them will bring them to their senses. Only a few days ago a solemn warning was given to the world by His Holiness Pope Pius XII. He said that if peace is to come, it must come in 1947; otherwise it will be too late. When I think of that old man who is in the seat of St. Peter, the pilot of the Roman Catholic church, and all the worries he had during the war, worries that did not cease with V-E day and V-J day, I am ready to listen to his words of appeasement because they are uttered by one who makes no difference between races and who desires the happiness of the whole world. Well, sir, it is unfortunate to think that, after the little progress which has been made by the united nations, we still stick to it. I cannot understand that stubbornness. United nations is a mess. United nations is a false description of some so-called statesmen who are always fighting each other, who are speaking to each other with distrust; and we still believe in them. Who would accept the rule of Russia in this country? Who would accept the rule of the socialist government of Great Britain in this country? Who would accept the rule of the French government in this country?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that the legislation before the house is with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada. The purpose of this bill is to make provision for the discipline and internal administration of the visiting forces. May I suggest to the hon. member that he relate his remarks a little more directly to the principle involved in this bill?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. The reason I was making these remarks before you rose, Mr. Speaker, was precisely because the whole set-up of the united nations has disturbed the minds of people throughout the world. It is precisely the reason why we have legislation like this before us tonight. If the whole world had not been perturbed we would not have such legislation today. No one would have ever thought of it. But during the war, when a wish was expressed by Roosevelt, it was done. And when a wish was expressed by Churchill, it was the law of the land in Canada. That is not the way to govern this country. We cannot stand for any piece of United States legislation unless we know what it is, and unless we approve it formally. That is the way we ought to act.

Have we reached the point where we have become Yankeefied enough to take for granted everything that is done across the border? I remember that one of the brightest journalists in Canada, Judith Robinson, wrote some time ago during the war, in the Quarterly Review, a fine article in which she referred to some remarks made by an Australian professor in international law. He used to say on some occasions that the reason Canadians did not have time to be themselves was that they were always busy explaining to the Yankees that they were not English, and to the English that they were not Yankees. But it will be pretty hard to explain to the English that we are not Yankees if we accept blindly any legislation which may be passed at any time by the United States congress or by military authorities concerning the army.

I presume I have said enough to be well understood. I shall not speak longer at this time, but when we reach the committee stage I may have more to say about the matter.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I fear I cannot compete with the oratory of my old friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

Mr. POULIOT: You are much better.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope not.

Mr. GREEN: Furthermore, I cannot agree with his sweeping condemnation of the united nations. However I do suggest, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the house that this bill brings up considerations which are far-reaching and which should be thought out carefully, not only by members of the house, but also by the Canadian people at large.

The bill, as we know, is entitled the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act, and it is described as an act to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces.

This bill is carrying into peace time a war-time provision. We are now being asked to enact in peace time a wartime provision; and if we do so it will be the first time a foreign nation has possessed in Canada in peace time the rights given by this measure.

I think it is worth while for us to go back a few years and consider just what position has been taken in Canada with respect to forces from other countries. First of all, I would refer hon. members to the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) also referred this evening, and which was passed in 1933. I presume it was passed as a result of the Statute of Westminster, to carry out the provisions of that statute. In effect, it gave authority to the officer of any troops from another nation of the commonwealth visiting Canada to discipline his troops.

But it was more restricted than the present bill in certain respects; for example, in section 3 there is provision that the officers are to have power only in matters concerning discipline and in matters concerning the internal administration of such force. There is no such restriction in the bill before the house tonight. It is true that such restriction appears in the description of the bill, and in one of the sidenotes, but it does not appear in any actual sections.

There are also several other differences between the act relating to the British commonwealth and this measure which relates to the United States. One of them is that provision is made for attaching troops from the force of one of the other commonwealth nations to the Canadian force. That is found in section 6, where provision is made for the temporary attachment of commonwealth troops to a Canadian force. But that provision is not found in the bill before us this evening, and I do not understand why it has been omitted. It does seem to me that if but very few United States troops are to come to Canada, they could be attached to Canadian units.

The next significant step was taken in 1938. Hon. members who were here at that time will recall that on July 1 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett raised the question of Canada's having refused to allow airmen from Great Britain to come here and train. A most significant debate took place on that occasion, and I shall read to the house a portion of the statement made on that occasion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He took the position that for the British to send airmen here to train would be the equivalent of setting up on our shores a foreign military station.

[Mr. Green.]

I quote from page 4527 of Hansard, of that year, where the Prime Minister said:

> I must say that long ago Canadian governments finally settled the constitutional principle that in Canadian territory there could be no military establishments—

And, mind you, this was only to establish a training school for airmen.

> —unless they were owned, maintained and controlled by the Canadian government responsible to the Canadian parliament and people.

Then he went on to say:

> Such domestic ownership, maintenance and control of all military stations and personnel is one of the really indispensable hall marks of national sovereign self-government and an indispensable basis for friendly and effective cooperation between the governments of Canada and those of other parts of the British commonwealth of nations, including the government of the United Kingdom.

That was just nine years ago, in 1938.

> Outside its homeland a state may have military stations and quarter military personnel in countries which it "owns," in its colonies or "possessions," or in its mandated territories according to the trust deed, or in countries over which it has assumed or been yielded, by some arrangement, what amounts to a protectorate. But no country pretending to sovereign self-control could permit such a state of affairs or its implications and consequences. I need only add that what I have said has, of course, to be sharply distinguished from the case of actual war where a country may have to permit its partners, associates or allies to maintain, operate and control military establishments and forces within its territory, forced to do so by the actual strategic or tactical necessities and for the purposes, but only for the purposes, of the actual joint war.

That was in 1938. Then in 1939, the following year, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who was then Minister of National Defence, announced that arrangements had been made by which British airmen might be brought to Canada to train. I am going to read to the house the terms under which they were to be allowed to come here. The minister is reported on page 3259 of Hansard of that year as follows:

> While the final detailed technical arrangements have still to be completed, it is possible to say now that agreement has been reached on a scheme whereby pilots from the United Kingdom will come to Canada to be given the intermediate and advanced stages of training—

These are the significant words:

> —under the auspices of the Canadian Department of National Defence.

Then the war came on.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. member be kind enough to put on the record what the Conservative party said in this house at that time?

Mr. GREEN: If the Minister of Veterans Affairs wants to make a political issue out of this, then let him put it on himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not the slightest.

Mr. GREEN: In the fall of 1939 war struck. Then in 1941 we find there was enacted what was called the foreign forces order. I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to correct me if I am wrong in citing any of these orders. I believe that was passed because we then had training in Canada nationals of various allied countries. For example, there were Belgians, Czechoslovakians, Norwegians, Poles, and soldiers from the Netherlands. That foreign forces order was in somewhat similar terms to the bill before us this evening. It mentioned specifically as foreign powers the nations to which I have referred, and then there was added this provision:

. . . and any other power which may be designated by order of the governor in council as a foreign power to which this order shall apply.

By the way, that order also was restricted to matters concerning discipline and internal administration. Then the United States came into the war and in 1943, by an order in council dated April 6 of that year, the foreign forces order was made to apply to troops from the United States, with certain variations. For example, they were not given the power to try cases of murder, manslaughter or rape, and there was a provision that they were to retain certain rights which had been guaranteed to them by an exchange of notes between the United States government and the Canadian government. Hon. members who are interested will find that set out in the last paragraph of the order in council.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I know the hon. member will want to have his statement complete. The order extending the foreign forces order to the United States was officially repealed and replaced by order of December 20, 1943, which is the one under which the commanders of United States forces present in Canada actually operated during the war period and up to April 1 of this year.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the number of that order in council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is P.C. 9694 of December 20, 1943.

Mr. GREEN: Then we come to days of peace, and we have the Prime Minister making his statement on February 12 of this year with regard to cooperation in defence matters between Canada and the United States. This will be found on page 346 of Hansard. The fifth principle which he then laid down reads as follows:

As an underlying principle all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory.

That is a somewhat sketchy background against which we can consider this bill. There are two sets of questions which should be answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or by the Prime Minister before we are asked to give second reading to the bill. The first set has to do with the terms of the bill itself, with our dealings with the United States. The second set has to do with the wider implications, with just how this measure and the policy under which it is enacted tie in with the united nations and our obligations to that world organization.

With regard to Canada and the United States, I put these questions: Is this provision fully reciprocal and have the United States on their statute books a bill which gives Canada the same rights that this bill gives to the United States? Are the United States forces to come here only for training purposes, or are they to come here to establish military posts, to set up what the Prime Minister described on July 1, 1938, as military stations, although at that time he was referring only to training schools for airmen?

Then what method is to be used to give United States forces permission to come to Canada. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a significant and far-reaching statement this afternoon. He was asked what consent was necessary in order that United States troops might be brought to Canada, and he said that that rested with the governor in council. I asked him whether, if groups could come in, that applied also to divisions. If it applies to groups and to divisions, this means that the cabinet could invite into this country any number of foreign troops they saw fit to invite under the present law without any reference to parliament. Yet at the same time we have a limitation in our law that we can raise only 30,000 Canadian troops for any permanent army that we have.

There is a gap here that must be filled by legislation. Surely parliament should determine under what conditions foreign troops are to be invited to come to this country. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is a famous lawyer and there cannot be much doubt when he says that at the present time there is no restriction in our law against the cabinet inviting any number of foreign troops to this country they see fit. That is something which I repeat should be decided by parliament, and parliament should give consideration to just what the conditions should be under which foreign troops may be invited to our shores.

Then I should like to know why we are not being asked to pass a foreign forces order rather than a United States forces order. If we are to have troops come here, we should not pick and choose in the bill. I doubt whether it is wise to have a bill applying to only one nation. We should have a foreign forces order that could, if deemed advisable, be applied to all nations.

Mr. POULIOT: All nations, great and small, not only the big powers.

Mr. GREEN: Yes. We hear a lot of talk these days about discrimination. I have heard a lot of speeches in the house in the last few weeks on discrimination and how united nations would get after us if we did not stop discriminating. But here is discrimination of the worst kind so far as other nations are concerned.

How permanent is this provision to be? There is no provision in the bill for a time limit. When this goes on the statute books of Canada it will have been a whole lot easier to put it on than it will be to take it off. It has no time limit, and if we try to remove it from the statute books ten years from now we are apt to provoke the United States.

The British, who have had great experience in matters of this kind, passed an act during the war to provide for United States troops being in Britain and for their control by United States officers. Members will find that act in the Public General Acts and Measures of 1942 of the United Kingdom, chapter 31. That act, in effect, makes valid the terms arranged between Great Britain and the United States in an exchange of notes. The notes are significant. I quote from the note to the United States. One provision is this:

> His Majesty's government propose that the foregoing arrangements should operate during the conduct of the conflict against our common enemies and until six months (or such other period as may be mutually agreed upon) after the final termination of such conflict and the restoration of a state of peace.

In other words, they put a time limit on the operation of the act. There is another provision in the British note for reciprocal treatment. It reads:

> I feel that Your Excellency will appreciate that the considerations which have convinced His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom that the interests of our common cause would be best served by the arrangements which they are prepared to make as regards jurisdiction over American forces in the United Kingdom would be equally applicable in the case of British forces which in the course of the war against our common enemies may be stationed in territory under American jurisdiction. It would accordingly be very agreeable to His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom if Your Excellency were authorized to inform me that in that case the government of the United States of America will be ready to take all steps in their power to ensure to the British forces concerned a position corresponding to that of American forces in the United Kingdom under the arrangements which His Majesty's government are willing to make.

In other words, they made an agreement with the United States on a fifty-fifty basis, each nation to have the same rights.

My final question with regard to this bill is this: What control will Canada have over the activities of these United States troops? That, I think, should be fully explained by the minister. So much for the implications as between Canada and the United States.

What about the united nations? Is this policy in line with the united nations charter? I believe that the objective of every thinking Canadian today is world peace. I believe, further, that practically every thinking Canadian is still relying on the united nations to bring about that world peace. I will not include the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), because obviously he is not. But I think the great majority of Canadian people still feel that if the united nations is not able to bring about world peace there will be no world peace.

Mr. POULIOT: They will have to change their manners.

Mr. GREEN: Yet, Mr. Speaker, to me personally—and I speak only for myself—it seems only too clear that there is a tendency for the world to divide into two great power blocs. Practically every day some move is made in that direction, and Canada is being drawn into that movement. Let me point out the dangers. There is more danger for Canada in a world war between two groups of powers than there is for any other nation on earth, because the two groups of powers are obviously the Russian and the American, and here our country lies between them. If the world divides finally into these two camps and there is a conflict between them, the chances are that it will be fought right here in Canada. This trend toward two great groups is setting the stage for a third world war, although our sons have been back from the last war, some of them, for only a little over a year; yet here we are in this position.

I suggest that the broad Canadian policy should be, rather than encouraging the building up of these two groups, for us to do everything possible to strengthen all the other nations, to equalize the power. Take, for example, the British commonwealth. It is so placed that it must be for peace. It must have peace to survive, and every effort by the British commonwealth is directed toward world peace. The same is true of the French empire. They must have peace, too, because their territory is so far-flung. I think the same is true of China.

Mr. MITCHELL: And the United States.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think the United States and Russia are under the same necessity of having world peace, because they cannot be got at as the British commonwealth and the French empire can. They are not so vulnerable.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not mention Russia.

Mr. GREEN: Our aim should be to strengthen, not only the British commonwealth and France and China, but all the other nations, to try to have an equalizing of power.

Again, with regard to the united nations, if we are to have an arrangement such as is envisaged by this bill, why is that not done under chapter 8 of the united nations charter, which provides for regional arrangements?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is.

Mr. GREEN: Why not let us have it right out on the table and open and aboveboard. The first paragraph of the article reads as follows:

> Nothing in the present charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the united nations.

Examples of such arrangements are the Australia-New Zealand agreement and, I think also the Arab league. These are two examples of regional arrangements.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Russia and Albania; Russia and Yugoslavia; Russia and Bulgaria; are these examples?

Mr. GREEN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Well, our friends of the C.C.F. want Russia in.

Mr. MERRITT: Stand up, if you want to make a speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GREEN: I have the floor now, and while I am always delighted to hear the hon. member for Vancouver North, the present moment is not the time or the place. I suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should explain why this Canadian-United States arrangement to permit United States forces to come into our territory should not be drawn up in the form of a regional agreement and submitted to the united nations. I do not mean the bill only; I mean the whole agreement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt? It was not drawn up in the form of an agreement, but it was in the form of statements made simultaneously here and in Washington, and the statements were communicated to the secretary general of the united nations for communication by him to all the members of the united nations.

Mr. GREEN: What the minister is referring to is the statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada on February 12. I had in mind an agreement such as the Australia-New Zealand one. Frankly, I do not understand why the provision for allowing United States troops on Canadian shores was not made by treaty, and then the treaty endorsed by the house, rather than in the way the government is doing it. However I repeat that what I had in mind was an agreement such as the Australia-New Zealand one.

My suggestions to the minister are that he should explain the questions under these two categories. Perhaps it might be as well for the government to delay final consideration of this bill until complete information is given to the house. This House of Commons is comparatively inexperienced in dealing with foreign affairs. We have been doing it for only about seven or eight years.

Mr. MITCHELL: Judging from the speeches that we listen to sometimes, one would not think so.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know whether that is meant to be an insult or a compliment.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take it whichever way you wish.

Mr. GREEN: I take into consideration the source, my good friend the Minister of Labour. For the sake of ourselves as hon. members, and more particularly so that the Canadian people can thoroughly understand what they are being led into, I suggest that time should be taken for the consideration of this measure

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I desire to say just a very few words on the bill now before us. No one could listen to the calm and reasoned speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Green) who has just taken his seat or to the splendid presentation of the case by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Probe), without being conscious of the tremendous implications of the legislation now before us. It is true that in a way the bill seems innocent enough. It is merely to permit certain forces or military groups which come in by arrangement from the United States, to administer their own military discipline under our law. So far as the bill is concerned, that is practically all that it means. But the background which has been given by the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred does bring out the seriousness of the implications of this legislation.

Personally I would not object to the legislation if it were, as the previous speaker said, made universal and reciprocal with a view to carrying out the programme or policy of the united nations, having in view merely the protection of the world peace. If that were its objective, then I think the preamble to the bill should read differently. It should be an act to make provision with respect to foreign forces when visiting Canada, and not limited to any particular nation. But if the arrangements have been made between our government and that of the United States to bring military units or groups or units—I do not know just what the term is that is a better one to use after the discussion which took place about units—to come into this country, then it is only natural that they should be permitted to apply their own principles of discipline. But I want to go beyond that.

In the statement that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made earlier in the session with respect to the matter, I understood him to say that any arrangements which might be made in this regard between the United States and Canada would be in harmony with the proposals of the united nations. If that is true, then there is no reason in the world why this should be limited only to the United States of America.

Reference has been made to the sad fact that the world is gradually being lined up into two great blocs. These blocs have been mentioned—the Russians with their satellites and the Americans with theirs. I think, sir, it is much too soon for us to identify ourselves with either. If there is to be any world peace, notwithstanding, shall I say, the tirade of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) against the united nations, it will have to come through the united nations. I do not see how we can now align ourselves in the smallest degree with one of these blocs without being regarded by the other as being in a way to becoming their enemy, and thus we are by our action, however innocent we may be in taking it, putting ourselves in the position of blocking the peace of the world.

I also noticed that the minister in charge of this legislation brought to our attention the fact that it was within the powers of the governor general to invite friendly troops into this country. In time of war it is essential that the governor general, as the commander in chief, should have full authority over our forces, but in time of peace I do not think that it a very wise policy. All our policies for defence, all our policies which imply either peace or war in time of peace, while we have time to consider policy, should be considered and passed by this parliament.

I insist, so far as my voice goes, on that practice. We have sufficient time now to consider this and similar questions which have a bearing on the united nations and our hopes for the peace of the world. Let us then find our policy; let us debate it here; let us settle it and let us follow it, but do not leave these things to any individual, not even to the cabinet, unless they have first been passed by this parliament.

I do not know to what extent our government is committed to a policy of coordination of defence measures, practices and manoeuvres with the government of the United States. I presume that if we hope to be united in a united nations world police force to maintain the peace of the world, it would be a good thing for us to have the coordination and collaboration in matters of defence which the government appears to contemplate. But again I say that must be not a matter between us and some other single nation; it is a matter for the consideration of all the nations of the world. It must be done, not only in harmony with the strict law or the strict regulations of the united nations, but in harmony with the broad spirit of international action to maintain the peace of the world. If that is not so, then I for one would desire to register my objection to the present procedure. But if that is so, then I say again that we should not confine this privilege to one nation. I imagine, as the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Probe) said, that if we were now passing legislation which permitted British troops, French troops or Russian troops to come in here, there would be much objection from many countries and much objection from people in this country as well. Regardless of the fact that the United States is our great neighbour, and our friend with whom we have so much in common, I do not think we can presume to make a military policy with her alone when we have been committed to the principles of the united nations. Having regard, therefore, to the important implications of this legislation in its bearing upon the future peace of the world, I think it would be well if this house should send it, in accordance with the amendment which has been moved, to the committee which has the right and authority of this house to consider matters of this kind, in order to give the members of parliament an opportunity to study it in all its details and in all its implications, so that we may be sure that we shall not now make a blunder which we may repent in a short time to come.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to make a few remarks which are occasioned mainly by those made by one or two of the opposition speakers. The discussion has centered, not on the principle of this bill because it seems to me the principle is recognized that if we are to have foreign troops in this country, then they should have some measure of control of their own troops and of discipline over them.

The debate so far has revolved around the principle of the admission of foreign troops. The stand taken by the opposition seems to be that this should be done not by agreement between this country and the United States of America, but by ratification of the united nations under the section for regional agreements. The thought which immediately leaps to my mind is that if Canada, a small nation, is expected to follow such a procedure, then it is certainly incumbent on the great nations in the united nations to do similarly. Yet I have not heard of Russia approaching the united nations and asking that sanction for the troops they now have in Albania, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Bulgaria and Roumania; I have not heard either of the United Kingdom in the past asking for approval for the troops they have in Greece; nor, now that the United States has taken over that task, have I heard of any request from the United States for such approval. Therefore, to expect us to set this shining example at this time in our relationship with our closest and most friendly neighbour is, I think, a little absurd. There is no doubt in my mind that the great bulk of the Canadian people welcome the closest and most immediate defence connections with our great neighbour to the south.

Mention has been made tonight of this great unprotected boundary between us. Certainly any enemy who attacks either Canada or the United States, obviously puts the other partner in a dangerous position. It is for that reason that we, without the sanction of the united nations, set up our excellent joint defence board. To the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who spoke tonight, I say that I am quite sure that ninety per cent of the people of Vancouver would give hearty accord to any plan whereby the troops of either of these two countries can visit freely for our joint defence. It is not a matter of distrust of the united nations. Far from it. When the great nations show a good example by putting forward such proposals for sanction of the united nations anywhere else, then that will be the time for us to ask for it. But until that time comes, we should put our own house in order first. People should remember what happened to Belgium. Belgium got a similar idea before the recent war, when they dropped the alliances they had in the hope that they would be safe. Their safety was no better in this war than it was in the last.

There is just one other thing I should like to say, and it is something which struck me forcibly during the speech by the hon. member for Regina. During the last one and a half years, I have been receiving over and over again from the Labour Progressive party clubs in my riding and from the communist-dominated unions of British Columbia these pious resolutions saying ,"Let us have joint control of the atomic bomb." The reason behind them is not the sentiment that there should be joint control. The thing is to give their Russian friends an insight and knowledge of the atomic bomb. You have only to hear the Labour Progressive party speakers in British Columbia to realize that. Now we are hearing the C.C.F. advocate what to me is an exactly similar thing. We are going to ask the united nations —that is, Great Britain, China, France and Russia—whether it is proper for us to allow United States troops into this country, with Russia having the power of veto. I tell the hon. member for Regina that he is playing the Russians' game when he suggests that to the Canadian parliament.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I do not think anybody can accuse me of internationalism.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is right.

Mr. JAQUES: I think I can say that I have said more against the surrender of Canadian sovereignty than all the rest of the members of this house put together.

An hon. MEMBER: What a man!

Mr. JAQUES: I have even made a number of trips to the United States and addressed great audiences there for the sole purpose of defending American nationalism and Canadian nationalism. In fact, only a week or two ago I was told that my nationalism was a menace—

Mr. HARTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. JAQUES: —because I stood for Canadian nationalism and loyalty; and no one was so critical as the leader or leaders of the C.C.F. They are the great internationalists, and to them nationalism is a crime. Yet tonight, when it suits their convenience, they tell us that we must not surrender any sovereignty for our own defence. I cannot help thinking that the underlying motive behind the opposition to this bill—I do not mean the details at all; I am discussing merely the general principles—is the same motive that was behind the criticism of the royal commission on espionage. That is my firm conviction. I make that statement only because I can say that above all other members of this house I have defended the sovereignty of Canada inside and outside this chamber, and I cannot be accused of ever wanting to make Canada cheap or to surrender her sovereignty in any shape or form. But we must accept the inevitable.

What is the situation? Geographically Canada occupies a position between the two greatest forces in the world today, not only the two greatest forces in armed strength, but the two greatest exponents of the two ideologies which at the present time divide the world. We cannot avoid that; we are like the nut in the nutcracker. Comparisons have been made with British troops, for instance, and troops of other countries. I do not think that is a fair comparison, because, as I have said, Canada is directly between our neighbours to the south and our neighbours to the north. Suppose war were to break out between those two countries, between those two ideologies. Certainly we can do nothing to prevent it; but in that case the United States could not possibly run the risk of leaving herself open to attack from the north. She would be bound to take advanced positions in order to defend her own territory. I do not think that can be contradicted; it is something we have to accept. In the old days, of course, one built a series of blockhouses along the frontier and one was very careful not to set foot over the boundary; but those days are gone. Today it is not a question of the earth; it is a question of the air, which knows no international boundaries. I say that in the event of war the United States would be bound to take whatever measures they thought fit to protect their own nationals and their own borders. Further, in the event of war, would any Canadian wish to load the balance against our neighbours to the south? I do not think so. I will challenge anyone to get up and say so. Therefore why should anybody be so much against the principle of this bill?

In what I am saying I am not accepting all the clauses of the bill. I think they should be thoroughly discussed in this house and, if necessary, modified. I am against the amendment at present before the house, for two reasons. The first is that as a member of the external affairs committee I know we already have more business than we can properly take care of. The second reason is that I believe a bill of this kind is far better discussed on the floor of this house, out in the open for all to hear what is going on. Committees do not get enough publicity; somehow, when the report is brought in, the house seems to have lost interest, and that is the last heard of the matter. I want it clearly understood that I am not by any means accepting every clause in the bill, but on general principles I support it and for these reasons I am against the amendment we are now discussing.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief in speaking on this bill, and as a matter of fact I did not intend to speak at all. I shall take a realistic view. I am not going to attack any of the previous speakers, because they are entitled to their own views. I am not a lawyer and I am not an idealist in the strict sense of the word. I am going to be practical. This is merely a bill to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces. It seems to me that is very simple. We all know that if there should be another war it will come upon us very quickly; one need not be a military man to realize that. We shall not have time to be passing acts of parliament and making special provisions to permit allied troops to come into our country. This is the time to make those provisions. We are not going to weaken our position with the united nations; we are going to strengthen it. I am tired of this business of appeasement. We saw what appeasement did. I do not want people to tell me about what happened in 1938. A lot of bad things happened then, so that we need not make any comparisons with that period. I do say, however, that we are very fortunate in having such a strong, friendly ally to the south, who is willing to see that no unfriendly power sets foot on Canadian soil, and we want to do everything we can to make it possible for those people to assist us in time of need. We love this great country of ours, and if we love it we must be ready to defend it. We know perfectly well, as other hon. members have said, that in the event of another war Canada is liable to be the battle-ground. I am realistic enough about the matter to realize that, unfortunately, that will probably be so. All right; can we defend it by ourselves? No.

What is happening in the United States at the present time? They are making a great study to see what they may need by way of having conscription during peace time for military training purposes, and what their appropriation may have to be. We have not come to that yet. But I say: By all means, if they are willing to be ready to come to our assistance, let us not turn them down.

Do we want this country, or do we not want this country? If we do want it, then we should do everything we can to defend it. Do not worry about the united nations; all one has to do is to see what is happening in Hungary today. That is only one of many countries.

I will not take more time this evening. The principle of this bill—and after all, that is what we are debating—is all too simple. It is for the best interests of Canada; and I was much encouraged to hear what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair).

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I commence by saying that I feel the hon. member who has just spoken has made a real contribution to the debate. And may I add that undoubtedly a number of members in the house will welcome the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to his place beside the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), because I am sure the Minister of National Defence will find much food for thought in what has been said this evening.

So far as I am concerned, I would remind hon. members that it was not long ago when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) made a fine pronouncement in the house with respect to national defence when he said, as did the hon. member who has just spoken, that if one has something of value and will not defend it, he will lose it.

As we have heard, the policies of appeasement, of disarmament and of weakness followed between the two great wars are not policies understood by certain absolute powers in the world today. Therefore we can only make that choice of defence policy which has been recommended to us from as far back as the days of George Washington. His views have lately been underlined by great commanders of the United States forces in the last war, including General Eisenhower, General Marshall and General Arnold. They have said, and have written in their reports, that there is no peace or security through weakness.

In my view this measure follows the right course at the present time. I know that every man and woman in Canada, and perhaps in every other country of the world, holds in his or her heart the hope of world-wide peace for generations to come. If we must have a police force now, to protect this peace, then I say, let us have it.

The time factor in war is all-important. Surprise, the power of weapons and the aggressive megalomania of some men in absolute control in undemocratically governed countries all add to the factors today which can bring sudden and absolute war involving not only the armed forces of the powers in this world, but every man, woman and child in our defenceless cities.

Therefore I say Canada today should take all the means she can, and should do what she considers reasonable to defend her boundaries, in the hope that the time will come—and I am sure all men and women throughout the world hope it will be soon—when we may see a disarmament policy which will encompass all nations of the world, and when we have decided to live and to trade peacefully one with the other.

In this bill I see none of the evil or far-reaching implications expressed by socialist members in the house. It is to me an innocent measure to implement the continued friendship and cooperation of our two peace-loving nations. In my view the socialist approach to this problem of national defence is as impractical as their approach to prosperity. It rules out the human factor, in both instances.

I should like also to agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that the government has not given us or—

Mr. KNOWLES: How can you do that? Are you a socialist?

Mr. SKEY: Well, if you will wait a minute, I will tell you.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Keep quiet and let him speak.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, well!

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yapping all the time.

Mr. SKEY: The policy of the Progressive Conservative party in parliament has been one which, in all cases, has supported the full development of Canada's defence forces within our national means, and the full implementing of an intelligent national defence policy. That is what the hon. member for Vancouver South has asked for. I will admit, for the most part we have had most impractical and vague explanations from the government, surrounded in secrecy at times. They have not quite forgotten their war mentality. However we are slowly persuading them, and I am sure that in the end we shall get the answers to our questions and perhaps, in a small way, be able to assist them in their endeavours properly to organize the armed forces of Canada. We do, of course, deplore the fact that the government have not done better.

As I was saying, the hon. member for Vancouver South has asked that the house and the people of Canada be given a clear view of the whole defence policy. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, ably assisted by the Minister of National Defence, will take his words in good faith and come before the house with a proper explanation of the safeguards and the implications in the bill, and how the government intends to implement the measure.

I shall not deal longer with the bill, except to say that if such a policy is implemented by the Canadian government it is my personal hope that our Canadian defence forces will be so organized, equipped and commanded that, in company with their United States friends, they may take a full part in all the peacetime military manoeuvres and defence exercises which the joint staffs may agree will be useful for the defence of our country and the continuing efficiency of our defence units.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr Speaker, with a lot of what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) has said, I, I think like most hon. members in the house, find myself in complete agreement. In the first place, in considering a measure of this kind we ought to ask ourselves whether we are in favour of working with like-minded countries. If we are to work with like-minded countries, then we should be prepared to extend to them, on a totally reciprocal basis, the same rights, opportunities and obligations as they extend to us. From the reports which I have had from those who have studied this matter and which I have checked I am persuaded that what we propose to give in this bill has already been extended to the forces of Canada should they be in the United States.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Some questions have been asked by hon. members, such as that by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) with reference to reciprocity. I think the answer to that is to be found in public law 384 of the 78th congress. It is chapter 326, second session, H.R.3241, an act to implement the jurisdiction of service courts of friendly foreign forces within the United States, and for other purposes. After dealing with the definition of friendly foreign forces' service courts in the United States, the act goes on to state, in section 2:

Upon a specific or general request of the officer commanding any friendly foreign force, having service courts of appropriate jurisdiction within the United States, it shall be lawful for any person in the civil, military, or naval establishments of the United States having authority to arrest, summarily any member of such force designated in such request and to deliver him to the custody of any officer of such force or to the custody of the military or naval authorities of the United States who shall deliver him forthwith to the custody of an officer of such force, for trial in such service courts within the United States for such offences as shall lie within the jurisdiction of the service courts of such friendly foreign force: Provided, that the trial of any member of such friendly foreign force for an offence against a member of the civilian population shall be in open court (except where security consideration forbids), shall take place promptly in the United States and within a reasonable distance from the place where the offence is alleged to have been committed, for the convenience of witnesses.

Mr. GREEN: What is the definition of friendly foreign force in that act?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is given in paragraph (a) of the first section as follows:

"Friendly foreign force" means any military, naval, or air force of any friendly foreign state with respect to which this act is operative by virtue of a presidential declaration as provided in section 6 of this act.

Under section 6, this proclamation was given:

Proclamation 2626

Service Courts of Friendly Foreign Forces within the United States by the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Whereas the act of June 30, 1944, Public Law 384, 78th congress, entitled "An act to implement the jurisdiction of service courts of friendly foreign forces within the United States, and for other purposes," provides in part as follows:

Then is quoted section 6 of the act. The next preamble reads:

Whereas there are within the United States military, naval, or air forces of the United Kingdom and Canada, co-belligerents:

After several preambles it states:

Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the said act of June 30, 1944, do find and declare that the powers and privileges provided in that act to implement the jurisdiction of courts martial or other military tribunals of friendly foreign forces within the United States are necessary for the maintenance of discipline of the military, naval, or air forces of the United Kingdom and Canada within the United States.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 11th day of October, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and forty-four and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-ninth.

Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The countries to which that was made applicable were the United Kingdom and Canada in respect of their military, naval and air forces. Our information is that that law is still in force in the United States.

Mr. GREEN: It is a general act which can be applied to any nation?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, and it has been applied to the United Kingdom and to Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the jurisdiction of the United States civil courts taken away under that act?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not an expert in United States civil or military law, but I should think it was at least arguable that any offence which lay within the jurisdiction of the service courts of such foreign forces would be an offence with respect to which the jurisdiction of the United States civil courts might be taken away. I am not sure about that, but that is something which we do not ask for under the present bill. What we ask for is that jurisdiction in respect of service offences under the United States military law shall be given to United States military courts. Under the law in the United States, which I am informed is still in force, jurisdiction in respect of military offences, which would be given to United States service courts under our bill, has already been given to Canadian service courts.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has that general act which was passed in 1944 been extended to other countries besides the United Kingdom and Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not informed on that, but I did make inquiries as to whether it was still in force in respect of Canada, so that we might be able to assure this house that there was complete reciprocity in regard to the provisions of the law which we are seeking to have passed. I was informed that that was the case. We are endeavouring to extend in respect of service offences and offences in respect of which either the Canadian courts have had no jurisdiction or in respect of which we were willing to give up jurisdiction, just the same jurisdiction as had already been extended in respect of similar offences by Canadian personnel in the United States.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why Canada could not have a general law which could be made applicable to the different nations?

Mr. CLAXTON: At the present time, apart from the commonwealth countries and the United States, there is no other country in respect of which we have such relations. Would you like to have us extend such a law to XYZ countries? We have already extended the provisions of our law to the United Kingdom and all commonwealth countries. If hon. members would like to see it extended all around the world, let them name their countries. We think it is a good thing to work along with people who have like-minded notions about law, order, military law and defence. Consequently this law is proposed to extend into the peacetime period cooperation as announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his statement of February 12, 1947, which I think had the unanimous assent, acquiescence and support of members of the house.

Mr. GREEN: It was never considered by the house.

Mr. CLAXTON: I did not hear any objections to it in the house or from any quarter in Canada—not a single word of objection to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was no opportunity to object.

Mr. CLAXTON: Four months have passed since that statement was made by the Prime Minister, and I have not heard any objection to it by any Canadian in this house or outside, in the press or otherwise. I do not think there is any other declaration of Canadian policy which received so much assent from the Canadian people.

With regard to the other question which hon. members have in mind, as to what is the relationship with the United Kingdom, I should say, first of all, that we have extended exactly the same privileges, if they can be called privileges—I think they are just ordinary working arrangements—to the United Kingdom and the other commonwealth countries. Also the United Kingdom herself extended the same kind of relationship with regard to United States forces in the United Kingdom. That was done by the Allied Forces

Act of 1940, chapter 51, 3 and 4, George VI, which was supplemented by another enactment, the United States of America Visiting Forces Act, 1942, 5 and 6, George VI, chapter 31.

Mr. GREEN: That expired six months after the war.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am informed that it is one of the things which has been carried on.

Mr. GREEN: I had the act here tonight.

Mr. CLAXTON: I may have been misinformed, but I am sure that similar privileges will be extended as they may be needed in the interests of those who seek peace.

I have no feeling about this bill Mr. Speaker, except that it seems to me, from the ordinary concept of cooperation, to be along the lines of the declaration of the Prime Minister of this country and the President of the United States on the 12th of February, 1947. This is the kind of thing which makes such arrangements workable and sensible. There is no surrender of Canadian sovereignty, because we reserve to ourselves and to our courts complete control over civil offences unless we ourselves give up that control in respect of a specific offence. Also there is no surrender of Canadian sovereignty in respect of cooperation between our country and that of our friendly neighbour to the south, because under the terms of the Prime Minister's declaration it was provided in paragraph 5:

> As an underlying principle all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory.

Then at page 346 of Hansard of February 12, 1947, I read this from the Prime Minister's statement:

> It has been the task of the governments to assure that the close security relationship between Canada and the United States in North America will in no way impair but on the contrary will strengthen the cooperation of each country within the broader framework of the united nations.

This declaration by the President of the United States and by the Prime Minister of this country given in the United States and in this house on the 12th of February is a statement that has been filed with the united nations. I do not think anyone who has studied the charter of the united nations would suggest for one second that it contravenes the charter either in letter or in spirit. This is the ordinary kind of working relationship that it is necessary to provide for close cooperation in matters of common defence in regard to our common interests. It gives nothing away of our sovereignty; it gives nothing away of our control of our own civil procedure or of our criminal procedure. It provides the machinery under which the United States forces which may be in Canada by our consent will be permitted to control their own forces in exactly the same way that any Canadian forces in the United States may be permitted to control their own forces by the consent of the United States.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very good idea that members should air their views on this subject in this debate. I quite agree that this bill is administrative only and in its contents is perfectly innocuous but I think it has behind it quite serious implications which, so far as I know, have never before been discussed by the house. Possibly these implications have never been discussed under a parliamentary system such as ours before in history in time of peace. Consequently I have been very much interested in listening to the debate, and I have not been a bit surprised to hear such divergent views expressed from different quarters of the house, ranging all the way from those who take a very dim view of the whole procedure to those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, some of whom I thought took altogether too light a view of what was involved here and who should clothe their realism with a little bit of consideration.

There is no one in this house who does not want defence cooperation with the United States of America. There is no one in this house who does not realize how essential that is to the security of Canada. I think we are all agreed that that cooperation should be carried on as smoothly and as effectively as possible, that it should be worked out smoothly and effectively and in such a way as to cause as little friction as possible.

There are two points I want to discuss first of all. One is very short. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) a few moments ago stated that there had been no disapproval of the Prime Minister's statement to the house of February 12. What did he expect? Surely he did not expect disapproval of that statement?

Mr. CLAXTON: I certainly did not.

Mr. MERRITT: No, and none was offered, and none is being offered now. But as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has pointed out there is here something considerably beyond the words used in the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of February 12. There was nothing in the Prime Minister's statement which suggested the principle that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) enunciated to the house just before six o'clock, that the government of Canada, without reference to parliament, could invite into Canada an unlimited number of the armed forces of a foreign power. That is the essential point which has been raised by the introduction of this bill, and it is well that the house should discuss it fully.

I suggest that the point for our consideration is not the legal aspect of this bill at all, but rather this important question. What limit, if any, should parliament place upon the right of the executive to invite foreign forces to Canada in time of peace? That is the new question which is being posed to the house for the first time. I say at once that I can see many circumstances in which it would be a useful thing for Canada so to invite such a foreign power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MERRITT: I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) was, first of all, invited into the house tonight in the apparel he is wearing, and, second, if he will exhibit his right leg, because I want to find out if he is wearing his skean dhu, and so is "bearing arms", under this bill.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A good representative of Scotland would be proud to have United States troops in here at any time to join with us in welcoming Maurice Chevalier of France.

Mr. MERRITT: Before the house applauded —I thought the applause was directed at my speech, but I now find it was directed entirely in a different direction—I was saying that the important point we were discussing was the limit, if any, which parliament should place upon the power of the executive to invite a foreign force to this country. I went on to say that I could see many circumstances in which it would be in our interest so to invite such a force. I am not suggesting that there are no conditions under which such an invitation should be extended, but I am anxious that this matter be thoroughly discussed because it is a grave departure from our practice heretofore. It is a very great departure, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has shown, from the most definite words used by the Prime Minister, when he rejected almost with scorn, to one who reads those words now, the idea that a sovereign country like Canada could possibly accept for training British airmen.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not at all, if I may interrupt my hon. friend. Long before the statement which he alleges the Prime Minister made, which has been sufficiently explained to this house before, we already had an act which gave to the forces of the United Kingdom exactly the same kind of privileges which we are now seeking to extend to the forces of the United States. They are two totally different questions.

Mr. GREEN: Why did you not let in the British airmen?

Mr. CLAXTON: We certainly did let them in; they were very glad to come, and went out of here in great numbers, and it was a great effort by Canada.

Mr. GREEN: After the war started.

Mr. MERRITT: I do not know, Mr Speaker, if the Minister of National Defence was in the house when the hon. member for Vancouver South read the words which he says I allege the Prime Minister used on July 1, 1938. If he had been I do not think he would have suggested that I was not quoting accurately.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have heard this quotation since 1938, and I do not think anyone in Canada has any misunderstanding about that, namely, that training in Canada—

Mr. GREEN: They certainly have not.

Mr. CLAXTON: —will be controlled by Canadians.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister also went on to say that he thought these words had been satisfactorily explained to the house on many occasions. I want to tell him that, for my part, they have not been satisfactorily explained.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I used the word "explained", I should like to change it to the word "stated".

Mr. MERRITT: I doubt very much whether they could be satisfactorily explained to me.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is quite possible.

Mr. MERRITT: However I did not mean to get off on that subject.

Mr. CLAXTON: Why did you?

Mr. MERRITT: What you said led me onto it. If I might quote the Prime Minister on another occasion, at page 2423 of Hansard of May, 1939, he said that on these matters of peace and war and defence it was for the government to recommend and for parliament to decide. May I say that I much prefer his words then to his words of the year before, and they might commend themselves to the house in this debate.

On February 12 the Prime Minister made an announcement of joint defence with the United States, in which he suggested that there would be exchanges of selected individuals and observers between the two countries for work in training and in experimental establishments, particularly in connection with cold weather. This evening the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in dealing with this bill, made it perfectly clear to the hon. member for Nanaimo that he had not under contemplation any extension of the doctrine enunciated by the Prime Minister on February 12. I am perfectly aware that in matters of this kind we want the most flexible kind of check on the power of the executive to invite foreign forces into the country. I am well satisfied with the statement of the Prime Minister on February 12. If that kind of cooperation is envisaged, and that kind only, the kind necessary for coordination of training and joint training in the use of weapons and of all these things which are necessary in order that we may get the greatest benefit out of our proximity, I would be satisfied with this bill and with the policy that was enunciated. For my own part I am not here to suggest that we should put any rigid checks of any great magnitude upon the power of the executive to give such an invitation; but I do want to suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a flexible check, if I may call it so, upon the exercise of this power by the governor in council.

I suggest that the government will be ill-advised to extend the doctrine of February 12 beyond what it states and to invite into Canada any operational forces or any large forces for training purposes without prior reference to parliament. If the house can be assured that no foreign forces of significant size would be invited in until this house is apprised of the fact that that is to be done, then I would feel that parliament had discharged its duty. I say that in this case, because I myself should like to see the smoothest system that could be devised to continue the system of joint defence. As I have said, that cooperation is absolutely essential to our security. Nevertheless this house has grave responsibilities toward the people of this country, and none so grave as that of seeing that our sovereignty remains perfect and that our status as a nation, of which we are so proud, remains inviolate. We cannot see this new departure in policy introduced—

Mr. CLAXTON: There is nothing new about it whatever.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. MERRITT: —without impressing upon the government their duty to keep the house informed on this subject.

I wish for one moment to deal with the amendment of the C.C.F. and to say a word about the suggestion of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Probe) that the united nations should be consulted before any such step as this is taken. I do not agree with the hon. member for Regina in that suggestion. I fear that if Canada has to run to the united nations before she makes a friendly arrangement with a great and friendly foreign power, there is danger that our liberty of action may be too seriously curtailed. I do not believe that we must follow the principle that Canada can take no step in external relations without reference to the united nations organization. Canada is a great supporter of the united nations organization; but, as I see it, Canada should influence the united nations for good by taking part in its councils, but should not at any time become the mere object of directives from that organization. For that reason I cannot agree with the hon. member for Regina in his suggestion.

Having said so much about the parliamentary limit which we could place upon the policy of the executive in inviting foreign forces into the country, may I say another word upon a limit which is much more important to me; that is, the practical and real limit which we could place upon any such invitations. The extent to which we may require to invite foreign forces into our country to share with us our task of defence will be limited by the extent to which we are prepared, reasonably, to defend ourselves. When I see this change in the policy of the government between 1938 and today in connection with this kind of invitation, I wonder why I do not see the same change in policy reflected in our own defence forces. It seems to me that Canada has not had, since the end of the war, any defence policy, and that may have a serious bearing upon the extent to which we may be obliged to take advantage of this power of invitation. I wish to read what the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who was then Minister of National Defence for the army, said on October 16, 1945. He was talking about the permanently employed active force, and he said this at page 1135 of Hansard:

> This formation will be maintained as a trained field force, fully equipped, ready to meet whatever commitments may arise. Until we know more about our international obligations and consequent requirements, these active force units will be retained as a minimum and would be subject to whatever expansion might later be required in the light of any obligations which we might accept to assist in maintaining the peace of the world. Preliminary estimates indicate that the numbers involved in the active permanently employed force will be between 20,000 and 25,000 all ranks.

We know now that we have not 20,000, much less 25,000 in all ranks in our active force. It seems to me that the safest limit we can place upon this new policy, which none of us, I suppose, wholly likes, would be to get rid of the interim force idea, get rid of the idea that we must wait until the security council gives us our task before we determine what our own defence forces will be, and get back to that principle which was laid down as long ago as the imperial conference of 1923, and which was referred to by the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was Minister of National Defence in 1939, "The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire is for its own local defence."

I simply wish to say, in conclusion, that if Canada does the maximum within her power to secure her own local defence, without help from outside our borders, our sovereignty will be secure, even though we may want the additional cooperation of other friendly powers. But if Canada should ever do less than the maximum within her power for her own local defence, and if she should ever rely on foreign forces to carry out her own share of that defence, then our sovereignty will be really challenged, not by the presence of the foreign forces, but rather by our failure to do all that we could do for ourselves.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): We in this group favour any steps that are essential for the defence of Canada. Above all things, we believe that at a time like this Canada should be kept strong. We realize, of course, that the destiny of Canada and that of the United States are closely interwoven, if for no other reason than the geographical one. On the other hand, we do not agree with those who are continually trying to give the impression that there are only two great powers in the world today. We believe that there is a third great power, the British commonwealth of nations. Furthermore, we believe that the British commonwealth of nations can do a great deal to help maintain peace in this world if only the members of that commonwealth remain true to themselves and true to it. We do not agree with those people who are continually trying to emphasize the fact that another war is inevitable. Some not only appear to think that; actually they seem to hope another war will occur between two of the great powers of the world. We have had the advice of men such as Eisenhower, who has told us that, in his opinion, Russia wants peace. We know the United States wants peace, and therefore we feel that if the British commonwealth of nations not only remains a great power but becomes a greater power it can be a tremendous force toward helping maintain peace between the other two great powers, Russia and the United States.

We feel, especially after listening to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that it would be a good thing to send this bill to committee, in order to obtain a better understanding of all that it may imply.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: May I call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to contribute just a few words to this debate. At the outset, I may say quite frankly that I do not like this bill; I have no sympathy at all with it. I do not like the way in which the government is bringing it into operation. I can remember that when the news first came out a month or so ago we were told that it was to be an agreement concerning meteorology, for the study of weather and so on. When we tried to discuss it on the floor of the house; at least when I tried, I was ruled out of order. Now we have thrown at us the fact that the Americans wish to have and apply their military laws here in Canada. I believe that this method of bringing in their military law is much like the story of the camel getting his head into the tent; before we are through, the whole works will be in. It is not a case of being friendly or unfriendly to the United States, but at the present time we have that country carrying on a one-man stand fighting for a method of trade with which the rest of the world does not agree.

I should like to point out that the attitude of Great Britain in world trade affairs, which is the basis of all wars, is altogether different from that of the United States. Britain is promoting friendly relations and friendly trade pacts with Russia, for example, and with such countries as Poland. The United States may be peace loving, but at the present moment it is carrying on an economic war which, if continued to its logical conclusion, will wind up in actual warfare, and we do not want to see that happen. As pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), there is a third method, which is being pursued by Great Britain. Already in the press reports it can be seen that the tension between Great Britain and Russia is easing, while the tension between Russia and the United States is increasing. It is all very well to say that we should go with like-minded peoples. Yes; we get in with them, and the first thing we know we shall be with them in their fight right up to our neck. I had personal experience with United States personnel up in Prince Rupert during the war, and some of it was not so good. If you take our standards of education, they are far ahead of those in the United States. You give these people power to judge their own personnel; you say that if they infringe Canadian laws they will be tried by Canadian courts. That is all very well, but once the M.P.'s get hold of their own men, it is difficult to get them back into our own courts.

Now may I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 5, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mrs. Strum be substituted for that of Mr. Jaenicke on the special committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SITUATION OF CERTAIN RETURNED SOLDIERS IN MONTREAL—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of the house to move, seconded by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the position in which some 500 veterans of the city of Montreal now find themselves after having used their gratuities and reestablishment credits for the purchase of motor cars to be used as taxi-cabs and in the formation of an association known as the veterans' taxi owners association of Montreal, which was organized and directed by one Leopold Ferland, while an official of the Montreal office of the Department of Veterans Affairs, in such a manner that the veteran members are in grave danger of losing both their gratuities and reestablishment credits and thereby their opportunity of becoming reestablished and rehabilitated into civilian life.

Mr. SPEAKER: I want to express my thanks to the hon. member for being kind enough to send me a copy of his motion a few minutes before I entered the house. I have considered the motion of the hon. gentleman to adjourn the house in order to discuss the position in which 500 veterans of the city of Montreal now find themselves after having used their gratuities and reestablishment credits for the purchase of motor cars to be used as taxi cabs and in the formation of an association known as the veterans' taxi owners association of Montreal, which was organized and directed by one Leopold Ferland. I would remind hon. members that, according to standing order 31, when an hon. member asks for the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance the idea is to adjourn the house in order to give an opportunity to the house to debate the matter and find ways of relieving the situation. It is not so much the urgency of the question which should enter into consideration as the urgency of the debate on the question. The matter which the hon. member wants the house to discuss is actually before the courts of Montreal. The matter is sub judice, and all hon. members know that a matter which has been referred to the courts should not be discussed in the house. I am sorry, but I cannot accept the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I understand that Your Honour has ruled my motion out of order on the ground that the matter is before the courts?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. According to the rules, the Speaker may refuse a motion to adjourn the house if he believes that the matter to be considered is not urgent for debate. I do not rule it out of order but, as has been done in the past, I do not think there is any urgency for debate since it is before the courts.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): When Your Honour spoke a moment ago I understood you to say that the motion was out of order because the matter was before the courts. If the motion is ruled out of order on that ground, then I should like to rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already said to the hon. gentleman that in those cases where the Speaker decides that the matter is not urgent—

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I only want to be clear. Do I understand that my motion is ruled out on the ground that the matter is not urgent, or is it ruled out on the ground that it is before the courts?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows very well that the decision of the Speaker is not debatable. If it is the desire of hon. members to appeal from the decisions of former Speakers who have ruled that when the Speaker refuses a motion to adjourn the house because there is no urgency, there is no appeal, they are free to do so.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I do not know yet on what ground you have ruled it out.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have tried to express myself clearly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have suggested that if hon. members believe that they should appeal my decision, they are free to do so.

Mr. GRAYDON: May we have the reasons for your decision before the appeal is directed?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any reason for saying anything more. I said that the motion could not be accepted because I do not see any urgency, since the matter is before the courts. It is well known, especially to lawyers, that when a case has been referred to the courts it is sub judice and should not be discussed.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): On a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you have ruled me out of order on the ground that the matter is before the courts. My point of order is this: had I been allowed to proceed with the motion I would not have referred to any proceedings that might be before the courts. The only matter to which I would have referred is the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, which certainly is not before the courts, and the actions of an official of that department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wonder if I should add anything to what I said a few minutes ago. I still insist that the motion of the hon. member that the position in which 500 veterans of the city of Montreal now find themselves after having used their gratuities and reestablishment credits for the purchase of motor cars to be used as taxi cabs and in the formation of an association known as the veterans' taxi owners association is a matter before the courts at the present time. I do not accept the motion and I will ask the house to proceed with its business.

S.S. "EMPEROR"

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT ON STRANDING AND SINKING OF VESSEL IN LAKE SUPERIOR ON JUNE 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Transport to the S.S. Emperor disaster on lake Superior the day before yesterday and to ask what action has been taken to have an inquiry held by the wreck commissioner. I refer the minister to what has appeared in the press of yesterday and today from Port Arthur. There are no aids to navigation or life-saving stations on the great lakes. In 1928 I brought up in the house the necessity of providing aids to navigation and life-saving stations for the protection of life on the great lakes. We have to rely on United States life-saving stations, as in the disaster to Canadian seamen on this lake in 1928. I should like to know what action is being taken.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has read the report of the accident, but if he had I am sure he would not have asked that question, at least not phrased in the manner in which it was. I expected that one such question would be asked today and I have prepared a statement.

The S.S. Emperor left Port Arthur about 11.30 p.m. on June 3, eastward bound, loaded with ore. In the early hours of the morning of the 4th, at approximately five o'clock she struck Canoe rocks, a submerged rock reef three and a half miles west of Blake Point light, Isle Royale, lake Superior, and broke in two.

According to the information at present available, two boats were lowered, one of which was swamped when the steamer went down.

The United States lighthouse tender Kimball, which was in the vicinity, received the distress signal from the Emperor at 5.15 a.m. and arrived at the scene of the casualty at 5.50 a.m., or about thirty-five minutes after the distress signal was picked up. Though exact information as to weather visibility at the time is not yet available, it is understood that the weather was good, and that the sea was comparatively smooth. The Kimball rescued twenty-one survivors and recovered the body of a woman. They were taken into Fort William. A further search was made and another woman's body was found and landed at Fort William by the Kimball on the night of Wednesday, the 4th instant. In addition to a thorough search of the area by the Kimball and two other small vessels of the United States lighthouse service, a coast guard plane made a thorough search of the area but no further survivors or bodies have been found.

Captain W. N. Morrison, Examiner Masters and Mates, of this department, is in Port Arthur at the moment holding a preliminary inquiry into the casualty.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: There are no Canadian life-saving stations on the upper great lakes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: With all due respect, Your Honour, as Speaker Lenthall said when Charles I came in, that he had neither eyes to see nor ears to hear but as the house gave him utterance, so having eyes to see and ears to hear, the house does nothing about this matter.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOW—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF MR. CROLL'S SPEECH AT MEETING OF OTTAWA CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION ON JUNE 4.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I have in my hand a copy of the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, which contains under the heading, "Charges R.C.M.P. With Inciting to Break Law," a report of a meeting that was held by the Ottawa Civil Liberties Association in this city last night, at which the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) is reported to have discussed racial prejudice. In the course of his discussion he is reported to have said:

> There had been a number of discriminatory acts against Jews, Negroes, Japanese and Chinese in Canada recently. "These were isolated incidents but they point to a trend that is working against our fundamental freedoms."
> These acts occurred all across Canada, even in Alberta which has a bill of rights containing "all the rights one could possibly think of." "There they have another bill whereby a Hutterite cannot live closer than forty miles from another Hutterite."

The part of the reported statement which is the subject of my protest at this time is this, which appears in quotation marks in the newspaper report:

> "There they have another bill whereby a Hutterite cannot live closer than forty miles from another Hutterite."

The hon. member for Spadina was evidently referring to Alberta. His reported statement is entirely false; and if the report is what the hon. member actually said, then, of course, only one answer could be given. If it is not what he said, I contend that it is damaging not only to the hon. member for Spadina but to the government of Alberta and this whole dominion.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the question of privilege?

Mr. LOW: Just hold your horses.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows perfectly well that questions raised on the orders of the day must be brief and to the point. I have always allowed a great deal of latitude to leaders of the opposition parties, but I must ask the hon. member not to take up too much time. I would suggest that he state his question now.

Mr. LOW: I will state it briefly. I contend, sir, that the reported statement of the hon. member for Spadina casts a reflection on the government of Alberta and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. LOW: Do not be in such a hurry, you fellows over there. You use up plenty of time. If there is one group in this house that is against freedom of speech it is the one over there.

I contend also that this reported statement of the hon. member for Spadina casts a personal reflection on me. As the minister in the Alberta government who was responsible for putting through the original bill I feel that I have a grievance. At the last session of the Alberta legislature, a bill was passed amending the act I had sponsored through the legislature. This later bill provided for the orderly settlement of Hutterite colonies in Alberta.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. leader of the Social Credit party, but he will understand that it is the duty of the Speaker of the house to apply the rules. I would ask him to collaborate with me. I have allowed him considerable latitude in order that his question might be understood by the hon. member concerned. I would ask him now to be as brief as possible and to state his question of privilege.

Mr. LOW: The question of privilege is this, that the statement made or reported to have been made by the hon. member for Spadina is absolutely false and I want to make a correction of it. That is all. The bill was passed by the Alberta legislature at the last session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LOW: It provides for the orderly settlement of Hutterite colonies which consist of upwards of one hundred members, but individual Hutterites can live in Alberta anywhere they wish to buy land, or anywhere they can find a job.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LOW: The bill has nothing whatever to do with individual liberty.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have given ample time to the hon. member to state his question of privilege.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO SALES OF CLASS II OF 1946 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister tell the house how much class II wheat of the 1946 crop has been sold and what is the average price received?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am grateful to the hon. member for Selkirk for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, which enabled me to get a comprehensive but brief reply.

Sales of class II wheat: August 1 to May 31, amounted to 55·9 million bushels, of which 35·6 million bushels were for export in the form of flour. Average sales price, $2.38 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver.

From August 1, 1946, to January 31, 1947, first half of the crop year, the board's daily class II price ranged from $2.05 to $2.34 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver. From February 1, 1947, to May 31, 1947, the board's class II price has ranged from $2.34 to $3.10 a bushel.

The sales figures given above will include a small amount of 1945 wheat sold early in the present crop year.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the large increase in the stocks of butter in Canada, will the minister inform the house when rationing of this product will be discontinued?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): That is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. DROPE: That is the same answer as the one the minister gave me about three weeks ago, and I do not consider it an answer at all.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF CUSTOMS FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. When does the government intend to establish customs facilities in Prince Rupert, British Columbia, so that foreign aircraft can clear from there instead of having to go to Massett on the Queen Charlotte islands, which is causing a great deal of confusion?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Aircraft both foreign and domestic, can be divided into two classes, namely pleasure aircraft and commercial aircraft. On May 26 the department established customs facilities in Prince Rupert so that foreign aircraft of the pleasure type may clear there. The matter of clearing commercial aircraft is being given consideration.

EXTRADITION

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH REGARD TO TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he say how far negotiations have proceeded with regard to the extradition treaty between United States and Canada? If he is not in a position to make a full statement today will he make it at some conveniently early date?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall have the appropriate files examined so as to be able, at an early day, to give accurate information to the hon. member.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

CROP FAILURE PAYMENTS—AWARDS TO FARMERS WITH MINIMUM PRODUCTION

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 261, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I desire to offer a few comments on this bill at this stage. It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that there was called in the year 1938 what was known throughout this nation as the Bracken wheat conference in Winnipeg. At that time they recommended an initial price of not less than eighty cents a bushel. In those days market conditions were difficult in the Dominion of Canada. Following that, there was the original plan by the federal government to drop the initial price to sixty cents a bushel and pay an acreage bonus on yields up to fifteen bushels an acre. However, the final policy of the government of the day was to pay seventy cents initial payment and acreage bonus up to a yield of twelve bushels an acre. The act was brought into being in 1939 on that basis.

The application of the act applied and still applies to all three prairie provinces and the Peace River block in British Columbia. There are three main sections in the act. There was the national emergency section which provided that in any year the price of wheat was less than eighty cents a bushel the minister could declare it an emergency year. Each farmer residing in a township with the following average yields was to receive the following awards: up to four bushels and under, $2 an acre on half the cultivated acreage; from four to eight bushels an acre, $1.50 an acre on half the cultivated acreage; from eight to ten bushels an acre, $1 per acre with a limit of 200 acres on which he could receive an award. This section was later amended so that the minister could declare an emergency year, regardless of the price that was being paid for wheat.

Section 4 dealt with crop failures. Regardless of the price of wheat, a province could be declared a crop failure area under the following conditions: at least ten townships with five bushels per acre or less in Alberta and Manitoba; in Saskatchewan at least 135 townships; awards: up to five bushels, $2.50 an acre on half the cultivated acreage and a maximum of $5.00 and a minimum of $2.00.

Section 6 provided for one per cent levy on all grains marketed in the prairie provinces, and that continues today. All farmers, including tenants actually farming the land, were eligible; ranchers were excluded and businessmen doing part-time farming were also excluded. Farmers who had more than 3,000 bushels and more than eight bushels per acre are ineligible. Otherwise all farmers receive the bonus, regardless of their yield if they are in an eligible township.

A recent amendment excludes from an eligible township any block of nine sections which has an average yield of more than ten bushels per acre, if the block lies next to an ineligible township. The same amendment brings into the eligible class any block of nine sections with an average yield of ten bushels per acre or less in an ineligible township if it lies contiguous to an eligible township, and that has been our difficulty from the point of administration.

With respect to administration, the head office has been located in Regina with branch offices in Edmonton for Alberta and in Winnipeg for Manitoba. The township yields are obtained by inspectors appointed for that purpose who make personal calls and obtain the production and acreage of each farmer, within these areas, I believe, after application has been made by the municipal officials asking that it be done. The superintendent then presents all the township data to the board of review which passes on the eligibility of the township.

The operation of the act from 1939 to 1946 inclusive has brought in, under this one per cent levy, the following receipts: from Alberta, $6,205,000; from Manitoba, $3,619,000, and from Saskatchewan, $12,895,000. The payments made within the provinces are as follows: for Alberta, $15,209,000; for Manitoba, $1,730,000, and for Saskatchewan, $45,558,000. The total levy collected under that scheme has been $22,719,000, while total payments have amounted to $62,497,000. In addition, there have been administration costs, amounting, on the average, to about $300,000 a year.

Several of us have put questions on the order paper and received answers by way of returns, and we find that for seven years in succession eighty-two of these townships have received these P.F.A.A. payments; 396 townships have received these payments for six consecutive years; 849 townships have received them for five years in succession, and 1,383 townships have received the payments in four consecutive years. The act has been in force for eight years, and in only one year, 1942, were no payments made.

On previous occasions I have referred to the fact that at times the operation of this act is somewhat in contradiction to the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. What it means, as I think can be readily proved by the fact that some of these farmers have received payments for seven years hand running, is that many of these people are farming sub-marginal land. Enough money has already been paid out in this way to purchase the land. Approximately 1,160 farmers who received the bonus for seven years were paid a total of $2 million. Based on the 1946 cultivated acreage, after ten years the farmers received $5 per acre for their land, or a total of about $1,760 each. In some townships the average total amount paid would be approximately $7 per acre. I know of land in my own constituency, in the Palliser triangle, owned by one of the municipalities for grazing purposes, which I am sorry to say they are not continuing to hold for that purpose, which now is being sold to operators for $2 an acre. Quite frankly, this is land which I do not believe should be put under the plough. So I think it will be seen that this matter calls for quite a bit of serious consideration.

I have a great deal of detail here. I do not want to discuss the matter at least at this time because, as I said at the resolution stage, we have an undertaking from the minister that the bill is to go to the agriculture committee, where I am sure it will receive close scrutiny. I do say, however, that this act should have only one clause dealing with eligibility, instead of two; that is, the crop failure and the emergency year. In the second place, it should be on an individual basis, not on a township basis. The part township clause and section 8 have not solved the problem so far. The act should provide that the land of any farmer who becomes eligible for these payments during seven successive years would be purchased by the government for community pastures under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It is a waste of public money to keep the act functioning as it is at present, and probably have operators living under conditions under which they should not attempt to farm. There is some argument as to whether the territory within those provinces should be zoned and some smaller categories provided. In some cases the payments should be larger. However I seriously urge the government to consider the possibility, after so many successive crop failures, of purchasing that land for community pastures.

As I have said, there are many more things which might be discussed, but since we are going to take up these matters in the committee on agriculture, I think I should reserve much of my comment for that stage.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house at great length, because I understand that this bill is going to committee, but since I am not a member of the agriculture committee I believe I should take this opportunity of offering a few remarks, because the provisions of this bill are of vital importance to the con- The second important amendment is that the amount a farmer may thresh is not limited to 3,000 bushels. As I read the act, I commend the government on these changes, which I think will be endorsed by the people concerned, especially by those who expect to benefit under these provisions.

I should like to refer to the interpretation section, which defines "farmer" under the act. It seems to me that the definition now is wider than it was before, and again I think I must commend the minister for having changed it. But we must remember that apparently this definition is still subject to regulation, and of course in that way it could be limited. I hope and trust, however, that if any new regulations are promulgated under the new definition the minister will see to it that any limitation imposed will be as liberal as possible as far as the beneficiaries under the act are concerned. I should like to commend the minister for including in the definition of "farmer" a member of a cooperative; and although the act does not so state, I presume this means a member of a cooperative farm. These cooperative farms are becoming quite extensive in the west, especially in Saskatchewan, and I thank the minister for thinking of these people.

Then the new section 3 provides that the benefits may go to a man who has been a farmer between May 1 and November 1. I presume this provision has been put in, following the understanding that a man shall not have two occupations, and so that a man may take some other position between November 1 and May 1, in order to earn some extra money, and still be entitled to the benefits of the act. I approve this; but I suggest that the minister should not confine himself to definite dates, between May 1 and November 1. If a farmer is going to have a crop failure, in many instances he will know it by the middle of July, and I believe he should then be entitled to go out and earn himself some extra money, which undoubtedly he will need not only for sustenance but to help carry on his farming operations. So I should like the minister and perhaps the committee to consider this feature of the matter. If a man knows in the summer that he is going to have a crop failure, he should then be permitted to go out and earn some extra money in order to tide himself over.

Further, in connection with the definition of "farmer", I should like the minister and the committee to consider the case of the farmer who has some little business in addition to his farming occupation. I am thinking particularly of a man in a small village in my constituency—and I dare say there are many men like this throughout the west—who is adept at blacksmithing, and who keeps a little blacksmith shop in the village, close to his own farm. He does not rent his farm; he farms it himself, and that is his main occupation. Last year his income from blacksmithing, which he does more or less to oblige his neighbours, was about $300. Yet, because he earned that $300 he was found not to be eligible to receive the benefits under the act. I know it is difficult to determine cases like this, but I believe that if the regulations or the law were to limit the amount of money which a farmer may make outside of his farming operations, it would meet the requirements in a case such as this.

The largest number of complaints which I have received in connection with the working of this act had to do with the question of the township award. As the minister knows, I have written to him on several occasions in connection with complaints which I have received; and I may say that I have received more complaints than I have referred to him because I did not wish to bother him, inasmuch as they were all on the same basis. In order to explain to the house how this act works, and how unjust it is to some people whom it should but does not benefit, I should like to give the example of one township in my constituency, which is township 37, range 28, west of the third meridian in Saskatchewan. In this township there are about a dozen sections on the west side and in the middle, which have low-lying, heavy land and where the farmers have experienced good crops. But to the north, on the east and on the south they have had small crops; in fact, practically crop failures. As the law stands, this whole township itself, because of the good crops in the centre of it, was not eligible, but undoubtedly these poor farmers who were living on the north, on the east and on the south were eligible. The law provides that part of a township may be eligible only if it adjoins a township which itself is within the provisions of the act. I know the officials of the board of review did their best in connection with this case and interpreted the act as they should have. I have no complaint to offer on that score. But I think the law is wrong. The result in this case is that the south part of the township, sections 1 to 18 received the bonus, and sections 23 to 26 and sections 31 to 36—in other words, ten sections—received nothing, or the farmers living in those ten sections received nothing. Yet they had a crop which was as poor or poorer than that of some of the farmers in sections 1 to 18, just because in the centre of that township there happened to be low-lying land and the yield of the farming operations in those sections of the township was such as to show an increase. The fault lies, I think, in the fact that a part of the township must be a rectangular block. I plead with the minister to take the word "rectangular" out of the act. In this particular case these ten sections which I mentioned could very well have been included with the other eighteen sections and justice would have been done. Of course the block would not have been a rectangular block. I think the minister should take that into consideration and amend the act accordingly.

Another matter which I wish to refer to the minister and draw to his attention is the fact that, in order for part of a township to be eligible, it must be adjoining another township which is eligible. It may be that under the new provisions this is to be done away with; I do not know as to that. It seems to me also that section 7(b) would need some amendment necessitated by the other amendments. I should like the minister to look into that as well. I think this question of township adjustment, especially the adjustment of parts of the township, has, as I have pointed out, worked an injustice on some of the farmers. For instance, in this particular township which I have described, the farmers in the north end of the constituency have now experienced a practical crop failure for two years without having been able to get the benefit of the act. I suggest that the minister again look into this matter and see what he can do. Perhaps the act can be amended by inserting a further clause giving the board of review or the minister some powers of discretion in order to rectify such injustices.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Before the bill passes, I should like to say a word or two concerning it. The present Prairie Farm Assistance Act is a definite improvement over the act which it replaces. As I understand it, the payments may be made any year without the necessity of a declaration of an emergency year. That is all to the good. But the payment may now be made only on the basis of nine sections, as I gather it, provided that those nine sections are adjacent to a township which is declared eligible. While that is much better than it was formerly, it is not yet as it should be. We social crediters believe that there should be a crop insurance scheme across Canada, and that losses ought to be paid on an individual basis rather than on the basis of a number of sections or townships.

It may be argued, Mr. Speaker, that constitutionally the federal government could not pass an act for such a scheme of universal insurance for farmers. We do not sympathize with that point of view. We believe that the federal government could take care of crop insurance by passing enabling legislation much as is done in the case of old age pensions, permitting the money to be provided to the provinces, allowing each province to come in with its own legislation providing for crop insurance within the province, and allowing each province also to take over in large measure the administration of the act. In the days to come this sort of arrangement ought to be made by the dominion government and will be recognized everywhere as being the sound, most effective and economical way of taking care of this important matter.

It will be urged that the dominion government could not possibly supply the funds necessary for a universal crop insurance scheme. On the face of existing realities, such a contention does not quite make sense. Undoubtedly in this country we are able to produce enough goods and services of all kinds to provide all the farmers in Canada with an adequate income in any given year, regardless of whether they are hailed, rained out, frozen out or in any other way deprived of their crops. Approaching the matter from that common sense, realistic point of view, I think every member in the house and everyone throughout the country will grant that it simply is not quite reasonable that we should be without a crop insurance scheme from coast to coast in Canada, covering every kind of agricultural endeavour. If Canada is able to produce sufficient goods and services to provide for the needs of her population, agricultural and non-agricultural, up to a given standard of living, that fact indicates quite clearly that the national credit could be used as a means of providing the money with which to buy crop insurance.

The minister deserves commendation for the steps which he has taken thus far in the development of this Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He has gone a long way since the inception of the scheme. He is making progress surely and probably as rapidly as public opinion will permit him to do at the present time; he is showing unmistakable signs of a progressive attitude in this matter. We social crediters desire to commend him for his past efforts and to congratulate him on the measure which he is now introducing. We shall follow it through with great interest and with complete readiness to support him in all forward-looking steps.

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal to say on this act but I am not going to do so now. I just want to say two words at this stage. A suggestion has been made in the house during this debate that the bill should be extended to include other parts of Canada. As the minister and the house know, I am one of those who hold the opposite view. I sincerely believe that an opportunity should be given some of the provinces to withdraw from the act. I for one, coming from Manitoba, gave facts and figures last year in the debate, which proved that in that province so far, since the act has been instituted, had it been administered by the province. from its own revenue of one per cent it could have paid crop failure assistance as well as assistance for hail damage, and still have a reserve in store. However I shall not go into detail at the present time.

I regret that the door was not left open in the bill to allow certain of the provinces, such as my own, to depart from the scheme if they wished to. I believe that my own province, for one, would be willing to take over the act, provided that the wheat board, or the agency of the federal government, would levy the one per cent and then turn it over to the province.

However, if the act is to carry on in the present form, and if we must tag along for a few more years, I commend to the minister that the definition of "township" in the act be cleared up, so far as river lots are concerned. As hon. members know, a good part of Manitoba is in the Palliser triangle, and most of the wheat growing area of the province is in the Red River valley. The greater part of the Red River valley, or at least a large portion of it, is made up of river lots. According to the act, there is no definition whatsoever to take care of a township in the area of river lots. In the past I believe there has been only one year when the river lots could have qualified, when there was a complete crop failure. There was one two years ago in my section of the country. When it came to applying the act in the river lots area, there was no definition, and this condition led to a great deal of confusion.

The officials of the department played around with various blocks of river lots, but could not come to any definite conclusion. It would be a great help to them, and a great help to the people if it were known what a township is in those areas, and would be most helpful in the event of another crop failure occurring there. I commend that particularly to the minister. Perhaps this is only a detail, but it is a significant one, and one which should be elucidated and cleared up in the act.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations respecting the bill before the house. I have received a number of complaints from farmers in my constituency about one feature of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which, even in the present bill, has not been improved. I refer to the township qualification, which still appears in the bill.

Perhaps the wording of a letter forwarded to me expresses more clearly than I could the problem which faces the farmers. This is the letter addressed to one farmer in my constituency who applied on behalf of a group of twenty. The reply he received was as follows:

> We have to advise again that the prairie farm assistance payments are made on a township basis. That is, a township must be declared eligible by the board of review before this department can make payment, and in order for the board to qualify such township for payment, they must find the average yield of wheat to be less than 8 bushels per acre. There is only one exception to the township being a unit for payment and that is, when an ineligible township, and the board find 9 or more sections forming a rectangular block, having an average yield of wheat of 8 or less bushels per acre and the side of this block of sections bordering an eligible township, the board may then qualify such a block of sections for payment under section 7 (b) of the act.

Then, with respect to the claim made the letter states:

> In so far as township 51-16 W4th is concerned, the average yield of wheat for the township was found to be considerably in excess of 8 bushels per acre. Therefore, the board of review declared this township ineligible. Furthermore, as this township is not bordering an eligible township, it is not possible to qualify any portion of same under section 7 (b) of the act.
> We regret to advise that no payments will be made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in township 51-16-4 for the crop year of 1945.

I shall state my appeal in a few words. Surely we have reached a time, in view of the length of time the act has been in operation, when we should bring in an amendment to the act so that individual farmers would qualify. That is the real problem which faces many farmers in my constituency. I have no drought areas, but the individual farmers who do suffer receive no compensation whatsoever. When all farmers have one per cent deducted from the grain threshed, whether the farm is in a rectangle or not, why should they not qualify for payment when the matter comes before the board?

I need not say more on the subject at the present time. I do request, however, that the minister give serious consideration to an amendment which would give an opportunity to farmers to apply on an individual basis.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say a great deal respecting the amendment at the present time. However there are a few points which perhaps apply to the area from which I come in Manitoba and which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister.

I agree with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) that the definition of "township" should be changed in the act because, as the minister well knows, along the rivers in Manitoba the divisions of land are not made in townships or in sections. The division is made in river lots; and in some areas it is divided into what are known as wood lots.

In my view the definition as it appears in the act is definitely restricted to the survey of townships, as set out in the act, and as referred to in this bill. I believe that some definite provision, as suggested by the hon. member for Provencher, should be made so that, if need arose, there would be no question at all that those subdivisions of land known as river lots and wood lots, which are of a substantial nature in acreage, would be eligible under the act.

The amendments now introduced by the bill before us would lead me to conclude that almost any kind of crop failure would make an applicant eligible under the act. If that is not so, then I suggest that the minister should clarify the position. In section 4 of the original act there was provision that relief could be given in respect of crop failures as a result of anything other than hail. But in the act as it now stands there is nothing even to exclude damage from hail, provided that it takes in a sufficiently large area. I am only mentioning this, so that when the minister speaks he may make it clear to the farmers of this country whether or not the scope of the act is being enlarged by the changes provided in the present bill.

I would ask also that he consider adopting individual settlements. I imagine it would be extremely difficult for the department to make settlement on an individual basis, but that is beside the point. Farmers all over this country, particularly those who are in areas like the one from which I come and where there is rarely a crop failure, have been paying substantial sums in the one per cent deductions. If it should happen that one, two or five farmers in the immediate vicinity of the city of Portage la Prairie, where there has not yet been a crop failure which would entitle the farmers to come within the provisions of this act, should have a failure, it seems to me it would be inequitable if they could not be reimbursed for the substantial amounts they have paid over the years. They should be reimbursed even though there was not sufficient acreage to justify making a claim through the municipality.

Unquestionably the minister has given consideration to this point because it is not unique nor does it originate with me. I know the minister has had this put up to him from all angles and by many hon. members. In spite of that and in spite of the fact that he may have rejected the idea of even further considering individual settlements, I suggest to him that he and his departmental officials and his colleagues should take this matter under further advisement. Unquestionably it is a moot point, particularly in the good farming areas, and one which is creating a great deal of dissatisfaction.

I should like to refer for a moment to the matter of withdrawals. It is true that there are certain areas which are asking for the right to withdraw from this scheme, but if this is to be done I think it can be done only on a province-wide basis. It seems to me that if the farmers who are now advocating the right to withdraw approached this problem from the broad viewpoint they would not desire to have a withdrawal provision inserted in the act. I think those farmers who are in good crop areas can stand the one per cent deduction year after year if they are blessed with good crops year after year. The benefits which come to the whole west from the scheme are such that I do not think the farmers in the good areas, such as the one from which I come, would insist on a withdrawal escape clause being included in the act. I am satisfied that I can speak for those farmers and say that when they have given the matter full consideration they will realize that it would not be fair for them to shirk their duty to the less fortunate parts of the western provinces.

As far as I am concerned I would be prepared to accept the responsibility of standing on any platform or going into any meeting of farmers and asking them to reconsider any desire that they may have had to have a withdrawal escape clause inserted in the act. However, in view of the fact that many of my constituents have urged that there should be a withdrawal escape clause to apply to any province which might desire to withdraw from the scheme, I felt constrained to mention it on the floor of the house today. But I must say that, so far as I am personally concerned, I feel that a withdrawal clause should not be inserted in the act.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, since we have the assurance of the minister that the bill is to go before the agriculture committee I shall be brief. However, as I am not a member of that committee I have a few suggestions I should like to offer at this time. First, I should like to commend the minister for the changes provided by the bill, but in my view there are many more changes that should be made if we are to give the farmers the real protection they have been looking for in the past few years.

The difference in soil and climatic conditions in the various parts of Saskatchewan are manifold. In the south we have drought conditions, but drought in the northern areas is quite uncommon. On the other hand, the northern areas of the province are subject to frost damage and damage from insect infestation. All through the province we have the menace from hail. The losses from drought in the south are much greater than the crop losses in the north caused by frost or other adverse conditions. Both in the northern and southern areas the differences in soil have a considerable bearing upon the losses sustained by individual farmers.

I believe I suggested last year that there should be a system of zoning in the provinces into crop risk areas with lower percentages of deduction in the low risk areas and higher percentages in the heavy risk districts. I believe that would make the burden of crop failure assistance much more equitable. A number of farm organizations have suggested this plan, so I am not the originator of it. At this time I should like to place on record a resolution passed by one of these organizations, the rural municipality of Weyburn, as recently as March 11, and I quote:

> Resolved that deductions and payments during short crop years are too small and we recommend that the one per cent deduction for P.F.A.A. be increased in the southern part of the province with corresponding higher payments in crop failure areas.

The resolution goes on to favour zoning of the province to apportion the deductions and benefits. Reference is also made to the high protein wheat produced in the south. This may not be apropos of the question, but, since the minister no doubt has heard of it before, I think it would be wise for me to mention it. The recommendation is made that wheat from the south should be graded on a protein basis to give a premium on wheat grown in the dry area which would more than offset the higher deductions which zoning would require from the southern area.

In my opinion payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be based on the individual farm yield. Several hon. members have expressed the same opinion. The present act provides for assistance to the farmer on the basis of the average yield of the township in which he resides. Even with the present changes allowing for a nine-section block, there is still a considerable amount of dissatisfaction. If it is not feasible to have benefits on an individual farm basis I would suggest that the proposed rectangular block of nine sections be reduced to a smaller area. The present system seems to me unsatisfactory because farmers living in the bonus area frequently, not only last year but in previous years, had substantial yields, but because they resided in a government "declared" area they were recipients of benefits under the act, while, on the other hand, farmers living on the fringe of the stricken area who had little or no crop at all received no benefits, since the average yield in the block in which they lived exceeded the maximum set by the act. Very often a farmer who failed to obtain the bonus lived just across the road from a neighbour who had received benefits under the act and had had a crop.

The act now reads that if a township has not the requisite yield to bring it within the act a rectangular block of not more than nine sections may be brought in. That is a good feature of the act. But this block of nine sections must be lying alongside an eligible township. This act should be amended to make it more flexible so that it would not be necessary to have a rectangular block, or to have it contiguous to an eligible township. Despite any changes which might be made in this particular regard, I am of the firm belief that benefits should be paid on an individual farm basis. There seems to be a sufficient number of inspectors now employed by the Department of Agriculture under this act to conduct the field work in this connection, so that no further operating expenses would be entailed. The farms in the stricken area have to be inspected anyway to ascertain the true situation in the stricken districts. I believe that this change in the act would actually save the government money, because many farmers now receive benefits under the act who are not in great need of those benefits. In any event, it seems to me that hail damage is nearly always on an individual farm basis. Certainly the damage runs in strips, so that damage at least from this source should be treated on an individual farm basis.

The act as it stands limits benefits paid to an individual farmer to a maximum of $400 or $500, depending upon whether the year is declared an "emergency year" or a "crop failure year". This is an inadequate provision and does not meet the farmers' needs. I think at this time I should draw the minister's attention to a resolution that was passed in convention last year by the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. The minister is, I believe, quite familiar with the resolution, but I wish to place it on the record because it is well worthy of consideration. The resolution asks:

. . . that the crop failure bonus be increased to $5 per acre and that the maximum be $1,000, and the assessment 2 per cent, and that payments be made on an individual plan.

While the two per cent assessment might not be acceptable to areas in the north of the province where crop failure is less common, certainly it would be welcomed in the south if benefits under the act were increased. Zoning as previously suggested, to apportion the deductions and benefits would, I believe, be acceptable to all areas in the province.

Under present conditions where the yield is less than five bushels to the acre, a $1 payment is made per cultivated area, with a maximum of $400 per farmer, regardless of the acreage involved. That, in my opinion, is hardly adequate relief. Costs of farm operation have substantially increased. The purchase of the seed which would be necessary for the next crop year would, at present prices, cost the average farmer of 320 acres more than the benefits paid out now under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The farmer also has food and clothing to purchase for his family and many other expenses as well. The maximum to be paid under the act should, I firmly believe, be increased to $1,000, which, with present high production costs, is certainly little enough.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that farmers in the west on the whole are thankful that there is such a thing as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It gives them a measure of security. It keeps the wolf from the door when crop failure is complete. But the wolf is never far away, because of the meagre benefits provided under the act.

I consider that the recommendations I have made deserve consideration. That is the reason I make them this afternoon, in order that they may be considered by the minister when this bill goes before the committee. I am sure that if they were incorporated in the bill it would make the act more effective and would establish a feeling of security for farmers everywhere in the western provinces. I am satisfied that the farmer is willing to contribute more to the fund if his benefits are to be on a more adequate scale. Finally, I believe that the zoning system is the only way to take care of inequalities, not only in the deductions scheme, but also in the benefits paid out under the act.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the discussion that has taken place on the second reading of the bill has been not only interesting but quite instructive. I appreciate the remarks which have been made in favour of the legislation as such, but in the criticisms of the measure there has been shown some misunderstanding as to the intentions of the government at the time the legislation was first placed on the statute books of the dominion.

It will be recalled that from 1931 to 1937 there was a period of severe drought in western Canada, and during that period we paid out large sums of money from the federal treasury. It is in my memory that $186,000,000 was paid out of the treasury of Canada for the purpose of maintaining persons in what is known as the drought area of western Canada. Having made that enormous expenditure, or at least committed ourselves to credits which resulted in that expenditure finally, the government thought it was necessary for some action to be taken to assure the people of the district that certain assistance would be available under certain circumstances.

It will be recalled that during the period from 1931 to 1937 farmers had to go to councils and plead for relief. The result was that certain amounts were allowed per person in order to maintain the individual in food and clothing. It was thought by the government that if that condition were allowed to continue in an area that was populated by about a million people, in due course it would be depopulated. Any young person who finds himself or herself dressed in other people's clothes when he goes to school or to church will not remain in a district which compels that for a very long period of time; they will get out just as soon as they can. It was decided that an area which had contributed so much wealth to the Dominion of Canada should not be depopulated. The experience of having kept these people there has proven to us that the contention was the correct one. Everything that was done by previous dominion governments and by provincial governments and municipalities has proven to have been useful because, during the last six years, when this country was one of the allied countries at war that particular area produced more tonnage of food than it ever did in any other six years of its existence. In other words, the experience of having kept people on that land to produce has resulted in showing that we could not have contributed as we did during the war period to the feeding of the allied armies and Britain in the manner in which we did had that area not been opened, and it has proven, too, that an area which can produce that much wealth over any five, six or seven-year period should be kept in production during the other five, six or seven year periods during which crops are not sufficiently great to maintain population there.

That was the idea behind the legislation, but there is a further fact which we should recall at this time. Prior to the enactment of this legislation, the legal and constitutional responsibility for taking care of people in those areas rested on the province and on the municipalities; it rested first on the provinces, and then by provincial law much of it was placed upon the municipalities individually. That is one of the reasons why the blocks are maintained. The federal government considered that in taking the solid blocks they were taking on the responsibility that should be placed on all the people of Canada.

Prior to the introduction of this act, we assumed the responsibility if twenty-five municipalities in a province found themselves unable to maintain their people, and when they got down to having only ten we ceased to assist. Under this act we have said, down to the present time, that if the government declared a year an emergency year, then the federal government assumed responsibility for the solid blocks of people to whom it was found necessary to give some assistance in order that they might be able to remain in that area. We have however, said over and over again from 1939 to the present, every time that we have received a resolution, such as that which was just placed on Hansard, from a municipality in the heart of the drought area, no matter what government was carrying on in the province, that the federal government is not taking the full responsibility; that part of the responsibility must rest on the province, and that if the province so decides, part of it must still rest on the municipality. Therefore we have said what the province ought to do, if they desire us to go farther than we have gone, is to make some contribution into the fund to take care of those corners in certain areas which are not included when the act says it must be a rectangle and when you say it must be contiguous to an area which is already proven to be a drought area. The dominion government believes that the areas which are immediately roundabout the solid block should be taken care of through the province and the municipality contributing something. If it is desired that the administration should be carried on under one set-up we are satisfied to conduct that administration; but if it were thought that it should be conducted under some other set-up, provincial or municipal, I am sure that we would cooperate in every way possible to see that that is carried out.

Mr. BURTON: Has that offer been extended to any of the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: It has been extended to every province at least once a year during all the time that we have had any government in existence in any province since 1939; therefore I am not speaking of any particular government. It has been extended to every municipal organization at least once a year, because they pass the same resolution year after year. I personally have replied to them and have pointed out just what I am now pointing out to the house. No later than this month a resolution came to us from the municipal association in Alberta, and I received a reply back from them in which they asked my permission to send the suggestion to every municipality in the provinces. I replied, stating that I expected them to send it to every municipality and I am sure that they would do so. But it has always been the intention—and it has been stated over and over again both in the house and outside—that any time the provinces or the municipal associations desire to make a proposal to us which involves the paying of something into the fund, which might be worked out on a basis such as was suggested in connection with zoning, whereby some particular area might wish to pay in more money in order to get something paid out on a different basis in areas where we do not pay money now—to give consideration to the matter. That is the reason why we placed in the act in the first place the provision that it should be solid blocks and that these blocks should be on a township basis. Later, we took in a greater part of the area by consenting to take in areas of ten townships or more which were contiguous to the larger block, but we still think the others should accept some responsibility once the greater part of the area is dealt with.

There is one other reason why we have maintained the solid block or the township areas, and I may say that when the legislation was amended before it was the intention that when a nine section area was added it should be treated under the terms of the different regulations and terms of the act as though it were an entire township.

There is another reason why we have taken the six-mile square block as the unit, and it is largely the reason which was brought out by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). He said that in his opinion people who have had payments time after time—probably he would say townships which have had payments for so many continuous years—should be eliminated. We sought to meet the same contention when the act was first brought in by saying that the blocks had to be six miles square, and that instead of paying on an individual basis we would pay on a township basis. The reason was that it will be found certain areas within those townships should not be farmed at all, and we have made provision under P.F.R.A. to organize those areas into community pastures, as was suggested by the hon. member for Souris. We have made provision also to stand the expense of moving farmers out of those areas into better areas; and, having done that, we think the federal government has done its share in trying to reestablish these people. Then we say to them, "If you insist on remaining in a township where two-thirds of the land is good and produces good crops every year and one-third of the land is poor and produces poor crops every year, it should not be considered the responsibility of the government to take care of you every year." In other words, instead of removing areas in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Souris, and on such a wide scale, we have tried to provide against people coming under the terms of the act who insist upon remaining on what everyone recognizes to be submarginal land.

In the act we had another protection against the thing that was feared by the hon. member for Souris; and only today, when I read the bill over carefully after coming into the house, I found that the provision in question had been eliminated from the definition in the present legislation. I am not too sure that when we get into committee we should not consider putting back that protection. In the definition of "cultivated land" the last words were, "and which has not reverted to natural prairie." That provision was inserted in 1939 because, as hon. members know, there were at least a million and a half acres of land in western Canada, much of which had been cultivated over a long period of years, which during the seven years of drought had not been cultivated, or had been allowed to go back to prairie. Perhaps it was just blowing around the country, and was not even growing grass. We said, if that land was brought back under cultivation, payments would not be made on it under this act; and the provision under which it was possible for the administration to carry out that idea was contained in those words, "and which has not reverted to natural prairie." I know there have been some hardships in applying that portion of the regulations, but you cannot apply legislation of this kind over a large area without having some hardships.

I want to repeat that the unit of six square miles was inserted in the act in the first place to provide that people who insisted on remaining on submarginal lands within the area were not paid each year, and also to see to it that those who lived in areas which were subject to drought year after year, but still had good crops, were not denied the privileges of the act.

I should like to deal for just a moment with one other matter bearing upon the same point. Those who discuss the measure without fully understanding it—I am not speaking of members of this house but those outside—usually speak in terms of yield of wheat. One reason we are removing the section which provided that a man with 3,000 bushels of wheat could not collect is because yield of wheat really has nothing at all to do with the payments. A man may draw if he never grows a bushel of wheat. A man may draw if he summer-fallows all his land in a year and does not seed anything. A man may draw if he has all his land in pasture and only runs cattle. The only reason wheat is in there is to provide a barometer; and that barometer simply says that if the yield of wheat over a whole township is eight bushels an acre or less, then it must have been dry. That is all it says, and that is all wheat is in for. When the inspectors go out and go over a township it is not even necessary for them to visit every farm to find out whether it has been dry. They have been compelled to do so, and thus increase the costs of administering the act, by the criticism that has been made. If they do not call on the farmer, there is some criticism; and if they do not examine the crop carefully there is still further criticism.

Mr. BURTON: Was my impression wrong, then, that when this act was first brought in and the limit of 3,000 bushels was imposed, that was done because it was felt that a person who had 3,000 bushels did not require assistance to pull through the year and put in his next crop?

Mr. GARDINER: As I remember it, the 3,000 bushels provision was not there when the act was first brought in; it was amended later. I believe that was put there at a time when we were doing other things in connection with wheat. At the time I believe we were paying something over and above the market price of wheat; we were paying eighty cents when wheat was worth sixty-two cents. Under those circumstances, the matter was discussed, and the principle I am outlining now was not accepted by those who were considering the matter at that time. I believe I am wrong when I say this was done when wheat was sixty-two cents. That was in 1938, the year before the act came in, so it was later than that; it was when some special provision was being made which left out the 5,000 bushels in connection with deliveries to elevators; I have just forgotten the circumstances in connection with it. It has been agreed that wheat does not govern the decision as to whether payment will be made to an individual. Wheat governs only the decision as to whether or not it was dry in that area. One can understand that one might go to a farm where a man was raising live stock almost entirely, where he had perhaps only fifty acres of summer-fallow in wheat. That would be the best cultivated land on the farm. All of it might have been in summer-fallow the year previous, so that he would grow only one crop in two years. He might have twenty bushels to the acre on those fifty acres, and the remainder of a section of land might be devoted to growing feed for live stock, and pasture. Those who argue for the individual basis would say that, because he had twenty bushels to the acre of wheat on fifty acres, he should not be paid. It was never intended that the provision in relation to wheat should be applied in that way at all. Wheat has nothing to do with it, other than it was felt we could determine whether or not it had been dry over a whole township by determining whether or not the wheat yield was eight bushels to the acre or less. But if it was twenty bushels to the acre over the whole township we are pretty well assured that it was not dry. Once the decision has been reached that it was dry, we go ahead and pay everyone in the municipality, in order to take care of the people who are raising live stock as well as grain.

Mr. BURTON: You mean in the township?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, in the township. We pay everyone; and if all the townships in the municipality are in, we pay everyone in the municipality. We do that whether they are raising wheat, oats or barley; whether their farm is all in pasture, provided that they are not ranchers and have not irrigation; and we also pay when they have very small areas in wheat and the greater part of the farm taken up in the production of live stock. We think that is fair. The only unfair thing about it is this. If a man produces nothing but live stock; if he sells no grain, he does not pay in at all because all that he pays in is one per cent of the grain he sells. If he does not sell any grain at all, but sells all live stock, then he has an advantage over the man who grows nothing but grain. But, as hon. members know, there are not so many of those men in the area we are talking about. Practically all of them have more acreage in grain than they utilize in producing live stock. But the reason for making it a unit is to determine whether it was dry or not, or simply finding out what the average yield over the whole township was. One could not find that out by taking the average yield of any one man's farm, because in some cases the man's yield would be twenty bushels, for the reasons I have spoken of, and in others it would be very low because he is farming land that he should not be farming at all. So we have tried to eliminate those possibilities by this provision.

I think that is all I desire to say at the moment. It is my intention, immediately the bill gets second reading, to move that it be sent to the committee on agriculture and colonization. I hope that in that committee we can discuss all the details which have been raised in the discussion here by those who do not belong to the committee, and that when the bill comes back to be considered in committee of the whole we can go farther into any of the details which were raised and which may require to be discussed at greater length. I only wanted to say what I have said in order to recall again to the minds of hon. members the principles underlying the establishment of the legislation in the first place, and the manner in which we have attempted to carry it out.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask the minister one question before second reading is given. The interpretation is not quite clear now to some of us. When the act is amended as is proposed, will it mean that it will include any type of crop failure, through hail and everything else?

Mr. GARDINER: It has always included any type of crop failure which was within an area where the crop was below eight bushels to the acre. But if the hail is in an area—and criticism on this score was, I think, raised by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay)—where the average crop in the district is twenty bushels to the acre, but the hail runs right through the middle and takes a strip one or two miles wide, such people are not eligible for payment unless they are tributary to an area which is already in. The reason why that provision was made in that way was that two of the provinces have hail insurance legislation; and I am not sure but that there are three. Three did at one time have hail insurance legislation. Is Manitoba still in the hail insurance, or have they dropped it?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

An hon. MEMBER: They have dropped it.

Mr. GARDINER: I think they have dropped it. But the other provinces where the greater part of the drought area is have had hail insurance legislation. They can have it because they are provinces. The dominion parliament has not the authority to bring in insurance legislation. That question was determined in the years when we were discussing hail insurance. It was finally determined that the provincial government had the authority to do that, and the provincial government did bring it in. In Saskatchewan today, a farmer has the right over all the area where hail prevails—and he has not the right in the other because he has not desired to come into it—to collect under the hail insurance law which exists in the provinces. If he, of his own volition, decides to come out from under that, which he has the right to do under the legislation, there is no reason why any other piece of legislation should take care of him. He has legislation now which takes care of him, and he must sign himself out or it will take care of him. If he himself does not sign out personally, the whole municipality has to sign in or sign out in order to make the legislation operative or inoperative. When they have that right now I do not think, in this legislation, we should be asked to provide for it a second time. The provision is there now in the provincial law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces, and of the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Probe.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: When the house adjourned last night I was pointing out that the United States had its own individual policy in world affairs and that by allying ourselves, as we are, with them so closely, we shall be drawn into their quarrels willy-nilly. It is also pertinent to point out at this time that the United States has a terrific economic stake in this country, and that the bringing in of the military in this way is just adding the final touch. In the final analysis it will at least solve one question, namely the flag issue. All the Americans will have to do will be to stick nine more stars on their flag and that will finish it. Either that, or we can create one with a bald-headed eagle carrying a wet muskrat in its claws, and that would be our national flag; because we shall then have military as well as economic dictatorship in this country, and the government will be nothing more than trustees for United States capital.

As regards the attitude of United States personnel when they come into this country, granting them their own courts does not instil into them respect for our laws and customs. Many of the people of the United States are of the highest type, but they also have their trouble in that country. In Prince Rupert, during the war, for instance, two aldermen who were walking down the street minding their own business were slugged down in the dark by United States soldiers. Owing to the persistence of one of the aldermen, the assailants were tracked down and tried by their own military courts. We never did know whether justice was meted out or not. I am afraid that sort of thing would come back once again. Their customs are different from ours. They have not the same respect for law and order. If they are allowed to come in here in a unit, with their own courts, they will certainly look on us as just another one of the conquered countries. I am absolutely opposed to it at the present time, because I believe it will give the yellow press of the United States some more ammunition in its witch-hunt on communism. If you read history you will find that any time any movement is persecuted bitterly, it grows and thrives on persecution. History has always taught us that. The only way in which we can bring in a higher order of society if we wish to do so, is consciously to adapt ourselves to changing times and instil in the people faith in their own democracy. This witch-hunt will certainly create the very opposite to what it is supposed to do. It is a sign of fear on the part of the people who are conducting it. They are afraid. They have no faith in their own institutions or in their own intellect. Let us have people who have faith in their institutions; then that faith will be instilled in the people, and there will be no more of this ranting and raving about some foreign ideology. We talk about the Russians going into such countries as Poland, Roumania, Hungary, and so on. We are doing it here by act of parliament, giving the works away. Let us turn this down and throw it out of court, because it will only breed fear and suspicion.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on the bill. I had not the good fortune to hear the interesting debate last night; but it seems to me that it made perfectly clear that this bill takes us far afield into matters of tremendous international importance in which we, whether we like it or not, are deeply and inescapably involved.

I should like to say, in passing, that I have no fear whatever of any ulterior motive on the part of the United States being involved in this bill. I am perfectly prepared to accept the statement of military authorities that this bill is, in many ways, a natural process. But it has become clear, I think, during the course of the debate, that certain important questions are involved, which have been adequately discussed and which I do not intend to take the time of the house in discussing at the present time.

What I wish to speak about for a few minutes is that all-important question which lies at the root of this whole matter and which has been referred to more than once in this debate; namely the relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. I suppose if there is anything upon which we can all agree, it is that we are deeply grieved at the tremendous deterioration in international relations in the last eighteen months. For that we blame the Russians, and, for all I can see, we are entitled to blame them.

It does seem to me that there was in San Francisco about two years ago—perhaps a little more than two years ago—a readiness for cooperation which could have brought the results for which we thought we were fighting. It is now made clear that in the weary months which have followed there has been very little cooperation from the U.S.S.R. And, such as there has been, looking at it as fairly as we can, seems to have come only under pressure, only when we have been, as it is called, tough.

Therefore we have come to the conclusion—and I do not see how we can come to any other conclusion—that we have to be firm. The premier of Ontario, who has just returned from Europe, tells us that today and I do not see how we can disagree with him. We have to be firm. We say that we must not have appeasement, because that gets us nowhere; and I do not disagree with that.

But I should like to say—and perhaps this is the real comment I wish to make this afternoon—that firmness is not enough. Firmness, in itself, is not a policy. Therefore I wish to suggest that there are one or two other things we should have in our minds beyond firmness. I want to suggest that, as in nearly all human relations, the fault is not all on one side; and when we are considering a thing like this, which I think in moderate language we can say is in very truth, a matter of life and death to us, and to our children—it seems to me that we should be very honest with ourselves, as well as very honest with those with whom we disagree. I think we should try to believe that in the end good sense will prevail; because, if it does not, then surely we can say again, using what I hope are not exaggerated words, that there is very little reason to believe that our civilization will persist.

We have talked in the past about the tremendous things which would result from the discovery of new weapons. It seems to me that now we have discovered new weapons which seem different, not only in degree but also in kind, from those which we have been used to before. Therefore I should like to remind the house—and I think we should remind ourselves—that, although I do not doubt that the Russian government is very well informed as to the true state of feeling in this country, nevertheless statements are being made from time to time in the United States and no doubt, if they are relayed to the Russian people, they can be used by the Russian government to suggest to the Russian people that there are imperialistic designs on the part of the United States against them.

I do not believe that to be so for a moment. But I do believe that things are said which can readily be made to bear that interpretation. And in that connection I should like to read a brief statement from that moderate and sensible publication, the London Spectator, which says:

> The increasingly impatient and unfriendly attitude of the American majority to the Soviet Union is a real danger.

Personally I do not believe there is an unfriendly attitude on the part of the American majority; and I shall have a word to say about that later. But I have quoted this as the opinion of a responsible journal because it could be used to show that the Russian government, in trying to alarm its people, has some basis of justification.

What is the truth of the situation? Do any of us believe that there is one one-hundredth of one per cent of the 130,000,000 people of the United States who do not abhor the very thought of war. And does not one believe that that is true with regard to an equally vast number in Russia?

I read the other day an interesting report by an American who had just returned from Europe, and who had been travelling widely on that continent. He said that he never found anywhere that people were interested in war or were talking about war. What they were interested in was housing, food, and clothing, the reestablishment of their families and bringing themselves back to some kind of a civilized life again. Then he added that it was not until he got back to the United States and stepped out of his plane that he began to hear people talking about war. I am not suggesting that many people are talking about war, but I am suggesting that there have been careless statements in the United States, some of which have come from high military authorities, which may have been sufficient, as I say, to enable the Russian government to mislead their people, and to make them believe that there are motives of unfriendliness in the United States against them.

I suppose it is true to say that in the past a good many wars have been fought, to some extent at any rate, from economic motives. But can anyone suggest that either of these two great continental powers need to fight a war or go to war for economic motives? I do not think any person would suggest that. If it is done it will be from fear and from ideological motives. So I say that we have a situation which makes the thought of war in one way absolutely fantastic; yet, on the other hand, I know people will say, "Well, what is the use of talking about it? The Russian people have no say about what happens. They are in a police state and just like a lot of pawns."

I remember a play some years ago which had as its subject a principality in India. The prince was an absolute monarch. He was asked why he did not do such and such a thing. His reply was—and I thought it interesting at the time, because it is profoundly true even in a police state—"Even the most absolute monarch can only act with the consent of the governed." In a way, probably that is a paradox; and yet I wonder after all if it is so paradoxical. We believe that Hitler had convinced his people so that they were ready to go along with him. I suppose, in a way, that the Russian government have convinced their people, too. And, of course, they were attacked.

Now a word or two as to what I think this adds up to. I do not suggest that we should disregard defence. I do not suggest that we should give up the military advantages we have at the present time. I think we are forced to say, and that we may properly say to the Russians: "You are maintaining your huge army, greater than that of any other army in the world. True, we in America have the atomic bomb, but we have to have a counterpoise to your army."

But I do say this, that at the present time we have a situation which reminds me of a condition which we will all remember when we were boys, when two small boys would shoulder up against each other, with the final result that one would haul off and paste the other—and the fight was on. We have something very much like that now. I suggest, first of all, that it is part of the responsibility of people everywhere—of course, what we can say or do here will matter little; one can carry only one's own load and speak one's own view for what it is worth—that we should refuse to tolerate the idea that war is coming and accept it as a kind of inevitability. I sometimes think we have begun to forget what it is like. A great many in this house have been through the war; some of them have been through two wars, and I think we are all apt to feel, "Oh, well, those prophecies were made and they did not come true." They came true enough in Europe; they came true enough if we are to believe what we have heard from those who have been there.

The next thing I would say is that we should have a strong sense of responsibility in what we say. I ran across two things which had been said by Mr. Walter Lippmann, who, I think, is one of the wise men of today. I should like to quote them because I believe they are true. This is what he said about the Russians and the atom bomb:

> They know we shall not use it against them unless they do what they do not intend to do—precipitate a general war.

Here is a further quotation about Russia:

> They are in no danger and they know they are in no danger of being attacked by the United States.

We all believe that is true and, of course, if the Russian people believed it was true I think there would be no danger of war. It may be said that there are no means of getting that through to them, but I think that is only a half truth. We have had a great deal of evidence to show that the Russian soldiers who were in Europe saw even in shattered Europe a way of life far above their own. They compared it with their own way of life, and we have a great deal of evidence to show that they took back the impressions of what they had seen. We can be sure that the Russian government knows the truth.

The last thing I want to say is this: People will say, "Well, there is not much hope in that; what you are suggesting is that we should be moderate, that we should try to see the other side, that we should curb ourselves from saying things which can be used by this unscrupulous Russian government to poison the minds of their people." I do not know whether there is much hope in that, but all I want to say is that if there is not much hope in that, if it is not worth our while to work to that end, hoping that in the end, in some way which perhaps we cannot now see, better counsels will prevail, then I say there is not much hope in anything.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say in support of the bill now under discussion. I am in agreement with those who advocate that we should not give up part of our sovereignty; but in view of the fact that certain circumstances now exist in the world, in view of the fact that we have practically the same economic interests as the United States, our friendly neighbour, I do not see why we should make so much fuss over this bill and be so afraid of giving up too much of our sovereignty to the United States. I heard the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) say last night that we should not play Russia's game. I agree absolutely with him. Then I heard other hon. members say that the same privileges should be extended to every nation of the world. Perhaps I should be excused, but I really cannot make any sense out of such a proposition.

The hon. member for Vancouver North stated that it would be foolish to ask this government and this parliament to extend to the U.S.S.R., Yugoslavia and Hungary the same privileges being extended to the United States, a great, powerful and friendly nation. We cannot compare the friendship of Russia toward Canada with the friendship of the United States toward our country. It is impossible; we cannot do it. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who has just taken his seat, said that we must look at both sides. It is easy now to look at both sides.

If you read the article in Newsweek of last week you must realize that you cannot overlook the dangerous infiltration of communism into the United States and Canada, an infiltration which is spreading its tentacles even into churches. We are not ready to extend these special privileges to the army of the U.S.S.R. when tomorrow we might be faced with an economic revolution which was developed and encouraged by this infiltration of what my hon. friend has just called the witch of communism. I am afraid of that kind of witch and I am ready to fight it anywhere and everywhere.

An hon. MEMBER: He is fighting too.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): He does not look like it. If we wake up tomorrow and are faced with that kind of revolution it will be too bad for those who have been so short-sighted. My last reason for being in favour of the bill is that the Russians are against it. I have before me the Montreal Gazette of June 2. Once in a while we find something interesting in the Montreal Gazette. This article reads:

> London, June 2—(Reuters)—Moscow radio said in a news broadcast today that Canadians were getting "more and more uneasy" about impending "infiltration" of United States troops, consequent upon plans for United States-Canadian defence cooperation.

And again:

> "In this draft," the broadcast said, "United States troops are given such privileges that have never before been given to foreign troops on territories of other countries in peace time."

Indirectly Russia is asking for the same privileges, and that idea is echoed in this house. The article continues:

> "Several articles of the Canadian criminal code will not be applied to the U.S. troops. Military and other U.S. authorities are granted full rights on the Canadian territory, providing only that they do not interfere with the local Canadian ones."
> "Several observers consider that the final approval of this draft will be only a further step toward Canada's final subservience to the U.S.A."

I am not afraid of any subservience we may show to the United States. If the United States had wanted to get Canada before, they had many opportunities to do so, and everyone knows it. I think we should rather cultivate the friendship of the United States than try to keep what is left of the friendship of Generalissimo Stalin, who has just called us a weak nation. Maybe my hon. friends who propose to give the same privileges to Russian troops as it is proposed to extend to United States troops will bow down before Mr. Stalin, calling us a weak nation. But in my opinion, Canada, with its great natural resources and its strong and virile population, must show Mr. Stalin that we are strong and clear-sighted enough to see what might come upon us through the infiltration of his spies even in this very country. We must not be content with a false sense of security. In view of what has happened lately in this country, we must be more far-sighted and not wait until the revolution comes upon us to give the United States the largest measure of friendship that we can give them. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, for the close friendship that we must extend to the United States and for the safety of my country, I gladly support this bill.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) last evening constituted a strong argument for the terms of the amendment now before the house to the effect that Bill No. 253 should not now be read a second time but rather that its subject matter be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

The Minister of National Defence gave us certain information regarding what he referred to as a similar act in the United States, and in giving us details of that act he pointed out that it is quite different from the measure now before the house. The act in the United States referred to is the Friendly Foreign Forces Act, and so far as the act itself is concerned it is general in its application rather than having specific reference to one country as does the bill now before this house. The minister went on to point out that only such countries came under the provisions of the United States Act as are covered by a presidential proclamation, and he gave the terms of one such presidential proclamation which brought the United Kingdom and Canada within the provisions of that act. I noticed, however, that the reference to the United Kingdom and Canada in that presidential proclamation was to these two countries as co-belligerents with the United States. I am not going to go into any further details with regard to the Friendly Foreign Forces Act, but it does seem to me that the information which the minister has given to the house is sufficient to indicate that we should examine carefully whether the bill before us is the kind of bill that we should be passing at all. I, for one, think that if we are to have a bill of this nature it should be similar to the United States act in that it should be general in its application. But even with regard to the United States act I should like to be able to ask questions as to the significance of that word "co-belligerents". Surely we are not at war at the present time, and therefore I am opposed to this kind of legislation. In these circumstances it is not good enough to ask the house to give second reading to this bill on the usual understanding that we can make amendments when we are in committee of the whole, because we know we do not get very far along that track. It seems to me desirable that the whole subject before us be referred to the committee on external affairs where members can discuss the issues involved with the minister, and I am sure that the minister, from the experience we have already had on that committee, will be only too glad to accept the advice and considered opinion of the committee. I hope, therefore, that it will not be necessary for us to vote on this amendment, but that the government will realize that it is a good suggestion and will agree to permit the subject matter of this bill to go to that committee.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Why delay the adoption of this bill?

Mr. KNOWLES: The answer to that is quite definite: because I do not like it.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have all the objections to it that have been stated by other hon. members, including in particular the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) last evening, and the pointed remarks just now made by the hon member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell).

The main fact of the present world situation, on which this bill has a bearing, is, as was stated last night by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the tragic way in which the world is tending to divide itself into two camps. I can appreciate the sentiments of the hon. member (Mr. Gauthier) who has just taken his seat when he referred to the desirability of building up a strong friendly relationship with our great neighbour, the United States of America.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): And of maintaining it.

Mr. KNOWLES: And of maintaining that relationship for all time. But I wish to point out to the hon. member and to this house that the possibility, not merely of maintaining that friendship, but of actually keeping in existence two countries like the United States and Canada depends upon our world being kept going at all. In other words, our destiny as a nation and the destiny of North America depends upon the maintenance of the peace of the world. We can no longer think in terms of adequate defence for a nation or a continent or a hemisphere. We have to see to it that war itself does not break out again.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was very much to the point when he talked of how people generally are saying that the dire prophecies about the last war did not come true and maybe we can survive another world war. He was quite right when he said that for great sections of the world the dire prophecies had come true in the tragic destruction visited on large sections of the earth, and furthermore, in the terrific economic and social maladjustments we are facing the world over today. I maintain that if we are sensible human beings we simply cannot think at all of pursuing any course that would lead to another war. If you accept the possibility of there being another war and the possibility of civilization surviving another war, why, then, there is logic to this discussion of ways and means of defending ourselves on a national, continental, or hemisphere basis. But if you face the fact that we simply cannot have another war, that it means the end of everything, then we have to find new ways and means of avoiding it. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that dividing the world into two camps, dividing the world into power blocs, has been tried often enough and it has failed in the past and will fail again.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): It is easy enough to say that on your side.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend has made the statement that it is easy to make the statement that our side is in the right.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): It is, too.

Mr. KNOWLES: We always do that even in arguments which take place in the house; as for example, the exchanges between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and me. We have them often. I always think he is wrong; he always thinks I am wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But I am right.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Many more think so than otherwise.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to assure the house that that little dialogue was unrehearsed; but it does drive home my point. It reminds me of an experience I had a little over a year ago, in the month of February, 1946. It was then two or three days after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had announced the investigation that was to take place into the espionage situation. By the strangest of coincidents I had the privilege at the time of being in Moscow, and on this occasion—it is particularly in my mind because of the little interchange that my right hon. friend and I have just had—there was a reception held at the Canadian embassy in Moscow. There were three Russian visitors; they were on a semi-official level. One of them was a lady who was the head of the society for cultural relations with foreigners; the second was an army officer who maintained liaison relationships with military attaches of other embassies in Moscow, and the third person was an official from the protocol division of the Russian foreign office. As was natural, because of the situation which had developed owing to the announcement about the espionage matter, we had quite a lengthy conversation. I will not go into all the details of that conversation, but it reached a point something like this. These people said to me: "What worries us is that the news which has come out"—they were not discussing the merits or demerits of the case at the moment —"has released such a flood of anti-soviet feeling and anti-soviet propaganda in the Canadian newspapers." That was the principal feature which was being reported in the Moscow newspapers at the time. I tried to explain the freedom of the press as we have it in this country, but we got along to the point where I tried to show to my three Russian friends to whom I was talking the real basic difficulty; I said, "I must admit that our western people are afraid of you, afraid there is going to be another war." With a response that was so ready that I could not avoid feeling it was genuine, they said to me: "Why are you afraid of us? We are the ones who are afraid of you." I was equally taken aback at the thought that they were afraid of us as being the people who might bring on another war. Our conversation carried on. There were five or six of us at this time because one or two of the Canadians had joined us, and we agreed that we had there the epitome of the world situation, a camp on one side afraid of the other, but not for one moment thinking that the reverse is the feeling over in the other camp.

Somehow or another we have to try to break that down. In my view we shall not break it down by adopting the attitude which my hon. friend suggests, always assuming that the other side is wrong. I do not mean to suggest that we go to the other extreme and always assume that we are wrong. What we have to do is to face the thing objectively and set as our aim the breaking down of this division into two camps and get the world together in some sort of international organization which, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has just said, if there is not some hope in it, then there is no hope in anything.

During the course of this debate it has been said that we must be practical. I agree. The suggestion was made last night by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker) that those who talked in any other terms than regional defence arrangements such as this envisages are being unrealistic and that he was tired of that kind of thing. All of us, of course, can use that language. We all like to think that we are the ones who are realistic and that it is the other fellow who is being impractical. I want to suggest that the most unrealistic approach in the world today is the approach that thinks we can defend ourselves by some sort of regional defence; that we can defend ourselves by tying up no longer with the British navy but by tying up to the might and power of the friendly nation to the south of us. That, Mr. Speaker, is completely unrealistic. The practical position today is to realize that there is no defence except to end war itself; that the destiny of this country, the destiny of Britain, the destiny of the United States, the destiny of all countries of the world is wrapped up in the maintenance of world peace for all time. It is that or nothing. We must make as our main aim, our main course, the following of ways and means that will somehow reverse the tragic trend which things have taken in the past few months.

I felt that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was describing the situation correctly when he referred to the deterioration that has taken place in relations between the western camp and the soviet camp in the last number of months. We must remember —and I hope that some day we can recapture it—the high idealism and the high hopes that were raised at the time of the San Francisco conference two years ago. At that time, although the war in Europe was over, V-J day had not yet come; and it was a mark of deep significance that here was a world which was not yet over a terrible war but which was already making plans to build an international organization that would keep the peace which was yet to be won.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask a question?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: Does the hon. member think we shall establish world peace by disarming and by not taking all the advantage we can of our allies, while Russia arms and is going through a systematic process of building up her armies? Does the hon. member think we can maintain peace by disarmament and breaking away from our allies; or by arming and showing that we can defend ourselves? I should like him to answer that. I am being practical now, but the hon. member has attacked me.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not attack my hon. friend; I took his words and used them. The question that the hon. member has asked points up the very thing that I am trying to say, namely, that in my view the building of defences is based upon the premise that we are to have another war and that it is perfectly proper for the other fellow to build his defences too. That means that in due course we have a conflict and our defences on both sides are of no use whatsoever. I believe the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was not talking in paradoxical terms but was being pretty practical when he said we have to show firmness, we have to make it clear that we are not weak; yet at the same time, or, as he put it, we have to go farther and find ways and means of bridging the gap between these two camps and bringing them closer together.

Now I want now to come a little more closely to grips, if I can, with the point raised by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, who referred to the way in which the Soviet Union is enlarging the number of states coming under its control. It is interesting to note the way in which we refer to the nations that come under the control of the Soviet Union as satellites of that power, and the way in which we refer to the troops of the Soviet Union in those other countries as being an outrage. And I quite agree; I do not deny it for a moment. But it is strange that when we have foreign troops on our own soil we call it a natural process, or working along with people of like-minded notions, or friendly relations with a friendly power. We are honest when we say these things; when hon. members use these phrases in this house during this debate that is what they mean, but it does not look that way to the people in the other camp, just as the things they are doing over on the other side of the world do not look like a natural process, or the soviets working along with people of like-minded notions, or friendly relations between friendly powers.

Mr. FERGUSON: Who started it?

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend means, who started this deterioration of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States?

Mr. FERGUSON: No; who started moving their troops into other countries?

Mr. KNOWLES: As far as the future is concerned, as far as maintaining world peace is concerned, it does not matter. When we have had an atomic war and we are all dead, it will not make much difference who started the thing. What matters is that we put some thought and effort now into trying to prevent it.

I should like to get along now to what I consider a practical suggestion to try to put a stop to this policy which the United States, on the one hand, and the Soviet Union, on the other, are pursuing. I think they are both wrong; and hon. members may take their choice as to who started it or who is the worst protagonist of the policy. I believe they are both wrong. I believe the Soviet Union should be condemned in strong language for what it has been doing by way of gathering in a larger number of satellites and trying to push out its frontiers, giving the western camp the feeling that war is coming. I think it is equally wrong for the United States to have gone beyond the famous Monroe doctrine to a Truman doctrine that extends the military and political barriers of the United States half way around the world. We are now being drawn into this United States policy; we are capitulating to it, and I think this country at this moment has a supreme opportunity. We can turn down this idea. We can say we are not going to have United States troops in Canada in peace time. That would be the first move by any small country against the Truman policy or the Stalin policy, and it would put us in the position of being able properly to criticize the Soviet Union for what they are doing as well as the United States. It would also strengthen our position in the councils of the united nations.

An hon. MEMBER: It would make us absolutely helpless.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not a bit of it. It would restore us to a moral position we are fast losing in the councils of the united nations. It took a long time for this country to convince the other nations of the world that we had an independent voice. We took a long step in that direction after the last war, when Canada was accepted as a signatory to the treaty of Versailles and as a member of the league of nations. It has taken a long while to convince the rest of the world that we are not just a daughter of the mother country, and that we speak for ourselves as an independent nation. Now, barely out of that era, we find ourselves being thought of by other nations of the world as a tool in United States foreign, economic and military policy.

Mr. FERGUSON: Nonsense.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not nonsense at all. I had the privilege of attending one session of the united nations; and, while there, it was my experience that we were losing ground, not because of our close connection with the United Kingdom, but because of our close connection with the United States. I suggest and I insist that at future meetings of the united nations any attempt by Canada to express views on this division of the world into two camps will simply not carry any weight at all, because we are part of the United States scheme; any more than to us the voice of Poland, or Yugoslavia carries any weight, because we say they are just expressing what is in the interests of the Soviet Union.

Mr. MARTIN: Will my hon. friend permit a question? He mentioned that he attended one meeting, the first part of the first assembly of the united nations, and he spoke of the reputation Canada had at that meeting. To confine my question to that meeting, does the hon. gentleman know of any country whose reputation was any higher in its desire to collaborate in important matters affecting the peace of the world than Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: If he remained awake during the sitting he deserves a lot of credit.

Mr. KNOWLES: Of course the question is worded in such a way that you just cannot answer it; that is why the minister worded it as he did; but I will say to him that he knows we stood high on the first ballot for election to the security council. We did not get elected to that council, however, and it is my view that was largely because we were favoured by the United States, and—

Mr. MARTIN: Surely that was not it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I got around and talked to a good many people, too. I did not waste any time while I was there.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Perhaps they looked at some of our representatives.

Mr. KNOWLES: I beg your pardon? These interruptions mean just one thing. They mean something is being said that is hitting home. I know just as surely as that I am standing here that at the next meeting of the united nations, with United States troops on Canadian soil and the whole infiltration that is going on into our national life, our voice on these matters, as I have said already, will not carry any more weight with those on the other side than does the voice of Yugoslavia or Poland with us when they speak on these same matters.

Mr. FERGUSON: Your voice won't be there.

Mr. KNOWLES: The voice of Canada will be there.

Mr. MARTIN: Then how do you explain that Canada was elected for the longest term possible to the economic and social council, at the same time as it was up for election to the security council?

Mr. POULIOT: It is because that council is not of any importance at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no. I may argue with my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare. (Mr. Martin), but I cannot agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) on that. To me the most hopeful feature of the united nations is the economic and social council; and one of the things I am really proud of is that Canada played such an important part at San Francisco in helping to get the provision for the economic and social council written into the charter. I think that was one of the reasons Canada was accorded such a high position on that council at London.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I want to put before the house and before the government as a serious suggestion the thought that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has posed the problem very well, and that we must try to find some way to reverse the deterioration which is now taking place in relations between the western camp and the soviet camp. We will not reverse the trend by allowing ourselves to be pulled into the western camp. We might have a chance to reverse it if we stopped this trend and, by prohibiting United States troops coming onto our soil, put ourselves in the strong moral position of being able to speak with an independent voice and to play, not a lesser but a greater part than we have played in the past in the councils of the united nations, which, despite what has been said by the hon. member for Temiscouata, to me holds out the only hope for peace in the future. Let us not, on the one hand, boast of our membership in the united nations and talk of the great principles of collective security, and, on the other, follow the old methods of regional defence, the old ideas which led to war; for in our day war is no longer something which we can have and survive. War is something that means the end of everything. In the name of the people of this country whom we represent, in the name of humanity—the welfare of which is the purpose of the united nations—let us use some real sense and try to grapple with this problem in an effective and practical way.

I close with this final plea to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), that he see the meaning and the value in the suggestion which we have made that this whole matter go to the external affairs committee before second reading, and that he therefore accept the amendment made by my colleague the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe).

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I am very much interested in what the previous speakers have said, and in the changes in the policies of hon. gentlemen to my left. I remember the position which those hon. gentlemen took in this house during the dark days six months before the war broke out in 1939. They said, "Let us depend on Washington for peace. What have we to do with Britain's wars?" One of them wanted to reduce the defence estimates of my hon. friend the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who was then Minister of National Defence. I called the attention of the house to the six hundred miles of unprotected coastline in British Columbia, from Puget sound to the southern Queen Charlotte islands, which had no defence at all if the British fleet were withdrawn from the Pacific in the event of war which I saw coming. After the war started, I said to these gentlemen, "Where are now you prophets who prophesied?"—as the hon. gentleman and the minister are prophesying tonight. I quoted Jeremiah, chapter 37, verse 19, to those gentlemen:

> Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The King of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land?

These hon. gentlemen, six months before the war broke out, believed in the policy that our defencelessness was our greatest asset. In March, 1939, I moved the adjournment of the house to discuss the matter and told them that war was just about on us, and all that kind of thing. Now what do they say? What does the leader of the party say? Miss Agnes MacPhail, who is not now a member of the house but who at that time represented the constituency of Grey-Bruce, said, "Why do we need to go looking for defence across the water to Glasgow and to London", that we could get all the defence we wanted at Washington and to remember we were on the North American continent. That was the policy of the pacifists. They believed in peace pacts, peace notes, the league of nations, agreements and all that kind of thing—something which caused this second war as well as the first one. I would go as far as anybody in this house in paying respect and showing admiration for the cooperation of the people of the United States. But do not forget this. Had we depended on hon. gentlemen to my left and on Washington for defence, and not on the British fleet, what would have happened? That fleet gave us and all America protection for 200 years. It was the British fleet that saved American shores before the war started. That fleet was the real Monroe doctrine.

Where would we have been if we had adopted the policy of hon. gentlemen in the C.C.F.? We would have been invaded, and we were very close to being in that position. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) made a fine speech last night. In some respects I agree with what he said. The axis fleet was right up along the coast of Newfoundland, in the St. Lawrence and other places like that. We were very close to being invaded.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me did not refer to the bill at all, or its object or principles.

Mr. KNOWLES: I dealt with the amendment, and that is what is before the house.

Mr. CHURCH: He was one of those to whom I referred when I quoted Jeremiah, who put his dependence in peace pacts, our defencelessness and all the rest of it. But Winnipeg, in which his constituency is situated, raised a large force of magnificent troops when Canada was at war.

I wish now to come to Bill No. 253 and bring the house back to what we are discussing. The bill is based on the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on February 12 last, which deals with seven clauses and different aspects of defence and collaboration with the great nation to the south of us to whom we owe so much.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, just before the recess at six o'clock I had been referring to our hon. friends to my left, and had stated that they were not the only pacifists in 1939 in the country. The debate then on the reduction in the estimates speaks for itself.

I wish to deal with the principle of the bill, because that is what is before us on second reading. True it is that the speeches come within the wide latitude given by the Prime Minister when he addressed the house on February 12 of this year, upon which occasion he outlined six or seven means of collaboration with the United States in respect of defence. No doubt what the Prime Minister said on that occasion has influenced some members who have spoken in this debate.

What is this bill? It is to make provision for the discipline and internal administration of visiting forces of the United States of America, when present in Canada with the consent of the government of Canada. The provisions of the criminal code, which are declared inapplicable to members of the United States forces, are applicable to the other dominions. They apply to Australia, New Zealand and to the other dominions within the empire, but not to the United States.

The sections in the criminal code I refer to have reference to unlawful drilling, the use of offensive weapons and many other matters. I would call the attention of the house to the principle of the bill, because as we look at the world today we look at a very dark picture indeed. Two years ago, at the close of the war, Great Britain and her dominions stood at the pinnacle of their strength, and stood as a bulwark for the protection of civilization, liberty, and all that kind of thing. During four centuries Britain has saved the world and the empire from a slavery worse than death. I refer to the days of Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon, and even twice in our own generation against the axis powers.

The New York Times, in a recent article dealing with this matter said:

> From the day it broke away from the British empire the United States has been living in large measure under the protection of that empire and in particular, of the British fleet.
> This was not necessarily an altruistic action on the part of Britain, but in days when Europe was the world's powerhouse and when Britain held the predatory European empires, it was to her own best interests to keep other European powers out of the western hemisphere. It was this interest which inspired the Monroe doctrine which was proclaimed by the United States as its own, and was really made effective by the British fleet.
> It was the same interest which in the final analysis safeguarded the freedom of all the Americas.

That is absolutely correct; it is the verdict of history. When I speak with respect to the principle of the bill, I would also, as have other members, speak about the duty this country owes to the people of the United States. In that connection I would point out that in my view the bill before the house violates the principles of the Rush-Bagot treaty. It is an absolute violation of that treaty. There is no doubt that we owe a great deal to the United States, and it is possible that our collaboration with them and Britain may save us from a third war, or, as F. D. Roosevelt called it, a war of survival. There can be no doubt about that. If we are to save the world, then the western democracies, Great Britain and the United States, must have absolute cooperation and collaboration in all important matters, and protest now against Russian plans to dominate the world.

I believe that throughout the war we surrendered too much initiative to Washington in our military, political, economic, social and financial spheres. I am one who believes we have gone too far in that direction, and the United States would have more respect for us if we told them that. I still maintain that patriotism is the cement which binds nations together.

In the Lay of the Last Minstrel, Sir Walter Scott said:

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!
> And, doubly dying shall go down
> To the vile dust, from whence he sprung,
> Unwept, unhonour'd, and unsung.

I believe there are some people in this country who do not appreciate those lines. In the first and second great wars we were saved from war on our own soil by Britain's magnificent fleet, when the enemy came right to our gates. Portions of the axis fleet were right in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, around Newfoundland, and we were saved by the British fleet from the awful results of invasion of our own soil.

Let me repeat that in my view this bill is in violation of the principles of the Rush-Bagot treaty. I do not know who has asked for the measure. I am wondering what the effect will be when it is read alongside the statement made by that great President Truman who will visit this country within a few days. I know he will be received with open arms, as a tribute to a great nation of which it is his honour to be the President. But it was only on Monday last he issued a statement in which he advised the United States to arm, or to invite extermination. A commission to look into military training has been operating in the United States, and its statement speaks for itself. The President asks for $1,750 million each year for universal training of those from eighteen years of age up.

In view of the statement made last Monday by the President, I believe we must read what he said into this bill. Mind you, I am not objecting to a reasonable amount of cooperation; but we must still remember that we are part of the British empire. While I am opposed to a complete programme of internationalism, I still favour it to a degree. In my view, internationalism should stay where it has always been, namely with Great Britain and her dominions, because that has been the only league of nations which has ever been successful in the history of the world. And why we should go outside it today, I do not know.

It was pointed out by my former leader only a few days ago that we have had no imperial conference. At that time he was referring to defence matters within the empire. When here in Ottawa, Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser, the prime ministers of two of our sister dominions which are now being seriously threatened so far as their security within the British empire and the world is concerned, are showing considerable interest in this matter.

I urge that this should have first been considered in an empire conference. The other prime ministers I named would have liked a conference in which Canada would join, but Canada rejected it. We now see the result of it in the statement made to the house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) on Monday last. The question was raised by me of the announcement by Mr. Bevin on May 16 in London as to giving up our British bases in the Mediterranean, Suez and the middle east, abandoning that whole area, to retire to East Africa, unwept, unhonoured and unsung and the empire scuttled in this way, and Canada never heard of it. Where would we have been in the last war if we had given up all our bases?

Away back in 1939 some people right here in this house seemed to believe that we could depend upon Washington for all the defence we needed. It was said: Why do we want to go to London or to Glasgow for defence when we can get all the defence we want in Washington? If we had given up those bases; if we had not kept Hong Kong, Malta and the other great bases; if they had been given over to an international body, where would we have been during the last war? We would have had to be neutral, too. They said that we should go to Washington. The United States came into the war after it had been on for nearly two and a half years because they were invaded; Russia came into the war because she was invaded, but Great Britain went to war in the defence of Poland to which she had given a verbal agreement, afterwards a written agreement. Lord Bennett said:

> We have not had an imperial conference for some time at which all of the commonwealth was represented and we have no parliament which speaks for all. We, therefore, are developing separate policies in the various nations of the commonwealth and you cannot have a commonwealth last long if all the nations that comprise it are developing separate policies.
> What we are facing is the greatest crisis this country has ever faced—and the epitaph has been written in cold-blooded terms just as accurately as far as guessing can be accurate. Many countries believe we are through.

In my opinion we should have called a dominion conference on the principles of this bill.

I do not believe in Bill No. 253. I do not believe in the present methods adopted by the united nations. They have given us very little satisfaction. Even Mr. Attlee said he was disappointed in their first year. I believe that what is going on in New York now will lead to untold disaster for the people of this country if we depend upon that agency alone as we did upon the old league of nations before. I further believe, as to this bill, in the words of Mr. Churchill, who said:

> I have never conceived that a fraternal association with the United States would militate in any way against the unity of the British commonwealth and empire, or breed ill-feeling with our great Russian ally, to whom we are bound by the twenty years treaty. I do not think we need choose this or that. With wisdom, and patience, and vigour, and courage, we may get the best of both. We have often said of our own British empire: "In my father's house there are many mansions."

That is correct. This bill and the provisions contained in it should first have been considered by the dominions at a meeting, like they used to have every few years to solve these dominion questions of trade, defence and migration.

Russia was referred to today by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). I believe that the western democracies should speak out plainly as to what they believe. Unless there is a united effort by Russia and the senior members of the democracies, the United States and Britain, to come to an agreement, there will be, as that great president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, said, a war of survival. If another war comes, it will be a war of survival. It certainly will be a war of survival for the western democracies. The only way in which it can be stopped is to make it plain to the other great nations that we want their help in order that there may be peace on earth and good will toward men for all time, and the time is now to oppose the aims of Russia for world supremacy.

Under this bill it is proposed to have the armed forces of another country here in Canada. In view of what has been said, I think we should have the advice of our military advisers. What is the necessity of having those armed forces here at the present time? They can do no good. They are proposing to send a large Canadian army to the United States to train. It is true that in the last war the Royal Air Force had bases down south, in Mexico, but that is another matter.

Bill No. 253 must be considered along with another matter, the giving up of bases along the Atlantic from Newfoundland to British Guiana. These have been given to the United States under a 99-year lease, which is practically a freehold, as any lawyer will tell you. That lease should be cancelled, and its cost charged to lease-lend by the United States. Now they are coming on to the land. Are we to have these forces come here? I wonder if the matter was taken up at Washington. I referred to this matter in another debate on civil aviation in 1944 when it was proposed to give up certain bases to an international body. After all is said and done, our history books will have to be rewritten if what is going on now is correct. It is said now that we owe nothing to history; that everything is internationalism; that we owe nothing to patriotism and all that kind of thing, and that Britain and the dominions come second to internationalism. If this goes on we shall have to revise our history books. The same complaint has been made about the histories in the United States and in Canada. We are being asked to give up some of our sovereign rights and to change our status. We are being asked to give away these rights, and I am not referring only to the United States now.

I say: Let them use the bases and give them the raw materials up to our capacity to give, but give them bases by sovereignty—no. If we had given them away before we would have lost the last war. We would never have been in the last war. If we had an international policy in connection with the giving up of parts of the empire—bases—if we had given them up, where would we be today? As the Prime Minister said:

> The Canadian government strongly favours a policy of international collaboration and cooperation in air transport and is prepared to support in international negotiations whatever international air transport policy can be demonstrated as being best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada but also our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war.

I then went on to say what would apply also to Bill No. 253, that we should be ready to cooperate with our allies. I said we should allow them to use our air bases, but we should not give away sovereignty over them. The empire has thrown back its enemies from without and in my opinion she will go on to destroy them. Now is the time that we should try to recapture the spirit of empire and our faith and pride in our dominions and in our trade and commerce. The empire is a living thing and should not be allowed to go by default or into liquidation. The mother country and the dominions fought this battle alone for two years. Our soldiers carried on with those from India, New Zealand, South Africa, Australia and the empire training plan. We stood shoulder to shoulder in the snows of Labrador and Newfoundland and in the heat of India and the far east.

In the days before the war you could go into any large port and find fifteen or sixteen ships from different parts of the empire carrying on their trade. I believe that this same spirit of empire cooperation will continue in the years that are to come. Canada should be ready to go along with the dominions and the empire. The time has come when the government should tell this house and the country what our relations are with the other sister dominions who fought along with us for two years to save civilization. One of our great allies stood aside for over two years with Germany, but Russia has since made a glorious record in the last two years of the war with Germany.

That is the speech I made in 1944, before the war was concluded. I was referring to the policy which should be adopted then—this would apply also to this bill—in connection with the use of bases and having forces in the country. In view of the Prime Minister's statement on February 12 last, I have yet to hear any real reason given for permitting troops of another country to be in Canada two years after the war.

One million men from the dominions went to the help of the mother country in the first world war and 130,000 of these men fell on the field of battle. These men went under their own status, autonomy and sovereignty, and what they did voluntarily changed the whole history of the world.

So far as this bill goes, I have my own views in connection with it. It simply comes down to this: Are we or are we not to continue to be a partner with the mother country in the defence of the empire and the world? We were her partner in two great wars, and the result was that the axis parties were defeated. In my opinion you are going to have wars until you change the hearts of men, and instead of sending delegates all over the world to leagues and the UNO—and we are sending them all over the seven seas now—we should be sending out missionaries to them to change the hearts of men. Without that, war is never far off. I have already quoted in the house the exact words of Premier Attlee of Great Britain in calling the attention of the country to the present danger of war.

Civilizations arise and continue to exist—and all history is the witness to the truth—when conditions are hard, only when they are continually threatened, only when they are determined to maintain and defend their rule. They decline and fall when the external pressure is removed, or the inner spirit decays. The surrender may disguise itself in many forms, of which humanitarian sentiment is one. F. S. Oliver wrote:

> If a country will not stand up for its rights, it must surely lose them. The spirit of giving in is the most fatal disease to which nations are subject, and it is apt to attack them, like a cancer, when they have arrived at the meridian.

As W. MacNeil Dixon says, in "The Human Situation":

> When England's day comes to an end the principles which have contributed to its coming, Christian, pacifist, or whatever they may be styled, will not thereby be strengthened. On the contrary, such is the irony which pervades things human, they will have brought about their own eclipse, their own dissolution, and all the triumph of the opposing principles. The decline and fall of England, which will rejoice her enemies, will not be England's decline and fall only, but of all for which she stood, and not till then shall we know the extent of our miseries. I, at least, am not of the opinion that humanity, justice, freedom or Christianity, will be gainers in that fall.

Next to the Christian faith no other agency has done so much for freedom, liberty and civilization as the mother country has done with the aid of the dominions. It has stood like the Rock of Ages. We should study the history of the empire and learn what it has stood for in the way of defence. Do not forget that if the dominions do not hang together they will hang separately, as none is able to go it alone, and the mother country will become a small empire like a second Denmark on the edge of Europe. Quebec would have been invaded in the last war and so would Ontario and the maritime provinces if Britain had not extended her help to us in Canada by the fleet. This country went to the aid of Britain and France in the first great war, and tens of thousands of our young men from the province of Quebec and other provinces lie buried in France until the resurrection morn.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, most speakers who have taken part in this debate have agreed that if United States forces are to come into this country a bill such as this to provide for their discipline and internal administration is necessary. The main argument has revolved around the much wider question of the defence of Canada and, related to that question, whether we should admit United States forces to this country and to what extent, if they are admitted, that would infringe upon our sovereignty. So far as these latter questions are concerned, we must take a practical and realistic view. I think we are all agreed that we would like Canada to reach the theoretically perfect position of being able to look after our own defence entirely by ourselves, but the plain fact is that we have not one-quarter of the population which would be required to do that, so that in my view it is foolish to talk about it. Therefore we must depend upon the help of our natural friends and allies, the British empire and the United States.

There are a few members of this house who, judging from their remarks, do not believe in the united nations; but even they, I am sure, earnestly hope, as well as the rest of us, that the united nations will become an effective instrument to maintain world peace. At the present moment the fact is that it is not such an instrument and the prospects of its becoming such in the near future I think everyone will agree are not very good. Under such circumstances, it would in my opinion be absolute folly to rely on the united nations and not to take the best measures that are otherwise open to us for our own defence.

Our geographical position makes our defence and the defence of the United States one problem in these days. I think everybody who has looked into the question is convinced that any possible war which might break out will be waged, in the first instance at least, in the air, and the targets for that airborne attack will be the heavily industrialized areas of the northern part of the United States and the southern part of Canada. To win the war, the enemy would have to knock out that industrialized area and destroy our potential war-making capacity on this contintent. The areas, that is to say the land mass of Europe and Asia, from which any airborne attack could be launched, would send either planes, rockets or any other type of missiles against the targets I have indicated by the great circle routes passing over northern Canada. Those are just simple facts which practically everyone will admit. If that is so, it seems to me that the least we can do is to cooperate with the United States in setting up experimental stations in the north to devise, if it is possible to do so, a defence chain against a possible attack coming in over that area. Furthermore, I believe that a bill of this kind is necessary to enable us to do that; therefore I am in favour of it.

To me the whole situation stripped of what I would call probably the unessentials, comes down to this. Are we prepared to cooperate with the United States in the defence of this continent or not? The whole thing can boil down to that one question. To me it is inconceivable that anyone should be opposed to such cooperation unless his sympathies lie with the only possible aggressor at the present time. So far as I can see, the only possible aggressor for several years is Russia; or unless he is one who is desirous of introducing into this country a system of government and an economy which is similar to that practised in Russia. Apart from people of that kind, I find it inconceivable that anyone would oppose the idea of cooperation with the United States in the defence of this continent.

The people who appear to be afraid of this bill are allowing their desire for peace and for a successful united nations completely to obscure the realities of the position in which we are and in which the whole world is at the present time.

The attitude of the C.C.F., as exemplified by the speakers who have taken part in this debate seems to me to be essentially a return to the attitude adopted by them in the ten years prior to the outbreak of the war just concluded. It seems to me that their outlook on questions of this kind is exactly the same as that of many friends of mine in Calgary. In the period before the war, these people were all members of the pacifist league and of this, that and the other thing. They advocated constantly that we should take no steps in the matter of military preparedness. I have had many of these people speak to me in a condescending and sneering way. They wondered why I was such a fool as to devote part of my time to militia training during the period. They seemed to insinuate that my intelligence was of a comparatively low order because I was wasting my time in such a way and held the view that another war might come and that we should prepare for it. As I say, I am afraid—and it alarms me—that the attitude of the C.C.F. at present is a return to that attitude. If that is so, it behooves all the rest of us to make sure that that attitude does not come in to anything like such widespread favour as it had in the period between the two wars, and result in our becoming so weak that another war would be brought on.

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, "If you accept the possibility that there may be another war, then this bill may be sensible". If I have not quoted him correctly I am sure he will correct me.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I just conclude the sentence? The hon. member was quite correct so far as he went. I said, the possibility of another war and the possibility of the world surviving.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member said, "If you accept the possibility that there may be another war". He then went on to say that he could not accept it. Following that, he began to talk about being realistic. If there is anything which is completely unrealistic I think it is that statement. Anybody who thinks about the question at all must admit that there is the possibility of another war. You cannot escape it. As a matter of fact I would say that if you think at all you cannot escape that conclusion. Certainly there is a possibility of another war, and anybody who argues that there is not that possibility is completely shutting his eyes to the reality of the situation and of the world in which we are.

Personally I feel strongly that I, myself, and a large number of other people, have suffered enough during the six years of war which we have just gone through from theorists of that kind. In my opinion it is people with the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who were responsible to a large extent for the fact that there are now thousands of Canadian graves in Europe. It is all very well for these theorists to talk about the horrors of war and all that sort of thing, but hardly any of them have seen any of the horrors of war. Not many of them have seen their comrades killed or helped to bury them or helped to wash the blood from their hands. All they do, as a matter of fact, is to take the "holier than thou" attitude.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member will have his turn in a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Privilege; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Does the hon. member wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. WRIGHT: A point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has just made a somewhat rash statement.

Mr. FERGUSON: A true statement.

Mr. WRIGHT: He said that members of this group had not seen the horrors of war. Well, I will say that if he will look through the records of the parliamentary guide he will find that there are probably as many members of this group who have seen the horrors of war as there are in his own group.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, you won't; that was done.

Mr. WRIGHT: I ask you, sir, to ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Speaker, I did not refer to the hon. member for Melfort; I referred to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other long-haired theorists with the same view, and I am not prepared to withdraw my statement. I did not suggest for a moment that there were not in the C.C.F. party men who had taken part in war.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member did suggest that.

Mr. HARKNESS: I suggest that the people who do most of the talking about these things in their party are the people who know nothing about it, and I still stand by that. Certainly the people who have talked in this debate are the people who do it every time and have no experience to talk from.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) seemed to be concerned with the fact that this bill would cause us to be swallowed up by the United States and add a few stars to their flag. I do not believe—and I will say right now that I am a staunch upholder of the British connection and our Canadian nationality—that there is any danger of that whatever. I shall have no fears on that score at all. It is merely a bogey, a red herring, or whatever you wish to call it.

The C.C.F. amendment, so far as the wording goes, is innocuous. However, the accompanying speeches, those of the hon. member who proposed the amendment and those made by all the other members of that party, have made it abundantly clear that their purpose in moving this amendment was to send the bill to a committee, where it would die and that would be the end of it. In other words, it was their hope to kill the bill and get rid of it by having it referred to a committee.

That being so, I am going to vote against the amendment, and I sincerely hope it will be defeated. However I believe we should be given the answers to the questions which have been asked by many hon. members, particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) when we consider the bill in committee of the whole. I trust the ministers concerned will answer these questions and make the whole situation as clear as possible.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate at all, but now that I have decided to do so I shall begin my remarks by saying I agree with the statements which have been made by the members of my group. I was deeply impressed with the fairness of the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). I was impressed to some extent by some of the things said by the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). But I am not the least bit impressed by some of the things said by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier).

An hon. MEMBER: That is too bad.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, it is too bad. I am not even impressed by that. I presume the hon. gentleman who interjects can catch your eye later on, Mr. Speaker, and make whatever statement he wishes. If anyone thinks I have my head in the sand, of course that is his privilege.

Many things have been said which indicate a wide range of ideas in the house with regard to this bill. One or two things in it concern me particularly; and I hope that when I say what I have to say I shall not be accused of being a narrow nationalist. I do not want to be one of those people who can be described in that way. I may have some tendency in that direction, being a Canadian. I know there are members of this house who came here from some other country and made a useful and valuable contribution. I honour them. They have another place to look back upon as their home. This is the only home I have had, and it has been the home of my ancestors for 200 years. So, if I say some things that sound like narrow nationalism, I hope they will not be taken in that way, but that hon. members will understand them to mean simply that I like this country. I do not want any other country to look back upon. I want to stay here in my humble way to make this just as great a country as its possibilities will permit.

Mr. POULIOT: You are too broad-minded to be looked upon as narrow-minded.

Mr. BENTLEY: I thank the hon. gentleman for that statement. I might have included him among those with whom I could agree on some things; not in his sweeping indictment of the united nations, but in his references to family and community life, with which I agree most whole-heartedly. That is where our living begins; from there it expands, we hope, in friendship. We have tried to keep peace in our own family circles and communities, and I wish it could be done all over the world. I suggest for the consideration of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that if we could bring the ideals of our families into the whole world of nations we would accomplish a great deal. I know it is not easy, but it is worth trying. Anything that is good is worth trying. It is no use saying it is impossible until every avenue has been explored. It is far better to approach your neighbour or anyone with whom you are dealing by trying to discover the things on which you can agree, than by trying to find the things upon which you disagree. I believe that is a good policy, a good philosophy; and if I were not a poor human sinner I would always try to carry it out.

I am going to say, in all honesty, that I do not see the necessity for this legislation, unless there is behind it some reason which I do not appreciate. If that should be the case it is all the more reason why I should support the motion to have it sent to a committee, where we can get the answers to these questions. As I say, if there is no move behind it, the act itself is not necessary. As a little boy I played around Halifax harbour; that was a long time ago. At that time Halifax was the headquarters of the Atlantic squadron of the British fleet, and the limeys came there whenever the fleet or any of the warships were in the harbour.

Mr. POULIOT: What is a limey?

Mr. BENTLEY: That is just a nickname they give an English sailor. I should have called them English sailors, but the other word came so easily to me, and the Yankees always call them limeys. Occasionally a United States battleship would come to Halifax on a friendly mission. There was never a gun fired with any ball in it, though occasionally a few blanks may have been fired by way of celebration; and I remember that it was an occasion for great rejoicing among the young kids who were looking for adventure when someone would say, "There is an American warship in the harbour. There are some English warships there too. There will be a fight tonight down on the waterfront; let's go and see it." Of course immediately we ducked out the back doors away from our mothers and fathers and congregated down on Water street, outside the rum shops, until the battle started. And we would certainly enjoy it when the Yankees and the limeys got together. I expect there were broken noses and some bloodshed, but pretty soon the police came and broke it up and chased us away and the evening's adventure was over. That is about all there was to it. The law was enforced; and in spite of what happened on one occasion, Halifax is a law-abiding city. They have officers who enforce the laws. I should like someone to tell me what would prevent the same officers from exercising exactly the same discipline today as they exercised back in the early 1900's, when those warships came in. I give that as an illustration to support my argument that there is no reason for this legislation. We have the necessary law enforcement officers in this country, officers as good as can be found anywhere in the world.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. gentleman has asked a question. I can answer it at once if he will permit me. The answer is that service discipline would be exercised in respect of these British sailors the moment they got on their ships, which were there to take them off.

Mr. BENTLEY: And I presume the same thing would be done in connection with the Yankee sailors, as they were called. Why can that not be done today? Why do we need an act today, when we did not require an act then?

Mr. CLAXTON: Because there are a few Americans in Canada at places like Churchill, engaged in the joint testing arrangements with which hon. members are familiar, who are far away from United States soil.

Mr. BENTLEY: That does not seem to me like a very good reason; and here I am coming to where I may be accused of being a narrow nationalist. I want Canada to be an entity, a nation of our own. I do not want this to be taken as expressing any desire to break away from the British commonwealth of nations. That is not my desire at all. That is an association which has grown up, one which we have continued since we became independent. We are now mistress in our own home, not daughter in our mother's home. That relationship is there because we as a nation want it to be there, because we like it to be there. We have no such association with any other nation or group of nations in the world; and I see no need for troops of any other nation to be stationed here for military training, observation or anything else.

I think I have good reason for making that statement. If it were necessary to have troops here for those reasons, Denmark would have a claim, because that country has interests in Greenland, which I believe some people are saying are being threatened at the present time.

The United States has Alaska. Why can they not train there? That is northern territory. Why must it be necessary for us to have military collaboration with the United States in order to do this testing? Why can it not be done on their own soil, if it is necessary? Again I want it to be understood that I am not anti-American. I have too many friends in the United States and too many friends in this country with relatives and friends in the United States for me to bear any ill will to the United States of America. I have nothing but the utmost friendliness for that country; there is nobody prouder than I am that we have that forty-ninth parallel without a fortification on it, and I hope there is never any need for one to be there. I believe that with all my heart. But I should like to see more freedom than there is in crossing that boundary for peaceful pursuits and less necessity for military personnel or equipment to go back and forth. Back as far as 1911, if I remember aright, an election was held in this country with reciprocity as the election issue. I was too young to vote at that time, but I remember being as active as a young person was allowed to be in promoting that idea. I would give serious consideration right now to promoting again, or anyway to thinking of establishing complete trade reciprocity with the United States. At that time the opponents to it said, "No truck or trade with the Yankees". Today I would be prepared to say, in all peaceful pursuits, any amount of truck and trade with the Yankees on the friendliest and best basis. Why can we not buy their motor cars as cheaply as they can sell them? They pay just as big wages as we do to the people who build their motor cars. Why do we not have them here at the same price?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I would ask him to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. BENTLEY: Quite right, Mr. Speaker. I expect I was getting far afield in this debate. There has been a slight tendency in that direction, I think you will admit, and I merely followed the tendency. Thank you for the correction, and I shall try not to do it. I was simply doing that, sir, to illustrate the reason why I do not think this bill is necessary if it simply means what it says. I would rather have peaceful pursuits than the interchange of military pursuits.

I come now to the matter of joint defence. There may come a time when it will be necessary. I am not a prophet or a seer, nor is anybody else in this house. In my lifetime I have listened to many people say that at such-and-such a time or in a certain number of years, so-and-so is going to happen, "because I think it is going to happen." I cannot arrogate to myself the right to say what will happen in the future. All I can do is hope as an individual, and as a humble individual in a nation of individuals who, by the way, I hope are as strong morally as the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) said we were, but who, even he will have to admit, were not too strong numerically. But in spite of that, I believe we are strong enough to stand on our own feet and to make whatever we believe are necessary preparations for any future eventualities we can see either for peace or for war. When the issue is confronting us, when the decision has to be made, let us then decide, on the basis of the issue itself and our conscience at that time, which, if any, side we are going to take.

The suggestion has been made by some who profess to look into the future, that the United States and Russia will likely be the antagonists in the next war and that Canada will be the battleground. I will admit that is a possibility. Anything is a possibility in this world that we live in, and always has been. But it is not inevitable that that will happen. It is not inevitable, on the checkerboard of politics in the international field, that finally these two tremendously strong nations will not find a way of resolving their differences. It is not even inevitable, if they do fight, that we have to be the battleground, although I will admit that is a strong possibility. But if we have to be the battleground, I should prefer Canada to be the battleground on one of two conditions. The first would be that we decide we would take no active part; we would declare ourselves neutral—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENTLEY: Hold on a minute; don't laugh—and leave the responsibility for occupying our country on the nation which undertakes to do so in the face of our declaration of neutrality. That would be one choice which we would have. That may not be a pleasant choice. I will agree that would not be a pleasant choice. It will not be pleasant if we have a war. There will be nothing pleasant about it, no matter what our choice is. But I say that is a stronger moral choice than any other we could make.

On the other hand, we could make a second choice and decide which side we would be on. If we took the first choice, we would try to defend ourselves with whatever strength we had at our disposal; and with whatever courage we have, we would defend ourselves against the first nation which undertook to make our Canada their battleground. If we were not strong enough to resist them, at least we would know that we had the courage to do all that our strength would permit us to do. If we took the second choice and decided we would take sides, then we would merge our military equipment and personnel on the side which we decided was the right one for us to engage on in the event of that war happening.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is that consistent with the policy of the C.C.F. in this house when they tried to cut my estimates for defence down to $1,000,000 before 1939?

Mr. BENTLEY: I have made these statements in C.C.F. groups and have never had them disputed when I have taken this attitude there. So I must assume that I am not very far off the general thinking of the individuals who comprise this group.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it consistent with the united nations?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read the records of Hansard and they will tell you.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, this cross-fire with regard to looking into the records, back history and so on is all very well, but I expect that if we read all through the records of Hansard we should find a great many inconsistencies. Right from the beginning of my remarks, I have tried to refrain from party political recriminations against any individual or group in the house. I did that for the simple reason that I started out by saying that I am a humble and patriotic citizen of Canada. While I am prepared to fight any political group in this house on the political hustings on matters that concern us in a political way, this particular issue seems to me to be large enough to be able to command the support, if I am correct, of anybody with any political views who feels the same way as I do about Canada.

There is another thing that I wish to point out, dealing with this matter of war between the two nations which have been mentioned. I have heard fairly strong groups in Canada at times claim that Canada has gone to war at the behest of the United Kingdom government, that we were not independent, that when Britain declared war we were automatically at war. I have heard that claim criticized severely and vocally and, I think, sincerely by the people who indulged in the criticism. Since the Statute of Westminster, we have always claimed that we had complete freedom in that regard, and that we do not have to do that. I would hate to see something happen which would put us in the position of having to go to war at the behest of another nation, no matter which one it was, if we claim we do not necessarily have to follow the lead of Britain. But even if we did, let me draw this to the attention of the house, that the British people have a twenty-year peace pact with the Soviet Union. If we are a full-fledged and cooperative partner in the British commonwealth of nations, while we do not have to join any peace pact Britain happens to join, I think we should respect it. And if we are going to respect it, we should do nothing which might in any way arouse suspicion against us on the part of a nation with whom Great Britain at the present time has that twenty-year peace pact.

Let us see how this works out. I want to refer to the united nations, because I believe this whole thing is a part of that great organization which we are trying to build. The hon. member for Temiscouata has said it has no value, and I have heard other members say the same thing. I cannot prove that it has. But I suppose we are to have a united nations organization of some kind or another. We may be united as were Joe Louis and Billy Conn when they came together in conflict; when they were united only for a time. Or we may have peaceful relations. But it is likely that we shall have a united nations organization of one kind or another; and I prefer the peaceful kind.

At the present time the united nations may fall short of the glory of God. But the fact remains that if we are to hope for the kind of cooperation and international understanding which I believe everyone here would like to have, regardless of their words, their thoughts or their expectations—and I believe all of us hope sincerely that we may have that—then we must realize that we need some kind of organization. The united nations is one way of trying to set up machinery which will make it possible to bring about that purpose.

Hon. members have heard me speak about cooperative enterprise before in the house; I believe in it. I believe in it, whether it is cooperation commercially, municipally or in local school districts. No matter where it is, it is cooperation. Like the hon. member for Temiscouata, I believe in our family homes, and that in those homes we want peace and harmony, comfort, well being, good will and affection. We want to have those families run as we in those families believe they should be run. We want no other families coming in to tell us how to handle our family affairs, and we have no right to go into other families and tell them how to handle theirs.

But when the two families meet on common ground, where there must be a sidewalk or a road, then they must get together and agree, if they are both going to use community enterprise. They must agree, if they are to take the same responsibilities as to where and how these things shall be built, and what they will be used for. That applies to school districts, to municipalities, to provinces, to the dominion, and it applies to relations between nations which go to make up a commonwealth such as the British commonwealth of nations. And this goes through to the rest of the world, if we are to have peace and harmony in the united nations.

Because of that, I must pin some faith in the united nations, because if we do not have that, then we have the other kind of unity, the kind where tremendous bodies are locked in warfare. And let me point this out, that if we choose that road—and I do not think we shall do so deliberately—but if we choose it ill-advisedly, then we shall subject our children and our grandchildren to unbelievable horrors.

I have helped bury the dead, I would remind the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). I have seen men die around me. I have been through some of those conflicts, as have other hon. members in the house. Indeed, I believe all groups are well represented in that respect. I do not want to see that happen again. But if the new weapons we are told about are even a quarter as powerful as it is said they are, then what we have seen before will be only a tea-party compared with what the magnitude of another war might be. Because of that, I believe we should be most careful in doing anything at all in the parliament of this country which might possibly fan the fires and flames of suspicion which are already too greatly extended across the world at the present time.

I have said these things earnestly and honestly, sincerely believing that I am right in what I have said. And I do wish hon. members would send this bill to a committee until we can get every bit of information with respect to it. If it can be proven to me that this is a better and a necessary thing to do, more necessary than anything we have done before, then I shall withdraw my opposition to it, and gladly. But I should like to know the complete story.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak in this debate; but, since it began, several thoughts have passed through my mind.

I am not going to oppose sending the bill to the appropriate committee, because if it goes there witnesses can be called and the whole matter investigated from every angle.

Hon. members will not be deterred from further discussion when the bill returns from committee. But in connection with the bill, and with respect to what has been said in the last two days, let me say we must face the fact that we live in a most unsettled world. When I say that I am not for one moment saying that any nation in the world wants war. I do not believe any nation today wants war for the simple purpose of having war; and I am not accusing any nation of any such intention.

But it must be recognized and we must face the reality that we do live in an unsettled world and, to my mind, it is the height of common sense for governments to care for the defence of their country. All countries do it, and it is the height of common sense for this government to care for the defence of Canada. When one speaks about defence he should not be branded as a warmonger. It is only common sense to lock one's door at night. It is the height of foolishness for one to say, "I am going to lock my door tonight, but I hope it will not aggravate my enemy. I realize there may be some enemies lurking around. There may be some who have an eye on my possessions. There may be others who for some reason or another do not like me. Perhaps I should leave my door open tonight, in case, by locking it, I aggravate my friends." People do not talk in that way and, as far as I am concerned, when it comes to national defence we have to look at the matter just as realistically as that.

I would suggest that the present government have a little larger picture and conception of things as they exist in the world than we, though we be members of parliament, could ever hope to have. I am not saying that we should not feel perfectly free to express ourselves on any matters relating to defence, but I think we have to recognize that when it comes to matters of defence, obviously everything is not exposed to the whole world. There are things that go on behind the scenes. There are negotiations and exchanges of information between one country and another. No doubt the present government which sits opposite have exchanged views with other countries, and I fancy the reason they are proposing this measure is based largely upon information they have received or conclusions they may have arrived at because of the exchange of views.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to the twenty-year pact between Great Britain and Russia. I think that is a commendable thing. I should hope that we would have no trouble, not only for the next twenty years or fifty years, but perhaps for the next 100 years, or indefinitely. Even though there is a pact between those two great nations, let us remember that the British government have put in a more rigid form of conscription. In so doing, surely they considered whether such a step would render negotiations of the united nations less effective. Yet that government being a government very similar to hon. members to my right in its objectives, saw fit to take rather more adequate measures with respect to their defences. I say this with the utmost care. Surely a government should not be criticized when they show a desire to protect our interests, especially when they are right on the field, perhaps having their hands more upon the pulse of world situation than ours are.

I do not wish to be presumptuous, nor do I wish to sound a note of suspicion; but, as I said at the commencement of my remarks, all is not well. History records that sometimes agreements become scraps of paper. I hope that will not happen, but sometimes it does. In the light of that, it seems to me that the nations of the world should arrive at a particular definition as to what an aggressor nation really is. How are we to describe an aggressor nation? How are we to know when some nation makes a move that can be termed "aggressive"? It seems to me that that is a question which should be settled in some way or another. I should like to put on the record a definition of "aggressor" which was proposed some years ago by Mr. Litvinov, at that time soviet commissar for foreign affairs, and adopted by representatives of the Soviet Union, Roumania, Estonia, Latvia, Poland, Turkey, Iran and Afghanistan, meeting in London at the convention for the definition of "aggression" on July 3, 1933. The definition runs as follows:

> . . . The aggressor in an international conflict shall . . . be considered to be that state which is the first to commit any of the following actions:
> 1. Declaration of war upon another state;
> 2. Invasion by its armed forces, with or without a declaration of war, of the territory of another state;
> 3. Attack by its land, naval or air forces, with or without a declaration of war, on the territory, vessels or aircraft of another state;
> 4. Naval blockade of the coasts or ports of another state;
> 5. Provision of support to armed bands formed in its territory which have invaded the territory of another state or refusal, notwithstanding the request of the invaded states, to take in its own territory all the measures in its power to deprive those bands of all assistance or protection.

No political, military, economic or other consideration may serve as an excuse or justification for the aggression referred to . . .

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the bill before the house is to make provision with respect to the forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada. I realize that a wide latitude has been allowed hon. members during the debate, but I would ask the hon. member to limit his remarks more directly to the bill under consideration.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall not digress; as a matter of fact, I am through with my speech anyway. I would suggest that something along the line of what I have read be redefined in order that we may know definitely what constitutes aggression. I am not opposed to the bill and I shall not be opposed to it going to committee. I do not think we can expect the government to reveal its hand in this case when the bill is in committee. I must say that, because I recognize that, no matter which party forms the government of the day and has the responsibility for the defence of the country, it cannot always reveal its hand.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise after listening to this debate to express my support of the motion to refer the bill to a committee. I shall make a few comments and express a few ideas in connection with this bill which has provoked a most fortunate and interesting discussion. I say most fortunate because, while the bill at first sight appears somewhat unimportant and technical, its implications are very wide under world conditions today.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the excellent opening speech by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) and to the factual presentation of his argument by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and I appreciated very much the, shall I say, moderate and wise remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) as well as a great deal of what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) had to say. So far as this debate is concerned, there can be no question that this side of the house has made the most constructive contribution to the discussion.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in replying last night, said that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave his statement to the house no opposition was expressed in the house and none in the country. I think that is quite correct, but when the Prime Minister reads a statement to the house we have no opportunity to reply and express our opinions. So far as the country is concerned, the minister's statement is quite correct. But I think the minister will realize that the great majority of the members of this house, on reading the Prime Minister's statement, were under the impression that only a few technical personnel were being considered. Yet in this discussion the hon. member for Vancouver South has suggested that possibly a division of United States troops might be brought into this country, and we heard no denial or protest from the Minister of National Defence or from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent).

Since the Prime Minister made his statement, there has been a change of foreign policy in the United States. The Truman foreign policy is now in effect. That is why I maintain that, while the mechanical features of this bill may seem unimportant and routine, the attitude of many people to the Prime Minister's statement regarding collaboration with the United States in defence has changed to some extent.

I wish to support strongly the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I shall not repeat them, but I think he presented a logical and valid argument in connection with this bill and for its reference to the committee. I want to support whole-heartedly his urging upon the government to do everything possible at this time to show our strong support for collective security and the principles of the united nations.

Personally I deplore the tendency on the part of some hon. members who have spoken in this debate of two great power groups in the world, the U.S.S.R. and the United States, to underestimate as it were the strength of the British commonwealth of nations. In the first place, I urge upon this government to do everything possible to avoid any public appearance of departure from support of the united nations. In addition, because of our membership in the British commonwealth of nations and because of our geographical position, I urge that we stand shoulder to shoulder in these matters with the other members of the commonwealth, because while Great Britain is in financial difficulties at the present time and the influence of the British commonwealth of nations may appear to be somewhat lessened, I have so much confidence in the balance and stability and traditions and in the future of the British commonwealth of nations that if peace is to be maintained in this world in the future I believe that it will be done as a result of the balanced stability, influence and moral character of the people of the British commonwealth of nations. I urge,

Mr. Speaker, that Canada take a strong hand in that connection and not allow herself, even by implication, to be included in one power bloc or the other. In these difficult times there are so many people who see everything in black or in white, who are prejudiced, whose opinions are fixed. May I say that it is not a question of peace or victory; it is a question of peace or disaster. The last war has shown that there can be no victor, except in a military sense, in modern war in this modern world. It is not peace or victory; it is peace or disaster. I urge that we do everything possible to back the united nations as a great balancing and useful force at this critical time.

I consider that the government has not been quite frank with the house. The replies of the minister to date have given us information that we did not have before. For instance, while many of us thought, and reasonably so, that the visiting United States forces would comprise a small number of technical men, we are now told that it is possible, without any consultation of parliament, for the commander in chief of the Canadian army to invite any number of troops into this country. I am sure that all hon. members are keen on the proper defence of this country. But we have to look at this question from every aspect, and because I believe that the members of this house and the people of this country should have an opportunity to obtain full information on the implications of this bill and its relationship to the international situation today I intend to support the motion to refer the bill to a committee.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as I read this bill I do not consider it one on which this house should divide on party lines. First, who sponsors the bill? The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). In that he doubtless cooperates and collaborates with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton); and, knowing both of these men, is there anyone in this house who for a moment would say that they would support legislation in this House of Commons detracting from the best interests of the Dominion of Canada or do anything that would lessen our pride in Canada of which we are all so proud? I, for one, cannot bring myself to think that of them.

During this debate I have heard so many straw men built up and then knocked down by brave volleys of words, straw men with nothing of reality to them but wonderful to talk about and wonderful to attack gravely.

We have to face the fact that this Dominion of Canada is greater in area than the United States of America, and also that we have a population of probably less than 12,000,000 people, whereas the United States has a population of some 130,000,000, and in our population of 12,000,000 there is a majority of women and children. So who are we to defend such a vast area successfully under modern methods of warfare? In our time the method of warfare has completely changed. As I grew up from childhood to young manhood, to manhood, I, like everyone else in this house, complacently felt that we were defended by the British navy and the British army; that we Canadians did not need to raise a hand to defend ourselves. It is true that that we sent a contingent to the South African war, but what did that mean in the long run in that war? The Canadians deported themselves well. They have done it in two great world wars, but alone we could not have had very much effect on the result of either of those wars. I think we are fortunate to be on the friendly terms that we are with the powerfully great nation bordering on our southern border. It is reasonable, it is sensible that Canada and the United States should cooperate in matters of defence and, if necessary, in matters of offence. We should exchange ideas as to defence, ideas as to attack and ideas as to armament.

What happened in the last war? Two big nations, dictator nations, Germany and Italy, undertook to conquer the democratic world. The British empire and commonwealth of nations took on the defence of the small nations that had been attacked by the dictatorship of Germany. The British commonwealth of nations consisting of Great Britain, the dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and Newfoundland, with France and the great United States of America saved democracy from dictatorship. But during that war the attacking dictators attacked another dictatorship, Russia. Who saved that dictatorship? The same democratic nations. If they had not stepped in and gone to Russia's defence Germany would have defeated Russia just as surely as we are here tonight. And the democracies of the world got little credit for it. It is no surprise that the democratic nations sitting at the peace table with a nation of dictators are having trouble arriving at a just peace. But I hope that they will overcome these difficulties successfully as they have in the past.

When that dictator nation was attacked by the attacking dictator nations that were fighting against us as democracies, what happened here in Canada? An element that up to that time was doing all it could to impede and injure Canada in the war, suddeeply, overnight, became ultra loyal and wanted to see the democracies win. Why? Not because of their admiration or love or loyalty to Canada, but because of their comrades over in Russia. The communists, the so-called Labour Progressive party, were more concerned about the fate of Russia than of Canada.

I am particularly impressed and pleased with the provisions of section 4 of the bill. Although we are not in committee of the whole considering the bill section by section, we are considering the principle, and in my opinion this is one of the chief principles in it.

Nothing in section 3 of this act shall affect the jurisdiction of any civil court in Canada to try a member of a United States force for any act or omission constituting an offence against any law in force in Canada whether or not proceedings with respect to such act or omission have been instituted by a United States service authority or before a United States service court.

That is as it should be. In the war that so recently came to an end, we had a large force of the United States army come into Canada to carry out war measures, to build the Alaska highway, to tap our oil wells on the Mackenzie river and pipe them across to a refinery which they built in Yukon territory. The government of Canada, by an agreement with the government of the United States, sold the rights of Canadian civilians down the river. Canadian civilians injured, damaged or attacked by United States soldiers could not take them to a Canadian court. If they suffered an injury they had to take the award of a workmen's compensation board sitting where—in Canada? No, down in the state of New Jersey. They had to take it and like it. And if a United States soldier by his carelessness—and there were many instances of it—severely injured a Canadian civilian, committed property damage or personal damage, the Canadian citizen could not take it to court. He had to put up with what the United States army chose to give him. In one case a Canadian civilian driving his own truck lawfully, conforming with the rules of the road, was crashed into by a United States truck driven by a United States soldier. The Canadian truck was damaged so that it became utterly useless. The Canadian driver was injured. Both of his feet were driven down through the floor of his truck; his leg was broken in two places above the knee; his pelvis was broken; his spine was injured and he will be a cripple for life. They had to cut the steering wheel with a hacksaw to get him out of the truck. The United States army offered to pay for the truck, the hospital and doctor bills. They have now consented to give him perhaps the munificent sum of $8,000. They will give it if the United States congress is good enough to vote the money, and not otherwise. If these conditions are prevented by this section of the bill I would support it, if for no other reason.

I could go on and tell of other instances that happened during, as they called it, the American occupation. When called upon the telephone, they would say "The American army of occupation speaking." That happened here in Canada. For my part, I say that this is a proper, useful and necessary legislation for this Canadian parliament to pass and I propose to support it.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Personally I have no great objection to sending Bill No. 253 to the external affairs committee, but I think a good purpose has been served by allowing a number of hon. members to speak on this measure. I believe that the speeches which have been delivered so far are a fair indication of the views of hon. members on this important subject.

Many critics of the bill seem to be possessed with the idea that Canada is going to declare war on some nation in the near future, when in reality such is not the fact. Some hon. members criticized the bill, and they have said repeatedly that they did so because they want peace in this world. Well, who does not? By passing this bill, would we run the risk of getting into a war sooner than we would if the bill did not pass this house? I am not at all surprised that some hon. members should hold definite views in opposition to this bill, but I must admit that I was surprised to hear strange ideas expressed by several hon. members who are usually reliable in their thinking. One hon. gentleman stated that we should refuse to tolerate the idea that war is coming. I am sure all hon. members agree that no one in Canada wants war, and that perhaps no one in any other nation wants war. But surely that hon. gentleman must agree that, even if there is no likelihood of war, it is better for our people to be on guard than to tell them there will be no war and have them unprepared, as they were in 1939. Really I cannot understand how a responsible individual could believe that it is in Canada's interests to tell our people there will be no war—even though he does not know any more about it than I do—rather than to warn them of the possibility. I subscribe to the view that we should be on guard at all times; I think that is a good policy.

While I am on this point, I should like to mention one other matter. During the Easter recess, while I was on my way out west, I was a guest of a friend of mine who also invited a number of Canadians holding prominent positions. These men of learning began to discuss the question of defence, and one expressed the fear that Canada might provoke war. So he appealed to me and others to do everything within our power to see that the secrets of atomic energy were handed over to our "friends". He stated that he had formed his opinion on that subject following a certain lecture by a prominent physicist at one of our universities, who told him that now this question was so serious that the Canadian people must do something about it. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members should take advice in military matters from military men. It is not enough for one to rise in his place and pretend to know everything about everything. This is not a small political issue. This is not a by-election. This is a serious matter, concerning the future of this nation. Surely we should have enough faith in our military men to take their advice in matters of this kind and not assume that we have a knowledge and depth of understanding concerning these problems greater than anyone else.

Would anyone suggest that in the event of a war it would not be in Canada's interests to stand together with our neighbour? Would anyone suggest that it would be a good policy for Canada to stand idly by and await developments? I should like to ask hon. gentlemen who have been criticizing this measure and have expressed opposition to it to telll this house and the country whether they feel that Canada would be justified in taking the course they are advocating, if we were attacked in a surprise-war, and had not made preparations together with the United States in regard to defence. Surely they could not say that. Yet now they are trying to convince this house that it is not in Canada's interest to cooperate with the United States.

I am not of Anglo-Saxon origin, but I do not believe any hon. member in this house is more pro-British than I am. In diplomatic affairs I believe the United Kingdom still leads the world; I am frank in making that statement. In economic and monetary matters it is true the United States has taken over the lead; but the United States has still a great deal to learn when it comes to matters having to do with various European countries, and world diplomacy. The British have had a great deal of experience in these matters, and of course experience counts. At the same time I maintain that it is in our interests to cooperate with the United States in order that we may arrange our hemispheric defence programmes. We did that during the war, and why should we not have this understanding with our good neighbour to the south during peace time?

Some may say this is peace time, and as a matter of fact some hon. members have stated that they would not object to our entering into this understanding with the United States if this were a time of war, but they are opposed to it now because this is peace time. What a shallow argument! I maintain that the war which began in 1914 was not concluded, and that it continued. We say a war breaks out, but that is not so; it is peace that breaks out now and then. From 1914 to 1918 we had a period of military warfare. Then there was a breathing spell. The struggle continued again from 1939 to 1945, and today it is still continuing short of military warfare. The fight is going on every day in the councils of the united nations, in the press, over the radio, and so on. Let me just quote from a press dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, June 5, 1947:

> Budapest, June 4—(AP)—Soviet Lt.-Gen. V. P. Sviridov has refused permission for an American officer to inspect military installations of Hungary, a former enemy country, American spokesmen disclosed today. The soviet action raised speculation that the Russians may already be taking a hand in training the Hungarian army.

Then farther down in the article:

> American spokesmen said Colonel John H. Stokes, Jr., of San Francisco, executive officer of the United States military mission asked War Minister Lajos Dinnyes, now the new pro-communist premier, for permission to inspect a Hungarian division. Ordinarily such a request would be a mere formality in view of relations between a victor power and a defeated former enemy.
> To Stokes' surprise, however, Dinnyes replied that such a visit would have to be approved by the allied control commission.
> Sviridov, acting chairman of the allied control commission, without consulting the American member of the commission, replied that the proposed inspection would be impossible.

Does that not mean war, Mr. Speaker? It is war in fact, but just short of actual military operations. There is this fighting going on, on all fronts. Let us not delude ourselves that this is peace time. Until such time as the principles of freedom and Christianity are supreme in this world, there can be no peace. When we have one set of rules applying to the so-called big nations and another set of rules applying to the so-called little nations, what sort of peace have you? Talk of peace! In reality there is no such thing now. What about the small nations of the world?

Recently in the mailbox I received several maps. Other hon. members must have received them also. May I read from the map? I am sorry that the shorthand reporter will not be able to take it down because this is in Russian (a map of Finland). I could review the whole map for you. I understand that it is our own Department of External Affairs which is distributing these maps in Russian to members of parliament. What is wrong with the English language? I am going to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) to tell me whether he has as yet received a future map of Canada in the Russian language. Here is another one, and this one is (in Russian, "a map of Roumania").

Mr. FULTON: What does that mean?

Mr. HLYNKA: Map of Roumania. That is another one.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): In Russian, too?

Mr. HLYNKA: It is in Russian, too. I understand that these are also distributed by our own Department of External Affairs. What is wrong with us? This thing has gone too far. Our own members of parliament spent two days in pleading the cause of a nation about which they know absolutely nothing, including my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

An hon. MEMBER: He was there.

Mr. HANSELL: He was there for eight days.

Mr. HLYNKA: He speaks in this house with such great authority about Russia that he asks that we should take his word for it and not prepare for defence.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege. I was not pleading the cause of Russia. I was pleading the cause of world peace.

Mr. HLYNKA: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get at odds with my hon. friend because, once they start me going, there will again be a row. I do not want to lose every one of them as my friends, because some of them are my good friends. I like them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Da da.

Mr. HLYNKA: There you are, Mr. Speaker. He speaks Russian to me now. You may not have understood it, Mr. Speaker, but he just approved what I said.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was, oui, oui.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should now like to proceed from there. As I said, I do not want to get into a fight, because then we would spend too much time. Hon. members who criticize the bill maintain that the bill violates the spirit of the united nations, and helps to divide the world into two antagonistic blocs. They also state than any arrangement into which we may enter with the United States carries with it serious implications. What sort of nonsense is that? Why should any arrangement with the United States carry any serious implications as far as we are concerned? We are living in this hemisphere; we speak the same language, and our interests are similar. The United States has always shown a friendly attitude toward this nation. Surely if they wanted to, all they have to do is to come across and take this country, but they do not do it; they are not doing it. If anyone attacks this country, my hon. friends who protest so strongly against this bill would certainly get on the telephone as quickly as they could and ask President Truman and General Marshall to come right over. They certainly would do that, and they would be the first ones to do it. Yet what reason is there for this argumentation for two days, advising the government and pleading with ministers not to protect the borders of Canada? That sort of reasoning does not appeal to me.

I should like to say just a word about the principle of sovereignty. My hon. friends immediately to the right of me have for years been advocating the giving up of Canada's sovereignty. They have been the strongest advocates of surrendering Canada's sovereignty to some super power that they do not know and we do not know, a power that, to my knowledge has not done anything for Canada and has not shown any good result so far. Yet they keep on pleading with the people, and delivering speeches all across this country, telling the Canadian people that we must give up a part of our sovereignty. Now, when we are on this issue, they switch right around and are the great champions of retaining Canada's sovereignty. Mr. Speaker, our friends should be more consistent. There must be some balance to their thinking, or to their switching. They just cannot go on in that way.

I should like to refer to the various international organizations. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the various international organizations which have been organized thus far have been, and are today, the instrument of internationalism and the vehicles of communism, however disguised. I have seen the workings of some of our international organizations; I have followed the workings of some of our international organizations before. And it is my sincere view that a nation as powerful as the United Kingdom, as experienced as it is in statecraft, and the United States also are being pushed around in the united nations organization.

I have no objections to an international organization that would work in the interests of liberty and freedom, principles that are fair to all nations, big and small; but not when you have a few large nations running the entire world and forming their blocs. And they do it right along. Then, as my hon. friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said, they waste time in pretending that we are getting somewhere. We are not. We must rely on our own strength; we must rely on the strength of those who have proven in the past to be our friends. That is the only safe thing for us to do.

During the past few years too many of our leading men became obsessed with the so-called global philosophy. We have been hearing public men speaking about things on a global scale. One country seems to be too small for these gentlemen. This talk is something like certain types of medicine. It might be good for one, if it is administered in certain amounts. But if one takes an overdose of it, the result is suicide. The same is true of this global philosophy—and I was going to use the word "globaloney," including global loyalty, world-wide this and world-wide that. In my opinion this prescription has been administered to excess.

Let me explain in a word what I mean. In recent years many public men have been advancing and emphasizing unduly the theory of the global approach to political, economic and social problems as the only solution for them.

Now, words fail me: it is pure—well, nonsense! Surely not a single member in the house can point to very many results of which we can be proud, in the past, which have been achieved by some international organization. But we can point to results which the United States achieved in guarding freedom of its citizens, and which we have in Canada in being able to voice our opinion as freely as a lark. The British commonwealth has a tradition and a reservoir of experience incomparably beyond that of any other nation in the world. There is the example; let us follow it.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken in the house before on any subject related to international affairs and, normally, I should prefer not to speak on that subject, but rather to leave it to those who have had some experience in it, and whose experience would therefore lend their words added weight. But some of the implications behind this bill, together with some of the things said in discussion, have made me think there is a certain point of view which at least should be expressed, certain questions which at least should be asked and to which I should hope answers might be given before, speaking personally, I would be in a position to vote intelligently on this bill.

At the outset I would say I am in entire agreement with those who speak in support of the necessity for cooperation in the defence of this country with those countries which are friendly and willing to help us. But I also associate myself with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), namely that we should know the policy behind the bill before we rush into the acceptance of this legislation which, it seems me, indicates that a new policy is now in force in Canada; because it is surely obvious that this bill can have no meaning; and can have no application, unless United States troops are to be allowed into Canada. And the bill applies exclusively to United States troops. So I refer to them, not with any suggestion that it is undesirable that United States troops be admitted, but merely because they are the only ones affected by the bill.

It is a new policy, in that Canada is now inviting United States troops into this country on a basis and under conditions which Canada has never extended to any other troops before in peace time. We should ask at the outset how many troops are here and how they came here. We should ask what exactly were the terms upon which they were admitted, for how long we expect them to stay, and if we expect any large increase in their number.

In the course of my remarks, which I intend shall be brief, I shall state why I think it is important that these questions be answered. But before going farther, may I say that the fact we are left without an answer to these questions at the present time, and indeed much of the discussion which has taken place in connection with the bill—discussion which, to some extent, is being carried on in the dark so far as members of the opposition are concerned—illustrates again the desirability of setting up a defence committee such as has been suggested in the house in the past. If we had such a committee we would have full information and would know the reasons behind such legislation before being asked to discuss it.

One of the most significant statements made thus far in the discussion of the bill was that made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). This was the statement of the minister, as reported at page 3792 of Hansard for June 4, 1947:

I think His Excellency—

He was referring to the governor general.

—as commander in chief of the Canadian forces, can do such things as are not contrary to Canadian law and which he thinks are advisable for the preparation of the defences of the country.

Later he said, as reported on the same page:

I think the commander in chief of the Canadian forces can take such measures as his ministers are prepared to assume responsibility for to the parliament, and to the country, so long as they do not infringe any enactment made by parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt? I do not think it is fair, or really that it is proper, that in this house there should be drawn from an answer to a theoretical legal question the inference that that implies any intention whatsoever to depart from a policy which, in fact, was stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on February 12. I am sure the hon. member would not want to create the impression that there was anything being kept in the dark. I was asked a theoretical legal question and I endeavoured to answer it as such. I assure the hon. member that it contained no implication of any intention or thought of there being anything more contemplated now than was expressed in the Prime Minister's declaration on February 12.

Mr. FULTON: I am sorry the minister did not allow me to proceed with my next two sentences, because then I think he would have understood that what I had in mind was not to suggest that his statement, which as he said was made in answer to a legal question, suggested going beyond the policy already announced. But, in the light of the previously announced policy as to the basis upon which other troops would be invited to the country, the statement suggests, to me at any rate, the possibility that troops in larger numbers and for purposes somewhat different from what parliament itself understands might be invited into the country without the knowledge of the House of Commons. That is the danger which I see in the principle stated by the minister. I see that apparently he still does not think what I am saying is fair, although I want to be fair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not suggesting that the hon. member should not say anything he likes, provided that the danger he conjures up is one of his own making and is not derived from a statement attributed to me.

Mr. FULTON: The minister made the statement, I did not. However, that is only the first point. The statement is there and the practice of inviting troops in is being followed. It is obvious that hon. members do not know at the present time in what numbers United States troops are in the country or in what numbers they may be invited here in the future. That fact becomes more serious when it is realized that the present practice is a considerable departure from the policy announced previously in the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am going to refer to the statement he made in 1938, not merely for political purposes, but because I think his statement laid down very clearly the policy which the Prime Minister felt should govern as far as Canada's relations with the troops of other countries were concerned. I read this for the purpose of showing that what is happening now is a departure from that policy. The words of the Prime Minister may be found on page 4527 of Hansard of July 1, 1938, and they are:

Such domestic ownership, maintenance and control of all military stations and personnel—

"Personnel" is the important word here.

—is one of the really indispensable hallmarks of national sovereign self-government.

He then went on to say:

Outside its homeland a state may have military stations and quarter military personnel in countries which it "owns"—

Canada is not owned by the United States.

—in its colonies—

Canada is not a colony of the United States.

—or "possessions," or in its mandated territories according to the trust deed, or in countries over which it has assumed or been yielded, by some arrangement, what amounts to a protectorate.

Canada does not fall into any one of those classifications in so far as the United States is concerned. I want here to refer to what was said last night by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) when the matter was being discussed. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), in referring to the new practice, said that we could not see this new practice being introduced without some misgivings and without a desire that the House of Commons should be fully informed. The Minister of National Defence said, as reported on page 3812 of Hansard:

There is nothing new about it whatever.

I have read the words of the Prime Minister to show that there is something new about it. There do not exist, so far as Canada is concerned, any of those relationships which he said must exist before a country could quarter its military personnel upon another country's soil. It is important that we should realize fully the implications of the policy behind this bill. It is a new departure, something which Canada has never done before, and I think it justifies fully the extent of the discussion which has taken place in connection with the measure. That is why I say it is important that we should have answers to the questions which I have suggested before we are called upon to make our final decision on this particular bill.

There is one other suggestion I want to put forward, and in putting it forward I preface my remarks again by saying that I would rather leave authoritative announcements on international affairs to those with more experience. But I think this is a point of view which should be expressed in the hope that perhaps it will be discussed by someone with that experience. I wonder if the background of this bill does not indicate that there is some danger that Canada is entering into too close a tie-up with the United States. I am not suggesting in any way that we should not cooperate with them in defence, but I am suggesting that we should be careful not to rush into their arms and to throw in our lot with them to the exclusion of all our other interests and disregarding those quarters where our ties have previously lain.

I should like to read some quotations with regard to the recent announcement by the President of the United States in connection with hemispheric defence policies. First, I should like to read a report in the Chicago Daily News of Monday, May 26, as follows:

> President Truman today asked congress for authority to arm, equip and train the armed forces of western hemisphere nations, including Canada.

And again:

> The legislation asked would authorize the President to make agreements with other western hemisphere nations to train and instruct their military and naval personnel.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it was stated here in the house that that report is entirely erroneous. There is nothing in that act which concerns Canada. The only statement made was that it was in a form which could be extended to Canada.

Mr. FULTON: Canada is one of the countries in the western hemisphere, and, as the minister suggests, that is the only way in which Canada entered into the sphere of that act. The act was not aimed directly at or passed with the immediate intention of bringing armed forces into Canada. I read the report merely as illustrative of the present United States policy. The report continues: that the President may make arrangements with other countries to:

> . . . maintain, repair and rehabilitate their naval and military equipment. Transfer to them arms, ammunition and implements of war.

The third is a dispatch from Washington dated March 6, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 7, 1947, and which reads:

> The United States is considering a proposal to increase the number of American troops working with the Canadian forces in military studies at Churchill, Manitoba.
> Such action would be a further step to implement the Canada-United States agreement for collaboration in common defence.

I am not suggesting that there is anything improper in what is revealed in those announcements. I am not suggesting that it is improper or undesirable for Canada and the United States to cooperate, but I do suggest that we should consider carefully the implications of the steps which apparently we are being asked to take. We should have definite information how far along the road and in what direction these steps will lead us.

I wish to refer to something the hon. member for Vancouver South said last night. Everybody in the house is agreed that it is essential that we should adopt any and every method which may lessen the possibility of another war. It seems to me that one of the factors making most directly for another war would be to have the world divided into two power blocs, because they cannot avoid coming into direct conflict at almost every stage. But if there were three or more groups of powers the danger of direct conflict would be that much further removed, because there would be three or more different pulls of interest. It is with that thought in the back of my mind that I say we should be careful to understand what we are doing, and we should be careful not to transfer entirely to the United States all the community of interest and collaboration which, under the traditional background of our policy and interests, have lain elsewhere.

There is one concrete suggestion I should like to put forward, and that is that it would be preferable if, instead of having a separate bill dealing with the United States, we passed an act in the form of their own Friendly Foreign Forces Act to which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) referred last night, a general bill capable of extension to the troops of any country which Canada sees fit to admit to our own soil. I think that would be a more appropriate way of dealing with this matter. The other way would be to conclude a treaty with the United States, so that we would not have on our statute books a permanent policy which could be changed only with great difficulty and with the possibility of creating further international friction.

I think that is all I have to say at the moment. In conclusion, I want to repeat that the views I have put forward are not intended in any way to be dogmatic, although I do feel keenly about them myself. They are put forward because I think they should be considered before we are asked to pass this bill. I, at any rate, request an answer to the questions asked before we are required to vote.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, as I studied the bill before the house I was reminded of an article written in the January, 1946, issue of Foreign Affairs, under the signature of Lionel Gelber, entitled "Canada's New Stature". Mr. Gelber states:

> In that momentous redistribution of world power now taking place, Canada must be classed with those nations which have gained rather than lost in stature. Her increased importance exemplifies the shift toward a system of international affairs founded on centres of authority removed from western and central Europe. For Canada has undergone a far-reaching diplomatic revolution. In some respects this is admitted and proclaimed by her leaders; in other respects it is concealed. Canada is one of the few countries among the united nations in which the prewar helmsmen of the ship of state are still at their posts. They are in fact steering a new course, but since they are loath to confess that their seamanship ever was at fault, they prefer to describe it merely as accelerated progress along the old one. They can put it in such terms because external affairs are seldom major issues in Canadian politics and neither politicians nor officials have been judged in Canada, as elsewhere among the democracies, on their pre-war records.
> But the evidence of Canada's new position in the world is unmistakable.

The bill before this house establishes a momentous precedent, the consequences of which no one at this moment can fully visualize. Bluntly, the bill means that there will be United States armed forces in undefined numbers on Canadian territory in peace time and that they will have their own military laws and courts. In theory this move is repugnant to our much vaunted sovereignty, and in this hour of internationalism I am very much afraid that further offences against sovereignty will be committed, as they have been openly and sometimes cruelly committed in the last few years. However, Canada must act according to her own situation in a changing world which has put her at the cross-roads of the Big Five. No longer is Canada, as was stated at the Versailles treaty making, a fireproof house far away from incendiary materials.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) stated, to my mind, quite correctly, our position when he said that we may be the nut in the Russian-American nutcracker. But we cannot change this position, hard as we may try, although the position itself may be unenviable and is not of our own choosing. I believe that we must face the facts cooly, because we are pledging our own interests to hemispheric defence, and we cannot antagonize our powerful neighbour to the south. Rather should we accommodate him as much as we can. If the joint defence plan calls for United States troops to be on Canadian soil in peace time we cannot logically or intelligently oppose a measure which provides for military laws and courts for these troops.

The amendment suggests that the bill be referred to the committee on external affairs. It is quite possible that the committee might obtain explanations which have not been given to the house and which I think should have been given, but I am satisfied, personally, that the committee would report favourably on the bill. Therefore I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I shall vote for the bill as it stands. As I see it—and this may appear crude to some hon. members—it is better for Canada to have on Canadian territory, at this time, United States troops, than Russian troops later.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in this House of Commons we have sometimes been accused of speaking to the people back home. On this occasion I intend to speak to the House of Commons and to speak plainly to the people back home. I do not want the house to be in any doubt as to where I stand on this particular legislation. Before I touch upon that, I wish to make two observations about the world as it stands. As the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) said, in the last eighteen months or two years international relations have considerably worsened; in other words, since the San Francisco conference. To me it is rather a harsh criticism of our civilization to think that today easily ninety-nine per cent of the people of the world are seeking nothing but peace; yet in the meantime we seem to be heading toward something quite different from it.

A friend of mine once remarked—I am sure what he said is quite true—that if we could have some law enforceable, which of course we can not, that all future wars should be fought by men over fifty years of age, we would have no more wars. That is a true statement of fact. But it lies with us older people to try to find a solution which will mean that our youngsters will not once more be subjected to what they have been in the last two wars. In these times of modern weapons, we fellows over fifty years of age will be in the picture, but only on the receiving end.

I wish to say a word about this bill. What I intend to say I shall put in a sentence or two. I am 100 per cent opposed to the amendment; I am 100 per cent in favour of the bill, and I shall so vote. There is no equivocation or anything of that sort in what I have said. Realistically our position is this. If we believe anything we read in the newspapers; if we discuss with persons who have gone from here to international organizations, then we can see that they are all worried. There is not any doubt about that.

We can talk as we like of ideals, and I agree with many of the idealistic things that have been said, but to be practical about the matter our position is this. I regard as highly as anyone the interest we have in our sovereignty; but, on the other hand, we are in this position. If a mouse is attacked by a cat it does not worry much about sovereignty; it hopes that a terrier will come along and kill the cat. That is the position in which we are—let us admit it—with our tremendous boundary line. We are not in a position to defend it. Where are we to get help? In France which was mentioned, in China and in all these other places? I agree with what so many people have said, that it is unthinkable among rational beings that war should come, but today international affairs are being conducted, in the judgment of us who are sitting here and other ordinary people in the country, on a basis which we cannot conceive or believe to be rational. Therefore, stripping the tree of its branches and leaves and getting down to the bare trunk, to the basic position, it is this. If, which God forbid, war comes, where are we to look for help except to our friends in the United States of America? Where are we to look for practical help? It is no use theorizing about these things. That is the only place we can get help. May I say this to the right hon. gentleman who is piloting the bill? I went over and spoke to him a moment ago and asked him about how many of these people were here and he said, about sixty. So far as I am concerned I hope they come in their thousands to help our defences to defend the country if we are attacked. We are not going to attack anybody. It is unthinkable. Nobody dreams that we should; but let us defend ourselves with the weapons we have and with those which we can get from a friendly people. I hope, sir, that I have left no doubt where I stand on this bill.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): This bill is similar to the one which the United States forces had in the United Kingdom during the war and which was passed by the British parliament. Since I had an opportunity to observe the functioning of that bill with regard to the jurisdiction of United States military courts over there personally, I found, and I think the general opinion was, that the bill worked extraordinarily well. It gave the United States courts and the United States courts martial the right to try their own personnel, and a wise right that was because the United States code of laws is considerably different from that in the United Kingdom. It had one thing which I think we have a little overlooked in this bill, namely, the prejudice that a civilian court has when trying a uniformed national of a friendly country. I would think that the civilian courts in Canada, and I am sure the civilian courts in England, welcomed the fact that the delicate business of trying offenders against breaches of the law was taken out of their hands. I can see, and it is obvious that anybody who has had experience will know, the difficulty of a court of law passing sentence against a member of an armed force that is serving as a friendly nation within the borders of his country.

We found that the civilian courts were, in many instances, loath to pass sentence or to try the offenders, in some cases our own, Canadian soldiers because they were friendly people, and there was the difficulty of a court, particularly a jury, wishing to take action against a member of the visiting armed forces, because it might be construed as an unfriendly act. How fortunate it is that the United States has this clause in their general military set-up, that it is their practice that all these delicate situations are handled by themselves. The Canadian bill does not give the United States authorities power over our courts, which still may try United States service personnel for breaches of Canadian civil or criminal law, if the authorities are not satisfied with the United States action.

That brings me to another point, namely, that this bill has nothing to do with sovereignty. How the question of sovereignty came in, I do not know; but it has nothing to do with it. This bill merely gives United States forces the right to try their own personnel.

I want to point out how this contrasts with the action taken by this government in 1938, when, with the whole European situation just dripping war, the United Kingdom said, "Please let us establish air training camps in Canada." They were turned down. The battle of Britain was won by a hair's breadth. Had it been lost, it would have meant the end of civilization on this planet as we know it. Let us never again be in the position of not being prepared even though we were forewarned. This bill is just an example of a little forewarning.

I do not see the hon. gentleman in his seat, but thank heaven for the realism of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). He has seen despotism in Europe; he has seen what happened to his own nationals when they came under communist dictatorship.

I now come to the larger question; since much has been said on it, I feel that I must saye something also. I refer to the question of the conflict, real or otherwise, between democracy in North America and communism in Russia. Let us look at the record since the end of the war. Let us go first to San Francisco. What happened there? The one thing that may jeopardize the whole structure of the united nations is the veto power, which was given to any member of the security council. That is the one thing that may emasculate the entire operations of the united nations. Who put it in; who insisted on it?

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, who?

Mr. ADAMSON: Russia.

Mr. KNOWLES: And the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON: Russia insisted on it.

Now let us go to Paris, where they were dealing with the satellite axis nations. What happened? Every day there was procrastination and obstruction; battles over the details, until it looked as though the treaties could not be signed in time for the delegates to get to the meeting of the united nations council at Lake Success. Day after day the Russian delegates would get up and ask that a comma be changed, that a sentence be changed, or some other triviality, just to waste time and obstruct the proceedings.

Then let us go to Moscow, where the main peace treaties were dealt with. What happened at that bootless and fruitless conference? There was obstruction from the very start, and no treaties were signed, so that today we have the major democratic belligerents talking of signing separate treaties with Germany and Austria.

Let us go on to the atomic energy commission; what happened there? The United States, Great Britain and other nations on that commission offered a fair and workable plan. They offered to make their secrets known; they offered mutual inspection of the production of atomic energy all over the world. What happened? The proposal was thrown out of court by the Russian delegate, Gromyko, and an absolutely untenable position taken under which the Rusisans wished the Americans to give up all their science and knowledge in regard to atomic energy and destroy everything they had done, including the possibility that this new force might become one of the greatest benefits mankind has ever known. So we had an untenable position, frustration and obstruction by Russia.

Then let us see what happens every day in the Russian press and over the Russian radio. We get nothing but absolute vilification and abuse of the democracies. Is that the way in which a friendly power is likely to behave? The other day we saw the coup d'etat in Hungary. We see what has happened in Greece, in Albania, in Yugoslavia and in Poland. Everywhere we see Russian communist infiltration and hostile actions toward the democracies; the mining of the straits of Corfu; getting the little Soviet satellites to commit overt acts; continuous unrest; subversive activity and hostility toward the major powers. Is that the way in which a peaceful nation is likely to act?

Then let us look at the troubles of the forces of occupation in Germany and Austria. Do we get cooperation between the United States, British and French zones and the Russian zone? We do not. Friends of mine on the control commission have told me that it is as much as their life is worth to go over the border of the Russian controlled zones, particularly in Germany. Do we see any effort on the part of Russia to try to rehabilitate Germany or Austria, without which there can be no economic peace in the world? No; we see them taking every bit of productive machinery out of the country. Is that likely to help the rehabilitation of Europe?

Then let us look at what has happened in our own country. Whether or not we like to admit it, today we are at war politically with Russia. Right in this very House of Commons we have seen that, but we forget these things. We have seen prominent, trusted civil servants subverted by Russian agents, right here in Canada. We have seen an attempt by soviet agents to grab the secrets of atomic energy. Was that a friendly act? Was that a friendly gesture between two nations? Then we see communist - controlled, communist - fostered strikes throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I had one in my own riding, and I do not mind mentioning it. That was the Anaconda strike, which lasted for five months, during which every member of the union lost $1,000 in pay. Now it has been shown that the man behind that strike was Reeve Robinson, named as a strong communist in Newsweek. Then what else do we see? Is any member of this house fool enough to believe that communist activity in Canada is not controlled from Moscow?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe I have already given him too much latitude. He should confine his remarks to the general principle of the bill before the house, which is an act to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces. The hon. gentleman must understand that on second reading he should confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I admit that I have strayed, but there has been so much straying I felt I could not let the opportunity pass without saying a few words on this important subject. We must face communism in the open and face it now.

However, I come now to the last point and it is this. This is a question of armed forces I have no apology to offer for doing this. Before you have armed conflict, you have political conflict. I have mentioned these things because I would say that political conflict is going on now and that neither we nor the United States are the aggressor, but the aggressor is the Soviet Union. That is why I have mentioned this matter tonight.

Let us see what the C.C.F. amendment would do to this bill. The C.C.F. amendment would kill the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMSON: Let us make that quite plain; the C.C.F. amendment would kill the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it would not.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, it would, because it refers the subject matter of this bill to a committee; and once the subject matter of this bill is referred to a committee, the bill is dead.

Mr. COLDWELL: Rubbish.

Mr. POULIOT: If it did kill it, it would be for the better.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it does not kill it.

Mr. ADAMSON: Second, appeasement has always caused wars. If the hon. members who have opposed this bill are so blind that they are now prepared to support any appeasement, then I want this house and this country to know it.

The next matter for consideration is this: Has the United States ever attacked anybody? Has Russia? I just leave those questions with the house.

The next matter for consideration is that we are not only geographically in the firing line, but are also the great storehouse and powerhouse of the world. As has been said, we cannot protect ourselves because our population is too small. We must face that fact. We must have help.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the next war will be a push-button war. We shall not require big battalions. We shall not require divisions and army groups. The next war will be fought with the new weapons. We might just as well admit that now. All this bill seeks to do is to allow our great friend and neighbour, the United States, to help us put our push-buttons in place, so that if we are attacked we can neutralize the attack before the new weapons take effect on our centres of population. I support this bill with all my heart and I am utterly and completely against the amendment.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You do not have to.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not have to, but I want to say this before the bill is given second reading. I think most of the debate on this bill has been deplorable. This is a very simple bill, whether we agree with the principle or not. It is a bill to allow a foreign country, whose military forces are here by our invitation or consent, to set up their own courts to deal with infractions of the rules or the law. To hear speeches such as that made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) just now, one would think this bill was the first step in a declaration of war. To me it is not understandable that reasonable men should say the things that were said by most of the members who have spoken in this debate.

The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) made what I thought was a reasonable speech. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), in my opinion, made an excellent speech in regard to this bill. I did not hear the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), but I am told that he also made a very good speech, as did the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr.

Merritt), and some of the other members. But for most of the debate today one would think this bill the first step in a war. The hon. member for York West did not leave any doubt about it. All of his speech was taken up with the danger of Russia, and he was in favour of this bill because it was the first step in stopping Russia, Surely that is not the way to build peace. Have my hon. friends to my right discarded the idea of the united nations? Are they going to throw away everything we have tried, with so much labour, to build since April, 1945? If they want to do that they had better say so and tell this country to go on an armed footing at once.

It has been said that to refer this bill to the external affairs committee would kill it.

Mr. POULIOT: The Aluminum Company made lots of money in Norway during the war.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: The bill, of course, would not be read the second time, but it could be referred to the committee; the committee could report back, and the bill could be reintroduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. If I may answer that, the bill as such, as introduced by the minister, would be killed.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right. Suppose, for the sake of argument, I take my hon. friend's word for that. If that is the case, then the government put over a pretty slick one on the house the other evening when Bill No. 24 was up for second reading. A minister moved that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the committee on industrial relations. All members, except the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) spoke in favour of it. I asked them if they did that in order to kill the bill. They should have had the courage to say that the purpose of referring it to the committee was to kill the bill and not do it in the underhanded way in which it was done. It is time that we discussed these questions honestly and not in the manner in which we have debated this bill. I say again that I deplore the debate, or most of the debate that has taken place on this bill, because I am satisfied that it is not the kind of debate which will help to bring peace to the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, Mr. Speaker. I move that the debate be now adjourned. I do not think it would be proper to allow the vote to be taken without making some observations on the wide range the debate has taken.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 6, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE, MR. KNOWLES—OTTAWA "CITIZEN" REPORTS OF PROCEEDINGS OF JUNE 5

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday there was an exchange in the house between my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and myself which will be found reported on page 3834 of Hansard as follows:

Mr. Knowles: We always do that even in arguments which take place in the house; as for example, the exchanges between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and me. We have them often. I always think he is wrong; he always thinks I am wrong.

Mr. Mackenzie: But I am right.

That is exactly what happened, but the Ottawa Citizen of this morning contains an article which offends my dignity. It is entitled:

"You're darned right" is Mackenzie's reply.

I have never used the word "darned" in my life. I think it is an objectionable and obnoxious word except when applied to the mending of socks. I wish the paper would make the proper retraction.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise also to a question of privilege. I regret having to correct our friends in the press gallery because I realize they are working under difficulties, but there is a sentence in a report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen which really ought to be corrected. It reads:

Stanley Knowles (CCF-Winnipeg North Centre) said that if Canada refused to have United States troops within her borders in peace time she would be in the enviable position of being able to say she had taken the first step against the "Truman policy" for the "Stalin policy."

Obviously if anyone had made such a statement as that in this house he would have been howled down. The word "for" should be "or". What I did say is reported on page 3836 of Hansard as follows:

That would be the first move by any small country against the Truman policy or the Stalin policy, and it would put us in the position of being able properly to criticize the Soviet Union for what they are doing as well as the United States. It would also strengthen our position in the councils of the united nations.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to table copies in English and French of orders in council passed under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers, 1945, for the months of April and May 1947. Orders in council passed under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, were last tabled on April 24, 1947. These will be the last group of orders in council to be tabled under the provisions of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, since the act expired on May 15, 1947.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I desire to table copy of P.C. 2179, passed on June 3, 1947, by which the federal government extended until March 31, 1949, the time limits under which financial contributions may be made to the capital cost of new vocational schools, including building and equipment costs. The arrangement is a dollar for dollar one between the federal and the provincial governments. The extension has been approved following representations by the provincial governments that the shortage of building materials made it impossible to complete school building programmes by the original deadline of March 31, 1948.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

HUMAN RIGHTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) presented the first report of the special joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria) moved:

That the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented on Wednesday, June 4, be now concurred in.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the last petition of the electors of Temiscouata county has completed its home run. I shall not make any remarks other than those I have already made, but if the house is kind enough I should like to place on the record editorials from the Vancouver Sun and the Northern Daily News. I have also a letter from Mr. J. A. Laforest, Mayor of Squatteck.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. COLDWELL: To table these documents, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. POULIOT: To put them on the record.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think anything put on the record should be read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, thank you. I tried to get rid of the embarrassment I would feel in reading those articles. The first, entitled "Sacramental Words," is from the Vancouver Sun, May 13, 1947, and the other, entitled "Shredded Red Tape," is from the Northern Daily News, of Kirkland Lake, Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows he is quite out of order in reading articles from newspapers.

Mr. POULIOT: I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but those who have not read this have missed a lot.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 266, to incorporate Federation Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Cote (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville).

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

LEAVE TO APPEAL FROM DECISION OF JUVENILE COURT OR MAGISTRATE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 267 (from the senate), to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUTTER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY AS TO FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Agriculture, but since he is not in his seat perhaps the Prime Minister would answer it. Reports that have reached me indicate that the butter industry, from producer to consumer, is in a state of confusion reacting to the detriment of all. Will the minister state what the policy of the government is in regard to a floor price on butter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must thank my hon. friend for the compliment he pays me. In reply I would say that the government's policy will be made known in due course.

OCEAN TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO PASSAGE FOR CANADIANS DESIRING TO RETURN FROM OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. I. HAMEL (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the appropriate minister a question. Because the government directly or indirectly sponsored the admittance of thousands and thousands of immigrants on ships, many Canadian citizens who are now overseas cannot return to their own country. Will the government tell the house what steps will be taken to facilitate the return to this country of those Canadian citizens before further immigrants are admitted?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the government has sponsored transportation for immigrants. It is my understanding that ships are common carriers and operate on the basis of first come, first served. That is certainly the case with the air lines. I think a little patience is all that is required for those Canadians overseas desiring to return to Canada.

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, June 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces, and of the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Probe.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the motion for second reading of this bill and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the committee on external affairs, have occasioned a debate that has covered a wide range of international politics. I shall not venture to take the time of the house to comment on many things which have been said in the course of that debate and with which most members of the house would be in agreement, or upon a number of things that have been said with which I cannot agree but which I do not think it is necessary to point out specifically. There are some points, however, upon which I feel it is my duty to give accurate and precise information to the house before it is called upon to vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City.

The first point with which I wish to deal is the effect of that kind of motion. There seems to be some uncertainty as to the effect of an amendment to a motion that a bill be read a second time, referring the subject matter of that bill to a committee for consideration. I have discussed this matter with the Clerk, whose experience in things of this kind is, as everyone knows, wide and broad. I have also looked at some of the authorities and I venture to suggest that this is the situation. When a motion for the second reading of a bill has been put a member may move that the bill be not now read a second time but that its subject matter be referred to either a standing or a special committee. If the amendment carries the bill is killed for the time being. There is always the rule that when the house decides that a bill be not now read a second time the door remains open for a motion to place it on the order paper for second reading at another time. But if the amendment that the bill be not now read a second time carries and the subject matter be referred to a committee, a motion to place the bill on the order paper for second reading cannot be made so long as the subject matter is before the committee. The subject matter cannot be dealt with in the house while it is under reference to the committee. If the committee reports recommending the passage of legislation identical in terms to the bill the subject matter of which was referred to the committee a motion for the second reading could be made without having the bill previously read again a first time. But if the committee does not so report or does not report at all the bill cannot be dealt with in the house. If the report of the committee is not for the introduction of legislation identical in terms with the bill, and the report is concurred in, that is the end of the matter. So that, in fact, as a matter of practical application, there is little chance for a bill, the subject matter of which has been referred to a committee for consideration, to receive further consideration in the house at that session.

The second point with which I wish to deal is the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) with respect to the effect of legislation or proposed legislation recently submitted by the President to the Congress of the United States. I think it is necessary that the Canadian public know what the situation is and not be left under the impression that might have been gathered from newspaper dispatches which have had to be qualified previously in statements to the house but which, unfortunately, the hon. member chose to put on the record last night.

There was recommended by the President to the Congress of the United States on May 26 a bill to replace the act which had been passed in 1940, and which was an act to authorize the secretaries of war and navy to assist the governments of the American republics to increase their military and naval establishments. The President, in submitting this bill, said, among other things:

> As stated in my message to the 79th congress our army and navy have maintained cordial relations of collaboration with the armed forces of other American republics, within the framework of the good-neighbour policy. Under authorization of the congress, military and naval training missions have been sent to various American republics.

And further down, he said:

> The American republics have assumed new responsibilities for their mutual defence and for the maintenance of peace in the act of Chapultepec and the charter of the united nations.

Hon. members know that the act of Chapultepec is an act adopted by the members of the Pan-American union to which Canada does not belong. I continue:

> The close collaboration of the American republics provided for in the act of Chapultepec, the proposed treaty to be based upon that act, and other basic inter-American documents, make it highly desirable to standardize military organization, training methods, and equipment as has been recommended by the inter-American defence board.

Canada is not a member of the inter-American defence board, which is an organism of the Pan-American union. I continue:

> Under the bill transmitted herewith, the army and navy, acting in conjunction with the Department of State, would be permitted to continue in the future a general programme of collaboration with the armed forces of our sister republics with a view to facilitating the adoption of similar technical standards.

That is the proposed legislation submitted to the United States congress by the President. In submitting it, he had this to say:

> The collaboration authorized by the bill could be extended also to Canada whose cooperation with the United States in matters affecting their common defence is of particular importance.

That being the situation, it was stated here the other day by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this legislation had no effect whatsoever on the arrangements outlined and described by him in his statement to the house on February 12, 1947. I think it is only fair that the Canadian public should realize that such is the situation, and that this legislation was legislation to replace the act to which I have referred, an act authorizing the secretaries of war and of navy to assist the governments of the American republics to increase their military and naval establishments and for other purposes. The legislation relates exclusively to the projects arising out of the arrangements of the act of Chapultepec and to implement the undertakings made by those who are parties to that act. It is something which could be extended to Canada, which could be extended to any other nation, which could be extended even to Russia, but it would have to be by arrangement with the sovereign government of such other nation.

Another matter which I think I should deal with at once is this, the idea mentioned by several speakers that the introduction of this bill at the present time had implications which went far beyond the declarations of policy enunciated by the Prime Minister on February 12, 1947. The purpose of this bill is to implement a portion of the declaration made on February 12, 1947, and goes no farther than that; and these implications that have been discussed, these prospective dangers that have been conjured up, cannot be founded on this bill or on the declaration of policy of February 12, 1947. If hon. members choose to imagine other possible policies, other possible dangers, I do not contest their right to do so, but let them do so on their own responsibility. In the presentation of this bill or in the policy declared to this house nothing is to be found which can serve as a basis for such feared possible consequences.

Mr. PEARKES: On a question of order, may I suggest that the term used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and subsequently withdrawn led me to get the impression that it went beyond the statements made, because the minister used the word "unit" which has a military interpretation. It is not quite fair to say that the dangers mentioned were not founded on anything in the presentation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid that those to whom I have been talking about the signification, the meaning of military unit since our exchange the other day do not appear to agree with the hon. member that it means necessarily anything other than a group of men under the command of one or more officers. It was in that sense that I used the word. It may be that great military strategists, like doctors, sometimes disagree. I do not wish to pronounce between them, but I do wish to assert that all I intended it to mean was a group of men under the command of one or more officers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Even judges disagree.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is one other matter with respect to which I think it is only proper that the real facts should be once more called to the attention of hon. members, and that arises out of the statement that the policies enunciated in the declaration of February 12, 1947, were a departure from the policy that had been declared in this house by the Prime Minister in 1938 when the question arose as to whether or not training establishments could be set up by the government of the United Kingdom on Canadian soil. First of all, I wish to come back to the theoretical question asked me by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) when I moved second reading of the bill. He asked where the government obtained the authority to invite the uniformed men of another nation on to Canadian soil. I replied I did not know of any statutory authority. but I pointed out that I thought it was something which could be done, if no prohibition was established by parliament against it.

During a discussion of the estimates in 1938 the then leader of the opposition, now Viscount Bennett, was criticizing something that had been discussed in the press about the establishment of training camps in this country by the government of the United Kingdom. I wish to say at once that it is quite inaccurate to say that there ever was any request and refusal. The situation was that the then leader of the opposition said, because of the known attitude of the government, "Of course there will be no request"; and that is where it ended.

I have before me Hansard for 1938, and I find at page 4523 a report of the discussion which took place when the estimates were before committee of the whole. Mr. Bennett said:

> The third point has to do with the utilization of portions of this country for the purpose of training grounds for the training of aviators.

And then, to skip a few lines—

> I believe other parts of the British empire have been considered, and the information is that not a request but what is equivalent to it, namely an approach to this government, was made to ascertain whether or not there would be any objection to this being done. Obviously no member of the commonwealth is going to ask this government, and face a refusal, because that is not the way governments do business.

Then, in dealing with that matter the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4529 of Hansard for that year:

> This government has never at any time said that it was not prepared to give in our own establishments the opportunity to British pilots to come over here and train, but they will do it in our own establishments, controlled by our own Minister of National Defence who is responsible to this parliament. That is an entirely different thing from having a branch of the British forces establish headquarters in this country, direct their own men here and be responsible, not to this parliament for what takes place in Canada as a consequence, but only to the British parliament and the British people.

That is exactly the situation; and I invite hon. members to compare that situation with the one described by the Prime Minister in his statement to the house on February 12 last, when he said:

> As an underlying principle of all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory.

That is the arrangement as it exists at the present time, and for the properly carrying it out it is felt by the government that a bill of this kind is appropriate and even necessary. I think most hon. members who have had military experience have said that if there were to be groups of men of the forces of another country present in this country under the command of an officer or officers it would be proper and desirable that that officer or those officers should have the disciplinary powers provided for by this bill.

It has been suggested in debate—I believe it was by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine)—that there seemed to be no reason to limit this bill to the United States of America, and that it might very well have been a foreign friendly powers forces act. I can assure hon. members that that was considered. I have not been in the house for many years, but I have been here long enough to feel, rightly or wrongly, that if the government had attempted to introduce that kind of bill these rafters would have rung with the denouncements of this autocratic government which wanted to substitute itself for the parliament of the nation.

It was said in the debate, and rightly said, that matters of defence policy should be considered and determined by this house of parliament. And it is to respect that principle that we thought it would be undesirable to come to parliament and to ask for powers such as that contained in the act of the American congress to which reference has been made, or even the act of the United Kingdom which was referred to, both of which are acts applicable to the armed forces of friendly powers to be designated by proclamation of the President or by His Majesty in council.

We did not think it would be proper to come to the house and say, "Pass an act under which the governor in council can apply this legislation to any nation." At the present time there is a similar act which applies to the armed forces of the United Kingdom and other units of the commonwealth, and to all parts of the empire dependent upon the parliament of the United Kingdom. There is occasion for members of the armed forces of our neighbour to the south to be present on our territory, and this bill is to make provision for that situation. There may come a time when there will be occasion for men of the armed forces of other friendly nations to visit this country. If that does happen, I consider it proper that the government should be required, in order to give them the disciplinary and court-martialing powers provided in this act, to come back to parliament and put the situation before it, telling it why those men of the armed forces of another friendly nation are here, the reason for it, and have the judgment of parliament as to whether or not the government has acted properly in inviting such men to visit this territory.

The question was asked: Well, what is the limit of this power of the governor in council to invite members of the armed forces of a friendly nation to visit Canadian territory? The limit is the responsibility of the government to this house of parliament and to the country. The government is not as desirous of committing political suicide as was suggested in the course of the debate with respect to another matter last night. Any government, whether it be this one, or one formed of any other party, knows that for its acts it is responsible, first of all, to the opinion of the house and, then, to the opinion of the country. It is in the light of that responsibility that it carries out any policy over which it has these powers of management and control. It was my feeling, and the feeling shared by my colleagues, that the government would not be realistic at this session, while we were having a long debate on the extent of the powers of the governor in council as compared with those remaining in parliament, to come to parliament and say, "Give us all your powers with respect to this matter and let us select those to whom these privileges will be extended." It does strike some that when this government proposes something that has to be regarded as good because it is good, hon. members can find room to say that it is not being done in the right way. If they cannot oppose the end to be achieved, they do find some way of saying they should be reached in another way, that it would be better to travel another route to get to the same goal.

I wish to say something with respect to some of the quite pertinent questions submitted by the hon. member for Vancouver South, whose interest in this, I am sure—at least I hope I can be sure—was not political in the sense of party politics, but was as genuine as that of a great many other members who participated in the debate. Several questions were suggested by the hon. member. One was, is this reciprocal? I think the hon. member was satisfied by the explanation given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that it is absolutely reciprocal with our good neighbours to the south. The next question was, "are these persons of the United States armed forces present in our territory for purposes of training or for purposes of military occupation—

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Those are not the exact words—or for purpose of manning an establishment under their own control? The answer to that question is in paragraphs 2 and 5 of the Prime Minister's declaration of February 12, 1947. Paragraph 2 reads:

> General cooperation and exchange of observers in connection with exercises and with the development and tests of material of common interest.

Paragraph 5 says:

> . . . without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory.

That is the purpose for which they are here.

Mr. GREEN: If I may interrupt the minister, my question was whether the troops were in Canada for training or, in some cases, to establish posts.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Here the answer is given that they are here for training in the broad sense. I do not know that it is for training of the individuals but it is.

> . . . to increase the familiarity of each country's defence establishment with that of the other country.

And:

General cooperation and exchange of observers in connection with exercises and with the development and tests of material of common interest.

I suppose that would come under the general classification of training. It is not something designed to improve the military prowess of the man who is here. It is a test of the material and equipment, so that the knowledge acquired from the test may be made available to others than those who are in personal attendance.

Mr. GREEN: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but if I may be permitted to do so I should like to ask him one other question. Is there not quite a difference between that and establishing United States posts in Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, yes.

Mr. GREEN: It should be easy enough to explain whether or not there are to be United States posts established in Canada.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are not to be United States posts established in Canada under the policy stated by the President and by the Prime Minister on February 12, 1947. I hope there will never be anything more than at present, but no man can undertake to say that situations will not change—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is so.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and that there may not, unfortunately, be some time when all Canadians will be glad to see posts established here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Especially on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have great sympathy with much that was said by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), but when he said that we could not tolerate that there be anywhere the idea that another war might, unfortunately, sometime become possible, I think that is going much too far. If that were the case, how could any responsible government come to parliament and ask it to vote $226,709,331 for defence preparations for one fiscal year? And how can any of the hon. gentlemen opposite be making speeches to the effect that we are not doing enough in that line?

The third question raised by the hon. member was, What consent is required for the presence of such personnel here? The consent required is the arrangements worked out by the personnel of the general staffs of the two countries within the terms of this statement of policy made on February 12, 1947. They, within the terms of that policy, can work out arrangements which, I am sure, hon. members with military experience will say should be left to the military authorities and should not be directed as to details by the members of this house.

Mr. GREEN: Does the cabinet not pass at all on any of these invitations to foreign troops to come to Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The cabinet passes upon the general policy, and if there is anything in contemplation which is not just routine for the carrying out of the policy declared to parliament, then the matter will have to come back to the cabinet, and would probably come back to the cabinet in the form of a recommendation of the joint permanent board on defence. The general staff has no authority to go beyond the ordinary routine of carrying out what has been stated to be the policy of the two countries. That brings me to a point which I think it is important to make, and it affords an answer to another question: Why was this not put in the form of a treaty like the treaty between Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. GREEN: Before the minister leaves that other point, may I ask him whether the inviting to Canada of United States troops who are now here was considered by the cabinet, or whether it was merely done by the general staff?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know to what extent it is proper for me to go in attempting to describe accurately to this house the measures being taken by our general staff to do what the country expects them to do if it is to provide them with $226,000,000. I am not going to attempt to do that.

Mr. GREEN: That is not answering the question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, if it is not answering the question, then the question will not be answered by me.

Mr. GREEN: All right.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was suggested that the subject matter of this bill might be referred to the committee on external affairs. To that course we are unalterably opposed. But after the bill gets its second reading, if members of the house want the bill referred to the committee on external affairs and want to question the officers of the general staff in that connection, the government has no objection whatever to the bill going before the committee on external affairs, and the hon. member for Vancouver South can go there and ask these questions. The hon. member knows as well as I do that there are things which should not be stated in public debate. I am not in a position to draw the line. The members of the general staff are in a position to determine what it is proper for them to say publicly and what it would be improper for them to say in public. I am not in a position to do so, and I cannot and will not attempt to answer any better than I have done.

With respect to the question as to why this matter was not put in the form of a treaty; well, hon. members have been very much concerned over the effect that even these joint statements might have in raising further suspicion in the minds of members of other governments. We do not overlook that. It does not bring us to the point where we refuse to recommend to parliament the appropriation of hundreds of millions of dollars for the preparation of defence. It does not deter us from doing the things that are recommended to us by those who are in charge of our general staff as being the prudent and proper things to do. But it does make us cautious; it does cause us to try to avoid doing anything unnecessary or anything which might be treated as alarming. We felt that if a treaty were made it would be seized upon as evidence supporting the impression that exists—I will not say how it is created—as to the wide gulf between the two ideologies of the east and the western democracies, and as evidence that the countries of the western democracies are lining up, ganging up, against the rest of the world. And it was quite unnecessary. What was contemplated was merely the continuation of a policy that had been in operation for a number of years, and it was so stated by the Prime Minister in his declaration. If hon. members will read that declaration they will find that the Prime Minister was at pains to point out that since August, 1940, when the creation of the joint board on permanent defence was announced, it was stated by the President of the United States that the board—

> . . . shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material. It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.

That was a year and a half before the United States became a belligerent in the last terrible war. The Prime Minister then declared that even the 1940 statement was merely a logical development of what had preceded it, and described in what manner that policy had been carried out in this country. Further, he went on to say that there was no treaty, no binding undertaking to continue; that it was a matter of cooperation along parallel lines, to which both parties would conform so long as it suited them to do so, but to which neither party was bound for any time beyond that during which it suited its policies to do so. The declaration further stated that the decision was made—

> . . . as a contribution to the stability of the world and to the establishment through the united nations of an effective system of world-wide security. With this in mind each government has sent a copy of this statement to the secretary general of the united nations for circulation to all its members.

Some of the debate in this house has almost implied that the adoption of this bill would be an alternative to Canada's participation in the united nations; and some of the debate would set up, on the one side, the hoped-for advantages to be derived from the united nations and, on the other, those to be derived from this kind of cooperation between Canada and her neighbour to the south. Well, it seems to me that is giving the Canadian public an entirely false impression. The corner-stone of Canada's policy, the corner-stone of the policy of our neighbour to the south, is the strength and validity and efficiency of the united nations organization; and that will ever continue to be the corner-stone of their policies. In spite of the many disappointments all of us have felt about the progress toward an efficient organization as contemplated by the charter of the united nations, I am still hopeful, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said, that the common sense of mankind all over the world will finally prevail and will allow us all to make the united nations organization an efficient working instrument for world peace and world security. But until we have a further demonstration of its ability to protect each one of us, then each one of us has to do his share to meet the conditions of a troubled world as they still exist; and that is the only justification for asking this parliament this year to appropriate $226,000,000 for our national defence.

Another question was, how long will this act operate? I think this act, if it is passed in its present form, will operate for a long time. I think it will operate as long as a government supported by this party is in power, and that is too indefinite a period to attempt to place any limit upon it. But it can operate only when there are forces of a friendly nation on Canadian soil. If it should ever happen that hon. members opposite, either the group nearest Mr. Speaker or a group further removed, were in control of the government of Canada, it would be they who would decide whether or not forces of a friendly power could remain on Canadian soil. If their decision were that there should be none, then the act would not operate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That would never happen.

Mr. GREEN: You think you are going to be there forever?

Mr. MACKENZIE: For a long time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have to tell the right hon. minister that already he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There were other things I intended to say, but I do not think they need to be said. If I have unanimous consent, however, I wish to deal with the sixth of the hon. member's questions. That was, what would be the control over such training or other operations as would take place on Canadian territory? The answer is to be found in paragraph 5 of the joint statement of the President and the Prime Minister:

> As an underlying principle all cooperative arrangements will be without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory.

Mr. GREEN: Does that mean that there will be Canadian officers in command of these United States troops?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In these joint operations, if the thing is being done in Canadian territory, the principle is that there must be Canadian command. That command will be exercised through the ordinary channels, not exercised directly by the Canadian commander over the individual in the United States group. The supreme command over the operation is to be Canadian when the operation is carried out in Canada. Of course there will be a United States command in such cooperative exercises or tests as are carried out in United States territory. I thank hon. members for their indulgence.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word and I am going to be brief about it. I do not think that, on the whole, this debate has served the best interests of good relations between nations with which we are friendly. I regret very much that the debate has been taken as an occasion and opportunity to criticize the policy or the attitude of the U.S.S.R. and of the United States. Many of the things that have been said in this debate would have been much better had they remained unsaid, but they have been said. I do not think some of the extravagant statements should be taken to represent the point of view either of this parliament or of the country generally.

I wish to say something about the suggestion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) regarding the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe). A short time ago a bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was before the house. It had to do with retirement and superannuation of railway employees. I remember distinctly that it was suggested that, instead of the second reading of the bill being pressed that evening—it was thought by hon. gentlemen on the government side, and by the minister, I think, that even if it were enacted it could be improved—it should be referred to the committee before being read the second time.

My understanding was—and I think the minister has confirmed this—that, while the bill itself might not come back to the house in the same form, the substance of the bill could come back in the form of a bill. If the substance were the same as that which had been sent to the committee, then it would come back for second reading of the bill, but otherwise it would mean that the substance would be incorporated in a new bill and the matter dealt with in that way. It seems to me that the two cases are analogous. If it was good to send one bill to the appropriate committee it ought to be good to send this bill to the appropriate committee also.

I think this measure does indicate a complete change in the attitude of the government of Canada now in office and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from the attitude taken in former days. I too, had Hansard of July 1, 1938, before me when the Secretary of State for External Affairs read that portion of the debate which he read; but if one is to understand the paragraph which the right hon. gentleman read one must understand the dialogue which preceded that paragraph and I propose to indicate to the house what I mean. I remember that debate distinctly, and I remember that I agreed whole-heartedly at that time with the position taken by the Prime Minister.

The bill now before us does imply a change of policy. I believe that it is essential, if Canada is to give any of her sovereignty to some other body, that portion of our sovereignty should be given to the united nations and we should not in any way surrender our sovereignty to some other foreign power, not even, may I say, to another member of the commonwealth of nations, let alone a nation which, though friendly, is not associated with us in that way. I remember very well that debate when the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 4529 of Hansard for 1938:

We have in Canada our Department of National Defence; we have our army and our air force and our naval service establishments as the British government have their army and navy and air force establishments under their own control and a responsible minister. You cannot have two military forces operating in individual countries responsible at one time or in part to the one government and at another time and in part to another government. We have to take complete responsibility ourselves with respect to everything we do and for everything that is done here.

Mr. Bennett: This is not a military force but a training force.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I want the house and the country to understand clearly what is being discussed. My reference was with regard to the idea of having the imperial air force set up a flying school somewhere in Canada to train their flying pilots. In short, a military station to be put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes.

Mr. Bennett: Not for imperial purposes.

Mr. Mackenzie King: It is for imperial purposes. Is it for Canadian purposes?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, very much so.

May I point out that the Prime Minister said:

It is for imperial purposes. Is it for Canadian purposes?

Is it for Canadian purposes that we are inviting these troops into Canada, or is it primarily for United States purposes?

Mr. CLAXTON: Exclusively for Canadian purposes.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister went on:

I say that we will look after our own defence in cooperation with other parts of the empire, just as they will look after their own defences in cooperation with other parts of the empire, but that cooperation will be most effectively maintained and carried out by each part managing its own affairs and being responsible to its own parliament for all its actions in respect thereto.

Then the Prime Minister issued this interesting challenge:

I have made this statement at this time this morning so that there can be no mistake about the attitude of the Canadian government on this question, and if at any time my right hon. friend wants to go before the Canadian people and have this issue fought out, I am quite prepared at the appropriate time to go before them.

That was the statement made at that time. Let us look at what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked him at whose invitation these troops were coming and whether their entry into Canada was supervised by the cabinet of Canada? The answer was given that the entry into Canada of troops from the United States would be under the control of the general staff and that for security reasons he could give us no other information. I want to say that I think Canada, at the present time at peace, should be governed by the parliament of Canada or by the executive branch of our parliament responsible to this parliament, namely the cabinet. The cabinet alone should have authority from parliament and should alone exercise that authority to bring troops of any foreign power into this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend permit me? I thought as I listened to him that he was not representing fairly what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said. I think my colleague made it perfectly clear that the government decided the policy—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right as to policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and that under that policy a certain authority was given to the chiefs of staff, and that they would have no right to exercise any authority outside of that which is given to them by the cabinet. May I say that in these matters—and I am not disclosing any cabinet secret—it is customary, before any measure is taken under authority of that kind, for a report to be made by the minister himself to his colleagues. There is ample cabinet supervision of these matters.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad that the Prime Minister has made that statement. It certainly was not clear from what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I am glad that we have had that point clarified because it removes what seemed to some of us to be an objectionable feature. We are most anxious that this country shall retain its independence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So are we.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are under tremendous economic pressure from our great neighbour to the south, as we are bound to be because of our proximity to her, and we are most anxious that we shall in no way jeopardize our independence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So are we.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to hear that, and I believe it is true.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: You never doubted it.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I did not doubt that for one moment, but I do think that those of us who are looking into these matters should emphasize that point of view, that we want our country to retain its independence of any foreign power.

The minister says that there is reciprocal legislation. I listened to the reading of the proclamation made by the President of the United States bringing into effect their legislation under which our troops were disciplined in the United States, but let me say that I noticed one word in that proclamation which does not assure me that that reciprocity is now being carried on or will be carried on in the future. That word is "co-belligerents." We, the United Kingdom and Canada, are described in the President's proclamation as co-belligerents. It may be argued that we are still co-belligerents because the peace treaties have not been signed. On the other hand, we know perfectly well that, so far as Canada is concerned, it is generally believed that the war ended on a date when the wartime measures were to go out of existence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was not that proclamation issued in 1944?

Mr. COLDWELL: In 1943, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The war was on, so that we were co-belligerents then.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is my point. We were referred to then as being co-belligerents because we were then co-belligerents. We are co-belligerents no longer and therefore I wonder if it applies now. I still think this bill should go before the external affairs committee before its second reading, before this house assents to the principle of a bill about which there has been considerable discussion in the house, and no doubt will be considerable discussion across the country. I suggest that, in spite of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said about the bill being killed if it goes to a committee, it will not be killed any more than the railway pensions bill of my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre will be killed when it goes before the appropriate committee, where it can be considered, revised, redrafted or returned to this house with a recommendation, if the committee so desire, for concurrence in the measure.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I want to take just a moment to correct a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon with reference to the statement which he attributed in yesterday's debate to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who is not in his place this afternoon. The interpretation put upon that statement by the minister in his remarks this afternoon was that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was saying that we should refuse to tolerate the idea that war is possible. I would ask the minister to refer to Hansard, page 3831, where he will see that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said something quite different. His words were these:

> . . . we should refuse to tolerate the idea that war is coming and accept it as a kind of inevitability.

What he was objecting to was our resigning ourselves to treating the coming of war as inevitable, and I say that the minister in what he said this afternoon, in reply to the purported statement of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, was simply building up and knocking down a straw man of his own making.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have your indulgence and the indulgence of the house to answer a question that I intended to answer, put by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). Last night he referred to certain maps that appear to be printed in the Russian language. One of them is in the Russian language, and the other in the language of Czechoslovakia. They are the official maps annexed by the council of foreign ministers to the peace treaties. They were not ready when the peace treaties were distributed to hon. members, but hon. members will have noticed that there was a pocket envelope in the binding of the treaty, and just as soon as we could get the maps they were mailed to those to whom the treaties had been distributed. So far we have been able to get only those two. As to the peace treaty with Italy, there were twenty-one or twenty-two maps selected by the council of foreign ministers. The hon. member asked why these two maps were not printed in English. I do not know. I was not present at the council of foreign ministers. The map selected by them for Finland was printed in the Russian language, and the map selected by them to describe the boundaries of Roumania was printed in the Czechoslovakian language. That is the explanation.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Probe), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I have a word of explanation to give the house. I voted against the amendment to refer the bill to the committee on external affairs because I believe the bill cannot be improved—

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking on second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CASSELMAN: It has not been called.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not yet before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I have the right to speak on second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for second reading is not actually before the house; so there is nothing before the house.

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: I was paired with the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

(Text):

Mr. HERRIDGE: I was paired with the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cournoyer). Had I voted, I would have voted to refer the bill to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Question.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, before second reading is passed, I have a few observations I should like to make. The suggestion was made that the bill be referred to the committee on external affairs. That is a respectable view, but I do not believe the bill is a good one or that it serves a useful purpose, so that it seems to me it could not be improved before a committee. Therefore I voted against the amendment.

My suggestion is that, instead of a bill of this kind, we should send to the United States on the occasion of the visit of the President of the United States an invitation to join our empire with the status of a dominion.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs give us the assurance that the bill will be sent to the committee on external affairs?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, in that regard I am in the hands of the members of the house. I stated that the government has no objection to the bill going to the committee on external affairs, and if it is the desire of hon. members that that course be pursued, the government is quite prepared to acquiesce.

If, on the other hand, hon. members would prefer to have the bill dealt with in committee of the whole, here, that would be also equally acceptable to the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: That depends upon the motion the minister will make after second reading has been taken. He can send it either to committee of the whole, or to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Question.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I voted against the amendment, my reason being that, in my opinion, the committee has done very little work. I spoke in the debate on the amendment, and for that reason I shall speak for only a moment or two on this motion for second reading.

During the last war United States soldiers used to be stationed in thousands at Fort Niagara, New York state, and many of them visited my city over week-ends. The people of Toronto seemed to be glad to see them. That was followed to the end of the last war.

I believe what has been said in the debate indicates the necessity of our having an empire conference. We know that three nations are interested in the Pacific—New Zealand, Australia and Canada. An empire conference of that kind should be called at once on trade, defence and migration, and this matter could be discussed at that conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, on division.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, carrying out what I said I will move that the bill be referred to the committee on external affairs, so that Your Honour may call for the yeas and nays, and we will not regard it as a defeat of the government if, in your opinion, upon calling for the yeas and nays, Your Honour declares that either has it.

I think it is only proper to leave it to the house to dispose of the bill either here or in committee, as may appear to be the desire of the house. For that purpose I move:

That this bill be now referred to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. St. Laurent, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that this bill be referred to the standing committee on external affairs. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it, and the motion is lost.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move therefore:

That Your Honour do leave the chair, and that the bill be referred to committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to get some information on the matter about which I asked a question a few minutes ago. How does it come about that this has been proposed in the way it has been? We are members of the British empire. We have a defence agreement with the dominions and signed with the mother country. As I said before, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. It seems to me that during the past few years we have stopped all conferences on peace and war between the dominions and the mother country, and that these empire conferences have been ignored by the present government. It has always been the custom, since these conferences were held, to discuss these matters; and it was never more important than at the present time, in these troubled days, that we should have a common empire policy for the dominion and the empire. Two years ago yesterday, or about that time, we had the close of the war with Germany. Britain, and the dominions then stood at the highest point at which they have ever stood in the history of the world and civilization.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The first section just deals with the short title.

Mr. CHURCH: To deal with this particular section, I cannot understand why this proposed bill was not made the subject of a conference with the other dominions. Canada is part of the British empire and we are not going to be talked out of the British empire; we shall have to be fought out of it. That is the truth. I would go as far as any person in this house in supporting that great nation, the United States, which has done so much in coming to the relief of the world and saving civilization. As I said, I see no objection to a reasonable number of them coming into Canada as they did before in the last war when they came in voluntarily, not by any act of parliament. As a matter of public policy, this bill has an important effect, in the present state of affairs, on Russia, our ally in the last war. They will take it that we shall be wrapped up with the United States in a military sense. It will have a serious effect on federal affairs. I regret that we have not in the city of Toronto three morning papers that used to give what happens here. If you read one of them this morning you will see how the people are blindfolded and not given the facts of the real debate that took place on this bill. Just read the verbatim report of what happened yesterday and read the report in the Globe and Mail of this morning. We want to see the fullest information regarding this matter given to the people. As I see it, I believe we should have had this empire conference and the matter should have been gone into accordingly. With the troubled state of the world today and with Russia acting as she is, I believe that the united effort with the United States is the most important thing we have, and that we should plainly tell our former ally, Russia, what we think about her. As the late President Roosevelt said, if we do not tell her plainly, there will be another war, and it will be a war of survival. I think we ought to make it plain, because that is the only way whereby the western democracies can avert the threat of war. We can go about it in this way, but it does not mean very much. This whole matter by this bill has been made a major issue—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that we are not now dealing with the principle of the bill. We have had a long discussion on the principle of the bill, and when we go into committee we are not dealing with the principle. We are dealing only with the sections. Section 1 is the short title. I just wanted to say that because we do not want to go over again discussion on the principle of the bill. We shall not get anywhere by doing that, as far as making progress is concerned.

Mr. CHURCH: What you say is absolutely correct, Mr. Chairman. I think the minister would be well advised to go about this in some other way than by making it an act of parliament. It has never been done in that way before. I referred to what was done in the last war. There is a large body of public opinion which has been aroused in connection with this matter of peace and war, and a probable war of survival. As I mentioned a moment ago, the western democracies must stand together in peace and war alike. I am sorry that the matter has been brought up in this manner, because I think it will have a serious effect on public opinion and create an alarming state of affairs. It may not mean much as a bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: The title of the act, according to section 1, is to be "The Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act". Has either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence any more specific information than they have given to us previously with regard to the friendly foreign forces act of the United States? In view of the fact that the presidential proclamation referred to the United Kingdom and Canada as co-belligerents, I should like to know whether we are still covered by that act in the United States? The other night the Minister of National Defence, on rather short notice, was endeavouring to answer a number of questions. A number of times he said that he was informed of this or informed of that, which left some of us in considerable doubt as to the exact situation with respect to that act in the United States at the present time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I reply to one part of the question and leave to my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, the reply to the other part? When we were considering the order in council that was last passed under the War Measures Act to give jurisdiction to the service courts of the United States forces present here, it was shown to our satisfaction by the experts of the Department of State that there was nothing required in the form of legislation to authorize our officers in the United States to exercise jurisdiction over their men; that all that was required was provision to give them assistance; that their act was not for the purpose of allowing our service courts to exercise jurisdiction; that they had that by virtue of the constitution of the United States and by virtue of their recognition of the law of nations as applied in decisions of their supreme court. We said, "That is all very well, but we have no way of compelling the attendance of witnesses, or things of that kind, before our service courts." They agreed it would be necessary to have legislation in order to impose obligations upon United States citizens to help us carry out the jurisdiction we have under the law of nations. To that extent they agreed to proceed by legislation to give us the right to get assistance of United States citizens to carry out the jurisdiction we had by virtue of the law of nations. With respect to the other portion of the question, I think my colleague can answer it.

Mr. GREEN: That arrangement, I understand, was made during the war?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What we want to know is whether that has any effect now that we are at peace; and, if so, where is the provision that puts it into effect?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We were told that was in effect at all times, as a consequence of the construction by the supreme court of the United States of the law of nations.

Mr. GREEN: But apparently not the provision for calling witnesses.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not the provision for imposing duties upon their citizens. Their explanation to us was that, under the law of nations, when they admitted members of the armed forces of a foreign sovereign they admitted that that foreign sovereign could exercise over them in United States territory the powers he could exercise in his own territory; that it did not have to be provided for by statute; that it was covered by a decision going back to Chief Justice Marshall of the United States supreme court, but that it was necessary for them to have some statute to make it a duty for United States citizens to lend us aid in carrying out the kind of jurisdiction we had. The statute they passed was for the purpose of making it the duty of United States citizens to give us the practical aid necessary to carry out our jurisdiction. My colleague the Minister of National Defence will say to what extent that statute is still operative.

Mr. CLAXTON: The statute to which reference is made was that cited by me the night before last. It is public law 384 of the 78th congress, being chapter 326 of the second session of 1944. Under it, the President of the United States is authorized to make the statute applicable to any friendly foreign force, and by the proclamation to which I referred the other night he made it applicable to the United States and Canada. That proclamation was dated October 11, 1944. The act does not limit his power to a power to be exercised only during the duration of the war, and it does not limit the friendly foreign forces in respect of which it may be exercised to the foreign forces of a co-belligerent. When the word "co-belligerent" is used in the preamble it is used merely to describe the United Kingdom and Canada. Certainly my view is that even if the war ends legally, as no doubt it will at some future date, the fact that this word "co-belligerent" appears in the preamble would not cause the proclamation to cease to have effect, but that the law would continue to apply to forces of the United Kingdom and Canada until the contrary was proclaimed by the President.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say, first of all, that I find it difficult to follow the logic of the Minister of National Defence in saying that the preamble has no effect. According to the wording he gave us the other night, it reads:

> Whereas there are within the United States military, naval or air forces of the United States and Canada, co-belligerents . . . Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt . . .

And so on. It seems to me that the proclamation itself is contingent upon the conditions set out in the preamble, one of which is that the United Kingdom and Canada are co-belligerents with the United States. This is one of the reasons I think this bill should have gone to the committee, so that we could get this matter clear. I am still not satisfied that the provisions of this more or less ancillary act—I recognize that it is an act to implement the jurisdiction of service courts—still apply and will continue to apply in the United States after the war is over in the same way that our bill, No. 253, will apply, whether or not we are co-belligerents.

There is one other question I should like to ask, and it is this. Are other nations apart from the United Kingdom and Canada, though not entitled to the benefits of this act to implement the jurisdiction of service courts, accorded by the United States the privileges the minister has said are covered by the law of nations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In 1943 we were told, and our legal experts were convinced, that that was the case; that under the decision of the supreme court of the United States, whenever with the consent of the administration of the United States forces of a foreign power were present within the territory of the United States, their sovereign could exercise over them the powers he could exercise under his own laws; that it was not something dependent upon a proclamation or anything else, but was in consequence of a decision of Chief Justice Marshall that had been recognized by all legal authorities as the common law of the United States.

Mr. GREEN: Then are we to understand that the contention made by the government that there is a reciprocal arrangement in the United States amounts to this; that by the United States interpretation of international law any visiting friendly troops are subject to the jurisdiction of their own officers, but that it is impossible really to carry out that jurisdiction in full without some ancillary law giving power to call United States citizens as witnesses and, I presume, other rights; and that then, during the war, the United States passed an act to enable them to give visiting forces such ancillary rights. I have had some difficulty this afternoon in getting from the library the law and the proclamation, I presume because the Minister of National Defence has them. I should like very much to see them, if he still has them—

Mr. CLAXTON: No; this is the copy of the judge advocate general.

Mr. GREEN: —because the other night the minister did not read the whole proclamation. He read only one of the recitals, which was as follows:

Whereas there are—

I would point that out to the minister as meaning then, at the time the proclamation was passed, which was in 1944.

Whereas there are within the United States military, naval or air forces of the United Kingdom and Canada, co-belligerents.

The whole basis of the proclamation is the fact that then, during the war, there were in the United States co-belligerents. All we have today to prove that there is a reciprocal arrangement is the interpretation placed upon that proclamation by the Minister of National Defence. He may be interpreting the United States law correctly, or he may not; but I submit that point should be cleared up and the government should know exactly the rights of Canadian forces in the United States now, during peace time. I suggest that it is not sufficient for the Minister of National Defence to produce a wartime proclamation, which obviously refers only to co-belligerents, and say, because there is such a proclamation, therefore we have reciprocal rights in the United States. This is an important feature in the whole consideration, because I am sure the Canadian people will insist, and rightly so, that their troops be given exactly the same rights in the United States that United States troops are to have in Canada. Certainly the government has not yet made it clear that now, in peace time, Canadian forces in the United States are to have exactly the same rights as we are giving United States forces in Canada under the bill now being considered.

Mr. CLAXTON: Surely the hon. member should give members of the government and members of the armed forces dealing with this matter credit for taking the same serious view about the necessity for our having reciprocal rights.

Mr. GREEN: It is not a matter of giving any one credit; it is just a matter of finding out the facts.

Mr. CLAXTON: The facts are as I have stated. The statement is there, and it is perfectly clear that it is not a statute which is in force only for the duration of the war. It is not limited in its application to co-belligerents; it is a general statute giving the President power, and the President exercised that power in 1944 in general and unrestricted terms. Since then, the statute and the authority have been used. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has some reputation as a lawyer, assures me that there is no doubt whatever on this point, that there is no room for questioning it.

Mr. GREEN: He has not said so.

Mr. CLAXTON: Further, my hon. friend must realize that this legislation would not be sought unless it was found desirable in the interests of both countries. In the course of preparing it we secured full information on the state of the United States law as well as full particulars from the representatives of the United States government, and they were directly along the lines I have indicated. There is no room for doubt on this. Certainly if it ever turns out that the way in which the law is interpreted or applied prevents us from having in the United States exactly the same reciprocal treatment as we give to United States troops in Canada, then we would soon terminate that situation unless that condition was rectified.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member had not before him the terms of the statute. The terms of the statute are that if the President finds that the application of the act to the forces of a foreign power is necessary for the maintenance of discipline he may so declare, and the President may at any time revoke such finding and declaration. He has so declared in formal terms and it has not been revoked. We were told that it is fully operative and we believe that it is fully operative and that nothing further is required. I know from my participation in the negotiations that if anything further were felt to be required it would be forthcoming at once.

Mr. PROBE: Is the minister or the government perfectly satisfied that there is such a reciprocal arrangement at the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Unqualifiedly, yes.

Mr. PROBE: By this bill we are proposing to give the United States military authorities certain privileges with respect to the exercise of discipline over such troops as they may have in Canada. I propose to ask the minister a question which he may or may not care to answer. I believe that it should be asked and that some definite statement should be made with respect to it. This committee should be informed as to how many United States troops are in this country at the present time. We should know what they are doing in Canada and what their disposition is, that is to say, in what parts of the country they are at the present time. I say that because the government saw fit to oppose the consideration of this bill by the committee on external affairs which could have had sittings in camera or elsewhere as necessary, and where we could have had the fullest questioning of the chief of staff. Would the minister comment on those three questions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it is quite fair of the hon. member to say that the government opposed referring the bill to the committee on external affairs. The government had no feeling at all in the matter; it simply took the sentiment of the house upon that question.

Mr. PROBE: You guided it somewhat.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PROBE: I am sorry; I withdraw that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As a matter of fact, what took place appears on the record, and I trust the hon. member will realize that I was only seeking to get in good faith an expression of opinion as to whether the house wanted the bill considered here or in committee. With respect to the other questions, there is a certain group—I can mention this because it has been commented upon and the public here and everywhere know about it—of United States soldiers who are at Churchill engaged with ours in the testing of material under winter conditions. They are less numerous than our own personnel. It is by design and arrangement that they are kept less numerous than our own. That is the way in which the policy is being carried out.

There are a few others at other places, but I would not feel at liberty to disclose that information without conferring with the chief of staff and ascertaining whether it would be proper to do so. The hon. member may be assured that the most important thing that has been done so far is this Churchill exercise. There the situation is that they are less numerous than our own and that is by arrangement. That stipulation was made and it has been observed. That is the policy. All told, there are very few and nothing which could in any way be regarded as a departure from the joint statement made on February 12, 1947.

Mr. PROBE: I have before me the statement made by the Prime Minister on February 12, 1947, and I should like to quote from page 347 of Hansard as follows:

> As the government views it, our primary objective should be to expand our knowledge of the north and of the conditions necessary for life and work there with the object of developing its resources.
> Canada's northern programme is thus primarily a civilian one to which contributions are made by the armed forces.

A statement such as that is absolutely innocuous with respect to military intentions or with respect to making neighbours in this world of ours suspicious as to our intent. However, when we combine it with the fact that a moment ago the minister referred to the term "co-belligerents", which appears also in the preamble to the United States bill which was quoted and with the fact that he would not give information to this committee without consulting the chief of the Canadian staff, it seems to me that there is an unnecessary amount of hush, hush, about this thing if the Prime Minister's words of February 12 are still valid.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is once more discussing the principle of this bill. The principle was decided upon after a long discussion, and what we are dealing with now is section 1 which reads:

> This act may be cited as the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act.

If there is any objection to that title it would be in order to advance it, but if there is no objection the title should be carried and we could then pass on to other sections which deal with this situation. Hon. members should bring up their points under the different clauses where it would be in order for them to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Might I ask the minister to clear up two points? The first has to do with the control of the activities of the United States troops who are in Canada. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said something about that when he was closing the debate. I point out to him that the Prime Minister's statement with regard to the training of British pilots read as follows—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Would the hon. member bring that point up under some other clause where it would be proper to do so? I do not want to call one hon. member to order and then permit another hon. member to carry on the same kind of discussion on this clause.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it will not be proper to bring it up under any clause. This is not a bill to declare that the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister in 1938 was the proper policy. This is a bill to provide for the future, and I do not think there is in this bill any clause where it would be proper to have a political discussion as to whether what took place in 1938 should have taken place then or not.

Mr. GREEN: May I speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Just a moment, if you please. I want to present this to the committee as fairly as I can, and I think the committee will agree with me when I make this presentation. On the second reading of the bill, all the debate that can take place on the principle of the bill should take place then. But once the house has decided the principle of the bill and has sent the bill to a committee of the house, the principle is not to be discussed in the committee at all. The committee deals simply with the clauses, and the rule is clear that remarks in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. I do not think that, under the rules, we can now start a discussion of the principle of the bill. That has already been decided, whether for good or bad. The clause before us is a very simple one dealing with the title, whether the title is right or wrong, and nothing else. If there is no objection to the title we should carry the clause. I am sure that hon. members will appreciate the position which the Chair must take and that we shall make better progress by abiding by the rule.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I was not proposing to discuss the principle of the bill at all. I am asking certain questions having to do with the terms of the bill. I would point out that for many years it has been the practice in this house to allow wide latitude for questions on the first clause of a bill. I have no objection to asking my questions under other clauses, but I certainly do not want to be taken as admitting that, in considering clause 1, we must be confined to discussing only the actual wording of the title. That is not the rule which binds this house.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: During the war, considerable latitude was allowed on the first clause of bills, but there is no rule which allows a general discussion on the first clause of a bill. If there is anything in the rules which permits a discussion of the principle or a general discussion of the bill on the first clause I should appreciate it if my hon. friend would tell me what that rule is. I want to be absolutely fair while I am in this Chair.

Mr. GREEN: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I have been here since 1936, and that was long before the war. The rule was followed then of allowing questions on the first clause of the bill, and there was never any suggestion that I have heard by any chairman that the rule applied only during the war. That is a new use to be made of the war. However, I am quite willing to ask my questions on other clauses of the bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I want to be fair with my hon. friend and fair with everybody. Will he be kind enough to refer me to the rule which permits a general discussion on the first clause of a bill?

Mr. GREEN: It is not my duty to teach the Chairman the rules.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: Under section 2 (e) there is this provision:

> "United States force" means any body, contingent or detachment of the military, naval or air forces of the United States of America that with the consent of the government of Canada, is lawfully present in Canada or on board any of His Majesty's Canadian ships or aircraft.

To deal particularly with the words "with the consent of the government of Canada," it seems clear from the explanations given thus far that, in practice, consent is given in this way, that the general staff decide what troops are invited to come to Canada, although the Prime Minister did say that the decisions of the department are reported by the minister. He was very indefinite about it. He more or less left the suggestion that the cabinet would hear about it.

I submit to the committee that this question of the giving of consent to foreign troops to come to Canada is a matter about which there should be no uncertainty. We should have legislation providing for the way in which consent is to be given and under what conditions it is to be given. It is entirely too slipshod to leave it to the general staff. In my own opinion, it should not even be left to the cabinet without parliamentary sanction. There should be broad-based legislation by parliament for the giving of this consent, and I urge upon the government most strongly that they give consideration to bringing in legislation defining under just what conditions consent is to be given and how it is to be given. I think the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament are entitled to have some such provision written into our laws. There can be no objection to that from friendly foreign countries, and we would then know exactly where we were going and what to expect. I realize, of course, that this is a new situation but there will always be new situations cropping up that have to be met by legislation. This is, I think, a typical example of a problem that has arisen which should be met by some definite legislation. I would ask for the views of the ministers concerned with regard to that suggestion. It involves, of course, both ministers, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, and I should like to have their reaction to this suggestion. It is made in good faith, without any attempt at making political capital. I think the subject is a serious one and one which should be dealt with by legislation.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Vancouver South no doubt in good faith referred to the terms on which United States officers or men may come to Canada as described by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs earlier today in a way which I think Hansard will not support. The situation was fairly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Prime Minister. The situation is not as the hon. member for Vancouver South would have us believe. The general staff has full control over who will be invited and who will not. The situation is as described by the Prime Minister; that is, the policy is decided upon by the cabinet on a report from the Minister of National Defence or the defence committee of the cabinet. Then that policy is implemented within the power delegated to him by the appropriate minister and the appropriate military authority.

The major project on which there are Canadian officers and men associated with United States officers and men, and vice versa, working together in Canada is the project to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just referred, namely the testing establishment at Churchill. That was specifically authorized by the cabinet, and the various changes in the possible size of the forces that might be there—and they are very small, as the minister has said—have come before the cabinet. But the cabinet does not say, we shall have three captains and two lieutenants and their name shall be John Brown, et cetera. That kind of arrangement and the carrying out of details, are done by the appropriate military officers. I can tell the committee that in the case of every other project so far undertaken in cooperation with the United States, either in the United States or in Canada, there has been full cabinet approval in advance. Then, when that approval has been given it is for the appropriate military, naval or air authorities, within the terms delegated to them, to carry them out. It could not work in any other way.

Mr. CHURCH: Paragraph (e) says:

> "United States force" means any body, contingent or detachment of the military, naval or air forces of the United States of America that, with the consent of the government of Canada, is lawfully present in Canada or on board any of His Majesty's Canadian ships or aircraft.

To my knowledge, we have had that on the great lakes since 1925. We recently had a great disaster on the upper lakes where a large number of sailors lost their lives. We have had these disasters take place in the chairman's constituency, and others in the constituencies of the maritimes. It has happened on lake Huron, the Georgian bay and on lake Superior. What happened in the recent disaster? Our sailors had to wait until a United States life-saving coast guard cutter came along and picked them up. That is Canadian nationality. Our brave sailors on the great lakes had no chance of having their lives saved except by a United States life-saving station.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the kind of cooperation we hope to see between the Dominion of Canada and other nations. Canadian airmen, Canadian soldiers and Canadian seamen have helped United States citizens when the circumstances were reversed.

Mr. CHURCH: I have the facts and evidence of the inquiries which took place, and it is exactly what I have stated. Look up the facts in the last disaster.

Mr. PROBE: The Minister of National Defence has assured us that the government carefully delineates our policy with respect to the activities of foreign troops in this country, and that then the details are worked out by the appropriate staff officers and military personnel. With government control of policy, there should be no quarrel. We wish to avoid the unfortunate experience of many countries in the past where military cliques secured control, first of all, of the activities of a defensive nature and from there expanding into the political and economic field. Because of that, it seems to me that in peace time the minister, whether of external affairs or of national defence, and the government have a responsibility to the people of Canada whereby, not just the government, but others should be kept informed as to the exact picture with respect to military activities in the country.

I do not want the information for myself as a citizen, but I want it for responsible citizens of various cross-sections of public opinion so that there is not a possibility of an autocratic group, a super clique gaining control under any circumstances. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not said very much with respect to our agreement with the united nations, it would seem to me that, as well as keeping us informed in Canada, to allay international suspicions and feelings, we should be told to what extent the operations that we undertake here in a military way are the subject of consent by or information to the united nations. Perhaps I should put the question in this way: Are all the activities of the Department of National Defence in Canada entirely within the permissive features of the charter of the united nations?

Mr. CLAXTON: Absolutely.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: An unqualified affirmative answer can be given.

Mr. PROBE: We are skirting around the problems. I can understand that the minister desires not to broadcast to the world everything he has in his pocket. That is quite proper, but others may feel—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am very glad to put on the record an unqualified affirmative answer to the question as to whether everything we are doing is within both the letter and the spirit of the charter of the united nations. It is.

Mr. PROBE: If the minister can give one further assurance I shall be quite prepared to let the thing go. To what extent is it possible to inform others who may have political views just a little different from those of the minister? Can we not have a committee of this house kept informed of these matters to the extent that it would be proper to do so? It seems to me that everything we do in this country that involves the welfare of Canadian people should be either open and aboveboard to the view of all concerned, or at least that an opportunity should be given to people of views other than those of the views of the government to concur or object.

Mr. CLAXTON: I know of no country which gives more information than Canada does; so much so that I think we go too far in that respect.

Mr. PROBE: We have not had much, then.

Mr. CLAXTON: What is more, I can say that we shall be prepared to give all information with regard to military matters to other countries, provided that it is done under adequate safeguards to ensure complete reciprocity. There are some matters with respect to which hon. members and others would not wish us to go that far.

[Mr. Probe.]

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Discipline and internal administration of United States force.

Mr. GREEN: This is the section which gives the power to the United States service courts. I would point out that the side-note reads:

Discipline and internal administration of United States force.

But there is no such restriction in the section itself. Section 3 of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933, contains these words:

. . . to exercise within Canada in relation to members of such force in matters concerning discipline and in matters concerning the internal administration of such force, all such powers as are conferred upon them by the law of that part of the commonwealth.

Why is that provision not also included in the present bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the original draft bill, that proviso was mentioned. It was discussed with the representatives of our good friends, and they said that it was meaningless in fact and might be embarrassing. They said, "All we want to exercise is such powers as are given us by our law and over members of our forces; and it has to do, we think, with discipline and administration. But we do not want to have questions arise about it." We said, "What we mean is that we want to have it left to our courts if anyone says he is not a member of your forces and subject to your laws. We want him to have recourse to our courts so as to determine that question. And if he is a member of your force—then, all right; we do not concern ourselves as to what you can do to him under your laws."

Mr. GREEN: It really gives the United States commander much wider powers than would be given an Australian commander, does it not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I think not. But they say, "We do not want to have to establish that what rights are given by United States law to United States commanders are comprised within the description of discipline and administration."

Mr. GREEN: Then is not the side-note wrong?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The side-note might have been changed. All we were asked was to take these words out of the section as being something which might give rise to an attempt to restrain its application. We said, "What we are concerned about is that we want to be sure that you are not going to apply any of your laws to anyone who, according to the decisions of our courts, would not be amenable to your laws."

Mr. GREEN: Then I should like to know also in what manner there is Canadian control over United States troops. That, I think, comes under this section. It was for the purpose of asking this question that I quoted from the Prime Minister's statemnt of July 1, 1938, which upset the Secretary of State for External Affairs so much only a few minutes ago. The Prime Minister then said that British pilots coming to Canada would train in our own establishments, controlled by our own Minister of National Defence, who is responsible to this parliament. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said this afternoon that United States troops coming here would really come only for training.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I explained that if training were to cover everything covered in the statement, that would be right. But what is covered in the statement is described in language which may not be mere training; it is not the word "training" which is used. It may be covered by what the hon. member has in mind when he uses the word "training". But this testing of materials is not really the training of individuals. I would understand that "training" would be something to increase the military skill or prowess of the individual so trained. But that is not what is being done.

Mr. GREEN: In my questions this afternoon I distinguished between "training" and "establishing posts". I asked the minister whether the Americans would be establishing posts here, and I understood him to say—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not under the present arrangement.

Mr. GREEN: —that what they were going to do would come rather under the heading of "training."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: That, of course, brings them under the Prime Minister's statement of July 1, 1938, which was that British pilots would have to train under our own establishments, controlled by our own Minister of National Defence. I understand, further, that the arrangements with the Americans are to be similar. Is that so?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: If so, in what manner is the Department of National Defence to control these United States forces?

Mr. CLAXTON: In exactly the same way as control is exercised in respect of Canadian forces. That is not through power of command; that comes down through another chain, but through the direction regarding the operation of any testing establishment, or things of such nature as may be set up. All those will be Canadian.

First of all, the man in charge will be a Canadian, under this arrangement as announced by the Prime Minister on February 12. The man in charge of each establishment will be Canadian. Instructions given to him will be given pursuant to policy which I as Minister of National Defence, interpret from the cabinet to the military authorities.

Mr. GREEN: How are we to work out these provisions whereby they shall be trained in our own establishments?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are our establishments. They are establishments under our flag. The man at the head of the establishment, and responsible to us for everything that occurs in the establishment, is a Canadian officer.

Mr. GREEN: I think it is really a question of a technical nature which the Minister of National Defence should answer, the question as to how they are being trained in our establishments.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not see the hon. member's difficulty at all.

Mr. GREEN: Obviously the intention in 1938 was that they would come into Canadian establishments. Is that the intention with regard to the United States troops; and, if so, how is that to be done?

Mr. CLAXTON: In exactly the same way as if they were Canadian troops coming in for the purpose, of course, that is the intention.

Mr. PROBE: Section 3 states, in part, that the service courts and service authorities of the United States of America may exercise within Canada or on board any such ship or aircraft in relation to members of that force all such powers as are conferred upon them by the law of the United States of America. It seems to me that that provision has elements of uncertainty in it, owing to the fact that at the present time the law of the United States with respect to service courts and service personnel may be sufficiently similar to our own that, under certain conditions, the Minister of National Defence is prepared to accept it. Supposing, however, that we pass this section and that, a year from now, the United States made a drastic change with respect to the powers of service courts for service personnel not envisaged at the present time.

It seems to me we have not here a safeguard to provide for the contingency of a law being passed by another foreign power which might be repugnant to ourselves. Is there any difficulty in that regard?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not see why we should be concerned, so long as we make sure that their law is applied only to members of their force, and that we do not leave it to them to say who are members of their force. If we say that no one in Canada shall be treated as a member of their force unless, if he objects, a Canadian court says, "You are a member of their force and you are subject to their law", it seems to me it is not really our concern to say, "Well, now, before you apply your law to a member of your force we would like to be satisfied that it is good law."

Mr. PROBE: Assuming there is a penalty for striking an officer and that a man is to be shot for it—and we will assume that as an extreme case—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I could not assume that as something ordered by the laws of our friends to the south.

Mr. PROBE: No, of course not. I cannot either. But we are not protecting ourselves in that regard.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like a little bit of clarification as to exactly what these powers are. I ask these questions really because I have run into quite a bit of discussion around the corridors and in private conversation with members who were far from clear as to the exact meaning of this section and the next one. Perhaps the thing could be made clearer by example than in any other way. As I understand the matter, if a United States soldier goes absent without leave or deserts, in that case discipline is entirely in the hands of the United States army officer under whose command that man comes. We will say that the United States soldier is alleged to have murdered a Canadian citizen. In that case who has jurisdiction? In other words, where is the United States soldier to be tried? Is he to be tried in his own United States court or in one of our civil courts?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under this law, it would be possible for him to be tried under his own military court, but that would not exclude the jurisdiction of our courts. Even if he were tried and acquitted under the United States military court, he could still be tried, sentenced and the sentence carried out under the jurisdiction of our courts. This does not exclude in any way the operation of our courts; and in an offence as serious as suggested by the hon. member, there is no doubt that the man would be tried in our courts.

Mr. HARKNESS: Would the same rule apply to an American who was accused of theft from a Canadian citizen, we will say?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Then, if a United States soldier is involved in an automobile accident and does damage to a Canadian citizen's car and person, where is the jurisdiction?

Mr. CLAXTON: He would still be civilly and criminally liable under our laws before the Canadian courts.

Mr. HARKNESS: Suppose he is really breaking one of our highway rules. Is he to be prosecuted in our court and then subsequently be liable to a civil action by the Canadian citizen?

Mr. CLAXTON: Absolutely.

Mr. HARKNESS: Or is he to be dealt with in the United States court as far as the highway violation is concerned?

Mr. CLAXTON: No. The Canadian courts would have jurisdiction.

Mr. HARKNESS: In that case, it would be entire jurisdiction, would it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If they choose to exercise it.

Mr. CLAXTON: If the Canadian courts choose to exercise it, they would have jurisdiction. But that would not prevent the United States service court from, in addition, exercising its jurisdiction if a military offence under military law had also been committed during the same set of circumstances.

Mr. HARKNESS: Take the case of a crime which is entirely within one United States detachment. Suppose one United States soldier murders another one. Is that something that will be left entirely to the United States army court to deal with, or would our courts step into the picture?

Mr. CLAXTON: Nothing takes away the jurisdiction of our courts.

Mr. HARKNESS: The presumption is that the case of this man would be left entirely in the hands of the United States military authorities.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would doubt that. That would be a matter for the Minister of Justice at the time or the attorney general of the province to decide. He would have jurisdiction to say what should happen there. I would doubt if the attorney general of the province would leave it to the United States court.

Mr. HARKNESS: In that case it really comes down to the initiative or action of the attorney general of the province. He is free at any time, in any case, to step in if a Canadian law has been broken.

Mr. CLAXTON: The untrammelled jurisdiction of the Canadian courts is not in any way affected by this.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Jurisdiction of civil courts in Canada not affected.

Mr. JAENICKE: I just wish to follow up what was being discussed a moment ago. Suppose an American commits an offence against the criminal code. Let us say it is a small offence, that he is arrested by his own detachment or by his own officers and tried. Could we then demand the custody of that person in order to try him in our own courts?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The jurisdiction of our courts has not been interfered with. It was explained to the United States authorities that, except under war conditions, the administration of justice was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, that we could give their service courts concurrent jurisdiction, but that we did not propose to interfere with the rights to exercise and discharge their responsibility which are held by those who had the responsibility for ordinary administration of justice.

Mr. JAENICKE: That is to say, if the soldier had been detained and tried by a United States service court, and then we wished to take action, we could go and demand to arrest that person?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. JAENICKE: Is there correspondence to that effect between the department and the United States authorities? Is there an understanding in correspondence between the authorities of the United States and ourselves that this can be done?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The correspondence we have had with them is to this effect: "Here, there are not going to be very many of you here; we do not think you are going to get into trouble very often, but when any of your people do get into trouble we think you will probably treat them in a manner that will satisfy the public opinion of the locality that adequate measures of restraint have been taken. But we will not abandon any jurisdiction of our own courts, and you must expect that if what you do makes the people where the offence takes place feel that our courts should deal with the matter, they will deal with it."

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes, I understand that. I was just referring to the question of actual arrest, as to whether or not we are prevented from doing that if he is lawfully detained by the service court of the United States. I was referring to the actual arrest itself.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not want to pronounce judgment on anything of that kind, but I think the hon. member will agree with me that, without an act, nothing the United States authorities would do would constitute lawful detention.

Mr. JAENICKE: Oh, yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. Nothing they would do, unless they have authority from the Canadian law to do it, would constitute lawful detention. Here we give them authority, but we say, "Nothing in the authority we give you is going to interfere with the rights of our own people to administer Canadian justice." I think that is as clear as I can make it.

Mr. HARKNESS: It seems to me that we may be running into a legal difficulty here as far as our own service courts are concerned. Any civil—and I use "civil" as opposed to "military"—offence comes under the civil court if there is a competent court of civil jurisdiction in the area. Apparently all our own troops would be tried in civil courts; all troops that were visiting here from Great Britain, Australia, India or anywhere else in the British empire would be tried in our civil courts; but United States troops would be tried in their own courts for what are really civil offences such as theft, murder and so forth. That may result in this situation. A man may be tried in a United States court and perhaps acquitted. But the attorney general of the province lays a charge against him. He is brought up in a civil court. Under our law, as I have always understood it, and particularly as far as the military end of things is concerned in the army act, that man having been tried and acquitted in the United States court, cannot be tried again under our law. In other words, he cannot be tried the second time. I would think we are likely to run into difficulties in that way. What would be the situation? What is the answer to that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 4 declares that nothing they are authorized to do will interfere with the ordinary administration by our courts and our officials of our laws, for offences against our laws. We have declared, however, that if we deal with them under our laws for offences against our laws and acquit them, that acquittal will prevail in their service courts; but the reverse is not true.

Mr. HARKNESS: That comes into conflict, though, with the general principle in our law that a man may be tried only once for an offence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Do you think it is a good thing to have that exception to the general rule under our law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it is. I believe it is necessary for us in Canada to say, "No matter what you do, if one of your people commits an offence against Canadian law, Canadian authorities must have it within their power, if they see fit to do so, to deal with it as they would deal with a Canadian resident." That is particularly true in our country where the administration of justice is the responsibility of the provinces. During the war we could say, "Well, because of the emergency we can override some provisions of provincial jurisdiction"; but during normal times we do not want to attempt to do that. During normal times we think the attorney general of a province, who is responsible to his people for the administration of law and order in that province, should not be restricted by any arrangement we make with the Americans in respect of their forces. So we say to them, "If having done that, we acquit one of your men, you must not try to prosecute him again. But if you acquit a man before we deal with him, in one of your service courts, of course that is no business of ours. We have to deal with him just as if nothing had been done".

Mr. PROBE: It seems to me that a great many of the complexities and jurisdictional disputes which conceivably could take place under this legislation could have been avoided. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that these United States troops are few in number and are doing simple business such as the testing of materials, and so on. I believe United States civilians could have come here to perform those duties, without having to wear United States uniforms. They could have carried out those scientific experiments, which apparently is what they are, and as civilians would have been amenable to all Canadian laws without any of these difficulties. What was wrong with that? Or why was not the general practice adopted in the treatment of troops in another country in peace time, under which practice they were first tried in civil courts and then taken to the border and turned over, as extradited criminals might be, to be dealt with by their own governments in their own lands and punished by whatever procedure might be considered fit? Why could that not be done in peace time? That is what is done with a criminal who commits offences in two countries. He is punished first in one place and then turned over to the authorities in the other country. Why could there not be a similar arrangement here?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. PROBE: No, I want an answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then, Mr. Chairman, will you please report progress, because the Minister of National Revenue wants to ask leave to introduce some bills.

Progress reported.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 269, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose just before six o'clock we were considering section 4? Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Legality of sentence, constitution of court and proceedings.

Mr. JAENICKE: I presume that this section is to cover the case of a United States soldier who has been found guilty by his own service court and is being held in detention and there would be no writ of habeas corpus in our courts. I can envision the case of a United States soldier who may be found guilty of a breach of a regulation which would not constitute a crime in Canada, and then escapes. Under our criminal code anyone who has been sentenced by a court of competent jurisdiction and who is at large in Canada while under term of imprisonment, commits a criminal offence. If a soldier escapes like that would we be bound to help to arrest him where the crime committed is not a crime recognized in Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member will find the answer to his question in section 7 which reads:

> 7. For the purpose of enabling the service courts and service authorities of the United States of America to exercise more effectively the powers conferred upon them by this act, the Minister of National Defence, if so requested by the officer commanding a United States force or by the government of the United States of America, may from time to time by general or special orders to any home force direct the members thereof to arrest members of the United States force alleged to have been guilty of offences against the law of the United States of America and to hand over any person so arrested to the appropriate authorities of the United States force.

I take it that that is the procedure which would be followed. If they wish to have the assistance of the Canadian authorities they would apply, either through the state department or through the United States officer, to the Canadian government or to the Minister of National Defence and he would, if he saw fit, and should, I suppose, if it were a proper case, give an order to render the assistance necessary.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Temporary detention.

Mr. PROBE: Subsection 1 of this section reads:

> Any member of a United States force, if sentenced by a service court of the United States of America to penal servitude, imprisonment or detention may, under the authority of the Minister of National Defence, given at the request of the officer commanding the United States force, be temporarily detained in custody in a detention barrack in Canada.

Will the minister state whether that will be done at the expense of Canada, or whether expenses in connection with detention will be recoverable from the United States government?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be anticipated that any expense to which Canada was put on behalf of officers of the United States forces would be reimbursed to the Canadian authorities.

Mr. PROBE: Is it contemplated that the United States will have detention barracks in this country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That matter has not been gone into and I do not think it would be practicable to express any views upon it. There are only a small number of these men here and there has been no occasion to consider whether or not they should have detention barracks of their own. I would say that there would be no insuperable objection if there were two or three hundred at a place where their military police had a room in which could be temporarily detained members of their forces who had been apprehended. So far the matter has not come up as a practical proposition.

Mr. PROBE: Is the United States government acquiring installations, buildings and so on as they did during war time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is understood that they are not to acquire any permanent property. To be quite frank, so far they have been paying us rental for barracks or huts, and there is on foot a project under which they will contribute to the erection of other barracks and pay in advance for a stated period what would be the equivalent of the rental to His Majesty in the right of Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Certain provisions of criminal code not applicable.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to ask the minister whether there is a reciprocal arrangement with the United States. When we were discussing this matter this afternoon it was contended that we have the same rights in the United States as their forces have here. Is there a similar arrangement whereby Canadian troops are exempt from similar provisions of their criminal law as United States troops are to be exempted from the sections of the criminal code set out in this section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We are told that that is so in fact. As the hon. member knows, criminal laws in the United States are state laws; they are not something that can be dealt with by the central government. We are told that the proper application of the doctrine accepted by Chief Justice Marshall would be such as to prevent the application of state laws to the parading with arms of members of the forces of a friendly power who were in the country with the consent of the central government.

Mr. PROBE: Section 9(1) provides that certain sections of the criminal code shall not apply to a member of a United States force in Canada acting in the course of his duty, and specifically section 99 of the code is referred to respecting military exercises, movements or evolutions. This provision is not quite on all fours with what the minster said earlier in the day, that the number of troops and their present duties in this country are of such a nature that they are simply testing equipment. It would, therefore, suggest itself to me that there cannot, under the present arrangements, be military movements or exercises of a type that might be construed as drilling. Does the minister foresee such conditions occurring in the future? Is that the reason section 99 of the criminal code is not made applicable to the United States troops, or is this just a general precaution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think the numbers I have mentioned would preclude drilling. I remember that a good many years ago when I was a lad there was a company of cavalry in my village and I would be surprised if they numbered more than forty, but they took pretty seriously the drilling to which they subjected themselves and their horses. We used to look upon it as pretty efficient drilling. There will certainly be a sufficient number at the Churchill establishment to make it possible for them to have a parade and to go through movements that would, I think, come within the description of drilling.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Coming into force.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask whether a similar bill has been passed by the United States congress?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, a bill was passed by the congress of the United States in 1944. It is not fully similar to this, because all they had to do there was to make provision by legislation to impose duties upon their own citizens. Their construction of international law as determined by their supreme court was such that they did not find it necessary to adopt a statute to recognize the jurisdiction of officers over men under their command present in the territory of the United States, but they did have to have legislation to impose upon citizens of the United States the duty of rendering assistance to enable officers to exercise in a practical way the jurisdiction they had by international law.

I must make a further qualification. I do not know that there was any provision in the United States statute that it should apply as from a specific date. The reason for making this legislation apply as from the first day of April, 1947, is that we told our friends representing the United States authority that we would get this legislation through at an early day. They felt a bit uneasy since the time the orders in council were repealed, and we said: "If you have done anything in the meantime we will ask parliament to declare that this statute shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April, so that there will be no hiatus in your jurisdiction.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I think it is the rule that a bill is given a third reading forthwith if it is reported without amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: No bill can be given more than one reading the same day without unanimous consent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would refer the minister to standing order 73.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is a special rule with respect to the third reading of bills, that they can be read a third time immediately if reported from the committee of the whole without amendment. Standing order 77 reads:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would allow me to read standing order 73:

Every bill shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

But a bill to be advanced more than one stage at one time must have the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since the second reading of the bill was passed this afternoon the minister would require the consent of the house to have the third reading now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no special reason why it should be taken right now.

Mr. MacINNIS: I might state my objection to having the third reading now. I was not in the house this afternoon when this bill went into committee, but I understand that certain information was sought as to the number of United States troops now in Canada and that that information was refused. When the third reading of the bill is taken I want to have something to say on that point.

UNITED NATIONS

ACCESSION OF CANADA TO CONVENTION ON PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the accession of Canada to the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations and to grant to the united nations and any specialized agency of which Canada is a member and which is brought into relationship with the united nations, to their officers and to the representatives of their members, the legal capacity, immunities, facilities and privileges necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of the united nations and of its specialized agencies.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a rather large order. The minister tabled a list of the countries, numbering some twenty-eight, which have agencies here in Ottawa, and ambassadors. You will have to build a new hotel or several houses for them, because they will take up about one-third of the accommodation. A list of the countries which have these privileges and immunities was given to us some time ago. Another list of Canada's expeditionary force, known as ambassadors overseas, has been tabled. It will be found that we have ambassadors in almost every country on the seven seas. The expenses of the department are going up; they are $1,700,000 more than they were last year. When you add that to the $1,500,000 for trade commissioners in the same places it amounts to $3,200,000 extra this year. The report that the minister brought down covers nearly twenty-five pages. It gives a list of the non-commissioned officers and men, the first secretaries, the second secretaries, the third secretaries and all kinds of officials.

I have never been to a meeting of the united nations. I have not much confidence in the whole organization because of what happened at San Francisco and Lake Success. Before they get through, we shall have to call it Lake Failure, but it is nothing but a talking tower of babel.

Look at the people to whom this resolution applies. I am surprised to find the list. Talk about the noble four hundred. I venture to say that if the list is counted the number will come to pretty nearly four hundred; it will reach to several centuries.

The minister says that it is expedient to introduce a measure. I doubt at this time, with all the talk there is going on, whether it is expedient to know more about the organization to which we are granting the rights and privileges for which the ordinary taxpayer will have to pay. The resolution says that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the accession of Canada to the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations. There are a lot of these conventions; we are getting them all mixed up. There was a Liberal convention some time ago. I do not know whether they could qualify here or whether they should qualify. They ought to have certain rights and immunities, Mr. Chairman, as well as these other gentlemen who belong to these other countries and organizations. My hon. friends to the left have a convention sometimes, and my hon. friends farther down the aisle—

Mr. COLDWELL: Not that kind of convention.

Mr. CHURCH: And that includes the hon. member for Temiscouata. He should get certain immunities, rights and privileges which are given to these other organizations.

I know the minister is a hard working man, but the people are becoming very much alarmed at the united nations. Mr. Attlee himself complained the other day and said he was very much disappointed in it the first year. I think he is right.

The resolution goes on to describe other specialized agencies of which Canada is a member, which are "brought into relationship with the united nations, to their officers and to their representatives of their members, the legal capacity" and so forth. Every one of these gentlemen will have an adviser, a legal officer. Why do they belong to the organization if they must have somebody to advise them? There is the first officer, the second officer, the third officer, and all that kind of thing. The resolution continues and mentions the "legal capacity, immunities, facilities and privileges necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of the united nations and of its specialized agencies." I fail to see why we should have a class like this. We are giving all these officers of the countries which belong to the united nations the rights and privileges of ambassadors and are exempting them from taxation. Many other advantages are given to them. It is becoming privilege and nothing but privilege. Some have relief and some have not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would hope that hon. members would prefer to have the discussion on this matter after they got the bill. The charter of the united nations provides that that organization and its affiliated agencies will enjoy such immunities as are necessary for them to accomplish the purpose for which they are established. Article 105 of the charter to which the houses of the Canadian parliament have acceded, says:

> The general assembly may make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the applications of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article or may propose conventions to the members of the united nations for this purpose.

The conventions proposed are not gatherings of members of a party; they are agreements setting out what the privileges and immunities are to be. I am sure it will be the wish of all members that the Canadian parliament give consideration to the matter. The convention has been prepared. All that this resolution does is to ask leave to introduce a bill to which the convention is annexed, so that the members may give it consideration. There are already a large number of states that have given their adherence to this convention, and I think it would be preferable to reserve the debate that we shall have on the propriety of acceding to the convention to the time when the bill is introduced and the convention placed before members of parliament, and they are in a position to discuss it in an appropriate manner.

All that we are asking at the present time is that we have leave to introduce a bill to which the convention will be attached, so that members of parliament can consider it and decide whether or not they want Canada to accept it as other members of the united nations have done.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Mr. Chairman, I look at the front row of the gallery right in front of you. It is reserved for diplomats, people who are mentioned, whose immunities are mentioned here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. This does not have to do with the diplomatic service at all; this has to do with the united nations and the organizations affiliated with the united nations. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the immunities of diplomatic representatives of states in Canada. If the hon. member will wait until he gets the convention he will then probably have something to say and we shall be glad to have his views on the merits or otherwise of the convention; but I think he would interest us to a greater extent if he waited until he had the convention to give us his comments upon it. It is not at all a matter with respect to immunities of diplomatic representatives in this country.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his explanation, but I will remind him of something. Canada is the only country in the world where those who are not diplomats are given the status of diplomats, if not formally, at least informally to a certain extent. Canada is the only country in the world where consuls have semi-official rank as diplomats. I already asked a gentleman who was at one time a secretary of state, Mr. McLarty, and he did not say that consuls, and commercial attaches such as high commissioners, and so on, had official rank and precedence. But they are given it. And of course, high commissioners are only trade agents

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I wonder how the hon. member relates his discussion to this resolution?

Mr. POULIOT: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not know why you call me to order, because neither you nor I have the paper which the right hon. gentleman mentioned. He told me: "When you see the paper you will have a different view about it." But I have the resolution, without the white paper.

My comments are simply to give the government an opportunity to draft a good bill, if the thing can be done. I do not believe in this business at all, but it seems to me that we should have all the papers available before beginning to discuss a matter of this kind. And if I do not have them and you do not have them, Mr. Chairman, how can you blame me for talking widely and broadly—

Mr. MacNICOL: And wisely.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. What I want to say about the matter is that I am warning the government, so that in drafting the bill they will not make the same error as was made in connection with lists of precedence, when ordinary commercial agents such as high commissioners, consuls and vice-consuls—and all those small fry—were considered as diplomats.

In the old countries, where diplomacy requires a special training, there is a line of demarcation between commercial agents, consuls and high commissioners, and diplomats. It would be a faux pas for commercial agents, consuls or high commissioners to jump across the line and to pose as diplomats. The reason is obvious. For a long time we did not have ambassadors; we had only consuls. And since we did not have ambassadors we gave the consuls and other commercial attaches the same rank as ambassadors had in other countries.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is not discussing the resolution before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, would you speak loudly enough for us to hear. This is an exceedingly important matter, and we cannot hear anything that is going on.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, these immunities—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I think if hon. members would try to keep order themselves they would hear what I am trying to say. It is not possible to make oneself heard when so many others are trying to talk at the same time. I have just called the hon. member's attention to the fact that what he was saying had no relation to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: With respect to these immunities, they have in the united nations organization certain officers. There are certain rules and regulations which apply to them. They enjoy many immunities, including those in respect of taxation, and all that kind of thing. When I look at the minister's book I am surprised when I see the list of alternate officers, and others. Provincial laws do not apply to these people; not even federal laws. They have all the privileges and powers of consuls and ambassadors abroad.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that there is a complete misunderstanding of this resolution. It is not a resolution which deals in any particular with ambassadors, consuls or others, but one which deals with delegates going to and from united nations meetings who were granted certain courtesies within countries through which they passed, together with their baggage and papers, and things of that description. This also applied to the secretaries and staff accompanying them. For instance, if an international labour organization conference is held in Canada, we will say, the delegates are granted temporary immunities and the usual courtesies extended to persons who take part in conferences of that description.

I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the debate should take place on the bill. I would suggest that we ought not to spend time in discussing something which is not involved in the bill, and thus spend it wastefully.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree perfectly with the hon. member, but with this difference, that he believes in that stuff, and I do not. That is the only difference between him and me. Very often the hon. member says he is a democrat. He is for the bill of rights, and all that stuff—for the common man, the man on the street. So am I. But I do not see why we give privileges to all these clerks and bureaucrats who are filling the space on our railways, aeroplanes, coaches and buses, when we do not extend the same immunities to every Canadian citizen.

I believe that all Canadian citizens, especially those who have certificates of citizenship, are entitled to the same immunities as all those men who belong to the united nations. Therefore, as a democrat, and a man who is more democratic than the leader of the

C.C.F. I want every Canadian citizen, man, woman and child, to have the same immunities and privileges as are given to all those bureaucrats who represent nations at the united nations meetings.

Mr. CHURCH: Making them all an aristocracy.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and if we accept this kind of proposal there will be no room for our own people to travel. Our children will be unable to go away during the summer months, after an arduous year of study. And the railways will not belong to Canadians any more. They will be used by a long line of bureaucrats representing the peoples of other countries. They will be more numerous than the stars in the sky and the sands of the sea. Every country in the world will be represented.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think we have listened to enough in the last two or three days—people who are experts at everything and masters of nothing. For goodness sake, let us keep within the rules of the house and try to get home by Christmas.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: And I am not referring to any hon. member in particular.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I submit that there was nothing in what was said by the Minister of Labour. He is one of those who are strong for—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member again, if he is going to discuss the resolution, to discuss it. That is the only thing before the committee. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, you know that I have the greatest respect for you; and I think what the Minister of Labour has just done is no more parliamentary than the appearance yesterday of his colleague in kilts. I will tell you, sir, that one is not out of order by showing the absurdity of a proposition. As a member of parliament, I think the thing has gone far enough. At the present time the people who represent such organizations as the international labour organization, for which the Minister of Labour is so strong, and the united nations organization, are taking the whole place in this country and there is no more room for the Canadian citizen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I am perfectly in order in saying that. I have just as much right to disapprove this kind of legislation as anyone has to approve it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is not in order in discussing any matters other than this resolution. If the hon. member is going to speak at all, I should like him to discuss the resolution and nothing else.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not discussing anything else, Mr. Chairman. The only thing is that I brought out a point of comparison with an organization which is so dear to the heart of the Minister of Labour. Now let us consider this thing. What is it? I wonder how many members have read it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Nobody.

Mr. POULIOT: It begins in this way:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the accession of Canada to the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations . . .

That is a convention which I cannot discuss because I do not have it before me, and I should have it before the resolution is submitted to the house. We should not have to wait until the bill is before the house in order to discuss the resolution, because the purpose of the resolution is to afford members of parliament an opportunity to make useful suggestions for the drafting of the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And to learn what they are doing.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. The drafting of the bill is supposed to be done after the resolution is passed and not before; and those who draft the bill are supposed to take notice of suggestions made by members of parliament, and to maintain in the bill the wording of the resolution or to change it according to the expressed wish of the members.

Mr. CHURCH: We are becoming a nation of ambassadors.

Mr. POULIOT: The resolution speaks of the convention on the privileges and immunities of the united nations. Immunity! If "immunity" is the right word, it is useless to prepare ourselves for defence against attack because this country will be immune against aggression. What is immunity? Again we do not know. We are asked to vote blindly, Mr. Chairman. Never in my life have I done that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN. Order. The hon. member has repeatedly stated that he does not know what he is talking about. The minister has suggested that we pass this resolution, and then the hon. member will have the bill before him and will know what he is talking about. In order to save the time of the committee, I would suggest that we do that.

Mr. POULIOT: Quite so, Mr. Chairman; but I do not know what is behind this. No one can blame me for not knowing what it is, because I am just reading it.

Mr. MUTCH: It would be all right if the hon. member did not talk about it.

Mr. POULIOT: Let the hon. member for Winnipeg South put on his kilts, and it will be all right.

The resolution continues:

. . . and to grant to the united nations and any specialized agency of which Canada is a member—

It is formidable when you note that. It is not only the representatives of other nations. It is all the other agencies of all the other nations. I will read it again so that everybody will know what it is about:

—and any specialized agency of which Canada is a member and which is brought into relationship with the united nations—

We do not have the bill. We should have it. If I complain that our information is not complete, it will be enough to show that this debate should have taken place later after every hon. member had been provided with full information about the matter. I do not speak of what I know. I complain that I do not know enough, and that if hon. members were well informed about it, no one would be in favour of this legislation. The resolution continues:

—to their officers and to the representatives of their members, the legal capacity—

Imagine that!

—immunities, facilities and privileges—

There are four things, namely, legal capacity, immunities, facilities and privileges.

—for the accomplishment of the purposes of the united nations—

And not only the united nations.

—and of its specialized agencies.

Who are they? We do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, we do.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope my hon. friend will be kind enough to give me a list of those specialized agencies and figure out the number of people involved, who will take so much space on the railways when the railways complain that they have not enough cars for transportation purposes. I do not wish to be unpleasant; but the other day when it was stated, in a discussion about a similar matter, that we should have to adopt the suggestions required by the secretariat of the united nations, I found it pretty hard to digest. Some members of parliament now take the view that this is just a matter of course, that it is just a matter of routine. That is their view, and they have a right to have that view. But especially after a committee has been set up with respect to human rights in conformity with the suggestion made by the united nations, I think a member of parliament has the right to express his views and to ask questions about matters of this kind.

Very often I have complained about legislation which was railroaded through and passed blindly by some hon. members who paid no attention to it. This is a serious matter. It is not only a question of routine. If it is ridiculous, it can also be dangerous. Yet some members are anxious to pass it. They are ready to accept everything that comes from the united nations. That is a dangerous state of mind, because there will be governmental irresponsibility in these matters. People whom we do not know, and whom we shall probably never know, will make decisions which we shall be bound to accept and put into law just because of all these pieces of legislation which are swallowed, one after another, by parliament. At the present time we are the witnesses of a wave of irresponsibility. There is irresponsibility everywhere. The attitude which is taken is, I did not do it; it was done by the other fellow. Who is the other fellow? I do not know. It is not in accordance with what has been for centuries the practice of the British parliament. The duty of members is not only to make speeches in the House of Commons but to control expenditures. How shall we be able to control expenditures when we know nothing about the shortcomings of the whole thing that is now being set up? Of course some hon. members—and especially some members of the C.C.F. group—are strong for it. They believe in bureaucracy. Bureaucracy is their god. They believe in bureaucracy and bureaucrats. The more there are, the better it is.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: All right, sir.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the wording of this resolution, which says:

. . . which is brought into relationship with the united nations, to their officers and to the representatives of their members . . .

We are going to give immunity to all these people. I have seen some criticism of this in an English paper called The Patriot, and in Time magazine. I believe this will be a very large organization. Are we to establish this principle and give all these people certain privileges and immunities, including immunity from taxation and immunity from other restrictions and responsibilities?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, Mr. Chairman, it is not carried. I should like to say a word concerning the general remarks of the minister, who said we ought to wait until we saw the bill so that we would know what is in it. Before we see the bill, I suppose we shall be called upon to give it second reading; at least we shall have a discussion on second reading, and in the discussion on second reading we shall be limited by the rules of a full-dress debate, which means that it will be impossible to ask questions and elicit information to which we are entitled as members of the House of Commons. I support the contention of the hon. member for Temiscouata that it is our duty, our privilege and our responsibility to find out what is behind this thing. I wish to ask several questions, and until they are answered I am not prepared to agree to the adoption of this resolution. I want to have the minister answer the question of the hon. member for Temiscouata as to just what are these specialized agencies. Surely that is a simple question. If the minister is not prepared to answer it he is not prepared to be open and frank with this house; and if he is not prepared to be frank and open with this house, then this house should see to it that he is, because that is the duty of a minister in a responsible government.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In answer to the hon. gentleman's question—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if you would speak loud enough so that we can hear you.

An hon. MEMBER: Be quiet and listen.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am quiet, and I wish other hon. members would be quiet. Down here it is impossible to hear when hon. members are making such a noise. I want to hear what is going on; that is why I came here.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, the bill will be given second reading, of course, and at that time there will be a full discussion on the principle of the bill. Then it will go to committee, and the hon. gentleman will have every opportunity to ask questions on each clause. But I believe the house would be wise to pass the resolution and get the bill before it, to see exactly what they are talking about. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, Mr. Chairman. I beg leave to challenge your statement. I do not believe the committee would be wise to pass the resolution. The proper place to get information concerning matters of this sort is right here, in the resolution stage. I want information, a lot of it. I happen to know enough about this thing to be pretty suspicious, and pretty inquisitive.

I want to hear the minister answer the question asked by the hon. member for Temiscouata. What are these specialized agencies of which Canada is already a member?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely, Mr. Chairman, hon. members must have entirely forgotten their duties. A member of this house has a right to ask a question and to have that question answered. Is there a member on the Liberal side who will contradict that statement?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have asked a question and I want an answer.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the bill is not yet before the committee. When the bill is in committee he will be able to get the information for which he is now asking. If we pass the resolution now, later the bill will come before the committee and be dealt with. In view of that, shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely, Mr. Chairman, you are not going to suggest that in the resolution stage we are not perfectly entitled to ask questions relating to the subjects mentioned in the resolution. That has been the custom during the ten years I have been in the house. Time and again, when a resolution has been introduced we have had a long discussion, with many questions asked and answered. This is about the first time I have ever known of a resolution to be brought before the house when the Chairman has ruled that questions and answers are not in order.

Mr. McCANN: He has not ruled that at all.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member for Temiscouata asked what these specialized agencies are, and I think that question should be answered.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will ask a question pertinent to the resolution I shall do my best to answer it, but I heard nothing in the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata that appeared to me to be a question pertinent to the resolution.

Mr. QUELCH: There is a reference to the specialized agencies. Could the minister say what those are? For instance, is the international monetary fund one of those agencies.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The international monetary fund is not one of the special agencies brought into relationship with the united nations. It may become so. These agencies are brought into relationship with the united nations by virtue of a contract entered into between the two, and the international monetary fund and the united nations have not yet even discussed the terms upon which a relationship could be established.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then will the minister tell us what are the specialized agencies involved in this resolution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The specialized agencies which may be brought into relationship with the united nations under the terms of article 57 of the charter of the united nations which was signed at a meeting of the united nations, which, unfortunately, was not attended by the hon. member, are: the international labour organization; the food and agriculture organization; the united nations educational, cultural and scientific organization; the international civil aviation organization; the universal postal union; the international telecommunications union; the world health organization. Others that have not yet reached the operation stage are: the international refugee organization, which is being organized under the united nations; the international trade organization, the constitution of which is being worked out and prepared at Geneva at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: Were there agencies to fight slavery and the drug traffic, and things like that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure whether there is a constituted organization. There have been meetings under the aegis of the united nations dealing with those subjects, and there is a narcotic drugs organization, but I am not in a position to say whether or not that has been brought into this relationship at the present time. A question arose there as to whether it could, because Spain was a member of the narcotic drugs commission, and a resolution was passed at the last general assembly that no organization of which Spain was a member could be brought into relationship with the united nations.

Mr. HACKETT: I suppose these agencies are likely to increase in number as the organization goes on?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are apt to increase in number; and the recommendation which will be made is that such immunities as are provided be extended to them when Canada becomes a member of one of them; but Canada becomes a member by virtue of something that is brought to the houses of parliament for approval.

Mr. HACKETT: A complete list could not be given now?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not an exhaustive list.

Mr. POULIOT: Article 57 of the charter of the united nations reads:

1. The various specialized agencies, established by intergovernmental agreement and having wide international responsibilities, as defined in their basic instruments, in economic, social, cultural, educational, health, and related fields, shall be brought into relationship with the united nations in accordance with the provisions of article 63.

2. Such agencies thus brought into relationship with the united nations are hereinafter referred to as specialized agencies.

Article 63 reads:

1. The economic and social council may enter into agreements with any of the agencies referred to in article 57, defining the terms on which the agency concerned shall be brought into relationship with the united nations. Such agreements shall be subject to approval by the general assembly.

2. It may coordinate the activities of the specialized agencies through consultation with and recommendations to such agencies and through recommendations to the general assembly and to the members of the united nations.

I will tell the committee why I asked the questions I did. I am surprised that they were so well understood by the hon. members for Lethbridge and Acadia and were not understood by other hon. members. The questions were put in plain English. The reason I asked them is this. With the great number of people from various countries passing through Canada on trains, aeroplanes and boats, we may be exposed to many things. That is what I fear. We shall have to be careful. We may have to double the R.C.M.P. to check these people, but that will be impossible because they will be immune.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it expected that Bretton Woods will become one of the specialized agencies?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When the hon. member says "Bretton Woods" I assume that he means the agreements which were worked out at that place, not the place itself. I am not in a position to tell the hon. member whether the organization set up by that agreement will choose to come into relationship with the united nations. No negotiations to that end have so far taken place.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not always find it so easy to keep quiet, but I think the minister has made a reasonable request that the debate be left over until we have all the material before us. He is thinking of the progress of the business of this house. If I speak on this matter I want to have the particulars before me. As somebody said lately, we need more light and a little less noise.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We can excuse the hon. member for Fort William for not being as familiar with this subject as members of parliament ought to be, but we cannot very well excuse a number of us. I cannot excuse myself. I want to tell the hon. member for Fort William that it is right now when we are dealing with the resolution that we should get the information before we commit ourselves too far. I want to ask whether the final act of Bretton Woods, which, of course, is the name of the whole thing, is to become one of the specialized agencies and, if not, why not?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know if it is or not, and I do not know why not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suppose the minister is not aware of how serious a deficiency in himself he has confessed before the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I leave that to the judgment of the public.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just imagine a responsible minister coming before this committee and being unable to answer that question! Such a tremendous amount depends on whether the final act of Bretton Woods, to which we acceded in 1945, becomes one of these specialized agencies. A tremendous amount depends upon that. I suggest to hon. members that, as a good practice, they should read once more the final act of Bretton Woods, which we passed in such shameful haste in the last days of 1945, and also the immunities appended to that. From those immunities they will get some sort of idea of the kind of thing this committee is committing itself to when it passes the resolution or passes the bill. There will be plenty of reason for the anxiety of the hon. member for Temiscouata. Since the minister cannot tell us that, I should like to ask what is meant by the words "legal capacity" as applied to the officers and representatives, we will say, of the I.L.O.?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that we should have a course in law in this House of Commons, but what it means is that if a body is to be recognized as having the right of a person, someone has to give it corporate capacity. It will be recommended to parliament that that be done in respect of Canada by virtue of the terms of the bill to be introduced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That means what? Does it mean the power to sue in the courts? Does it mean the responsibility to be sued in the courts? Just what is the significance of that? That should be put on the record.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, I think we have got off on the wrong foot here. The hon. member for Lethbridge is quite within his rights in asking these questions because there would be no reason for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee unless questions could be asked, but I submit that we are wasting our own time and the time of the house by asking questions now when we have not the full picture before us as we shall have when the bill is brought down. I suggest to the hon. member for Lethbridge and others that they forgo asking questions now, because they will be in a much better position once the bill is brought down. Someone has mentioned the custom in the British parliament where resolutions are never discussed, where the discussion on the principle of a measure is carried out on the second reading. I agree that the hon. member is within his rights, but he will be in a better position and the minister piloting the bill will be in a better position once the bill is introduced.

Mr. QUELCH: That may not be true. On the resolution stage you are free to ask any question pertaining to the resolution, but when we are dealing with the bill we are tied down to individual sections and may find it impossible to ask a particular question. We had an example this afternoon when certain questions were asked and hon. members were told that they could not ask them under that particular section. It is quite possible that when the bill comes down there may be certain questions we want to ask that do not apply specifically to any section, and therefore we shall not be able to ask them.

Mr. MITCHELL: You can ask them on the title.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it intended to take any steps to screen the various officials who may come here from all parts of the world? Since we have had a lot of publicity in connection with espionage, are these various representatives to be allowed to run wild across Canada without any form of screening?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think there will be anything as wild as some of the statements made in the house.

Mr. QUELCH: They were pretty wild last year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All I am asking is for the adoption of this resolution, so that a draft convention which has been prepared by a committee of the united nations and has been recommended to the members of the united nations by a resolution of the general assembly may be put before this house, in order that the house, which has approved of the adherence of Canada to the united nations, may say whether or not it is prepared to take the recommendation of the general assembly and agree to some or any or none of the recommendations of that convention. That is all that is involved at the present time. The convention will be before the members of this house. They have agreed to the united nations charter. The united nations charter provides that the general assembly will recommend the terms of a convention. The general assembly has done so, and I think the Canadian parliament should, in conformity with the spirit of the charter, at least take the trouble of examining that convention and saying whether it is prepared to agree to the whole of it, to any part of it or to none of it. That is all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister tell the committee whether there is any sufficient reason why that convention should not be placed before the members of this house without having the bill before us?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That convention was published in the newspapers and has had all kinds of publicity. I have a copy of it here which I can tear off the bill and send to the hon. member if he wants to see it. It is something that was recommended by a resolution passed a year ago February. Fifteen or twenty members of the united nations have already expressed their intention of adhering to it, some without reservations, some with reservations. It is our intention to put it before the house and to ask: Shall we do anything at all about it?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, words have many meanings. If one looks at Webster one will see four or five significations for a single word. The trouble with our legislation most of the time is that there are not enough definitions to make more precise the meaning of the words used in the statute. If the discussion that has taken place has had only the effect of warning the government of the necessity of having clearly drafted legislation and sufficient definitions I shall not regret the difficulties I went through to express that wish. We speak now to a house which is practically all converted to the idea of the united nations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: "Converted" is exactly the word.

Mr. POULIOT: Of course opinions are free. All I can tell you, sir, and my colleagues is that it is a wrong sentiment and the future will prove that all those who opposed it were right. If I oppose it now I do not do so for myself or for those of my generation, but for those of the future generations who will suffer from it just as the boys of the two previous generations suffered from the bureaucracy that was called the "New Despotism" by a lord chief justice of England and from the bureaucracy of Geneva, and now we shall have the bureaucracy of Lake Success, New York.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We might just as well save ourselves all this shouting of "carried" and behave ourselves like members of parliament. Surely a matter of this great importance merits the calm and considered attention of members of parliament. We have been listening for about an hour—

Mr. McCANN: Address the Chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am including the Chair in what I am saying. We have been talking for about an hour and before we had been on this subject for about twenty minutes we had the anvil chorus of "carried" going on. That is surely a sign that there is "a nigger in the woodpile" somewhere.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member to be allowed to make a statement of that kind?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member if he is to speak at all to speak to the resolution.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, what about the hon. member being allowed to state that the conduct of his fellow members in this house indicates that there is a nigger in the woodpile?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we have not the right to ask the minister to state the matter correctly. I did not say that the conduct of the members of this house—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sure that the hon. member if he made any statement of that kind would be imputing motives and that he will withdraw his statement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I said was that an anvil chorus of "carried", which commenced fifteen or twenty minutes after this discussion commenced, is pretty good evidence that all is not well, that something is seriously wrong; in other words, that there is a "nigger in the woodpile" somewhere.

I am going to ask several more questions which I think are pertinent to the resolution. I have tried to find out something about the nature of the immunities which we shall be granting to all these various people. I noticed in the long list which the minister gave the I.L.O., FAO, UNESCO, Civil Aviation, et cetera. To each and every one of these, according to the resolution which is before us, we are to grant legal capacity, whatever that means. The minister has defined it in a general sort of way but not so that those who read Hansard out in the country will understand what he means. May I ask, what are the immunities which are referred to in the resolution and which are to be granted to the various specialized agencies which are to be associated with the united nations. What are those immunities?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are the immunities recommended to the members of the united nations in the convention that was recommended by its resolution on the third of February, 1946.

Mr. QUELCH: Article IV of the schedule to the bill says that among the privileges and immunities are:

(a) immunity from personal arrest or detention and from seizure of their personal baggage, and, in respect of words spoken or written and all acts done by them in their capacity as representatives, immunity from legal process of every kind.

This afternoon and yesterday we listened to a lot of talk about the tremendous dangers that may face this country. To listen to some hon. members one would almost come to the conclusion that a war with some countries is imminent. If the stiuation is anything like as dangerous as many hon. members would have had us believe yesterday and today, surely we are not going to suggest that we should allow representatives of these countries to run around this country with their baggage. They are allowed to bring baggage in and out of the country without any investigation as to what is in that baggage, what the documents may be that they take out. How can one say that we do not face a crisis when we have a situation which necessitates bringing troops of another country into Canada; how can one say we face that situation at one minute and, in the next, suggest that we should allow representatives of these countries, countries that we suspect, shall I say, to come here and have free rein without our right to investigate the documents which they may be carrying out of the country or the code messages which they may be sending out? It seems to be rank insanity to me. When I say "insanity" I mean that either the things that hon. members were speaking of here yesterday and today were a form of insanity; or, if they were sane, then this resolution is insane. You cannot have it both ways.

I would ask the minister whether or not there is some loophole whereby, if we are satisfied that certain representatives of certain countries—and I am not suggesting any one country—are carrying on some form of espionage, we can investigate, or do we mean by this bill that these men have complete immunity? Has the government not the right to provide for an investigation upon what they may be doing? I should like an answer to that question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think I should be called upon to give answers as to what will be the effect of the legislation resulting from a bill which has not even been introduced.

Mr. QUELCH: I hold in my hand the schedule which is dealt with in the bill which will follow the resolution. I am interested in the schedule. In view of the fact that the minister has sent this schedule over to us and it is the schedule that we are in reality discussing, I should like a reply to my question. The minister will admit that it is a serious question and I should like an answer to it. The minister should answer. Why wait until we are out of the frying-pan into the fire?

Mr. ASHBY: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. QUELCH: I should like an answer to my question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Will the hon. member please state his question in a form that can be answered.

Mr. QUELCH: All right. If there are in this country certain officials about whom we receive information which causes us to believe that they are carrying on acts of espionage, are they granted complete immunity by this resolution, or have we the right to investigate, seize their baggage and see whether or not they have been carrying on that kind of work?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If we grant immunities we shall be expected to respect them. They will be such as this house sees fit to determine. If this house sees fit to make reservations, as other nations have made reservations, in some respects of this convention, then those reservations will apply. If this house and parliament see fit to grant complete immunities I would expect the Canadian people to respect the immunities granted by an act of parliament.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, that is quite right, if we grant these immunities. The question is, is it wise to grant these immunities with the facts that are before us today, or has the government just been stirring up a mare's-nest in the past? If we can believe the documents that have been put out by the government; if we can believe some of the references made in the Taschereau-Kellock commission, then I would say a bill of this kind is insanity.

Mr. ASHBY: May I ask the minister who is the individual responsible for drawing up this bill in the first place?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The bill was prepared in collaboration between the legal counsel of the Department of External Affairs and the law officers of the Department of Justice.

Mr. ASHBY: I asked the names of the individuals, not the institution.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think that is a question which is pertinent to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ASHBY: We must have individual responsibility. I receive letters from these bureaucrats telling me that the department did this, or that or the other. An individual did it, or some individuals did it. I should like to know who these individuals are.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When this resolution is passed I shall put in the hands of the Chairman for delivery to the Speaker a bill for which I take full responsibility.

Mr. QUELCH: Again I should like to point out that this is the time to decide whether or not we want that bill to be drawn up; otherwise what is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Apparently the minister thinks he is the sole judge as to whether or not he should answer any question. I should like to convey to the minister in a perfectly respectful way the idea that he is not the sole judge, that the members of the house are the judges of what questions we shall ask him and what he is to answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If I am asked a question and I refuse to answer I shall be glad to have my refusal to answer challenged and a vote taken upon it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Edmonton East just asked a question and was refused.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member wishes to challenge my refusal to give the name of the official who wrote or typed the draft bill I am prepared to meet that challenge.

Mr. ASHBY: I think I have every right, Mr. Chairman, to have that question answered. We must pin responsibility upon individuals, and some individuals drew up this bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is discussing the bill. The bill is not yet before the committee. If we pass the resolution, then the hon. member can see the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are asking questions concerning the resolution.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind the hon. member that I was not addressing my remarks to him; I was addressing my remarks to the hon. member for Edmonton East who was discussing the bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It apparently is not convenient to give the committee details concerning what these immunities are to be. Two of the immunities, which I think are quite clearly indicated in the passage which the hon. member for Acadia read are these, that an officer who would represent the international labour office, for example, in Canada would be immune from arrest. He would be immune from investigation in any respect, no matter whether he was suspected of espionage or not; he would be immune from all these things except in so far as he himself waived the immunities. Look how serious that is, Mr. Chairman. It would mean the representative of the I.L.O. was immune, the representative of FAO was immune, the representative of UNESCO was immune, and so on with the international civil aviation organization and the international postal union, the international telecommunications and so forth. There is hardly anything concerning any of these which hon. members know. Each of these gentlemen possesses immunities, and, in addition to that, all these members to whom the hon. member for Broadview referred possesses this immunity. Look at the bewildering responsibility this committee is taking upon itself when it grants that immunity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course all that I consider it my duty to do is to bring to the attention of hon. members how serious the action is that they are engaging in in accepting this thing like a pig in a poke.

What are the facilities which are referred to in this resolution which are to be granted to each of these privileged individuals representing the united nations and each of the specialized agencies which will be attached to the united nations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are those that are described in the convention which was adopted on February 13, 1946, and to which this country is invited by resolution of the united nations to adhere, and to which it can adhere in whole or in part, or not at all, as it may be decided.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister name those? He must be familiar with them. He can surely give them to the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If I thought there was information being sought for the purpose of getting information I would be only too glad to supply it. With respect to that, if it can be of any use to the hon. member, the facilities that are referred to are with respect to communications facilities not less favourable than those accorded by the government to diplomatic missions accredited to this country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I probably should request the minister to withdraw the imputation of motive.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If I made any imputation I will gladly withdraw it—if it will save any time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right; the imputation was that I was not asking for information. I am asking for information. What are the privileges which are granted or which will be granted, as implied in this resolution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that will be granted under this measure. I know there were a certain number of privileges enumerated in the convention, and if the hon. member will read the convention he will see exactly what they are. I do not know to which of those parliament will see fit to adhere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now, Mr. Chairman, as parliament is at present constituted, it will adhere to exactly what the minister says it will adhere to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is a compliment which I appreciate.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: People on the Liberal side would vote for anything under the sun that a Liberal minister would propose. That is my own opinion. The minister ought to be able to name those. Every member in the house is not supposed to know all that is in the convention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I may remind the hon. member who is asking the question that I sent him a copy of it. He need not think his duty obliges him to ask for information for other members in the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Probably other members in the house will profit a little if they are exposed to the information. But I am asking particularly for myself.

I should now like to ask the minister to give us the purposes of the united nations. All these, I submit, are questions which are perfectly legitimate to ask, and they are perfectly legitimate to be answered at this stage.

Mr. MARTIN: A terrible reflection on the hon. member who is questioning!

An hon. MEMBER: Shut up.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am afraid the reflection is entirely deserved. The remark of the hon. member indicated a degree of irresponsibility which should not be tolerated in the house.

What are the purposes of the united nations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are millions and millions of people who have been interested in the charter of the united nations. It has been a public document for more than two years, and I am astounded that a member of parliament would ask me at this time to tell him the purposes of the united nations, when they are set out clearly in article 1 of chapter I of the united nations charter, a document which a great many people who have not the responsibility of a member of parliament have taken the trouble to read.

Article 1 is as follows:

1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace;

2. To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

3. To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I wanted the minister to put those purposes on the record.

An hon. MEMBER: He did.

Mr. MUTCH: You wanted it to kill time; that is all you wanted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If there were time to go into detail in respect of all these purposes, what would be involved in acomplishing them, and the kind of measures that could be adopted, and the reasons why such measures could be adopted, I think it would be astonishing reading to the people in the country who read Hansard. The difficulty is that scarcely any attention has been given to the nature of the measures which would be used by the united nations, or the reasons for which they would be used. However I am not going into detail; I just wished to have that information on Hansard.

I wonder if the minister would give us the purposes of the telecommunications union which he mentioned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not that here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I wonder if the minister would give us the purposes of the international trade organization.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That charter has not yet been completed. There is a conference going on which is working to the end of diminishing the barriers to trade which many people feel were one of the contributing factors to the situation which brought about the last war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which means, of course, that in passing this resolution, and in passing the bill which would follow, this house will accept the purposes of that organization, without having seen them.

Mr. KNOWLES: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; the resolution provides that such privileges or immunities as are accorded to associated agencies will apply only to such of those agencies as Canada joins with the approval of its houses of parliament.

Resolution agreed to, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 272, to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the united nations and related international organizations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.—for Mr. Abbott) moved the second reading of Bill No. 265, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HAZEN: When this bill was in the resolution stage the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario asked a question. He said, as reported at page 3789 of Hansard:

> The only question I wish to raise is as to giving authority for refunding operations for the next five, six or seven years.

The question he raised was as to the refunding operations covering such a period of time. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at that time said, as reported at page 3790 of Hansard:

> However, all that we are doing at the present time is to ask for first reading of the bill, and the minister can give further consideration to the matter and answer the hon. gentleman on second reading of the bill.

Has the minister given any further consideration to what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said, and will the parliamentary assistant explain why this bill covers such a long period of time?

Mr. MAYHEW: The Minister of Finance has given consideration to the request of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario but is still of the opinion that it is in the country's interests to have this provision go through in this way. Timing is an important factor in dealing with the amount of money which is involved in this item, namely $200,000,000; and it is necessary to be able to make the refunding at a time when it is most advantageous to the country. Therefore the minister has asked that this stay as outlined in the bill.

Mr. LENNARD: Are $200,000,000 required to cover even that period of three or four years? I notice that the parliamentary assistant said the other evening that there was a total of some $123,000,000 required. Why the $200,000,000?

Mr. HACKETT: May I add a question to the one just asked, which the minister might answer at the same time? Have the railways called in any securities, and does the necessity arise out of an opportunity to get money at a lower rate of interest?

Mr. MAYHEW: There is a total altogether of $221,304,943.61.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the rate of interest?

Mr. MAYHEW: It varies. There are two amounts at five per cent; there is practically $75,000,000 at five per cent. There are two amounts of about $49,000,000 at four per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: When do the five per cent ones mature?

Mr. MAYHEW: The five per cent ones mature in 1969, but they are callable in 1949.

Mr. HACKETT: At par or at a premium?

Mr. MAYHEW: At a premium.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the premium?

Mr. MAYHEW: A five per cent premium.

Mr. HACKETT: So they are paying 105?

Mr. MAYHEW: If they called them on that date, they would be paying a five per cent premium.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the rate on the new money?

Mr. MAYHEW: It will depend entirely on the market at the time that this is refunded.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is it proposed to advance the $200,000,000 now? I assume it will have to be raised by borrowing. Is it the idea to raise the $200,000,000 now because we have a low interest rate, or is it intended over the years to advance the money from time to time? What I have in mind is this. My memory is very slack about it, but I think there is a section in the Railway Act which has to do with this method of raising money for this purpose. I wondered how you were going to get the $200,000,000. You must find it somewhere. It does not come from general revenue. It will have to be borrowed somewhere. I assume these will be bonds or something of that kind, will they not?

Mr. MAYHEW: The money will be borrowed from the public from time to time as these maturities come due or are called. The whole amount will not be borrowed at this time.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the parliamentary assistant say whether these securities will be sold in Canada and whether they will be payable in Canadian funds? Will he also state if any of the five per cent bonds which may be called are payable in United States funds or in sterling as well?

Mr. MAYHEW: The five per cent bonds are payable in Canada, London or New York.

Mr. HACKETT: Will these bonds be marketed in Canada, or will they be marketed in the United States and England as were those which they will be replacing?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is most likely that they will be marketed in Canada. It has been the general policy of the government to do that, and it is most likely that they will be marketed in Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: And will they be payable in Canada only, or will they be payable in the United States and in London?

Mr. MAYHEW: Well, I cannot answer as to what we shall do, but I would say that they would be payable in Canada only.

Mr. HARKNESS: I was going to ask a question which is really directly along the line taken by the hon. member for Stanstead. What I wish to know is what amount of this $200,000,000 is payable or callable in Canadian funds, in United States funds and in sterling, in relation to the United States funds, whether we are to refund them at par or at what has been referred to quite frequently as the unofficial market price; and as far as sterling funds are concerned, whether we are to refund them at what was par, $4.86⅔, or whether we are to refund at the present price of approximately $4?

Mr. MAYHEW: The answer to the last question is that it will depend entirely upon the terms of the bonds. As to the first question, I really put the answer on Hansard when the bill was introduced. The amount payable in Canada is $86,980,000. The amount payable in London is $2,607,443.61.

Mr. HARKNESS: Pounds?

Mr. MAYHEW: Dollars. The amount payable in New York is $8,629,000. The amount payable in London, Canada or New York is $123,088,500.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the information before the hon. gentleman establish what portion of the last-mentioned figure is held in the United States, and in consequence would be payable there?

Mr. MAYHEW: We really have no way of telling how much of this is held in the United States.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that quite accurate? I thought payments to be made in the United States would be painfully perceptible to the department, because United States dollars would have to be purchased for the purpose.

Mr. MAYHEW: If they are held by Canadians the United States dollars are sold back to Canada, so that it would be pretty difficult to trace it and give the amount.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. gentleman just said that some $120 million was payable optionally in one of three places. You will have to pay almost all in New York, will you not, because that is where the people get the most money.

Mr. MAYHEW: The exchange is at par. There is no particular advantage in doing that at the present time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What?

Mr. HACKETT: Is that quite right?

Mr. HARKNESS: Is this $123 million to be paid at par or at the current rate of exchange on the New York market?

Mr. MAYHEW: It will be paid at par. The current rate is par, as far as we are concerned.

Mr. HACKETT: I think there must be some misunderstanding. A Canadian dollar will not purchase a United States dollar in New York. If it is necessary to pay interest in United States dollars on, say $100 million it will take more Canadian dollars to purchase the United States dollars necessary. Of course we have a certain amount of United States dollars in reserve, but they are rapidly vanishing.

Mr. MAYHEW: They can still be bought from the foreign exchange control board at par.

Mr. HACKETT: That is, we are depleting our reserves to make these payments. Is that the answer?

Mr. MAYHEW: That would be so. It would be nothing new.

Mr. HARKNESS: Apparently $123 million as far as these securities are concerned is payable in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. What about the remainder, the $77 million; what is it for?

Mr. MAYHEW: I have given those figures. probably the hon. member did not get them, but he will be able to read them in Hansard in the morning.

Mr. HARKNESS: You gave me only $86 million Canadian, $2 million United Kingdom and $123 million United States.

Mr. MAYHEW: There is $86,980,000 payable in Canada, $2,607,443.61 payable in London and $8,629,000 payable in New York.

Mr. HARKNESS: That does not make $221 million.

Mr. MAYHEW: Add the $123 million and you get $221 million.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If I might be permitted to change the line of discussion I should like to say that when the officers of the Canadian National Railways were here a year ago the question came up of the relation of fixed charges on the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and class 1 railways in the United States. As appears on page 19 of the evidence before that committee, the president reported that negotiations had taken place between the railways and the Department of Finance with a view to having the government accept income bonds of the Canadian National Railways in payment of the amount owing by the railway to the government for the repatriation of British securities. We were given a pretty complete picture of the situation of the Canadian National versus that of the Canadian Pacific and some of the better railways in the United States. That position is outlined at page 20, where the position of the Canadian National is put in these words:

> In the seven years referred to, 1938-1945, the funded debt of Canadian National Railways, including loans at interest from the government, was reduced from $1,298,141,226 to $1,247,381,610, a reduction of 3·91 per cent, and the fixed charges were reduced from $53,451,741 to $49,009,508, a reduction of 8·31 per cent.

Over the same period the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was able to reduce its funded debt from $232,188,724 at the end of 1938 to $93,669,000 at the end of 1945, and the statement goes on to say:

> The 1945 report shows that their fixed charges (which in 1938 amounted to $26,853,756) have been reduced to $19,547,129 in 1945, a reduction of 27·21 per cent.

Then later:

> Statement "B" attached to this memorandum shows the relationship of fixed charges to gross earnings for the larger U.S. roads, also for U.S. class 1 roads as a whole, and for the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National respectively. In 1939, which is taken for comparison as being the last pre-war year, the ratio of fixed charges to operating revenues for class 1 railroads was 15·21 per cent, for the C.P.R. and 16·76 per cent and for the C.N.R. 26·24 per cent. For 1944, the latest year for which full comparison is available, the percentage for class 1 railroads was 6·00, for the C.P.R. 6·50 and for the C.N.R. 11·44.

In his interesting brief the president said:

As a result of the war, however, a large block of railway securities previously owned by U.K. residents has been transferred under repatriation proceedings from public ownership to that of the government, and had the present situation existed in 1937 it is fairly sure that the repatriated securities would have been retired as railway interest bearing obligations and the government's interest would have put on an equity basis, as was done in 1937 as regards all the indebtedness of the railway to the company for capital purposes.

Could the parliamentary assistant make some statement as to what progress has been made since that time with a view to giving the Canadian National Railways some relief from the unfair burden it has been carrying for a great many years?

Mr. MAYHEW: What the hon. gentleman is asking now would certainly require legislation and, as far as I know, there is no such legislation in the offing for this year; at least it has not been introduced up to the present time.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Since this bill deals with the provision of funds to take care of various kinds of capital expenditures, is it permitted to ask whether any provision has been made for the completion of certain railway lines in northern Saskatchewan? I refer to two branch lines, one from Frenchman's Butte to Heinsburg, out of Saskatchewan into Alberta, and the other line in Saskatchewan, from St. Walburg to Beaver River. On both lines the middle has been left unfinished. At other sessions, consideration has been promised, and I was wondering whether it is the intention to do anything about these lines. I would urge that they be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think the hon. gentleman is a little confused. We are talking now on the refunding bill, and what he is referring to would come under Bill No. 258, the Canadian National bill.

Mr. HARKNESS: I still have not discovered the rate of exchange. I was under the impression that a good deal of the money, as far as the general public was concerned, is still owed in the United Kingdom; but, according to the figures which the parliamentary assistant has just given us, it is only $2,000,000 and some odd. At what rate of exchange is that money being repatriated or paid off?

Mr. MAYHEW: I think the hon. member is a little bit confused about the repatriation of Canadian national securities. They are bought at the market price and paid with the pound at $4.04.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. HARKNESS: Do I understand from that all Canadian National securities which are held in Great Britain and which are coming due at the present time will be repatriated at that rate of $4.04?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, not at all. We are dealing here with only $221 million, out of a total indebtedness of Canadian National Railways of $1,200 million.

Mr. HARKNESS: And it is only $2,000,000 odd of that, which is being paid off?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is only $2,000,000 worth. We are dealing with $200 million.

Mr. HACKETT: Have all the bonds held in Great Britain that it is contemplated refunding been repatriated? Can the parliamentary assistant say if the bonds in Great Britain have already been repatriated at $4.04?

Mr. MAYHEW: If they were owned by residents of Great Britain they have been repatriated.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood that the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East was as to the portion still held in Great Britain, and the answer was that there was only $2,000,000 worth still held in Great Britain. Does that represent the bonds which are held in Great Britain and which have been repatriated?

Mr. MAYHEW: Out of the $200 million that we are asking for there is $2,607,000 payable in sterling in London. That is all we are dealing with in this particular item.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): A moment ago the parliamentary assistant suggested that we were confused. I know I am, in any event. I gather that there are $124 million payable either in London, New York or Canada, I assume at holder's option?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then the parliamentary assistant said that either $8,000,000 or $80,000,000 were payable in New York; I was not sure of the figure.

Mr. MAYHEW: It is $8,000,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then we have $132 million where payment may be required in New York?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, that is right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Inasmuch as our dollar is at par we must possibly find United States dollars to the extent of $132 million?

Mr. MAYHEW: Possibly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When the resolution was before the committee the other night I understood that either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Transport would be here to answer some questions. The question of the capital debt of the Canadian National has been before the railway committee on several occasions. Of course the officers of the railway have no jurisdiction to make adjustments, but it would seem to me that, in view of the representations made by the president and the fact that these securities are now held in Canada, some statement from the cabinet level should be made. I realize that the parliamentary assistant is not able to speak for the cabinet, but I think someone should. The president of the railroad said:

> I am trying to put the Canadian National Railways on a sound basis. We want to show a satisfactory financial statement and we do not want to feel that we are a burden on the government. We do not want the "railway problem" to reappear. The Canadian National Railways is operating efficiently but it may very easily be made to appear a failure because it cannot achieve the impossible. In that event the effect on the railway organization itself will be one of discouragement. Moreover the comparison between state ownership and private enterprise is involved.

I had hoped that at this stage someone would be prepared to make a statement on government policy, especially in view of the negotiations in connection with this problem which have extended over a period of years between the management of the railways and the cabinet.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member will have ample opportunity of asking his questions when the Minister of Transport is here and when the Minister of Finance is here.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We understood that someone would be here to answer questions which it was not convenient to answer the other evening.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the parliamentary assistant say what is the present credit in United States dollars in the foreign exchange control fund?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, I cannot say that and I would not if I could.

Mr. HACKETT: I wonder why not. If I understood correctly the information vouchsafed earlier in the evening by the minister any refunding in New York will be made by United States dollars from the credit of the foreign exchange control fund.

Mr. MAYHEW: Just in so far as bonds are held in New York.

Mr. HACKETT: They are all payable in New York with the exception of $2,000,000.

Mr. MAYHEW: If they are held by Canadians they must sell their funds back again to the exchange fund.

Mr. HACKETT: I was a little astonished when the minister told me that he did not know what proportion of these bonds was held in New York. I think the record of interest payments would indicate clearly in what proportion they are held in New York, and when I say "New York" I mean the United States.

Mr. MAYHEW: We have not the information.

Mr. HARKNESS: I understand that approximately $131 million of these bonds are payable in New York with United States funds. Has the foreign exchange control board made that amount of money available to the railways to pay these off, or are some other arrangements being made so that our reserve of United States funds in gold will not be depleted to that material extent? I understand that, as matters stand at the present time, the situation is quite serious.

Mr. MAYHEW: They have not made any provision for it, because a number of these items do not mature until 1949. 1950 and 1951. They will be taken care of at the time of their maturity or when they are called.

Mr. HACKETT: I am sure the minister will understand that I am anxious to get this information because we have considered with a great deal of perturbation the rapidity with which our reserves of United States dollars are dissolving under the requirements of an ever-increasing one-way trade with the United States. Our purchases in the United States seem to be growing apace. Our sales there are not at all sufficient to enable us to make payment for what we are purchasing, and the proceeds of our sales to countries which pay in sterling are not readily convertible either into gold or into United States dollars. It would seem to me to be a matter of great importance to know exactly the position of our foreign exchange reserves. That would be almost a determining factor in deciding whether or not these bonds should be retired, even though the interest would seem to be high at the present time. If our reserves of United States dollars are being eaten up as rapidly as the budget discussions have led us to believe, it may be highly unwise to make these capital refunds at the present time, especially if they have to be made out of our small and diminishing reserves of United States dollars. I submit that it would be helpful to the committee to know exactly what those reserves are and how they stand today as compared with thirty or sixty days ago. That would give us some idea of the extent of the demand upon these reserves.

Mr. MAYHEW: That will no doubt be a factor when the transaction is under consideration. The government will decide then what they should do and will no doubt take into consideration whether it is advisable to refund these bonds in New York or in Canada. So far as the present exchange position is concerned, I am not in a position to speak.

Mr. HARKNESS: From a superficial examination of the report of the foreign exchange control board and a certain amount of attention to the trade figures which have been issued since, it would seem to me that the payment of this $131,000,000 will mean that we shall get rid, in one fell swoop, of more than one-fifth of our total remaining foreign exchange in United States currency. If that is the case, which I think it is, the passing of this bill involves more than merely authorizing the Canadian National Railways to refund $200,000,000. It involves also our liquid position so far as foreign exchange is concerned, and that before we pass this bill we ought to be told whether authorizing now the payment of this amount in United States exchange will jeopardize our foreign exchange reserves.

Mr. MUTCH: Before the parliamentary assistant to the minister answers, if I appear to be a little confused after listening to the debate I think I am in good company. It occurs to me that if it is important in connection with this legislation to know the position with respect to United States dollars held in Canada today as compared with thirty or sixty days ago, the immediate position of our holding of United States dollars has comparatively little bearing on loans which are to be refunded some in 1949, some in 1950, and some in 1951, because the exchange position then may be entirely different. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if it is not the case that in this legislation we are providing for borrowings to retire obligations. Large issues of bonds are payable in the United States, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant if there is anything in the proposed legislation to prevent Canada from doing what she has done many times before, namely, borrowing United States dollars in the United States to refund those bonds?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He has already said that they will be sold in Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: Probably the minister will tell the hon. member for Winnipeg South that, although the bonds do not fall due until several years later, what is being contemplated—

Mr. MUTCH: You cannot call them until 1949.

Mr. HACKETT: I did not understand the parliamentary assistant to say that. When is the earliest moment the bonds can be called?

Mr. MAYHEW: The United States ones are October 1, 1949. But this is not a case where, if this bill goes through, the department will rush out immediately and dispose of those bonds.

Mr. HACKETT: Could they not be called before 1949?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, they cannot be called before 1949.

Mr. HARKNESS: If they cannot be called before 1949, why should we authorize this $200,000,000 now? By 1949 it may perchance happen that United States exchange will be very much in our favour. Conditions may be entirely different. I completely fail to see why in 1947, and not even the latter part of 1947, we should be voting money to call bonds in 1949. It is absolutely certain that parliament will meet at least twice in the interim, and certainly we should not be called upon to vote this money now for a purpose we do not know. We do not know what the position will be in 1949.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wish to make it clear that I am not opposing this legislation, but my hon. friends to my right have a good deal of difficulty getting the information they want and, while I do not wish to raise a point of order, I would ask, should not this legislation be piloted through this house by a member of the cabinet?

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not know what information the hon. member wants that he has not been able to get.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friends to the right are not making much progress in getting the information they want and, before we pass this legislation, we should have either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Transport on hand to supply the information. Could we not report progress and resume the discussion later?

Mr. MAYHEW: The Minister of Justice is in the house, and I am sure that he would be able to answer more clearly than I have been able to do, and I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not carrying the legislation. I am not familiar with the bill at all, but I have been listening to the discussion and it seems to me that every question has been answered. There may be one or two questions outstanding.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is there not some provision in the Railway Act that when parliament gives authority to do certain things, issue bonds or borrow money, it must be done within a certain time? My recollection is hazy, but it strikes me that there is something in the Canadian National Railway Act or somewhere with respect to the time of sale of these securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no recollection on the matter at all; I am not in a position to answer the question.

Mr. MAYHEW: This is the same kind of bill which has been going through each time since 1929. It is four years since the last one went through. Practically everything is identical in this bill to the last one that went through. It will give the department a better chance to know what they are to do or to plan a little ahead of what they are to do than to wait and have to come back to the house each time. This is not something that goes through the estimates every year as ordinary amounts do. It is a matter of financing as one would finance his own business. He looks ahead to see when he can best sell his bonds or buy them. This is exactly the same thing. The Department of Finance wants to be in a position to negotiate the securities.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will you sell the whole of them now?

Mr. HARKNESS: May I have an answer to this question? Apart from the general statement which the parliamentary assistant has just made as to why it is necessary for us to vote this money now when the railway will not need half of it until 1949, frankly I completely fail to see why we should vote $200 million which cannot be used until 1949 In fact it seems to me a little ridiculous.

Mr. MUTCH: Are we voting any money at all in this bill?

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes.

Mr. MAYHEW: The sum of $20 million will be required on February 1, 1948, and $25 million on February 15, 1948.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that New York?

Mr. MAYHEW: No; Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: It still seems to me that we are asked to pass this bill with a scanty amount of information. In 1948, $45 million falls due and presumably will have to be refinanced. Although the parliamentary assistant has not said so, apparently $131 million in United States funds becomes callable in 1949. In other words, it becomes possible to call the bonds to the extent of $131 million. We are asked to pass this bill now authorizing the government to raise $200 million, the bulk of which will not be needed or it will not be possible to use it until 1949. The government may say, we are prepared or we desire to borrow in the money markets of the world in order to meet these obligations when they do fall due; or they may say, we wish to have this bill passed so that we may do this. The parliamentary assistant has not said that. But we have three possibilities: We can deplete our fast vanishing supply of hard currency in setting up a reserve for this $131 million; we can do it on the open market in New York and buy United States currency with Canadian dollars at a discount, or we can borrow United States dollars in order to refund this $131 million. If we take the latter course we presumably are expecting to get a lower rate of interest than this $131 million of capital is now costing us. Therefore I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should tell us what rate of interest we are paying on the $131 million and whether he expects to borrow in the New York market to refund these bonds. Does he expect to deplete our rapidly vanishing hard currency reserves, or does he propose to go out into the open market and purchase United States funds?

Mr. MAYHEW: I cannot tell the hon. member what they will do; I could not tell him myself what I would do until the time came when these maturities were due and what the situation would be at that time. But we should be in a position where it can be handled to the best advantage. I did not say that there were $131 million. That was picked up; but I shall give the figures if required.

Mr. ADAMSON: Let us have the figures.

Mr. MAYHEW: These figures are quite lengthy, but I shall be glad to put the table on Hansard, so that hon. members can see them in the morning. I think they will find I have already given the information which is in here. It may be convenient for hon. members to have them on Hansard.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is our net debt in hard currency?

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not know what the hon. member means by "net debt in hard currency".

Mr. ADAMSON: What is our net debt? How many of these bonds are payable either directly or by holders' option in New York or in United States funds?

Mr. MAYHEW: I gave that.

Mr. HARKNESS: $131 million.

Mr. MAYHEW: It totals $132 million and some odd: $8,629,000 payable in New York and $123,088,500 payable in Canada, London or New York. The two of these together total $132,717,500. If I have the consent of the committee I shall put the tables on Hansard.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MAYHEW: The tables are as follows:

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I make a remark that may clear up something? I have given the bill a little study and it seems to me that we have been talking at cross-purposes. I think what the bill says is this. It really authorizes the treasury to lend money on notes to the Canadian National Railways. That is what section 7 says. In the earlier sections, provision is made for assigning substituted securities for the securities which are paid in by the $200 million or such portion of the $200 million as may be decided on, so that tonight all we are asked to do is to authorize the borrowings on notes. "Notes" is the word used in section 7. In other words, the government gets a note from the Canadian National Railways for such portion of the $200 million as the railway wants to borrow from the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think that is exactly what it says.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why would the government be guaranteeing, then?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am coming to that. Against that borrowing we then have securities issued by the railway which the government guarantees and, according to section 4, these securities may be mostly in kind or issued probably at any time the government chooses. I hope the parliamentary assistant to the minister will agree that I have now perhaps—I hope finally—found out just what the gist of the bill is. Therefore all that we are really doing tonight is authorizing a loan from the treasury up to the $200 million to the Canadian National Railways on notes. Then we also authorize the treasury to guarantee new securities in substitution for those which are brought in and cremated as is provided in the act. So far as I am concerned I have some confusion in mind. I thought the securities were to be sold immediately or something of that sort in order to take up this $200 million. That is not so. The $200 million is a loan on a note as it is used. Then the government guarantees the securities issued by the railway company to take up the reclaimed outstanding bonds, or whatever they are. Having regard to our exchange situation—and this may be an amateurish suggestion—would it not be worth while considering the issue of new securities payable in New York in United States dollars at a discount, and thus, for the present at least, avoid paying bonuses—of ten per cent, as it is at the present time—in New York to get the United States dollars to pay off our present securities? That may not be a good suggestion, but it is one which has occurred to me.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member has put the situation exactly as I understand it. This is an enabling bill. The government may lend the railway company money, or the railway company may borrow from the public money which the government will guarantee. As I said two or three times, that is all we are doing. We are not rushing out now to buy. It is enabling legislation so that we can convert these as they come due, and to the best advantage. The suggestion made by the hon. member will certainly be considered when these transactions take place.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does this refinancing, or whatever it is called, include rolling stock trust certificates? In other words, does it include refinancing through repayments of loans to organizations such as the Guaranty Trust Company, which has the ownership of much of the rolling stock of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member will see the items when he gets his copy of Hansard tomorrow. It is in the table I have placed on record.

Mr. ADAMSON: But it does include those?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the type of security.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, some of them.

Mr. HACKETT: Did the parliamentary assistant say that a similar bill is passed every year?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, not every year. The last one was passed in 1944, but it was for a similar amount, and the sections in this bill are exactly the same as they were in the former one.

Mr. HACKETT: But is there any limitation as to the period during which the legislation is valid? If not, why do we have to renew the legislation now.

Mr. MAYHEW: The limitation is the amount; and there is also another limitation in that the last one comes due in 1954. So that it will all have to be paid by that time.

Mr. ADAMSON: One more question; do any of these bonds being refinanced include long-term securities which might have a gold clause in them? If so, does the government propose to repay some of these securities, if they exist, under the terms of that clause? Some of the old bonds did have a gold clause in them.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am informed that some of them have a gold clause in them. But a gold clause act has abrogated that. It has not been paid in gold since 1932 or 1933, I believe it was.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is that our act or the United States act? I ask that question because I am not familiar with the act abrogating the payment. I know the Americans did it, but I did not know we had done it; that we had an act abrogating paying of gold securities held by nationals of other countries. I know we did it to our own nationals, but I did not know we did it to the nationals of other countries.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We could not, of course.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am informed it was passed by congress and also by ourselves in 1932 or 1933.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Loans authorized to national company not exceeding aggregate amount of $200,000,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the parliamentary assistant will look at subsection 2 he will see that it states:

Should any such temporary loans be made within the limits aforesaid, substituted securities may subsequently be issued and guaranteed under the provisions of this act to repay such loans or any part thereof.

Obviously the securities there contemplated are not the securities contemplated in the first part of the bill. If we look at section 3 we find that it says:

. . . the national company may issue notes, obligations, bonds, debentures, or other securities...

That is, in substitution of loans, irrespective of whether they are bonds, or whatever securities they may be, which are paid off. Then we have ample power to do that.

Then subsection 2 of section 7 says that should any such temporary loans be made within the limits aforesaid, the substituted securities may subsequently be issued. Is that two sets of securities, or do we require that last bit at all?

What I had in mind was this, that the earlier section made provision for the railway issuing securities known as substituted securities. They are issued to take the place of securities which have been reclaimed. That being so, I do not see the object of section 7 (2). Obviously it is not to those earlier securities that this applies. I assume that it may be a security of the railway to the government. Perhaps that is it.

Mr. MAYHEW: Subsection 2 is the same as section 7 (2) of the act passed in 1944. It makes it quite clear that if the dominion government makes a temporary loan the company securities of the railway company guaranteed by the dominion may be issued to pay off the temporary loan.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is a security then, in favour of the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is separate from the railway. The railway is a corporation and the government is a government. I think the situation is clear. Section 2 provides that the governor in council may make provision for refunding; section 3 provides that the railway may issue these substituted securities; and section 7 provides that, in the meantime, the railway may temporarily borrow money from the government. Then, when the railway does issue substituted securities it takes part of the proceeds or all the proceeds and pays off the government. And the government may guarantee the repayment of substituted securities to the lender.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We have already done that. This latter section is to take care of the loan from the government to the railway.

Mr. ILSLEY: The temporary loan.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, the temporary situation. Then the substituted securities may be issued and guaranteed by the provisions of the act. As I understand it, if I am correct, we have already issued substituted securities to take care of the $200 million, or of that part of it we are redeeming. That has already been done under section 3. Then I gather, if I am correct, that we have no money left there, and that we then issue further securities to guarantee the repayment of the loan to the government. Is that the situation? It seems to me that we are doing it otherwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I speak subject to correction, because I am simply reading the bill and putting my interpretation on the language of it. It appears to be clear to me.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister is in the same unfortunate position as we are in. We read it and wonder.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bill seems clear to me. I do not understand that part of the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) when he assumed a situation in which substituted securities had already been issued; that is, issued before the government made the advance. That is not contemplated by this legislation. I suggest that when sections 2, 3 and 7 are read together, the normal course of procedure would be that the government would perhaps make a temporary loan to the railway for the railway's purposes. The railway would then proceed with refunding operations; when they were completed, securities called substituted securities would be issued to the lender by the Canadian National Railways. Those substituted securities would normally be guaranteed by the government, and out of the proceeds of those substituted securities the government would be paid off by the Canadian National Railways the amount of the government's temporary loan to the Canadian National Railways.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now.

Mr. KNOWLES: At the next sitting of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: On third reading?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I refer the hon. member to standing order 77.

Mr. KNOWLES: We went through this once before this evening. Standing order 73 provides as follows:

Every bill shall receive three several readings on different days previously to being passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read standing order 77.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call to the attention of the hon. member that this bill was not today read for the second time. It was considered in committee of the whole today. Therefore, according to the rules, it could be read for the third time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I object.

Bill read the third time and passed.

WAR CHARITIES ACT, 1939

AMENDMENT CONFINING PROVISIONS OF ACT TO FUNDS ALREADY REGISTERED

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. 205, to amend the War Charities Act, 1939.

Mr. FLEMING: The house is travelling a little behind schedule tonight, and I appreciate that the government may wish to have the bill disposed of in the few remaining minutes, if possible.

In the first place, I draw attention to the fact that this bill is an inevitable kind of bill, because the position of charities must revert at some time or another to the situation which existed prior to the war. The purpose of the bill is, therefore, such that it deserves the support of the house in so far as it seeks to close the class of charities to which the War Charities Act applies and which must submit to registration in accordance with the act before they are entitled to seek moneys by way of subscription.

The explanatory note I suggest, Mr. Speaker, overstates the effect of the bill. The bill provides that the application of the act shall be confined to war charities established prior to the coming into force of the act. Of course there is a difference between establishing the fund and submitting it to registration, and the explanatory note says that the effect of the amendment is, therefore, to confine the provision of the act to funds already registered for the purpose of complete administration of such funds and to free from the provisions of the act any new funds which would otherwise require to be registered. As the bill stands, of course it cannot have that effect because the effect of the bill as it now reads is to limit the effect of the act to charities established, whether registered or not, prior to the coming into force of the act. If the intention is as stated in the explanatory note, then I suggest that the bill will have to be amended when the house goes into committee. It may be that there are some new charities which are within the scope of the act but are not yet registered, since the 1945 amendment extended the scope of the War Charities Act to include funds to be used for the purpose of providing war memorials. Perhaps the minister can deal with that when he speaks.

There is one other matter—

Mr. MARTIN: So that we may save time, the provision is intended to apply to anything that is not already a registered charity, war memorial or otherwise.

Mr. FLEMING: Then I suggest to the minister that when we get into committee the word "established" should be amended to read "registered", and that will clarify it.

There is one matter that, I think, does call for some explanation. Section 12 of the Department of National War Services Act requires that an annual report be submitted to parliament, but the last report issued by this department covering the administration of war charities is the report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. The administration of this act was transferred from the Minister of National War Services to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by P.C. 134, dated January 14, of this year. That does not, I submit, override the requirement of the act in connection with annual reports to parliament. A report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, should have been submitted long ago, and none has yet been submitted.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the minister not think we should change that word to "registered"?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HACKETT: No, no. There is an amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: The amendment is for the committee. It can be raised in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—War Charities Act, 1939, to apply only to a fund established prior to this act.

Mr. MARTIN: I am very happy to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Eglinton that section 1 be amended in the second last line by substituting for the word "established" after the word "fund", the word "registered".

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FLEMING: Has the minister anything to say on the subject of the report and as to when the report may be expected? I appreciate that the administration of this act is in its closing stages, but parliament should have some assurance that the report required by the statute will be soon forthcoming. It is long overdue now.

Mr. MARTIN: It will be. I will deal with the matter on the estimates.

Mr. FLEMING: When will that be?

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

RESOLUTION EXTENDING GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES TO HIS MAJESTY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as today has been set apart for the official observance in Canada of His Majesty's birthday I am sure it will be the wish of all hon. members that an expression of their good wishes be extended to His Majesty, King George VI, from this House of Commons. I have had a word this morning with my friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and he and I have agreed on a resolution which we are sure that hon. members will be pleased to support. I would suggest that after the motion has been put by His Honour the Speaker, and any other hon. members who may wish to speak to the motion have addressed the house, we should signify our approval of it by the singing of God Save the King.

The motion, seconded by Mr. Bracken, is as follows:

That an humble address be sent to His Majesty, King George VI, in the following words:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, desire respectfully to extend to Your Majesty, on this day set apart for the celebration in Canada of the King's birthday, our loyal greetings and heartfelt good wishes. We pray that Divine Providence may continue to guide and protect Your Majesty and that you may be given strength to meet in the future as you have in the past the great responsibilities of your high office."

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to associate myself with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this resolution. I am pleased also to associate the party I lead with the good wishes it expresses to His Majesty the King.

This is a resolution which does not need the support of argument in order to secure what I trust will be the unanimous approval of this house. The crown in all parts of the commonwealth has come to mean to us more than a hereditary position, more than royalty, more than kingship as we have known it in the past. The crown has come to mean a continuing democracy, no matter how often governments change, and no matter what party is in power. Members of the commonwealth may differ in many things, but there is one thing in which they do not differ, and that is in the respect we have for the person of His Majesty the King and the high regard we have for the crown as we have come to know it. I am very happy indeed to have this opportunity of associating this group with the spirit of the resolution.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I just say that we of this party wish to associate ourselves with the expressions of loyalty and good wishes which have been extended to His Majesty the King, the symbol of our unity within the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I am sure that I speak for every member of this group when I say that we are happy to join with others in support of the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister. It is most fitting at this time that we all unite in expressing our good will and felicitations to the crown in the person of the king, and to assure him of our united loyalty to the great ideals for which Britain has stood for so many years.

(Translation):

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to mark the bilingual character of this house in associating myself and all those whose mother tongue is mine with the feelings expressed in the resolution moved by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bracken).

PRICE CONTROL

FURTHER LIST OF ARTICLES AND SERVICES REMOVED FROM CEILING AND RATIONING

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that effective today a further list of articles and services has been removed from price ceiling and rationing controls. The list is much shorter and less important than at previous stages of the decontrol programme. The main groups are, first, certain products which it is desirable to remove from control now because of seasonal factors; secondly, a number of metals which show signs of having settled at price levels on world markets substantially above those prevailing in pre-war years; and, thirdly, restaurant meals.

The most important foodstuffs released from price control are dairy products of all kinds, including butter, cheese, evaporated milk and ice cream. These products are now at their seasonal peak of production and price ceilings can therefore be removed with minimum danger of significant price increases. At the same time butter is removed from the list of rationed foods.

Honey, being subject to the same seasonal factors, is removed from both price control and rationing. All jams, jellies and marmalades are also being derationed but price controls are being retained on strawberry and raspberry jam and any jam containing strawberries or raspberries.

Eggs were removed from price control several weeks ago. Because of good supplies it has now been decided to remove ceilings from poultry and poultry products of all kinds. Canned soups and salt are also released from price ceilings.

With respect to clothing, home furnishings and household equipment and supplies, the items removed from control are of relatively minor importance, and I shall not take the time of the house by listing them.

All agricultural equipment and supplies remain under the ceiling, with the exception of brooders, incubators and other poultry equipment for which the current season is past. Hay, which will soon be at its season of high production, is free from control.

The new order provides for the removal of only three items in the list of construction products, namely, hardwood lumber and plywood made wholly of hardwood and hardwood veneers. This action has been taken, first because practically all end-products have already been removed from control, and, second, because increased production in the United States, accompanied by some recession in United States prices, is now reducing the cost of hardwood imported into Canada. Millwork of all kinds remains under control.

In the metals field, the new order removes from control lead, copper and zinc, leaving under control only primary and secondary tin and alloys containing more than 95 per cent tin. World prices of lead, copper and zinc appear to have settled fairly steadily at levels considerably above pre-war. Since practically all the end-products which embody these metals have already been removed from control, this appeared to be a logical time to complete the process of decontrol of these items.

The only other important change is to free from control the supplying of meals and refreshments in all public eating places. The government has had to recognize the fact that during the past few months most of the costs which enter into restaurant meals either have been decontrolled or, as in the case of meat, butter, sugar, shortening and rents, have had authorized price increases. The government considers the time now appropriate to take this further step.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR A BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): The right of petitioning the crown and parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution. Since the ordinary citizen has no right to appear personally before the House of Commons, I have been asked to present to this house a petition signed by 500,967 Canadians asking for a bill of rights. I now present the petition, although I do not agree with the religious views of the organization which promoted it.

Mr. CLAXTON: With reference to these six questions having to do with the Canadian navy, it is not considered in the public interest to give the names, locations and strengths of ships in the Canadian navy in detail. There is no objection, however, to giving the total strength of the Royal Canadian Navy, which today stands at 7,386, of which 1,202 are officers and 1,845 are chief and petty officers. Of these 3,590 are on the complements of ships.

As was announced in the house last Monday by myself, Canada at present has one aircraft carrier, the Warrior, on loan from the United Kingdom, and this will be replaced at the end of the year by the Magnificent, which will also be on loan from the United Kingdom.

We own two cruisers, the Uganda and Ontario. The Ontario will be commissioned in July when the Uganda will be placed in reserve. We have ten destroyers, of which five are in commission and one is awaiting disposal. We have fifteen frigates, of which ten are for disposal and one is in commission. We have nine minesweepers, of which one is for disposal and four are in commission.

In understand that, with the information contained in the statement I have just given, the hon. member for Yale is agreeable to accepting the questions as being answered or dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PENSIONS TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Do any former employees of the Canadian National Railways, now retired receive pensions from the United States as well as pensions from Canada because of international service? If so, how many?

2. Is any deduction made from the Canadian pension of such persons by reason of pension rights earned in the United States?

3. If so, what is the basis of such deduction, what is the average amount, and for what reason is such deduction made?

4. How many present employees of the Canadian National Railways are earning pension rights in both the United States and Canada because of international service?

5. Is there any curtailment of the Canadian pension rights of said employees because of pension rights earned in the United States?

6. If so, on what basis, how much is to be deducted, and for what reason is it done?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes. 265.

2. By agreement dated May 31, 1937, between the Canadian National Railway Company and the general chairmen of the employees' committees it was agreed that a coordinated pension would be paid to all Canadian National railway retiring employees who had been engaged in international service on the following basis:

(a) Such employees to be entitled to contribute to the railway pension fund on earnings for services performed in Canada. They are required by the U.S. Railroad Retirement Tax Act to contribute to the U.S. railroad retirement fund on earnings for services performed in the United States. Such contributions (within certain limits) to be matched by the railway.

(b) On retirement they receive a coordinated pension equal to what they would receive if all their service had been in Canada and if contributions paid into the U.S. railroad retirement fund had been paid into the railway pension fund. The proportion payable by the railway is the difference between this coordinated pension and the amount awarded by the U.S. railroad retirement board.

3. See answer to question 2. Without such a coordinated pension international employees would have been in a more favourable position than employees who served wholly in Canada or wholly in the United States.

4. 1,347 in the month of April, 1947.

5. See answers to questions 2 and 3.

6. See answers to questions 2 and 3.

WARTIME HOUSING—PETERBOROUGH

Mr. FRASER:

What is the total amount of moneys received by the Wartime Housing for rents from the following wartime houses in Peterborough, Ontario, from the date they were first rented until March 31, 1947: (a) rents from 4-room bungalows in project No. 1, rents from 6-room houses in project No. 1, rents from 4-room (large) bungalows in project No. 1; (b) rents from 4-room bungalows in project No. 2, rents from 6-room houses in project No. 2, rents from 4-room (large) bungalows in project No. 2; (c) rents from 4-room bungalows in project No. 3, rents from 6-room houses in project No. 3, rents from 4-room (large) bungalows in project No. 3; (d) rents from 4-room bungalows in project No. 5, rents from 6-room houses in project No. 5, rents from 4-room (large) bungalows in project No. 5; (e) rents from 4-room bungalows in project No. 8, rents from 6-room houses in project No. 8, rents from 5-room bungalows in project No. 8?

Mr. HOWE: In connection with the question I have a letter from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, of which I shall read one paragraph, as follows:

We have at present a total of 658 wartime houses in Peterborough. The only form of record which shows both the type of house and the actual rentals received is the tenant's rent ledger card. I am sure you will appreciate that during the life of a project there is a considerable turnover of tenants and that we might well have an average of five tenant cards per house to review to compile the data required. The tenant's rent ledger cards would show all moneys collected as rents from the individual tenants but it would be necessary to total the various entries of these cards to compile the required answer. I am sure you will agree that to have this done in overtime periods by a staff that is already worked to capacity would take several weeks.

I suggest that perhaps the hon. member will reword his question. It has been suggested that we can give the total gross rent receipts from wartime houses rented in Peterborough.

Mr. FRASER: The gross rent receipts for each type of house in each project would be sufficient.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MOTOR VEHICLES—C.M. DEPOT, HAGERSVILLE, ONT.

Mr. LENNARD:

1. How many motor vehicles were at C.M. depot, Hagersville, as of May 1, 1947?

2. How many in each classification?

3. How many of these were (a) new (never been used); (b) reconditioned; (c) beyond repair?

4. What disposition is to be made of these motor vehicles?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 7,097.

2. (a) Engineer, technical and armoured vehicles, 2,569; (b), personnel and load carrying vehicles, 4,528.

3. (a) 3,769; (b), 3,227; (c), 101 in process of disposal to War Assets Corporation.

4. (a), 6,996 to be distributed to active and reserve units of the navy, army and air services as required; (b), 101 to War Assets.

CIVIL SERVICE—WAR DUTIES SUPPLEMENTS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What are the names of temporary and permanent civil servants in the city of Ottawa who did not receive payment of war duties supplements in (a) the Department of Mines and Resources; (b) National Film Board; (c) War Assets Corporation; (d) Department of Transport?

2. Who recommended payment of war duties supplements in the above-mentioned departments?

3. What constituted eligibility for the payment of war duties supplements?

4. Why were war duties supplements not paid to all employees of the departments mentioned?

Mr. HOWE: I can answer this as it affects the Department of Mines and Resources. There are about ninety members on the staff of mines and resources out of some 6,000 who received war duties supplements. If my hon. friend would reword his question and ask for the names of those who received the supplement it would be much simpler than to give the names of those who did not.

Mr. LOCKHART: Stands.

Question stands.

CANADA-AMERICAN DEFENCE BOARD

Mr. McKAY:

1. What are the duties of the Canada-American defence board in peace time?

2. Who are Canada's representatives on this board?

3. What is their tenure of office?

4. How much salary and expenses is each member allowed yearly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. The permanent joint board on defence was established in 1940 by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States in order to facilitate the consideration of common problems related to the defence of the northern half of the western hemisphere. As indicated in the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons of February 12, the board continues to make recommendations to the two governments concerning defence co-operation between Canada and the United States.

2. General the Hon. A. G. L. McNaughton, chairman, Major General C. C. Mann, army member, Acting Commodore F. L. Houghton, naval member, Air Vice Marshal W. A. Curtis, air member, Mr. S. F. Rae, secretary.

3. Members of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence are appointed by order in council.

4. No salary is paid to members of the board for their work on the board. Three or four meetings are held annually either in Canada or in the United States, the expenses of which are met by the individual departments concerned.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—HOSPITAL DESIGN DIVISION

Mr. BREITHAUPT:

1. What is the function of the hospital design division of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

2. Since the inception of this division, how many requests have been received for designs or information regarding active treatment hospitals?

3. How many requests have been received for assistance in replanning existing hospitals?

4. What other information besides active treatment hospital plans has been supplied by the hospital design division?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. To collect, tabulate and make available to the provinces the most recent information regarding the planning of hospitals and other health institutions, and to be prepared to study problems of design and construction in the provinces.

2. Thirty-three.

3. Nine.

4. (a) Preliminary plans for an 85-bed pediatric hospital; (b) Preliminary plans for 60-bed and 120-bed tuberculosis sanatoria and also for nurses' residence: (c) Design of a chest operating suite for a teaching hospital.

BARCLAYS BANK (CANADA)—RESIGNATION OF CANADIAN DIRECTORS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. During the summer of 1946, did five Canadian directors of Barclays Bank (Canada) tender their resignation from the board of directors of the said bank on account of a difference of opinion with its head office in England concerning a fundamental policy?

2. If so (a) who were the said directors; (b) have they informed the finance department of the subject of such difference of opinion?

3. If so, what was the subject of such difference of opinion?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. In accordance with the provisions of section 113 (1) of the Bank Act, Barclays Bank (Canada) advised the Minister of Finance that on August 6, 1946, the following directors had resigned: Mr. A. A. Magee; Hon. L. A. Taschereau; Hon. J. L. Ralston; Mr. Henry Borden; Mr. J. C. Cushing.

No reasons were given for the resignations.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO PARTNERSHIPS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act to provide for the making of guaranteed loans to veterans already established in partnership businesses for expenditure by the partnership and to enable a veteran to include as part or all of his cash requirements under the act, moneys expended by him in connection with his business between the date of assent to the bill and the date of proclamation of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

83166—250

REVISED EDITION

He said: The reason for this motion is the observance of certain national and international courtesies.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF DISPLACED PERSONS FROM EUROPE

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the house an order in council, P.C. 2180, relating to immigration. The order provides for the immediate admission to Canada of 5,000 persons from the displaced persons' camps of Europe.

The 5,000 individuals to be covered by this order will include those displaced persons who have already been admitted. They need not be relatives of residents of Canada. The new order is designed as a further Canadian contribution to the solution of the general problem of the displaced persons.

In the selection of displaced persons, priority will be given to those persons who have skills and aptitudes which will make them capable of absorption in industries where there is a reasonable guarantee of steady employment. In the light of the existing housing situation, priority will also be accorded to single persons.

In discussing this matter in the past the Canadian government has taken the attitude that we would be prepared to do our full share, along with other countries, whenever an international agreement could be reached on the disposal of the persons in these camps. With that end in view, we have supported the work of the international committee on refugees and have taken a prominent part in the negotiations leading to the establishment of the international refugee organization.

We had hoped and expected that more rapid action would have been possible in connection with the organization of the I.R.O. and that this would have facilitated the early conclusion of an agreement on the disposal of the displaced persons. However, one delay after another has occurred and it now looks as though it would still be a matter of some months before the I.R.O. is established and is able to work out the terms of an international agreement.

Rather than wait for the initiation and the completion of the negotiations for a general attack upon the refugee problem, the government has decided to make this initial contribution to the solution of the problem.

The number of persons admitted as a result of this initiative will, of course, be deductable from any general quota that Canada agrees to accept following the international discussions on this subject.

As has been repeatedly pointed out, the greatest present difficulty in the way of a major immigration movement to Canada is the lack of shipping. I am now glad to be able to report that the government hopes to be able to arrange for the conversion for immigration purposes of a vessel received on reparations account from Germany. In addition, we are continuing our efforts to obtain more space for immigrants on vessels under the control of the I.G.C.R. or provided by the British ministry of transport.

With regard to the plans for the selection, transportation and distribution within Canada of the persons covered by the new order, it has been arranged that the handling of these matters outside Canada will be under the control of the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources; and within Canada, under the control of the Department of Labour. In carrying out its work of selection and transportation the immigration service will be assisted by representatives of the Department of Labour, and in arranging for the distribution of the new immigrants throughout Canada the Department of Labour will receive assistance from the officers of the immigration service within this country. It is expected, for example, that the immigration buildings in several of our larger cities will be used as distribution centres in which the new immigrants may be initially received, and from which they may be sent on to their ultimate destination.

The government does not, of course, consider that this initiative will meet the full Canadian responsibility in relation to the displaced persons. We do believe, however, that it is a contribution towards the solution of this very grave problem and is a recognition of our moral obligation to contribute to a solution.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources tell the house when the immigration of the Dutch farmers is likely to begin? Prominent Ontario agriculturists have asked me about it. They think there is undue delay in these Dutch people coming in. Can the minister make a statement?

Mr. HOWE: The matter is entirely one of transportation. I shall be glad to make inquiries as to the present position and reply to my hon. friend tomorrow.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask a question arising out of the minister's statement. Will the cost of transportation be paid by the Canadian government?

Mr. HOWE: No. The cost of transportation by ship is paid by the international relief organization.

Mr. COLDWELL: The intergovernmental committee?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources state whether any of the 5,000 immigrants to whom he refers will be suited by training and inclination for domestic service?

Mr. HOWE: Ways and means of obtaining suitable persons for domestic service are now being studied. I think I can assure my hon. friend that immigrants of that class will be among those who will be brought here.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister if the agreement with the intergovernmental committee to pay transportation applies from now on, or whether it is in any respect retroactive?

Mr. HOWE: I understand that transportation by ship has been available from the organization since the commencement of the movement, and was available, as a matter of fact, to the extent of the cost of transportation by ship in the movement sponsored by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. BRACKEN: The Minister of Reconstruction has intimated that 5,000 immigrants are being allowed to come in from the displaced persons camps in Europe. Has he the latest estimate of the number of displaced persons in Europe now; and can he—perhaps not today, but later—give us some idea of what other countries are doing to help solve that problem?

Mr. HOWE: I understand that the number of displaced persons in camps is about 850,000. Ours is a small contribution towards Canada's share of the problem. I shall be glad to make a further statement after I have consulted with officers of the department.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC AND PARKING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works if something cannot be done to stop cars from speeding around the parliament buildings and on the roads leading to the gates of the parliament buildings. Automobiles come around those curves at high speed. Some of us are not as young as we used to be and cannot step in as lively a manner as we could a few years ago. This is really a serious matter; I have seen some near accidents.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I will take note of the remarks made by the hon. member and give instructions that if there is any speeding it is to be stopped.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Minister of Public Works if he will at the same time take into consideration the strengthening of the hands of the mounted police who look after the automobiles around this building? They tell me they have not the power to supervise their disposition.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There is a statute, which was passed in 1930, regulating traffic on government-owned property. We never had any difficulty until this year, when some people complained about the parking space which was allotted to members and officials. One went so far as to say that the statute did not give the mounted police authority to prosecute those who did not follow the regulations. I myself am not too sure whether the statute does give the mounted police the power to regulate motor vehicle traffic on parliament hill. I am having the officials of my department study those regulations. They have also been submitted to the Department of Justice. If we are not empowered under the actual statute to control or regulate automobile traffic on these grounds, we shall have to bring in a new statute which will give us that power.

Mr. GRAYDON: More legislation.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY

INQUIRY AS TO CHRISTENING OF S.S. "ABEGWEIT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he say when the S.S. Abegweit will be christened?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The present plans are to have the naming ceremony for the new Prince Edward Island car ferry on Saturday, June 28, next.

PRIVILEGE

MR. QUELCH—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF JUNE 7

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I rise to a question of personal privilege. On Saturday, June 7, the Ottawa Journal contained the following report:

Mr. Quelch said that he was becoming convinced that there was to be war with some country . . .

That is not my view, and I quote from page 3896 of Hansard of Friday, June 6, in order to show what I actually said:

To listen to some hon. members one would almost come to the conclusion that a war with some countries is imminent.

MR. MCIVOR—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF JUNE 7

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I rise to a question of privilege. On Saturday, June 7, a report in the Globe and Mail refers to something that I was not guilty of. Speaking of my speech, it says: "He sat down and turned his back on Mr. Pouliot." The hon. member for Temiscouata is an independent Liberal member and lives up to his reputation. I am often proud of him, and while I do not always agree with him I have nothing but respect for him.

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF JUNE 7

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I thank my reverend deskmate for his kind reference, and I rise to a question of privilege with respect to the same article in the same paper. The report says:

Deputy Chairman Ross Macdonald (L. Brantford City), had to call for order several times as first Jean-Francois Pouliot (L. Temiscouata) and then several Social Credit M.P.'s insisted on discussing matters which were not before the house.

Then again he says:

After calling Mr. Pouliot to order several times, Deputy Chairman Macdonald pointed out—

And so on. Then the reporter repeated the same thing a third time in regard to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). There are several mistakes in that. In the first place I was not called to order by the hon. member for Brantford City. He was not in the house; and he is not deputy chairman. Therefore the Globe and Mail does not inform its readers properly.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

MR. POULIOT—QUESTION PLACED ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have another question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on a different matter. It concerns a question of mine which has been mutilated to the point that it is unrecognizable, and is no longer one of my brain children. On Friday of the week before last I gave this question to the clerk:

1. Referring to the government statement at page 1997 of Hansard (April 14, 1947), that an application for a passport is a confidential document, why is it so, since when, and in virtue of what authority?

2. Is the passport itself a confidential or public document, and why?

The only part of that question I see in Hansard, at page 3708, June 2, is:

Why is a passport a confidential document?

I say it is not fair to mutilate a question to that extent, to carve it up and put my name to it. The question that appeared in Hansard is not at all the question I asked. What I want to know is why an application for a passport is a confidential passport, while the passport itself is not.

VISITING FORCES

UNITED STATES—DISCIPLINE AND INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION WHEN IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the third reading of Bill No. 253, to make provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada and with respect to the exercise of discipline and to the internal administration of such forces.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this measure before it is given third reading. I am not going to deal with the principle of the bill, because that was settled on Friday when we voted for second reading. When the bill was being considered in committee of the whole a statement was made that to me is somewhat disturbing. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe), in discussing certain aspects of the bill, made this statement:

I propose to ask the minister a question which he may or may not care to answer. I believe that it should be asked and that some definite statement should be made with respect to it. This committee should be informed as to how many United States troops are in this country at the present time. We should know what they are doing in Canada and what their disposition is, that is to say, in what parts of the country they are at the present time.

That is at page 3876 of Hansard. In reply, on the same page, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned that the number of United States troops stationed in Canada was not very large, and that wherever they were stationed they were fewer in number than the Canadian troops who were with them. His statement was:

> They are less numerous than our own personnel. It is by design and arrangement that they are kept less numerous than our own. That is the way in which the policy is being carried out.

But in regard to United States troops in other parts of Canada the minister said:

> There are a few others at other places, but I would not feel at liberty to disclose that information without conferring with the chief of staff and ascertaining whether it would be proper to do so.

It seems to me an amazing state of affairs that a member of the cabinet, asked a question in this house, cannot answer that question until he refers the subject matter to the chief of staff. That sort of answer might have been satisfactory when the country was at war, but certainly it is not a satisfactory answer at the present time, when the country is at peace. I believe—and in this matter I think the precedents in British countries hold with me—that the members of this house should be informed not only as to where foreign troops are, when they are on our soil, and what they are doing, but also where our own troops are, when they are under arms, and what they are doing. That should be so in time of peace. If we are secretive about these matters surely we are bound to create suspicion not only in our own country but outside as well. So I would suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that even now, before this bill is given third reading, he should give a full and complete answer as to the number of United States troops in this country, where they are stationed and what they are doing. Parliament is entitled to that information, and nothing less; and I believe that in the interests of world peace and the elimination of suspicion in these affairs the answer should be given before this bill receives third reading.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reason for my statement that I would wish to confer with the chief of staff before answering that question was not that I wish to have the opinion of the chief of staff about it; but as it had to do with the presence here of men in uniform from our neighbour to the south, I wished to be informed by him whether it might be embarrassing to him in his relations with them to have that information published. The hon. member will realize that these matters are not of very great consequence at the present time, because there are only very small numbers who are cooperating; but I did not feel at liberty to answer without being sure that when the arrangements had been made for a few men to come to such and such a place, it was with the express or implied understanding that the particulars could be made public. I think the hon. member will agree that we are under some obligation of courtesy in that regard, and it was for that reason that I stated perhaps in general terms what I should have stated a little more precisely, that I wanted to be sure there would be no violation of courtesy in giving that information.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just add one word to what my hon. friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has said. It is not a matter of courtesy. May I say to the minister that we are prepared to extend all the courtesies possible to our great American neighbour. But throughout the ages—at least ever since the execution of Charles I—the right of parliament to know what troops or armies are within the borders of the country, and under whose command they are, and what they are doing, has been a fundamental principle of our British parliamentary practice. It is not because we wish to be discourteous to our great neighbour to the south, but rather because we believe this parliament has a right—indeed a duty—to inquire into the movement of foreign troops in this country in peace time—and I say "in peace time" because when we are at war and allied with another nation, circumstances are entirely different—we have a duty, I say, to ask what troops are on our soil. We have a duty in relation to our own troops to see to it that no outside individual or group shall have control in our own country. If it is true that this parliament has entire control of military arrangements within our own country, then parliament should know exactly what troops, other than our own, are on the soil of Canada at a given time. That is the point at issue—not the matter of courtesy or discourtesy.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has referred to the time-honoured rule which, he says, is observed in the British parliament, that information as to the number of troops in the country must be disclosed at all times.

Mr. COLDWELL: To parliament.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, to parliament. I can refer my hon. friend to a refusal to indicate to the British parliament the number of British troops in Great Britain, which was given by their minister of defence on March 4, 1947, as reported at page 43 of their Hansard. I have looked into this matter and I can refer the hon. member to a number of other answers in the debates of the House of Commons at Westminster in the course of which ministers of the crown have refused, on the ground of public interest, to give information as to the detailed disposition of their own forces in Great Britain or outside Great Britain.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is familiar with the discussions which took place before the united nations as to the desirability of full disclosure by all nations of information of military value; and he knows how far that suggestion got before that body. He must know that in these matters, if you give all the information you have to other countries, you have very little chance of getting any information in return. I will be frank with the house and say that in this instance the information is not of any genuine military significance, because the numbers are so small and the operations are of such a routine character that they would not be of any great significance to any country.

We hope that the international situation will not deteriorate; we hope that it may be possible to exchange information on terms of complete and guaranteed reciprocity with all countries. But we are not certain that that day will come. Until it does come we do not feel it is in the interests of Canada or of the defence of this continent to establish the precedent of making disclosures not only to members of parliament—because there is no difficulty about that—but to the public and to other nations, of the detailed disposition, purpose, location and numbers of our forces or those of any friendly country within our boundaries, because of the significance that might be attached to changes and developments that might be made.

The situation as it exists today is, as I say, not at all significant or serious. But let us suppose, for example, that three more weather stations or five more loran stations are built, and let us suppose that the number of men serving those stations, partly Canadian and partly American, has increased. That can be played up in this or in other countries as a dangerous and threatening sign, whereas everyone in this country knows that it would be nothing but the most reasonable step in the defence of our own country and to prepare us for any emergency that may arise.

These matters of defence have changed greatly since the period between the two wars.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Now we have inventions like radar, loran and inventions of other types which are of use principally for defensive purposes. Their location and number may be of some interest, and until we can secure an exchange of information on a guaranteed reciprocal basis we do not propose to give that information away to anyone who wants to get it. But as for hon. members in the house, let me say that we should be glad indeed to give them the fullest possible information as to the situation.

What I have said does not apply to the total of forces or to matters which are of common interest and common knowledge in Canada. But we do not believe it is a good thing to give information as to the disposition, location, purpose and strength of these forces in detail, not because of what exists today, but because of some significance which may be attached to changes in the future—and which almost certainly would be attached, judging from our experience.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Vancouver-East deplored the debate; and I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs went some way in agreeing with them. I too would like to express regret at some of the things said in the debate; but I would call attention to the fact that many of them, which I believe many of us would regret, were occasioned by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) representing the C.C.F.

When later the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that some of the things said in debate did not represent the point of view of parliament or of the country, I must say the question arose in my mind whether some of the statements of the hon. member for Regina City, as reported at pages 3795 and following, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at page 3835 and the hon. member for Swift Current at page 3846, represent the views of the C.C.F. That they did not represent the views of parliament or of the country I am convinced, but I think it is of interest to learn if they did represent the views of the C.C.F.

As a further word in conclusion I would point out that some thirty speakers took part in the debate, of whom thirteen were members of the official opposition and nine were members of the C.C.F. while only six speeches were made by representatives on this side. Of those six, two speeches were made by the minister who introduced the bill, and one by myself in explanation of some of its features. It cannot be said that this debate was in any way occasioned or carried on by members on this side, it can be said to the contrary that more than two-thirds of the time of parliament was taken up by representatives of the opposition.

In our view this bill was not a bill of great significance. It was designed to enable Canada to extend in peace time a privilege that it had been found useful to accord to the troops of the other country in war time. It does not infringe on the sovereignty of Canada or on the jurisdiction of our courts. It simply gives visiting forces to our country the privilege of trying their own men for offences under their own military law. It is a privilege extended by the United Kingdom to the United States and Canada. It is a privilege extended by the United States to the United Kingdom and Canada. It is a privilege extended already by Canada to the rest of the commonwealth, and it seemed to us to be a reasonable provision and in accordance with our common interests that we should extend the same privilege to the United States that they had already extended to us.

Hon. members have spoken throughout this debate as if the advantages of our common participation in joint defence in accordance with the arrangements announced by the President and by the Prime Minister on the 12th of February were entirely one-sided. The arrangement was spoken of as if Canada were the only beneficiary. This arrangement was made in the interests of Canada, of course, but it was made by the United States in the interests of the United States. It is in our common interest, and that is why it was made. Further, the cooperation extended under the arrangement is by no means one-sided. On account of the fact that the United States has some twelve times our population and many times our wealth and many times our power, she naturally has the most to contribute. But it is by no means a one-sided arrangement, and I can assure the members of the house that we intend to have this arrangement carried out, so far as lies within our power, on a reciprocal basis, by means of which we would give to the United States the full advantage of such inventions, discoveries and works as we have—there is much we can claim to our credit in these fields—and we shall also engage with them in common measures of joint training and the like.

Hon. members spoke as if it were contemplated that there would be large numbers of United States troops drilling and training here. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made it clear that that is not contemplated at the present time at all. This is entirely, I would say, at the staff, liaison, testing and experimental level. So there is no considerable group of United States troops in Canada and no group of Canadian troops in the United States at the present time receiving training for training's sake, that is, which will be of primary value because its primary purpose is directly to increase their military skill. This is an extension of the kind of arrangement friendly countries have carried on throughout the ages, the exchange of staff information, the exchange for training purposes of staff, the exchange of matters of common interest of one kind or another. No other two adjacent countries, I think, on the face of the earth have ever before had such close and intimate relations as the United States and Canada, and have such common interests in their common defence. It is because of that that this arrangement was made, born of the statement of the President and the Prime Minister in 1938, carried through in the declaration of Ogdensburg on August 19, 1940, and the basis for so much of the allied cooperation which contributed to victory. It seemed to us that this arrangement should be carried on in peace. It seemed to us to be the merest act of common sense in the common interests of two good neighbours.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the minister referred to some remarks of mine on Friday in his criticism of myself and those associated with me. I want to tell him that he should have gone farther afield than the members of this group. The whole tenor of the debate was unfortunate, and that was occasioned by the secrecy concerning the movement, not of our own troops, but of foreign troops within the borders of our country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is an argument, not a question of privilege.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, nearly everyone who has taken part in this debate has assured the house that he had not intended to speak. I on the contrary, Mr. Speaker, have intended to speak from the very beginning; I have waited long for an opportunity to address the house.

I am not going to approach the question from the point of view of international politics, nor shall I criticize the purpose of the bill. It seems to me however that the bill is without purpose unless it anticipates the presence in this country of the troops of a friendly nation in substantial numbers. Week-end visits, excursions by boat or by rail of military or naval units, even a week's outing here by United States forces, would not give rise, in my view, to the enactments that are found in this bill. The purpose of the bill has been stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) and it is not my intention to question the accuracy of his statement. I would, however, like to dwell for a short time on the results of passing the bill.

We recall that the party of which I am a member has found the going in the province of Quebec very rough for the last thirty years because that party was looked upon in Quebec, and was held up forsooth by the party which constitutes the government, as a war party, as an imperialist party, as a party which desired war; as a party which whenever there was any possibility of electing as between domestic interests and imperial interests always neglected the domestic interests to favour the imperial interests. I need not assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I felt and still feel that those charges were wrongful, that they were without basis; nevertheless they did find credence in the minds of a large number of the electors of my province.

All through the years there never was a general election that a great war was not hatched for the purpose of compelling the vote of Quebec into the support of the party which constitutes the government opposite. I can turn to newspapers printed and published on the eve of each general election and establish beyond any doubt that the Conservative party was branded by the Liberal party as a party of warmongers; and coupled with that charge was the assertion that if the people of Quebec did not want their children to be conscripted and sent away to fight an impending war in which they had no interest whatsoever, they should eschew the opportunity of supporting the Conservative party.

Mr. CLAXTON: Does the hon. member remember the Drummond-Arthabaska by-election of 1910?

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. gentleman remembers the Drummond-Arthabaska by-election very well, and is willing to discuss it. He remembers other elections, too; and if the hon. minister wants him to name the ministers on that side who took part in these other elections and made statements that are shameful, he can do so. I believe that this debate, whatever its purpose, will have the result of making it clear to the people of Quebec that there are times when the people of Canada have to take on the defence of Canada, and at no time has any other policy been that of the Conservative party. I go further and say that when we have a debate of this kind—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must rise to a point of order. This discussion has nothing to do with the question before the house.

Mr. GREEN: You can't take it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I detest interruptions. It is interesting to listen to my friend's discussion, but it has nothing whatsoever to do with the motion for third reading of this bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I was under the same impression as the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I was going to ask the hon. member for Stanstead if he would relate his remarks more directly to the bill under discussion, which makes provision with respect to forces of the United States of America when visiting Canada. At present I cannot see how his remarks are related to this bill. May I ask him to relate them to the bill?

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, if it will not put too great a burden on your patience I intend to show that my remarks are very directly associated with the bill, and that they are pertinent to it. It is my aim to establish that whatever the purpose of this bill, its result is to show to the province of Quebec that there are occasions when preparations for war have to be made, and I was merely leading up to the point by showing that in the past it had been the policy of the party which constitutes the government of today to preach at all times that there was no reason to prepare for war or to anticipate war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want to challenge that statement from my own experience.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BROOKS: That emphasizes only the correctness of it.

Mr. HACKETT: If the hon. gentleman will bear with me for a moment I will be very happy to accept his challenge. I am not going to talk about what happened in 1914 or 1915 or 1916, or in the election of 1921 or 1925 or 1926 or 1930.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Or 1911.

Mr. HACKETT: I am going to talk of the period when disaster was dripping from the clouds; I am going to talk of the period after Munich; I am going to talk of the period when everyone knew that war was inevitable, and I am going to read to him a passage from a speech of his own leader delivered in the House of Commons on the 30th day of March, 1939.

Mr. CLAXTON: How are you going to relate that to the bill?

Mr. HACKETT: These are the words of the Prime Minister of Canada on that occasion, as reported at page 2419 of Hansard:

The idea that every twenty years this country should automatically and as a matter of course take part in a war overseas for democracy or self-determination of other small nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save, periodically, a continent that connot run itself, and to these ends risk the lives of its people, risk bankruptcy and political disunion, seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

That is the statement which was made in the house by the Prime Minister of Canada in March, 1939, when everyone knew that war was inevitable. I follow that up with another statement, when the Prime Minister, a few years later, was criticized and condemned for making no preparation whatever for the war that everyone knew was coming. He said in the house on the 11th day of August, 1944, that previous to the statement which I have just read, in 1937 forsooth, he had gone to Germany and to Hitler, and this is what he told Hitler at that time. Said the Prime Minister on August 11, 1944, as reported at page 6275 of Hansard:

But I do tell this House of Commons today that my visit to Germany had as its objective to make it perfectly clear that, if there was a war of aggression, nothing in the world would keep the Canadian people from being at the side of Britain. That was known to the German government at that time, and my action in the matter was fully known to the British government; but I did not talk about it at the time, for it is just as well that some of these matters should not be spoken of until later years.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I still cannot see what the last statement has to do with the bill under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Tory propaganda.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that quotation Tory propaganda?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I cannot see how the statement that has just been read has any relation to the bill under discussion at the present time, which relates to the forces of the United States of America which are now visiting or which may hereafter visit Canada. The hon. member should confine his remarks more directly to the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: I am merely showing that there are times when people have to prepare for war, and I think it is a very proper thing that the people of this country should finally be told in all frankness that there is a possibility of participation in a war. I am not suggesting for a moment that there is to be aggression from this or from that nation; but I do believe that when there is uncertainty of aggression today as there was certainty in 1939, when it was denied by the government that there should be any preparation made, that we should today instruct our people as a whole—

Mr. MACKENZIE: We got a lot of help from you and your party at that time.

Mr. HACKETT: It was—

Mr. MACKENZIE: They cut down our estimates; that is what they did. You had better read your history.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, is there any order in the house?

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there no order in the house?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I ask hon. members not to interrupt?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They ruined the air force estimates.

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Remember your history.

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must insist that hon. members do not interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Let him stick to the facts.

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. HOMUTH: The only thing is you cannot take it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You read those debates.

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You ruined the air force.

Mr. POULIOT: Human rights.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the right hon. gentleman from Vancouver that I am accustomed to interruption of this kind. If he thinks that by making his mellifluous and highly sonorous voice heard above mine he can discourage me he is in error. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to deduct from the time allotted to me that which has been unduly usurped by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I in turn ask the hon. member for Stanstead to direct his remarks to the bill under consideration, and try to keep within the limits of the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: I am directing my remarks to the bill, and so pertinent have my remarks been that they seem to have aroused some disturbance opposite. I was merely endeavouring to point out the results of this enactment. At last the decent and God-fearing people of my province are going to be brought face to face with the facts as they never have been in the past. They have been told, without contradiction by a unanimous party press and by a very vocal representation in the house, that wars are made by members of my party and that there is no fear or possibility of war so long as gentlemen opposite sit on the treasury benches. That is the story that has been told and reiterated in Quebec for thirty odd years. I am glad to know that at last the people of that province are going to learn that such is not the case. I am glad to know that we are going to have an era in which fear of conscription and the dastardly agencies of propaganda which have been known and which have been summoned to the aid of the Liberal party at every election in the last quarter of a century will no longer be available to any party in Quebec.

The people of Quebec are decent and law-abiding people, a people as loyal to Canada as a people can be, but they have been told by Liberal leaders for thirty years that any war which was not waged on Canadian soil was a war in which they had no interest whatever. Apparently we have now reached the point where it has become necessary to call in neighbours, or to make provision for calling them in to defend our own heritage. I ask you if when the Canadian people took up arms in the wars of 1914 and 1939 it was not just as much in defence of their own land, of their own country, of their own lives and of their own liberties as could be any anticipated war for which this bill makes provision?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I glanced through the bill again and I cannot see that it makes provision for war; it does not discuss war in any way. It relates only to the discipline of the forces of the United States while in Canada, not while they are at war with Canada or while Canada is at war with any other country.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are making shells, but they are not necessarily to kill people.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member says we are making shells, but not necessarily to kill people. This has nothing to do with making shells; this is an arrangement which is being made with respect to the discipline of the forces of a friendly country, the United States, while in Canada. I do not think it calls for a discussion on war generally, such as the hon. member is carrying on at the present time.

Mr. HOMUTH: What are soldiers for?

Mr. HACKETT: I am very grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for enlightening me. I did not know that these troops were to come here from another and friendly land on a Sunday school picnic or for a week-end. I had understood from the statement made on February 12 by the Prime Minister and from what the minister of external affairs had said that there was to be between Canada and the United States some uniformity in arms, equipment and military organization; that there should be some uniformity in technique; that we should learn something of how the United States operate their armies and how we operate ours. While I admit that there was no direct mention of war in the bill, I was under the illusion, until you corrected me, that it was in anticipation of mutual defence against armed intrusion that this united effort of our soldiery and that of this friendly power was being arranged. I am most grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for the correction.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member unduly. The remarks which he has made may be correct, but this bill has nothing to do with the training of those forces in Canada. This bill deals only with the discipline of troops while in Canada. No doubt there will be an opportunity afforded to hon. members at some other time to discuss the training of troops and other matters to which this bill does not refer.

Mr. HACKETT: I am very grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for pointing this out to me, but I am forced to regret that some thirty-one hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate had not the benefit of your advice.

Mr. ABBOTT: Better late than never.

Mr. HACKETT: It might have helped curtail the debate and get on with the estimates of the genial Minister of Finance.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nothing will do that but hot weather.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think that anyone who wishes to be at all serious can believe that this bill is anything other than what it purports to be. It anticipates something that none of us can foresee without a renewed prayer for peace. This bill anticipates joint preparation for war, or it has no significance at all. Whatever may be my appreciation of the wisdom of the government, I cannot believe that its sense of futility would permit it to introduce a bill like this unless it has some real use; and the only use to which it could be put is to provide for the forces of a friendly country who enter upon our territory in great numbers. If that be not anticipated—

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like the hon. gentleman to allow me to rise to a rather important question of privilege, because what he has said is misconstruing the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by myself. If I may say so, I also think it is casting an exceedingly provocative reflection on a bill which has but one simple purpose.

Mr. GREEN: The minister himself made a provocative speech.

Mr. HACKETT: I am glad of enlightenment from another source, but I still maintain that unless this bill anticipates the presence on Canadian soil—possibly not today, possibly not tomorrow, but in some emergency—of large numbers of the armed forces of a friendly nation, who are to discipline their own delinquents, it should be withdrawn, because it has no other purpose. We know that legislation of this kind was introduced in England in war time, and there was some difficulty in getting it through, even there. In fact, it did not pass until many millions from that great country which aided so vigorously in the pursuit of the enemy had landed on the shores of Britain.

But again, Mr. Speaker, my point is that at last we are in the open. At last it is admitted that our country may be obliged to defend itself, that we are seeking allies in that defence, that that defence may take place on the seas or on another continent. The bill puts an end to the era when a great political party can be accused of disloyalty and chauvinism because it believes in the possibility of war, war which has come twice within my generation, and which God forbid should ever come again. When it does come I hope that debates such as this will have made the Canadian people a united people, a people that will not be forced to go through periods of disunion and distress, largely provoked by unfair and inaccurate statements concerning war which were showered upon this country between 1914 and 1939. I may say that the reason for these unfair and unreasonable statements was just for political power. It was to achieve it that a party was willing—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is that what caused the vote in 1917, the distortion of ballots?

Mr. HACKETT: —that a party was willing to make such statements on the eve of every election so that a substantial element of the electorate would be led to believe that its dear ones were being exposed to unnecessary military service if it exercised its franchise freely. I think we have at last written finis to a dark era in Canadian politics. I for one am glad of the debate, and I am glad that the bill has had its second reading, because from now on, all sections of the country must know that we have got to defend this Canadian land.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I take this opportunity to rise on the third reading of this innocuous bill, which has been discussed by so many speakers and the statistics for which were so readily outlined by my much respected friend, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I regret that at this time the minister took occasion to lash out in the rather acrimonious and unnecessary manner in which he did at my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), doubting whether he concurred in the remarks which were made during the debate on the second reading of the bill by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) and myself as mover of the amendment. I just want to emphasize now, both to the minister and to the House of Commons, that when I rose to move the amendment I was speaking after consulting with and having received the approval of every member of our group.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. PROBE: There is no qualification about that fact. Therefore it was not necessary for the minister to make the suggestion he made in that regard.

Mr. COLDWELL: And a fact which escaped me when I rose.

Mr. CLAXTON: I asked the question and it has been answered.

Mr. COLDWELL: It escaped me or I would have answered. The amendment was agreed upon by all of us.

Mr. CLAXTON: I asked the question and it has been answered.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Which makes it all the worse.

Mr. PROBE: I believe the wisdom of the amendment has been eminently confirmed by the extreme latitude which was taken by the numerous speakers in this current debate, because the amendment simply—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The amendment has been put to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has been disposed of.

Mr. PROBE: We insist, on the third reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KNOWLES: Insist on it?

Mr. PROBE: Let me finish. I will make the speech.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Was that agreed upon also?

Mr. PROBE: That was also agreed upon.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PROBE: May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we insist that in peace time parliament be kept fully informed of all the activities of the various branches of this government. That is a right which parliaments have had from time immemorial. It is up to the government to make information available to us in order to make it possible for us to discuss matters of external policy as well as of internal economy. It is up to the government to find occasion to make this possible, whether it be by referring matters to the external affairs committee for discussion and for questioning our military staffs, or otherwise. Therefore I do not think the Minister of National Defence needed to hide his, shall I say, stubbornness or opposition to our desire in that respect in a rather dense foliage of language akin to that made use of by many other speakers in the House of Commons when they wish to evade a point. The important point is that the house and parliament should have an opportunity in peace time to be fully cognizant of what goes on in this land, especially when it concerns the presence in this country of foreign troops in uniform, no matter how friendly they are to us.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Before taking his seat, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) said, "At last we are in the open." I think we are. I remember very well in 1911 when the nationalists—pardon me, the Conservatives—were playing nationalist, running as nationalists, being elected as nationalists, then coming into this very house, jumping on the seats and coming back as Conservatives, as they always had been. We are in the open. We, the Liberal party, have been labelled in Quebec as being pro-communist, by the Conservative organizer, Mr. Sabourin. That is the way in which the antis work in trying to put the Liberal party down. This afternoon my hon. friend tried not to speak as a nationalist. He was trying to save the surface by putting a little paint on the front of his own party. I do not blame him, but one thing should be said and I believe I am in a good position to say it. Is there one party in this country of ours that has not made nationalist declarations once in a while during an election or by-election? Too many nationalist declarations have been made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Wait a minute. Too many nationalist declarations have been made. In 1911 it was the Conservatives. Later it was the Liberals, and it will be the C.C.F., the social crediters, the independents; everyone is playing nationalism.

As I understand this bill, we are trying to be co-defendents after having been co-belligerents. When you hear a member from Quebec speaking in favour of an accord with the United States, or in favour of privileges to be given the United States army, it is not because we in Quebec want to turn our eyes away from the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations and turn them toward the United States of America for good, leaving the former alone. It is just because we have the experience of the last war, because we want those two organizations, those two nations or groups of nations, to stand firmly on their feet right in front of the menace from without and from within. That is the way in which I understand it.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 269, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Child qualified for family allowance."

Mr. FLEMING: I have one or two observations to make on this section, with a view to asking the minister to clarify the meaning of this definition, because, as I read it, it is anything but clear. It is not one of the amendments of which there was any specific warning in the resolutions; therefore we have to deal with it as it stands, without the benefit of prior discussion. This section proposes to introduce an amendment to the definition section of the act, defining "child qualified for family allowance." If you read it through I think it will be found that there may be ambiguity in the second line, depending upon what the minister's intention is in reference to it. It reads:

"child qualified for family allowance" means a child that, in the last month of the taxation year in respect of which the expression is being applied, was qualified or might have been qualified by registration under the Family Allowances Act, 1944, so that an allowance under that act was or might have been payable in respect of that month or the immediately following month.

It will be recalled that the Family Allowances Act does not contain such a definition. This is a new definition, and the act itself is not clear on this matter. I should like to ask the minister whether this definition is to be applied in such a way that the expression "in the last month of the taxation year" will be equivalent to "at any time in the last month of the taxation year" or "throughout the last month of the taxation year." There could be, as the minister will understand, a change of status during the month. For instance, there might be the death of a child. Could this not be clarified?

Mr. ABBOTT: The section is intended to mean "at any time during the last month." The purpose of putting the definition in the defining section is to simplify the drafting of section 4, which, as my hon. friend knows, is the charging section. The intention is that with respect to a child qualifying at any time during the month the provisions respecting a child qualified for family allowances will be applicable, even though the status may change during the month.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister clarify it by using the words he has just used instead of the word "in". Then his intention would be clear. I suggest that the language of the present section is capable of a different construction, and that he might change the word "in" to the words "at any time during". That would place the section beyond any doubt.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that none of the other exemptions use the word "during". There has never been any question raised that, when dealing with exemptions, the word "in" a given period means "at any time" during the period. The word "in" was used before, and it has always been interpreted as meaning "at any time" in the taxing year. As my hon. friend knows, under the old rule a child born on December 31 in any year entitles the parents to the child's exemption for the whole of that year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, before we go any farther, I should like to add another word.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. FULTON: Before this section carries, I should like to ask either the minister or you, Mr. Chairman, for advice. I wish to make some observations respecting the taxation of breeding herds. I did not make my remarks in the debate on second reading because there would have been no opportunity for questioning. Would the minister prefer that I withhold my remarks until we reach the title of the bill, or would it be more convenient to speak on one of the sections?

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member is referring to basic herds?

Mr. FULTON: Yes. Shall I wait until we reach the title? It is difficult to find a place for what I have to say on one of the sections.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no title section, because it is an amending, not a new bill.

Mr. FULTON: Is it not entitled, "and act to amend the Income War Tax Act"?

Mr. ABBOTT: But there is no section setting out the title; it is an amending bill. I do not believe there is any section on which the hon. member's remarks would be strictly relevant. The discussion we had the other day with respect to basic herds was fairly comprehensive. I said at that time, as has been said before, that the matter was under active consideration—and has been for some time—by the Department of National Revenue. It is primarily an administrative problem, and I believe I did say in reply to a question by the hon. member for Calgary West, that some definite decision should be taken in the not too distant future as to what portion of the purchase price or sale price of the herd should be treated as capital, and what portion as income.

Since the termination of that discussion on the resolution, the matter has been, to use a standard expression, under active consideration and discussion. I consider that a solution will be found in the near future, a solution which may not be entirely satisfactory to everyone. In that event, no doubt fresh representations would be made. However I know the matter is being actively considered and the views of hon. members are well known. I assume my hon. friend would wish to voice somewhat along the lines of those expressed by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. FULTON: I am prepared to wait until the third reading.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I have to say is strictly in order. I submit that a most unjust thing has been done. The bill now before the committee was not available to hon. members until Saturday, and it was impossible for anyone to get a copy of it until then. The suggestion is made that we should have objected when the motion for second reading was made; but the noise in this chamber is so intense that it is almost impossible for hon. members to hear what is said from the Chair. In large measure we have to depend upon what is said the night before, if we are to know what is to take place. No word came from the minister to the Social Credit group regarding this matter, and I consider that the whole situation is exceedingly unfair.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I support what has been said by the hon. member for Lethbridge. In my view the committee should rise and report progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The bill was in the hands of all hon. members last Saturday.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to force this bill unduly, but I must point out that we had a fairly full discussion on the resolution stage. As the committee knows, the amendments this year are not extensive. Many of the amendments in the bill are of a technical nature. There is the qualifying provision respecting private companies, in accordance with the Ives report; then the new tax schedule is no surprise to anyone. The section with which we are now dealing is a technical one, referring to the definition of a child qualified for family allowance.

While some of the amendments may be a bit complex in drafting, I must point out that no new material, no new principle is involved. We have such a heavy agenda before us that I would hope we might make some headway with this bill. I am sorry hon. members in the Social Credit group were not informed this morning that it was the intention to proceed with this bill. We have been working on these bills for about a week to have the drafts completed, so that they would be available to hon. members, and so that we might proceed with them today.

Mr. LOW: I have great sympathy with the load of work carried by the Minister of Finance. No one appreciates it more than I do. At the same time we must not overlook the rights of hon. members, and it seems to me that they ought to have adequate time to prepare themselves in respect of a bill as voluminous as this one. I can understand how I could have been overlooked in the notifications which went out, but may I point out that the leader of the C.C.F. party has only now received a brief note which was sent to his office by the house leader this morning.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps I should say it was my own fault.

Mr. LOW: At the same time, the C.C.F. group did not know that this bill was coming up. They took the same meaning as we did from what was said by the minister on Friday night, where he pointed out that the government would like to follow the order of the three bills mentioned, and that probably this one might be available. But it was not available then, and did not become so until Saturday. If it could be held over for another day I would certainly appreciate it, because some hon. members would like to give some thought to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I dislike forcing the bill, but the Prime Minister has said time and again that the house should be ready to take up any matters on the order paper. While giving notice the night before or, as in the present instance, two or three days before, is an act of courtesy—and desirable, of course—it must be remembered that this will be a broken week. We shall have the visit of President Truman and, while I do not wish to make any personal appeal, I should point out that I have more legislation to bring in. If we could make headway in the committee stage today, I would appreciate it.

I shall give this undertaking, that if there are any sections hon. members feel they would like to have stand, where there is some point to which they would like to give further consideration, we could allow those sections to stand and proceed with others. In that way we could make headway today. I put that suggestion forward for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I point out what I said on Thursday night when announcing the business of the house. I said:

> Tomorrow, if the budget bills are ready I might ask the consent of the house to have them introduced and read for the first time, kept over the week-end for consideration and discussed fully next week.

So that no member can complain of any lack of notice in regard to this bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That did not mean on Monday. The worst of this is that it destroys the confidence which ought to exist in this house. The minister speaks of being burdened. The members are burdened too, and extremely heavily, and they have a right to consideration. I will say no more about the matter, but I think this is one of the basest tricks that I have seen perpetrated in the house since I have been here.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Security in lieu of interest or dividend.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to say a word mainly by way of repetition of what I said at the resolution stage. I must confess, since the minister has not seen the light up to now, it may be that we cannot persuade him to see it today. It does seem to me that a clause of this kind, which really undertakes to say that a document does not mean what it says it means, is unfortunate. Take the case of a man with a $100 bond which has been in default, let us say for ten years, as may well happen. If the arrears are all paid up in one year and the bondholder is taxed on one year's income that seems a hardship, and if it can be avoided I think we may fairly call it an injustice. If the minister is sure that it cannot be avoided I must confess that that would impress me a good deal, but I earnestly suggest that parliament should not pass legislation like this which says that a document, "notwithstanding the form or legal effect of the transaction," is to mean something entirely different from what was intended and from what it says it means. The effect will be to incite people, indeed drive people to various ways of attempting to get around such a provision. I am sure that the minister never in his legal practice did that, but there are other lawyers who do. I suggest also that the people who can take advantage of it are those who are well versed in these matters, not the ordinary man on the street. Without labouring the point or holding up the committee, I would ask the minister once more, is it not possible to do what I believe justice would suggest and as has been done in several other cases, to spread this over several years; in other words, to recognize that a situation of this kind can be a hardship, and an injustice if it can be avoided?

Mr. ABBOTT: I did give consideration to my hon. friend's point, but there are grave difficulties in doing what he suggests. I do not believe there will be any substantial hardship, because, as he will notice on looking at the rates of tax, the brackets are fairly wide. Between $3,500 and $5,000 the rate is the same, twenty-two per cent, and it would take a substantial holding of bonds and fairly substantial arrears of interest to put the man into a higher bracket. Suppose a man did get $25 on a $100 bond, and suppose he had 1,000 of them; he would get $250, and that would not push him into the higher bracket unless he was on the edge of it. I think, upon reflection, my hon. friend would agree that with the fairly wide brackets before the income tax rates change there is not much likelihood of any real hardship. A man would have to be a substantial holder of the particular bonds in arrears and would have to receive a very large amount of arrears in order to change substantially his rate of tax.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to add my word of appeal to the minister to that offered by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I offer it, in the first place, on the ground of fairness. The arrears presumably have accumulated over a period of years and some rights are to be given by way of recoupment for the losses sustained over that period. Yet the proposal is that the rights, whatever they may be worth, shall be taxed in the first year. So, first on the ground of fairness, I urge the minister to reconsider this provision.

In the second place, may I urge, as did the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, that when a provision smacks of unfairness, as this will to many people, the temptation to find ways and means to get around it is very strong. It would be a bold member who would undertake to say that there will not be cases where the incidence of the tax as contemplated by this section may not be defeated by transfers in anticipation of the issue of such rights. When the tax smacks of unfairness from the beginning the minister would, I think, have to admit that many to whom he referred as being on the borderline of a higher tax bracket will be tempted to find ways and means of evading the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: This section in terms is substantially analogous to a section contained in the British act, which has been there for some time. I think it is a desirable section to have in our law because there was a loophole there which could lend itself to serious abuse. There are not a great many of these refinancing obligations. The one case that brought it to my attention was that of Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company, where there were substantial arrears. I do not think I could agree to amend the section this year to allow any such arrears to be spread over a period of years. As I said in answer to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I do not believe there will be any substantial injustice done, but I will give further consideration to the question and when we bring in our new bill which will be effective for the 1948 period, if I find that a real case can be made out for my hon. friend's suggestion, we can include it in the new bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thank the minister and would add just one word. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, we often ask for things and do not get what we want the first time or the second but, if we keep on, we sometimes get it. The minister spoke of the unlikelihood of a payment of this kind forcing a man into a higher bracket. That may be true. But even a man with an income of $2,500 is going to pay twenty-five per cent upon any excess over $2,500. I am not going to labour the matter further. I thank the minister for promising to give it further consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize that such a provision is in all the other acts and I realize the difficulties. A case that affects a great many citizens of Toronto is a refunded municipal bond that has been in arrears over a number of years and then the arrears are paid in one fell swoop. If that is paid in a lump sum it certainly puts the taxpayer into a much higher bracket. He could get around this by selling his bonds before payment is made through the municipal refinancing. If he sells his bonds, it is a capital gain and is not taxable. If he holds on to his bonds and accepts the refinancing, then it is income. It is a difficult point; nevertheless consideration should be given to it. A man holding a bond of some of the municipalities which were in default in the last depression, having bought the bond at par or nearly par, finds that it is now selling at a considerable discount. The principal may be selling at $40 or $50. He has received no income from it for a period of six or seven years, which is a serious setback so far as income is concerned. Then he gets the whole thing at one fell swoop and is taxed at a much higher rate.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably not, because the brackets are so wide.

Mr. ADAMSON: Two things mitigate against the cases I have in mind. First of all, the man holds security for a number of years and does not get anything from it at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: And therefore pays no tax.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is so, but if he bought the security for income he gets nothing from it for years. I believe some of these bonds were in default for six or seven years. He gets nothing from it in that period of six or seven years; therefore he is penalized in those years. That is his bad judgment. The government cannot do anything about a man's judgment; but he is definitely penalized. Then he gets the income all at one time and is again penalized for those six or seven years during which he has been able to receive no income. He gets it two ways. First, he does not get his income and, then, he gets it in one block and is taxed, despite the fact that in the bill this year the brackets are much wider than they have been. This is one of the things that must be given real consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend says that the problem is one that is pretty difficult; but he will appreciate, as will other hon. members of the committee, that the refunding which takes place from now on will be on a descending scale of taxes. The tax which will be paid for the whole of the bond on the accumulated income will, in all probability, be at a substantially lower rate than he would have paid had the interest been paid during the war when rates were at a much higher level. On balance, I think it will be found that the actual tax contribution on the accumulated arrears of interest will be less than the aggregate of the tax which would have been paid had the interest been paid as it went along and included in the individual's tax returns. In most cases I think it will be found that that is true.

Mr. ADAMSON: I see the point with a decreasing scale. Let us pray that we have not seen the last of decreases in income tax; let us hope that it will be an annual thing and that every year we shall have less and less income tax. But my point is this: two things mitigate against it. One of the things is that municipal bonds—and there will be difficulties with municipal financing—are going to run into difficult times when municipal authorities ask for supervision or are unable to meet their interest charges. At that time the bonds will sell at a discount. Because of the government's policy, the hope that the bond will come back and that the interest will be paid on the years when the municipality is not able to service its bonds, has in many cases kept the security of the municipality at a reasonable level. But because of the continuation of this policy, we see bonds selling at forty per cent or fifty per cent of their par value, and men will hesitate to buy them and therefore support the market because, if the bonds are made good and the arrears are paid, or a substantial payment is made of the arrears, they will be taxed for it all in one fell swoop. In my opinion that will make municipal financing just that much more difficult. At the moment municipalities are able to borrow money at low interest rates. Their credit is extremely high, but there will be difficulties ahead, and this is one of the difficulties that must be foreseen.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): In the explanatory notes and in the remarks of the minister the words "funding" and "refunding, are used. I wonder whether this position will apply to a mortgage. Take a mortgage that had been in arrears for a considerable period of years and a new mortgage was given to include both principal and interest. First, would the interest be taxable in that year? Second, take a case under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, where default has been made, and after going through certain proceedings, the mortgage reverts to its former position before action is taken. There would then be a large accumulated fund and interest which would come due. Would that apply in the same way here?

Mr. ABBOTT: To answer my hon. friend's first question, this section does not relate to mortgages as such. It relates only to security, funding securities in the nature of stocks, bonds, and so on, although the language is broad enough to cover securities in the sense that a mortgage is a security. That has always been the rule. Where a mortgage that is in arrears is paid up with arrears of interest and a new mortgage given consolidating the principal and interest, then I would think the portion of the new mortgage which represents the accumulated arrears of interest would be income in the year in which the new mortgage was taken. Therefore the answer there is in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): How do you know the new mortgage would ever be paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: How do you know that the new Abitibi bonds will be paid? You take them. The creditor takes them in satisfying the interest and the claim in the same way that stock dividends and other dividends under the Income War Tax Act are income in the hands of the person who receives them. He is getting only a piece of paper, it is true, but the earned surplus of the company is capitalized; the shareholder gets new stock certificates for the arrears of dividends, and that has been income in the year in which it is received.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I am sorry to hear the minister say that, because I am more convinced than ever that there will be all sorts of ways and means found to evade it.

Mr. FLEMING: There is one word in this section which calls for a word of comment from the minister. In line 24 we find the following: "The value of the security or other right." In the case of a security that is of doubtful value, how is the department to determine the value? Will it be determined in the face amount of the substitute or supplemental security? Otherwise it will be a vague and uncertain kind of taxing provision.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend who is a capable lawyer knows, value is a question of fact, and sometimes it is extremely difficult to ascertain just what the real value, the current value of a particular piece of property, is. I think the best line to follow is to use the word "value" in the act and, in the case of dispute, to leave it to the courts to determine what that value is. That is the usual procedure in any other case where there is a dispute as to value. Under the succession duties law, for instance; there may be another adjective attached to "value"; I do not remember. The essential word is "value". I take it that the practice would be for the taxpayer to report the funding security and to place a value on it. If the income tax collector felt that the value was too low he would assess for the difference. If the taxpayer were dissatisfied with the income tax collector's assessment he would appeal in the usual way, and in the final analysis, if it were sufficiently important it would have to go through the exchequer court and perhaps the supreme court. I see no other satisfactory way of putting it in the law. It would be dangerous in this case, as in most others to attempt to define what is value in the case of a fairly wide range of assets. I think it would be better to leave it to the appropriate forum, namely the court. That is what the courts are for in cases of disagreement.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the minister will agree that the first duty of parliament in writing taxation laws is to be just and fair. The second duty of parliament must be to achieve clarity and certainty in the taxing law. Here we have a provision which, according to the minister's statement, is bound to provide much administrative difficulty and to give rise to many disputes between the taxpayer and the taxing authorities. Undoubtedly it will be the occasion of many appeals. I wonder if the result is justified by the end that the minister is seeking to attain here.

What the minister has just said buttresses the argument of those on this side of the house who have been talking about the unfairness of a taxing measure which arbitrarily imposes a tax in the year in which the obligation is created regardless of whether it may or may not ever be satisfied and regardless of the period of time for which the obligation in redemption or liquidation of which it is given has arisen. Are not those factors which ought to weigh seriously in the minds of members in legislating for a new tax of this kind?

I urge that it is a contradiction in terms for parliament to legislate an income tax act which says that something shall be income which may never come into the hands of the individual except perhaps as a piece of paper, which may never be translated into dollars and cents. It seems to me that by every canon of interpretation of income tax law, by every recognized rule, by the golden rule of interpretation, barring some special statutory definition, income is only that which is received. It becomes income only when it is actually received.

Here parliament is being asked to say that when a man has been given a piece of paper which is payable over a period of years, which in fact may never be paid, it shall be considered as income, and be taxable in the year in which it is handed over by the debtor to the creditor. I have heard the minister's explanation, in which he has been fair with the committee, but it does seem to me that in treating such rights as income a taxing measure such as the minister has described is manifestly unfair.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I say, I am fully conscious of the difficulties which are involved in this section. I gave it a tremendous amount of consideration when the Abitibi funding operations were on, for reasons which I think will be appreciated. At first I issued a statement that they would be taxed in the hands of the person who received them. Then I realized that that would be retroactive legislation which would be unfair, and I said it would be effective only from the time the budget was brought down. It is inevitable that we should have this sort of thing when we are dealing with intangible property rather than cash. It would be manifestly unfair to the taxpayer to use the term "face value".

I really think it is better to leave the matter for determination by the courts if necessary in the event of dispute. I venture to say that in ninety-nine cases out of 100 there will be no difficulty. In the case of publicly listed securities there are quotations on the market and those will establish the value for tax purposes. I imagine the difficulty will arise in the case of a private concern where there is no readily available market. Those cases are not very numerous, comparatively speaking. There it would be a matter for determination, in the first instance, by agreement if possible between the taxpayer and the income tax authorities and, in the event of dispute, for determination in the usual way.

As I say, I am conscious of the difficulties that are inherent in this thing, but I have not been able to find any better solution. As I pointed out before, this is the method which has been followed in Great Britain for a number of years and, so far as we can ascertain, it appears to have worked reasonably well.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As a matter of clarification and administration, do I take it that if somebody happens to have securities in which the principal and interest are blended, it is perfectly clear that the principal comes out first? If the value were such as to show nothing over and above the principal, there would be no tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a legal question involved there which I do not know that I would care to give an opinion on off hand. I am thinking of the rules in the province of Quebec with respect to the imputation of payments when there is a payment on account of principal and interest. It might be that there would have to be some apportionment between the capital obligation and the interest obligation. Our rule in Quebec is that if payment is made and there is no designation of payment by the debtor, it is paid, first, on account of interest and second, on account of principal. I do not know what the rule is in the common law provinces.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would have hoped that the minister had stopped with his first answer, but he evidently thought it required clarification. It seems to me that hardship will occur if that point is not made clear. Does the minister not think that should not be made clear?

Mr. ABBOTT: Apparently there was a case in Toronto where there was a large mortgage with substantial arrears of interest. A new mortgage was issued consolidating the principal and interest and then calling for the payment of principal and interest over a period of years. That case went to the exchequer court and certain rules have been laid down with respect to apportionment, but I could not give them. Again that is a matter of law. There is no definition in the act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are making law now.

Mr. ABBOTT: This section will not make income of anything that would not be income at some time under some other provision of the act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to be too persistent, but if there is any doubt about that I should like to ask the minister whether he agrees, as I think he does, that perhaps we are imposing a considerable hardship upon people.

Mr. ABBOTT: The language of the section is quite specific; it says that payment must be made in lieu of payment of or otherwise in satisfaction of an interest, dividend or other debt. That is the rule laid down here.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 3—Cooperatives.

Mr. JAENICKE: If I interpret this section aright it provides for something for which the cooperative union asked in their submission to the government in April. I commend the minister for introducing this section, and I am sorry to know that no more submissions by the cooperative union have been adopted by the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are two others.

Mr. JAENICKE: I intended to make a speech in support of the argument of the cooperative union, but in view of the work ahead of parliament I shall desist. I should like to ask the minister a question about the procedure in connection with the taxation of cooperatives. A few weeks ago I received a number of letters from cooperative associations in my constituency with respect to a directive that had been issued in connection with the filing of returns by cooperative associations. I do not think I can do better than read one of those letters which contains the wording of the directive and also an argument as to why the directive should be abandoned. This letter is addressed to me under date of April 28, 1947, by the Eston Cooperative Association Limited, and reads:

We have been advised of a recent directive of the Department of National Revenue, Ottawa, in regard to taxation of patronage dividends, reading as follows:

"Where a consumer cooperative sells to customers both 'cost of living goods' and 'cost of production goods' the onus is on the cooperative to make the division of the patronage dividend and show the amount that applies to each class of dividend on Form P.D. 5 supplementary, otherwise, if no division is shown, the whole of the patronage dividend will be taxed in the hands of the recipient, instead of just the portion which applies to 'cost of production goods'."

Our board of directors are convinced that it is impossible to comply with this directive. In some instances the co-op manager would know whether an item was "cost of production goods" or "consumer goods," but in most cases it would be impossible for him to know. For instance, how could he know whether a pound of nails went into a dwelling or into a pig pen? Or, whether a gallon of gas was used in a tractor, car, washing machine or stove? Groceries could even at times be "cost of production goods" if used to feed hired help.

We feel that the task of complying would be impossible, but if the manager should attempt it, the members could rightfully ask, "Who gave the co-op manager the right to say what is my income and what is not?"

We would ask you to use your influence to have this directive cancelled and let each taxpayer decide what part of his patronage dividend is income, and what part is not.

Hoping you will be able to help to straighten this out, we are,

Yours respectfully,
Eston Cooperative Association, Limited,
per V. M. Hanson, Secretary.

The question I wish to ask the minister is whether he has received many complaints and whether he has considered the cancellation of this directive, because I think it is oppressive and almost impossible to be complied with.

Mr. FULTON: Before the minister answers, may I associate myself with the question asked by the hon. member for Kindersley. I should like to remind the minister that I took up with him by letter this question along with several others affecting cooperatives. after having had the same point drawn to my attention, I wrote to the minister and received his reply of May 16, 1947. Since it is not marked "private", I presume there would be no objection if I at least gave the effect of it. I am glad to find that the minister said:

I am, nevertheless, giving consideration to the possibility of making changes in the act or in the regulations which will relieve cooperatives of tax for periods prior to January 1, 1946. If it is possible to make this change, notice will be given when the bill to amend the income tax act is brought down.

I read that into the record in order to ask the minister whether he is now in a position to say whether that change will be made.

Mr. ABBOTT: The change to which the hon. member has referred is made by this section. That is the change which the section is intended to accomplish.

Mr. FULTON: The point of the change was to relieve them of responsibility before 1946.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is done in this section. Although the section may look a little bit technical in its drafting, I can assure my hon. friend that is done or will be done when this section becomes law. There is no tax on cooperatives for 1946.

To answer the hon. member for Kindersley, I am not familiar with the problem which he has just raised. It sounds to me as if it were an administrative decision or ruling in the Department of National Revenue. I will see that his remarks are brought to the attention of the appropriate officers. I shall see whether the ruling to which the hon. member refers can be amended or varied in order to meet the point he has raised. I myself am not familiar with it. After listening to my hon. friend, I do not believe it is a point which would require legislation in order to accomplish what he has in mind. That is not to admit, of course, that it is, of necessity desirable. But I do not think we should require an amendment to the act in order to allow that apportionment to which he refers to be made. I can assure my hon. friend that we would not need law to do that.

Mr. FULTON: A letter which I wrote to the minister, to which his letter was in reply, had to do with the same matter to which the hon. member for Kindersley was referring, and the objection which I was making was that the income tax return required cooperatives to show "what portion of refund was on 'living expense' and what on 'production expense'". The letter to me went on:

All this is entirely new and applies to 1945 business altho' paid in 1946.

The point made by my correspondent was this. After he had closed his books for 1945 and had not kept books in such a way that he could say what portion was on one and what was on the other, he wanted to know how he could be expected now, in 1947, to go back to 1945. Business done in 1945 was reflected in the 1946 tax which was payable on April 30, 1947. I had intended to cover both points in my letter to the minister, and when I saw his answer saying that the matter would be considered and possibly a change would be effected in this bill, I thought he was referring to both points. It does seem to me that to make a distinction between what portion of a payment is on "living expense" and what portion is on "production expense", is really more than an administrative matter. Would that not require a definition? Could that not be covered by a definition in the act?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not too familiar with the particular practice to which the two hon. gentlemen have referred, but the officials assure me that this is a matter for administrative determination. The question of not being taxable in 1946 is taken care of in the amendment which is introduced in this section. The other question, I am told, does not require an amendment. The situation, as I understand it, is this. I think I made the statement in the house that a dividend from a consumer cooperative was not taxable, but a dividend from a producer cooperative was. There are some cooperatives which are both producer and consumer cooperatives. That is, I believe, correct. The difficulty arises in apportioning the patronage dividend which is declared and paid, as between the consumer part of the business and the producer part. That does not require specific law. That is a question of accounting practice, administrative determination, or whatever you like to call it. Possibly the Department of National Revenue makes certain rules on apportionment and those rules may not be—and I say "may not be"—soundly based. But they can change them if they are not. That is the point which I think my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. FULTON: It is a matter entirely for the Department of National Revenue, is it?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is an administrative decision of the Department of National Revenue in accordance with the facts; it is made according to accounting principles, on whatever the facts show.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister one question while he is dealing with cooperatives, and I ask it purely as a matter of information. It has to do with the great confusion which exists among cheese factories as to whether they are to be taxed in 1947. In eastern Ontario there are a great many of these cheese factories; some are incorporated as cooperatives, some as joint stock companies, and some have really no legal incorporation of any kind. But roughly, the cheese factory consists simply of a number of farmers who have joined together for the production and manufacture of cheese and butter; and after the deduction of costs of manufacture and other running expenses, the remainder of the money on hand is divided among the patrons according to the number of pounds of milk they have sent in during the year. I think it would be helpful if the Minister of Finance or his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, could make some kind of statement as to these various cheese factories. I would point out to the minister that the only official in the factory who is paid is the president, who is generally also the secretary and treasurer. They have the idea, perhaps wrongly, that they are now to be taxed and be burdened with complicated returns, deductions and things of that kind. If the minister could make some simple statement, I am sure it would be very much appreciated.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is perhaps right; if it were possible to make a statement which would cover all cases, it would undoubtedly be helpful. I am told that the conditions vary so much, as my hon. friend has indicated, in these different cooperatives that it is hard to make a short, simple statement covering them all. If they are a corporation, then, of course, they are subject to tax in 1947, the same as any other corporation. If they have paid out patronage dividends these are deductible as an expense before arriving at the net taxable income. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue points out that, in answer to a question asked two or three months ago by my hon. friend, he gave this reply. I do not know whether the committee wants me to repeat it, but the question was:

Will the Minister of National Revenue in the near future make a statement in the house outlining the interpretation of the deputy minister of taxation of the 1946 amendment to the Income War Tax Act in regard to cooperatives in so far as the amendment applies to cheese factories in the province of Ontario which operate more or less on a cooperative basis?

The reply, which appears at page 261 of Hansard, was:

In view of the fact that cheese factories conduct their affairs in varied manners, it is not possible to state specifically which sections of the 1946 amendments to the Income War Tax Act, in so far as they refer to payments to customers, would be applicable to any particular cheese factory. The manner in which a cheese factory would be taxed would depend on whether it was wholly a cooperative, partly a cooperative or a purely private operation. In the case of any particular company it would, of course, be possible to give a specific answer privately to the taxpayer.

If it is not a corporation, incorporated under the cooperatives act of Ontario, if there is such an act, or some other act, then, of course, it would not be taxable at all as a corporation. The individual members would be taxable on any profits they made; but I am advised that it is almost and in fact quite impossible to give a general statement with respect to cooperatives other than a statement such as that given by the Minister of National Revenue, because of the wide variety of conditions under which the cheese factories operate; some operating as cooperatives, some more or less as cooperatives, as my hon. friend has said, and so on.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I want to point out that none of these cheese factories, as far as I know, pay any patronage dividends or anything of that kind. The only income a patron receives from his cheese factory is his share of the total proceeds which he receives, figured on the number of pounds of milk he sends during the year, after all the usual running expenses have been deducted. No one receives any dividend on his stock, or anything like that.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the hon. member has raised an important point. There is a great deal of confusion in my own riding. A number of farmers, without actually incorporating, lend money to a cheese factory and claim to hold shares. But they and others send milk to the factory, and they are paid for their milk on this basis. The cost of production is estimated and deducted from the receipts, and the remainder is distributed to the farmers in accordance with the volume of milk delivered, with no provision whatever for the financial interest of anyone in the company. They are in a sense a cooperative, but they get no dividends or premiums; what they receive for their milk is entirely commensurate with the volume they bring in, and has little connection with the capital of the concern. In other words, no matter how many shares a farmer may hold in the enterprise, he does not get a bit more per pound of milk than the farmer who does not hold any shares. Many farmers have had to do this sort of thing in order to keep their factories operating. Some factories even pay a small rate of interest on the money lent by way of shares, but many do not even do that. There is no incorporation. They are cooperatives in the sense that the total cost of production is deducted from the bulk receipts, and the remainder is distributed on the basis of the amount of milk sent in. If the minister could make a statement dealing with a case of that kind I believe he would enlighten a great number of farmers in this community, and probably would end a good many of the difficulties of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

Mr. ABBOTT: I followed my hon. friend's remarks with some interest. As he stated the case, it seemed to me that this would be a sort of voluntary association, not incorporated. Perhaps it might be described as a partnership, and if so it would not be subject to taxation under this section. The individuals would be subject to tax on the receipts from their produce, but they would not be subject to the provisions of the Income War Tax Act with respect to the tax on corporations, which is the tax imposed on cooperative corporations the same as on all others.

Mr. BOUCHER: But they have been assessed for tax as an association by the Department of National Revenue. Really they are only partners; they are not cooperatives in the strict sense of the word. I believe the farmers will very much appreciate being notified of what the minister has just said.

Mr. ABBOTT: They might have been subject to the excess profits tax, of course, because that applied to partnerships as well as individuals.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Exemptions and deductions.

Mr. PROBE: I wish to express once more my regret that there is no increase in the exemptions, which are indicated here as $1,500 in the case of a married taxpayer, and so on down the line. I believe the present exemption of $100 per child is also too low. If one has a taxable income within the meaning of the act he is allowed an exemption of $100 for each child under the age of sixteen; and, in effect, by this legislation you have taken away whatever benefits a family enjoyed when it first received the family allowance. Once the child passes the age of sixteen, the family allowance stops, and of course the exemption is then increased to $300. That would be perhaps nearer the cost of maintaining a child than the exemption of $100 plus whatever the family allowance amounts to. There is some attempt at grading the expense, as I see it, because, in effect, an infant gets an exemption of about $160. Then, as the child gets on toward sixteen years of age, the exemption works up to $196, when it reaches the maximum of $300. I believe the minister has set that figure too low.

There is one matter I should like to mention in connection with this question of exemptions, and I ask the minister's permission to introduce it here. I refer to the exemptions allowed to a class of people who receive a great deal more by way of platitudes than by way of income, and I have in mind our teachers. They are subject to the same taxes and exemptions as other wage-earners, with the exception that they are not permitted deductions for what I think are necessary expenditures to stay abreast of their profession and keep up with educational procedure. I have particularly in mind such things as summer-school courses, which it is most necessary for teachers to take from time to time, and the acquisition and maintenance of an educational library. These things are not considered by taxation officials as allowable professional expenditures in the case of teachers, and it seems to me that the department should reconsider its attitude in this regard. Representations have been made to the government from time to time, and I believe there is a definite injustice.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to mention a matter in connection with the expense allowance permitted in certain districts for the necessary use of an automobile in the conduct of business; and I wish to refer the minister to a particular case in which I had an opportunity to see the documents. This refers to a real estate salesman who required the use of an automobile in 1944. Because there was gasoline rationing at that time apparently he was permitted to put in a claim to the extent of 6,000 miles of travel at 4½ cents a mile, making a deduction of $260, from which was deducted a quarter of the complete cost of the allowance, leaving his net deduction the sum of $202.50. That was the amount set down as his gasoline and car operational expenses for the year, despite the fact that there were vouchers in support of his claim which, in this instance, amounted to $328 for the year.

It seems to me that the treatment given by the minister's department to people who must necessarily use their automobiles in business differs considerably from the treatment the government gives its own civil servants who use their own automobiles and receive a mileage allowance running from eight cents to eleven cents, depending on the area in which they travel. If it is justifiable to give a higher allowance to civil servants who use their automobiles in their business, the same consideration should be given others, particularly those in receipt of incomes as modest as the one to which I have just referred, and which affects one of my own constituents.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take into consideration the representations the hon. member has made. However, the policy for many years has been that salary and wages are income, by definition, and that deductions are not permitted therefrom. That rule has been followed in the past, and I would not be prepared to depart from it in this particular bill.

Mr. PROBE: It applies in no other provision.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is hard to say. I believe I could make out as good a case for some other provision, although I cannot think of one offhand. My worry in these matters is always that if I do something in one instance, where does it lead me? I do not want to keep putting off all these questions until we reach the general bill which I shall bring in, but which shall not be put through this year. However, that is an important question of principle which could be well discussed under the general bill. I can say to my hon. friend that I would not be prepared to introduce such an amendment in the amending bill, now before us. Therefore it cannot be made effective this year. Whether the matter should be reconsidered when the general bill is before us is, of course, another matter.

I have had numerous representations from the teachers' federation. An old friend of mine, one of the officers of the organization, came to see me about the matter not long ago, and I had a long chat with him. I have had similar representations from other groups, including the medical profession.

Mr. PROBE: Would the minister refer to the matter of the gasoline exemption?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall give consideration to both matters.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister say something about the complicated provision in section 4 (2), either now or after six o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have to cover this in two bills, both in the Excess Profits Tax Act and in this bill. However, it relates more particularly to the Excess Profits Tax Act because, as my hon. friend will recall, these special inventory reserves were available only as against the Excess Profits Tax Act. But it has to be in the Income War Tax Act, because the definition of "profits", for the purposes of the Excess Profits Tax Act, is income as determined under the Income War Tax Act. It has no bearing on the income tax payments by a corporation. So that perhaps it would be better if we were to deal with the matter under the Excess Profits Tax Act, where there is a section relating to it, and where it will be clearer as to what is being done.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am prepared to accept the minister's suggestion that it would be proper to deal with it in detail under the other bill, but I have another question which perhaps I should ask at eight o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: It will be possible for me give a full explanation under the Excess Profits Tax Act. However, if the hon. member would prefer to have this section stand, I shall let it stand.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps it should stand until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 4 of the Income War Tax Act, exemptions and deductions.

Mr. FLEMING: In view of the current increase in the cost of living—and I do not think anyone would care to say that the increase has ended—will consideration be given to increasing the exemption for dependents, say children?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think consideration will be given to that this year.

Mr. FLEMING: Was consideration given?

Mr. ABBOTT: Consideration was given to the whole picture, but the increased cost of living was not taken into account. The exemption structure has been worked out over a considerable period of time, and more effective relief can, I think, be given in the tax rate than by raising exemptions for children or for married status or raising the exemption to a level below which the income is not taxable.

Mr. FLEMING: If $300 a year was a fair deduction for children in times when the cost of living was not as high as it is today I suggest that, to maintain parity of treatment between those who have children dependents and other classes, some adjustment upward should be made in the exemptions for dependents.

Mr. ABBOTT: That point could, of course, be argued. But these exemptions must be looked at over the longer period. The cost of living varies from time to time. It is true that in recent months, perhaps years, it has been tending upward, but I would not be prepared to say that is a permanent trend, for we may well see some reduction in the cost of living. I do not think one should adjust income tax exemptions for children from year to year in accordance with the cost of living. It would be pretty difficult to work out a tax structure on that basis.

Mr. FLEMING: I agree that it is not the only factor to be considered, but I wonder if the time has not come when the minister or the government should give some consideration to that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think subsection 2 was held over at the request of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I have an amendment to suggest simply for purposes of clarification.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister had suggested that this might conveniently be dealt with in connection with the excess profits tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: While we are on this section, I would ask one of my colleagues to move this draft amendment:

That immediately after the words "provided that" in line 44 of page 3 of the bill there be added the words "for the purpose of determining profits under the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940."

The section would then read:

Provided that for the purpose of determining profits under the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, where a corporation or joint stock company—

And so forth.

Mr. MacKINNON: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It occurs to me that subsection 2 should stand and be considered when we are considering the excess profits tax so that we would not have to go over the same ground twice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would prefer to finish this bill first.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the minister anything further to say by way of explanation?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is an intricate provision and difficult to explain. The provision of the law, as my hon. friend knows, is this, that special inventory reserves could, under the Excess Profits Tax Act, be set up out of liability for excess profits tax and then be charged back at a later date if and when inventory losses were established. As we shall see under the Excess Profits Tax Act, any amount left over must be charged back anyway. If a loss is established in, let us say 1946, and an inventory loss taken in the same year, a portion of that reserve can be taken and charged back in that year, thereby converting the year into a year of profit. To take a specific case, if the operating loss were $10,000, including inventory losses, and a reserve of $40,000 had been set up, then $40,000 could be taken off and credited to profit and loss account, which would result in a profit for the year of $30,000. Under the averaging provisions in section 5(1) (p), that $10,000 operating loss could be taken back into the previous year, could be averaged with the previous year; and, suppose the previous year had shown a profit of $50,000; that $10,000 loss could be deducted from the profit so that a profit of $40,000 would be shown for that year. This would mean that the income tax branch would reopen the assessment for the previous year and, in averaging the loss, would make a new assessment for income tax. That is perfectly all right so far as income tax is concerned. But the loss so established should not be taken into account when taken back for excess profits tax purposes, because the reserve has already been taken as a deduction and should not again be taken in the averaging provision.

The purpose of this amendment is to assure that the loss which is taken back and averaged with a previous year will be for income tax purposes only, not for excess profits tax purposes. When you take back the figure and average for excess profits tax purposes you must take into account the figure arrived at for excess profits tax in the year in which the reserve is utilized in order that it will not be taken twice. That sounds complicated but that is the exact position. The reason for inserting the provision in the income tax act is that the act as it now stands provides that for the purpose of computing excess profits tax and liability for excess profits tax the net income for income tax purposes will be taken. That is perfectly all right except in cases such as we are now considering where a special reserve is utilized for arriving at profits for excess profits tax purposes but not for income tax purposes. The purpose of the amendment is to assure that the reserve will be utilized for the purpose here but should not be utilized twice, averaging the excess profits tax in a previous year where the benefit has already been taken. As my hon. friend knows, there is not a self-contained definition of income in the Excess Profits Tax Act. The definition in the income tax act is incorporated by reference into the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. FLEMING: The last lines of paragraph 3 of section 4 read as follows:

. . . and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption.

These words are not new; they are in the present act, but I should like to ask the minister if, in point of interpretation by the department, the word "adoption" is construed as applying only where an adoption order has been made under an adoption act of one of the provinces, or whether "adoption" in fact in such case that the taxpayer stands in loco parentis to the dependent is sufficient without a formal adoption.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that is adoption in fact, and that the exchequer court has recently so held. I am told that the contention of the income tax branch was that it was adoption in a legal sense by formal order, but that the exchequer court has held adoption in fact qualified under the section.

Mr. KNOWLES: One of the provisions of this section is to fix the exemption levels at $1,500 and $750. It is not my purpose at this time to discuss these levels as such, for we have already expressed our views with regard to that phase of the matter. I should like to know whether there has been any change made with respect to the point at which family allowances are recovered. My point in asking this is that last year some portion of the family allowance was recoverable in the case of a married taxpayer earning $1,300. As a matter of fact, at that point a married taxpayer with up to three dependents had to pay back five per cent of his family allowances. A married taxpayer earning $1,400 and having even as many as four dependents, according to last year's rates, paid back ten per cent of the family allowance that he received. If that has not been changed, my point is that the effect is to establish two different exemption levels, and it provides, as from these levels, two different scales of taxation.

It is generally understood that a married man with four children would have an exemption level of $1,900. That is true, if the $1,900 is income that he earns at his employment; but if a married man with four children is earning only $1,400 and receives family allowance, let us say, of $312 for his four children, putting him up to a total of $1,712 I contend that he pays what amounts to a tax of ten per cent on the $312 family allowance that has been given to him. May I make the point again? Here is a married man with four children whose total income is only $1,712, but because $312 of that is family allowance he pays tax on all he has received over the level of $1,400; he does not get the benefit of the $1,900 level that is accorded to the average taxpayer. I am anxious to know whether a change has been made in connection with this matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: The recovery provisions do not apply any more since January 1, 1947. Since January 1, 1947, the structure is pretty fairly simplified. If a man has children of family allowance age he receives his basic exemption of $1,500, of course, for being married. Then, if he has four children of family allowance age he would be entitled to another $400 exemption, $100 per child and, as my hon. friend has pointed out, that would give him a total exemption of $1,900 before he pays any tax. But he receives his full family allowance for the four children and there is no refund whatsoever, no matter what his income may be.

In the other case cited by my hon. friend, a total income of $1,400 with four children, he pays no income tax, of course, because he is below the exemption limit, and he receives his full family allowance. On that basis, with four children, he could have an income up to $1,800.

Mr. KNOWLES: Up to $1,900.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, up to $1,900 if he had that income; that is correct. But if his income were $1,400 he pays no tax; he is below the exemption limit, and he does not need any children's exemption because his income is below the limit where it would be of any use to him. He receives full family allowance, whatever it may be, with the four children; it is not taxable income, of course, and there is no question of any refund in that case.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am very happy to hear that. Can the minister tell me how this arrangement was made? Was it by an administrative order?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it is in the law; it has been there since last year's budget. It started on January 1, 1947. It was as a result of careful study and the combining of the family allowance and the basic exemption. That was one of the reasons why it was felt necessary that everyone who had children of family allowance age should apply for and receive family allowance in order that everyone would be on a uniform basis of exemptions and that there would be no question of these refunds or reductions of family allowance because of the income tax scale.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, family allowance is now treated as income and one does not pay tax on it unless the family allowance puts him above the normal brackets.

Mr. ABBOTT: Family allowance income is tax exempt income in the hands of anybody. If I have an income today of $1,900 and I have ten children, all of whom are eligible for family allowance, I get the family allowance for the full ten and I get my regular taxation exemption of $1,500 plus another $100 for each child. As a matter of fact, that would be $2,500 in the case I am giving. It would be a total exemption of $2,500 plus non-taxable income of whatever the family allowance would amount to for the ten children.

Mr. KNOWLES: So that the provisions that applied to the taxation year 1946 do not apply to 1947.

Mr. ABBOTT: Do not apply now. Since January 1, 1947, the new system has been in effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is fine.

Mr. SHAW: Before section 4 is disposed of, I should like to direct attention to one important matter. Residing in Canada we have quite a number of married men who entered this country as immigrants during the late twenties or at other times. Owing to adverse economic conditions which prevailed during the thirties, these persons were unable to contribute substantially, if at all, toward the maintenance of their families which were domiciled outside this country. With the commencement of the war and the general improvement in economic conditions, these persons, while able to contribute toward the support of their families, were not permitted to do so because of war conditions. However, since the war, government regulations have permitted the transmission of funds abroad to provide for the wives and children; yet today we find that the department is refusing to recognize these persons as married persons. Even where receipts are produced showing that amounts of money are being forwarded for the support of these families, they are still not regarded as having married status. Does the minister regard that as completely fair; if not, what does he intend doing about it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I must be dreaming or something, but that is the purpose of the present amendment; that is what the section is being amended to provide for. I thought for a moment that my hon. friend was suggesting some other case. The proposed amendment to the section provides that the restriction which formerly existed, that they must reside in any part of His Majesty's dominions or a country contiguous to Canada, or, residing elsewhere, be a subject or citizen of a country associated or allied with Canada in the conduct of the war, shall be removed. All that will be necessary under this bill will be for a person in Canada claiming married status to establish that he has a wife living, let us say in Czechoslovakia, and is remitting funds to support her.

Mr. SHAW: Will this apply to all countries or just to those countries which were allied with us?

Mr. ABBOTT: It will apply to all countries. We are removing the restriction now in the act that it must be His Majesty's dominions or a subject or citizen of a country associated or allied with Canada in the conduct of the war. There is now no limitation.

Mr. HAZEN: When we were in committee on the resolution I brought to the minister's attention what I considered to be discrimination against domestic servants in the maritime provinces. At that time I pointed out that a domestic servant in New Brunswick was obliged to add to his or her income $26 a month for board and lodging, while in the province of Quebec a similar domestic servant was obliged to add only $15 a month to his or her income. If my information was correct this meant that in certain instances a domestic servant in New Brunswick would have to pay income tax—this would apply also to the other maritime provinces—while a domestic servant in Quebec would not be obliged to do so.

At the same time I also brought to the minister's attention that porters, waiters and certain other employees on the Atlantic division of the railroad were obliged to add $300 to their incomes in lieu of tips, while in other railway divisions the same employees did not have to add this $300 to their income when making out their income tax returns. The minister stated at that time that there was no discrimination, but he said he would look into the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the Minister of National Revenue has information on that matter and one or two others that were brought up. I do not know the wishes of the committee, but I had thought that, after we had concluded the specific sections of the bill, the minister could then deal with the questions raised by my hon. friend. I think the point he raised could appropriately be discussed under this section and he may prefer to have the information now.

Mr. HAZEN: It makes no difference to me.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we might as well give it now.

Mr. McCANN: With regard to the first matter brought up by the hon. member, the answers which we have received from the several districts are to the effect that the allowances vary from $180 to $360 a year. The reports indicate, however, that there is no hard and fast rule and that every effort is made to take into account the type of home in which the domestic is employed and the nature of the board and lodging received. The amount of the wages and the nature of the board and lodging received really have to be taken together. The employer, in dealing with the employee, sometimes will offer a nicely furnished independent room, and a more than ordinarily luxurious table may be kept. A domestic may accept a lower monthly wage for steady employment in such a household than he or she would where the accommodation is on a minimum basis and tenure of employment less secure.

In general, the amount added in the majority of cases tends to run about $20 a month, and in the average case this is rather low having regard to present-day conditions and cost of living.

It is the belief of the administrative officers that this is a matter which should continue to be left to the judgment of the assessors and officials in the district offices familiar with the individual cases, and that to set any hard and fast rule may impose a hardship in some instances and allow unduly favourable treatment in others. Living conditions in various provinces and homes in Canada vary considerably and the assessors are required to make a fair-minded appraisal of the facts in each individual instance.

The second question which the hon. member asked had to do with tips paid to railway porters, stewards and waiters operating between Halifax and Montreal. I think the claim was that in the maritimes $300 was added, but that nothing was added in the case of the Montreal district. The consensus of the reports which we have received from our district offices throughout the country is that the cases are dealt with on their merits, much depending on the nature of the run upon which the employee may be engaged. A waiter attending people in the luxury class travelling, say from Toronto to Vancouver, would undoubtedly receive much more in the way of tips than a waiter on a train, say from Montreal to Sherbrooke or Quebec, where only the casual businessman would have a meal in the club car. In this, as in other matters, the heads of the district offices attempt to deal on a factual basis, which means that they make due allowance for differences in circumstances of the individual taxpayer.

The problem of income by way of tips, however, is difficult. It is in the category of income of which there is no record and in all cases our assessors have to be governed by some attempt to determine probabilities.

Their general attitude where they set arbitrary allowances for tips is to set them safely on the low side. Three hundred dollars a year for a waiter with a run on a transcontinental luxury train would be about $1 a day or thirty-five cents per meal hour. I do not think anyone with any familiarity with the facts would complain that this was excessive as a yearly basis for tips which such a man might receive.

Mr. HAZEN: Do I understand that the amounts charged for board and lodging would vary in different cases in New Brunswick, or are they the same in all cases?

Mr. McCANN: It would vary in different cases, but the average is approximately $20 a month.

Mr. FRASER: When we were in the resolution stage the Minister of National Revenue said that he would consider changing the regulations in regard to the return of T.D. 2 forms and change the date from the seventh of the month to the fifteenth and thus give a few extra days in which to make the return. I wonder if he can give us anything in regard to that. I might say that there has been a suggestion from some of the inspectors that clerks in different counties put a partial return in with their pay sheets and that the present practice tends to mess up their books.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps that could be answered a little later on this evening. In any event, it would be covered by an administrative regulation.

Mr. McKAY: Family allowance payments stop at the age of sixteen years. Is the taxpayer allowed an exemption of $300 in the year the allowance stops for a youth of sixteen? If not, what is the taxation method employed in such cases?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the case of a child attaining the age of sixteen, I am advised that if at the end of the year the child is sixteen years of age or older, the $300 exemption may be claimed, although family allowance payments may have been received for part of the year. There is a little edge there in favour of the taxpayer.

Mr. FAIR: In the early part of the discussion I asked the Minister of Finance a number of questions and he promised to give an answer on some section of the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have those questions. They do not relate to any particular section of this bill. They were the ones I had in mind giving the answers to at the conclusion of the committee's discussion. I have the data here and I thought I would perhaps give it when we reached the last section of the bill.

Mr. McCANN: To answer the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West, I might say that at the present time section 92 of the act requires every employer to remit the amount of tax deducted or withheld at the source within one week of the day when he became liable to pay the relative salary or wages, or at such other time as the minister may prescribe by regulation. Administrative experience proved, however, that it was more advantageous to have remittances made monthly. A regulation was therefore issued requiring employers to remit such amounts by the seventh of the month following. Generally speaking, this has been found to be satisfactory. It has been our practice to grant reasonable extensions of time to employers who, because of unusual circumstances, such as irregular mail delivery, are unable to remit within the time prescribed.

With regard to the letter from the county clerk of Peterborough to which the hon. member referred, our Belleville office advise that they have experienced very little difficulty with this taxpayer, but have on one or two occasions had to mail out our form letter, TDL 1, which is used as a warning in instances where remittances are not received within the time prescribed. They have no record of having imposed any penalty for non-compliance and feel that the fine referred to in the letter must apply to some matter other than tax deduction.

They are not aware of having been requested by this taxpayer to grant an extension of time, but are most anxious to cooperate and will certainly give the matter every consideration if a request is received.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister consider allowing the time to extend to the fifteenth of the month, in stormy weather?

Mr. McCANN: As has been stated, consideration will be given to meet extraordinary conditions as they arise.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to raise again a question that I referred to during the resolution stage with respect to people living in northern, out of the way areas. Could they have transportation expense to a doctor included in the exemption? I have experience of cases which are sent south, say from the Queen Charlotte islands, to Vancouver. They are dismissed from the hospital but must live in a rooming house near the hospital in order to go there for treatment each day. Yet that expense is not exempted, and it is making it absolutely impossible for fishermen, for instance, who live in villages at out of the way points along the coast, to take treatment. They would like to go to live in Vancouver but it is economically impossible. I bring this to the attention of the minister in the hope that he can do something about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I understand my hon. friend's question—and I remember when he asked it before—it was to extend the application of extraordinary medical expenses to the cost of board and lodging when, of necessity, people have to come from remote points to get hospitalization. I promised to give consideration to that, and I will do so, but it is a big question. You cannot just say you can give that exemption without consideration, because you have to see where these things lead you. This is importing an unusual principle into the income tax law when it is suggested that we allow board and lodging as an expense. I can see that it would be an expense which relatives would necessarily be put to, or even the people who were going down to undergo treatment. But I do not believe that I should be prepared to introduce an amendment in this year's bill without giving the matter much more consideration than I have been able to do up to the present time. I doubt whether the present provisions of the act are broad enough to cover it. I think it would require an amendment to the law.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister a question which affects married veterans attending university. Take the case of a veteran attending a university, who is married and is drawing only $60 a month allowance, but is not drawing the extra allowance for his wife, and his wife is working. Suppose she is earning $2,000 a year. In that case is the wife entitled to a $1,500 exemption? If, during the summer months, the husband earns, say $500, what would be the amount which would be deducted from the wife's exemption?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the case given by my hon. friend, I am advised that the wife would be entitled to take the married exemption of $1,500. The $60 a month, or whatever it is which the veteran would be receiving—that would be a matter of $720 a year—while it is not taxable in his hands, is taken into account in calculating the wife's married exemption; and it would probably have the effect of reducing it by the amount which it exceeds $250. The extra $500 odd would reduce the wife's $1,500 exemption by a corresponding amount. It works in just the same way as it would if the husband were in receipt of the income and the wife in receipt of the smaller revenue.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Has there been some change, or do I understand the minister correctly? Suppose the veteran gets $600 or at the rate of $60 a month. Do I understand the minister correctly as saying that from the $600 he deducts $250, and the remainder over $250 is deductible from the wife's exemption?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. There was one point I overlooked in answering my hon. friend's question. If the veteran earned extra money during the summer, that would have to be included as well in calculating the wife's final exemption.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Then I would suggest to the minister that, at that rate, this $60 a month which is a part of the reestablishment credit, is really being taxed?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, there is no tax on it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): It is the same thing. His wife has to suffer. It is deducted from her exemption for married status.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Just a minute. I should like to ask the minister a further question. Take the case of a child attending university. Is that child still allowed to earn up to $400 during the summer and the parent still get exemption?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, if the child is under twenty-one years of age.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Under twenty-one, of course. Then I suggest to the minister that it is hardly fair that the child can earn up to $400 and the parent can still get exemption, while the husband who is also in this case going to school, will really have part of his reestablishment credit deducted from his wife's exemption of $1,500. I think the minister will agree that is hardly fair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Logically, of course, when providing the $250 rule in the case of a married woman we should have done the same thing in the case of dependents who are going to college; but I am advised that would make it unnecessarily complicated, and it was decided to leave that just as it was. There was one point I overlooked, which I should have mentioned: that the wife gets the $1,500 exemption on the assumption, of course, that she is supporting the husband.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): She is assisting to support her husband.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right; but the whole basis of the marital exemption for anyone, as I have had to point out time and again here, is that the spouse who is getting the exemption is supporting the other spouse. If the husband or wife, as the case may be, is only partly supporting the other consort, then the exemption is correspondingly reduced. That is the basis of the exemption.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): But I would point out that there seems to be a certain amount of discrimination against the veteran who is getting $60 a month. You take the various other benefits allowed under war service act, or under the Veterans' Land Act. A veteran who takes up land under that act gets extensive benefits by way of loans for the purchase of stock, and so on, which he does not have to pay back; and then a certain amount is written off. In that case there is no question of any part of the grant being taxable in any way. But here is a veteran attending university; he is really being taxed on his reestablishment credit.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no tax on the reestablishment credit of the veteran. If the veteran is not married he supports himself, presumably, out of the allowance he gets under the provisions relating to veterans attending university. He gets his university fees paid, and works in the summer. If he has a wife who is able to earn income which is taxable, then he lives a little better than the veteran who is single; but the wife is entitled to an exemption as a married woman only if she is supporting her husband, if her husband is dependent upon her for support. So that there is no tax on the husband's allowance as a veteran. As to there being any discrimination as between the veteran attending university and the veteran going on the land, I think anyone who knows, as my hon. friend does, the monetary value of a college education will realize that the money cost is very much more than in almost any other branch of veterans benefits, because a man who is capable and qualified to go to university can get the equivalent of five or six or seven thousand dollars in veterans benefits over the course of his university career.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I would not altogether say that. It depends upon the length of time the veteran spent in the armed forces. If he has been in the army for only a year he gets credit only for twelve months at university.

Mr. ABBOTT: That applies to the other benefits also.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Yes; and it is only in a few cases that a veteran who has been in the army for only six or twelve or eighteen months is going to have his tuition and fees paid for the full course.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right; but the point is that proportionately the veteran who is able to qualify to go to university gets a higher benefit than almost any other class of veteran.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As to potential benefits for boys going to university, there is discretion in the minister to continue their courses into post-graduate work; so that those benefits can be much greater than the $2,300 odd they get under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. BROOKS: I did not intend to refer to that point, but I think the minister will agree that those benefits are extended only to those who come within the seventy-five per cent average.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: And I believe they are very few.

The question I wished to ask the minister was in relation to a farmer or other person who might have a woodlot on which the lumber had been growing for a long period of years. We know that during the war, when prices were high, much of this lumber was cut; and many farmers and others who owned these small woodlots were very much surprised to find themselves taxed for the full amount they received for their lumber. If they realized five or six or seven thousand dollars they had to pay the tax on that amount as income for that particular year. This was felt to be quite a hardship. I believe the question of exemptions comes in here again. As I have said, this lumber was growing for perhaps twenty-five or thirty years; and if the amount realized had been spread over a number of years, these men would have received the benefit of the exemptions for each year. I believe what applies to lumber applies also to a man who sold his herd of cattle. The amount he received from the sale of his herd, which had taken a good many years to build up, was taxed as income for that one year. I should like to have the minister's opinion on these points.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is asking a large question which, of course, involves a difficult administrative decision as to what is capital and what is income. If the taxpayer in question were a farmer, I do not know whether lumber could be included in the averaging which is now available to farmers.

Mr. BROOKS: It is not a yearly crop.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true. Certainly if he had any losses he could average them against it. I am afraid I could not give my hon. friend an offhand opinion as to what the ruling of the income tax branch would or should be in the case of a sale of wood or lumber. Obviously there is a point at which the line has to be drawn between capital and income; and I would think the case is analogous to that of the basic herd, which we are discussing here.

Mr. BROOKS: I think there is some unfairness.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a point where I can see there would be room for unfairness.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister wish to leave all the questions raised by the hon. member for Battle River until the end?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was what I thought. I have a memorandum in which I have covered the various points the hon. member raised, and I thought it might make for more orderly discussion if I handled them all, say on the last section.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. ASHBY: These income taxes are, I assume, a method of attaining some end. What is the aim, the end in view in connection with these income taxes?

Mr. ABBOTT: The main end in view is to help pay the country's bills.

Mr. ASHBY: Why do you tax the people; and if you do tax the people, what is it you desire? Do you desire paper money, bills; or pieces of metal, coins; or do you desire signs or symbols, units of account which are dollars? I should like the minister to answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, we are not too particular. We want something the public will take in payment of the country's liabilities.

Mr. ASHBY: Then would the minister answer this question. Why are the people taxed? The people are neither the creators, the source of paper money, nor the source of coins, nor the source of these signs or symbols which are dollars. Would the minister tell me why the income tax officials do not go to the source of money to obtain it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not able to answer my hon. friend's question. My own view is that the only source from which we can collect taxes is people.

Mr. ASHBY: I did not hear what the minister said; he was talking away from me.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I was addressing the Chair. I said that from my experience the only source of taxation is people. You cannot tax inanimate things.

Mr. ASHBY: Why tax at all? You see, I do not create any money except my own turkey money. The source of money is definitely not the people, and I claim that all taxation is downright robbery. I am just waiting until the people are sufficiently awake to this robbery that they will demand the immediate resignation of all officials who are imposing these penalties upon them.

I spoke to the deputy minister of taxation on the sixth floor of this building, and I introduced him to my wife as the commander in chief who engaged the troops to rob us on our own farms of money which we did not create and which we require for production. I claim that today production is being deliberately restricted, because I know that on my own farms, if it were not for this income tax I would wire my sons and tell them to get busy and produce to capacity. Yet on my own farms, where I can produce 500 to 1,000 hogs a year, not a single hog is being born because of this downright robbery. I can produce a ton of butter at present a month, but I am not producing a single pound of butter for sale. Agriculture throughout Canada can produce all the wool we require if we could cut out this damnable robbery. I claim the Minister of Finance will be held personally responsible for this insecurity he has created.

This robbery must cease. I am telling my people, and telling them bluntly, that until they revolt against this robbery they will never obtain their freedom. And I claim this income tax is introduced and imposed upon the people for no reason other than that of bringing them down to the status of slaves.

The minister does not know why people are taxed, when all the money, all the figures in the world can be created at will. I rode down on the train with a couple of senators, and I asked those old senators why in the world they permitted this robbery to continue. They said to me, "Where is the money coming from?" "Why", I said, "do you really want to know?" "Yes," they said. "Well now", I said, "don't resist what I am going to tell you. You sit right there and I will tell you where the money comes from." Then I pulled a bill out of my pocket, and I asked them, "What is this?" They said, "This is ten dollars." I said, "It is not ten dollars, because it says right on the bill 'will pay to the bearer on demand ten dollars.' "

I say, if we want bills, we can create all the bills we want, all we desire. All we have to do is to get the authority and call up the British American Bank Note Company. I believe that is the company which printed this one I have in my hand; yes, I see it was the British American Bank Note Company. They make them. This is a perfectly good bill; it is perfectly good money; there is nothing wrong with it. The British American Bank Note Company is an absolutely reliable company.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a question of privilege, when an hon. member produces a document, does he not have to table it?

Mr. ASHBY: I am perfectly willing to have it tabled.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Page boy!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Table it.

Mr. McCANN: Sticky fingers.

Mr. ASHBY: I said to these senators, "All we have to do is to instruct this reliable company to print all the bills we require, if it is paper money we need. They can bring them to us by the bale. All we have to do is to ask them how much they charge for running these through." Then, if they say they charge a thousand dollars, I can peel a thousand dollars off the bale and pay them. The remainder costs us nothing.

Then, when it comes to coins, I say we can produce all the coins we want, absolutely free. If a lump of gold, silver or copper, or whatever it may be, were brought and placed upon my desk, and if I had the authority I could obtain it all, absolutely free. I do not know how I can get it otherwise, except absolutely free. I can say to the man, "Here, take $10,000 out of the bale, and I will buy it." The bills cost me nothing. The man would say, "Well, I am not going to lug around a bale of bills on my back. I do not want to take bills in exchange for this gold." I can say, "Well, fill up a couple of gunny sacks of coins, get a wheelbarrow, and I will pay you in coin." He will say, "No, I don't want to go down the street wheeling a wheelbarrow full of coins."

Now, how else can I buy gold? Well, the legitimate way is to turn over the pages of a ledger, enter the number of his account at the top of the page, put down the date and credit his account with ten thousand units of account, or dollars, or the symbols we call dollars. And I can give him a little bankbook; I think I have one in my pocket. They cost us nothing.

I merely enter his name in this little bankbook which I have taken out of my drawer, and I enter in it the sum of $10,000—a perfectly legal procedure. There is nothing wrong with it. I have created this ten thousand units of account, or true dollars.

Mr. MITCHELL: If what the hon. member says is true, why does he not sit down and write each one of us in the House of Commons a cheque for $10,000? We would all be rich then.

Mr. ASHBY: I can do that. But if we all did that, confusion would result. I say this is perfectly legitimate. There is nothing wrong with it. There is nothing wrong with these bills.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Send them over so that we can see.

Mr. ASHBY: And there is nothing wrong with our coin. There is nothing wrong with entering these units of account, or dollars, in this ledger. I am certain there are no people in the world who are greater experts on these matters than are the bankers themselves; and it is done every day in this manner.

I should like the Minister of Finance to give me a definite answer as to why the government does not go to the source for dollars, instead of impoverishing the people.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before I could recommend that I would have to believe in my hon. friend's theories—which I do not. So that I am afraid what he suggests will not be brought into effect until his party is in power, and he is Minister of Finance.

I do not wish to limit the discussion, but I would recall to the attention of hon. members, through you Mr. Chairman, that we are dealing with an amendment to the Income War Tax Act which relates to permissible deductions from income. I would hope that hon. members might confine their criticism to the amendment proposed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to section 4 (2) now before the committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then I understand that we are still on section 4?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are various subsections to section 4. It might make for orderly discussion if we were to consider them one by one. We have passed subsection 2 of section 4; what about subsection 3?

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to make only one comment, with respect to subsection 1 (e) (ii) (C):

(C) under twenty-one years of age and a student at a secondary school, university, or other educational institution.

I leave this suggestion with the minister; and I do not expect, of course, that he will carry it out this year. However I would expect the department to give it consideration. Let me point out that our universities and our higher educational establishments, despite the extraordinarily heavy enrolments which have taken place, are having a progressively more difficult time to make ends meet. I suggest to the department and the government that consideration be given to a direct deduction for secondary and higher education. I think that is important. The present situation is not peculiar to Canada but is happening all through the United States as well. Tuition fees are going up and almost every educational institution finds that its revenues are not sufficient to meet its charges. I would suggest that educational fees, fees paid for sons and daughters attending these educational institutions, be allowed as a deduction from income tax. I suggest that, not only because it is a good thing to encourage higher education, but because of the difficulties in which the universities find themselves. The university of Toronto, while its endowment is heavy, will face serious difficulties in the years to come in regard to higher education.

[Mr. Ashby.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do you include Rhodes scholars in that?

Mr. ADAMSON: I would not be surprised—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why?

Mr. ADAMSON: Are you a Rhodes scholar?

An hon. MEMBER: That will hold you, George, for a while.

Mr. ADAMSON: Subsection 3(iii) (B) reads:

(B) on underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine in a period of twelve months ending not later than the thirty-first day of December, 1950.

In that case one-half of the expenditures made during exploration is allowed. I suggest that here again one-half is not sufficient. I would ask that all the exploration charges be allowed as a deduction. I may be in error as to the exact intent of this clause, but it appears to me that here we have one-half of the expenditures made on underground development by a taxpayer developing a mine allowed as a deduction, and there are two or three things of which I believe the government is not fully aware. The United States experience—and they have suffered more or less in the same way as we have—is that not only are all the expenses of rehabilitating a mine allowed but that congress has passed an act actually bonusing a mine to get back into operation.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a special deferred maintenance provision. One-half can be charged back to a different period.

Mr. ADAMSON: I appreciate that. This is not exploration.

Mr. ABBOTT: What I mean is that this is a special provision in the law for deferred maintenance. The full cost of underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine can be taken at some time or another. This is a special provision given to taxpayers to make expenditures in a certain period, some time prior to 1950, and to charge half back to another period, say 1946, 1945 or 1944. The other half will presumably be charged in the year in which the expenditure is actually made.

Mr. ADAMSON: Therefore, if a mine is badly behind in its development, as every mine with one or two exceptions is, and is able to get sufficient labour to catch up with its development and put its development into shape it can say in 1949 or 1950: We have spent so many thousands of dollars on back development work which we should have done in 1944 or 1945, and therefore we can take that development as a direct charge against the excess profits taxes we paid in 1944.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is it exactly. They can take half of it then and the other half in the year in which the expenditure was actually made.

Mr. ADAMSON: And get a refund of the excess profits tax paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. It is purely optional. They can take it all in the year in which the expenditure was made, or they can take it back into 1944 and reopen the year 1944 and get a refund of the excess profits tax that has been paid.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think that will be helpful. One expects the excess profits tax to come off at the end of the year.

Clause (5) (W) reads:

(W) such amount as the governor in council may, by regulation, allow for amounts paid in respect of taxes imposed on the income, or any part thereof, by the government of a province by way of tax on income derived from mining operations or income derived from logging operations.

Will that include royalties? Let me give an example. The Helen mine is a low-grade iron deposit that cannot develop without a certain amount of assistance and I understand that there was some talk of a royalty being given to the mine because there was great difficulty in sintering this low-grade ore. There was some talk of the province of Ontario assisting in this operation by lending them some money and having the thing put on a royalty basis. If a royalty was payable of so much a ton on the ore treated, would that be considered a tax under this section?

Mr. ABBOTT: This has always been allowed. The only purpose of the amendment, which is indicated by the underlined words, is to make sure that the provincial profits tax will be imposed on the same income as the dominion income tax against which the provincial profits tax is taken as a deduction before calculating the dominion tax. This is to make sure that it is not a tax on previous years that is claimed as a deduction in the particular year in which the mining profits are subject to tax under the dominion act. Royalties such as my hon. friend suggests are always taxable as an expense of the operating company before arriving at the net taxable income under the dominion act.

Mr. ADAMSON: I had this out with the minister's predecessor and it was never quite clear just what the position was. Several properties paid royalties to the province and they were not allowed them as a deduction. I merely want to have it made absolutely clear that a royalty paid to the province is allowed as a tax deduction or allowed as an expense.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the case if it is a royalty in the true sense of the word. If it is the return of an advance that has been made by somebody and is called a royalty that would not be an expense of operation, but the ordinary royalty in the true sense of the term is an expense of operating a mine or timber limit or whatever it may be, and as such is deductible as an expense from gross income before arriving at the net taxable income under the act. That, I understand, has always been the case.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If a farmer employs casual labour is it still necessary for him to deduct the tax if the labourer is working at a rate that would bring him into the taxation bracket? Are the farmers supposed to deduct the tax and send it in?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is correct; they are treated in the same way as any other man.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is one other point I should like to take a minute or two on, because on his estimates the Minister of Agriculture said that it should be discussed when the income tax bills were before the committee, and this is a case where it is actually in order. The minister has made several statements pointing out that the deduction of $500 for the production of hogs and dairy products would really not work out as was suggested. On several occasions he said that the figures showed that only seven per cent of the farmers in Canada were paying taxes. That may be true in the general picture; but, according to the 1941 census, there were about 650,000 farmers in Canada. In 1945, some 27,411 farmers were assessed income tax. Out of those 27,411, 20,372 were from the three prairie provinces. Not many days ago we received another return showing that, out of 108 inspectors assessing farmers' income tax in Canada, seventy-nine were employed in the three prairie provinces, compared with twenty-nine in the other six provinces of Canada. The point I am coming to is that in these three prairie provinces for some reason there has been a great decrease in the production of hogs and of beef cattle. The other evening I asked the minister if he could tell us the position of beef cattle between the prairie provinces and the rest of Canada. I have the figures now for Canada in 1945, which was the last year I could get, showing 6,760,000 beef cattle in Canada. Of this number, 3,596,000 beef cattle were in the three prairie provinces, again a greater number than in all the rest of Canada.

In the matter of hog production, the greatest year in history showed a total of some 8,863,000 hogs. Of this number, 5,768,000 odd were produced in the three prairie provinces. They have now practically gone out of hog production in the three prairie provinces. While the figures given by the Minister of Agriculture may be generally true of Canada as a whole, these figures give some idea of the great decrease in the production of essential foodstuffs, at least in the three prairie provinces. Yet for some reason or another the department has come to the conclusion that the inspectors should move into these particular provinces. I am not saying that they should not do that; probably they should do it all over Canada, but I think it proves conclusively that in a very short period of time, for some reason, if not income tax—I think it certainly enters into the picture—we have lost the production of some millions of hogs in these three provinces.

The situation is not as set forth by the minister the other night that, in driving through Ontario and Quebec, one finds that in each of these provinces the bulk of the production came from places where you found two or three brood sows on the farm and maybe up to a dozen or twenty steers. That is not the situation. The bulk of the beef comes from the three prairie provinces, and in the years of heavy production the great majority of the hogs came from the three prairie provinces. I wanted to put that on the record to support the request which has been made by several hon. members that serious consideration be given to some further exemption for such production as that. On the facts I have given, one can say that the request was well taken and should be seriously considered. If these figures can be refuted I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not competent to discuss the reasons for the reduction in hog production in western Canada. I doubt whether it is due to the income tax law, although that may have some little effect on it, but I would say that it must be due to other causes. I dare say that on his estimates or at some appropriate time the Minister of Agriculture will deal with the subject.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I hope it will be in order at that time.

Mr. FAIR: The Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue are the ones to deal with income tax. I believe that the hon. member for Souris is quite correct in the statements he has made. These statements can be obtained from any number of farmers in my part of the country and from many others with whom I have come into contact in Ontario and in other parts as well. I believe that the Minister of Finance is the man who has to find the money to pay the country's bills. If he will not go to the proper sources for it, if he will not do what was suggested by the hon. member for Souris, then he is helping to cut down the production on Canadian farms.

Mr. CARDIFF: How much money are you supposed to pay a hired man before he comes under the income tax brackets? Is there a stated amount?

Mr. ABBOTT: It depends on whether he is married or single. It is all set out in the tables and I shall read it. If he is working a certain number of days which produces an income in the case of a single man in excess of $750 and in the case of a married man in excess of $1,500, taking into account the value of board and room and so on, then the deduction must be made.

Mr. CARDIFF: If you are hiring the man only for a day or for a few days is it necessary to make the deduction? Is there a stated number of days that you must pay him before you take anything from him?

Mr. ABBOTT: The daily rate is set out in the new table. For a single man, the rate is $2.70 to $2.79 a day. If you pay a man that amount or in excess of that the table of deductions starts and it is at that rate. If he is a married man the wage could be large without the requirement for a deduction. The income tax deduction tables, which are available in the Department of National Revenue, show the point at which it starts.

Mr. CARDIFF: I understand that the deduction would start after you pay him over $2.79 a day.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he is a single man.

Mr. FAIR: Is the minister aware that, in many cases, if a farmer tells his hired man that he is going to take income tax from him he puts on his coat and goes on to the next farm where he does not have to pay income tax. If the minister is not aware of that, how is he to take care of it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I dare say that is true. There are a lot of people in this country—I suppose it is human nature—who do not like to pay taxes and who try to avoid paying them; but somebody has to pay them if they do not pay them. If the particular man that my hon. friend is referring to does not pay them somebody else has to pay the shot. We try to catch up with him; but, human nature being what it is and with the shortage of enforcement staff, of course we do not get them all. The fact of the matter is that there is a responsibility on every citizen of this country who gets the benefit of the country and the protection that the law affords to pay their proper share of the taxes. I have no sympathy for those who take advantage of one means or another to avoid the payment of taxes. That is what it is, evasion, and nothing else.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry I did not get in until quite late. Does the word "mine" here include an oil well? I am not speaking of deferred maintenance or anything like that.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the first time the question has been raised. I do not believe it does.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We get in through some other back door.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think so, yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Keeping in mind the exemptions in this section, I am interested in the reply that the minister gave to the hon. member for Edmonton East, namely, that the purpose of taxation was to provide revenue. I think he will admit that that is only part of the answer because, during the war, we were told that the main purpose of taxation was not merely to provide revenue but to curtail expenditure; in other words, to prevent inflation. I take it that in setting up this schedule the minister has in mind that the present rate of taxation is necessary in order to prevent inflation. The point I am interested in is this: If the situation that he pointed out in his budget speech develops whereby our income becomes lower, demand falls off and unemployment increases, then I should imagine it would be necessary to try to stimulate spending. The deputy minister of finance, Doctor Clark, made it quite clear and I quoted from his speech where he said that during the war the main purpose of maintaining heavy taxation was to curtail spending. Then, for exactly opposite reasons after the war it will be necessary to reduce taxation in order to expand spending. I take it that the present rate of taxation is the rate the department considers necessary to stabilize demand and supply. What will be the point when we reach the period which the minister envisaged in his speech where demand starts to lag? Will the government then still further reduce taxation in order to encourage spending or, on the other hand, will they then be willing to create the money required to expand the purchasing power of the people? I think that is an interesting point.

I have in mind the fact that Mr. Graham Towers, during a broadcast on post-war finance, admitted that the time may come when demand falls off and for that reason it will not be desirable to increase taxation. We may have unemployment and it may be necessary to finance national projects. Obviously you could not finance those national projects by increased taxation because that would reduce still further your demand in relation to supply. Mr. Graham Towers admitted that, when that time comes, he would advocate the creation of money to finance worth-while projects. Would the minister agree that the present scale of taxation is not merely for the purpose of providing revenue but is for the purpose of maintaining a balance between demand and supply?

Mr. ABBOTT: I was very much interested in the observations of my hon. friend who has a good grasp of this question, but I do not think this is the proper time to discuss theories of taxation, the economic effects of taxation or the use of the income tax or any other tax as a fiscal weapon. I will content myself with saying that the primary purpose of taxation is to raise the necessary revenues to pay the current expenses of the country, to provide for the servicing of its national debt and, if possible, to reduce that debt. Of course it has an incidental effect in that it is a powerful fiscal weapon; it is an anti-inflationary weapon.

It is perfectly true that during the war we were spending a great deal of money and producing a great deal. Goods were being paid for but were not being consumed. In that case high taxes were a potent fiscal weapon in order to prevent inflation. However, I do not think this is the time to discuss these questions. We are on a specific section of the income tax act and I do not think this is relevant. On an appropriate occasion I shall be glad to debate and discuss these questions with my hon. friend on which, as I say, he has a wide and specialized knowledge, but I do not think this is the time.

Mr. QUELCH: In the past we have not considered it necessary to try to raise enough revenue by taxation to balance the budget, because in the eighty years since confederation we have had only sixteen balanced budgets. This shows that we have not considered it necessary to try to balance revenues with expenditures. Therefore I am wondering why at this time the government are not willing to raise the exemptions. I take it that the only reason the government are not prepared to raise the exemptions is that, if they do that, it will cause inflation. Naturally, when you increase the purchasing power in the lower income brackets you are creating a greater demand for goods than you could by increasing the purchasing power of any other class. It is the people in the lower income brackets who largely spend their incomes on goods.

Mr. ABBOTT: I deny the statement of my hon. friend that the only purpose of maintaining the income tax at the present level is to prevent inflation; the purpose is to raise the necessary revenues to pay our bills this year and, while conditions are good, to make a reasonable contribution toward the reduction of the national debt. I am not one of those who believe that you can indulge in deficit financing year after year, although there may be years when it is necessary. I repeat that I do not intend to be drawn and I do not think I should be drawn into a discussion of these questions. If we are, there will be no end to it because there are a great many other members who would like to voice their views. I suggest that it is not relevant to the section we are discussing.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On what authority does the minister say that a drilled oil well is not a mine? Mines are used for the production of minerals and oil is classified as a mineral. When we reserve rights in the crown for mines and minerals we also reserve oil, the basis being that oil is considered a mineral. That may be wrong in fact; nevertheless that is the interpretation which the courts have given. I should like to know why the man who drills a small hole in the ground in order to get a mineral is any different from the man who digs a shaft as large as the aisle between us. They are both in the same position as far as I can see. There is no doubt that oil is a mineral and there should be no difference whether you dig a small shaft or a large one.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend may be perfectly right. So far as I am aware, this is the first time the question was raised and I just gave it my off-hand opinion. Perhaps an oil well is a mine.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue doing anything with regard to the many requests which have come from agricultural bodies throughout the country asking that a broader interpretation be made of the regulations in order to make it possible for a farmer whose whole family is taking part in the production of a certain income not to be the one against whom the whole income is assessed? I think there is a general realization that farming is different from ordinary business. The income tax forms are evidently made out to take care of the ordinary business operating from year to year. Farming is quite a different thing. Farmers and farm organizations have protested and urged that something be done. I understood the minister to say that something was being done and I should like to know if that is so. At the same time could he tell us if anything is being done to simplify tax forms for farmers. The T.1 supplementary is quite simple and it can be filled out by most farmers who have any records at all. It seems to me that that would be quite sufficient for the large majority of farmers.

Mr. ABBOTT: The second part of my hon. friend's question relates to the Department of National Revenue. As to members of a family working on a farm, the same position obtains there as with any other group. If a farmer's sons are working for him he can pay them wages and he can deduct those wages as an expense of his own.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If they are over sixteen years.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have forgotten the administrative rule. Of course, if he pays them too much he loses the benefit of the exemption which he is entitled to claim under the income tax act, of $300 in the case of a child over sixteen years. The same rule applies to the man with a business or store who has sons working for him.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If a man operating a business in town requires any help he hires it from other people around; they come in and assist him. I suppose it would be possible for his children to go and work for someone else. In the case of a good many farm families children of eight or nine years of age help feed the hogs and milk the cows. The wife on the farm helps in the production by milking the cows, taking care of chickens and working in the garden. The income earned by the woman in western Canada who raises a couple of hundred turkeys, hundreds of pounds of chickens, eggs and cream, is all placed on the one man. I understood the minister to say that something was being done about the matter, and I wanted to know what has been done or what has been contemplated. Then there is my other question about the simplification of the tax form.

Mr. MICHAUD: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that a farmer is entitled to pay wages to his son. It seems to me that I did hear him add, "And if he is over sixteen years of age, can claim exemption." Is that a fact?

Mr. ABBOTT: He cannot claim both.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wanted to be clear on it.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I have said, he cannot claim both.

Mr. MICHAUD: In other words, if he pays his son wages in excess of the exemption, I gather that he cannot claim any exemption. Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. MICHAUD: I was not quite clear. I might have misunderstood the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. MICHAUD: I should like an answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Yorkton with respect to the farmer's wife. Is there anything on that? Is there any relief?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course the same question comes up year after year. The farmer's wife is in the same position as a small storekeeper's wife who helps him in his store, or a man's wife who has a little garden at his home, who works in the garden, keeps chickens, and so on. It has never been felt, either by my predecessor or by myself, that a special income tax provision should be made for the farmer's wife as distinguished from other groups in the community.

Mr. BROOKS: There was another question I should like to ask the minister with reference to veterans and the exemption for students. In the case of a student under twenty-one years of age, the parent is exempted if he is supporting the student. As the minister knows, there were a good many young men of eighteen or nineteen years of age who were in the army for only one and a half or two years. They get their $60 a month, but they are now over twenty-one years of age, and are being supported at the universities by their parents. I think there should be a clause exempting the parent who is supporting those sons and daughters, and providing for the same exemption for them. The principle of exempting them under twenty-one is exactly the same principle as should apply in exempting them over twenty-one. Has any consideration been given to that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, quite extensive consideration has been given to it. I dealt with this matter at some length when we were at the resolution stage. I explained that the age limit of twenty-one was fixed with this idea in mind. That is the age at which, ordinarily, young people finish their arts course or their ordinary university course. If they are going on to take specialized professional training to become lawyers, engineers, or whatever it may be, it is felt that the income tax exemption for the parents should not continue beyond that age. In other words, it is felt that there should not be a special income tax exemption for those who are carrying on post-graduate studies. That does not run into very large figures. As my hon. friend will appreciate, a $300 exemption, with a taxation rate of twenty per cent, which carries one up to the type of income of something of the order of $5,000, is worth only $60 a year under the new schedule of tax rates, so that it is not a substantial proportion of the cost of education. The costs, of course, run very much more than that, and they must be found from other sources. So that if one takes the case of parents who are helping to send their children to university, in the average income group of $5,000 a year, which perhaps is putting it high, the tax value of that to the parent is, in any event, only $60 under the new act.

Mr. BROOKS: I was not speaking of the general application. I was speaking only of the young man who is in the army.

Mr. ABBOTT: You had reference to veterans.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not intend to just ask a question here, and I do not intend to say anything on this section except what I wish to say right now. We are on section 4 of Bill No. 269, an act to amend the Income War Tax Act. This is a large section with a good many subsections, divisions, subdivisions and a few sub-subdivisions. The whole thing is on the matter of income tax, exemption and some details in administration. What I wish to say is this, and it is in respect to the two questions that were asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East and the hon. member for Acadia. These questions could have been asked on the resolution stage of the bill but we are always met with this reply, "Well, now, if you will wait until the bill comes down, I will be able to answer it then." By obliging the minister, we let the resolution pass and wait till the bill comes down. Surely, when we are discussing a section like this we should be able to ask the minister a few questions as to why all this income tax is necessary. The hon. member for Edmonton

East asked, what is the purpose of this taxation? Why take it out of the people? Why not go to the very source from which money comes? The minister evaded that question—

Mr. ABBOTT: No. He answered it.

Mr. HANSELL: —by saying he did not want to get involved—

Mr. ABBOTT: No, he answered it, and answered it directly.

Mr. HANSELL: I will accept the minister's statement, but I am quite confident that when he reads Hansard tomorrow he will find that it was not answered directly. The hon. member for Acadia asked a subsequent question, and I think these questions are fundamental because they get down to the basis of taxation. The hon. member for Acadia asked, are these exemptions set in order to avoid inflation or to create revenue? The minister gave what I contend to be an answer similar to what I have indicated, namely, "Well, I do not want to get into a technical discussion of the philosophy of money", or something of that kind. All I say is this, Mr. Chairman, and I will sit down. If there is one place where we have a right to know what the taxation officials or what the Department of Finance really know about money and the reason for having or not having taxation, this is the place. If all this taxation is not necessary we, the people's representatives, have a right to know; and I take it that the officials are not able to answer. I take that from the answer which the minister has given. I say these things kindly. We in this corner of the house do not believe that there is need for such great taxation. Our position is that the only time when taxation is needed is when there is a surplus of money over and above production, so that it must be drawn off. We claim that the government could go to the source from which money originally comes and get it from there for the purpose of revenue.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Mr. FAIR: I am still confused about the situation with respect to the payment to a farmer's family in relation to farm produce. We have been given what I consider to be contradictory explanations in connection with this, and I should appreciate it very much if the minister would tonight give us an explanation which would stand up year after year. On some occasions we have been told that a farmer can pay his family without affecting the allowance as dependents. Again we have been told we cannot do that. I should like very much to get a definite statement by which we can go from year to year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I had given that answer a few minutes ago. I am told that the age is sixteen; apparently that is an administrative ruling.

Mr. FAIR: Then children below sixteen can or cannot be paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that below sixteen they can be paid and the payment can be deducted from the farmer's income as an expense if the payment is in cash, the same as he would pay any other hired help.

Mr. MICHAUD: What about the $100 exemption, now?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is very simple. If a man hires one of his children to work for him and pays that child more than the amount which renders him totally dependent upon the father, he cannot claim the exemption. In other words, as I understand it, by administrative practice in the Department of National Revenue a so-called dependent can have income up to $400 and still be classed as a dependent of the father or parent claiming the exemption. That would mean, I take it, that a father could pay his minor child, provided that he paid him in cash, up to $400 for his work on the farm. At the same time he would have to include the value of board and room, I suppose, if he were claiming the exemption; and if the cash payment plus the value of board and room ran over $400, then the parent could not claim the $300 exemption or the $100 exemption, as the case may be.

Mr. FAIR: Now may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he concurs in that statement by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. McCANN: Yes. Perhaps I might be a little more explicit than the Minister of Finance has been, since this question was raised previously by the hon. member. First, in connection with the question of the amount that is to be added back to a farmer's income in order to cover the estimated value of the commercial produce of the farm which, instead of being taken to market for sale, is actually consumed by the family for food—I think this is what the hon. member wants answered—the replies from the district offices indicate that here every attempt is made to proceed on the basis of the facts. All the districts make such allowances; but in those areas in which extensive mixed farming is carried on and therefore the family does use a much higher proportion of the commercial product than, say, in the semi-arid areas, the amount added tends to be higher. The range runs from a minimum of $25 to $100 per person per annum, with $50 as a rough average. On some farms the output is so diversified as to permit of the maintenance of a very liberal table with the purchase of a relatively small amount from local stores. Taking into consideration the present cost of living, the amounts added back are, we claim, definitely on the modest side.

Then I may say that it has been the administrative practice to allow a farmer to deduct from his income the amount of any cash payments he makes to members of his family other than his wife for work done on the farm; but in that event, where this is done it is the practice to make an allowance for the value of the board of a child or children, which is putting them in the same category as if they were hired help rather than members of the family. Naturally, if the payment to the child plus the value of board exceeds $400 the farmer cannot claim for the dependency allowance with respect to that child. This follows the regular rule applicable to all taxpayers. It must be emphasized that money must be paid in cash and not in kind.

In addition, I should like to make a short statement in reference to the farmer's wife. Where a farmer's wife receives income from a small flock of poultry, et cetera, these are considered as purely normal things in the life of a farmer's wife and the proceeds from anything she sells in this category are not required to be included in income. I made a similar statement a year ago, and that has been the practice.

Mr. McKAY: Is any maximum put on that?

Mr. McCANN: Cases in which a farmer's wife devoted eight hours a day or three hundred days in the year to out-farm work would be rare exceptions, not worth calling for any major change. That is, where it is a side-line on the farm, and the farmer's wife obtains an amount of money, we have not been asking them to put that in as a return of income.

Mr. FAIR: I am under the impression that today a farmer is assessed, on the average, $50 for every member of his family, for garden produce and other things of that kind. Is that correct?

Mr. McCANN: That is right.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then, in towns and cities during the war many people had victory gardens, and many people have gardens today. Is a similar charge made against those people?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the answer to that is that they are not deriving their living from that work, and of course the farmer is.

Mr. FAIR: That is not quite correct. The farmer is deriving his living from the sale of grain, live stock and other things of that kind. He is in exactly the same position as the people in cities and towns who have gardens, from which in many cases they get a good share of their living. I am not for a moment advocating that people in towns and cities who have gardens should be taxed on anything they grow, because I believe they should have some slight pay, whatever it might amount to, for the work they do in the garden. These things should be taken care of, but they are not taken care of satisfactorily at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: There is one question I should like to direct to the minister in connection with the married veteran attending university. In some of these cases the wives are working, and I understand that some difficulty has arisen in that, while the husband's allowance is not taxable—

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think he was not in his seat when I dealt with this matter at some length earlier this evening, in reply to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

Mr. GREEN: Was it the case of the allowance preventing the wife from being granted the status of a married person?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not preventing her from getting the status; but if the allowance ran over a certain amount and the husband also earned something during vacation, it would reduce her $1,500 exemption to a lower level, depending upon the amount by which her husband's allowance exceeded $250. The reason for the wife's exemption of $1,500 under those circumstances would, of course, be the assumption that she was fully supporting her husband, because that is how it applies in reverse. I dealt with this question at some length earlier in the evening.

Mr. GREEN: Is the allowance paid the husband considered as part of his income? I can quite see that any money he earned during vacation would be considered income.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not taxable in his hands, but it is considered a source of income in so far as his wife's $1,500 exemption is concerned, if she is earning money and supporting him.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Did the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska have a question to ask?

Mr. MICHAUD: I got my answer from the minister privately, and I am satisfied.

Mr. SINNOTT: I am not going to take up very much time, but I want to say in the most kindly way and most constructive way that here as members of parliament, we are all interested in trying to do what is best for our country. We are attempting to discourage inflation and, at the same time, get production. I have been on a farm for twenty-five years, and no one knows better than I do what farmers' wives and families do in connection with the production of farm products. If we are to have the increased production we want, then we must discourage deflation. Nothing is more likely to keep the boys on the farm than to encourage them to make a little money on the side. Those boys who have been brought up on the farm, and at the ages of four or five years can drive horses, or at eight or nine years of age can drive tractors, are the ones who will make constructive farmers. If we have to depend upon some of these people from the city, then let me say that they do more damage than they are worth. They let the horses run away and they damage more machinery than would equal the value of their services. So that at this time we must encourage the income tax branch all we possibly can to give the man who produces a chance where he can get away from income tax, and thus encourage production. I hope the minister will give every possible attention to this matter.

Mr. ROWE: I think there was confusion between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. McCANN: Not a bit.

Mr. ROWE: There is not?

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. ROWE: Well, I am glad there is not on this issue, because on many issues I know there is. I thought I heard the Minister of Finance say that if a boy on a farm earned $400, that is all he could be allowed as exemption from income tax. Yet the Minister of National Revenue said that he could be paid the same wages as any other member of the staff. If there is no difference, then I should like to find out what happens if he received $800, because in my district the wage is about $100 a month. If a boy is to be forced to leave his own home and go out to earn $100 a month from a neighbour, rather than have that exemption from his own family, then surely, if there is unity between the ministers, they should get together.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no conflict. The $400 has relevance only to this extent, that that is the figure which is taken in the Department of National Revenue as being the figure up to which a child can have income and still retain the status of dependency upon the parent. So that the farmer can pay his son cash wages, and if those cash wages, taken together with the value of his board and lodging, do not run over $400 the farmer can still claim the full $300 for that child as a person fully dependent upon him.

Mr. ROWE: That is over and above $400?

Mr. ABBOTT: If it runs over $400, or if, for instance, he pays his son $700 and the cost of board and lodging is worth another $25 per month, that makes $1,000. The taxable income for tax purposes of the son in excess of the $750 exemption will be $250, and the farmer will lose the $300 exemption which he could claim if the child were a person totally dependent upon him.

Mr. FAIR: I have one more question for the minister to answer. We are getting more satisfactory answers tonight than we have ever been able to get before. In hundreds of instances across the prairie provinces a farmer's wife will milk three or four cows. She will do that work herself, ship the cream to the creamery and receive the cream cheques. The same farmer's wife may possibly have 75 or 100 chickens, and sell eggs. She has that for her own spending money. Does a farmer have to pay income tax on those amounts? The farmer's wife does all the work herself; the farmer does not have a thing to do with it. She receives the cheques and spends the money. What happens in a case of that kind?

Mr. McCANN: Individual cases have to be considered on their merits. If the money she receives in proportion to the full income of the farm is not out of keeping with what she might have by way of pocket money, it is not taxable.

Mr. FAIR: There is a principle there; I do not think it should come down to individual cases. If a principle were laid down we would know where we stand, because, as I said before, the imposition of this tax has considerably cut down production of cream, milk, butter and eggs.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought the subsections were to be called. If not, I should like to ask a question about section 4 (4). What is that order in council?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the order in council which fixes the period of twelve months commencing January 1, 1946, and terminating

December 31, 1948, within which this deferred maintenance could be taken. My hon. friend may recall that when the resolution was under discussion I made a statement in the house. I was engaged with preparation of the budget at the time the order in council was passed and, after carefully reconsidering it, I felt that the rule should be as is contained in this section which I am now introducing, namely that it is to be a twelve-month period to be determined by the governor in council ending not later than December 31, 1950. The advice of the Department of Justice was that we could make a statutory provision that the order in council which specified the period under the old section should be revoked.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): These are strong words—"shall be deemed not to have come into operation or to have been made." Does that mean nothing was done under it at all?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is just as if it had never been passed?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Just one question with regard to subsection 5. What is the reason for this being dealt with by regulation? Surely that is unusual. Why does this particular case have to be dealt with in that way, and is it the intention to continue to leave it that way?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I think it will remain that way. That language is now in the act. The only change is in the words which are underlined, to assure that it will be profits imposed with respect to the same income in both provincial and federal jurisdictions.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am raising a broader question. Why is it necessary to have this left entirely to regulation? Am I not right in thinking that is an unusual way of giving exemption, and what is the reason for it?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend will appreciate, this is a concession which is given, not to a province, but to taxpayers who are subject to tax in a province on the same profits. In the agreements with the provinces with respect to taxation, which existed during the war, it became necessary to specify what were profits derived from mining operations or on income derived from logging operations. I believe the committee will appreciate that there is a difference between mining operations as such, and the processing of ore. There is a difference between revenues from logging operations and operations in connection with the finishing of lumber. It is difficult to spell this out in a statute and, as is the case in a number of these situations, it is desirable to leave some latitude, some flexibility. But rather than leave it in the discretion of the minister, it was provided in the law that the condition would be fixed by the governor in council and would be known to all who are interested. It provides a more flexible way of amending the provisions, if they are found to be unsatisfactory.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I suggest that it might give rise to another kind of log-rolling.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to speak with respect to subsection 5, about which there has already been some discussion. What reference has this to matters under discussion between the dominion and the provinces? As I understand it, in the negotiations with reference to new tax agreements the position taken by the provinces was that they should have those six so-called minor fields of taxation yielded up to them exclusively, and that, in addition, they should have priority in the fields of mining and logging, because in that instance it was the development of natural resources which was being taxed, and for that reason they felt they should have priorities in those fields. Would the minister make a statement as to the relationship between this amendment in section 4 (5) and those matters that were under negotiation between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: This provision permitting a deduction from income tax for this particular purpose applies whether or not a province enters into a taxation agreement with the dominion. Ordinarily the general rule is and always has been that, for purposes of dominion income tax, the taxpayer is not entitled to deduct profits tax, a tax in the nature of income tax paid to a provincial jurisdiction. There is an exception, however, in the case of mining and logging profits, and that applies whether or not a province enters into a taxation agreement with the dominion. In other words, all provinces are entitled to impose taxes on mining and logging profits, and those taxes may be deducted as an expense by the taxpayer as though they were an expense under the dominion income tax law. But in order to protect the dominion treasury in respect of this special deduction which is allowed for this type of income, it must be clearly income derived from logging and mining operations, and not income derived from processing operations, or income derived from manufacturing the logs, for instance, after they have been cut. The only purpose of this amendment is to make it clear that the profits tax or income tax imposed should be on the same income in each case, and not, for instance, on the income of a previous year, although paid in the same taxation year.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the minister for his clear statement. Will he say to what extent the terms of this amendment go in meeting the views of the provinces as set out in the negotiations? I gathered from the minister's statement that it goes a substantial way, but that there still remains a field perhaps in connection with processing where the demands of the provinces have not been fully met by the amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not quite sure to what negotiations my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. FLEMING: I am referring to the position taken by the provinces a year ago in this building at the dominion-provincial conference, when they asserted their claim to the six minor taxation fields and priority in the fields of logging and mining. This amendment, I gather from the minister's statement, does go some way in recognizing the claim of the provinces to priority in mining and logging.

Mr. ABBOTT: This amendment does not change the position at all. Paragraph (w) as contained in the law last year extended the principle that logging and mining profits taxes imposed by any province could be deducted from gross profits before computing dominion income tax. The amendment this year is a minor one to ensure that the profits tax will be calculated on the same set of profits, not on other profits.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In this subsection the term "mining operations" is a different expression from that used in subsection 3. I would ask the minister whether mining operations covers the drilling of an oil well.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to give very much the same answer I gave in the other case. I do not believe it is. But if drilling an oil well is mining I suppose it would be covered.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Can the minister tell me why it is not? Drilling an oil well is clearly a mining operation. It cannot be anything else. It is going into the ground for minerals just as all mining is.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that no provincial government in Canada imposes any income tax on oil well companies. It all takes the form of a royalty, and that, of course, is clearly deductible. So that the question has not arisen as a practical one so far.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister is quite right about that. But let us look to the future. I live in a place where, if I may say so, with great respect, they may tax anything.

Mr. ABBOTT: It might encourage the imposition of a profits tax by provincial governments. I do not know whether we should do that or not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I take it that the simple answer is this. The minister says that he does not know whether mining operations covers drilling for oil or not.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not believe it does.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): My opinion is so contrary to his. Oil is a mineral and drilling for oil is a mining operation. You go into the ground to get it. Gold is a mineral and you go into the ground to get it. The only difference is the size of the hole you put down.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is an expert on oil wells and I am not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before we pass this section, I wonder if it would not be a good thing to ask the minister what he would consider an appropriate occasion upon which we might discuss this whole question of taxing people for money rather than having it created by the dominion government itself. He suggested a while ago it might be a good thing to discuss it on an appropriate occasion. What would he suggest as an appropriate occasion?

Mr. ABBOTT: My experience, in my seven years in the house is that, during the course of a session, numerous occasions arise in which this matter is debated at length. One occasion would, I suppose, be the estimates of the Department of Finance. I do not know; I do not want to put any ideas into the hon. gentleman's head, but I suppose that would be an occasion. Certainly in the course of the seven years I have been here I have found there have been many occasions such as the second readings of various financial bills and a variety of other occasions when the question has been discussed at some length whether we can finance without imposing taxes. What those other occasions may be I cannot think of many of them offhand, but I know that the amendment to this section of the Income War Tax Act is not the appropriate place.

Mr. HANSELL: When would the minister like to be engaged in such a discussion, because we shall be glad to suit his convenience?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: Following up the inquiry of the hon. member for Calgary West as to whether the production of oil is a mining operation or not, what is the minister's view of the operations of those who are planning to produce oil from the sands of the Athabaska river? That is definitely a mining proposition. Will they have any consideration in the matter of exemption?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is absolutely a mining operation, done with shovels, mining the oil from shale. It is mining and nothing else.

Mr. ABBOTT: I repeat again what I said before, that the question only has significance in the case of a profits tax being imposed by a provincial jurisdiction. There is no provincial jurisdiction which imposes a profits tax on the production of oil today. That is my information. Therefore at the moment we are discussing a hypothetical question. It is an interesting one, and I always like to discuss hypothetical questions, but it has no practical significance in connection with this amendment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But once something gets on the statute books and is interpreted, it stands that way. I agree with the minister that what they get is a royalty, in our province one of 12½ per cent. The minister generously said that he allows them that, and I appreciate his generosity in that particular. Of course it is none of his business anyway because the province owns the resources. I am not suspicious of the minister; I am suspicious of the government of the province in which I live, and I should like the views of the minister perhaps a little more expertly directed than he has shown up to the moment as to why the drilling of an oil well is not a mining operation.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a question to which I would have to give the most careful consideration. I would hesitate to try to give a snap answer this evening.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will accept that; I have been stalled quite often and I have become used to it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not yet received an answer to my question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You never will.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister consider the production of oil from the tar sands of Alberta the same type of business as the production of oil from an oil well?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a question I am not really competent to answer. The answer is the same one I gave to the hon. member. It has no practical significance, because I believe that there is no profits tax as such imposed by the province on the particular development to which my hon. friend refers, and I have never had to consider it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You spent millions of your own money up there.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is it true that there are only two provinces, namely the provinces which have not come into agreement with the dominion, which impose corporation profits tax on mining operations? Is that so?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I believe there are other provinces. I would have to check, although I am told that Saskatchewan has a type of taxation which is called a royalty, but which is, in fact, on a net basis.

Mr. ADAMSON: I know the circumstances of that tax which operates on a particular property. The point I am making is purely and simply directed to exempt taxes paid by mining and logging companies which pay corporation profit taxes to the provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily corporation profits taxes. This is profits tax or income tax on income derived from logging or mining operations, and it would not necessarily have to be a corporation; it could be an individual who has engaged in that type of work.

Mr. ADAMSON: An individual engaged in cutting trees? I have never heard of a case like that. If he paid taxation it would be on a stumpage basis, would it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably it does not exist today; but suppose a provincial government imposed an income tax, as it is free to do. It could impose it on a man who was engaged in logging and mining operations. It would have to be a special tax imposed with respect to these two types of operation; but it would be clearly within the rights of a provincial government to impose such a tax. I do not know that they do now.

Mr. ADAMSON: Therefore you are getting to this; you are exempting from double taxation mining and logging? That is the basis?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mining and logging are exempt from double taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: If, as and when applied by a province?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Deduction not allowed on certain taxes paid to provinces or municipalities.

Mr. FLEMING: Reference is made in the explanatory note to the dominion-provincial taxation agreements. It reads as follows:

The amendment repeals the definition of "corporation tax" now in the act to permit it to be kept in conformity with the dominion-provincial tax agreements.

Heretofore the committee knows nothing concerning the contents of the dominion-provincial tax agreements. Perhaps the minister would say a word in explanation of this note.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course there will be legislation introduced in the house later to authorize the execution of the agreements so far as the dominion is concerned. The terms of the agreements with these other provinces have been made public, and if my hon. friend has had an opportunity of examining them he will see that a corporation tax is defined in the terms of the agreements, and it is necessary that it should be defined because the agreeing provinces have undertaken to go out of the corporation tax field by the terms of the agreements. A corporation tax was defined in the wartime tax agreement. I cannot say that the definition is identical in the new agreement, but it is similar. I am advised that there have been a few minor changes.

Mr. FLEMING: But it would be much more desirable to have the definition, if it is an accepted definition, written into the act instead of giving the governor in council the right to define. We are back to the same old business of ministerial acts and discretions, to the same sort of thing I understood we were trying to get away from.

Mr. ABBOTT: The difficulty is, as one finds when he looks into this, that it is a question of what may be a corporation tax. There is such a variety of differences that it is almost impossible, or we felt it was almost impossible, to set up a comprehensive definition which would include every type of tax that should be classified as a corporation tax. There are a good many ways of levying it, but the accepted types were, of course, taxes paid on capital and taxes on head office. My hon. friend is familiar with the types that were in force before the war; but we find that in the different provinces there is a great variety of these taxes which were imposed on corporations and they are corporation taxes, so that this is the deduction which we are disallowing but which requires definition of what will be included and what will not.

Mr. FLEMING: I appreciate the difficulties to which the minister refers, but I am coming back to this. There must be a definition at some time by somebody. What the government now proposes is that it be reserved to the governor in council. That is not going to make it any easier. Surely this is the place where definitions of this kind should be written.

Mr. ABBOTT: Another is that it may have to be varied from time to time and it may have to be varied as other provinces come in and raise new points. We found in the discussions with the provinces, with which discussions have already been carried on, that a great number of points are raised, and each province has had its own particular types of taxes and its own particular cases that it has to put up. After giving the matter pretty full consideration, we came to the conclusion that the most satisfactory way was to set up in the law that the governor in council, that is to say, the government of the day, shall have the right to define by regulation what constitutes a corporation tax for the purpose of not being allowed as a deduction from gross income for purposes of arriving at liability for federal income tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Following what the hon. member for Eglinton has said, it does seem to me that there is great force in his point, and also that it is unfortunate, particularly when the question is one between the dominion and the provinces, that this should be done entirely unilaterally.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is one thing about this section which seems to negative a previous clause. The side-note says:

Deduction not allowed on certain taxes paid to provinces or municipalities.

It does not specify any type of industry. This, presumably, is for an industry. I have not subsection 6 of section 6 of the old act before me, but you could here have one authority saying your mining or logging industry was exempt from a tax and another group advising the governor in council, saying it was not. It seems to me that this is the sort of draftsmanship which leads to confusion. This is something that will cause the federal and provincial governments a great deal of trouble a little later on, and I am referring to the northern mining municipalities. Under the provincial law, a mine pays a royalty to the municipality—I have forgotten how it works—and the municipality can tax certain surplus works. There is a definite part of its tax to the municipality on certain of its surplus works, but nothing on production. The working out of that arrangement is causing serious financial embarrassment to many northern municipalities. I would refer particularly to the township of Teck which has an extremely serious municipal problem. I wish the minister would clarify this section 5, because it seems to me that a decision under section 4 might exempt a corporation and then a tax could be reimposed under section 5.

Mr. ABBOTT: Section 5 is really the repealing and reenacting of paragraph (o) of subsection 1 of section 6. In an extreme case, a province or a municipality could impose a tax which would take fifty, sixty, or seventy per cent of the corporation's income. If that were deducted as an expense, then the dominion would be left with only thirty per cent of the total revenue on which it could impose a tax.

Mr. ADAMSON: You are cutting the province's throat there.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—I.T. paid to a country other than Canada by subsidiary non-resident company.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a drafting amendment to section 6 which I will ask one of my colleagues to move. It is:

That subsection 2 of clause 6 of Bill 269 be amended by inserting before the word "company" in the second line of subsection 2 C the word "non-resident" and by adding a new subsection 2 E as follows:

"2 E. A company entitled to make deductions from its taxes as provided in subsection 2 B of this section shall not be entitled to make a deduction from its taxes under subsection 2 A of this section."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This section goes beyond the terms of the budget resolution to some extent, does it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that it does. It certainly does not go beyond what the budget resolution intended. The budget resolution was drafted in rather general terms, but it goes down through the subsidiary of a subsidiary as my hon. friend will see by looking at clause 2 C.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—When amount of income is $2,000 or less.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a drafting amendment here which I will ask my colleague to move. It reads:

That clause 9 of Bill 269 be amended by deleting "section thirty-three" in line thirty on page seven and substituting "section thirty-five" and by deleting "time when it made" in lines forty and forty-one on page seven and substituting "day on or before which it is required to make" and by deleting "when it made" in line three on page eight and substituting "on or before which it is required to make" and by deleting "at that time" in lines five and six on page eight and substituting "forthwith after receiving the notice of assessment."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to have some clarification of section 7. I know we have passed it, but I ask the minister's indulgence. This refers to foreign-owned corporations. The explanatory note says that it is a corporation owned entirely outside Canada. I should like the minister to explain this, because it seems a little involved. I am thinking of corporations such as the International Petroleum Company, which is a Canadian corporation holding considerable foreign securities.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the section which imposes a tax of five per cent on non-resident corporations in respect of dividends received after April 30, 1947. The United States revenue act has a corresponding provision imposing a tax of five per cent on Canadian parent companies with respect to dividends received from United States subsidiaries. We are imposing a similar tax on United States parents with respect to dividends received from Canadian subsidiaries paid after April 30, 1947. This is a taxing section.

Mr. ADAMSON: A Canadian corporation having a wholly owned subsidiary in any foreign country is liable to this five per cent tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it is just the reverse. The Canadian company may be liable to a five per cent tax imposed in a foreign country, and in point of fact I understand the United States does impose such a tax on Canadian parents with respect to dividends received from United States subsidiaries. Of course the Canadian company may take credit here for that tax. We are imposing the same tax on United States parent companies with respect to their Canadian subsidiaries.

Mr. ADAMSON: The United States company with a subsidiary here would pay the five per cent tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: Has the minister any estimate of the number of cooperative taxpayers that are likely to be affected by the new provision?

Mr. ABBOTT: We have no figures; it would have to be a guess. There is quite a large number of these small producer cooperatives whose income is not large. We have received representations that it is difficult for them to estimate in advance the amount of tax that they will be liable for and to make instalment payments. This was one of the submissions made to us on behalf of the cooperatives and it was considered to be a reasonable request.

Mr. FULTON: It seems to me that the whole question of taxing cooperatives is giving rise to great difficulty. That is probably inevitable because of this new effort which is being made and the new principle which has been introduced into the act. It seems to me that it is hard to assess that interest. It is hard to assess that interest at four per cent between, as I understand it, the date when they make their first payment of tax and the time when the final assessment is sent to them. For the very reason that it is difficult for them to decide on how much tax they will have to pay, and provided that they make a bona fide effort to arrive at that amount, why should they be charged interest while they are waiting for the final word from the assessing authority as to how much they are allowed?

Mr. ABBOTT: They can tell pretty well at the end of the year, when they file their return, how much tax they are liable to pay. This is intended to relieve them of the obligation of making an estimate month by month as the ordinary corporation has to do in making an instalment payment on account of tax. These small cooperatives can wait until their year is closed, close up their books, have their accounts entered up. Then they know, if their bookkeeping is accurate—and I assume it is—the amount of their tax liability, if any, and they file their return the same as any other corporation, and pay their tax. If they have underestimated their tax, then, when the assessment is made, they will have to pay interest on the amount of excess tax, if any, which was due, the same as any other taxpayer or the same as the individual.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. FULTON: I think that provision for penalty is unfair whether it is applied to a cooperative, an individual or a corporation, because so frequently there is delay in the final assessment. That may not be the fault of the department; it may be simply because it is understaffed. But it is not the fault of the taxpayer. It is an honest error on his part. This is a new provision, and I regret seeing this penalty extended to cooperatives.

With regard to the whole question of the difficulty that cooperatives experience in arriving at their liability for taxation, I have a letter which just came in today from a cooperative in my constituency. It appears that a new form, PD 1, has been designed and it is for the use of taxpayers claiming deduction from income for payment to customers such as these cooperatives claim as a result of paying dividends to patrons. The form refers to the incidental brochure re cooperatives which it states must be used for the instruction of the taxpayer in filling out his form and with it is an accompanying letter from the department saying that this brochure would be found of great assistance. My correspondent says that when they wrote to the department asking for the brochure, the department replied that, owing to the large number that had been asked for, it was temporarily out of print and would be forwarded as soon as available. This was on May 19. My letter is dated June 5. In other words, the cooperatives are finding it difficult to know just how to assess their tax. There is this brochure which the department got out to help them, and the brochure is not available. I should like to ask the minister what, if any, steps are being taken to speed up the preparation of further copies and get them into the hands of the cooperatives?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will make inquiries into that and see what the cause of the delay is. As the committee will appreciate, we are still in the trial and error stage so far as returns from these cooperatives are concerned. I feel sure that, as regards any difficulties which crop up as a result of this year when the first returns are being filed, if it is something which can be corrected by administrative action, we shall see that it is corrected. If it is a proper case and is something that requires legislative action, we can take care of it in that way. I will make inquiries as to why the brochure is not more readily available.

On section 10—Regulations.

Mr. HAZEN: I regard this section with some alarm. I consider it most objectionable, if I understand it correctly. I refer to the first part of it which reads as follows:

(3) The governor in council may make regulations not inconsistent with this act

(a) prescribing the evidence required for any purpose under this act.

It seems to me that the evidence required in the case of a prosecution under this act should not differ in any way from the evidence that is required in a court of law in any case that comes before it. It seems to me that the evidence required in any legal proceeding under this act should be subject to the same rules of evidence as are required to be complied with in a court of justice in any legal suit or proceedings in that court. It is a well established principle of law that a person who alleges must prove; and it is also a well established principle of law that a person charged with a crime is presumed innocent until he is proved guilty according to the rules of evidence of the land. To prove a person guilty of an offence, laws of evidence have been gradually developed, through trial and error, in the interests of justice. Hearsay evidence and secondary evidence are not, in most cases, permitted. It is now proposed by this section, as I read it, to give to certain bureaucrats powers to make their own laws of evidence. I see no reason why this should be permitted. I see many reasons why it should be opposed. Why should we make it easy for these officials to set aside the well established rules or laws of evidence, make it easy for them to get along by setting aside those laws and, in consequence, obtain convictions against persons who may be innocent?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no intention of that kind here. If that is the case, we would not put it in. There is no intention to affect the rules of evidence in prosecutions. It is merely in the administration of the act.

Mr. HAZEN: I may be altogether wrong in the way I have read this section. I trust that I am.

Mr. ABBOTT: Unless you are, we should certainly amend it. I think it relates only to administration. I should like to say a word of explanation, after my hon. friend is through, as to what the purpose of this is; because it is simply to facilitate administration. It is under the heading of "administration". Will my hon. friend allow me to give an example of what I have in mind?

Mr. HAZEN: I know what you have in mind, but does the wording of the act confine you to what you have in mind?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, the courts would never be bound, in a criminal prosecution, by anything like this. We want to be able to get the best evidence. If a man says he is the father of ten children living in Czechoslovakia, we want to be able to take a declaration to that effect.

Mr. HAZEN: Where do you find this is only for administration?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is under the heading of "administration". You have to take it in the context. It is sub-section 3 of section 75. It is the third sub-section in part 10. Part 10 is headed "administration". Under section 75, there are now two sub-sections, 1 and 2. This is added as sub-section 3. My hon. friend may be right. It is intended to be purely to supplement the administrative provisions of the act and to facilitate its ready administration. As the committee will realize, in a great many cases, evidence of dependency, evidence of the extent of medical expenses, evidence as to all other kinds of odds and ends of that kind, if you followed the strict legal rules of evidence, requiring the best evidence, it might impose an onerous burden on the taxpayer. It was intended that, under this provision, there should be considerable latitude whereby the governor in council could set up a code of rules under which statutory declarations would be accepted as evidence of certain claims made for exemptions, and that sort of thing. There is no intention that this should have any application for prosecutions for offences under the act; and if it could be interpreted in that way, certainly the section should not go in. But it was submitted to the Department of Justice, and I am told we were advised that was not the case. Frankly I had not considered that phase of it until my hon. friend raised it.

Mr. HAZEN: What struck my eye when I glanced at it previously was section 75, subsection 2, which definitely says the minister may make any regulations deemed necessary for carrying this act into effect. It seemed to me that those words were wide enough to give him power to make any regulation he saw fit. Now you go on and add this new clause saying that the governor in council may make regulations not inconsistent with this act. It does not say "not inconsistent with the administration of this act", but "not inconsistent with this act", prescribing the evidence required for any purpose under this act, not merely for the purposes of administration.

Mr. ABBOTT: Certainly there is no intention to have it cover any such field as my hon. friend suggests. It does not seem to me it does, but if there is any doubt, perhaps we had better let the section stand. I can drop it if necessary, but I think it is a useful section to have and it was put in at the suggestion of the department to facilitate the setting up of a code of which all those interested could be advised, under which they might derogate from the strict rule of the best evidence.

Mr. HAZEN: I was going to move that it be deleted, but if it could stand—

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we had better let that section stand, and I will get an opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether it could be extended in the way my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister is going to let that clause stand, does he wish to hear any further representations on it? It is objectionable from another point of view.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no objection to additional representations on it, if hon. members want to make them.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. member for St. John-Albert has dealt with the first subsection. It seems to me that sub-section 3 (b) may likewise go farther than is strictly necessary. We may be including here, in the class of persons who may be required to make information available, people who have no present liability under the act to make returns. I am quite sure the minister will tell us it is not his intention; nevertheless we are not legislating in those terms; we are legislating in terms of the language of the act and the powers it may give; and this conceivably could be used to enable the minister to conduct inquisitions in the case of persons who are not under obligation to make returns.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give consideration to that, too.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Might not the minister reconsider both subsections for the reasons given and perhaps make an alternative suggestion tomorrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I shall be very glad to reconsider them. I do not want to ask for any powers that are unreasonable. All we are trying to do is get a section which will provide reasonable flexibility and more efficient administration of the act. As I said before, if there is any question of paragraph (a) in particular going to the extent suggested by the hon. member for St. John-Albert I would drop it like a shot. I do not think it does go that far, but we can let the whole section stand and I will look at both (a) and (b) and see how far they go.

Mr. FRASER: How far back can the department go when they ask for evidence? Is there any regulation? I could not see any in that regard.

Mr. ABBOTT: Evidence of what?

Mr. FRASER: Evidence that a tax has or has not been paid, or that funds have been received for which a return has not been made?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no limit in law. I do not think they very often go back once the return has been assessed and the notice of assessment issued. I do not believe cases are often reopened unless there is some allegation of fraud or concealment, or something like that; and of course fraud is never outlawed.

Section stands.

On section 11—Refunds.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In sub-section 2 of section 11 there is a definite time limit, in these words:

> . . . the minister may, upon an application made on or before the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and forty-eight . . .

Is there any escape clause at all, or is that adamant?

Mr. ABBOTT: The section provides that they have until the end of December, 1948, to get in their application for refund. That is an additional relaxation. Then they will be subject to the general rule.

Mr. CARDIFF: Is it necessary for a person who has paid more income tax than he is liable to pay to apply in writing before that extra money will be refunded?

Mr. ABBOTT: If he has filed an income tax return, no; because that of itself constitutes a request for a refund. If he has not filed an income tax return, then the onus is upon him to notify the tax department that he claims to have paid more tax than he should have paid, and ask for a refund.

Mr. CARDIFF: What length of time does he have to wait before he gets back that money?

Mr. ABBOTT: He can make application as soon as the year is over. He would have to wait until the end of the year; if it were the calendar year 1947, for example, he would have to wait until the end of 1947. Then he would know what his income was for the year, and would know that it did not bring him into a taxable bracket.

Mr. CARDIFF: I can tell the minister that plenty of people have been waiting for three or four years to have this money paid back.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is referring to delay in refunds. That is because the Department of National Revenue, owing to staff shortage and for other reasons, has not been able to catch up with the work.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Has the minister ever considered that when assessments are made showing that a further tax is payable, some explanation should be placed on the assessment notice saying what the extra tax is for or what the mistake was? I think the minister will find that in the district offices when the assessment is made, often only a figure is mentioned. If there is a mistake, or anything of any importance, the solicitor has to communicate with the tax office. I think it would save a great deal of time and would satisfy a great many people if some explanation were given.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is quite right. I am told that during the war, because of the shortage of staff and in their hurry to get out the assessments, that work was curtailed; but instructions have gone out to the districts that, where an assessment is to be made, there is to be an explanatory statement reconciling the new assessment with the original assessment. It is important that this should be done.

Mr. KNOWLES: I welcome three words in this section which were not in it before. I refer to the words, "without application therefor", as they appear at line 34. That seems to give the government power to make refunds, even if application has not been made for them. Does that signify anything effective?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is to bring it into line with the other section. That deals with the period prior to the issue of the notice of assessment. It uses the words, "without application therefor, or on application in writing therefor by the taxpayer within two years from the end of the calendar year." In the case of the income tax payer who files a return, the department has to check that return; and if it develops that overpayment has been made, power is given here to make a refund at or prior to the issue of a notice of assessment.

Mr. KNOWLES: This section comes under part 16 of the act, which relates only to tax deductions at the source. In the first part of this sub-clause it says, "under this section", so that we are dealing only with tax deductions at the source.

Mr. ABBOTT: It brings it into line with section 56.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was wondering whether it meant that the department might reach the point where people who had deductions made at the source, which should not have been made, would receive them back automatically, without application?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would happen, if we had any means of checking what the overpayment was. But it is almost physically impossible to do it.

Mr. JACKMAN: In respect of a man, or the returns of a taxpayer, where there has been overpayment for some years, and underpayment for other years, before the final assessment is made, is the taxpayer charged at a certain rate of interest? What is the rate of interest for the deficiency years, and is no credit allowed for the surplus years?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. The rate that is payable on the underpayment would be the rate fixed under the act.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is that? Is it five per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is four per cent until one month after the assessment is issued, and then there is a three per cent penalty on top of that, if it becomes overdue.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why does the rule not work both ways, particularly if it is the same taxpayer and he happens to have overpaid through error, if you like, or through some change in understanding of the tax law? Why is he not given the same break in respect of underpayment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the internal administration, but I understand that these returns are assessed from year to year, the earlier returns being taken first. Let us say the year which is reached is 1943. It is assessed, and it is found there is an underpayment. An assessment notice is issued and the underpayment is collected with interest. Then it passes on to 1944 and the same thing happens there. The assessment is paid, with interest. Then you reach 1945 and find there is an overpayment. In that instance there is a refund; but no interest is paid on it.

Mr. JACKMAN: It seems to me that it is not a matter for jocularity. If someone wishes to collect interest when there is an innocent deficiency, particularly when the same taxpayer is involved, why should he not be allowed some credit for surplus payments in other years?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that where several years are assessed at the same time and overpayment is found in one year, with underpayment in another, no interest is assessed from the time overpayment was made, if it is credited to the other year.

Mr. JACKMAN: But that still does not answer the question. I do not know why a taxpayer should not be allowed a credit for overpayment. The crown wishes to have the money. I do not ask the crown to get into the same position as occurred in the United States administration where people purposely overpaid in order to collect the six per cent interest. But where there is an innocent overpayment, the crown should allow some compensation for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what rate should be suggested.

Mr. JACKMAN: You had no difficulty in assessing a rate of three or four per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: But that is done for a very real purpose. That is the type of penalty imposed on a taxpayer, who has control himself. He can estimate his tax accurately. If you do not impose an interest penalty there is a tremendous temptation to borrow money without interest from the public treasury.

Mr. FLEMING: There is another angle to the matter of penalty which, in fairness, the minister must acknowledge. So long as the situation continues as the minister concedes it to be, namely with a considerable backlog of work in the Department of National Revenue, is it fair to go on assessing interest at the rate of four per cent per annum—and it was formerly eight per cent—on people who have not deliberately made any error or underpayment, but who may have made a simple error?

There may have been misunderstanding in connection with interpretation of the statute; and I am bound to say that these amendments do not make the statute any easier for interpretation by the man on the street. It will be more and more difficult for more and more people to interpret it, and they will have to go to experts for advice.

In the light of these facts, it seems to me either that drastic steps must be taken in the Department of National Revenue to speed up this work and thus to reduce this considerable backlog or, in fairness, some step must be taken to reduce the interest charge. If the situation were as we would like to see it, namely the department following up quickly with its assessments of returns made, then there would not be any great complaint about the rate of four per cent, on a short period. But when you have assessments running behind four or five years it is a heavy burden. In the early years the penalty is still eight per cent.

In all fairness, I put it to the minister that an interest rate of four per cent is still too large a rate, so long as there is a considerable backlog. And from what we can tell, there is no prospect of any substantial reduction in that backlog in the near future.

The Minister of National Revenue indicated on an earlier occasion that he hoped some headway was being made—and probably so—in some tax jurisdictions in the dominion. But certainly in the one with which I am most familiar there is still a tremendous backlog. So long as that backlog persists, will he not have regard for a reduction in the interest rate, which I say, is grossly unfair if people are to be kept waiting for years.

Mr. ABBOTT: The rate of interest can be considered. There is a limit of twenty months on it now.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 2.45 o'clock.

WARTIME PRIME MINISTERS

Mr. SPEAKER: In the name of the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate and in my own name, I would like to invite all the hon. members of this house to a ceremony which will be held in the main lobby of the parliament building, at 5.30 o'clock this afternoon.

His Excellency the Governor General, accompanied by the President of the United States of America, Harry S. Truman, will unveil the portraits of the two Prime Ministers of Canada who were at the head of our country during the two great wars: the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

THE PRIME MINISTER

FELICITATIONS ON COMPLETING HIS TWENTIETH YEAR IN OFFICE

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has to leave about seven minutes after three o'clock to welcome a distinguished international statesman, the President of the great neighbour at our gates. Apart from these international courtesies which will be very close to our hearts, we have occasion to observe a national courtesy of the first order.

Today is a significant one in our history. As usual, I am at the side of the right hon. gentleman who today has been twenty years Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. We have our contentions here, our conflicts in debates, but on these larger occasions we are warm-hearted Canadians.

The Prime Minister is the dean of this house. He has enjoyed membership of this assembly for the twenty-eight years since 1919, with a few slight interruptions, and sat here for an additional period of three years, beginning in 1908.

May I leave with the house a practical way some of his record in the office of prime minister: From December 29, 1921, to June 28, 1926, 1,643 days; from September 25, 1926, to August 7, 1930, 1,413 days; from October 23, 1935, to the present hour, 4,249 days, a total of 7,305 days.

I must be brief. I wish I could speak longer, but I must not. The right hon. gentleman will pardon me, I think, if I mention four or five of the great inspirational influences in his life. The first was his beloved mother, born in exile, beside whose portrait in Laurier House there is an abiding light. The second was that old chieftain of Quebec, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I shall never forget, sir, the last words the present Prime minister used when Laurier was dead, recalling precious memories. I cannot quote them all:

> It is the old man with his bare head and his white hair, standing alone, fighting for the right as God gave him to see the right.

Again the inspirational voice of his illustrious grandfather, the rebel patriot of Canada:

> Well may I love the poor; greatly may I esteem the humble and the lowly, for poverty and adversity were my nurses, and in youth were want and misery my familiar friends; even now it yields a sweet satisfaction to my soul that I can claim kindred with the obscure cotter and the humble labourer of my native, ever-honoured, ever-loved Scotland.

Another great influence in his life was Louis Pasteur. Most of us are familiar with just a word from a favourite quotation:

> Two contrary laws seem to be wrestling with each other nowadays; the one, a law of blood and of death, ever imagining new means of destruction, and forcing nations to be constantly ready for the battlefield—the other, a law of peace, work and health, ever evolving new means of delivering man from the scourges which beset him.

Then in war, in 1939, most of us were here and remember the Prime Minister's words. I wish I could quote them all but I cannot. I remember that he said:

> I never dreamed that the day would come when, after spending a lifetime in a continuous effort to promote and to preserve peace and good will in international as well as in industrial relations, it should fall to my lot to be the one to lead this dominion of Canada into a great war; but that responsibility I assume with a sense of being true to the very blood that is in my veins. I assume it in the defence of freedom —the freedom of my fellow countrymen here, the freedom of those whose lives are unprotected in other communities and countries, the freedom of mankind itself.

Victory crowned our efforts. With the consent of the house I am going back across the ocean to Scotland for a moment, to quote some words from one of the poets of Scotland, Neil Munro, of Inveraray:

> Though hails may beat us and the great mists blind us,
> And lightning rend the pine-tree on the hill
> Yet are we strong, yet shall the morning find us
> Children of tempest all unshaken still!

One last word and I am through. Our distinguished leader has known the golden promise of the dawn, the full glory of the noontide hour, the conscious satisfaction resulting from great achievements in the afternoon of life; and now, sir, in the mellow twilight, we wish him continued happiness and health and many more years of devoted service to Canada which we love and which he loves so much.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not given to many men to be Prime Minister of Canada. Only eleven have held that position since confederation. The present Prime Minister is one of them. It is given to much fewer men to be Prime Minister of a democracy for twenty years. The right hon. gentleman has been Prime Minister of Canada for that long. As a matter of fact he has been Prime Minister of Canada for one-quarter of this nation's history. Whether he is to be blamed for one-quarter of the ills of all the people of Canada during that time I shall not discuss today, but I want it perfectly understood that I reserve the right to discuss it next week or next year.

On this occasion I want to express my congratulations to the Prime Minister upon his long years of service to this country. One does not need to agree with the policies of a man in the position in which the Prime Minister finds himself today in order to pay his respects on an occasion like this. Twenty years is a long time. I can speak on that with some experience. In a rather smaller field it was my privilege to serve for more than twenty years, and when I left there were some who said that that was twenty years too long. I feel sure that there is nobody in Canada who would say that today about the present Prime Minister. I said nobody would say it today, but again I reserve that right to say what I think wise about it tomorrow or later.

I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity of associating myself with those sitting with me in extending to the Prime Minister our congratulations on his long years of service. I am sure we all wish for him long life and much happiness in the days ahead.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we too of the C.C.F. party join in the good wishes that have just been extended by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We hope that he may yet enjoy many years of life and happiness. He has been Prime Minister for twenty years, one of the most challenging twenty years I suppose in world history. Indeed, when we think of the events since the first great war—the toppling of thrones, the rise of dictatorships, another great war, the elimination of dictatorships, the breaking up of empires—one realizes that the right hon. gentleman has been Prime Minister of Canada at the end of one of the great eras of human history. We join with all others in this house in expressing to him all our good wishes, and the hope that he may yet be spared to render service to our country.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to add a word of congratulation to the Prime Minister on this occasion. It is no mean achievement to serve as the elected head of Canada's government for a full quarter of the nation's history. No matter what we may think, as I have said on another occasion, of the horse which the Prime Minister has been on during all those years, we all have to admit that he made a hell of a good ride. No matter how we may differ in our views on the policies advocated by the Prime Minister, there are a good many of us in the house I suppose who would be very happy to learn just how he had managed to achieve those twenty years of service, and at the same time how he had managed to keep his remarkable vitality through all the years since he first became Prime Minister. I wish to join with other hon. members in extending congratulations and sincere personal wishes to the right hon. gentleman.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), senior French-speaking minister in the present cabinet, I am happy to associate myself with those who have spoken before me in offering our most sincere congratulations and our best wishes to the Prime Minister on this happy anniversary.

We are assembled today to pay tribute to one of the greatest Canadians of all time. We are here to express our feelings of admiration, esteem and gratitude. For twenty years, Canada's Prime Minister. For twenty years, government leader of his country. We cannot help thinking of the studies, work and preparation represented in the achievement of such a career.

From early youth, the Prime Minister prepared himself by careful study, by meditation and travels in nearly every country of the world, for the post he has held for so long. While still a young man he became a member of the administration. A few years later he entered Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government. At that school, he increased his experience, developed his patience and qualified himself fully for the leadership of a great party. As soon as he entered parliament, he revealed himself an accomplished parliamentarian. His authority among party members and in parliament is beyond all question. He dedicated his life to the development of his country and to the happiness of his fellow countrymen. A tireless worker, he devoted his energies to the expansion throughout the world of his country's fame.

As peacetime leader, his administration was gratified with success after success. As wartime leader, he maintained unity among the various elements of our population, in the accomplishment of an admirable all-out effort which finally led Canada to victory.

Among our Canadian statesmen, he is probably the one who best understood the mentality, feelings and aspirations of my compatriots. He devoted his life to Canada's national unity, seeing the Canadian people as one group, without distinction of language, creed and customs. That is why he has enjoyed for such a long time and still enjoys the esteem and respect of my compatriots.

We shall never forget the unflinching confidence he placed in the French Canadians' sincerity during the historical and tragical moments which we experienced during the past few years. His understanding enabled our country to pass that critical period of our history without any clash, all to the best interests of the country. We have admired and supported him in the past and he may rest assured that his name will forever live in our hearts.

And when the time comes to write history, the Canadian people will unanimously recognize the unrivalled qualities of this great statesman.

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North) (Text): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are pressed for time, and I can assure you that my remarks will be brief and to the point. As the representative of the constituency of Waterloo North, the riding which first sent our illustrious Prime Minister to parliament, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without paying a tribute to him for the splendid work he has done on behalf of Canada.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) mentioned, I believe, that the Prime Minister rode a horse for a good many years. To that I might add that the horse started in a good riding, is the right kind of horse, and has come a long way. On behalf of the riding I wish to express to the Prime Minister our sincerest congratulations on this, his twentieth anniversary as Prime Minitser, and to express the hope that he may be spared for many more years of useful service.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could begin to tell hon. members what it means to me to be surrounded today by those with whom I have been most closely associated in the work of government and in the work of this parliament, and to hear the kind tributes which have been expressed on this occasion. I know that hon. members will make allowance for some of the things which have been said much too generously. I can assure all hon. members that every word which has been spoken today will retain its place in my mind as long as memory itself endures.

I know that, in speaking of the twenty years I have been in the office of Prime Minister, a good many have said to themselves, "I do not know how to account for it." This comment has not been confined to those of any one party. I have heard that members of my own party have said the same thing on occasions. I know that some hon. gentlemen opposite have said it repeatedly. I myself will not attempt to give an answer because I could not if I tried. All I wish to say is that, in looking back over those years and asking myself how it comes about that I should be speaking in this House of Commons to its members this afternoon, I can account for it, so far as my part may have contributed in any way, only by recalling what I owe to those whom my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) has referred to this afternoon, and to a few others whom he might also have named. I believe that for all of us the best that is in us comes from the past. After all, we only play our little part as a result of the sacrifices which have been made by others and for which we reap the reward. So I thank my colleague for having reminded me, the house and country, of those who are much in my mind and heart today.

To speak of my years of office, I think I can truly say that such good fortune as I have had in my present position has been due in large part to the ministers of the crown by whom I have been surrounded, to their great ability and great loyalty. It has been due also to the marvellously loyal support which I have received over the years from those who have been my followers and supporters in this House of Commons. It has been due also in large measure to the assistance which has been given to the work of the Prime Minister's office by members of the public service, the assistance which has been given by officials of this house and by many who are in very humble positions. Without their efficient service and loyalty it would be impossible for any one in an important position to perform his public duties. I do not forget either the kindness of my friends of the press. Though some of them may differ with me, many of them have given me loyal and helpful support, and all have given me the best of comradeship.

May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that while I cannot thank them for the fact that I am still in office, and hope to be in office for a little while longer at least, I thank them most warmly for the courtesies which they have extended toward me in all the years I have been here. I think I have been particularly lucky in the friendships I have had among hon. members on all sides of the house. I shall always remember gratefully the kindness that has been shown me on many occasions by the other side of the house and never more so, may I say, than today. Above all, I do not forget at this moment what I owe to the confidence of the Canadian people over so many years. That is perhaps the greatest of all the rewards of public life and service.

Mr. Bracken, as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, I thank you very warmly for what you have said and for the hearty manner in which your words have been supported by members of your following. To you, Mr. Coldwell, may I say the same. I shall always remember what you have said, and equally the cordial manner in which those who sit around you applauded your words this afternoon. I thank you, Mr. Low, for your good wishes, and also for the generous support your followers have given your kind words. I thank you also for your reference to the political horse I have ridden over the years. My friend Mr. Breithaupt, who comes from the county in which I was born and represents it so splendidly in this house, knows that I began quite early in life—I think it was perhaps before he was born—to ride a horse. I learned something about how to ride horseback personally and politically in the old county of Waterloo. One of these days I intend to return to the county which I first represented in this parliament and express my thanks for the teaching I received at that time, which has stood me in such good stead through all these eventful years. To my colleague Mr. Fournier, I am deeply grateful for reminding the country of how much I owe to my French-Canadian compatriots.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to be able to express my thanks fully but you and all will realize I am sure that this is a moment when it is difficult indeed for me, after listening to what has been said this afternoon, no matter how long I may have been in parliament and in public life, to find words with which to express what is really deepest in my heart. I can only thank you, my fellow members of the House of Commons one and all; this I do irrespective of party; this I do with all my heart.

I hope I may be excused if I now leave the chamber. As my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs who is leading the house has just said, I am to join His Excellency in meeting the President of the United States and greeting him on his arrival. That will be in less than a quarter of an hour. Again I thank you all and say God bless you.

GOLD

STORAGE OF BULLION BY MINING INTERESTS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): A short time ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked the following question:

In view of suggestions made in the house for the devaluation of the Canadian dollar or an increase in the price of gold, and Canada's need of American exchange, what action does the government propose to take regarding the storing of large amounts of gold bullion by the McIntyre-Porcupine Mines Limited, or other mining interests who may be adopting a similar policy?

I have given very careful consideration to the problem raised by this question. There is no law on our statute books which specifically prohibits a gold mining company from withholding, or delaying to ship to the Royal Canadian Mint, a part or all of the gold currently produced by the mine. The only law relating to the subject appears to be subsection 2 of section 28 of the Bank of Canada Act, which was passed by parliament in 1934. Under this subsection, the governor in council is given power to require——every chartered bank or every other person to transfer to the bank—

That is, the Bank of Canada.

—any or all gold coin or bullion held in Canada which is owned by such chartered bank or by such other person.

The subsection goes on to authorize the governor in council to take——all measures deemed necessary or expedient to enforce any such transfer and to impose and recover penalties in respect of any neglect or refusal to make any transfer so required.

I believe that the government could take action under this authority, if the situation appeared to warrant it. It might, of course, be urged that what the mines have been shipping to the mint in the past and what some of them are now storing is not gold bullion but, say, gold concentrates or gold in some other unrefined or partially refined form. However, this contention could hardly be successfully supported in most cases, and particularly in cases where the parcel deposited consists of gold which has been refined to a fineness of around eighty per cent.

There is, however, a rather serious difficulty or objection in applying the above provision of the Bank of Canada Act to the type of case which is now in question. This difficulty arises from the very severe penalty which has to be imposed when the provision is put in force. Section 29 of the Bank of Canada Act provides that where gold is transferred to the Bank of Canada under the previous section——the value of the said gold shall be computed on the basis established by the Currency Act at the date of the relevant transaction.

This means that if the governor in council required a mining company to transfer to the Bank of Canada the gold bullion which it is now storing, the price at which it would be taken over would be $20.67 per fine ounce, rather than the current price of around $35 per ounce.

This would be probably too drastic a penalty to impose in a case of the kind we are considering—too drastic, that is to say, unless the country's need for the gold was immediate and urgent. On the other hand, after serious consideration I have not been able to think of any amendment to these provisions of the Bank of Canada Act which I would be prepared to recommend at this time, because I can see that there may be cases arising in future where it might be appropriate to apply the present provisions of that act. With this in mind, I am not proposing any action on this matter at the present time. I am content to defer action for the time being because any gold that is stored by mining companies will be in a few hands; we will know where it is and approximately what it amounts to. We can therefore take it into account as in some measure a substitute for a part of our official reserves and, finally, if the need should arise, we will be in a position to have it transferred to the Bank of Canada under the legislative authority I have mentioned.

I cannot refrain, however, from expressing the hope that we will not see a continuance or extension under present circumstances of this practice of hoarding gold and thus not allowing the current output of this monetary metal to become an acknowledged part of the country's essential exchange reserves. As hon. members will recall, parliament itself has approved within the past twelve months the Foreign Exchange Control Act, to permit the conservation and control of the use of our foreign exchange resources, and under that act it is necessary for us to maintain restrictions on many types of capital transactions. If this were a world which was not suffering from the consequences of two great wars in one generation, it would probably be possible to permit complete freedom for companies and individuals to speculate in foreign exchange, foreign securities and gold. Unfortunately, it is not that kind of world. We simply cannot afford at present to see widespread speculation in foreign exchange and foreign securities, nor widespread speculation in gold, which is the equivalent of foreign exchange. In so far as we can secure the sensible cooperation of business men and investors, it is possible to get along with a minimum of restrictions and controls. I trust that public opinion itself will be a potent force in determining what type of action is considered reasonable under given circumstances, and that that public opinion today will serve to a considerable extent to dissuade individuals or groups from attempting to make unproductive and speculative profits by exploiting the international difficulties that various countries face in these times.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Can the Minister of Finance give the house any assurance that Canadian gold mines will receive notice or warning before the threatened imposition of the Bank of Canada regulations are brought into effect against them?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I think the gold mines in question had better take my statement today at its face value and govern themselves accordingly.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ARRANGEMENT OF FLAGS—ABSENCE OF UNION JACK FROM PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the leader of the house. Why has the union jack been discarded from the flag pole today, and why is it not flying on any of the three flag poles, either on top of or in front of the parliament buildings? Who is responsible for giving instructions as to what flags should be flown?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I believe my colleague the Minister of Public Works could answer that question better than I can.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in 1945, right at the close of the war, an order in council was passed stating that the red ensign would be flown on public buildings. I did not expect this question today. However I can say that I believe the officials of my department have followed the order in council passed at that time. That would explain why they have put the red ensign on all public buildings.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister realize that when Mr. Churchill was here the union jack was on the right and the Canadian ensign to the left? When General Montgomery was here the Canadian ensign was on the right—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a speech.

Mr. KIDD: I am asking a question. When General Montgomery was here the Canadian ensign was on the right and the union jack on the left.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member has put his question and has received his answer.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, with respect to your ruling, the Minister of Public Works has not answered the question completely. He, himself, sir, suggested he was answering only with regard to the Canadian ensign in the top position. He has not answered that portion of the question which had to do with flags flying either to the right or the left of the Canadian ensign. My question, supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Kingston City, is this: Why is not the union jack flying in some place, somewhere, inasmuch as there are three positions which are recognized today, namely the Canadian ensign in the centre position, with one to the right and the other to the left? With due respect, sir, I should like to have an answer with regard to the two other official positions for flying the flag.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KIDD: Let him answer.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I can only repeat that the officials of the government are following the terms of the order in council passed in 1945. I believe that order in council was tabled in the house and was explained by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the time. Furthermore a committee of the House of Commons sat for a session or two to try to find a distinctive flag for our country, and the report which came back to the house recommended the red ensign. On all our buildings we are flying either the union jack or the red ensign. If hon. members will read the order in council they will see that we are justified in flying the red ensign over public buildings.

I am answering in an impromptu fashion, because I had no notice of the question. However if the hon. member wishes me to make a further statement I shall study the matter and make another report later.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, as a member of this honourable chamber for over a quarter of a century, and having read the history of Canada since confederation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On a question of privilege; I have some rights, and I propose to exercise them—with all due respect to you, sir, and the usages of this honourable House of Commons. We did give way in 1945 to the ensign, with the union jack, on every occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I asked—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but that is not a question of privilege. He will understand that I have permitted him to ask his question, but I cannot permit a debate on the matter. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Just one second; I recall in this House of Commons that hon. members of the party opposite moved a motion that the red ensign be the national flag of Canada. I cannot see why they object when we fly it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not wish to debate this matter, but on a question of privilege, sir, I asked the minister a question, not about the red ensign which is at present flying over the building, but about the flags which are flying to the right and left. And I make this statement, that never before since confederation has this honourable house sat under flags which did not include the union jack.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It does include the union jack; the union jack is part of our red ensign. Do you realize that?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF DISPLACED PERSONS FROM EUROPE —PRESS REPORT AS TO SELECTION—DUTCH IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources arising out of a comment appearing in the Globe and Mail of today respecting the statement the minister made yesterday in the house. The press report states that employers will be allowed to select persons in displaced persons camps and bring them here under contract. Would the minister care to make a statement on that point?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): Immigrants will be selected by the immigration branch, with the advice and counsel of the Department of Labour. Where the Department of Labour gets its advice is for the Department of Labour to determine. I can see no objection should the advice be taken of people who will later agree to employ these displaced persons in a particular industry. But I should like to make it clear that the selection will be made by the immigration branch.

While I am on my feet I should like to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I can now advise him that one thousand Dutch immigrants are sailing for Canada on June 17 of this year.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question in connection with Dutch immigrants. Can applications be received under the usual circumstances? I have received letters stating that they have been definitely turned down. Is there any provision prohibiting the entry of Dutch immigrants, or are they as free to come in as persons of other nationalities?

Mr. HOWE: Dutch immigrants are free to come in under the rules governing immigration. Under the government movement, Dutch immigrants are screened by the immigration branch. If they come forward and are found healthy and otherwise suitable for emigration to this country it is quite within their privilege to come to Canada. How fast they can be moved depends upon shipping. As I say, the first movement of one thousand will take place on June 17, which is next week.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have these thousand Dutch immigrants had farm experience? If so, how will distribution be made throughout Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the background in this type of movement which would permit my answering the question. It is my understanding however that many applications have been received for the employment of those included in the movement. Whether the applications are being filled in the order in which they are received, I cannot say. However I shall be glad to make a statement on that point later.

Mr. DESMOND: May I say that if there is any confusion regarding immigrants from Holland and if there is any question about their acceptance, they are all quite acceptable in Kent county.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY

INQUIRY AS TO DATE ON WHICH S.S. "ABEGWEIT" WILL BEGIN BORDEN-TORMENTINE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, arising from the announcement made yesterday, as to the date of the christening ceremony of S.S. Abegweit, I now wish to ask an all-important question of the Minister of Transport. Will the minister state when the S.S. Abegweit will take over the Borden-Tormentine ferry service?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Just as soon as it possibly can, after the naming ceremony.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS TAXI OWNERS ASSOCIATION OF MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs what action has been taken to protect the interests of Canadian veterans who are members of the veterans taxi owners association of Montreal.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I should like to make a statement on that question as soon as possible, but I have not the file before me now. I want to say at once that the Department of Veterans Affairs has nothing whatsoever to do with the activities of the veterans taxi owners association of Montreal, except that a former employee of the department got mixed up with the activities and he was immediately dismissed.

CHEESE

INQUIRY AS TO REQUISITIONING FOR UNITED KINGDOM CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Yesterday an announcement was made by the Minister of Finance that the price ceiling had been removed on all agricultural products—

Mr. ABBOTT: Dairy products.

Mr. TUSTIN:—and I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is the intention of the government to requisition the entire make of Ontario cheese for the United Kingdom contract. If so, will it be taken at the floor price?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know of any intention on the part of the government to requisition cheese this year.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Monday, June 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 269, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

[Mr. McLure.]

On section 12—Private companies.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will the minister explain subsection 2?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): As the explanatory note points out, the amendment to subsection 2 is consequential upon the amendment to subsection 1 which allows a private company incorporated after 1939 to elect to pay the special tax under this part of the Income War Tax Act. It is a purely consequential amendment in order to bring subsection 2 in line with subsection 1 as amended. I have a further amendment, to add a subsection 5 to this section, which I will ask my colleague to move.

Mr. McCANN: I move:

That subclause three of clause 12 of Bill 269 be amended by adding after subsection four therein contained the following subsection:

"(5) Where a private company pursuant to the winding up of another company received property in any form in respect of which it was not subject to tax under this act but in respect of which it would have been subject to tax if section nineteen of this act had been in force at the time it received the property, the private company may, at its option, include in its undistributed income for the purposes of this part of the lesser of

(a) an amount equal to the amount in respect of which it would have been so subject to tax, or

(b) an amount equal to the amount by which the value of all property in any form received by it pursuant to the winding up exceeded the value of the consideration given by the private company for the shares of the other company in respect of which the said property was received by it."

Mr. FLEMING: Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is to cover a case which was overlooked when the original section was drafted. It was found that there were certain companies which, had they continued in their former state, could have qualified and elected under the provisions of the section. However, they had been reorganized and assets of the former company were transferred to the new company, but there was a substantial identity between the original company and the successor company. It was considered equitable that company No. 2, if it cared to do so, could avail itself of the provisions of the section, and this new subsection is being put in to enable it to do so.

The committee will realize that these provisions will lapse on December 31 of this year. It was suggested that these so-called private companies should be enabled to pay tax at the rates stipulated on their undistributed surplus. As the committee realizes, the provisions are pretty technical and in the practical application it was found that there were certain cases which in equity would be entitled to the benefit of the amended provisions and which on one technical ground or another were excluded. The amendments this year are designed to cover cases which it is considered should properly be covered.

Mr. FLEMING: Company No. 2 in the instance given by the minister is to be given the option provided by the legislation which was consequential on the report of the Ives commission.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is it exactly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not like to trouble the minister at the moment, but this section refers to a private company. The interpretation section of the Income War Tax Act refers to a family corporation in paragraph (d) of section 2 and a personal corporation in paragraph (i). I have had some difficulty in distinguishing just what is meant by the interpretation section, and we now have a private company. I wonder if the minister, either now or later, would care to give the committee a succinct definition of these three different forms of small private or family companies so that we may have it clear in our minds?

Mr. ABBOTT: The family corporation is no longer of any great practical significance, because the special tax provisions relating to family corporations were repealed some time ago. The personal corporation is a type of corporation defined in the Income War Tax Act. I have not the section here, but broadly speaking it is a company with just a few shareholders which is controlled by an individual or by members of his family, and I think it is 75 per cent or 85 per cent of its revenue must be derived from interest or dividends on securities and the like. The income of the company is taxed in the hands of the shareholder in proportion to the number of shares held. This so-called private company, as used in this section, applies simply to the type of company which was dealt with by the Ives commission in its report, and colloquially it might be described as a company with closely held shares. The requirements in the suggested amendment are that the company should not have more than seventy-five shareholders. That definition is a modification of the provisions of the Companies Act, which states what will constitute a private company for the purposes of the Companies Act and thereby relieve the company from obligation of filing a prospectus or a statement in a prospectus.

I explained on introducing the resolutions on which these sections are based that in a good many cases, as a result of deaths and distribution among heirs, there are companies which are private companies within the intent of this legislation which have sold more than fifty shares, so we decided to extend it to seventy-five. There is nothing sacramental about the rule of fifty, except it happens to be the number which is set out in the Companies Act. That is a pretty general statement as to what constitutes a private company. There is no special legal significance to the term "private company" except under the Dominion Companies Act and except with respect to this particular legislation.

Mr. JACKMAN: As far as income tax is concerned has the family corporation classification any significance now? There are no such family corporations?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. There are a few companies which may still have some income which was accumulated under the family corporation provision, but I think it has mostly been distributed. The provision with respect to electing to be treated as a family corporation expired in 1942.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Tax in respect of dividends from a private company, etc.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask the minister to give an explanation of this section. It is becoming very confused and involved. It is, without doubt, as difficult to follow as anything I have ever seen for some time. In explaining the effect of the section will the minister have in mind the impression that some of the provisions create, that in fact there will be retroactive taxation here?

Mr. ABBOTT: I realize these sections are very complicated. I found the greatest difficulty myself in working them out and in understanding them as drafted, although for over twenty years I have had experience in looking into sections of this kind. This particular section, which will be section 97 in the act, is to plug a loophole in the provisions of the act. I issued a press statement back in January pointing out what this loophole was, and stated that I proposed to introduce an amendment at the present session of parliament to plug it. Perhaps it would be as easy as any other way for me to explain it if I were to read into the record the statement I made at that time, and then I can elaborate on it if my hon. friend wishes. I said I proposed to introduce certain amendments to the Income War Tax Act of a somewhat technical nature affecting private companies. I said that although not many taxpayers would be affected by the amendment, I thought that those who would be concerned should be informed. I now quote from the statement:

> The purpose of the amendment is to prevent legal avoidance of tax on distributions of accumulated surpluses of private companies electing to pay tax under part XVIII of the act in cases where persons have purchased their shares from corporate owners since December 31, 1944. Where the shares of the private company are acquired by the individual on or after January 1, 1947, the dividend paid out of accumulated surplus will be taxable in the hands of the individual at the rates that would have been paid by the private company in respect of the surplus represented by the shares in question if the present owner had been the actual owner on December 31, 1944. If the shares were purchased in the calendar years 1945 or 1946 the dividend will be taxable when received by the individual but at a rate of 15 per cent.

The reason for that was this. As my hon. friend will appreciate, dividends from one Canadian corporation to another are exempt from tax. Take a private company which had individual shareholders and corporation shareholders. It could elect and could qualify as a private company under this section. It elects to be taxed on the basis of part XVIII. The tax is calculated at the appropriate rate as income of the company on the proportion of the income of the company or proportion of the surplus of the company attributable to individual shareholders; but since the corporate shareholder would pay no tax on the portion of the income which was going to him, the total tax paid by the private company to which I referred would be less because of having corporate shareholders. Then, step No. 2. If an individual acquired the shares of that corporate shareholder or private company he could get the dividend from the private company tax free. It is to plug that hole that this amendment is introduced.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the minister for his statement. The committee appreciates that there is a fairness about the proposal, but the feature which troubles me, and which I think has not been fully clarified by the minister is this. Simply because the warning was given in January of this year it is treated as a ground for imposing the tax now. But there may be people who acquired their shares prior to the date of the warning, and acquired them with knowledge, presumably, of the fact that the shares at that time were free of this particular type of tax. The tax is now being extended in 1947 although the individual sought to be taxed now may have purchased them prior to the date of the warning. No doubt in most cases he purchased them prior to the date of the warning, understanding, and being entitled then to understand, that the shares were free of tax on the proportion of undistributed surplus in the hands of the company. It looks to me like a retroactive tax, which is not a desirable kind of tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: One answer to my hon. friend is this, and that is why we made the difference between the two rates which were imposed here; the 15 per cent rate, which is the minimum under the schedule in section 92, applies to such cases as took place in 1945 or 1946. In the future the regular rates which are set out in the schedule apply.

Mr. FLEMING: Would it not be better to make it apply from this point on instead of going back?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I really feel that that would be unjustified.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not quite understand the minister's reasoning where the tax avoidance is if the corporation gets the distribution from the private company, it being a shareholder. When it receives the income it will go into the earned surplus of the receiving corporation, and then when it is paid out, as it must be some time if anyone is to benefit from it, the shareholders must ultimately pay the tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I perhaps was not quite clear in my explanation. What happens is this. The individual buys the shares from corporation No. 2 before the dividend is paid out. That is where I was incomplete in my explanation. An individual buys shares of a private company from this other corporation before the dividend is paid out, and he receives the dividend tax free.

On section 15—Paragraph A of first schedule.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is nothing new to it in principle except what was said in the budget debate; but as the minister has said, and everyone in Canada believes, the rates of advance on taxation are much too quick, and this schedule is must too fast in its rate of advancement; after $1,500 a man pays an extra 2 per cent, I think it is, upon every $100, so by the time he reaches a taxable income of $2,000 he will be in the 20 per cent bracket. I merely wish to go on record again as saying I think that is too high a rate of progression if the government wishes to stimulate the best activities and the utmost production in the country.

On section 16—Deductions allowed corporations refining or marketing petroleum.

Mr. ARGUE: An oil company is allowed to deduct from income the cost of exploration, even it if strikes a dry hole; why is the farmer not allowed to deduct from income the expense of digging a well, even if he finds no water?

Mr. ABBOTT: The short answer would be that this is incentive legislation to stimulate in Canada the search for oil, which is a badly needed raw material.

Mr. ARGUE: So is water.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 10—Regulations.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for St. John-Albert raised the question last night that the provisions of this section might be interpreted in a very much broader fashion than I had thought possible, and I said at the time that if he was right the section should be amended or withdrawn. The purpose of the section is to endeavour to provide a flexible workable basis for administering the Income War Tax Act. What we are trying to achieve is an act which will be readily understandable and which will work fairly for all taxpayers. For that purpose it is necessary to give a certain amount of flexibility to the act. We are trying to eliminate the straight ministerial discretion, and in cases where flexibility is necessary we want to incorporate a provision whereby regulations will be adopted by the governor in council, which will of course require approval by the cabinet. The regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette and I hope would be available in brochure form for the use of all taxpayers.

Paragraph (3) (a) provides:

> The governor in council may make regulations not inconsistent with this Act.
> (a) prescribing the evidence required for any purpose under this Act.

That is pretty broad in its terms. I consulted the law officers of the crown this morning. They do not believe it could be interpreted as widely as my hon. friend suggested last night, but I think we should put the question beyond peradventure and state just what the intention is. As I said last night, this is intended to relate only to the administration of the act as such. The evidence required would be in regard to such matters as establishing charitable donations, dependency, and so forth. Suppose a man claims he has a dependent living in Europe. He should not be held to the strict rule of best evidence, but the department should be able to require that an affidavit be evidence of dependency if accompanied by money order receipts to show that payments were made regularly. That is the sort of thing we had in mind.

Paragraph (3) (b) reads:

> (b) requiring any class of persons to make information returns respecting any class of information required in connection with the administration or enforcement of this act—

And so forth. I discussed this with the officials of the Department of National Revenue, and they find that in the enforcement of the act they require information from different classes at different times in rather different forms, and it is hard to spell that out in advance in the act. They feel that there should be some flexibility and that regulations should be made, which could be made known to all taxpayers, so that the rules could be varied from time to time. They feel that it is not desirable that we should attempt to spell the whole thing out in the statute. With that in view I think the objections that were taken last night might be met by amending the section in this way:

> That clause ten of Bill 269 be amended by deleting the words "for any purpose under this act" where they appear in paragraph (a) thereof and substituting "to establish facts relevant to assessments under this act" and by deleting the words "the administration or enforcement of this act" where they appear in paragraph (b) thereof and substituting the words "assessments under this act."

In other words, prescribe what character of evidence may be accepted by the department, and what type of information may be asked for, relating only to assessments under the act. I suggest to the committee that that is a reasonable provision and that it will make for efficient administration of the act. If it is found that it is abused, and I do not think for one moment that it will be, the question could be raised in the house and an appropriate amendment insisted upon, but I suggest to the committee that the section as I now propose it and which I will ask one of my colleagues to move in a moment is an appropriate and a workable section.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the suggested amendment clarifies the matter to a very great extent, and so far as I understand it now it is acceptable.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to say a word about the proposed amendment to clause (b). I can appreciate the points raised by the minister, and I also appreciate his willingness last night to take these objections into consideration and review the section. Such an attitude on the part of the minister is something we welcome on this side of the house. We do not see enough of it on the part of ministers in the house.

But as to the amendment proposed by the minister I do say again, as I said last night in connection with another section, that the proposal of the minister is in some form or another to codify, first of all, the evidence to be prescribed under paragraph (a), and also the rules attaching to the filing of information by classes of persons under paragraph (b). It is a task that has to be done some time and it ought to be done here in parliament. It ought to be as easy for us to do it here as for the minister or the governor in council to do it. The minister says that it is desirable to have some flexibility, that more frequent changes are necessary than are possible with legislation. But I wonder whether with these long sessions of parliament there is any great danger of hardship arising if it is left to parliament to do the legislating. I want to offer this word of caution and warning. It is far too easy for any minister or any member to allow himself to get into this frame of mind: We want flexibility; let us not tie ourselves down too tightly; give power to the governor in council to make regulations. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that that is a sufficient reason for leaving it to the governor in council. I think the task of parliament is to legislate clearly and to legislate sufficiently. A codification of the matters referred to by the minister will be helpful, but my point is that the body that ought to be doing that kind of legislating is parliament and not the governor in council.

Mr. ABBOTT: With a good deal of what my hon. friend has said I am in sympathy, but I think he and all hon. members who have had experience in these matters will agree that in an act like the income war tax act it is essential that power be given to make regulations which in effect become a part of the statute. In other words there is a certain type of legislation where, if the thing is to work efficiently and if parliament is to get through its work, parliament must lay down certain general principles and there must be a certain flexibility allowed whereby regulations can be made. It is a matter of opinion where the line should be drawn between those two points of view. That is where my hon. friend and I may differ. I feel quite strongly from the experience I have had that in a case of this kind the flexibility should be achieved by conferring upon the government of the day the power to make regulations. Remember that the minister in whose department the regulations are made is responsible through the government to this parliament and the country.

As I said a moment ago, I feel that administrative regulations of this kind which are widely publicized, which should be made known and would be made known to all taxpayers, can be made the subject of burning criticism in this house if the executive has presumed to go farther than it should go. In drafting this act and the bigger act which I hope to bring in a little later in this session, all I am interested in is to achieve a sound, workable and understandable tax law which we can make known to the people generally. I believe that one way to do that is to have the act lay down the broad general principles—in considerable detail, it is true—and then have fairly extensive power by the governor general to make regulations, which, of course, must be publicized, but which can be readily changed from month to month if the circumstances of the administration of the act demonstrate that it is desirable to do so. I am hoping that when I bring in my big bill my hon. friends will see that there is a considerable degree of that in the act. I am trying to get away from those purely ministerial discretions and put in something by regulation which will be the tax law, to which the taxpayer can have recourse and which the courts can interpret and rule on, which is not the case with ministerial discretions. That is what I want to get away from as much as possible. I honestly believe that this is a power which should be given to the governor general to exercise by regulation. I see that my hon. friend differs from me to some extent on that point; and that, of course, is a matter of opinion. I should like to see this section given a trial. As I say, it is perfectly open to any member of the house to come here and show that any regulation made is unjustified and demand that it be changed.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is not good enough.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I should like to mention two things about the statement which the minister has just made and which I appreciate. First, so far as the power to make regulations is concerned, I think the minister has ample powers now under subsection 2 of section 75. We are not taking away from him anything which he now has, in saying what we have said about the proposed new subsection 3.

Mr. ABBOTT: The minister may make regulations, not the governor in council. I am going a little farther in this section.

Mr. FLEMING: Probably that is another case where some improvement could be made in the new big bill.

With regard to the subject matter of paragraph (b), this is a matter of giving power to the governor in council to direct persons to make information returns which bear, not necessarily on their own assessments, but on the assessments of other people. Everybody wishes to see the government clothed with sufficient power to make sure that all persons who are properly taxable do pay their taxes. But after all, parliament has always proceeded, as I understand it, on the theory that the decision to compel people to make returns is an important matter and it has always done that by legislation. There are sections in this income tax act which require persons to make returns; such provisions are always in the form of legislation. It seems to me that this is a new departure, in clothing the governor in council with power to direct persons to make returns.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish to prolong this debate either. I am informed that there are fairly wide discretionary powers under the British act to make regulations for returns of this kind, although I have not seen it. I would suggest to the committee that we give this a try; and if when the larger bill comes in, it is still felt that it is objectionable, when we are considering it next year we could repeal the section. I feel certain there will not be any abuse. As my hon. friend himself has said, it is put in solely for the purpose of seeing that the provisions of the taxing act are fully and fairly administered and that no one gets away without paying his just share of tax; because, if he does, somebody else has to pay it. That is the only purpose behind the section. It is not to try to give bureaucrats, so-called, any additional powers to go around harassing people for returns which they should not make.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to on division.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, if I can do so under the rules, I should like to reopen a section which has already been carried. I refer to section 9. In that section, as the committee will recall, we extended to the smaller cooperatives—that is, cooperatives whose income did not exceed $2,000—the privilege of not making instalment payments of their tax because of the difficulty of knowing early in the year what their patronage dividends would be; they were exempted from that provision. Since the section was passed last night, I have had representations from the secretary of the cooperative union and from some others to the effect that that amount is rather too low; that it would involve a tax of only some $600. Therefore, with the permission of the committee I should like to ask one of my colleagues to move that the $2,000 figure be increased to $3,000, which would be roughly equivalent to a tax on such small cooperatives of $1,000. As a result of discussion with those who are familiar with these matters, I am told that they believe that will be reasonably satisfactory. In any event, we will try it out over this year, and if it is not satisfactory I would be quite receptive to the suggestion of increasing the amount by a further reasonable figure. However I think it will be found to be sufficient.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In order to reconsider section 9, it will be necessary to have a motion that the committee revert to it.

Mr. McCANN: I move that the committee revert to section 9.

Motion agreed to.

On section 9—When amount of income is $2,000 or less.

Mr. McCANN moved:

That section 9 of Bill 269 be amended by deleting the words "two thousand dollars" wherever they appear therein and substituting the words "three thousand dollars."

Mr. FULTON: Just before the amendment carries, I should like to ask the minister, if it would not be abusing a confidence on his part, whether the request was made specifically for $3,000 or whether it went beyond that amount? In other words, why stop at $3,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: It went beyond that. The original request made by the association was for a tax of $2,000. I felt that was really too much because it would be equivalent to a taxable income of $7,000; and it seemed to me that a cooperative with a taxable income of that size should be able to estimate pretty well in advance. This is a special arrangement for smaller cooperatives which do not keep their books in quite the same way, and which, I am informed, find some difficulty in estimating, early in the year, what their patronage dividends were as a deduction from income. I was told this morning by these people that this amended figure which I am suggesting will work out pretty well. As I say, if it does not, we will look into it again next year.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is not any title.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister will recall that I had an interview with him a few weeks ago. I am bringing this matter before parliament now so that, if possible, it may be discussed by members who represent farming constituencies. I do not bring this matter before parliament by way of criticism. I had a courteous interview with the minister, and in order to open the matter up for discussion he suggested that I might ask him the question on the floor of the house. It was with respect to the manner of collecting farmers' income tax. During the Easter recess I had a delegation of farmers wait on me asking if it would not be possible for farm income tax to be deducted at the source. I recognize that this might involve many intricate matters of administration, but I do not think it would be impossible to carry it out.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is out of order to discuss these matters now, when we are dealing only with the title. If the hon. member has the consent of the committee to discuss these points, I am in the hands of the committee; but I make this observation because someone else might want to discuss the same or another matter, and it would be out of order.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I ask my hon. friend if this was a discussion he had with me or with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. HANSELL: No, it was with the Minister of Finance, here in the chamber.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably when my hon. friend gets a little further along with it I will recall it, but at the moment I cannot remember that particular conversation.

Mr. HANSELL: I am afraid it could not have made much of an impression upon the minister, though he even promised me that he would refer the matter to some of his officials.

Mr. ABBOTT: As the hon. gentleman goes along a little, I may remember it, but so many hon. members speak to me that my memory is not as good as it might be.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. HANSELL: As a matter of fact I think I have stated my case. I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that it is a little odd to discuss this matter on the title, but this bill is with respect to income tax and it contains nothing covering certain particular situations. I believe there is also a matter with respect to resolutions of the farmers' union, to which the minister said he would reply. The delegation that waited upon me seemed to think this tax deduction at the source could be carried out, and they advanced a good many arguments in favour of their position. Certain deductions are now made, not for income tax purposes but for other reasons. For instance, certain deductions are made for the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This indicates that it is not impossible to make deductions at the source. I should like the minister to give some public reply to the request. He is nodding his head; evidently he now recalls the discussion. I know he is a very busy man; I know any finance minister having the administration of this country's financial policy has tremendous responsibilities, especially under this system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going to enter upon that discussion, though I notice the finance minister has moved a little farther away from this corner of the house since last night. I hope that is not too significant.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is just because they put the chairs here.

Mr. HANSELL: Then perhaps the minister would reply now.

Mr. ABBOTT: First, I must apologize to my hon. friend. I now remember clearly our discussion. I was a little confused as to what question my hon. friend was raising, but a moment later I realized that he was referring to the suggestion he made that farmers' income tax should be deducted at the source in somewhat the same way that deductions are made from salaries and wages. I did discuss that matter with the officials and also with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue; but, as regards the farm population generally, I am afraid it would be administratively impossible. It might and perhaps would work in the case of a farmer who is raising only one crop, such as wheat, and selling it all at a given point; but, for a man engaged in mixed farming, I am told, and I believe, that from a practical point of view it would be almost impossible to operate the same system as is followed in connection with salaries and wages. If it could be done I am sure nothing would please my colleague the Minister of National Revenue better than to get it while the getting was good; but I am told it is not practically feasible.

In the course of the debate the hon. member for Battle River and, I think, the hon. member for Acadia also referred to representations made to me by representatives of the Alberta farmers' union, and I said I would reply to those questions at a later stage. I remember very well the discussion I had with representatives of that organization, who submitted to me an extensive brief with a series of recommendations. The hon. member for Battle River mentioned most of the points in the course of his remarks the other evening. Some of them I find are matters for my colleague the Minister of National Revenue, and he will reply to those in due course; I understand he is prepared to give answers on those points. But there are some which concern my own department.

The first request was for a four-year averaging of income in place of the present three-year averaging. For reasons which I believe I have already given in this house, I did not consider that I could recommend this change.

The second point was one which we discussed at some length the other evening; that is the question of the proceeds of the dispersal sale of live stock. I mentioned yesterday evening that this question is receiving, at the moment, particularly active consideration by the Department of National Revenue. I understand that some of their officials are now in western Canada discussing this matter, and I have been given reason to believe that a statement of the policy considerations which will govern in those cases will be arrived at very shortly.

One of the other suggestions was a request for higher personal exemptions generally. I have discussed that point on one or two occasions during the course of this debate, and I do not think I can add anything more at present to what I have already said.

There was also a recommendation that farmers be relieved of the responsibility for deducting income tax from farm wages. Here again I was forced to conclude that we could not properly relieve formers from an obligation which is imposed upon all other employers with regard to tax deductions.

The suggestion was also made that we should allow as a charge against current income the payment of debts incurred in previous years. In this case also I think I gave my reasons earlier in this debate as to why I do not think a proposal of that kind would be equitable. Of course, as hon. members will realize, the present system of averaging, in connection with farmers' incomes, goes a long way toward evening up for tax purposes the varying results of different years of operation, and I do not think I am prepared to go any farther at present than is provided in the existing law.

I think I have covered the points raised by the hon. member for Battle River as far as they relate to my own department. Some of the other points may perhaps be more properly dealt with by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. FAIR: I should like the Minister of Finance to go right through the fourteen recommendations made by the two farm organizations and deal with those coming within his department, and then the Minister of National Revenue to deal with the remainder.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can do that; I did it with the delegation when they were here. I went through the list, point by point. I have covered those which relate to my own department, but I can go through the list; I have the brief in my hand. The fourteen recommendations were as follows:

1. Four-year average for income tax purposes. I have already dealt with that.

2. Dispersal sales of live stock. I have dealt with that.

3. The raising of exemptions. I have dealt with that.

4. Allowance for labour of farm families in connection with production on the farm. I dealt with that yesterday evening.

5. No further responsibility for income tax on farm wages. I dealt with that a minute ago.

6. Board of arbitration on income tax cases. There is an appeal board, and I do not think any further boards should be set up.

7. That payment of arrears of interest and principal on the home farm, due before 1940 be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. I dealt with that a minute ago.

8. Provision for final clearance to all taxpayers within two years. That comes under the Department of National Revenue.

9. No special exemptions to any class but full provision for proper expenses. That is an excellent generalization, with which I heartily agree.

10. Simplification of income tax forms. That is the Department of National Revenue.

11. In computing net worth statements over the years 1941 to 1945 the increase in value of live stock and implements which has come about through the general advance in prices should be discounted and an equal amount of this property valued on the same basis per unit for both years. That is a national revenue matter.

12. Uniformity of interpretation and administration of the income tax act. It should not be left to the discretion of district inspectors to vary the provisions of the act. That is national revenue.

13. Brushing and breaking of new land should be considered as a current expense. That is national revenue.

14. Money expended in drilling or boring wells or excavating dugouts on the farm together with all equipment for same should be chargeable as a current expense. That is national revenue. It is a question of whether it is capital or revenue expenditure.

Those are the fourteen points.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is another point.

Mr. McCANN: Perhaps I might be permitted to deal with two or three of the points the Minister of Finance missed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I refer it to your skilful attention.

Mr. McCANN: This afternoon the hon. member for Wood Mountain raised a point in connection with section 16, with reference to money expended in drilling or boring wells or excavating dugouts on the farms, together with all equipment for those operations, with the suggestion that it should be chargeable as a current expense.

Such expenses are inherently of a capital nature and, in accordance with recognized accounting principles in the case of business and entrepreneur classes in general, would be capital expenditures and not a deduction from income. However, it has been the practice of the division for simplicity of administration to allow such expenditures as a charge to income if they do not run into any substantial sum. Relatively shallow wells which are apt to go dry fairly quickly and not costing more than $250 to $300 are usually allowed as an item of expense in the year in which made, rather than spread over the two or three years of the possible life of the well. This also applies to the ordinary run of dugout. However, large deep wells and large dugouts would naturally have to be treated in their proper category as capital expenditures. I believe that affords rather generous treatment to farmers, and that perhaps it meets the wishes and demands of the hon. member who raised the question.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ARGUE: Is depreciation allowed on the wells?

Mr. McCANN: No, there is no depreciation for wells. There might be a windmill which went into it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is there not a ten per cent depreciation?

Mr. McCANN: The next recommendation is that the brushing and breaking of new land should be considered as a current expense.

In point of fact, casual and incidental brushing and breaking are usually accepted as a current expense. A major piece of work sometimes involving twenty or thirty dollars an acre for a considerable area is obviously a capital expenditure just as would be the brushing and clearing of land for a new airport or new factory. Expenditures on the development of land are frequently of considerably more value than the amount of the actual outlay, and it is only fair that the amount of such expenditures should be charged to capital. It is not only fair but in keeping with universally recognized accounting principles.

The special allowances which were made to those engaged in drilling for oil were a wartime measure based on the nation's then desperate need for gasoline for military use. These were exceptional measures for conditions of exceptional national danger.

The third recommendation is with respect to the uniformity of interpretation and administration of the income tax act, and the suggestion that it should not be left to the discretion of district inspectors to vary the provisions of the act.

No evidence has been forthcoming to show that the directors of the district offices do, in point of fact, vary the provisions of the act, but in the administration of thousands of cases in which there may be widely varying circumstances the directors and their assessors must naturally be allowed to use their own judgment to a reasonable degree. Overly rigid rules would be more likely to work injustices to individual taxpayers than the situation under which responsible officers are given some freedom to interpret in a reasonable and logical way the broad principles laid down for their guidance.

It is quite possible that in a limited number of instances some differences of interpretation may arise on relatively minor points. To keep such differences at a minimum, however, meetings have been held from time to time among the officials charged with this work both in Ottawa and at other principal centres, and this procedure will be carried out to an increasing extent in the next several years.

Mr. FAIR: Have not instructions been issued to assessors in the different administration districts?

Mr. McCANN: Yes; directives go out to the district offices in connection with many types of work. Those go to the head of the administration in the district, and if they concern the assessors they are passed on to those assessors.

May I add, in connection with the assessing of farm returns, that we have received many letters from farmers commending the procedure which has been taken with reference to our attempt to keep farmers informed as to the regulations, the methods used in assessing, and the type of return we would ask them to make.

Let me say frankly that there has been more criticism in the House of Commons than there has been from the farmers about the assessment of farmers. That may be quite natural—

Mr. FAIR: The farmers are not here to speak for themselves; therefore we have to represent them. On April 14 I asked for a copy of the instructions issued to the assessors, but—

Mr. McCANN: I had intended to say what the hon. member said, namely that the farmer cannot be here to speak for himself. But I seldom hear a good word said for the income tax branch by the representatives of the farmers. It is for that very reason I bring to the attention of hon. members the letters of commendation from farmers throughout the country which have been received.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps the minister would table those letters.

Mr. McCANN: If you are going to speak, then I will sit down. If not, let me continue. I have had letters from Mr. Northfield, our representative in Edmonton. He is the district inspector out there, and he tells me that the assessors are sent out to the different parts of the country where public meetings are called. At those meetings information is given to the farmers as to the type of return we would like to have them put in. They are told how to keep something bearing a resemblance to books from which they may tell from year to year what their position is. The consensus from the farmers, as indicated by the letters I have received, is that the inspector and the assessors have been well received. The department has been commended for the action it has taken in giving out that information and helping them to make their returns.

That is not a condition which obtains in only one or two districts; it is one which is found generally throughout the whole of the western provinces.

To conclude my statement with reference to the uniformity of interpretation and administration of the income tax act, it is pointed out in the directive that, apart from what I said earlier, the head office endeavours, by correspondence and by methods of supervision, to keep the interpretations as uniform as possible. It is to be remembered, however, that it rarely happens that the facts of two cases are actually identical even where at first sight there is a considerable degree of similarity.

I think a good deal of the criticism with reference to returns made by farmers and assessments arises from the fact that the department have not done enough educational work in the farming communities to indicate to farmers that they as well as any other class should pay the tax as long as it is the law of the country. We are going to endeavour to clear up that situation by continuing these meetings in certain districts. All our farmers are excellent citizens, and I think they will see the point that they should make a contribution through income tax as well as any other taxpayer.

Mr. FAIR: I believe I have been one who has criticized the department as much as anybody else—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the hon. member for Macleod rose I called the attention of the committee to the fact that it would be out of order to have a general discussion on the title. The hon. member for Macleod was permitted to proceed and then the ministers made their statements. I am in the hands of the committee but actually there should be no general discussion on the title.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was agreed last night that certain information which had been asked for, particularly by the hon. member for Battle River, should be given after we had concluded discussion in committee of the sections of the bill. I think that information has been given as fully as the Minister of National Revenue and I can give it. There is no section before the committee; there is no bill before the committee; we have completed our work in committee.

Mr. FAIR: I asked the minister some questions on the resolution stage and it was impossible for me to discuss those questions until I got the answers. I feel that I should have a couple of minutes now. If I do not take time now, I can take it on third reading, so that it is up to the committee entirely.

Mr. GOLDING: As I say, the Chair is in the hands of the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no objection, but I think the discussion should be restricted to comments by the hon. member for Battle River upon the questions which he asked me and to which I have just given him answers. I do not think we should reopen this whole debate. Perhaps his position is fair since I asked him to permit a delay in getting the answers to his questions, but I suggest that we should not open up the whole discussion.

Mr. FAIR: I wish to thank the minister, particularly for saying that my position is fair. I believe it is fair. As one of those who have criticized the administration of the income tax legislation, not because of the income tax itself because I believe that, as far as taxes go, the income tax is one of the fairest that can be levied, I feel I should say something. I am not in favour of the present levies or the present exemptions, and I want to make that definite and clear.

I want to commend the Department of National Revenue for having instructed their inspectors to attend meetings for the purpose of educating the farmers. Earlier in the discussion I advocated radio addresses or perhaps the putting out of a booklet by either the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue giving farmers instructions along these lines. That would help to clear up a lot of the misunderstanding and perhaps hard feelings which exist.

On April 14 I received a return in reply to a question which I had asked in connection with instructions issued to assessors of farm income tax during each fiscal year from 1939-40 to 1945-46. This return contains brief information. One set of instructions dealt with the transfer from cash to accrual basis and the other one dealt with wheat participation certificates. Those were issued in 1943-44 and 1944-45. I do not believe I have been given all the information for which I asked. If instructions have been sent out to the different officers, perhaps the Minister of National Revenue could at his convenience, supply me with copies for the years mentioned.

The question of uniformity of administration came up, and I think we have had evidence enough from the different administrative districts to show that there is no uniformity of administration. In connection with brushing and breaking new land, I am quite satisfied that if a farmer undertakes to break twenty, thirty, forty or fifty acres of land that expense should be allowed in the year in which it is incurred. Unless that breaking is done, he cannot produce any crops. As I pointed out when dealing with this matter before, if the farmer hires help during the year to do that work there is no question about those wages being allowed, but if he hires a contractor to come in and do the work, then the department sees fit not to allow that expense. I feel that any expense incurred in a particular year for the clearing or breaking of land should be allowed as a current expense for that year.

I am not going to say anything more at this time because quite a little time has been taken up, but I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue one question. Will there be sent out to the different administrative districts instructions which will line up with the discussion we had here yesterday and today in connection with farmers' income tax?

Mr. McCANN: Yes, we will see to that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has consideration been given to changing the name of this act?

Mr. McCANN: That is in the new act.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say one sentence which may perhaps be a bit out of order? I am sure the minister will be glad to hear what I am going to say. I want to tell the committee that four oil wells are in active production in the Leduc field. They have established a front of three and a quarter miles in length, with an open flow of roughly one thousand barrels apiece. They are now producing roughly one hundred barrels apiece on a choke of from three-sixteenths to three-eighths of an inch.

Bill reported.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 270, to amend the Excise Profits Tax Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Minister may direct standard profits to be ascertained by board of referees where profits from a business substantially different.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has gone part way to meet the views which some of us expressed in the resolution stage concerning the proposed deadline for the filing of SP-1 applications. Instead of the deadline being fixed at August 1, it is now proposed that it be fixed for general purposes at September 1, and there is a further exception. I should like to make an observation or two about the exception. The explanatory note at the bottom of page 2 reads as follows:

> The amendments in this subsection give effect to paragraph two of the resolution which provides "That no taxpayer shall be entitled to make application for determination of his standard profits on or after August 1, 1947." The final date for application has, however, been extended to September 1, 1947, and special provision has been made for taxpayers who, by reason of first becoming liable to pay tax on excess profits did not find it necessary prior to that date to have their standard profits ascertained.

As I read the new subsections 4, 6, 7 and 8, they deal with the generality of applications. In subsection 9 provision is made for an exception which is described in the note as follows:

> Exception—where taxpayer may compute his standard profits or make application for determination by the board.

I appreciate the fact that the minister has gone part way, but I urge that when the tax is to continue until December 31 of this year, in the case of those who may come within the new capital or reclassification provisions of the present section 5 of the act, a prohibition of the filing of any application to ascertain standard profits should not be imposed while the tax is still being incurred. With the tax coming off on December 31 of this year, will the minister not agree to allow the filing of such applications up until at least December 31 of this year when the tax is to be removed, in the special cases to which I have referred? As I mentioned when I spoke on this matter on the resolution stage, I can see that it is quite fair, provided that ample warning is given, to fix a deadline for the filing of applications in the case of persons claiming to have a depressed business or to be engaged in a depressed class of business; but it seems to me that these other cases should not be assimilated with the cases of which I have just spoken.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think every case is actually covered here. Take the case of the company which has been in the excess profits tax bracket and should have filed its return, got its material in and had its standard profits ascertained. We ask that the application be put in and the relevant data submitted before September 1. I do not think it is unreasonable in the case of this company that it should do that. In the case of companies that have losses or low profits during the period up to this date, or in the case of new companies, they are under the provisions of the proposed section as amended since the resolution stage. All they have to do is give notice prior to September 1 that they intend to make application to have their standard profits fixed, and they have ample time after that to get their material in and have it completed. That covers the case which my hon. friend referred to the other day, of the new company or the company which had never had occasion to come in and have a standard profit fixed.

The case to which he has referred, that of a change in capital, or an increase in capital, is automatically taken care of. Section 4 deals with increase in standard profits. One does not have to go to the board of referees to have his standard profits changed. In case of capital changes during the fiscal period ending December 31, 1947, the standard profit is automatically adjusted to take care of the increase in capital, or the decrease in capital if decrease there be.

I discussed this matter with the officers of my own department and the Department of National Revenue, and I am satisfied that there will be no hardship in the section as now proposed.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to make one further request to the minister. The decision having been made to proceed on this basis, will the minister take reasonable steps to see that warning is given to the public? I know that a directive has been issued on this subject on the basis of the resolution. It went into certain publications received by chartered accountants. I know it also went to many lawyers; I saw it in "Ontario Weekly Notes" recently. I would think that a newspaper advertisement would be justified in a case of this kind to warn companies which may be affected and which may not be served at the present time by solicitors or chartered accountants.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree that the provision should be widely publicized and we shall see that that is done.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—No tax on profits earned on and after January 1, 1948.

Mr. PROBE: Before this section carries, will the minister tell us whether in the field of corporation tax anywhere the department considers it necessary to adopt the principle of ability to pay in connection with taxation? I should like to refer him to the fact that in the personal income tax field the rates are made progressively steeper as the income of the individual rises. So far as I can see, no such principle is recognized in differentiating between small and large corporations. I am, of course, personally opposed to section 4 and do not wish to see the excess profits feature removed from taxation. But apropos of this, will the minister give us some indication if and how the factor of ability to pay, which I think is a recognized principle, is applied in the field of corporation tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course the corporation tax field is a big one. When you tax a corporation as such you are taxing a legal person. It is really a tax on what would otherwise be distributed to the shareholders, and to that extent it may be regarded as a double tax. There has been a good deal of discussion in the house and elsewhere that we should try to work out a system analogous to the English system whereby a certain standard tax is deducted by the corporation and then the taxpayer takes credit for that in his own personal tax return. Our system follows the system which was established in the United States and, except for the so-called excess profits tax during the war, it has taken the form of a flat percentage tax of the company's net income. In a sense, that does not take into account ability to pay because the corporation is a corporation; it is not an individual. When the shareholder gets his dividend, then the progressive feature comes in and the shareholder pays his tax.

If I remember correctly, in the proposals which were put out in connection with the suggested agreements with the provinces it was indicated that if and when agreements were made with all provinces it would be possible to make some revision of the corporation tax structure, but the progressive feature is not a feature of the corporation income tax structure. The obvious answer is that a good many wealthy men own small companies and a good many poor men own shares in big companies. As my hon. friend appreciates, this question of the taxation of business or corporation profits is a complex one and it is hard to say where the final incidence of the tax will fall.

Mr. PROBE: The minister referred to the fact that our corporation tax structure is based on that of the United States.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not based on it, but similar.

Mr. PROBE: There is one important point of difference. In the United States the principle of capital gains is adopted, whereas with us capital gains are disregarded entirely. Would the minister care to express an opinion on introducing that feature into our field of income taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a very large question. It has always been foreign to the British conception of an income tax. Some of us may remember during the days of the depression that it has disadvantages, and I have never been able to see great advantages. It has always seemed to me that a capital gains tax lent itself to methods of evasion which I personally am not very much in sympathy with.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 271, to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to change its title to the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Tax on railway, et cetera, ticket.

Mr. FLEMING: I have a question with regard to the last clause on the page reading:

> The governor in council may reduce the rate of tax imposed by subsection one of this section or abolish the said tax as he may deem expedient.

The explanation given in the explanatory note is:

> The new subsection 9 is designed to permit the rate of the transportation tax to be kept parallel to the corresponding tax in force in the United States, if deemed expedient.

If it is expedient that the tax in Canada be equated with that in the United States, surely we can have a more definite statement from the minister as to the government's intention than appears in the explanatory note.

Mr. McCANN: When the United States revised its transportation tax considerable representation was made by the transportation companies that, unless Canada did likewise, the travel agencies and the transportation companies would probably lose considerable revenues, because people who wanted to make transatlantic, transpacific or South American journeys would probably purchase their tickets in the United States in order to avoid the Canadian tax.

The intention of this section is to exempt journeys to Europe, Asia, South America, and Australasia, from the last point in Canada or the United States where the vessel or aircraft stops to discharge or take on passengers, but intervening transportation would be taxable. That is, if a person bought an air line ticket from Winnipeg to Prestwick, Scotland, and the point in Canada from which the aircraft took off for direct overseas flight was Dorval, then the portion of the ticket from Winnipeg to Dorval would be taxable. Similarly, if a passenger travelled by rail and vessel from Winnipeg to Liverpool, embarking at Halifax, the rail journey from Winnipeg to Halifax would be taxable.

Provision has also been made to empower the governor in council to reduce or remove the tax if it is found necessary so to do because of similar action taken by the United States. It may perhaps be explained that transportation companies, travel agencies and the like, find that a difference in the tax rate causes considerable fluctuation in the purchase of tickets in Canada and United States if the rates of tax are not parallel. This is to enable us to bring the tax rates into conformity with each other.

Mr. FLEMING: If this section is adopted will it be applied in such a way that, if changes are made in the United States tax, the Canadian excise tax will be changed in parallel fashion?

Mr. McCANN: This is to give the government power to meet conditions which might arise when the house is not sitting if there were a revision in the United States rate. This gives us power to revise our rate.

Mr. FLEMING: That does not answer my question. If the section passes may we take it from the statement made by the minister that, if changes are made in the United States tax, parallel changes will be made in the Canadian tax?

Mr. McCANN: We would not necessarily obligate ourselves to do that. It would be taken into consideration, and the government would have the power to do it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—When taxes payable.

Mr. PROBE: My remarks will apply to both sections 12 and 14. Under section 12, the excise tax on certain commodities, wines I believe, are paid at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer. The effect of section 14 is identical because it refers to the collection of a consumption or sales tax of eight per cent on the sale price of all goods. Generally speaking, I think both excise and sales taxes are collected from the manufacturer on the invoice which he presents to the jobber or to the retailer. The effect on the consumer of this form of taxation is that there is a pyramiding of costs on the sales and excise tax portion, thus affecting the final cost of the commodity. With an eight per cent sales tax, I am quite certain that the ultimate consumer pays twelve to fourteen per cent on an article on which the government realizes only eight per cent. Since this is a consumer's tax, it enters into and is an important feature in the cost of living. Why is it that the Department of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance could not consider collecting both excise and sales tax at the last point of sale—that is, in the hands of the retailer—instead of in the hands of the manufacturer, and making it eight per cent at that stage, if he must—although I oppose that rate—or whatever rate the government decides is adequate! Then it would seem to me that at the same time it might be desirable to use a system of stamps placed on the goods to show that the taxes have been paid, as in the case with playing cards, matches and the like. The present form of taxation gives the government a good deal less revenue than is actually paid as tax by the consumer. It differs in that respect from the income tax where the amount paid by the income taxpayer is net to the taxpayer and the cost of collection is a cost borne by the government. But in the case of excise and sales taxes, the cost of collections is an expense added to the tax and borne by the consumer. Has the government given some consideration to the practicability of what I am now suggesting? What administrative flaws are there in levying the tax in the way I suggest rather than at the manufacturer?. I believe that it would result in more revenue to the government, using exactly the same rate of taxation. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. McCANN: There would necessarily be grave difficulties if such a system as that advocated by the hon. gentleman were followed in that, instead of dealing with a limited number of licensees, you would have to deal with an almost countless number.

Mr. PROBE: By the use of a form of revenue stamps, it would seem to me that would be obviated.

Mr. McCANN: All of that costs a good deal of money. As one example, I might state to the hon. gentleman that the removal of an imprint upon an excise stamp which was used on tobacco saved the government $40,000 in a year. From that it can be seen how quickly costs of that type would run up and pyramid. With respect to the pyramiding of the sales tax, that is not nearly as much in effect now as it was some years ago.

Mr. PROBE: The minister has stated that the sales tax levied at the manufacturer's place of disposal, where he passes it on to the jobber or to the retailer and the invoice will have the eight per cent added, will not pyramid the sales tax. I do not believe that statement is correct.

Mr. McCANN: Not as much as it did because of competitive conditions which obtain now and which did not obtain before.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have knowledge of firms which have gone bankrupt and which have collected sales tax from individuals, but the government did not receive any of it. What is the department doing to protect itself in those cases?

Mr. McCANN: The position is this. In the case of any firm which goes bankrupt and owes sales tax to the government, the government is one of the creditors and shares with the other creditors.

Mr. PINARD: A privileged creditor.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Is that trust money?

Mr. McCANN: We are in an in-between position. We are between the creditors who have privilege or priority and the common creditors. We come before the common creditors. Every attempt is made to collect as much as it is possible to collect of money owing to the crown.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Will the minister inform the committee how much has been lost by the department with respect to that kind of thing?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall section 12 carry? Carried.

[Mr. Probe.]

Mr. STIRLING: No, Mr. Chairman. A question has been asked.

Mr. McCANN: The hon. gentleman is entitled to an answer. I do not know how much has been lost, but we have figures on what has been collected.

Mr. PROBE: Has the minister collected the $40,000 odd which was owed three years ago by Caledonia Farms when they went bankrupt? That was an Ontario meat-packing firm and it owed the Department of National Revenue some $40,000 or $41,000. Was that collected?

Mr. McCANN: Although I do remember the case I do not recall the figures in connection with it. We could get that information for the hon. gentleman.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to ask a question with reference to subsection 3 of section 103. The effect of the section would be to give the minister power to grant exemptions from the licensing provisions of the act. In what cases is it intended that this power of exemption should be exercised, and what is the reason for it?

Mr. McCANN: That would have to do with small manufacturers, people who are in the cosmetic business, people manufacturing handbags and things like that in their own homes, who have not established a place of business for that work entirely; it is a sort of side-line and the amounts involved are small.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. McCANN: I just wish to make this statement. This bill appears to have gone through rather hurriedly. There are no great changes in the act besides the fact that it implements the changes founded on the resolutions under the budget. The whole idea of bringing in this Special War Revenue Act and of changing its name to the Excise Tax Act is in order to simplify it, consolidate it and put in their proper position those portions of the act which have to do with the same thing, such as licences, penalties and the like of that. It has been more or less a tidying-up process so that the act is much more easily referred to and much more easily read.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Apropos of the statement made by the minister, is one of the reasons for changing the act to get away from the idea of calling many of these things luxury taxes? I judge there is to be no change in the luxury taxes?

Mr. McCANN: There are no changes in any of the taxation in this act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was suggesting that this luxury tax we are talking about, such as the tax on alarm clocks, flatware and so on, will stay on for some time. Is that the idea? Or does the minister propose to make some change shortly, revamping the tax on luxuries, as we call them?

Mr. McCANN: That is not within my province. That belongs to the Minister of Finance. We do nothing with reference to the changes except see that they are properly and honestly administered.

Title agreed to.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

VETERANS' AFFAIRS—VETERANS' TAXI OWNERS ASSOCIATION OF MONTREAL

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on Friday last it was agreed that we would call two new departments on going into supply. The first item that I suggest be called is No. 366, of the Secretary of State.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. gentleman has anything to discuss, in view of the peculiar conditions prevailing this evening, perhaps it would be better to let the matter stand. It was agreed that we would go on with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and in view of the fact that members of the ministry are otherwise engaged it would seem to me that if the hon. gentleman has no objection we should not proceed with the question he has in mind. Perhaps in view of the circumstances he might agree with me in that.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): In reply to the remarks of the minister I would say that the matter I wish to bring up is the one I raised last Thursday, with which I was not allowed to proceed. On Friday evening the leader of the house indicated that if we reached supply on Monday we would take national health and welfare, and agriculture.

Yesterday afternoon we did not reach supply, nor did we reach it by eleven o'clock. Then the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), in giving the business for today, said he hoped to bring in the two departments he had expected to get in the day previous, and two more. If that is correct, that will leave only one or two departments still to come in.

Mr. MARTIN: No; it will leave five more. These two will make fifteen, and that will leave five others still to come.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Even so, the opportunities yet to be afforded hon. members will be very few, and the matter I wish to raise, after trying to do so last Thursday in the proper way and being prevented from doing so, in my view is important. It became my intention to take advantage of the first opportunity to bring up that matter on going ino supply. I expected that opportunity yesterday, but it did not materialize, so that this is my first chance to do so. It is to be regretted that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not here, but in my view the matter I wish to discuss is urgent and should be brought before the house as soon as possible. Therefore, with all due respect to what the minister has said, I should like to proceed.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. gentleman will permit me to interrupt once more. I appreciate that the point he wishes to raise is, in his judgment, an important matter, but I would point out to him and to the house that at Rideau Hall a dinner is being held tonight in honour of the President of the United States. It is only proper that members of the government should be at that dinner; and among those in attendance is the senior privy councillor other than the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); that is, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the well known chivalry of my hon. friend, I would respectfully suggest to him that his point could be raised the next time supply is called for the purpose of bringing in another department. In the circumstances, in view of the fact that the ministers, I think properly, are out of the house, I would ask him to raise his point then. Thirteen departments have been called; it is suggested that two more be called tonight, which will leave five yet to be called, so that the hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity. I would ask him to be good enough to accede to my request.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has every right to proceed if he wishes to do so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: No point of order has as yet been raised.

Mr. MARTIN: This is just a request; there is no doubt about his right.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): In reply to the request of the hon. gentleman, and in view of the kindly way in which he has referred to me, I would remind him of what took place in the house last Thursday. In my opinion the matter I raised was urgent, and was not something that could be ruled out because it was before the courts. On that occasion some of the hon. gentlemen who sit around the Minister of Health and Welfare did not extend very much courtesy to me. However I would say to the minister that if he would undertake to have supply called tomorrow, not at half-past ten or a quarter to eleven o'clock tomorrow night but tomorrow afternoon, to give me an opportunity of raising the matter I have in mind, I should be glad to accede to his request. I realize that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not here tonight, and I should be pleased if he were here when I make my statement. But I should not like the matter to go over until next week, or anything like that. If the minister will say that he will arrange to have supply moved tomorrow afternoon I shall be very happy to let the matter stand.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Just before the minister replies, perhaps I may be permitted to make one or two observations. In the first place, I am a little stunned by the suggestion of the minister that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) might show a little more chivalry. I say to you, sir, and, through you, to the members of this house, that no other individual in this chamber during the last twenty years has exuded as much chivalry as seems to flow from the hon. member who has just taken his seat. As one who does not intervene very often in the debates in this house, I am sorry my hon. and good friend the minister should have let slip that suggestion.

In the meantime, what is a day? Speaking as an ordinary member of this House of Commons, I quite appreciate why the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the other members of the privy council are absent tonight. They have a right to be absent; they should be where they are, and I am sorry the minister finds it necessary to remain here to represent the government. I am sorry he is charged with the responsibility of trying to get a couple more departments into supply. The function being held elsewhere this evening has the commendation and endorsation of the entire membership of this house and the populace of the Dominion of Canada, but at the same time I hold this reservation. For the sake of a miserable little period of twenty-four hours the government of the day should not seek to force this house to deal with the matter of these additional departments. So I plead for the house to give consideration to the position of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, who, though I suppose not shut off summarily, nevertheless was definitely prevented from introducing a matter which to him was of great moment; more so, perhaps, than to the member for Danforth, because the hon. gentleman knew what he was introducing, he knew the boys on whose behalf he was making the plea, and he had fought with them overseas, which was not the privilege of some of the rest of us.

With respect to all the considerations bound up in this particular question, I ask, through the representative of the government tonight, that he just give us another twenty-four hours, and we will bring the matter in, in an orderly fashion, without any disruption of routine in the carrying on of the business of parliament. Today one of the highest honours has been paid to this nation of only 12,000,000 people by the representative of perhaps 120,000,000 people. So, skip it for twenty-four hours; and, to use the language of the street, let us get on with the government's business tonight.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. member to whom I directed my remarks in the first instance did not misunderstand the suggestion I made, and it was because I knew him so well that I felt at liberty to make that suggestion. Since the minister of the department concerned is not in his seat, I do suggest that my original request be acceded to, and I will undertake to make arrangements so that the hon. member will be given sometime in the course of the next few days an opportunity to raise his question.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I thank the minister, but I do not like the last few words he used—"the next few days". I ask the minister if he will just state that he will call supply either tomorrow afternoon or at eight o'clock tomorrow night, and I shall be happy to accede to his request. But if the minister wants to leave it to some time in the next two or three days, then I regret saying that I would have to go on. If he will say that an opportunity will be permitted tomorrow afternoon or tomorrow night, that will be all right. I do not think I am being a bit unfair.

Mr. MARTIN: I will undertake that, for either tomorrow night or the next night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know what the plans of the house are for Thursday. But the hon. member's original request was that it be within two days.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): No, my request was that we have it tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN: I will undertake to do my best for tomorrow night and, if not tomorrow night, then the next day. I want to be absolutely fair.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I am not being difficult with the minister, but he can easily arrange to have it tomorrow afternoon or tomorrow evening.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows about Thursday.

Mr. MARTIN: I was wrong about Thursday. There is no supply on Thursday.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, what is the minister deciding to do—to allow the hon. member to go on tomorrow some time?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, I will do my very best. I wish to be fair with the house. I dislike undertaking something I cannot live up to, but I undertake that he will be given a chance tomorrow night.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): As I understand the rules, on going into supply on Thursdays and Fridays there is no motion.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, that is right.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): But I am perfectly satisfied with what has been said.

UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that matter is settled. Now the minister has another one on his hands. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I intend to discuss a matter which I consider is of urgent importance to the people I represent in the house. It means bread and butter to them.

I listened to the minister's request of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), and there is no minister I would rather oblige than the one who has just spoken.

Mr. MARTIN: Thanks for those kind words.

Mr. GILLIS: Nevertheless I do not consider the request he made of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough was a valid one. The fact that many of the cabinet ministers are out of the house is immaterial. All of them can read. Tomorrow they can read what took place in the house tonight and, in their absence, they can do something about the subject matter discussed. I am not criticizing them for being where they are this evening; it is their duty.

If there were any possibility within the next couple of weeks of discussing the matter I am now going to discuss—and I shall be as brief as I can—I would not be raising the matter at this time. However, there is not.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, in view of the attitude I have taken, and in fairness to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, if the hon. member who is now speaking persists in going on I do not see how the house can refuse to hear what the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has to say. In fairness, it must be said that he took the initiative in the matter.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, that matter has already been settled. The minister and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough have already come to an understanding. The hon. member agreed to let his problem stand until such time as the appropriate minister is in his seat, and supply is to be called to suit his convenience. Then the hon. member took his seat.

I do not consider I am violating any of the rules of the house in raising the problem I am now about to discuss.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not wish to be unduly persistent, either; but in view of the request I make of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South will agree that I should make the same request of him. He will have the same chance tomorrow night to make the observations he now has in mind. They would be made with the ministerial benches filled, and with the responsible minister in his seat. In view of the circumstances, and of the engagement of my colleagues, I think my request is not an unreasonable one. And, knowing the hon. member as I do, I have no hesitation in asking him to accede to it.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, as I stated when I first rose in my place, there is no minister in the house I would rather oblige. However, under the circumstances the matter I am about to discuss is a serious one.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order; if the hon. member is going to make a speech on any subject on going into supply, then surely the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, who has taken his seat, should have the right to go ahead, as the minister has suggested.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The minister has made a request of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The hon. member has not yet stated whether he is prepared to allow the matter he has in mind to stand over until a future time. He should now be given an opportunity to state his position.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, we are wasting a good deal of time. It is my intention to proceed with the subject matter I am about to discuss.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Davenport; I understand that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough entered into an agreement on the understanding that we would immediately go into supply. If we are not going into supply immediately, then he should be given an opportunity to make his representations now.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order; the arrangement made between the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough and the minister was a personal one and, if the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has given way, it is not binding upon the rest of the members. He gave way on the understanding that the motion to go into supply would be made tomorrow.

I am not suggesting that the hon. member for Cape Breton South should or should not give way. But it has no bearing on the other matter which has already been settled.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member has just said is true, technically. But I take it that, as leader of the house for the moment, I was expressing what seemed to be the consensus of the house generally when I made the arrangement with the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. The hon. gentleman is known by everyone in all quarters of the house as being extremely fair-minded, and I say that in all sincerity. I know he will recognize and appreciate the position of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. I say to him that, in view of the fact that the ministers are, in line of duty, inevitably outside the house, my request is not an unreasonable one, particularly when an opportunity will be given tomorrow to deal with the important matter the hon. gentleman says he has in his mind. I again ask him as one who will understand the reasonableness of my request.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough wishes to discuss a matter which pertains to only one department and it is reasonable to ask that the minister of that department should be here. The matter which I am going to discuss has to do with government policy as applied to the section of the country which I represent in this house. Whether there are one, two or half a dozen ministers here is immaterial. This matter has been outstanding for some considerable time and apparently no effort has been made to adjust it. It is a grievance which will not take me very long to state; I think it is important enough to be stated at this time and I intend to proceed.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: Have I the floor?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Davenport has risen on a point of order, but I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South should be allowed first to state his position. I do not want the hon. member for Cape Breton South to discuss his grievance; I want him just to state his position.

Mr. GILLIS: You mean as to whether or not I intend to proceed?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: It is my intention to observe the rules of the house and proceed with my discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Davenport was raising a point of order.

Mr. MacNICOL: My own opinion is that, under the circumstances, the request made by the minister was fair and the acceptance of that request by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough showed a chivalrous spirit on his part. If the debate is to go on, to save the minister being charged tomorrow with not having the debate go on I think the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough should precede the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough gave up the floor on the suggestion of the minister and we all felt that the minister's request should be acceded to. I am going to insist that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough go ahead.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): On a point of order—

Mr. GILLIS: Have I the floor or not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough is speaking on a point of order.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I feel that the arrangement agreed to between the minister and myself was a reasonable one and I was happy to agree to it. Under the circumstances, I would not care to proceed tonight.

Mr. MARTIN: I thank my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I am not able to oblige the minister, but I also have responsibilities in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: I have responsibilities even if some members across the way have not.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it snappy.

Mr. GILLIS: I am referring to those hon. members who interrupt when someone is trying to talk.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead; talk.

Mr. GILLIS: At least they should have sufficient courtesy to keep quiet.

As I stated at the outset, the matter I wish to discuss tonight affects the people of the maritime provinces generally and Nova Scotia in particular. There are over 30,000 unemployed in the maritime provinces and perhaps some 17,000 of those are in Nova Scotia. A large percentage of the unemployed in the maritime provinces are service personnel of this war. From present indications it would appear that there is no government policy or policy on the part of free enterprise to create anything in the way of employment in any one of those provinces.

In addition, the old relief measures which prevailed prior to the war are not in existence, and those service personnel who do not come under the out-of-work benefits or those who have run beyond the statutory provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act have no relief whatsoever. On two occasions in this house I suggested to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) that the out-of-work benefits for service personnel should be extended until such time as they can be gainfully employed. That was some time ago, but no extension has been made and there is no indication from the government that an extension will be made. Second, I suggested on two or three occasions that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be expanded to provide unemployment relief, if you must call it that, for able-bodied workers who cannot secure employment in any part of Canada. There has been no indication on the part of the government as to whether that will be done.

Direct relief for the people I am discussing is thrown back into the hands of the municipalities and most municipalities across this country are not financially able to handle direct relief. There is no arrangement, either federal or provincial, to establish relief measures of any kind for the unemployed. In that respect they are worse off today than they were in the 1930's, up to the outbreak of this war, because at that time there was some system of relief. As I say, thousands of these people have run beyond the Unemployment Insurance Act and the out-of-work benefits.

The worst feature of the whole situation in the maritimes is that, while these unemployed are milling around, no plans are being made by the federal or provincial governments to give them relief, and there are no plans on the part of free enterprise, or at least none in sight, to establish secondary industries. On the other hand, people who are endeavouring to do something in that part of the country are stopped by federal regulation. I should like to give three or four examples of this.

I raised a question in the house on at least two occasions and I have written to the engineering branch of the Department of Public Works with reference to repairing an old pier at Sydney, Nova Scotia. This would cost only a few thousand dollars. There are a few people in Sydney who are prepared to establish a fish processing plant and a bait freezing plant which would service the fishermen for about thirty miles along the coast line, men who now have no harbour facilities. An expenditure of a few thousand dollars by the federal government would create new wealth through the establishment of these plants which would be set up to service the fishermen on that coast. This matter has been held in abeyance for eighteen months, and the men who were going to establish these plants have become disgusted to the point where they are not sure whether they will proceed with them.

A couple of boys got together in Sydney, Nova Scotia, about a year ago and pooled their resources, purchased a building and put some equipment in it. They made a contract with a canning factory in Ontario to supply cans.

They intended to go into the canning of pork and beans which would have meant employment for some twenty or thirty people. They have been waiting for over a year for a molasses quota. The building and equipment are standing idle; no molasses quota has yet been furnished.

A few days ago I questioned the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in the house about an established industry in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, Topper Industries Limited. They were canning chicken. Their market was largely an export one. They were refused an export permit and had to swing over into the processing of pork and beans; but they were refused a permit to go into that business by an order in council which was passed in 1941. If you were not in that business in 1941 you cannot start a new business in that line. They are standing idle. They employed some sixty people and they are now waiting some word as to whether they may proceed.

Mr. HACKETT: That is a shame.

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of Finance made it quite clear to the house a few days ago that no permit will be granted. These sixty people are unemployed.

On the other hand, there is a plant in Truro, Nova Scotia, which could manufacture ice-cream cones. The young man went over to the United States and studied the process of making that particular commodity. He bought equipment and invested $35,000 in it. He has been waiting for a year for his sugar quota. He cannot operate because he cannot get a sugar quota, and there is not another plant like it in the maritime provinces.

Hon. members talk about free enterprise in a free economy. Is it free? Is there any competition there? That is not control; that is dictatorship on behalf of central Ontario and Quebec manufacturers.

An hon MEMBER: That is what you want, more control.

Mr. GILLIS: That is dictatorship; that is the bureaucracy we are trying to smash.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is what you have been after all the time, more controls.

Mr. GILLIS: I have the answer as to why we are not allowed to process pork and beans in the maritime provinces. It is contained in a letter from a commission merchant of Sydney, Nova Scotia. He gives the reasons, but I shall not read them all. He cannot understand why the canning of pork and beans in New Glasgow cannot be proceeded with. There is no shortage of cans. The plant has 400,000 cans on hand. There is plenty of molasses and plenty of beans, but it cannot get the permit because of an order in council which was passed in 1941. When the minister telegraphed the Canadian Legion which protested against this thing he said that it would not be fair to those already established in the business. That is pretty plain language.

As I say, this letter, is from Sydney, Nova Scotia, and is dated June 6. The commission merchant says that he cannot understand why they could not go into the business in New Glasgow, but he says that the reason may be this:

> This week, Stoker-Van Camp Inc., a U.S.A. controlled company, operating in Ontario have to date this year brought into Sydney for distribution through local wholesalers 8,000 cases of Van Camp's pork and beans, not taking into consideration the thousands of cases of canned pork and beans brought into Sydney by Clarks, Heinz's, Canada Packers and Dominion and Canadian Canners Ltd., besides thousands of cases from independent small Quebec and Ontario packers, but, with the exception of small L.C.L. shipments from Lanes Ltd., Moncton, New Brunswick, none from the maritimes. The W.P.T.B. refused to allow my customer, Brennan & Company, North Sydney, Nova Scotia, to bring in a car of white beans I secured for Brennan from Gorman, Chatham, Ontario. Car was stopped at Montreal. The following week, Canada Packers, Sydney, distributed a car of white beans—

—in the same city, but they confiscated his car and put it to one side in Montreal. Every control that was exercised by this government during the war and that would protect the people of this country has been thrown out. Price controls have all gone out the window, but there have been maintained, behind the scenes, controls that protect the capitalists of this country. I am not concerned about the wealth that Canada Packers, Swift Canadian Company, or any of the rest of them have. The thing that I have always protested against is the power that they exercise behind the scenes to stop the people of this country from creating new wealth themselves. I have given four examples of it tonight which have cropped up during the last couple of months where restrictive legislation in sugar and molasses quotas, export permits and a permit to operate these little plants demonstrates the control from behind the scenes in the interests of the big packers and processors in the two central provinces to the detriment of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That is why I am speaking tonight. This is important and urgent. Surely if we cannot force either the federal or the provincial governments to accept responsibility for 30,000 citizens of this country who have not the means of livelihood because of restrictions behind the scenes which prevent people who are progressive from establishing some kind of employment in these provinces we should know about it. These people should be allowed to go ahead without restrictions from Ottawa preventing them from carrying on.

The Minister of Finance can read this tomorrow. So far as I am concerned, I intend to pursue it. I hold in my hand a clipping from Halifax. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) should read it. Some hon. members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would lead one to believe that everything is prosperous in that end of the country. When a few of us rise in our places and tell the truth about conditions as they actually exist they say that we are crying havoc and that conditions are not that bad. They are worse than they are being portrayed here. This clipping I hold in my hand is a Canadian Press dispatch. I do not think they would lie about the matter.

An hon. MEMBER: How did you vote on the control bill?

Mr. GILLIS: I voted for it. But there are no controls. The government pays lip service to controls. Hon. members to my right do not want them except where they protect Canada Packers and the other big corporations.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no such animal as control except the kind of controls that I have described tonight.

Mr. FULTON: Who voted to retain them?

Mr. GILLIS: The Dominion Steel and Coal Company and other such companies are the people who are controlling today. You are just the little man at the end of the string who dances when they pull the other end on St. James or Bay street.

An hon. MEMBER: There is a by-election in Halifax.

Mr. GILLIS: That is too bad. This problem has existed ever since the people of the maritimes were foolish enough to relinquish control of their own end of the country and to enter into a confederation which has strangled them ever since. We have had this problem for fifty years. It is not new. All that we are asking is that there be restored to us some of the things that were taken from us, lifted out and the wealth siphoned off.

This clipping from Halifax paints a pretty bad picture in that city. It was not written by the C.C.F. or the trade unions.

An hon. MEMBER: You want a preferred control.

Mr. GILLIS: The Canadian Press dispatch is dated June 5. I shall not read the top part of it because it is too bad. But it says:

"Things are bad in Halifax and they are going to be worse," said J. J. Kelly, civic welfare inspector. "I hate to think of what is going to happen to many people next winter."

Doctor A. R. Morton, public health and welfare commissioner, agreed that "it's going to be bad next fall."

Most pessimistic note was sounded by Miss Helen Burgess, family welfare bureau secretary. "The conditions today," she said, "are like the early days of the depression. Even those drawing unemployment insurances and family allowances are not getting enough."

Officials of the unemployment insurance commission told reporters that of the 2,590 unemployed males here, "about 30 per cent" were not drawing out-of-work benefits although some were entitled to do so. Insurance is paid for a maximum of one year and applicants must meet certain requirements to qualify for it.

The city has no programme of direct relief similar to that followed in the 30's, and Mayor J. E. Ahern said no such scheme was planned. "I hope that will never have to come again," he added. "Work is what the people want—not relief."

I agree with that. But when no work is available and apparently no one is making any effort to create employment, relief of some kind is necessary. People cannot stay on the roadside and starve. The article goes on:

Miss Burgess said the family welfare bureau, which handles most of the needy family cases from a fund contributed by the community chest and the city of Halifax, has been able to look after only the most destitute cases.

My main object in rising tonight was to focus attention on the fact that people in Nova Scotia who are willing to go ahead and do something for themselves are being prevented by Ottawa, and the examples I have cited I have brought to the attention of the house and the government so that at least the restrictions may be removed which prevent people from creating work.

Before I conclude, I am going to make a few recommendations. First, I recommend that the industrial development bank should at least open an office in Nova Scotia. The industrial development bank was created, as I understood the discussion in the house at the time, for the purpose of going into the field in the post-war period and helping to create secondary industries throughout Canada. It has not performed that function, and the interpretation that I received today of the functions of the industrial development bank is that it will not assist in the establishment of new industry; that it will assist in the expansion of industry established at present. But the industries that are established today do not need assistance. Most of them are large, and if they wish to expand they can very well use their excess profits tax which was refunded to them. That is why it was refunded. At least that was the reason given for refunding it.

An hon. MEMBER: When was it refunded?

Mr. GILLIS: They have got it all back by this time.

The purpose of the industrial development bank was stated at its inception to be to give assistance to a person or group of people who had some capital and could meet the regulations for the purpose of developing secondary industries in the province where it was not profitable for Canada Packers and other large firms to go.

Second, I recommend that the government should give consideration to extending the out-of-work benefits to service personnel until such time as they are able to secure employment. We owe them at least that much.

Third, I recommend that the government give consideration to extending unemployment insurance to care for people who are unemployed and seeking employment and are able to work until such time as employment can be found for them.

I am going to suggest to the Minister of Finance that he reconsider the decision made by his department and relayed by himself to the Canadian Legion of New Glasgow and that a permit be granted to Topper Industries Limited to can beans for sale, so that they may be able to put back to work sixty people who are now out of work because Topper Industries Limited cannot get a permit.

I am also going to recommend that Maclean Brothers, who have made an investment in a small plant at Sydney, Nova Scotia, be granted a molasses quota, so that they can put that plant in operation. I also recommend that the ice-cream plant at Truro—I am not going to give names—should be given a sugar quota, so that they may put their $35,000 investment in that little plant to work.

If these things were done it would be an indication to these communities that the federal government was at least interested in them to the point of permitting them to do something for themselves.

Fourth, I suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that he put an appropriation in the supplementary estimates this session to repair that old pier at New Victoria on Cape Breton island, so that the fish processing and bait freezing plant can get into operation and service the fishermen on that thirty-five mile coast.

It was not easy for me tonight, Mr. Speaker, to hinder my very good friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) from going on with his estimates, but these matters I have raised are urgent. They mean bread and butter to the people I represent in this house. I hope that the ministers who are away on other duties tonight will read my remarks, pay attention to them and endeavour to alleviate the sore spots that I have enumerated tonight.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the problem which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has brought before the house tonight is not a new one. It has been discussed in this house many times during the present session. As he stated, it is as old as confederation, at least eighty years old anyway. The solutions which my hon. friend has suggested are only temporary. He recommended that a few small factories in Nova Scotia be granted certain quotas of molasses and sugar and so forth, and as I sat here I could not avoid realizing that only about seven or eight hundred people out of about 35,000 seeking work could find employment through the solutions he suggested. It is a big problem and one with which this House of Commons must deal at some time.

We in the maritime provinces feel that we have not received proper treatment for a great many years. The unemployment we are suffering today is the accumulated result of federal policies of the past, and more particularly the policies which this government followed during the last war. We in the maritime provinces situated near the coast were in a favoured position during the war for the supplying of munitions for overseas, and we thought factories would be established in those provinces to produce the munitions for our armies overseas. But that did not happen. My own province of New Brunswick received less than one-half of one per cent of the munitions production in all Canada, although we have a population of nearly 500,000 as compared with 12,000,000 for the whole dominion. So what we are experiencing today is mainly the result of the neglect we have received in the past.

There is not much unemployment in the province of Quebec and very little in Ontario, for the simple reason that the large factories established there with the assistance of the government for the production of munitions during the war are today producing civilian goods. Had the same policy been adopted in our maritime provinces, we would not be in the position we are in today. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) recommends that our people receive out-of-work benefits. He went on to say—and I think rightly so—that the people of the maritimes do not want charity. It is not out-of-work benefits that we desire. It is work that we want and it is work that we should receive. The hon. member appealed to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I realize, as I am sure does every other hon. member, that it is not possible to build industries in a few days or a few months. Our unemployment is a thing of the present; and you cannot go along and, by a wave of the hand, establish a factory here and another one there. We must have something else. I hope this government will realize that factories and secondary industries must be developed. We have the common sense to know that these industries and factories cannot be established overnight. In the present unemployment situation in the maritime provinces, what I suggest to the government is that there be voted by this parliament money with which to start public works. An eloquent appeal was made to this house not so long ago for the commencement of the Chignecto canal between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This would give work to many thousands of people, and is something which would be of everlasting benefit to those small provinces down by the sea.

In my own province of New Brunswick we have no national park, and we are the only province in the Dominion of Canada without one. We are told that the tourist industry is one of the greatest industries that can be developed in Canada. I would ask this house or anyone who has visited the maritime provinces if there is any finer part of this Canada of ours, for the purpose of development of the tourist trade. I do not think there is any finer place than along the Saint John river. But we have no national park there. I am not blaming the federal government for this deficiency as much as I blame our own provincial government, because when national parks were established in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick could have had a national park if the provincial government at that time had not been so small that they fought over the site of the national park and did not select the one which the federal government had recommended.

This is a situation which the hon. member for Cape Breton South thought was so urgent that it could not wait for even a day. Well, we have waited now for eighty years, and perhaps one day more would not have made a great deal of difference. I hope the government will consider the seriousness of the present situation. We have had a strike in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. GILLIS: And still have it.

Mr. BROOKS: And we still have it. Perhaps the fault is not all on one side; I do not know. I have heard it said that there are 13,000 men or more out on strike, and that they account for possibly 13,000 or 15,000 of the 30,000 unemployed in those provinces. The men want to work, but for some reason—I am not here to judge what it was—it was a case of "on again, off again, Finnigan"; work one day and not work the next. There may have been some fault there, but it is a sad commentary on the industry of this country and on the labour regulations of the government when men can go to work one day and then, because of a dispute over some matter which certainly could have been settled, not go to work the next. If there is any common sense at all in industry and labour, surely this small matter could have been settled and these men could have gone back to work or could have remained at work.

Mr. GILLIS: There were fifty-eight points at issue.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, and I suppose you could make fifty-eight more. I am not blaming labour. I am not blaming industry. Probably there was fault on both sides and both should be blamed. However, it is the children and the wives who are suffering. As I say, 15,000 of this 30,000 are possibly responsible for half of the unemployment in our provinces. In my own constituency there are 700 to 800 men out of employment in the mines. Not one of those men wanted to go on strike.

Mr. GILLIS: They are back to work.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, they are back to work today. But if these men had been left to themselves, if they had been allowed to form their own union and not the tail-end of the union at Glace Bay in Nova Scotia—

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member did not want to be unfair—

Mr. BROOKS: Not at all.

Mr. GILLIS: —but he has certainly demonstrated that he is uninformed. The miners were an independent union for years. When they came in with the mine workers of Nova Scotia they voted on the matter. It was a democratic vote, and they voted themselves into that union.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, I will admit that my hon. friend is better informed than I am on labour matters. He has been a member of a labour union. I am only taking the word of the men whom I have consulted in my own constituency and the word of the operators. The operators and the miners in Minto have always got along well together. I have been told—and I believe it—that if the union at Minto had not been connected with the union in Nova Scotia, there would not have been any strike in New Brunswick. However, that is a matter—

Mr. GILLIS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. BROOKS: Certainly.

Mr. GILLIS: Did your constituents inform you that the miners' wage rate increased by fifty per cent as compared with what it was when they came in with the mine workers of Nova Scotia?

Mr. BROOKS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, it did increase by fifty per cent.

Mr. BROOKS: I am speaking about the present.

Mr. GILLIS: I am speaking about the men's wages going up by fifty per cent.

Mr. BROOKS: I think the wages of nearly all the people employed in Canada have gone up by fifty per cent, whether they are carpenters, bricklayers or whatever they may be. I believe the wages of the miners in Minto would have gone up by fifty per cent whether they had been connected with the union in Nova Scotia or not. Be that as it may, I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South and I agree on ninety per cent of the matters to which he has referred tonight. I will not agree with him that the mines and everything else should be nationalized, and that private enterprise should be done away with. Private enterprise has built up this country, and I have great faith in private enterprise. If the government takes a friendly view of our situation in the maritimes, these matters can be corrected in the future.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I had no thought of entering into the debate this evening, Mr. Speaker. It is only as a result of perhaps two remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), that I am on my feet now. One remark was, "Any member who wants to tell the truth"; and the hon. member for Cape Breton South would almost lead the members of this house, as well as the people of the country at large —particularly those residing in the maritime provinces—to believe that he was the only member from the maritimes who was anxious and concerned about the conditions in that section of the country. I think each and every member, irrespective of the party he represents, is interested in the welfare of the maritimes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Nobody else ever told the truth.

Mr. ISNOR: I have heard members sitting on this side of the house and in the official opposition on more than one occasion present a fine case on behalf of the maritimes. There are others, in addition to myself, on the government side who have presented a very strong case. From time to time in my own way I have endeavoured to bring forward constructive thoughts that would be helpful to Nova Scotia in particular and the maritimes as a whole. A section of the press in the extreme far end of Nova Scotia often refers to the hon. member for Cape Breton South as the only member who rises in his place and fights for Nova Scotia. I believe that is a mistaken idea, as hon. members of this house will realize. There are other members, just as sincere, sitting in every section of the house; and I say that with all due respect to the efforts of the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

What did he place before us this evening? He referred to the industrial development bank and set out, in part, the functions of that bank. As I remember, thinking back three or four years, the function of the industrial development bank was to assist any new concern to become established, or to promote expansion along certain lines; and I have yet to learn of a single case in which that bank denied an application of that kind. I wonder if the hon. member for Cape Breton South could name two definite cases coming within the provisions of that act where the industrial development bank has denied the applications.

Mr. GILLIS: Do you want me to answer that question now? Up in my office I have a list of seventeen which I got from Graham Towers.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member has always a long list in his office or elsewhere.

Mr. GILLIS: It is official, from the head of that bank; seventeen applications from Nova Scotia were refused.

Mr. ISNOR: I repeat that, to my knowledge, not a single application which came within the provisions of the act has been refused.

Mr. GILLIS: That is it; what are the provisions of the act?

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member referred to the businessmen, who, he said, were not using the refundable portion of their excess profits tax to expand. As an hon. member of the opposition mentioned, they have not as yet received that refundable portion. Large numbers of men in the so-called free enterprise or incentive class are anxious to expand and are just waiting for the refunds to be made. They are ready to make use of the money as soon as it is available.

Mr. GILLIS: Poor fellows; why don't they get out-of-work benefits if they are so poor?

Mr. ISNOR: Work benefits have nothing whatever to do with the matter. That is the difference between the hon. member and myself. I sit here and listen to him try to expound what he has in mind and do not make any foolish interruptions. When I am dealing with a matter like the refundable portion of the excess profits tax the hon. member interrupts and brings in an altogether different question. If the hon. member wishes to direct an intelligent question—

Mr. GILLIS: You wouldn't understand it.

Mr. ISNOR: —I am quite prepared to take my seat and have him ask that question, if he has something to bring up of a constructive nature or something that will bring out some real information. Otherwise I would ask him to do as I try to do; that is, act the part of a gentleman. I do not say that in an unkindly way, but it is a little lesson I have more or less learned from the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who so often uses an expression like that to bring the rest of us back to a proper sense of proportion.

I should like to follow along the line of the statements made by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), who said this was not a new problem. It is an old problem with us, and I admit it. We are in an awkward position in the maritimes. I am anxious to cooperate with anyone, in any part of the house, who will bring forward a solution that will help us there. We have talked over these matters time and again; but unfortunately in our section of the country it would appear almost impossible to bring about industrial development with the principal market one or two thousand miles away. Our own market is limited. Roughly speaking, we have some 600,000 people in Nova Scotia, another 500,000 in New Brunswick and perhaps 100,000 in Prince Edward Island, and that does not represent a market large enough to permit any real development. In Ontario and Quebec, on the other hand, they have a population of three and a half to four million people almost at their back doors. Naturally that brings down the cost of production to a point that we find it hard to meet in competition.

It is true that we have had some outstanding examples of industrial development in the maritimes. The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to Halifax, and perhaps that is another reason why I am standing here saying a few words on this occasion. There we have Moirs, known from coast to coast as producers of perhaps the best chocolates made in Canada. They have made a real success of their industry. On previous occasions I have referred to Stanfield's, in the town of Truro, which has also made an outstanding success. I do not wish to repeat what I have said already about that fine firm and the manner in which they have carried on over a long period of years. Also in Halifax we have the Schwartz firm, whose products are known all over Canada. At the present time, however, they are finding it difficult, because they have to buy all their glass containers in central Canada; and the transportation charges on the containers, plus transportation charges back to market, total more than the cost of the products themselves. That is a heavy handicap under which they have to work. Then we have the Lewis firm, also in Truro, which has made a great success, whose hats and caps and ladies' hosiery are sold in every part of Canada. There is Borden's milk, and I could go on with a number of others, but they are all finding the competition very keen. I wonder if perhaps transportation charges and the lack of certain containers, such as I mentioned in connection with the Schwartz firm, do not keep these firms from progressing to a greater extent than they have been able to do up to the present time. In regard to containers, a short time ago I thought we had an opportunity to bring a glass factory into operation in Nova Scotia. I did my best to assist in bringing that about, but unfortunately it has not as yet come to pass. We are still hopeful that we may see such a factory commence operations in Nova Scotia, making bottles, jars and so on to meet our requirements in that respect. We still have some shoe factories in the maritimes; very good shoes are made in Fredericton.

Mr. BROOKS: The Hartt is the best shoe made in Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: Again I agree with my hon. friend, that they make among the best shoes sold in Canada.

Mr. BROWN: The manager of the Hartt Shoe Company is from Windsor, Ontario.

Mr. CASE: Windsor; where is that? It begins with "wind" and ends with "sor".

Mr. ISNOR: I have no objection to the maritime provinces making use of some good products from Ontario, even if it includes the manager of a factory.

Then, we have clothing firms in Nova Scotia which formerly sold "A.P.H." trousers right through to Vancouver, and are still doing a good business. So I say things are not too bad. While they are not as good as we would like them to be, certainly they are not in such a blue and depressed condition as the hon. member for Cape Breton South would have us believe. I have been in business for many long years, and I have never found it helpful to talk about the rainy days and poor business. Rather I look upon the good days. And when I come in after a good day I say to my clerks, "I congratulate you; that was a worth-while day you had yesterday. Just see if you can do better tomorrow." We have kept on building and building, not with over-optimism but always with an optimistic view of things. I feel, if the hon. member for Cape Breton South would join some of the other members from Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces, and do a little more boosting and less knocking, it would be better.

Mr. GILLIS: Before the hon. member sits down—and I think he is going to sit down soon—

Mr. ISNOR: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —would he answer a question?

An hon. MEMBER: If it is a sensible one.

Mr. ISNOR: Go ahead and ask it.

Mr. GILLIS: I raised four points tonight, and asked for four small plants and factories which are waiting to operate down there.

Mr. ISNOR: I thought the hon. member was going to ask a question. He is starting to enumerate some points.

Mr. GILLIS: Is the hon. member in favour of granting the quotas and the necessary permits to get those four small plants operating?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. ISNOR: Who said, "No"?

Mr. GILLIS: Are you trying to say there is no need for them?

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. ISNOR: I will answer that myself, and it will not be no. You cannot put me in that position. I am just as anxious as the hon. member for Cape Breton South to do what he has suggested, except that I want to see it done in a proper way.

Mr. GILLIS: We have been waiting for a year and a half.

Mr. ISNOR: The other day the hon. member made quite a case about pork and beans, and he used the chicken tin or can as an illustration. I think it is recognized by the trade throughout the whole of Canada that it is not economically sound, that it is not good business, and that one cannot possibly build for the future on the basis of a seven-ounce tin or can.

Mr. GILLIS: That is free enterprise.

Mr. ISNOR: I believe that is recognized, and it is because of that they use the twenty-ounce can. Inexperienced as he is, the hon. member for Cape Breton South must at least take that for granted, because that is a reason given by the trade, and a well-established practice. We were in somewhat the same position in Halifax, although in some respects it was more favourable, so far as beans are concerned. Some years ago one of our large concerns had to go out of business because they were unable to procure tins. But of course they would not have used those small seven-ounce tins, even if they could have procured them. It would not have been sound business to do so.

The hon. member asked whether I am in favour of Maclean Brothers case for an extra sugar quota. One must consider the necessity of taking sugar away from consumers who want their full quota. The decision had to be made as to whether Maclean Brothers should have a larger quota of sugar, or more than someone else who was serving the public, thereby taking the quota away from the individual consumer and giving it to Maclean Brothers. Surely it is a matter of judgment. If they could have been given more sugar, without its being taken away from others, then I would have been with the hon. member in advocating that Maclean Brothers be given the quota to allow them to proceed.

The second case to which the hon. member referred was somewhat similar, having to do with a sugar quota.

Mr. GILLIS: It was molasses in one instance and sugar in another.

Mr. ISNOR: They are both on quota. The hon. member is in favour of controls, and I am in favour of a certain degree of controls, as has been stated this evening. I was in favour of controls during the period of the war, but I feel that, for the general good of trade as well as that of the consuming public, a gradual removal of controls is a good thing for this country.

With respect to public projects, I do not know just how those projects are going to serve the people in the future. They are, of course, temporary measures. Anything that will help the fishermen of Nova Scotia, such as the building of wharves and breakwaters, and anything which will permit them to carry on their industry to a greater extent, would have my full support. That was about the only constructive suggestion the hon. member advanced this evening.

In closing, let me say in all sincerity that sometimes we in the maritimes feel we are forgotten by the rest of Canada. I do not know whether the solution is additional freight rates subsidies—and I do not like the word "subsidies"—or a regional tariff which would permit us to export or to ship to central Canada, and put us on a more equal footing with manufacturers in central Canada. Perhaps we should be given special benefits in the matter of exports.

When I refer to exports I am reminded that the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), with myself and other hon. members on this side of the house advocated a greater quota of lumber for the maritime provinces. I am happy to say that that quota has been increased to a marked extent because, I believe, of the efforts of hon. members from the maritime provinces. The minister in charge recognized the need, and the fact that the suggestions we advanced were those which would be helpful to our section of the country, with the result that we have been allocated an additional 50,000,000 feet for export purposes. After all, our export business is very important to us. Sixty per cent of lumber in the maritimes is exported, and it is that market we want to hold, encourage and enlarge when we fight for a greater quota.

The hon. member for Royal mentioned the Saint John river. I agree that it is a beautiful river. However I cannot take my seat without referring to the fact that in Nova Scotia we have one of the finest national parks in the whole of Canada, and the well known Cabot trail is known everywhere.

Then in the county of Halifax we have Peggy's Cove, one of the most painted spots on the continent. It attracts a large number of United States artists who come every year. At the present time the Nova Scotia government is embarking upon an extensive road building programme and is developing the tourist business.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not forget the Annapolis valley.

Mr. ISNOR: Then the hon. member for Cape Breton South questioned the hon member for Royal in regard to wage increases. When the wage control was taken off on November 8, 1946, there was practically an immediate general increase of wages in the retail stores, without any efforts on the part of the retail clerks or any one else. That was free enterprise. I agree with the hon. member for Royal that free enterprise has done a good job in this country, has built in the past and is building for the future.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in view of the fact that this particular subject has been raised. Of course there is much in what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said, although as usual he spoke in an unduly pessimistic manner. He knows as well as anyone else that he is at a particular disadvantage because he is the only member of his party east of Winnipeg. He seems to think that if the Liberal members from Nova Scotia banded together they could do more, but he is well aware that he does not know the extent to which we can and do work together on this side of the house and obtain benefits of which he knows nothing.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nobody ever hears of them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why not tell the people about them?

Mr. WINTERS: It is always more effective for opposition members to talk about things one cannot get than about the things which are obtained day in and day out.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South always uses the round figure of 30,000 when talking about the unemployed in the maritime provinces, but the actual figures show that at the end of April there were 13,779 people, made up of 11,585 males and 2,194 females, receiving unemployment insurance benefits That is considerably short of 30,000.

Mr. GILLIS: The rest are not obtaining unemployment insurance; they have run out.

Mr. WINTERS: There is a growing feeling in the maritimes that something constructive can be done. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) reflected the spirit of optimism which many of us feel. We showed in full measure during the war what we can do when given the opportunity. Many industries grew where there were facilities to support them. The population was swollen because of these wartime industries, and in the light of all the factors I think the employment situation, though serious, is remarkably good. Certainly it does not compare with the gloomy picture which our C.C.F. friends have painted since long before the war ended. There is in some quarters a complex going back to the days of confederation. There are those people who say that we suffered because of confederation. Many people are beginning to feel that it is more an imagined than a factual consideration. It is true that Nova Scotia is at a disadvantage; we all admit that. We are at the end of a long, slow rail haul and distance makes it difficult to put our products on the central Canadian market. However, there is a trend toward small industry in Nova Scotia. I think it is most unfair to those people who are really trying to do something in the maritimes to have this picture of gloom painted time after time in this house and publicized across the country to give the impression that nobody is trying to do anything. Actually a great deal of good work is being done day in and day out.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not permitted to do anything.

Mr. WINTERS: The hon. member for Cape Breton South sits in his seat and smiles when I say that a great deal of good work is being done and I think he does not believe that. Probably he does not believe that in my constituency there is a great resurgence in the spirit of the people. They have settled down to business. Many undertakings have been started in Nova Scotia through private enterprise. In other instances, substantial businesses have been started with government assistance. Hon. members know what has been done in the way of cold storage plants in the Annapolis valley which were established by a combination of government assistance and private enterprise. Cold storage plants for the fishing industry have also been set up. As we all know, the fishing industry is in a critical position at the moment because of the grave danger of oversupply. Inventories are high. I think, if the plant had been established on the wharf which the hon. member for Cape Breton South talks about, the difficulties in that particular field would still not be overcome.

In connection with public works, I think anyone who examines the estimates for this year will say that Nova Scotia has not fared too badly. I can see no grounds for saying that this government has not cooperated in the interests of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is not in position to know all this government has done, because of his predicament as a lone member of his party. There is a great deal to be done in Nova Scotia; we all acknowledge that. There is that important project which my hon. friend speaks of so often—the causeway across the strait of Canso. That is something we all want to see go forward because it would create employment and result in lasting benefits. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) said he did not believe that the type of solution advocated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South would be the lasting answer to the problem and, generally speaking, that is true. We will not accept temporary solutions when we can have more in the way of permanency.

A causeway across the strait of Canso would provide an economic channel between Cape Breton and Nova Scotia to central Canada, and we are all in favour of it for that reason.

I do not intend to make any extended remarks at this time; I simply wanted to dispel some of the feeling of gloom which the hon. member for Cape Breton South so constantly sheds over this house. Every hon. member, whether he is from Nova Scotia or elsewhere, knows that the situation is serious, but there is no lack of cooperation. If we look at the bright side of this problem and fight it together we shall come out on the winning side.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege last fall to visit the maritimes for the first time, and I feel I would be remiss in my appreciation of those great provinces if I did not put in a little plug for them at this time. I want to follow along the lines advocated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). I feel that anyone from the maritimes need make no apologies for their great community. We travelled through New Brunswick, on to Prince Edward Island and then through Nova Scotia.

Anyone who is privileged to visit those provinces is bound to be impressed by the wealth of resources of the people. They have a wealth of natural resources; there are timber resources, natural industries, the dairying industry, the mining industry and, above all, there is the wealth they have in their people.

In Halifax particularly I noticed the possibilities of that great city, one of the finest harbours in the world, and that must mean something to the national life of this community. And beautiful Prince Edward Island; I always refer to it as a little spot of heaven. I do not think there is any more beautiful place on the face of the earth. But I can appreciate something of the feeling of being cut off from the rest of the community. Therefore I say to the maritimers that their greatest problem is one of transportation. As a member of one of the central provinces I would say, with all sincerity, that if we can lend a hand together to do something with respect to the equalization of freight rates and greater opportunities for the maritimes—because, after all, we owe a lot to them; they are a part of confederation; they are entitled to our best consideration—we should do so in order that they may, in turn, develop their wealth of resources of which I have spoken, and I have only barely touched on them.

I shall never forget my journey through the beautiful Annapolis valley where at that time they were harvesting millions of bushels of the finest apples in the world, and on through the Saint John river valley in New Brunswick. It would be worth while if hon. members could enjoy the same opportunity to visit that which is part and parcel of our great country, the three important provinces down by the sea, that we might, in turn, have a greater appreciation of each other and of each other's problems and lend a hand so that they, too, will share in what is considered the prosperity of the central provinces.

I am not going to labour the point that they were robbed as a result of confederation, but I certainly do not feel that they got entirely a square deal. Those of us in this parliament and those of us who are interested in the welfare of this dominion from the point of view of national unity and otherwise and its general prosperity should do our best to correct these wrongs.

Why should we be paying subsidies or imposing high tariffs on certain protected products when the same might be manufactured in our own country and particularly with the ingenuity, enterprise and enthusiasm of the maritimers? I feel that much of their economy could be entrusted to themselves if they were only given a fair and square opportunity to compete with the rest of Canada.

Therefore, on this occasion, I should like to pay my warmest tribute tonight to the people whom I met in the maritimes and tell them how much I admire their great provinces and how much confidence I have in the enthusiasm and ambition of their people. I believe it is up to us, who to some extent probably enjoy more physical advantages, to share those advantages with those who may be less favoured in the other parts of our dominion and at least bring to them an opportunity to enjoy an equalization in transportation rates and an improvement in transportation facilities, so that together we may play our part, not only in the onward march of civilization, but in the future development of this country in order that national unity will become a reality and not a myth; that we together may make Canada that country which we have indicated, by words if not by deed, we believe is possible for its people. But I cannot visualize a great Canada if some parts of the country are left neglected and are not given opportunities to develop themselves according to their own abilities and to enjoy the advantages they otherwise would enjoy. I really appreciate this opportunity to pay my compliments to the members from the maritimes and particularly to the maritimers themselves, and to say that I am wholeheartedly in favour of anything that will benefit their lot within confederation.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of entering into this competition which was started by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), followed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) and the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) with respect to the physical aspects of the maritime provinces, the wonderful character of the men, the beauty of the women, the health of the children and all that sort of thing. I know the Annapolis valley in apple time is wonderful; I know the Bras d'Or lakes are tremendous, but I am inclined to come back to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and say that a lot of these things you just cannot eat and they do not buy you a great deal of clothing. Beauty is an amazing thing to a man who has a full stomach but does not taste so well to the man who is hungry. Therefore I intend to devote myself to only one aspect of this picture, namely the situation in the coal mines in the maritime provinces. What is the story? We had a strike which, according to all the newspapers—and it has never been denied—cost these miners $5 million. We of this House of Commons have been asked, and have responded in a very humble way in doing a little bit down there, but it does not even mean a drop in a very large bucket.

Then we read in the newspapers—and we were all very happy—that this strike had been settled. An increase of $1.40 a day had been granted and another probable increase on the basis of increase in tonnage in the next year. These were the facts given to us, and all the men went back to work. Then in a few days they were again out on strike. I had thought someone would ask for a statement with respect to that situation. The only information we got is that there is a difference in interpretation of the settlement agreement. I do say, with great respect, that when it comes to a matter of interpretation of an agreement arrived at between two people and a disagreement arises, any labour department that is worthy of the name could go in and give the proper interpretation and stop this nonsense which is going on in Nova Scotia at the present time. This is the second strike over an interpretation of some little clause in an agreement.

It seems to me that we are entitled to a complete and full statement as to the situation. At the moment it is no use worrying about something that cannot bring immediate results. A settlement of the strike will bring practical results, because the men will be earning money again and the basic industry of Nova Scotia, which is coal and steel—nothing else compares with it—could get going. If that cannot be done by the intervention of the labour department, may I repeat that it is of very little value. Let us get that done, let us get Nova Scotia rolling in this month of June. Then we can develop our oratory as best we may, as long as our lungs last, in describing the beauties of that excellent part of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am sure that we have listened with close attention to what has been said by those who have taken part in a debate which I would have preferred taking place tomorrow night or some other day. However I want to assure those who took part in the debate that I will bring it to the attention of my colleagues, the various ministers connected with several of the matters referred to by hon. gentlemen, and the government will continue to give these matters its serious and active interest.

I need only remind the house that the observations made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, observations that I am sure we have all noted with great interest, will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). May I remind him that when the Minister of Labour did give his interest to this matter he acted in such a manner as to receive commendation from the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who is unfortunately not in his seat tonight because of illness. The government is interested in this matter. It is interested in seeing that the economy of this country in all its aspects works to the point of giving to its people the opportunity of as full a life as possible. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that these matters will be continuously and continually receiving the attention of the administration, and I trust that I may now proceed to my own estimates.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

366. Departmental administration, $126,198.

Mr. MARTIN: Stand.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Chairman, this was not the arrangement at all.

Mr. MARTIN: It was arranged last Friday that we would go into two departments. The hon. member for Davenport will corroborate that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is right.

Mr. MARTIN: As soon as we call the items in these two different departments we shall let them stand and go on with national health and welfare.

Mr. FLEMING: My point is that we should not be going into these other departments now but should be going on with national health and welfare. That was the understanding with the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

Mr. MARTIN: This is no violation of that understanding. I undertook that we would go into supply again tomorrow night. The hon. member for Davenport will, I am sure, corroborate that the procedure we are following is correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: What is going to happen tomorrow night? Is the minister proposing to call two new departments tomorrow night?

Mr. MARTIN: No. We shall take either agriculture or health and welfare.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

379. Departmental administration, $246,417.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

200. Departmental administration, $531,954.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to ask the minister some questions on administration as it applies to the family allowance.

Mr. MARTIN: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that if he has any specific question relating to any particular item he might wait until the item is called. On the administration item the practice is, if any hon. gentleman wishes, to make a general statement. In the interests of economy of time and clarity and completeness of discussion, it is desirable to put questions on each item as we come to them, when I shall be glad to answer them to the best of my ability.

Mr. BLAIR: In speaking on the health and welfare estimates, I find it difficult to understand why more time is not spent on the question of health in this house. We can spend hours and days in discussing the question of defence or a potential enemy of Canada; yet disease is the greatest enemy of this country. It is constantly attacking our citizens, and the only time we have to allot to health in this parliament is a few hours when the health and welfare estimates come up. But all the time this major enemy of the people is constantly attacking them.

The most important asset of any country is its people. The only sound foundation upon which a prosperous and happy nation can be built is the good health of each of its members, and the health of the country and the health of the people should be the primary concern of the government. The ultimate objective of public health should be to bring to everyone an equal opportunity to attain physical and mental health, regardless of race or economic status. During the war years, economic conditions were, on the whole, favourable to public health. However, certain adverse factors also played their part. Public health services often had to be reduced because of shortage of personnel. Medical and nursing services were inadequate in many localities, and the expansion of public health facilities were greatly slowed down. There are six main factors necessary to a proper health programme. I shall tabulate them.

1. Government financial aid and direction.
2. Research.
3. An educational programme, in order that public support may be given to the plan.
4. Sufficient hospitals and other institutions concerned in the care of the ill.
5. Sufficient doctors, nurses, and trained assistants to carry out a health programme.
6. The amalgamation of all organizations by government authority.

Costs of medical care of all kinds have increased tremendously during the past twenty-five years, as new methods of diagnosis and treatment have been discovered. Costs of medical services are increasing, but the ability of the people to pay is not increasing. Medical science is making great strides, but the application of medical discoveries has not made progress in the treatment of all the people. It is the duty of the community and the state to care for the poor and unfortunate who are unable to seek or procure proper attendance. Unfortunately, people in the lower income brackets, who formerly were able to pay for medical attention, are no longer able to do so on account of the high and increasing costs of hospitalization and attendance. Even in the most severe illness, they cannot afford the necessities such as special nurses or hospital services. Unless an illness is acute, these people are forced to neglect chronic conditions for financial reasons. It is regrettable that children belonging to these families cannot have defects corrected at a time when such correction would be most beneficial to them. The development of good citizens in a country like Canada is of the greatest importance, since the future of the nation depends on the physical, mental and moral health of the young people.

We are entering upon a new era in the fight against disease. To be successful, it will call for unselfish leadership, the co-operation of the whole medical profession, and the interest and financial support of our citizens. All interested bodies should work together in promoting the health services we visualize. While important discoveries in treatment have been made over the past decade, yet problems such as cancer remain to be solved. Unless we find good researchers, and provide laboratories and funds for them, it will be difficult to reduce the tremendous sums spent annually on disease in this land. It will require the highest standards of scientific talent, supported by adequate facilities as well as finances. The medical research scientists of Canada are second to none, and I firmly believe that our Canadian scientists who have solved many problems in the past could, if given opportunities and financial help, find the clue to a cure for cancer.

Demands for government intervention are increasing with respect to the treatment and control of cancer. There has been a new impetus and a new hope of success in the war against this disease. It is a great misfortune that a sum of $500,000, known as the King George V cancer fund, placed under the control of the government to advance cancer research—

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not mean to say it was put under the control of the government.

Mr. BLAIR: The government were the trustees of this fund.

Mr. MARTIN: No. The trustees were the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the Chief Justice of Canada, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, one lay gentleman who represented the insurance bodies, Professor Boyd of the university of Toronto, and Doctor Dube, Dean of Medicine at the university of Montreal.

Mr. BLAIR: I stand corrected on that, but the object is the same. This fund was not used for a period of twelve years except for small amounts which were given out from it at intervals, without a really definite programme in view. The point I wish to make is that during the twelve years when this fund was not in use, approximately 156,000 people in Canada died of cancer. I am glad to say that, at long last, the trustees of this fund have awakened from their comatose condition and have come to a state of realization of the health needs of the nation.

Cancer research at the present time is very small in comparison with the casualty list caused by the disease. Although cancer is regarded as the greatest problem confronting medical research today, only a small amount of money is spent for investigation in this field in comparison with the number of cancer cases. Any attack that we make on this problem must be a long-term attack. Education must be an important factor. An educational programme should emphasize ability to procure treatment for cancer. There is no point in emphasizing correct treatment for cancer unless there are chances to obtain it. We must see to it that opportunities for early diagnosis and successful treatment are available to both the physician and the patient. Better and more extensive facilities for the treatment of cancer are required if we are to bring this terrible disease under control. Cancer is a non-contagious disease.

Approximately 15,000 people die of this disease each year in Canada. While the mortality is high, we must take into consideration the years of suffering and pain for the unfortunate patient afflicted with cancer. The real tragedy lies in the fact that at least one-third of these cancer deaths occurred because the patients themselves failed to recognize the signs and the symptoms of the disease when it was in its early stages. They did not seek medical advice in time to have successful treatment. In sharp contrast, and most encouraging, are the patients who recognized the disease early and, with the help of their family physician, were given the full benefits of surgery or radio-therapy and, as a result, continued to enjoy good health. The public should be educated to the fact that, while it is possible to obtain complete cures in the early stages where the disease is located externally on the body, yet in a large proportion of the cases the cancer is located where present-known treatment cannot effect a cure. We cannot disillusion the public mind that the only reason which has prevented treatment and research has been a matter of costs.

There is one encouraging thing in so far as cancer is concerned. I note in an article in the Toronto Telegram of June 2, 1947 giving the causes of deaths in the city of Toronto, that whereas cancer killed 115 persons in the month of May of this year, 148 died of cancer in May of last year. I think the average in a city of that size would keep up; and I believe there is some cause for congratulation in the fact that the number of deaths from cancer has dropped even by this small amount.

I come next to tuberculosis. It must be considered as a disease which killed one out of every four persons dying in the age group from sixteen to thirty-nine years. From September, 1939, to June 30, 1944, tuberculosis killed more Canadians in Canada than were killed in all the theatres of war. There are certain facts about tuberculosis which should be recognized. First, in the last ten years sixty per cent of the deaths from tuberculosis occurred in the most productive age group of life; that is, from twenty to forty-nine years; and over sixty per cent of all patients entering sanatoria for treatment are in this age group. Second, the average cost—and costs are important—including hospital care and loss of wages when a male wage-earner is incapacitated because of tuberculosis, has been estimated at $5,400; when a female wage-earner is incapacitated, the cost is $5,000. Third, the cost to the taxpayers for assistance to a family because of tuberculosis has been estimated at $2,800. Doctor G. C. Brink, director of the division of tuberculosis prevention in the department of health of Ontario, in an article in the Canadian Journal of Public Health, of January, 1946, states:

If we are to wipe out this preventable disease there must be:

(a) Adequate diagnostic facilities, which should include enough mass survey equipment, and personnel, to make possible an X-ray film of the lungs for every citizen at least once every five years.

(b) Sufficient beds to permit prompt sanatorium treatment for every person with active tuberculosis.

(c) Adequate public health nursing services.

(d) Proper post-sanatorium care.

(e) Social services to make possible a higher standard of living in families represented by tuberculosis.

(f) Rehabilitation of the handicapped patient.

Doctor Brink further states:

If these facilities were available, the road ahead would be clear, and people in all parts of our country would be protected against tuberculosis.

The pioneering period is over. The result of a planned attack on tuberculosis needs no restating here. There is a new spirit abroad among the people in regard to what can be done to prevent disease, and they are demanding an all-out programme which should be the go-ahead signal to all governments and health departments.

One of the handicaps in dealing with tuberculosis is the general conception that the disease is now being defeated. It cannot be considered that a disease which kills nearly 6,000 people each year is under control.

Canada can be proud of the progress which has been made during the past few years in reducing the toll of infant and maternal losses. We must, however, carry on the fight to overcome these unnecessary deaths, and this can be done only through the cooperation of the medical profession, public health officials, Canadian mothers and mothers-to-be, and the public at large.

The maternal mortality rate has decreased from 4·2 per 1,000 live births in 1939 to 2·3 last year. In comparison, I give the figures of 1·8 in Denmark, 2·2 in New Zealand, 2·3 in the United States, 2·8 in England and Wales, 2·9 for the white population of the Union of South Africa, 3·1 in Scotland, and 3·3 in Australia.

In our own country the number of deaths in 1944 was 775. The reasons for the decrease in maternal mortality may be listed as: First, new treatment by penicillin and the sulfa drugs; second, the increased number of births taking place in hospitals; third, education. Better hospital facilities and a continuation of the educational programme would no doubt continue the trend downward in the mortality rates. The toll of infant and maternal losses could be still further reduced through the cooperation of government health officials and the medical profession. While Canada's infant mortality is the lowest in its history, yet it is still high in comparison with other progressive countries. It could be lower still, because today fifty-five per cent of these infant deaths occur during the first month of life. If mothers received closer supervision and more attention was given to nutrition, many of these lives could be saved. In 1945 Canada lost 3,156 babies because of prematurity. This represents thirty per cent of all infant deaths. Excellent results have been gained in the treatment and handling of premature babies, but such care is not within the reach of many mothers. The infant mortality rate in the Dominion of Canada in 1944 shows an increase in deaths from diarrhoea and interitis. The deathrate of children under one year, per 1,000 live births, for 1944 gives the following figures. For Canada as a whole the rate was fifty-five. For the provinces the rates were as follows:"

New Brunswick	77
Quebec	68
Nova Scotia	54
Manitoba	49
Saskatchewan	47
Alberta	46
Prince Edward Island	45
Ontario	43
British Columbia	40

The number of infant deaths, that is children under four years of age, was 15,511. New Brunswick had the highest rate, with seventy-seven per 1,000 and British Columbia the lowest with 40 per 1,000. Other countries in the world have attained an infant mortality rate of thirty per 1,000. This should be the objective of all the provinces of Canada. It is unbelievable that the Canadian people can view in a complacent mood the situation regarding preventable diseases. The fact that 1,500 babies died each year, in the ten-year period from 1932 to 1942, is disturbing when one considers that these deaths were due to the four major communicable diseases which cause such a high mortality in children; that is, diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles and whooping cough. In one area in Canada with a population of 1,150,000, there were 518 deaths from diphtheria from 1934 to 1943, while in another area with a population of 1,500,000 there were only forty-three deaths. Why should there be such a contrast? Why should this exist? For years we have been putting the emphasis on curative agencies rather than preventive agencies. There is an urgent necessity for immunization against these scourges of childhood, diphtheria, scarlet fever and whooping cough. These diseases are largely preventable, but they still take a toll of disability and death among Canadian children. The maximum number of cases of poliomyelitis in any one year since 1940 is 1,881, with sixty-eight deaths in 1941. This has been an average of 760 cases a year. In the same period there have been 628 deaths from whooping cough alone in a single year.

In this period there has been an average of 17,000 cases of whooping cough, 3,000 cases of diphtheria, and over 17,000 cases of scarlet fever.

We have no means of preventing the spread of poliomyelitis by immunization. There are specific means of preventing diphtheria, whooping cough and scarlet fever. A full programme of immunization could banish these diseases from the country. Immunization by diphtheria toxoid is approximately 100 per cent effective. Whooping cough vaccine protects children and causes immunity in about eighty per cent of those treated. Immunization has proven the best and most effective means of protection against communicable diseases. As an example, I point out that in Toronto there were 2,256 cases of diphtheria in 1920 with 224 deaths, while in 1940 there were none. In the countries of Europe where war has upset public health organization, diphtheria is now showing a tremendous increase. Doctor Hastings, for many years medical officer of health for the city of Toronto, has said, "Every death from diphtheria should demand a coroner's inquest." The statistics regarding the mortality of these diseases have been encouraging generally, but we must remember that the price of safety is a thorough immunization programme. Diphtheria is only slowly coming under control.

The problem of arthritis continues as a major difficulty. Very little progress has been made by research in the quest for a solution. I again remind the committee that there are approximately 600,000 sufferers from this disease in Canada alone, with some completely disabled, and others partly so. I urge that financial assistance be given the new association which has been formed to study rheumatic diseases. While arthritis is not a killer, yet it causes long periods of disability; many of these chronic sufferers occupy hospital beds for months and years, and in many instances have spent all their funds in the hope of a cure. Rheumatic fever still stands as a chief cause of chronic heart disease.

The Canadian hospital council estimates that additional hospital accommodation is required for 40,000 patients. Later, I had a return from the minister in which he set the figure at 27,000 beds. Even with that difference of 13,000 beds, there is a marked demand for additional hospital beds in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member referring to the return tabled the other day?

Mr. BLAIR: Yes. The lack of hospital accommodation is apparent to any person who has tried to obtain a room in a hospital during the last few years. In an attempt to cut down on overhead expenses, hospitals have found it necessary to reduce their staffs, and the nurses are overworked. Unless patients can afford special nurses, often they do not receive sufficient attention. It is estimated that in all branches of the nursing service the shortage of professional nursing personnel now stands at 8,700. Of these, 7,000 are needed for all types of hospitals; 1,200 are needed for private duty, and 500 are needed for public health.

In regard to the question of beds, I quote from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of May 27. It is a dispatch from Niagara Falls; and this is the common thing we hear all over Canada in regard to hospitals:

> Niagara Falls, May 27. Major Robert Buckner, business manager, told the Niagara Falls hospital trust tonight that the women's ward in the new wing has been closed for lack of nurses. "It may be necessary to close the men's ward in the new wing," he added.

The shortage of nurses today is due to the fact that the rate of increase in the number of nurses graduating has not kept up with the rate of increase in the demand for additional nursing service. The rate of admission to hospitals, according to the population throughout Canada, has greatly increased over the pre-war rate. In Ontario hospitals, the admission rate is more than sixty per cent higher than in 1931. In the event of an epidemic such as influenza, our position in Canada would be hazardous. We must remember that in the influenza epidemic of 1918 we lost 30,000 people in the Dominion of Canada. This is something we simply could not cope with at the present time.

Environment, especially during childhood, is a requisite of health. Unsanitary houses providing poor shelter are conducive neither to health nor to good citizenship. The ratio of sickness is higher in the slums than where the people are well housed.

There are widely different standards of health between one province and another. Under section 91 of the British North America Act, the health of the people is the individual responsibility of each province. There is an inequality in various fields such as public health or tuberculosis control as between provinces, and as between urban and rural areas of provinces. At this time it would be impossible to tabulate all the requirements of an adequate public health program for the dominion. I hope I shall not be accused of advocating expenditures. I do not think there is one member in the house who would consider it an extravagance to spend money where human life is at stake or for the relief of suffering.

I have discussed the necessity for research and the lowering of the mortality rate in cancer, preventable diseases, maternal and infant mortality, and tuberculosis. I have drawn attention to the serious shortage of hospital beds and trained personnel. Again I refer to the fact that the cost of sickness is becoming beyond the means of many people. The solution of these urgent health problems is, therefore, an adjustment among all the provinces and the dominion. The two largest provinces have not yet reached an agreement, although the premiers of those provinces have requested another dominion-provincial conference.

In view of the situation I have described regarding the over-all health picture in the dominion, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should be the first to raise his voice in demanding a renewal of the dominion-provincial conference. If by the calling of another conference the life of even one child of a Canadian citizen could be saved, then there should be no hesitation. A grave responsibility rests upon the federal government.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure we have all listened, and with great profit, to the address we have just heard. Let me say at the outset to the hon. member that the temper of his observations and the constructive nature of his suggestions are in keeping with the kind of cooperation which, as an eminent member of the medical profession, he has given to me since I became Minister of National Health and Welfare. While there may be one or two points on which it may be expected that we shall have different points of view, I want him to know that I shall follow with great interest, not only the speech he made tonight, but also the excellent speech he made in the house early in the present session of parliament.

I would not be doing my duty if in my first observations respecting the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare I did not pay what I think the committee generally will recognize as a deserving tribute to my predecessor, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who took over this department when, on the welfare side, there were new assumptions of responsibility which might well have taxed the ingenuity, energy and imagination of any man given that particular portfolio. Might I add that, while the work of this department is not such as to engage the headlines, it is extremely important and complicated. My daily experience confirms my earlier judgment of the great contribution my predecessor has made in this department.

The hon. member who has just spoken has pointed, and quite properly, to the general health state of this great country of ours. He will not think me unfair, I hope, if I add that in his statement he did not draw the lines which, as Minister of National Health and Welfare, I must draw in respect of the constitutional distribution of powers and responsibilities of the federal government with regard to many of the matters he has discussed. But I do agree with him, and I say to the committee that, while we spend a great deal of time in the discussion of many matters, perhaps there is no field of governmental endeavour on the federal level which touches so directly the welfare of the people of Canada as does this department.

The hon. member referred to arthritis, and perhaps later in the estimates I shall have more to say about this specific item. But I may tell him—and I announce now—that the technique we employed early in January in calling together here in Ottawa, the capital city of our country, those who were interested in cancer control, will be employed again when all the authorities, governmental and professional, in the field of arthritis, are called within a very few months, to see if we cannot provide some coordinating authority to carry on in the field of arthritis; as I ultimately hope to show we did and have done in the important field of cancer.

I am sure hon. gentlemen will regard what I am now saying not in any sense as an expression of political partisanship, because I hope we can follow the lead given by the hon. member who has just spoken in looking at this matter as one which should not divide us on a political basis. Through the officers of my department I have had an opportunity of consultation with Lord Horder who, as hon. members will know, is one of the outstanding authorities in his profession in the rheumatic field, and who has in Great Britain set up a number of investigational clinical centres for the treatment of this malady.

Likewise, Doctor Wallace Graham of Toronto, an eminent physician in this particular field, has also been in consultation with the department. These two sources, to whom I have referred, together with the Canadian Rheumatism Association, will be the basis of a conference which, I hope, will lead to an examination of all the possible avenues available to bring about some relief in respect of this painful affliction.

As the hon. member knows—and I say this in all humility, because I am not a medical man—there is not the same opportunity for fundamental research in the field of arthritis, so I am told, that there is in the field of cancer. In respect of arthritis the research may perhaps best be conducted along with clinical effort or with treatment effort, whereas in respect of cancer, while one should attack it from both the educational and the clinical point of view, perhaps its solution—and I say "perhaps"—lies in the field of fundamental research.

I take this opportunity, because it is the first I have had, to tell the committee what has been attempted in an effort to bring about the control of one of man's deadliest enemies, cancer. I found, shortly after I became minister, that my own feelings with regard to cancer had been seriously considered not only by my own officers but by my predecessor. There have been discussions in this house from time to time. Hon. gentlemen will recall one of our former members who sat not far from where the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) now sits and who since has died, a victim of cancer. One cannot help but recall the stirring appeals which he made to this house and nation. I must say that I resolved when I became Minister of National Health and Welfare that whatever energies I possessed would be employed at the outset in seeing if we could not in some way make sure that the instruments of war were made available to our research people and others in this country who might make a contribution in the control of cancer. I found that my predecessor had anticipated me considerably, because steps had already been taken to try to bring about some coordination of cancer control in Canada.

I found, on looking at some of the statistics, some of which have been referred to tonight by the hon. gentleman, that during the war, while we were fighting for decency and freedom, 35,000 of our young men and women died and during that same period 80,000 Canadians died from cancer. I note the following statistics:

	Deaths from cancer
1921	6,153
1925	7,153
1931	9,578
1935	11,156
1940	13,322

So I say to all sides of the house that this is a problem which must engage our fullest attention. There are extenuating circumstances in these mortality rates which should be observed. The increase is due to two certain factors. First, the population of Canada has increased and, second, the proportion of older people in the Canadian population has become greater. But even if we take those factors into account, there appears to have been an increase of approximately nine per cent in the standardized cancer deathrate. If that trend continues—what I have noted by way of trend is true not only of Canada but of all countries in the world—and no external influences such as immigration or other unknown factors interfere, from now until 1960 some 220,000 people in this country will die of cancer. If the statistics persist in their consistency, 15,000 Canadians will die this year of this dreaded disease. There are some who find these facts repugnant and who think they should not be emphasized, but I am not one of those, nor is the government. We feel that we should face this situation frankly and see if we cannot address ourselves to the problem.

What were we to do? I sat down with my officials and discussed this matter the first day I was in the department. I put myself at their disposal and prepared to use professional knowledge. I was told then of some projects that my predecessor had in mind. I recognize that there is now on a regional basis in this country a great deal of work being done on cancer; I recognize that in Ontario, in Saskatchewan and in practically all provinces to a varying degree there is being done important work on the clinical, on the educational and, to a lesser extent, on the research side. There are centres in Ontario and Quebec particularly, where important research is being done.

There was no suggestion in our minds that these localized efforts to try to find an answer were not commendable; that was not in the thoughts of the Department of National Health and Welfare when we suggested to all provincial governments, to the representatives of the national research council, medical division; the Saskatchewan cancer commission; the Canadian cancer society; the Canadian medical association; the Canadian public health association; the Ontario cancer treatment and research foundation; the Manitoba cancer relief and research institute; the British Columbia cancer foundation, the medical faculties of the universities, that they should send their key men to a conference which was called on January 27 and 28 last here in Ottawa.

There was perhaps no legal authority to call that conference because, under the constitution, matters of health, except those referred to specifically in the British North America Act, came primarily under the provinces.

Many of the provinces regard that particular field jealously; they regard it as a field in which they should have priority of interest in both administration and policy. But it seemed to me that, acting as a friend of the court, as it were, I as Minister of National Health and Welfare might perhaps receive a ready acceptance from all these bodies, including the provincial governments, to attend a conference at which, at any rate, we could have a general discussion of the problem—and we did.

I must pay my tribute tonight to the representatives of the various organizations to which I have made reference, to the medical colleges of the universities and to lay bodies like the Canadian cancer association which have done such a satisfactory job in bringing to public attention the desirability of early diagnosis. The Canadian cancer association has made a very important contribution. I also want to pay a tribute to the officers of my department for the part they played in the conference of last January.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask if the medical departments of the provinces cooperated?

Mr. MARTIN: Every one of the provincial departments of health cooperated. I was anxious to learn from them, as I am sure every hon. member would be, whether or not our maximum effort was being put forward to eradicate this disease or whether, as I suggested a moment ago, we were only making a piecemeal attack on a great national hazard. I learned that what has often been referred to as the war against cancer was not a total war. The campaign was, in reality, a series of local attacks, many of them magnificently fought, nevertheless not capable of justifying the designation of an all-out national campaign.

There was the lack of research workers, the lack of laboratory facilities, the lack of coordination of effort, and particularly the lack of the instruments, material and human, by which we could at least say that we were putting forward our best effort. It became apparent as well that the public conscience was uneasy and that the time was ripe to mobilize our entire efforts in some sort of unified or coordinating command or body. The moment had come, it seemed to me, and it seemed to them, when a concerted, well-organized and a properly directed attack on cancer should be pursued. It was generally recognized by those who were there, men like Doctor Charles Best, one of the great collaborators and co-discoverers of insulin, and Doctor Collip and others that I could mention who have made a contribution in one field or another in medical scientific research, that no advance could be made until we had some sort of intelligence report. They canvassed the problem from every angle, and after two days of full discussion preceded by ex parte reports and submissions, we were able to arrive at a full measure of agreement. First of all, there was a discussion as to what was being done in the field of education. We reviewed the extent of scientific research at present being carried on at the universities. We heard reports about the facilities set up in the provinces for diagnosis and treatment of sufferers of cancer, and we inquired into the reasons why so few young men were willing to devote themselves to full-time investigation of the causes and cure of malignant growths.

Then our attention was turned to the urgent necessity for assessing the whole problem by means of surveys and the need for adopting some form of uniform reporting, not only of deaths from cancer, but also the data about cases that have been diagnosed, treated and saved from dying. Lastly, and perhaps of most importance, ways and means were explored by which an adequate campaign against cancer could be waged. The conference moved unerringly towards one objective. When we talk about the problem of unity in this country I think of medical men and laymen from all provinces working together so that problems in Canada may be solved. I think, for instance, of Doctor Simard of the university of Montreal, and I think of Doctors Vezina and Bergere of Laval collaborating with men like the former dean of the School of Medicine of the university of Western Ontario, Dean Hall, now president of the university; I think of men like Best and Collip and the dean of McGill and so on, all working toward a common objective.

Mr. POULIOT: And Doctor Adélard Groulx and Mayor Camillien Houde of Montreal.

Mr. MARTIN: One had the impression there of what could be done to meet the objectives of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), that this is a problem which should engage our full cooperative effort on all levels of government and of all classes in the community.

We moved unerringly forward to a single objective, namely, that we should formulate and direct a national cancer control programme. It was decided to set up a body that is now known as the National Cancer Institute of Canada. May I say at once the word "institute" may conjure up in the minds of some the idea of brick and mortar. That, I can say, is not and was not the intention of the founders of the institute. That sort of thing may come later, but an effort will be made first to try to bring about in the three avenues I have mentioned some control of this dreaded disease. No one can guarantee that the efforts of the institute and the work that they may project will succeed; but we should be able to say, I trust, after some years of experiment with this particular technique, that we have done all that we know how as human beings to try to meet this problem.

The institute, I may say, as a result of their own decision is a non-governmental body, non-profit making. The men and women who had come from all parts of Canada decided that it would be better to have this institute modeled along the lines perhaps of the Imperial Cancer Institute in Great Britain and corresponding bodies in the United States which are non-governmental. There was, however, proper acknowledgement of the part which both provincial and federal governments made in initiating the conference. It was thought that cancer control is dependent upon many factors; first, that there is a serious shortage of young scientists in Canada who are qualified or trained in the technique of cancer research. This includes both men and women in laboratory or clinical investigation teams. The reason is apparent. Young graduates in medicine, biology and the physical sciences find that they have to make a living after graduation. This they cannot do on the grants which are available to them through various organizations at present sometimes dispensing aid to research. The universities in many instances are not sufficiently endowed to pay adequate living allowances. The national research council has its responsibility and I am sure, when the problem is canvassed, as it is being canvassed, that body will show and continue to show its deep concern and interest in the problem. The final result, however, is that our young graduates, particularly, those with a bent towards research, are being directed sometimes in other quarters and elsewhere where they are provided with the necessary conditions under which they can give their full attention to investigation without worrying unduly over clothing, shelter and food. The National Cancer Institute plans to do something about this state of affairs.

Second—and this concerns physicians and their patients directly—there is a need for reviving the excellent undergraduate and post-graduate educational programme begun by the Canadian Medical Association before the war. The war made it necessary to abandon temporarily these lectureships throughout the country. Personnel was simply not available with over three thousand doctors in the service.

The founders of the institute declared their belief that the universities, and the medical schools which are actively engaged in cancer research will recruit more research students who have an increasing awareness of their responsibility to professional education. Doctors will be even more enthusiastic in making early diagnosis and in keeping accurate studies of their patients and making close contact with the special treatment centres so wisely provided throughout the provinces.

It was the opinion of the conference that some uniform system of reporting cases and deaths should exist throughout the provinces, and steps will be taken to explore this question as it was explored at the last meeting at the Dominion Council of Health. It is thought that, with every physician contributing to cancer research in this way, the problem of cancer control will attain its true perspective.

Third, it is obvious that physicians can diagnose only the cases of those who come to consult them. This is where the splendid work of the Canadian Cancer Society comes into proper focus. As I have said, this organization deserves the warmest praise of everyone in Canada. They have persistently presented to the people the opportunity and the benefits of early diagnosis and the necessity of medical examination.

One of the conclusions of the conference was that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as one of the trustees of the King George V cancer fund, should address himself to the trustees of the fund to see if the fund could not be placed at the disposal of the cancer institute to enable it to carry on its work. I regretted having to intervene when the hon. member for Lanark was speaking, but I am sure he will agree that I should have intervened to indicate clearly that this cancer fund was in no wise under the control of the government, but that the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the Chief Justice of Canada, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Professor Boyd of the university of Toronto, and one gentleman representing the insurance bodies should be approached as trustees of the fund to see if the claims of the institute for financial assistance did not deserve attention. I may say that the motion moved by the Prime Minister and seconded by the leader of the opposition reflected the determination of the trustees of the fund to see that every initial opportunity was given to the cancer institute to carry on its work. That has been done. A sum of money on a three-year basis has been turned over by the trustees of the fund to the cancer institute. The president of the institute is Doctor Blair of Saskatchewan; the vice-president is Doctor Simard of Montreal. Then there is Doctor Low Little, an eminent physician of Guelph and lately of the Department of National Health, who has taken over the active secretaryship and direction of the organization.

Mr. TIMMINS: How much has been turned over to the institute on a three year basis?

Mr. MARTIN: Four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The idea is to give $150,000 each year for a three-year period. At the end of the first year the directors of the institute are to appear before the trustees and indicate how they have expended the funds.

I simply make this observation and I say this as one who has no official connection now with the institute. My part in it was humble, that of calling a conference together and giving it an opportunity, by virtue of the particular portfolio which I hold, of trying to bring about some decision in the field of coordinated activity and effort.

Mr. HACKETT: How much is in the fund?

Mr. MARTIN: Approximately $490,000 I think, but the institute has been given $450,000. I now speak not as a member of the institute because I am not, but as one who is anxious to see the institute do its job so that no stone will be left unturned. It is important that the beginnings be sound. Whatever assistance comes from the dominion or provincial government—and I am not now making any statement with regard to contributions; that I will do at the proper time—it will be recognized, I am sure, that whatever assistance is given a large sum of money will be needed over the period, and there will be large sums needed if the research projects contemplated by the institute are to be undertaken.

One of the great avenues of assistance will be not only from official but from private sources. I can say at this juncture without in any way breaking confidences that already individuals in this country have shown themselves anxious to make their contribution toward the remedial efforts of one of the greatest maladies known to man, and whenever the institute makes its decision as to the form and nature of its appeal I am sure it will find all groups in this country anxious to make the work of the institute a notable success.

The future of the institute is in the hands of the professional and lay men in this country interested in this problem. I can only say at this juncture that I have exhibited, and I say this humbly, on the part of the department a real interest and a determination to see that we do everything to try to meet this problem.

I think the other matters to which the hon. gentleman referred can be dealt with as we proceed. I want to thank him again for giving me an opportunity to make a statement which I think is of great importance and to say to him how much I appreciate the kind of contribution he himself made tonight.

Mr. TIMMINS: I am sure the committee thanks the minister for his remarks in respect of cancer and the programme of the government with regard to the national cancer institute. There arise out of his remarks some questions with which I should like to deal.

It is quite clear that the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund contains at the present time only $490,000, and the minister stated a few moments ago that $150,000 a year is to be turned over to the institute in each of the next three years. I presume that this money will be used, for the most part in educational work, with a good portion of it being used for research, because that seems to be the matter with which the cancer institute will mostly concern itself.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not quite agree with that statement of the functions of the institute as declared by the institute. I just want to make that reservation.

Mr. TIMMINS: I have before me a return which was made by the minister's department on the 29th of May, in which the question was asked as to the annual expenditure in 1935 to 1945 through the national research council directed at finding the cause and cure of cancer, and the answer given in the return had this to say, among other things:

> Any person qualified to direct medical research and having the required fundamental laboratory facilities at his disposal—

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, he is referring to something else altogether. I was talking about the institute. He is now referring to the medical division of the national research council.

Mr. TIMMINS: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend's statement. I perhaps did not state clearly the aims and objects of the institute. They are:

1. To coordinate and correlate the efforts of individuals and organized bodies with a view to reducing the morbidity and mortality from cancer in Canada.

2. To aid in establishing and maintaining or to establish and maintain fundamental research activities in the field of cancer.

3. To assist in the training of prospective scientists who may be interested in the field of cancer research by the award of fellowships for this purpose.

4. To collect, assess and disseminate scientific knowledge and material relating to cancer.

Mr. TIMMINS: I thank the minister for his interruption. The return to which I am referring has to do with applications made and taken care of by the national research council. During the period of some ten years it appears that the national research council spent some $4,364 on cancer research. I would ask the minister this question. Is it not to be assumed that the duties of the national cancer institute will override the former powers and the former work of the national research council in respect of cancer? Will the cancer institute take over the work which formerly the national research council did in regard to cancer?

Mr. MARTIN: To some extent, with the cooperation of the national research council. I regret to have to say that my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs has an important motion to make and has to leave before eleven o'clock. I trust the committee will allow him to intervene at this time.

Progress reported.
